All we say about that is that we want to know what that collection is going to be in order that we may be satisfied, before we put $15 million into a project, that the farmers are going to be able to live on the land and finance themselves after that collection is made. No other suggestion has been made. Some people think that we have been a long time getting together. The present position is that we have been discussing proposals made by the province and they have been considering proposals made by us. We think we are pretty close to the time when we can reach an agreement. I have been a little concerned, as well as the hon. member for Lethbridge, that in our discussions we should not get into a position where misunderstandings might be created where there are none now, and where there have not been any.

As a matter of fact the government of Alberta have always acknowledged, in any discussions I have had with them, that irrigation is a provincial responsibility. They have never questioned it, but they have said that no matter how much it is a provincial responsibility there is no way they can raise all the money that is necessary in order to take care of the cost, which at the time the Meek report was made was $43 an acre for land, and which today at present rates is $70 an acre for land. The province naturally says that even if it were their responsibility, and if the federal government were to say that they would not assume any obligation in connection with it, they just could not go on with the project at all.

We understand that, and all that has been suggested up to the moment is that we follow the same principle that was recommended in the Meek report and try to find some division of responsibility which will result in a fifty-fifty apportionment of cost, part of the provincial share of which can be collected from the farmers. I do not think we will have any insurmountable obstacles to overcome, and for the benefit of the hon. member for Moose Jaw may I say that I do not think we will have any insurmountable obstacles to overcome when the same principles are applied to Saskatchewan, or to any of the projects that might be developed in western Canada. I hope that the discussion will at least have thrown some light on the matter.

Mr. Thatcher: On that point, the minister said that he did not anticipate any difficulties when he got to Saskatchewan. He said this afternoon and just now that the federal government assumes the cost of the dam, but the point I cannot get clear—and I am sorry if I am dense about it—is what he meant last night when he said at page 772 of Hansard:

> . . . I think there is a good argument for saying that they—
> The provincial government of Saskatchewan.
> —can pay $3 million or $4 million a year in order to have this irrigation project carried out in that period of time.

In the preceding paragraph he said that the project would take ten years. Therefore that would mean that the Saskatchewan government would have to pay $30 million or $40 million as their share. If the minister did not mean that was their share of the dam, does he mean to say that the provincial government would have to pay $30 million or $40 million for subsidiary pipe lines and things of that kind? I wish he would clarify that point. I would feel very much better if I could have it clarified.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the minister one other question, and he can answer both at the same time. I thought the matter had all been cleared up and that there was no doubt about it. Now I read what the minister said yesterday, and I heard what he said today. I should like to ask a very simple question which will clear up the whole matter as far as I am concerned. Will the construction of the dam at Elbow, or whatever place is determined upon on the south Saskatchewan, be gone ahead with irrespective of whether the province of Saskatchewan agrees to pay 50 per cent, or whatever percentage may be determined, of the anticipated irrigation costs?

Mr. Gardiner: As has been explained to the committee on many occasions, the position is that on the St. Mary river the dominion government undertook to build the dam. There was only one real reason why we gave that undertaking at the time. We were in the middle of a war; and we had been notified that unless we started to utilize the water of the St. Mary river it would be taken by the Americans as a matter of right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: For power?

Mr. Gardiner: Power, irrigation or anything they wanted to use it for. We said we were not in a position to sit down and discuss the recommendations contained in this report or any other recommendations and decide upon an agreement of the kind suggested there. They said they would not be going ahead with their project in wartime, so we felt that some time after the war we should sit down with the provincial authorities and decide when to go ahead with it, and that when we did so the whole matter should be considered in the light of the conditions then existing. This is only a suggestion made by the committee in regard to a division of the cost. We had said already that we were going to build the St. Mary dam, war or no war; that we were going to get on with the job as fast as we could. It so happened that the contracts were not let until 1946. There was a good deal of engineering work to be done, but we got at it as soon as possible after the war, and we then announced as government policy that in any of the larger irrigation projects in which we took part we would at least build the dams necessary for the storage of water in order to make irrigation a possibility. But we also said that anything beyond that was a provincial responsibility.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where was that said?

Mr. Gardiner: It has been said a thousand times. It was said here tonight when another hon. gentleman was trying to suggest that back in 1947, I think it was, I had said something different to what I said last night.

Mr. Thatcher: If I may interrupt, would the minister clarify what he said last night to the effect that the provincial government would have three or four million dollars—

Mr. Gardiner: Don't hurry me; I am coming to that. I am answering my hon. friend across the way first, but I will get around to you soon. The position taken then was that there would be no question about the main storage dam to provide water so that irrigation could be carried on. Whenever it was determined that a project was to be proceeded with, we would build the dam. As applied to the south Saskatchewan, this means that once the government undertakes to proceed with that project the dam in the south Saskatchewan river, whatever it costs, will be built and paid for by the dominion government. In the order in council which was passed—and which was read to this house after it was passed—and which has been accepted by all three prairie provinces as the basis of their policy, it is clearly stated that before the dominion government will proceed with the building of any dam the province must first give us assurances that they are going to use the water and then must tell us how they are going to use it. I am quite sure the hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Moose Jaw will recall that last spring the government of Saskatchewan not only signed the agreement under the order in council but made a lengthy announcement to the public to the effect that they would be prepared to utilize the water.

Well, that is the basis of the whole thing. When we come to decide what the province is to pay and what the federal government is to pay, no doubt we will figure the cost of constructing the dam on any of these projects, and then we will discuss with the province the amount of money it can put up in order to assist in completing the whole project. That is the way we are discussing with the city of Regina and the provincial government at the present time the amount of money that each body ought to put up in order to bring water to Regina. The suggestion has been made that the city might put up one-third and the province one-third, and that the dominion might consider putting up an amount which would work out at not more than one-third. That may be the position we will be in when we construct the dam on the south Saskatchewan. I do not know whether the dam is going to cost $66 million. That was not the estimate at the time negotiations were commenced. At that time the estimate was that the whole project would cost $66 million.

Mr. Thatcher: I am sure the minister would like to answer my question.

Mr. Gardiner: I am just coming to it now. If you will contain yourself in patience you may get on the record something you will understand when you read it.

Mr. Thatcher: Well, I hope so.

Mr. Gardiner: The estimate of the cost of the whole project at the time it was first discussed was some $66 million.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was that just for power?

Mr. Gardiner: No; that included the dam and other works that would be necessary to put the water in a position where it could be utilized. Later it was estimated that the cost would be much greater. As a matter of fact I would not be at all surprised if by the time we are through with it the whole project cost more than $100 million. When we speak about the dam costing a certain amount, we are speaking of what the dominion government is prepared to do; but we must have some assurance that the province is going to at least assist in paying the additional cost, before putting in the dam and making provision for power facilities and irrigation possibilities which may never be utilized. I can say to this committee, what will be obvious, that if we built the St. Mary dam and the water was not utilized, there would not be a vote put through this house for a long time to build another dam. This house is not going to pass a vote running up to five, six, seven or eight million dollars to put in a dam and then find that the authorities which should utilize the water for power and irrigation have not done so. That would be even more true if we started with the Saskatchewan river dam, which would be the most expensive of all, and put fifty or sixty million dollars into the project and then found it merely standing there providing a lake 145 miles long and 200 feet deep at the dam. It would be a nice thing to look at, and perhaps we could sail our boats on it occasionally, but it would not serve the purpose for which the people of this country put up the money. So we must have assurances from somebody that the organization will be set up to utilize the water, and that they are going to contribute a share of the cost sufficient to ensure that they will take some responsibility for seeing that the work is carried on.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw asked how I figured that the province might pay the amount he mentioned. Well, I still say that the province of Saskatchewan as I know it—and I think I know it as well as any person does—can raise three or four or five million dollars a year to put into a project which, if it is carried through to a successful conclusion, will bring in more revenue than any other project that could be undertaken in that province. I did not say that they could raise $50 million or $60 million in a year, but they could raise $50 million or $60 million to complete that work over a considerable period. I noticed in some of the estimates for highway undertakings the government is prepared to spend some $17 million in order to see that people can move about in the province of Saskatchewan. I have no doubt that any government in Saskatchewan would take the responsibility for seeing to it that a project which promised to give industry and agriculture greater possibilities for production, as the south Saskatchewan project would do, would not hesitate to obligate themselves for a considerable part of the cost of putting in this plant. This is particularly true when that government would be able to charge back approximately 25 per cent of the total cost to the farmer, or whatever it works out to be when the whole project is finally concluded. I hope I have answered the question that was in my friend's mind.

Mr. Thatcher: The minister has been very general in his remarks. I still would like a specific answer.

Mr. Gardiner: I am going to give you a specific answer in so far as the south Saskatchewan project is concerned. We will expect the government of Saskatchewan, plus the farmers who are going to be interested in it, to pay about half the cost.

Mr. Thatcher: You calculate this $30 million or $40 million would be the subsidiary cost, not the cost of the dam?

Mr. Gardiner: No one knows just what that is. As a matter of fact, the $2 million the government is spending now is to find that out.

Mr. Thatcher: Last night the minister stated it would take ten years to complete the project and the province's share would possibly be $3 million or $4 million per year which would be a total of $30 million or $40 million. If the federal government has to pay a certain amount, I am taking it from your suggestion that the subsidiary amount would be $60 million or $70 million in addition to the cost of the dam. I should like to know on what you base those figures.

Mr. Gardiner: If the plan is carried out to the extent it is being advocated, it will cost well over $100 million.

Mr. Thatcher: For the dam or the subsidiary costs?

Mr. Gardiner: No, the whole program of putting water on the land and putting in power facilities. The whole thing will cost well over $100 million.

Mr. Thatcher: But how much will the subsidiary costs be?

Mr. Gardiner: The government's position in the discussions is that we start from the point that we think the provinces, plus those who are going to benefit by the project, should pay about fifty per cent of the cost. I am not saying the discussions will finish on that note. The government will try to do the reasonable thing. All the time we are trying to do that, we will not have in mind the government of the province of Saskatchewan as such, nor the government of the Dominion of Canada as such. We will have concluded that the Dominion of Canada believes this is a worth-while national project and is, therefore, prepared to put some money into it. We will have concluded that the provincial government believes it is a worthwhile provincial project and will be prepared to put some money into it. The chief concern in all our negotiations is that the farmer does not have to pay any more than it is possible for him to pay and still live in ordinary comfort upon the land he is going to occupy.

In other words, those considering irrigation projects, either in the United States or this country, know that farm land cannot carry the cost of putting in irrigation. The same is true of farm land in the maritime provinces. It cannot pay the cost of putting dikes around marshlands. The land just will not bear that cost, so it has to be a proposition that is large enough and important enough to the nation. It is important because thousands of people can live where nobody can live now—at least, if they do try to live there, they live under conditions under which no government would want to see its people living. It is our belief that the national expenditure and the provincial expenditure should be such that, when the job is complete, these farmers can live there under the conditions that most people who are talking about social services and other things are hoping all people will be able to live under.

I have stated our objective. I do not know of any way in which I could be nailed down. Even if I were, it would not make any difference because I shall not be here long enough to carry out the whole project. I am simply laying down the principle that is in the mind of the government, and in my own mind as minister. It is our desire to make it possible for thousands of people to live on lands that today are not occupied. Those lands are some of the best in the Dominion of Canada; all they need is water. We believe we can put water on them. In helping to do that, we expect to spend sufficient money to make it possible for the provincial government to continue to give the services to the people that should be given and for the farmer to be able to live on the land under conditions that we all wish to see him living under.

Mr. Thatcher: The minister still has not answered my question. Perhaps I have not been clear enough.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask the hon. member a question? At what price are you going to sell boots and shoes five years from now?

Mr. Thatcher: I do not sell them.

Mr. Gardiner: At what price are you going to sell stoves five years from now?

Mr. Thatcher: I think I am being reasonable in this request. I am only asking for some information for the people of Saskatchewan. Last night the minister said this, as reported at page 772 of Hansard—

Mr. Gardiner: All you have to do is look at the last election returns and you will know that the people of Saskatchewan understand me very well.

Mr. Thatcher: At page 772 of Hansard the minister said:

> But it would be absolutely impossible to construct the south Saskatchewan river project in less than ten years.

I agree with him. At another point on that page he says:

> If the government of Saskatchewan can raise $20 million more, I think there is a good argument for saying that they can pay $3 million or $4 million a year in order to have this irrigation project carried out in that period of time.

If I can take the minister's words literally, that means the province of Saskatchewan may have to pay $30 million or $40 million towards this project, but not for the main dam. All I want the minister to tell me is what the subsidiary expenses are that would amount to $60 million or $80 million including the two shares.

Mr. Gardiner: There is six hundred thousand acres of land to which you have to distribute water, and some of that water has to be pumped. Some of this land has to be levelled; not all of it, but some of it. There is a dam on the Qu'Appelle river which will be 75 feet high, and that will be in addition to the one we are talking about on the south Saskatchewan river. There are works that would have to be put in order to make it possible to develop power from the dam. There are many other works as well. It is well understood that when you have built the dam you have only started to carry out an irrigation project.

Mr. Thatcher: The minister would not say he was guessing last night?

Mr. Gardiner: I would say this: neither my hon. friend nor anyone else knows exactly what the costs are going to be, so there has to be a certain amount of guessing. I was not guessing when I said any government in the province of Saskatchewan could pay $3 million or $4 million a year towards the project.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I believe every member from the province of Saskatchewan as well as Alberta will have listened with interest to the statement the Minister of Agriculture has just made. He said, "I do not know any way in which I can be nailed down." When he said that, I was reminded of—

Mr. Cruickshank: Of the 27th of June.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —a statement made some years ago in the British House of Commons by Lloyd George in regard to de Valera. He said trying to pin him down was like "trying to pick up mercury with a fork." After listening to the cross-examination of the member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) and how well the minister kept away from answering the simple questions that were asked, Lloyd George's remarks appear applicable.

The people of Saskatchewan will be most deeply disappointed by the statement made this evening by the minister. I say that because over the years—it goes back to 1946—the minister has consistently brought before the people of Saskatchewan the promise of a new hope for them through the development of power on the south Saskatchewan power project. The resultant industrialization of Saskatchewan would assure the maintenance of the population of that province. His promise caused him to receive large and generous support for his party during the last federal election.

As I listened to him, I could not conceive that the minister who was speaking in this house was the minister upon whom the people of Saskatchewan have placed such reliance. I am not going to quote the promises—I have them here—but I am going to quote the reaction of the Saskatchewan press to them. It is not the C.C.F. press to which he referred yesterday in answer to the hon. member for Moose Jaw. The press that supported the government in Saskatchewan cannot but be disappointed by his statement this evening.

Mr. Warren: They did not elect many Tories.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was not discussing the matter in that light. I am quoting from the Liberal press now, and I can refer to chapter and verse. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I ask the minister this question. In Saskatchewan, when speaking to the organization set up in the province to provide irrigation and water supply for the city of Moose Jaw and the city of Regina, did he ever say that only if the provincial government were prepared to provide 50 per cent, or a proportion close to 50 per cent of the cost of irrigation, the dam would be proceeded with? When did he ever say that unless that were done the dam would not be proceeded with?

Mr. Gardiner: Would the hon. member like that answered now?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member for Regina City, and any others who are here who have been following the discussion of this question, will recall that a meeting was called in the city of Regina in either 1946 or 1947—I have not the exact date in mind—in order to form the association which is promoting the irrigation of land in Saskatchewan, particularly as related to the dam in the south Saskatchewan river. On that occasion I was asked to be the main speaker. They set up their organization. They appointed their president and their committee, and they asked me to speak to them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where was that speech made?

Mr. Gardiner: In Regina, in the Saskatchewan hotel, at a banquet which was attended by two or three hundred of the promoters of the scheme. On that occasion I called their attention to the fact that we had built two dams south of Swift Current, and that the water in those dams was not being utilized to the extent that had been suggested by those who were going to be served by it. I pointed out that it was the responsibility of the provincial government and of the local authorities to utilize that water, and indicated to them that unless they did there was not much possibility of their ever persuading the federal government to build other larger works which would cost much more money. I used this term in describing it. I said: "These dams will be pointed to in a very short time as white elephants created at the expense of all the people of Canada; they are not being utilized, and I think you should get busy and utilize them." As a result of that there was very considerable activity and the water is being utilized, and the provincial government has taken its share of the responsibility in seeing that it was done, and so have the municipalities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That answer again deals with these two small dams.

Mr. Gardiner: It dealt with the big one, too. That is what we were talking about.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It does not deal with the south Saskatchewan dam project. That is what I am dealing with. No doubt the minister did say that certain small dams—

Mr. Gardiner: That meeting was held for the purpose of discussing the south Saskatchewan dam. I told them that, before they started asking us to put in another dam, they had better start utilizing the water in the dams they had.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I hold in my hand several speeches delivered by my hon. friend. I say that when he spoke in the city of Regina he spoke of the necessity for the utilization of the waters of two small dams.

Mr. Gardiner: When?

Mr. Diefenbaker: In Saskatchewan, at no time has he ever publicly said that this dam would be held up. When I say "this dam" I refer to the south Saskatchewan river dam. At no time did he ever publicly say that this dam would be held up unless the provincial government would contribute to the irrigation.

Mr. Gardiner: That is exactly what I was talking about. That is exactly what I was invited to talk about. What I was talking about was the south Saskatchewan dam.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a strange thing, Mr. Chairman, that no newspaper in Saskatchewan took that meaning from anything that the minister said.

Mr. Gardiner: I can get the newspaper tomorrow morning.

Mr. McCusker: On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I was present at that meeting, and I can verify every word that the minister has said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All I have to say is this—

[Inaudible interruption.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask the hon. member who has just interrupted to rise in his place. I cannot understand these interruptions that come from wherever the hon. member hides himself. I am trying to discuss a matter that is of interest to every person in Saskatchewan. The Saskatoon Star-Phoenix is a supporter of the government. On July 15, 1947, after the Minister of Agriculture had spoken, the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix pointed out the situation with regard to this project in these words:

> It will be two years before construction work can begin on the south Saskatchewan river dam. But it is not too early to begin exploring the problem of how costs can be met. The prairie farm rehabilitation report has estimated the cost of the dam and "appurtenant works" at $66,360,000. In the whole range of possible reconstruction works in Canada, the only undertaking that may exceed this in national importance would be the St. Lawrence seaway. The south Saskatchewan development will yield national benefits and it must be carried out as a national undertaking. It is not, of course, a relief project or anything of the kind. It is a project to bring a mighty river under control, to divert to fruitful use its swift volume of water (of which almost no use has been made in the 70 years that settlers have lived along its banks), to stabilize the livelihood of a million people on the plains and to make economic living space for as many more, and finally to expand the commerce that flows between the west and the east in Canada. A hundred million dollars expended in this project would return itself many times over in a few years.
> That the south Saskatchewan project will be carried out, let no one doubt. Mr. Gardiner has committed the present government to the undertaking, according to a report of his speech at Lethbridge the other day. The funds for the project must come from the nation's credit. The main problem is to get the parliament of Canada to approve the expenditure of $66,360,000.

Mr. Gardiner: On a $100 million project.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It said that it must be a national project. I come to the speeches my right hon. friend made just a year ago,—the first on October 16, 1948, during the by-election in Rosthern.

I asked the minister a few moments ago whether, in the event that the province would not supply the necessary money for this irrigation project, the dam would be gone ahead with as a power project—in other words, to provide for industrialization.

Mr. Gardiner: You are asking a hypothetical question which will not happen. But Saskatchewan will have a government which will assist.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, but that was not the view last year, as I shall read.

Mr. Gardiner: It might even be a government under your new leader you have just come back from choosing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is all very well for the minister to say that. If promises had been made by us they would have been carried out; and when the minister makes a promise the people take him at his word.

Mr. Gardiner: That is because for thirty-five years I have always carried out any promises I made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then I am asking the minister now to continue what he says has been his practice for thirty-five years. That is the very reason I am bringing this to his attention—and by his interruptions he is not diverting me from reading his promises.

I take this from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix:

Great Industrial Development Seen if Big Dam Built

Unexpected industrial development would follow construction of the proposed Outlook dam, Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner told the annual meeting of the Saskatoon Liberal Association, Thursday night. The federal agricultural minister predicted that the dam would furnish electric power for a wide farming area as well as providing irrigation for many acres. It would mean a changing economy for this sector of the province, he said.

Under the heading "His Main Job" the article continues:

Mr. Gardiner said his main task in the commons—as well as that of W. A. Boucher, if elected, in the Rosthern by-election—would be to "push the building of the dam as much as possible." . . . "The time has come when we must put great emphasis on the development of this country," Mr. Gardiner declared.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

And then a little later, on October 22, 1948, we find this in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix:

The fact that two federal cabinet ministers have expressed a favourable attitude toward the south Saskatchewan river irrigation and power project in the Rosthern by-election campaign has contributed to make this one of the main campaign issues, Walter Tucker, Saskatchewan Liberal leader, declared at a public meeting here Thursday night.

Mr. Tucker said that it is "now up to the people of Rosthern to give their endorsement by electing William A. Boucher, Liberal candidate—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cruickshank: A good man. They elected him, too.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, they did. It continues:

—if they want the project proceeded with."

You may applaud that.

He added, "You certainly won't get anywhere by sending C.C.F.'ers to Ottawa; the election of Makaroff would be tantamount to repudiation of the great scheme."

"We have now reached the stage where public opinion will have to be mobilized behind the project to help obtain the passage through parliament of the necessary funds." Mr. Tucker continued, "it is imperative for the people of Rosthern to send Mr. Boucher to Ottawa to help Mr. Gardiner in his fight for it."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wright: You have a cheering section now.

Mr. Gardiner: You ought to read one of your own speeches.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I appreciate the help from all quarters of the house.

Mr. Cruickshank: And you need it, too.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It continues:

The fact that the Hon. Paul Martin, Minister of National Health and Welfare, had shown a favourable attitude toward the project while he participated in the by-election campaign, was construed by Mr. Tucker as evidence that advocates of the project were making headway in winning converts in the east.

Then on October 21, 1948, the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix carries the headline "Outlook Dam Would Mean Development of Heavy Industry in West Canada", and states:

Development of irrigation and power on the south Saskatchewan river by means of the Outlook dam would mean industrial and agricultural development of western Canada similar to the Essen country of Germany.

In another report appearing in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of October 23, 1948, under the heading "Immense Benefits from Dam," it is stated that:

In a speech Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner said, "If this part of the country could be turned into an industrial as well as an agricultural area, it would be possible for it to support twice the population that it does now."

Mr. Gardiner: Did you not say all that, and a lot more, in your speeches?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely, I said it. And I am asking for the construction of the dam so that we can industrialize Saskatchewan. That is the reason I am asking for it.

Mr. Cruickshank: You will never be in power to do it; we will be.

Mr. Cleaver: Would the hon. member permit a question from an Ontario member?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. member sit down?

Mr. Cleaver: Then I shall ask it when he has finished.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the interruption?

An hon. Member: Will he ever get through?

Mr. Cleaver: I had a question to ask, but the hon. member would not answer it. I shall ask it later on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The article continues:

> Cheap power is the open sesame to industrial growth. With a dam at its back door almost assured, and with the resultant cheap water power available in the not too distant future, Saskatoon stands at the gateway to new and unprecedented development.

I could go on and read further references from the speeches made by my right hon. friend, all of which point out the necessity for power development in our province, with incidental irrigation development. I say to him this, that if we in that province now are to find ourselves in the position where the dam is not to be proceeded with unless the provincial government says that it will spend several million dollars a year to take up 50 per cent or thereabouts of the irrigation costs then, sir—

Mr. Cruickshank: Why shouldn't you?

Mr. Green: Stick to the Fraser valley.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We supported the hon. member last year when he was advocating assistance for the Fraser valley at the time of a national disaster. Saskatchewan is losing population. We have 70,000 less in that province now than we had in 1936. This project represents the hope of the people of that province, and it is for that reason that I defend it in this House of Commons.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member is a good friend of mine—a personal friend. He will admit this, that British Columbia paid 25 per cent of the cost of that expenditure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not argue that point at all. But I am arguing this, that so far as a dam is concerned to produce the necessary power to be made available for industrialization, we in the province of Saskatchewan have the right to expect that this project will be proceeded with nationally.

When the minister was answering the hon. member for Moose Jaw I could not believe that he was placing before this committee his considered view that this project, which represents so much to hundreds of thousands of people in our province, is to be placed in a position where its construction, instead of being a national undertaking, is to be an undertaking in part national and in part provincial.

The minister distributed a map when he spoke in Saskatoon, showing the benefits of this project. When he spoke, he raised no question at any time that this project was going to be dependent upon whether or not the water would be actually utilized for irrigation purposes. He placed before the people of Saskatoon, in that address before the board of trade, the benefits which would follow in keeping in Saskatchewan the thousands who are leaving that province.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend should attend some of my meetings because—

Mr. Ferrie: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend should attend some of my meetings because I have never made an address on this subject without calling attention to the fact that the province has some obligation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The press did not report it?

Mr. Gardiner: They reported it once. Anything that has been said half a dozen times is not news any longer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They did not report it once.

Mr. Gardiner: They reported it when it was necessary to report it. It was always understood.

Mr. Ferrie: May I ask the hon. member for Lake Centre if at any time in the history of Saskatchewan he went around and said that the minister had let Saskatchewan down?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Ferrie: I should like that question answered.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend asks a question that has nothing whatever to do with this matter. It is not pertinent, and the kind of question one would expect the hon. gentleman to ask.

An hon. Member: Very smart.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Having said that, may I say that I am surprised at the attitude taken by the Saskatchewan members in opposing my endeavour to get this for Saskatchewan. I am surprised at the attitude they take when I bring this matter before the committee. Each of them said during the campaign that he was in favour of it. Now when I endeavour to impress upon the minister the necessity of something being done if the morale of the people is to be maintained, they oppose my efforts. The people have been looking forward to this. Two years ago the minister said that within two years the government would decide on the location of the dam and the work would proceed at the earliest possible moment. The last time the matter came before the house the minister said that they were going to continue the investigation. There was never a word when the matter came up that this great project was going to be placed in jeopardy because part of the responsibility in regard to irrigation was going to be imposed upon the provincial government. What I am saying this evening, and I shall say no more—

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the best contribution my hon. friend has ever made. I have requested the minister to join with those hon. members from Saskatchewan who have been interrupting me when I have been making this argument and impressing upon this committee and the country, as it no longer needs to be impressed, that this is a national project, necessary for our province if its population is to be maintained. I shall not enter into an argument as to whether there should be a division of responsibility between the dominion and the province, because then each will endeavour to pass the buck to the other. The people of the province do not want any of that. They are asking that this national work be proceeded with.

During the days of the war hundreds of millions of dollars were spent in other provinces to lay an industrial foundation. We in Saskatchewan got none of that. I thought we were all united in this regardless of party considerations. I thought we all wanted to rebuild our economy to the end that the exodus of our people would be restrained by the industrialization which was pictured in two or three of the minister's addresses when he pointed out that there were great possibilities in the way of power to industrialize the province and change its economy to such an extent that a livelihood would be provided for the many thousands of people who today find it necessary to leave because of drought and climatic conditions.

It is in that spirit that I make this appeal. I am not entering any arguments as to whether it is a provincial or dominion obligation. All I know is that all our people believed that the minister had the authority to make the promise he did when he said that this would be proceeded with without delay. This is not a political matter in the province. All are united in this. The Liberal members to my right were elected in its support. The C.C.F. candidates spoke in favour of it. No one in the province has dared within the last two years to stand up and say that he did not fully support going ahead with this project.

I think hon. members of this committee are willing to give our province assistance in this regard, assistance which will spell an improvement in our economy and above all stop that exodus which is reducing Saskatchewan year by year to a lower and lower position in the population category of the provinces of this dominion. It is in that spirit that I approach this matter. Our people as a whole are going to be intensely disappointed—

Mr. Gardiner: Nobody has said that there is going to be any stoppage.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I ask a question from a non-partisan point of view?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is why I know the question will be non-political.

Mr. Cruickshank: How many people in Saskatchewan thought on June 27 that the official opposition represented the people of Canada?

Mr. Diefenbaker: On October 27, 1948—

Mr. Cruickshank: June, I said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On October 27, 1948, the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix contained this editorial:

> The Liberal campaign was based in large part on the promotion of the south Saskatchewan river development, the project that offers the quickest bargain in national dividends anywhere in the country and which needs only the approval of the Canadian parliament. . . The Liberal victory represents a decisive endorsation of the south Saskatchewan river development.

Another excerpt from an editorial in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of October 26, 1948, reads:

> The election was fought on a number of issues; the Liberals seeking endorsement of their agriculture and social security policies and asking support for a large irrigation project on the south Saskatchewan river.

That was the issue a year ago in that by-election. During the federal election no issue was made of that because we all believed that the project was to be proceeded with. I say once more that there is going to be the greatest disappointment in Saskatchewan over the minister's announcement. I have nothing more to say because the government with its majority can determine whether or not this work will be proceeded with.

Mr. Cleaver: Will the hon. member permit a question from an Ontario member? I think the hon. member will concede that there are members in this house other than those from Saskatchewan like himself who are interested in the welfare of Saskatchewan. I listened with a great deal of interest to the plan outlined by the minister whereby the federal government would assume roughly fifty per cent of the total cost of this tremendous project that means so much to Saskatchewan. I learned also that the remaining portion of the cost would be borne by the province and those who would directly benefit, such as the farmers and those who would be using the electric current which would be developed. I suggest to the hon. member for Lake Centre that if he wants to advance the project he will get a lot further with the other members of the house in doing so if he will argue to the point, tell the members of the house what he does not like about the program, and make his own suggestions as to what would be a fair and equitable distribution of the cost. He will get a lot further than by making —and I say this in all sincerity—smart-aleck answers to questions from members who are honestly seeking to get his views.

An hon. Member: What is your question?

Mr. Cleaver: In what way does the hon. member for Lake Centre object to the broad proposals outlined by the minister?

Mr. Diefenbaker: First may I say that I have always noticed in this house a fine spirit of co-operation among members in appreciating the difficulties of other parts of the country. My experience has never been that there is in this country an east working against a west. I often hear that in the west, but I have never found it to exist. There is that spirit that was displayed a moment ago by the hon. member in his very studied, careful and objective remarks. I want to say that I have set forth what the promises were and what the people are asking.

Mr. Cleaver: If I may be permitted, I have listened carefully to the entire speech of the hon. member.

Mr. Green: He does not like it.

Mr. Cleaver: He read some excerpts, but he did not give me any idea of what he thought was unfair about the broad outline given by the minister as to how the cost of this tremendous project is to be borne.

Mr. Green: You had better read it in Hansard.

Mr. Laing: I am not going to make any prepared observations. I should like the hon. member for Lake Centre to tell us if it is his view, and the view of the people resident in his province, that the whole cost of the project should come from the consolidated revenues of the Dominion of Canada. I have in mind that some of this type of work is being done in the province of British Columbia. Water is being provided to a certain point, but that water is being collected with one end in view, and that is land use. The water is no good unless you use it and it is being used on land. Certainly our provincial government is going to co-operate with the federal authorities in the distribution of that water at Westbank, and again on the west bench at Penticton in particular. They are certainly going to co-operate with the federal government, and are co-operating right now in respect of the work at Pemberton. I can visualize there is only one source from which the money comes, and that is revenues collected from all parts of Canada. If the people of Saskatchewan are going to take the stand that the people of all parts of Canada must bear 100 per cent of the cost of the project in Saskatchewan, I am afraid you are going to have a difficult time selling that idea to the people of British Columbia.

Mr. Thatcher: Hear, hear.

Mr. Laing: I will deal with my friend in a moment. He is an authority on hardware.

Mr. Cruickshank: Not even on that.

Mr. Laing: And the Regina manifesto, but he is not an authority on soil fertility. I remember that last year $167 million was collected from the province of British Columbia by the federal government. I wonder how much came out of Saskatchewan. If we are going to take these projects on a national basis, as we certainly must, and along the lines outlined by the minister and by the hon. member for Lethbridge, then there is justification for them on the basis that they will keep more people in Canada and produce more wealth which will be distributed all over Canada. That is the only justification for them. It seems to me if the people of a certain province are going to take the stand that they will contribute nothing and that they want everything from Ottawa, it is in the interests of the Dominion of Canada to know that right now.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussions that have taken place regarding the St. Mary river and south Saskatchewan projects. I realize how important it is that a satisfactory understanding be reached as to the St. Mary river project because the minister has stated that the agreement that is signed for that project will be the pattern for all future contracts. Therefore if we get off on the wrong foot on the first project we will have a problem with the rest.

I want to ask a few questions about the Red Deer irrigation project because that is included in this item. Two reservoirs have been created on Berry creek, and I understand that two more are under construction this year, one further south on Berry creek and one on Sounding creek. I should like to say that the farmers in those areas appreciate very much the fact that the government has constructed those dams. On the other hand, they also realize the fact that these reservoirs are absolutely dependent upon surface runoff of water for their supply. Consequently in years when there is no runoff there will be no water available for irrigation. For example, take the dam that was constructed last year in that reservoir. There is not enough water there now to drown a mouse, for the simple reason that there is no runoff. Therefore the people of that area feel that they will never have the assurance of irrigation until such time as the main project is constructed under which water will be diverted from the Red Deer river into Hamilton lake, and from there down through the drainage creeks into various parts of that land.

The first dam that was built was the Bartman dam which was built several years ago on Berry creek. That project provides for irrigation by gravity and many hundreds of acres have been irrigated from that reservoir. Good use has been made of it. The other three dams that have either been built or are being built are for the purpose of creating reservoirs to provide water for irrigation by means of a sprinkler system.

The question I should like to ask the minister is what the policy of the federal government is with regard to providing grants to farmers for the purchase of aluminum pipe in connection with the sprinkler system. I sat down with the chairman of the special areas board and discussed the matter with Mr. Larry Helmer, who is the P.F.R.A. agent at Hanna. He told us that a grant of $350 per farmer would be provided for the purpose of buying aluminum pipe for irrigation projects provided that no money had been given to those farmers for the purpose of digging dug-outs or erecting dams. I am especially interested in finding out whether or not that is correct. I do not doubt it because the minister knows the man to whom I refer. I know him well and I know he is not the type of man who runs around making irresponsible statements. Therefore I take it that it is correct.

The reason I am interested is that if irrigation is going to be provided by a sprinkler system it will mean a great saving in cost to both the federal and the provincial governments in not having to dig ditches. If the federal government is making a grant I think there is every reason why the provincial government would also make a contribution towards a sprinkler system because such a system would also save them the cost of digging ditches for the purpose of getting water on the land. Another reason why we favour a sprinkler system in that area is that it is rolling land and it will not be easy to irrigate by means of ditches. Secondly there is a certain amount of alkali, and with a sprinkler system we will not have so much trouble. I know many people will say that a sprinkler system is far more expensive than a gravity system. I listened to Dr. Palmer from the Lethbridge experimental farm, however, who showed clearly that while the initial cost may be greater, nevertheless over a period of time it would be even cheaper than a gravity system because there would be such tremendous savings in labour. So I wonder if the minister could briefly outline the policy in regard to the purchase of aluminum pipe.

Mr. Gardiner: I believe the hon. gentleman asked me this question earlier in the session, and I was unable to answer it until I communicated with the western organization. They tell me no such suggestion has ever been made. They say some of the agents selling aluminum pipe promoted the sale of the pipe on the basis that the government ought to do this. Anyone who is familiar with suggestions of that kind realizes that you do not have to go very far—as a matter of fact you need not go outside this house, if you look at the newspaper reports—to have a suggestion by an agent selling something become a suggestion that the government ought to do something, and finally have someone saying the government is going to do it. The government have never said they are going to do it. As a matter of fact we had six men out this summer investigating the position with respect to that kind of irrigation, and we have not sufficient information to advise farmers to adopt it as against some other methods. It does not settle all those problems having to do with alkali, and so on; we know that. Those matters are associated with the amount of water and the manner in which it is put on the land. An individual might put water on his land by means of pipes and cause damage through alkali, just as he might cause the damage in some other way.

Most of the reservoirs that have been constructed in the vicinity of Hanna are of a type and in a position which will make it possible to utilize them in connection with the Red Deer project when it is brought into being. They were built as the result of representations made by a delegation that came from Hanna to Lethbridge when I was there in 1947, I think, or the early part of 1948. Their representations were to the effect that if those reservoirs were proceeded with while the other larger project was under consideration, in the meantime it would be possible for them to irrigate some six or seven thousand acres of land. I brought those representations back here and recommended to the government that we proceed with those reservoirs, and following that recommendation the work was carried on.

The unfortunate thing about it, and what makes it possible for the hon. member to say there was not enough water in some of these reservoirs this year to drown a mouse, is that there was no rain. That is the reason we have irrigation systems out west. I may tell my hon. friend that I built a very large cistern on my own farm, which is in a district that usually has much more moisture than most of the constituency my hon. friend represents. While I have a barn roof 100 feet long and 40 feet wide from which to get water for the cistern, which is only 10 feet wide and 60 feet long, I have not had more than 20 inches of water in it at any time this year. The fact is that we did not have three inches of rain from one July to the next. That is why we talk about irrigation out west. It does not rain enough every year to put water into the reservoirs. But we are hopeful that in the years to come we will have runoffs some time, and when we get those reservoirs filled they will take care of the needs over considerable periods of drought. Then when we get the larger scheme in operation these reservoirs will be filled from time to time from the larger dams.

After having said this, I do not want anyone to say that I made the promise tonight that we are going to build the dam at some particular time. I am only saying that when that dam is constructed—and I assume it will be constructed—the reservoirs which have been put in this year will form part of the whole system and it will not be necessary to have them supplied by runoffs every year. The water will be brought in from the larger reservoir that will be put in for the purpose of replenishing these smaller ones from time to time.

Mr. Quelch: I think the minister misunderstood me. I did not say a salesman for a particular system had said anything.

Mr. Gardiner: I know my hon. friend did not say that; he referred to somebody I knew very well. I do not really know whom he is talking about, but likely I do know the man very well; I know a great many people in Alberta very well. I am saying that we investigated that rumour, it led us back to the salesmen who were selling pipe. They were going around that district saying these things, and I have no doubt somebody believed what was being said, and it was not long until someone said the government was going to do it. Well, we are not doing it.

Mr. Quelch: I can give the minister the name of the person responsible for the rumour. He is the district representative of P.F.R.A., Mr. Larry Helmer. He gave that information to the chairman of the special areas board, and I was there when it was given. That information was also given to the east central irrigation association; and keen enthusiasm in the sprinkler system has been created throughout the district by the minister's own representative.

Mr. Gardiner: The director, who is sitting in front of me, tells me Mr. Helmer is the very man he investigated out there, and that was where he got the information that these statements were being made by the agents. When they told him that he took it for granted the information was correct, and repeated it.

Mr. Quelch: Then I would suggest that the minister immediately contact Mr. Helmer, because the sooner that rumour is denied the better it will be. Otherwise it may cause a great deal of trouble.

Mr. Gardiner: I took it up with the director right after my hon. friend mentioned it to me, and he tells me that he contacted Mr. Helmer and that what my hon. friend suggests has been done. I am quite sure he is not circulating that report now.

Mr. Quelch: I am glad to hear that. I am not saying this was done during the election campaign. As a matter of fact that information was given to us six weeks after the election, so I am not making any charge of political propaganda. I should like to ask the minister one or two other questions. Could he say whether or not consideration has been given by the prairie provinces water board to the construction of the Red Deer diversion project?

Mr. Gardiner: I am informed that up to the present the Alberta government has not applied to that board for a diversion of water for the Red Deer project. I am not saying this to be critical of that government. The understanding we have with the government of Alberta is that the Bow river project, which was under way, would be proceeded with by the federal government with as little as possible in the way of further discussions with the province. They assumed that we had undertaken the obligation and would go along with it until we reached the point of working the land they owned, and that then the matter would be discussed and we would come to some arrangement about it; and we intend to come to that arrangement. Then they agreed that after this the St. Mary project should be proceeded with and developed as rapidly as possible, and that the Red Deer project should follow after that. So we have been devoting the greater part of our time and effort to the first two projects. With respect to the other one, in the meantime we have been making these temporary arrangements and putting in small dams that do take care of some of the farmers.

Mr. Quelch: Did I understand the minister to say the St. Mary river project would be completed first, and then the Bow river project?

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps I should not say it will be completed. We intend to get it far enough under way so that it is a going concern, and then turn our attention to the other project.

Mr. Quelch: I am glad to hear that, because it means we will not have to wait another fourteen years.

Mr. Gardiner: That is right.

Mr. Wright: I am fortunate in representing a constituency in Saskatchewan where we do not need irrigation, but I have been interested in this discussion. In that province we are all interested in the irrigation project, and particularly in industrialization. When the minister stated, as I think he did, that the government would be responsible for the major work, that is the dam for storing the water, and that the province would come into the picture in the distribution of the water and the irrigation of the land, so far as the province of Saskatchewan is concerned I believe that has been understood. Last year a department of the provincial government was set up to make a study of irrigation and to be prepared, if and when the dominion government completed the dam, to do something with the water. We hope they will not have to wait ten years to get some water to us. I think they will be prepared to use it before that.

I am interested in this point: If the dominion government is going to build the major dams, then will the dominion government own the power which will result from that dam? It seems to me that is an important point. Who is going to own the power that will be produced at the major dams? Will it be under the control of the province or under the control of the dominion? If the dominion is building the dam and will own the power, then it will be able to get large returns from the power. I should like to hear the minister's explanation of that situation.

Mr. Gardiner: I am pleased to hear the hon. member who comes from the northern part of Saskatchewan, an area that is not concerned really with this particular development, say that the province was assuming an obligation in connection with this project and has set up an organization to take care of this obligation. That is right. There is another development which has never been discussed in this house to any great extent and which I am not going to start discussing at this time of night, which does not happen to be within the bounds of either Alberta or Saskatchewan, but which will serve the northern part of the province. Even though the hon. member comes from a section of the province which is some distance from where these discussions have taken place, I was pleased to hear what he said.

This government has been assuming that the water which is put there for the purpose of irrigation and the purpose of power will be utilized by the province or some agency set up under provincial law. Irrigation law is provincial law. As my hon. friend knows, I had the privilege of setting up the power commission in the province of Saskatchewan. It is still operating. It is the expectation of this government that the power commission will utilize the power. It is not the intention of the government to charge rates for water, either for power purposes or for irrigation purposes, which will return part of the capital cost. If anything is charged it will only be enough to pay for the maintenance of the dam and the reservoir that holds the water. This subject has been discussed here and it was agreed by all that there should only be a charge of that kind.

Mr. Knight: If the discussion is to be continued until eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I shall carry on, but if it is the desire of the committee to call it eleven o'clock now, I am agreeable.

Some hon. Members: Carry the item.

Mr. Knight: I had hoped, sir, that I was merely going to speak on the smaller project which, in some ways, is subsidiary to this larger project in the Saskatchewan river. I say this is subsidiary because the minister has acknowledged it to be so by the issuance of a map. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) referred to it tonight. This map has certain black spots on it showing subsidiary dams all the way up into the Rosthern constituency and my constituency. I did not want to speak in a political tone tonight, but I do want to say in all seriousness and earnestness that I have been more bitterly disappointed tonight than at any time since I came here in 1945.

I had hoped that yesterday the minister merely made a slip of the tongue and, in that persistent way he has, was refusing to acknowledge himself in the wrong. I thought after this debate was over everything would be sweetness and light, and we would be back to where we were before with regard to this whole project. I am now convinced in my mind that the government has abandoned the Saskatchewan project. I cannot come to any other conclusion.

Mr. Gardiner: It is our child; why should we abandon it?

Mr. Knight: The minister told me on an occasion when I went out to make a speech, which he has referred to as "that speech", that it would lose me the election in the Hanley territory. It did not. Although I want to be modest, I can say that my majority was trebled over that of the 1945 election. That is not what I came to tell you about, however. The minister was rather annoyed at me when I suggested on several occasions he was pussyfooting about this particular project and making a political football out of it. I have now come to the reluctant conclusion that I was right.

The election was won by the Liberal party, and they made a fine showing in Saskatchewan. May I give the minister all the credit for that, much more credit than I would give the Liberal leader in that particular province. There are two things to which I give credit for the Liberal victory. The first is the astuteness of the Minister of Agriculture and the second is the promises which were made in regard to this particular water project. The Minister of Agriculture has returned to this house with what I call his cheering section, the fourteen Liberal members gained at the expense of this party in the province of Saskatchewan. I should like to ask them tonight if they will get up during this debate—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Langlois, Gaspé): It being eleven o'clock, shall I report progress?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday next we will proceed with the notice of motion concerning an act to amend the British North America Act, which is in the name of the Prime Minister. We will then take up the second reading of Bill No. 12, to establish the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation. If we can reach the next item, it will be the second reading of Bill No. 62, an act respecting forest conservation. If those bills are completed, we will move to go into supply, calling two new departments and completing the Agriculture estimates.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. minister a question? I understood him to say that two new departments will be called if there is a motion to go into supply. About thirteen departments have been put in so far, so there are only three remaining; is that correct?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No. I hesitate to say there are six, but I am sure of five departments that are to come.

Mr. Green: I would suggest the government be satisfied with putting in one department on this occasion.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We are always ready to accept a suggestion from my hon. friend.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at three o'clock.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies of correspondence I have had with premiers of the provinces with respect to amendments to the British North America Act, following the letters to them, copies of which I tabled on September 15.

ANSWER TO QUESTION BY MR. GREEN ON OCTOBER 14

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) referred to the press report of a statement made in San Francisco by the Canadian ambassador to China, who was on his way to Ottawa for consultation. Mr. Davis is expected to reach Ottawa next week, after a few days in Saskatchewan. Without having had the opportunity of speaking with him, I am unable to comment on the remarks he is reported to have made. I can assure the hon. member, however, that the situation which has been developing in China has been and is under constant and careful survey by the Department of External Affairs, and that if a statement is not made before then, my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) will deal with the situation when he returns from Lake Success.

QUESTION AS TO SINGAPORE CONFERENCE OF COMMONWEALTH REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to ask a question which I had intended to ask on the orders of the day, but which ties in directly with the answer just given. Over the week end it has been announced that early next month there is to be a conference in Singapore of top-ranking representatives of various commonwealth countries. I believe it includes all of them, with the exception of South Africa and Canada. Apparently the purpose is to consider the threat of communism in the Orient, and to chart a course for future dealings with the Chinese Reds. Is Canada taking part in that conference?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I received notice in my office of the hon. member's intention to ask this question on the orders of the day. The answer is that the Canadian government has no official information concerning the proposed meeting in Singapore to which the question refers. It is my understanding that this meeting has been arranged so that the United Kingdom representatives in the Far East might discuss among themselves matters of mutual concern, and that there may be present local representatives of certain other commonwealth governments. There has been no invitation to Canada to be represented at that meeting.

Mr. Green: Will the government make inquiries to see whether the conference is as broad as the report discloses?—because in Canada, and particularly on the Pacific coast, we are vitally concerned in what happens in China.

Mr. St. Laurent: No; I do not think Canada will take the initiative of asking whether the conference has the scope indicated by newspaper reports. If it did have that scope, we would expect to be notified by the United Kingdom government, without the initiative being taken by us.

Mr. Green: And Canada would take part?

Mr. St. Laurent: Canada will make its decision when it has had an invitation, if it gets one.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED SINCE MARCH 1, 1949

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many orders in council have been issued or passed since March 1, 1949?
2. Of these, how many have been (a) published in the Canada Gazette; (b) tabled in the house?

Mr. St. Laurent: Stand.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): The Prime Minister has asked that this question stand. When he is answering it, will he be good enough to make his answer broad enough to include the answer to a question on the same subject asked by me on April 25, 1949, as reported at page 2517 of Hansard of last session. It was put to one side by the Prime Minister with the statement that he would answer in a month's time, knowing that parliament in the meantime would be dissolved.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not recollect the incident to which the hon. member refers, but I shall look at Hansard. I should be surprised if at the time the hon. member mentions there had been any decision whether the house would be dissolved.

[Mr. Harris (Danforth).]

2. Up to the present, an appointment has not been made, but one is under active consideration and it is anticipated an early announcement will be made in this respect.

RADIO BROADCASTING—LICENCES TO PRIVATE STATIONS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many applications for private radio broadcasting licences have been made since the 1st of January, 1949?
2. What are the names of the applicants, and what was the decision made by the C.B.C. in each case?

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Majesty the King in the following words:

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:

An act to amend the British North America Act, 1867, relating to the amendment of the constitution of Canada.

Whereas the Senate and Commons of Canada in parliament assembled have submitted an address to His Majesty praying that His Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom for the enactment of the provisions hereinafter set forth:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. Section ninety-one of the British North America Act, 1867, is amended by renumbering class 1 thereof as class 1A and by inserting therein immediately before that class the following as class 1:

"1. The amendment from time to time of the constitution of Canada, except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces, or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other constitutional act granted or secured to the legislature or the government of a province, or to any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or the French language."

2. This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1949 (No. 2), and the British North America Acts, 1867-1949, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867-1949 (No. 2).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that hon. members will regard this resolution as one of the most important steps in the constitutional development of Canada that has come before this parliament since confederation. Of course the very nature of a federation requires that there be a constitution, largely of a written and well-defined character. That is necessary because the basis of federation is a distribution of powers between a central and several state or provincial legislative and government bodies. If the federation is to preserve its character, that distribution must not only be clear and precise, but protected in some manner from encroachment by any of the legislative bodies.

The result is necessarily a constitution that cannot in all its aspects have the complete fluidity of the constitution of a unitary state. On the other hand, the constitution must not be so rigid that it cripples the development of the nation or prevents the nation from living and growing within the framework that had been established. In one aspect the resolution before the house deals with the capacity of Canada to live and grow and adapt itself to the demands of the future, but to do so within the framework that was devised in 1867. This may be looked upon as the internal aspect of the resolution.

The second aspect of the resolution deals with the attributes of Canada as an adult sovereign state among the states of the world. Up to the present time Canada has had the unique, but perhaps not altogether proud or enviable, distinction among the nations of the world of being the only sovereign state without the power to amend its own constitution. It is a distinction for which we are not apt to be envied by other countries, and a distinction which other nations must have regarded for some time either as a denial of our sovereignty or as a mark of an inferiority complex that has prevented us from asserting our capacity to take responsibility for the complete management of our own affairs. What the present resolution seeks is that, in part at least, Canada should assume one of the normal attributes of nationhood which I believe its record, its status and the political capacity of the Canadian people obviously demand.

It will be remembered that other members of the commonwealth have for years had the power and the right to amend their constitutions. The Australian Constitution Act of 1900, in section 128, provides that a majority of both houses, plus a referendum with an over-all majority throughout the commonwealth and in a majority of the states, can bring an amendment into effect. My understanding is that this has proved to be a rigid manner of dealing with amendments which might be required from time to time.

The South Africa Act of 1909 provides, in section 152, a method of amending the South African constitution. The amendment may be made in many cases by a majority of both houses, with certain sections requiring a joint session of the two houses and a two-thirds majority of those composing the joint session. In New Zealand, a majority of the general assembly may in most cases make amendments to the constitution. That is probably because of the fact that it is a unitary state, and that there are no other jurisdictions susceptible of being impinged upon.

In the original constitution of the Irish Free State, which provided a unitary state in 1922, article 50 dealt with the method of amendment. It required a majority of both houses, plus a majority in a popular referendum. The Indian constitution has not yet been adopted, but we may be confident that when it is, there will be provision made for its amendment from time to time.

I suppose it is not surprising that in the British North America Act no provisions for amendment were made. One reason was assigned in 1929 in the report of the London conference on the operation of dominion legislation and merchant shipping legislation. It was a conference of experts to prepare a draft for what later became the Statute of Westminster. Paragraph 63 of that report is in the following terms:

> Canada alone among the dominions has at present no power to amend its constitution act without legislation by the parliament of the United Kingdom. The fact that no specific provision was made for effecting desired amendments wholly by Canadian agencies is easily understood, apart from the special conditions existing in Canada at the time, when it is recalled that the B.N.A. Act, 1867, was the first dominion federal measure and was passed over sixty years ago at an early stage of development.

I do not think it is entirely clear what is meant by the words "special conditions existing in Canada at the time", but the main statement is entirely true. The reason for the omission of an amending clause was that Canada led the parade in achieving dominion status as distinct from the old colonial status, and I think it is fair to assume that the full implications of that change were not appreciated at the time. Canada had had several constitutional statutes before, and none of them contained any provision for amendment. It was quite the normal thing to have anything of that importance dealt with by the parliament at Westminster. There were no provisions for amending the Quebec Act of 1774, the Constitutional Act of 1791, or the Union Act of 1840. I think it is fair to assume that it was thought that the British North America Act, like earlier statutes applicable to Canada, would be amended whenever necessary by the British parliament itself.

Thirty or forty years later, after the Canadian constitutional set-up provided in 1867 had functioned for an autonomous dominion, it was realized that in preparing constitutions for the like dominions of Australia and South Africa there should be some procedure provided for amendment from time to time. The result of that omission in the British North America Act has been that each time an amendment has been desired, Canadians have had to go to the British parliament to have the amendment enacted. It has also meant that there was no definite procedure laid down as to what had to be done in Canada to obtain an amendment by the British parliament, and as a result not only has the procedure varied, but in many instances there have been charges that an improper procedure was being followed, and that some different procedure should have been adopted. Hon. members will recall that since 1867 it has been found desirable to have amendments made to the British North America Act on eleven occasions, and there have been four different forms of procedure adopted in Canada to bring about the amendments.

The first two occasions, in 1871 and 1875, the government of the day sought the amendments without the prior approval of parliament. In 1871 parliament took exception to that procedure. Mr. Blake, a leading member of the opposition at the time, initiated a debate condemning the attitude of the government in taking the responsibility of applying for an amendment without the prior consent of parliament. The government conceded immediately the desirability of consulting parliament, and the House of Commons unanimously adopted a resolution, moved by Mr. Holton, that no change in the provisions of the British North America Act should be sought by the executive government without the previous assent of the parliament of this dominion. A few days after the unanimous adoption of that resolution by the House of Commons, the government brought down a joint address, which was adopted, and which formed the basis upon which the amendment was made by the United Kingdom parliament.

In 1875 an amendment was passed on the basis of the government's request without joint addresses having been adopted by the houses of parliament, but objection was again taken in the House of Commons, and a resolution similar to that of 1871 was introduced. The government recognized the propriety of the principle of the resolution, and after a debate the resolution was withdrawn. Since then no Canadian government has ever ventured to suggest an amendment to the constitution without the formality of addresses by the houses of parliament.

Where joint addresses have been introduced in the houses of parliament, in most cases it has been without prior consultation and certainly without consent of the provincial legislatures or provincial governments. This was the case in seven of the eleven amendments; that of 1871; the amendment of 1886, concerning the representation of the territories in parliament; that of 1915, respecting the number of senators, and providing that thereafter no province should be entitled to fewer representatives in the Commons than it was entitled to members in the other place; that of 1916, to extend the term of the twelfth parliament for one year; that of 1943, to defer redistribution until the end of the war; that of 1946, to amend and alter the basis of representation in parliament as is now provided by section 51; and the so-called amendment of 1949, to ratify the terms of the entry of Newfoundland into the Canadian federation.

There has been one case in which an amendment was sought after consultation with certain provinces to be affected thereby. It was the amendment of 1930, to restore the natural resources to the control of the prairie provinces. That amendment was sought after consultation with the western provinces, but without consultation with the other provinces. In two cases amendments have been sought after consultation with all the provinces. The first was in 1907, when it was proposed to amend the constitution to alter the basis of provincial subsidies. All the provinces were consulted, and eight of the then nine provinces agreed. British Columbia opposed the proposal, both here and before the parliament at Westminster; but in spite of its opposition the amendment was adopted. In 1940, as hon. members will recall, there was an application to transfer to parliament jurisdiction which under the act had been allocated to the provinces—that is to say, jurisdiction with respect to unemployment insurance. That amendment was sought only after the consent of all provincial governments had been obtained. In some of the provinces the consent was given after consultation with the legislative body. In others it was given by the executive government without consulting the legislative body of the province concerned.

In one other case, steps were taken toward an amendment by means of joint addresses without provincial consultation, but the matter was not proceeded with to the point of obtaining the amendment. In 1920 a proposal was made to give extraterritorial effect to dominion legislation. Joint addresses asking for such an amendment were adopted, but after correspondence with the authorities of the colonial office the matter was not proceeded with. It was finally dealt with by the imperial conference of 1926. The decision of the imperial conference was implemented by the Statute of Westminster, which gives extraterritorial effect to dominion legislation otherwise intra vires of the power of parliament.

To analyse the twelve cases: in nine cases the provinces were not consulted at all; in one case some provinces were consulted, those to be immediately affected by the amendment proposed; in two cases, all provinces were consulted, in one, eight of the nine agreeing and one disagreeing; in the other, the nine provinces agreeing. The result has been a continuing controversy as to the proper procedure to follow in any particular case; and in at least half the number of occasions on which amendments were sought and obtained, the procedure adopted was criticized. In 1871 and 1875, when the government of Canada asked for amendments without the approval of parliament, parliament criticized. The government admitted the validity of the criticism, and promised that careful note would be taken of it; and such careful note was taken that never since 1875 has any government ventured to resort to that procedure. In 1907 all the provinces were consulted, and British Columbia objected to the amendment because it was not satisfied with the substance of the matter proposed. In 1915 the provinces were not consulted, but Prince Edward Island objected on the ground that its representation in parliament should not be reduced at all. It was not satisfied with the provision that its representation here should never be reduced below its number of senators, but insisted that it should not be reduced at all. It was after litigation arising out of that position that a dictum of the privy council indicated that in order to bring about a reduction there did not have to be, as Prince Edward Island contended, some increase in representation since confederation in the first instance, but that there did have to be a diminution within the ten-year period, that is to say between two decennial censuses, of five per cent in the proportion of the population of the province to the population of the whole dominion, which brought about the situation dealt with by the amendment of 1946.

In 1943 the government of Quebec objected, and contended that before attempting to postpone redistribution the provinces should have been consulted. In 1946 a resolution was moved in this house to the effect that the matter under discussion should not be proceeded with until the provincial governments had been consulted. As hon. members who were here during the last parliament will remember, that point of view was again urged when it was proposed to ask the parliament at Westminster to ratify the legislation providing for the union of Newfoundland and Canada.

It was not clear what consultation meant—whether it meant merely that the matter should be brought to the notice of the provincial governments, or that they should give their consent. Hon. members will recall that there was a resolution calling for consultation, and that when an amendment was moved suggesting that the matter should not be proceeded with unless the consultation resulted in the consent of the provinces, many of those who favoured the theory of consultation voted against the amendment. I thought it might be wise to indicate objectively what the course of events has been, and then to recall that even in the days of Sir John A. Macdonald he had said that Canada is a difficult country to govern. I believe the foregoing indicates that throughout the years it has become, in some respects, even more difficult than it was in the days of Sir John. We have enough problems with which to contend without periodically having this controversy over the proper method to be adopted in Canada to bring about an amendment which is a matter of mere ratification by the parliament at Westminster.

Another consequence of the fact that there is no procedure indicated in the British North America Act for its amendment is that there is no prescribed legal protection in that act for the fundamental provisions of our constitution. I am not worried about that myself. On more than one occasion I have said that the best guarantee of the fundamental provisions of the constitution is to be found in the good sense and fairness of the Canadian people and of those they send to represent them in parliament. In a federal constitution it is usual to provide that some special rigid procedure be followed whenever any question arises as to amending any of the fundamental principles of the federation. It may have been felt that, so long as Canada was in a semi-colonial position, the fact of having to go to Westminster for an amendment provided some form of protection for those fundamental principles.

In the early days of our national life, there was no question as to the right and propriety of the British government interfering to some degree in our Canadian affairs. Canadian statutes could be disallowed, and we had no control over our external relations. Statutes of the parliament of the United Kingdom could be made to apply to Canada. In such conditions I think there could be no doubt that the British government would have felt some moral responsibility, perhaps to the extent of refusing to accede to a request for an amendment which might seem to disturb the fundamentals of our federation without adequate participation in that request by all the parties concerned. A request by the houses of the Canadian parliament without consultation with the provinces might perhaps have been rejected if they felt that it invaded the fundamental aspects of federal-provincial relations.

It cannot be assumed now that any such condition could exist. After the development of complete nationhood by Canada; after years of relations with the government of the United Kingdom on the basis of absolute equality, and after the long establishment of the position that neither country interferes with the affairs of the other, could anyone feel now any assurance that a request for an amendment, supported by the majority of the representatives of the Canadian people in the two houses of the federal parliament, would be rejected by London? As a matter of fact the embarrassment that is felt in that quarter over having to appear to take responsibility arises out of the fact that no one likes taking responsibility for matters over which he exercises no real control.

The United Kingdom authorities, I will not say resent, but do not like the position in which they are placed of having to rubber-stamp decisions for Canadians, made by the representatives of Canadians, and having to do it because no other procedure has been yet devised in Canada for implementing those decisions. I believe we must recognize that either Canada is a sovereign state or she is not. If the former is true, then Canada must act as an adult nation and assume her own responsibilities. If we are not prepared to assume our responsibilities, then we should revert to adolescence and ask others to serve as our guardian.

I do not think Canadians now wish the parliament of the United Kingdom to exercise any responsibility for watching over our conduct of Canadian affairs. It is our own responsibility to see that the fundamentals of the Canadian constitution are protected and preserved. How that should be done is, I think, a matter for discussion between the federal and provincial authorities. It is a matter to be settled in Canada, by Canadians and for Canadians. It should not be left as a burden on the parliament of another nation.

The unsatisfactory condition resulting from the lack of amending procedure in the British North America Act has been generally recognized for years. It has led to repeated consideration in parliament, exchanges with provincial governments, and dominion-provincial conferences. Not going back beyond 1920, one finds that Mr. King, as leader of the opposition, referred in the House of Commons to the desirability of securing an amending procedure. The matter was debated at that time but no satisfactory procedure was suggested, and it was allowed to drop. In 1924 Mr. Woodsworth moved a resolution in that sense in the House of Commons. In 1925 Mr. W. F. Maclean moved that the parliament of Canada should be empowered to amend the British North America Act, but not empowered to pass any amendment affecting the rights of minorities.

In 1927, there was a debate on a similar motion, and the late Mr. Lapointe led a discussion on amending procedure. He pointed out that the position was not consistent with Canada's status as a self-governing dominion. A proposed procedure was discussed, but no agreement was reached and the matter was dropped. Then there was an exchange of correspondence between the late Mr. Bennett and the then premier of Ontario, Mr. Ferguson, in 1930 which arose out of the proposed Statute of Westminster. In 1931, Mr. Woodsworth again moved:

> That, in the opinion of this house, it is desirable that Canada should have the right to amend her own constitution, but that in proceeding to make any amendment, scrupulous care should be taken to safeguard the rights of minorities.

The matter was discussed at that time but allowed to drop after a very interesting discussion which hon. members will find in the report of the debates of the session of 1931.

In 1935 a resolution was passed by the House of Commons in the following terms:

> That, in the opinion of this house, a special committee should be set up to study and report on the best method by which the British North America Act may be amended so that while safeguarding the existing rights of racial and religious minorities and legitimate provincial claims to autonomy, the dominion government may be given adequate power to deal effectively with urgent economic problems which are essentially national in scope.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What date was that?

Mr. St. Laurent: January 28, 1935. A committee was set up. It heard witnesses, and on the 19th of June brought in a report making no specific recommendation as to amending procedure, but recommending that a dominion-provincial conference be held to consider the adoption of a recognized yet flexible method of amending the constitution. It further recommended that the minority rights agreed upon and guaranteed by the provisions of the British North America Act should not be interfered with.

The dominion conference was held in 1935, from December 9 to December 13. The conference appointed a subcommittee on constitutional questions to discuss the revision of the British North America Act and to try to reach agreement on future action with respect to social legislation. The subcommittee submitted a report, and a continuing committee on constitutional questions was set up, which met on January 28, 1936, and constituted a subcommittee which worked on the matter from January 30 until February 11, 1936. This subcommittee prepared a report in which it recommended that in respect of matters concerning the central government only, amendments might be made by passing an act of parliament; that, in respect of matters concerning the central government and one or more but not all the provinces, the amendment might be made by an act of parliament and the assent of the legislative assemblies of each of the provinces affected; that, in respect of a large number of matters concerning the central authority and all the provinces, the amendment might be made by an act of parliament and the assent of the legislative assemblies in two-thirds of the provinces representing at least fifty-five per cent of the population of Canada; but that there be a certain number of "entrenched clauses" which could not be dealt with except by an act of parliament and the assent of the legislative assemblies of all the provinces.

General agreement could not be obtained and the matter was dropped. It received some discussion in 1940 when a proposal to amend the British North America Act was brought forward, and again in 1943, 1946, and 1949, but without any definite results being achieved.

In considering one of these amendments in the British House of Commons Mr. A. P. Herbert was reported as follows:

> The necessity for action was clear to everyone. But the view was very general that nothing could be done.

As a matter of fact nothing has been done about that procedure for the eighty-two years which have elapsed since the proclamation of the act on July 1, 1867.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What date was that?

Mr. St. Laurent: I have not the exact reference here. I think it was in the discussion on the terms of union.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Redistribution.

Mr. St. Laurent: In a national broadcast on May 19, I ventured to say:

> The record of Canadians in two world wars demonstrated beyond any question our ability and our capacity to bear the responsibilities of full nationhood. But our adult nationhood is not yet fully recognized in our constitution and our laws... A method should be worked out to amend our constitution in Canada.
> That won't be easy. We do not want the Canadian constitution to be too rigid, but we do want to make sure it contains the fullest safeguards of provincial rights, of the use of the two official languages, and of those other historic rights which are the sacred trusts of our national partnership.
> It is our intention, after the election, to consult the provincial governments with a view to working out a method, which will be satisfactory to all Canadians, of amending the constitution in Canada.

That was before June 27. Since then my colleagues and I have felt that we have a responsibility to accomplish as much as can be accomplished. That is why this resolution is now before this House of Commons. In a previous debate the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) said that it was the accomplishment of an electoral promise. I do not blush for that. It is. Few promises were made, but, as to those which were made, we feel that a serious attempt should be made to implement them to the full.

In suggesting a procedure with regard to amendments, we take it for granted that, in the Canadian federation, constitutional matters fall into three particular classes. There are those matters which are of concern to the provinces alone and not to the federal authorities, such as the constitutions of the provinces themselves in respect of everything that is within their control. Hon. members know that from the very inception the provinces have had the right to deal themselves —each one of them, independently of anybody else—with the amendment from time to time, notwithstanding anything in the act, of the constitution of the provinces except with regard to the office of lieutenant governor. Several provinces have made use of that provision to bring their provincial constitutions more in harmony with what the representatives of those respective provinces felt to be the conditions then prevailing. Likewise there are matters which concern the federal authorities alone and which are of no concern to the provinces. It is with respect to those matters that, upon eight of the eleven occasions on which amendments were enacted by the parliament at Westminster, that parliament had to deal. In 1907 it was a matter of the provincial subsidies, which were of concern to all the provinces. In 1940 the proposed amendment had to do with the transfer of jurisdiction in certain matters from the provincial authorities to the federal authorities. In those two cases the provinces were concerned, and though in one case one of the provinces did not agree, the amendments were made. In 1930 the amendment concerned the western provinces only. In the other cases the amendments were made on the request of the houses of the Canadian parliament, because it was felt that they were matters which dealt with subjects assigned to the jurisdiction of the federal parliament.

There are other classes of matters which are of concern to both the federal and the provincial authorities. This resolution deals only with matters which concern exclusively the federal authorities. It requests that there be inserted in section 91 of the British North America Act a provision similar to that which is in section 92 of that act with respect to provincial constitutions, and that it be declared that this parliament may itself, by its own responsible action, implement the decision it arrives at with respect to amendment. Heretofore the decision has been arrived at here, but the amendment has been officially made by the action of another parliament. All this resolution seeks to do is to have it declared that henceforth amendments of that kind can be made by this parliament instead of being requested by this parliament and made effective by the parliament at Westminster. Great care has been taken to avoid any possibility of infringing upon provincial jurisdiction, upon the rights of provincial legislatures or provincial governments, upon the fundamental principles dealing with schools or with the use of the two official languages of this country. Care has been taken to avoid making any declaration as to where the dividing line might strike matters which are of provincial jurisdiction, those which are of federal jurisdiction, and those which are of joint concern to federal and provincial authorities.

Under the proposal contained in this resolution the parliament of Canada will be in the same position with respect to its constitution as the legislatures have been for the last eighty-two years with respect to their provincial constitutions.

If under the pretext of making an amendment to a provincial constitution a provincial legislature had attempted to impinge upon something which was within federal jurisdiction, the courts of law would have declared its attempt unconstitutional and invalid. Likewise, if after this amendment is adopted any parliament of Canada at any time attempts to do something which a provincial government or, in fact, anybody else, says impinges upon the jurisdiction of the legislature or upon the rights or privileges guaranteed to legislatures or provincial governments, or upon any of the safeguards over school matters or the use of the official languages, the legislation can be challenged before the courts, and the courts can and will decide whether or not it is something within the jurisdiction of this parliament, something which impinges upon the jurisdiction allocated to another body, or upon the rights guaranteed to another body.

It has been felt that that was all we could attempt to do without agreement with the representatives of the ten Canadian provinces, and that we should do at once everything we had the right to do. It was felt that we should then discuss with the provincial authorities the establishment of a proper procedure, one which would be looked upon as proper and safe by each one of them and by ourselves, to bring to Canada the remaining vestige of legislative jurisdiction by the parliament of another country over the domestic affairs of the Canadian nation.

I invite the close attention of hon. members to the terms of the suggested change in the British North America Act. They would do well to compare it with the terms of class 1 under section 92 of the act. It will be noticed at once that the resolution does not contain, as is contained in class 1 of section 92, the words, "notwithstanding anything in this act". That is because it is unnecessary. Those words are in the first portion of section 91, which reads:

> It shall be lawful for the queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms in this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say—

And class 1 thereof will be:

> 1. The amendment from time to time of the constitution of Canada, except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces, or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other constitutional act granted or secured to the legislature or the government of a province, or to any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or the French language.

As I stated on a previous occasion, when the speech from the throne had been prepared letters were dispatched to the premiers of the ten Canadian provinces, informing them of the intentions of the government—and I have tabled the replies today—to seek immediately a declaration that parliament can deal here in Canada with all those matters which do not trench upon the jurisdiction of the legislatures, or upon the rights guaranteed to the legislatures, or upon educational rights or the use of the official languages, and would immediately after the session seek a conference with them to determine a proper procedure to make all such amendments as could not be made by a provincial legislature under class 1 of section 92, or by a federal parliament under the new class 1 of section 91, and would seek to have a procedure established which for the future would determine how amendments which, from time to time, may be necessary can be effected.

I confess at once that this method of proceeding does clash with the effect sought to be given by many to the compact theory of confederation. According to them there is not a word, not a comma, in the British North America Act that is not of a contractual nature among at least the four so-called original provinces, and that nothing therein can be changed without obtaining their prior consent, unless one wishes to incur the charge of committing a breach of contract.

I have recited to the house what has been done in the past in that respect. Here we are seeking a declaration whereby only such amendments as deal with matters within the exclusive concern of the federal authorities can be made in the future, as they have been made in the past, without consulting the provinces, but that they can be made here. To that extent, but only to that extent, does this create a new situation. It does not change anything at all, except the venue where the amendments can be made. They have always been decided here, in this parliament, without recognizing the necessity or the obligation of consulting the provinces or getting their consent; and in the future, with this in the act, they will continue to be made without consulting them or getting their consent. But instead of having them decided in one place and registered in another, they will be registered and made effective in the place where they are decided; and they will be registered and made effective for the Canadian people by representatives of the Canadian people in a Canadian forum.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition:) Mr. Speaker, first of all may I say that the review by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) of the background of the subject matter now under discussion is most helpful in considering a subject that perhaps is not generally understood and not fully recognized by many people as having the importance it really does have for every Canadian. So far as the record itself is concerned, I think the review given by the Prime Minister can be taken as one which will be agreed upon by hon. members, but a number of the points made by the Prime Minister serve to emphasize the tremendous importance of this subject and the necessity of dealing with it on the basis of a recognition of the fact that this is not merely a question of what power or legislative authority the parliament of Canada possesses; it is also a question of future good will and harmony and understanding between the dominion and the provincial governments which collectively make up our federal system.

I do not believe there is the slightest difference of opinion anywhere in this house as to the amendment of the Canadian constitution being made in Canada by Canadians for Canadians in a way that will be best for Canada at all times. That is not a subject that is in issue; it is not a subject to which the thoughts of hon. members should be devoted in the present discussion. We start by agreeing on that basic proposition. I feel sure that there is general agreement—I would imagine unanimous agreement—as to that basic approach to the problem.

I do not think there is any question of national sovereignty involved in this discussion. There has been agreement in this house for many long years that the Canadian constitution should be amended in Canada. But there has been a great deal of discussion and considerable difference of opinion as to the method by which the constitution should be amended in Canada by the parliament of Canada for Canadians.

The Prime Minister has referred to a statement that he made in May. I believe I am correctly quoting the words he used earlier when I say that he said: "A method should be worked out to amend our own constitution." The right hon. gentleman then went on to say—and in this case I am not attempting to quote his exact words, but I believe I give the effect of them: "It is our intention after the election to consult the provinces as to the method by which amendments to our constitution shall be made."

That was the undertaking; that was the basis upon which this government received a mandate. This government received a mandate to proceed with the question of amendments to the constitution after consulting the provinces, and only after consulting the provinces. Any attempt to deal with amendment of the constitution without first consulting the provinces is in itself a repudiation of the very statement to which the Prime Minister has himself referred.

Even assuming that there could not be the slightest question about the authority of this parliament to deal with amendments to our constitution in any aspect without consulting the provinces, there are the strongest reasons why it is desirable to consult the provinces. To do so is in the interests of future harmony in Canada, in view of the statements which have been made already by some of the provincial premiers on behalf of the governments chosen by the people of those provinces.

May I quote what I think is a clear statement of the position taken by some of the provincial premiers and others who may not be in an official position. A letter was written on October 12 last to the Prime Minister of Canada by the premier of Alberta in response to a letter which the Prime Minister has written to the premiers of all the provinces. I quote the last two paragraphs of a letter written by Mr. E. C. Manning, as follows:

I would like to refer particularly to your observation that it is the intention of parliament at the present session to request an amendment to the British North America Act by the United Kingdom parliament which would vest in the parliament of Canada the authority to amend the constitution of Canada in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces.

While this may appear to be a matter of concern only to the dominion government, my colleagues and I feel strongly that the amendment proposed concerns the provinces as well in that federal policies initiated under future amendments to the British North America Act, which the dominion parliament might make within its constitutional sphere, could well have far-reaching effects on the economy of the provinces. Furthermore the privy council has held that under the British North America Act all powers have been vested in either the provinces or the dominion. It is difficult, therefore, to see how a situation could arise where any amendment to the British North America Act would affect dominion powers alone without, at the same time, affecting at least to some degree the rights of the provinces. We feel it is extremely important, before any amendment is made to the British North America Act, even in the field of federal jurisdiction, that the whole question of dominion versus provincial jurisdiction be fully discussed at a joint meeting of representatives of the dominion and provincial governments. We strongly urge that this whole matter be held in abeyance pending the conference which you propose to convene at the close of the present session of parliament. It seems to us that this is the only way in which future conflict can be avoided and the unity of Canada, which we all desire, preserved and strengthened.

I believe that the premier of Alberta in those words has put forward one of the clearest and most cogent arguments in favour of withholding any action until the representatives of the dominion and the provincial governments have met so that the whole field may be explored, not only because of any question as to the constitutional authority of the Canadian parliament but so that any future misunderstandings might be avoided by the discussions which would take place in that way.

It is because of the points put forward in the letter of the premier of Alberta, which I have quoted simply because they express what I believe is the general sentiment of many who have given this subject considerable thought, that I believe the government would be well advised to defer action on the resolution, and to have a meeting with the provinces to discuss the whole subject. Then amendments to the constitution could be dealt with as one subject and not piecemeal in the way that it is now proposed.

The suggestion is too often made that there is difficulty in obtaining an effective agreement between the governments of Canada. I think it might be well if it were remembered how wide the measure of agreement really is that has been reached by all the governments of Canada on many important problems of administration and legislative authority. I could review many of them. I think one of the best examples is the measure of agreement which was reached in regard to the education and rehabilitation of our veterans after the last war. There is an example of the kind of agreement that is being reached constantly between the dominion and provincial governments. The provincial governments handled the whole of the educational and rehabilitation programs under broad plans worked out in consultation with the dominion government. It worked with complete satisfaction not only to the governments but I am sure to practically all of the many thousands of young men and young women who availed themselves of the courses developed in that way.

A wide measure of agreement has already been reached in regard to certain aspects of forest supervision, which have not awaited the measure now before the house. I think the evidence is fairly conclusive that it is possible to reach an agreement as long as a continuing effort is made to do so. The particular matter we are dealing with is something that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has described as one of the most important subjects brought before the house for consideration since confederation. For that reason I think the possibility of agreement should be fully explored in the manner that has been suggested in the letter from which I have quoted.

The Prime Minister has referred to a number of occasions on which this subject has been discussed. The fact that it has been discussed on those occasions is the best evidence that we are not discussing a new subject. It is the best evidence that there has been agreement for years that this parliament should have the power to amend our own constitution within Canada. The fact is that there has been full power to amend the constitution. In many long years there has not been a case where any question has been raised as to representations made with regard to amendments of the British North America Act.

One question which has held back the dealing with this matter entirely by the parliament of Canada has been the failure to find a procedure. That subject was explored very carefully in 1935. I think it is well for us now to remember what took place at that time because the proceedings started under the government headed by Mr. Bennett, and were carried forward under the government headed by Mr. Mackenzie King. Both those governments, made up of different political parties, were agreed that there should be full power to amend in Canada, and that the one question about which they were concerned was the procedure.

On February 12, 1935, a select committee was appointed to inquire into the possibility of amending our constitution, and four important conclusions were reached by that committee. I should like to refer to them, because I think they indicate what the problem appeared to be at that time, and how the matter was approached. The committee reported as follows:

> The committee recognizes that there is a divergence of opinion with respect to the question of whether or not the British North America Act is a statutory recognition of a compact among the four original provinces of the dominion and as to the necessity or otherwise of provincial concurrence in amendments. Without expressing any opinion upon that question, the committee feel that in the present case and at the present time it is advisable in the interest of harmony and unity that there should be consultation with the provinces with respect to the adoption of a definite mode of amendment or the enactment of amending legislation which might seriously alter the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces and the dominion.

The committee further recognized the urgent necessity for prompt consideration of amendments to the British North America Act with reference to a redistribution of legislative power and to clarify the field of taxation. The committee further expressed the opinion that before any decision upon the subject matter is finally made the opinions of the provinces should be obtained, and recommended that a dominion-provincial conference be held to study carefully the adoption of a recognized yet flexible method of amendment. The committee definitely expressed the opinion that minority rights agreed upon and granted under the provisions of the British North America Act should not be interfered with.

These four recommendations apply just as strongly today as they did in 1935. They are recommendations made by men who believed that there should be the power to amend our own constitution in Canada without reference to an authority outside our own country, but they pointed out certain safeguards that they thought should be recognized as the best way to avoid any future misunderstandings which might undermine the effects of what they were seeking to achieve in the best interests of their country.

As a result of that recommendation a conference met in December of 1935. That conference adopted a resolution which was introduced by the then premier of Quebec, Hon. L. A. Taschereau, K.C., who was attending both as premier and as attorney general of his province. This was the resolution he placed before the conference, and which was adopted:

> This conference, in the interests of the dominion and of the provinces, is of the opinion:
> (a) That amendments to the British North America Act are now and subsequently may be necessary and imperative.
> (b) That, as in the case of all the other self-governing dominions, Canada should have the power to amend the Canadian constitution provided a method of procedure therefor satisfactory to the dominion parliament and the provincial legislatures be devised.
> (c) That the Minister of Justice convene at an early date a meeting of appropriate officials of the dominion and of the provinces to prepare a draft of such method of procedure to be submitted to a subsequent conference.
> (d) That a conference be held at an early date after such draft has been prepared to consider such a method of procedure.

I would point out that this resolution, presented by Mr. Taschereau and approved by the representatives of all the provinces and of the dominion, emphasized that a method for amending the constitution—the whole constitution, not just part of it—should be devised by representatives of the dominion and provincial governments before any steps were taken to amend our basic constitution, which is the British North America Act. After all, that proposition is just as strong today as it was then. The reasons which prompted Mr. Taschereau to introduce that motion and which prompted the representatives of all the governments to approve it are reasons which I suggest to hon. members make it desirable that this motion should not be proceeded with until after the conference, which is to take place after the termination of this session, in regard to limited aspects of the constitutional problem.

It does not seem to me that a single argument has been placed before this house to indicate why this matter cannot very well stand over until that time. What is the urgency? There is no suggestion that we must assert our sovereignty, or declare that we are no longer under any limitations. We have asserted that; we have demonstrated that, and we all believe it. There is no situation now confronting this country which makes necessary or advisable such an assertion of our position to the outside world. We have full power to amend now; and we are concerned with the future of Canada, not with what any people outside Canada may think of the form of procedure. Having regard to the best interests of Canada, then, we should follow the course most likely to avoid any misunderstanding or dangerous conflict of opinion in the future. In view of the statements already made by some of the provincial premiers with respect to the misunderstandings that may follow this piecemeal approach to the amendment of our constitution, I believe a very dangerous step will have been taken if this resolution passes and the provincial representatives are called together only after this has become a fait accompli, after this positive and definite step has been taken. Then they will be told, "Well, now we are prepared to discuss with you what remains".

That is not the way to deal with this question. It is one constitution; but in effect this resolution would tear that constitution in two. Much has been said about asserting our complete independence of any outside jurisdiction. Well, let us assert it; but we are not doing so by this procedure. This resolution merely provides for amendments within a partial field, leaving the remainder of the constitution in such a position that until the discussions with the provinces have taken place we must still go to the same authorities. If that is the important consideration—and it is suggested that it is—then surely it is best to wait until the whole problem has been examined and then deal with it once and for all, ending the necessity of reference to any outside authority in the whole field, not just in part. Unfortunately in the face of statements already made by some of the provincial premiers the possibility of reaching agreement in the remainder of the constitutional field may not be as good as it would be if the recommendation to which I have just referred were followed and the whole matter allowed to stand until the representatives of the dominion and provincial governments could come together, discuss the whole subject and seek to find a procedure satisfactory to all.

Again reference has been made to the fact that there is a difference of opinion between those who believe in the compact theory and those who hold that this is a statute. Of course the British North America Act is a statute. That argument has been worked to the limit, and really has no validity. The British North America Act is a statute; but it is a statute which interpreted in statutory form the agreements, the compact, call them what you will, reached in Quebec by the representatives of the governments who joined to make Canada one nation. Certainly, there was a compact and there was an overall agreement. Is it possible for any hon. member of this house to conscientiously assert that this country would have become one nation unless those who made and presented their resolutions at Quebec, prior to the presentation of the opinion of that conference to Westminster, had believed that this was a binding agreement as to certain basic principles which would be strictly observed in the future?

One might argue about the dictionary definition of the word "compact", but surely that is a compact in the ordinary understanding. We do not need to argue that further. Here is a statute which interprets the basic understanding in the minds of those who said, "It is upon this basis we are prepared to join in forming one nation in Canada." It seems that it would be highly desirable, in any way possible, to avoid any arguments that could be made that this parliament is disregarding those common understandings reached at that time. Even if hon. members of this house do not think the arguments put forward in support of the compact theory are right, even if they do not think the theory is based upon a sound interpretation of our constitutional position, it would be much better to avoid any possibility of a misunderstanding. It should be recognized that there are those who sincerely believe in the compact theory, and whose views can only be dealt with in a way that will avoid future misunderstanding if this meeting takes place before any amendment to the constitution is undertaken.

The Prime Minister has pointed out that the difficulties that have arisen in the past have been with regard to procedure. Certainly, all the difficulties have been in regard to procedure, and it is for that reason the proposed course should not be followed. The course proposed by this resolution does not provide any procedure whatever, but is worded as though there were only two fields of legislative and administrative responsibility. There are, in fact, three, as the Prime Minister pointed out. He has pointed out that there are, first of all, those things which are beyond question within the jurisdiction of the dominion government. There are those that are unquestionably within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces. Then, there are those matters in which there is a common concern and a common responsibility shared by the dominion and provincial governments.

There is something more, however. For years there has been a repeated emphasis upon the need for a review of the responsibilities of the dominion parliament and the provincial legislatures, as well as the division of taxing power, which would give to the governments responsible an independent discretion to deal with the powers that are actually conferred upon them. To an extent that is often not fully appreciated, a provincial government may have full legislative power as well as full administrative responsibility, yet if its taxing powers are limited those responsibilities cannot be carried out because the government has not the necessary revenues to do what should be done on behalf of the people.

The main consideration prompting the appointment of a royal commission, which was presided over first by Mr. Justice Rowell and later by Mr. Sirois, was the division of that responsibility. The report of that commission was directed to the need for a definition of responsibility and a definition of the taxing powers of the governments concerned. Under such an amendment as is now proposed, the dominion government might make amendments in the field of taxation which it would be contended were entirely within their jurisdiction. From the practical point of view, such an amendment might make it impossible for the provinces to carry out some of their responsibilities, no matter how little doubt there might be that those were exclusively within provincial jurisdiction.

In the resolution before the house, reference is made to education. Perhaps there is no single matter of greater concern to every province in Canada than education. It is the basis upon which the future of our country is built. It will be of little use to the provinces to retain full control over education unless they have the revenues to do the things they feel should be done in the interests of the people of the provinces. If the dominion government exercises the taxing powers to the extent that the provinces are unable to raise their revenues for this purpose, then indirectly the dominion government becomes the overriding power which is in a position to say, not only that this is the amount of money a province will receive, but this is the manner in which the money shall be used. There is not an hon. member in this house who does not know quite well that there is a general tendency for people to say, if money is being provided by one treasury for another, then the treasury providing the money should have some say as to how that is to be spent.

Consequently, by the process of amendments relating to taxation, fields of exclusively provincial jurisdiction may be effectively invaded, and invaded in a very dangerous manner, even though that might not be the intention of any member of this government. As this government looks around and sees the large numbers of its supporters in this house and feels the confidence inspired by that representation, it would be well for them to realize that there will be many other governments in the years ahead. It should be the purpose of the parliament of Canada to make certain that the course which is followed is not one which opens up dangers in the future, no matter how confident any government of the day may be that it would not abuse those powers. Of course, the extent to which a government might not abuse those powers is a subject upon which there might be a divergence of views.

The fact remains, however, that this is something which will affect the whole future of Canada. Great caution should be exercised to see that the door is not opened to a procedure which would centralize in Ottawa effective control of matters that were intended to be under provincial jurisdiction, through the indirect method of gaining control of the purse strings of the provincial governments, which is a very real and immediate possibility unless a conference meets soon to deal with the particular problems of taxation and allocation of responsibilities.

I need not remind any hon. member of this house that the present agreements under which a number of provinces receive payments are not agreements that resulted from conferences. They are agreements that resulted from the acceptance by those provinces of terms stated here in this House of Commons. Long before those agreements terminate it is essential that the whole problem of taxation be considered, as well as that of responsibility and jurisdiction. The time to do that is while this matter is up for consideration so that we deal not only with the constitutional matters but with the incidence of the constitutional problems which measure the practical ability of the governments to carry out what the constitution says they must do.

This present motion assumes the possibility of clearly defining that dividing. I recall that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said that, if there was any doubt about that, the courts could decide. But in many cases that may be an imaginary relief; because if the dominion government goes ahead and places before parliament amendments which would concentrate the taxing power and would remove from the provinces that measure of independent taxing authority which is an incident of their ability really to govern, they might be placed in the position in which they would be forced to accept agreements, as some provinces were, simply and only because, according to the statements of the premiers of those provinces, they did not feel they could help doing so because of the financial point of view.

By all means let us have a flexible constitution adjusted to the needs of this adult, growing nation. By all means let us have a constitution that is up-to-date in every respect. But we do not achieve that result by this piecemeal procedure or by tearing the constitution in two and saying: Let us take the power to amend in regard to this part; then having done that, let us meet the provinces to see how we can deal with the rest. We shall achieve the result which the Prime Minister has said to be the purpose of this resolution only by covering the whole field at one time.

The Prime Minister accurately and fully has reviewed the difficulties which have arisen in the past. He has referred to the fact that charges have been made that improper procedure had been followed. There is not an hon. member of this house who has been reading the press or who has read the letters that have been sent in who will not be aware that there is every possibility of further charges of improper procedure being made if this course is continued; because that is the clear indication disclosed by those letters and statements that have already been made. As the Prime Minister himself has said, the result of the absence of an understood and clearly-defined procedure has led to controversy as to methods. Nothing that is now before the house meets that situation in any way. Yet that is a situation which we should all try to meet.

Referring to the discussion earlier this year with regard to the Newfoundland agreements and the statutes, the Prime Minister said that it was not clear whether consultation means consent. After all, this is a subject on which men of good will and good judgment can best determine how they can proceed when they meet together and discuss this problem. Until they do so, no one in this house is in a position to say what measure of agreement can be reached or what procedure might be suggested.

The fact is that the conference that met in January, 1936, went a long way toward reaching unanimity as to procedure. The fact that agreement was not reached is no evidence that agreement cannot be reached, because this matter was not brought forward in a purely constitutional conference. It was again brought up in a conference in 1940 when a number of other subjects were under consideration and when the conference did not deal first with this one but with others upon which great difficulty was experienced in reaching agreement. So it has been in other cases. This matter is sufficiently important that a conference should be called for the sole purpose of dealing with it, of reaching agreement, and of reaching agreement with regard to the whole field.

There is one other point that has been mentioned on other occasions as well as today. The Prime Minister pointed out that ever since 1867 the provinces have had the power to amend their constitution, and that what is now proposed is only giving to the parliament of Canada the right of amending, a right which the provincial legislatures have possessed for more than eighty years. But there is a vast difference in the situation. The provincial legislatures carry on their duties within the definite limitations of section 92 and other limiting sections of the British North America Act. Their power to amend their constitution is strictly limited in that way, and in effect deals only with procedural matters and details of that kind. But under the British North America Act, in addition to the specific authority that was conferred upon the parliament of Canada, all the residuary powers which had not been dealt with by the act were conferred upon that parliament. Therefore this amendment covers the whole broad field, including its effect upon provincial responsibilities and administration as well as upon the dominion field.

May I once again quote the words of the premier of Alberta in the closing part of his letter, because I believe they put in simple form something that should be in our minds now.

> We strongly urge that this whole matter be held in abeyance pending the conference which you propose to convene at the close of the present session of parliament. It seems to us that this is the only way in which future conflict can be avoided and the unity of Canada, which we all desire, preserved and strengthened.

Assuming for the sake of argument that every hon. member in the house is in complete agreement with the arguments put forward by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), I still believe that this matter should stand, in view of the fact that the wholehearted concurrence and co-operation of every provincial government and every provincial legislature is so essential to the strengthening of our domestic structure within Canada, during one of the most critical periods in our national history.

No country in the world offers to its people greater opportunities than this country offers to every Canadian today. But the full realization of our vast opportunities to a very great degree depends, in this vast country of ours, upon effective and real co-operation between the dominion and provincial governments, and the parliament of Canada and provincial legislative bodies, no matter of what political persuasion those governments may be.

We are here dealing with the future of Canada, which depends upon that kind of good will and understanding. In view of the statements which have been made, I urge every hon. member to think of the unnecessary disputes which may result if the course now proposed is actually followed, no matter how right the Prime Minister may think he is in the arguments he has put forward, nor how right hon. members supporting him may believe he is in the statements he has made.

The question of co-operation is a real, practical and fundamental principle, one which is vital to the fulfilment of the very purpose the Prime Minister has stated to be in his mind and the minds of his colleagues in offering this resolution. It is for that reason that I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker):

That the said proposed resolution be amended by striking out all the words after the first word "that" and substituting therefor the following:

"That His Excellency the Governor General in Council be requested to convoke as soon as may be possible a constitutional convention of representatives of the dominion and provincial governments to devise a method of amending within Canada the constitution of Canada, and of safeguarding minority rights; so that such method may become the subject later of an humble address, when adopted, to His Majesty the King praying an amendment of the British North America Act, 1867, accordingly."

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in common with all hon. members I realize that this is a most important debate, and that we are discussing this afternoon an important resolution.

First of all however may I offer the suggestion to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that in view of the importance of the subject, and of the correspondence with the provincial premiers, it might be well if the letters tabled this afternoon were printed as an appendix to today's Hansard. I make this suggestion because, in following a debate of this description, references are made to communications. Unless those communications are printed in Hansard, many of the people who receive Hansard could not follow the discussions.

May I ask the Prime Minister if he would agree to my suggestion?

Mr. St. Laurent: If there is no objection from any hon. member I should be glad to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and ask Mr. Speaker to instruct the editor of Hansard to print the letters as an appendix.

Mr. Speaker: Does the suggestion meet with the unanimous approval of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Coldwell: The two speeches to which we have listened this afternoon have been of a very high order, one which I suggest does credit both to the subject under discussion and to the House of Commons. The Prime Minister has placed on record an historical review of our constitution, both prior to the adoption of the British North America Act, and the events which occurred subsequently. His plea is that we shall take unto ourselves in this parliament the right which parliament should possess to deal with matters specifically assigned to this legislative body, and to safeguard the rights of minorities as set forth in the British North America Act. With that position we of the C.C.F. are in agreement.

I am not going to discuss the amendment, because the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) did not develop the idea which he suggests in his amendment. He did not tell us how the constituent assembly implicit in the amendment would be established, or what procedure would be followed in implementing the amendment. If for no other reason, we could not vote for it.

However, for another reason I shall not discuss it. I believe that under the rules of the house Mr. Speaker, after taking it into consideration, may consider whether or not it is in order.

We have heard a great deal this afternoon about the early days of our confederation. Not as a lawyer but rather as a student of Canadian history let me say that I have always been struck with the manner in which the fathers of confederation immediately after 1867 viewed the British North America Act. This afternoon the Prime Minister drew to the attention of the house the fact that in 1871 the government of the day, which consisted of the fathers of confederation, actually took upon itself the responsibility of requesting the parliament at Westminster to amend the British North America Act, without any reference to the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada, or any reference to the provincial legislatures.

That action was criticized on the floor of parliament. In 1875 something similar was done. When we look through the records following confederation I think it is perfectly clear—I am not dealing with subsequent interpretations of the law; I am leaving that out altogether—that obviously the fathers of confederation did not hold the view that has been expressed this afternoon by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and which is sometimes expressed by some other people, that in order to amend the British North America Act the provinces must be consulted. That is what is known as the compact theory.

The leader of the opposition remarked that the provincial legislatures may amend their own constitutions. Indeed they may amend their own constitutions in every particular except that touching the appointment of the lieutenant governor. If it is argued that the provinces should be consulted if we propose to amend the constitution of Canada in matters assigned specifically to the parliament of Canada because what we propose to do may affect the welfare, the rights and the economies of the provinces, it seems to me that by the same token it might be argued that this parliament should have the right to be consulted if any amendment is to be made to the provincial powers or, if we care to call them that, to the provincial constitutions. However, no one argues that opinion because obviously it would be untenable. I think that we have in this parliament the right to deal with all matters assigned to us and hence should also have the right to amend the constitution in relation to them.

There was some validity to the argument of the leader of the opposition that it is unfortunate that this is being done in a piecemeal manner. I do not know the minds of members of the government in this particular, but I presume something like this is in their minds: In the past the dominion-provincial conferences dealing with dominion-provincial relations have been abortive and consequently, when this parliament takes to itself the right to amend the constitution in connection with those particulars that affect only the rights of this parliament, it is an indication to the provinces that this parliament is determined to do everything in its power to bring about a satisfactory method of amending the constitution generally. That is what I think.

In that connection the leader of the opposition spoke of the powers of taxation and expressed the fear that we might infringe upon certain rights of the provinces in regard to taxation. I am sure that this parliament has no desire of infringing upon the rights of the provinces in that field. Let me point out that under section 91, subsection 3, of the British North America Act this parliament is empowered to raise money for the country by any method it decides to use. Consequently it seems to me that the argument of the leader of the opposition in that particular falls to the ground.

However, in taking the right to amend our own constitution there are some fears that we might legitimately have in our minds. I am not going to deal with all of them, but let me say that when we have the right to amend our own constitution in the particulars involved in this resolution there will be nothing to prevent this parliament from perpetuating itself beyond five years. This parliament could amend the sections of the appropriate acts to prolong the life of parliament to seven years, to ten years or beyond. I think we should safeguard ourselves somehow in that particular.

I say that, because the legislatures have done exactly that. A few years ago the legislature of the province of Ontario extended its life by one year, with the consent of all the parties in the legislature. Then it proceeded to extend its life another year. I fancy the present leader of the opposition was the leader of the opposition in the Ontario legislature at that time, and if my recollection is correct the second extension of one year was not agreed to by the opposition parties. A Liberal government of Saskatchewan, against the bitter criticism of the opposition, took unto itself in 1943 the right to extend the life of the legislature for one year beyond the five years' limitation.

I think the real power of the people is in their right to elect their parliaments and legislatures, in their right to statutory periodic elections. It seems to me that in dealing with this matter, and it should be thought of, we should see to it that when we amend our constitution we do not jeopardize a right of this description. We should safeguard ourselves in connection with important matters of that sort.

We should see to it that we provide for measures of parliamentary reform. As hon. members know, we believe that the time has come when the condition of the other place warrants its abolition, but in any event we should see to it that Canada has the right to amend it under the proper conditions and in important particulars.

The main point I want to make this afternoon—the other points in connection with this matter have been well made by both the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, and I do not propose to reiterate what they have said—is that I do not think under the circumstances, and in view of what has happened in recent years in dominion-provincial negotiations, that we should heed the plea for further delay. The idea has grown up in this country over a number of years, due in part to decisions of the privy council, that we should accept the view that the provinces must be consulted when we propose merely to take to ourselves the right to amend our constitution only in so far as it affects the affairs of this parliament itself. We do not accept this opinion.

If we look at the history of this country since confederation we find, for example, that we are told that at the Quebec conference agreements in the nature of a treaty were reached. My recollection is that there were seventy-two resolutions passed to guide the fathers of confederation when they went to London, but when they got to London they did not implement them. As a matter of fact, there was much discussion and finally compromises were reached. Even the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said that there were four provinces at Quebec which gave approval to the resolutions requesting the British North America Act, but there were only three. There were Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, although at the Quebec conference Canada was more or less divided into two parts, upper and lower Canada.

Let us not forget that before the British North America Act was passed Joseph Howe went to Great Britain with, I believe, one or two colleagues to make a protest to the imperial parliament, but without avail. I understand only two of the thirty-eight members elected to the Nova Scotia house after the British North America Act was passed favoured confederation. After that election Joseph Howe headed a delegation to London to protest and to ask the imperial parliament to set up a royal commission to review the whole matter of the entry of Nova Scotia into confederation. We all know what happened. The request was not granted.

I mention that because it indicates that there was no compact, no agreement. As we have seen, one of the provinces that came into confederation at the beginning bitterly opposed it subsequently and sent its ablest spokesman to London in an attempt to upset the British North America Act.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): He afterwards supported it.

Mr. Coldwell: He afterwards joined the government and supported it when he found that all protests were ineffective. I suppose as a good patriotic Canadian he decided that the best thing to do was to try to make the best of what he considered a bad job and help to make it a success. In any event he had failed to upset it. I think a very good summary of what actually happened can be found in volume II of a series of papers written some years ago and circulated widely across Canada. They were known as the Kingdom and Independence Papers. I used to get them from the very beginning. They were the work of the late John S. Ewart, K.C., of Ottawa, a man who, in the years prior to his death, which occurred in the early thirties, did a great deal to popularize the idea that Canada had become an adult nation and should take unto herself the attributes of sovereignty and nationhood, including Canadian citizenship, the abolition of appeals to the privy council, and the right to amend our Canadian constitution.

In the concluding paragraph of paper No. 5 in volume II this description of the British North America Act can be found:

> A statute arranged not in Canada but in England, by delegates from Canada who although bound by the Quebec resolutions departed widely from them; by delegates from Nova Scotia who were known not to represent Nova Scotia's wishes and the proceedings purposely kept secret from the people who might, by "reverberation" of it, be "stirred to its depths" in opposition, can hardly be regarded as a contract.

In support of the last statement, "kept secret from the people who might, by 'reverberation' of it, be 'stirred to its depths' in opposition", he quotes at some length a letter written to Mr. Leonard Tilley, one of the fathers of confederation, by Sir John A. Macdonald just before he left for London on the 8th of October, 1866. In his letter Sir John A. Macdonald says that great secrecy must be kept regarding the proposals and that in view of the forthcoming New Brunswick elections the least said about the proposals the better. That is the meaning of the reference of Mr. Ewart.

It seems to me it is in the best interests of parliament and of Canada that the resolution should be adopted by the house at the conclusion of the debate, and that we should not let the matter drag along interminably. I believe the people of Canada understand the situation very well. I think there was and is a good deal of resentment across Canada that the dominion-provincial conferences were not a success in other respects. As a matter of fact, I think that hon. members opposite to some extent owe some of the support they received in the election on June 27 to the fact that many people of Canada felt that way about it. Whether or not that be so, I think the time has come when we should support a resolution of this description.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) asked why we should adopt the measure right now, and whether it mattered what people outside the country might think about it. I think it matters a good deal because anyone who has attended an international conference, and perhaps has represented Canada at one or more of those conferences, or has represented Canada unofficially at some of the unofficial conferences, as I have had the privilege of doing from time to time over the last ten or twelve years, will know that again and again a Canadian is questioned in this regard. People say to him, "You say that you are an independent sovereign nation, but what is your final court of appeal?" Then the Canadian representative says, "It is the privy council in London". Then he is asked, "What is your constitution? Have you the right to amend it?" The answer is made that we have not. We also know perfectly well that in the early years of the United Nations, as in the league of nations before that, there were nations which were inclined to question Canada's right to act as an independent nation because they would constantly say that we were merely a colony of Great Britain, and that we had to do what the foreign office of the United Kingdom said we had to do. The evidence they brought was our constitutional immaturity.

I think from the point of view of our external relations, from the point of view of the manner in which we appear in the eyes of the world outside our own borders, the time has come when, in so far as this house can do it, we should take the right to amend our constitution. I also think that we cannot leave the matter there. I do not think the government should allow the final amendment of our constitution in all particulars by Canadian legislatures—and I use the plural—to drag along indefinitely.

I believe every attempt should be made to tidy up the matter within the next year or so, to get a provincial conference together, and to finish the job in a proper and decent manner. I know there are tremendous difficulties in the way, but sooner or later not only the governments but perhaps—and this may be what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has in mind; I do not know—the parliament and the legislatures of the country may have to form themselves into a constituent assembly, where all parties would be represented and come to a conclusion. I do not think it would be wise to have a constitution drafted which would be predominantly a constitution of the Liberal party, or of the Conservative party, or of any other party. I believe the constitution of Canada should be one which will represent the consensus of Canadians as such, aside from their party differences and affiliations.

Mr. Speaker, we support the resolution.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I should like to record the views of the Social Credit group on this very important question of constitutional amendment. We have not spent a great deal of time trying to decide whether the British North America Act is a pact or simply a statute of the parliament at Westminster. Whatever it may be declared finally, the fact remains that sections 91 and 92 set out a division of powers as between the dominion and provincial governments which since 1867 has served to guide those governments in the things they have attempted to do. With respect to a federal constitution, we believe the broad principles upon which the legislative powers were distributed between the dominion and the provinces under the British North America Act were generally sound. Jurisdiction over those matters of national concern was reserved exclusively to the dominion, while jurisdiction over matters with respect to which decentralized autonomy was considered desirable was reserved exclusively to the provinces. However, over the years many difficulties have arisen between the dominion and the provinces. I should like to cite just two or three of the main reasons for this, as I see them; and I do this because they involve some of the views we hold toward the proposal of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as it is contained in the resolution now before us.

In the first place, the British North America Act is a rigid constitution circumscribed by a statute of the parliament of the United Kingdom. Under it the distribution of legislative powers was laid down in the light of conditions existing at the time, that is, in 1867. Conditions have changed since then in a good many respects. I feel sure, as must most hon. members of this house, that the fathers of confederation could not possibly have foreseen the changes that have taken place, nor could they have foreseen the many problems that have arisen between the senior and the provincial governments as a result of changed conditions. But the fact remains that some of our present constitutional difficulties have arisen simply because times and conditions have changed. This in itself indicates that occasions requiring amendments are bound to arise; but we believe there is little that cannot now be done in the interests of the Canadian people, under the British North America Act as it stands, through earnest co-operation between dominion and provincial authorities. In those few cases where desirable and progressive things are actually being retarded because of the super-rigidity of the constitution, we think it desirable that amendments be sought; and we are quite in agreement that those amendments should be sought in Canada, through this parliament.

The second important cause of problems that have arisen is the fact that difficulties in fields of jurisdiction and responsibility as between the dominion and provincial government are not altogether due to the allocation of specific powers under sections 91 and 92. Very often they arise from interpretations; and the interpretations that have been placed upon the distribution of powers over the years have involved a good many classes of subjects. Considerable confusion has arisen because at different times in the past dominion governments have invaded various fields of provincial jurisdiction, or fields the provinces had come to believe were theirs exclusively, of course much of it under the pressure and exigencies of war. We believe this whole situation must be clarified permanently as soon as possible.

The first step in that direction, in our judgment, need not be the amendment of the constitution but rather the negotiation of a clear and definite understanding as to respective fields of jurisdiction and responsibility as between the dominion and provincial governments. If as a result of dominion-provincial negotiations it is established that amendments to the constitution are necessary and obviously in the interests of our people as a whole; and if it becomes necessary to allocate responsibility for and jurisdiction over such matters as have become of national interest and importance since 1867, such as radio and things of that sort, then of course we believe such amendments ought to be sought. And let me repeat that we believe those amendments should be sought within Canada, in this parliament.

A third cause of difficulty between provincial and senior governments lies in the failure, particularly here at Ottawa, the capital of Canada, to realize that authority carries with it corresponding responsibility. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, there has been too much inclination here at Ottawa to place responsibility under the constitution upon provincial governments without careful consideration of the means by which those authorities and responsibilities may be carried out. With respect to this cause of trouble between governments, and by way of illustration, let me quote a short portion of the preliminary statement by the premier of Alberta at the opening of the dominion-provincial conference on August 6, 1945. At that time Mr. Manning said:

> In actual fact, while with respect to certain matters the dominion government has been given constitutional authority, the provincial governments are constitutionally responsible for the consequences of the federal government's actions. With respect to other matters for which the provinces must assume full constitutional responsibility, they are denied the means—that is the effective constitutional authority—necessary to enable them to discharge those responsibilities. Section 92 of the British North America Act gives the provinces exclusive jurisdiction over property and civil rights, but experience has shown that the provinces' authority in this field is largely nullified by the fact that the dominion government has exclusive jurisdiction in matters affecting interest and bankruptcy laws. This was brought out forcibly during the pre-war depression years, when under the stress of economic conditions many western Canadian farmers were unable to meet their debt obligations resulting in wholesale foreclosures at depressed land values by lending corporations. It was within the provinces' sphere of jurisdiction to safeguard the property rights of the victims of those conditions, but provincial governments frequently found themselves frustrated in taking effective action due to the fact that the dominion possessed exclusive jurisdiction over matters affecting interest and bankruptcy.

This quotation illustrates the fact that there are overlapping authorities and confused fields of jurisdiction. Furthermore, it illustrates that, in at least this one instance which I have cited, the responsibility is placed on the province but it is denied the wherewithal to make good that responsibility.

Now, a good many examples could be quoted to illustrate this same confusion about the allocation of authority and responsibility within the dominion. Mr. Manning cited another example which I believe should be put on the record because it is important to this whole discussion. He said:

> Of particular importance is the fact that the dominion government enjoys exclusive jurisdiction over banks, banking and the issue of money, together with the regulation of trade and commerce. This gives the parliament of Canada complete jurisdiction over national monetary and economic policy, but it is the provinces that are constitutionally responsible to provide the necessary relief and other social services required by those who find themselves unemployed and destitute as a result of a restrictive monetary policy imposed or permitted by the dominion government. In short, experience has demonstrated that the provinces frequently must assume responsibilities involving substantial expenditures as a result of the consequences of national policies over which the dominion government has exclusive jurisdiction, while at the same time experience has made it equally clear that the constitutional responsibilities of the provinces frequently cannot be carried out effectively due to the fact that provincial authority in certain fields is nullified by the dominion's exclusive or equal rights in fields which infringe upon provincial autonomy. This situation is particularly acute in regard to matters involving financial policy and its effects upon the economy of the country as a whole.

The important question, sir, which faces us, in the light of these facts, is this: How can the Prime Minister and his government contend that they can safely proceed with the piecemeal alteration of the constitution? How is he going to know which is, in fact, a federal and which a provincial authority or responsibility? That is a question which has to be answered, and it is one about which there is grave concern across this whole country. In the first place, we are opposed to the piecemeal method of changing or altering our constitution. We hold, Mr. Speaker, that any worthy move to clarify the constitutional position of the federal and provincial governments must be a part of a much broader effort that will embrace the entire field of constitutional authority.

All of these things emphasize our contention that this resolution should not be passed by this house now. There are two main reasons why this group has adopted that position and I should like to refer to them briefly. I am puzzled, Mr. Speaker, about the resolution as a result of a Canadian Press dispatch which was dated Montreal, October 14. It appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of that date under the large headline:

> Will meet provinces when session ends. To discuss amendment of B.N.A. Act.

The dispatch states that the Prime Minister said on October 13, at a meeting in Montreal, that a dominion-provincial conference will be called at the end of the present session to ask agreement on a satisfactory procedure for amending the Canadian constitution in Canada.

If this dispatch is correct, sir, the Prime Minister said, while speaking to the main conference and banquet of the Young Liberals Association:

> If we can reach a satisfactory agreement, we will then ask the United Kingdom parliament to amend the British North America Act of 1867 . . . to give to federal authorities the same power to amend the constitution of Canada which the provincial authorities already enjoy to amend the constitutions of the provinces.

Mr. St. Laurent: If the hon. member will permit, I should like to say at once that that dispatch is incorrect. If the hon. member reads the editorial in the Citizen, he will note that the editor of that paper realized from the tone of the dispatch that it could not be correct.

Mr. Low: I am glad to have the Prime Minister's statement at this point because, Mr. Speaker, there were grave questions in my mind, and the minds of many other Canadians, about his good faith. I do not like to doubt him. I think the Prime Minister should be above that at all times. I am glad he did make that assertion to correct the impression that had gone abroad.

The fact remains, sir, that whatever was said, the last part of his statement is repeated in the letter to the premier of Quebec, namely, that the proposed amendment will—> —give to the federal authorities the same power to amend the constitution of Canada which the provincial authorities already enjoy to amend the constitutions of the provinces.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to pass this resolution would not put the dominion on an even footing with the provinces at all. It has not escaped the Prime Minister's thinking, I am sure, nor the thinking of any hon. member, that the powers of the provincial legislatures, even in the matter of amending their own constitution, are seriously circumscribed by the overriding authority of the dominion government to disallow any provincial legislation. That is a handicap from which the federal government does not suffer. I say to you, sir, that the Prime Minister's argument is invalid.

In moving the adoption of the resolution today, the Prime Minister indicated that he did not intend to await the outcome of the dominion-provincial conference which has been announced. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that is a poor way of starting to gain and hold the confidence of the provinces of Canada in the good faith of the federal government. Surely, the Prime Minister must realize that, when it comes to the very serious and important matter of changing the fundamental law of the federation of provinces, he must seek and get the full co-operation, good will and confidence of all the governments and people of Cananda. Without those, no satisfactory procedure could possibly be worked out as he has suggested for the amendment of the constitution, even in matters that do not affect the exclusive powers of the federal government. If there is not that confidence and good will, it could not be worked out from now until doomsday. I am quite sure all of us are aware of that.

Good will must be exhibited on all sides, but it takes an effort to get it and to hold it. If the provinces and the people do not have confidence in the justice and fairness of the federal government, I do not know what good a dominion-provincial conference could do.

Under those circumstances why did the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) not have the dominion-provincial conference first, and then at the next session of parliament bring this resolution before the House of Commons? Surely a matter of a few months is not going to make any appreciable difference. There is not that much rush. If there is, why have we not been told why? I am convinced there is nothing that is rushing. Could the explanation of this particular question that I have asked be found in that article that Mr. Sandwell sent around to all of us, which was published in Toronto Saturday Night of September 27 last, and in which he said:

> The announcement of the government's policy has achieved already one of its main purposes, which was unquestionably that of clearing up the confusion left in the public mind, especially in Quebec, by the Prime Minister's declaration that parliament has the power to abolish the French language if it decided to do so. The country has now been assured, if it needed the assurance, that parliament has no intention of abolishing the French language and is perfectly willing to turn over that power to some authority more carefully constituted for the purpose.

I say that may be the explanation, although I do not know. But if it is, then the purpose has already been served, and the minds of the people have already been set at rest on that point, and we need not proceed to pass the resolution.

There is another cause for some bewilderment over the way in which the government is proceeding in this whole matter. Only a few days ago this house passed legislation authorizing the government to set up the Supreme Court of Canada as the final and conclusive court of appeal in all cases, constitutional and otherwise, coming from the Canadian courts. It will take months if not years of most painstaking work to organize our supreme court and to establish it on a basis that will make it possible for it to deal effectively with constitutional matters especially; I am not now referring to civil and criminal appeals.

I am sure that it has not escaped the Prime Minister's thinking that there is a most important psychological consideration involved if the Supreme Court of Canada is to achieve and to hold the confidence of Canadian citizens in its ability to deal objectively and justly with constitutional references. That, to my mind, is a most important consideration. Let us not forget that the supreme court will be a creature of the dominion government, that its members will be appointed by the governor general in council, and that the powers and duties of this court can be increased or decreased by a simple majority vote of this house at any time that the government sees fit to bring in proposals for doing so. It is our belief that the resolution should not be passed until the Supreme Court of Canada has had time and opportunity to establish itself in the confidence of the people of this country.

I have only a word or two further to say, Mr. Speaker, and then I shall close. Other questions that are in our minds at this moment are these: Why is the government seeking this power? Are there important things that are essential to be done in the interests of the Canadian people and that cannot be done without amending the British North America Act? If so, let us have a statement of them. What are they? We are, of course, denied the privilege of asking these questions and dozens of others that would occur to us, and which it is necessary to ask in order to obtain the information, because the resolution must be discussed with you, sir, in the chair. If it could be discussed in the committee of the whole, we could then ask the questions that are in our minds and could elicit all the information that it is possible to get. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we in this house should get all possible information with regard to what is behind this resolution, or what is activating the government in moving it at this time. Furthermore, every implication in it should be laid bare to the Canadian people. That is our contention.

Perhaps the Prime Minister would be constrained to answer some of these questions. It being nearly six o'clock, I have not time to ask them all, but one or two occur to me at the moment. One is this. Is this resolution the government's way around the stalemate or impasse which arose as a result of the breakdown of the last dominion-provincial conference? Another one is this. What would be the attitude of the Prime Minister and his government, if, having attempted to lay down a definite procedure for a constitutional amendment, the majority of the provinces state that they are definitely opposed to an amendment suggested by the federal government? Would the government of Canada proceed to put through the amendment anyhow? Those are questions that are in the minds of the Canadian people and they have far-reaching implications that the people ought to understand. Another question is this. Is this resolution indicative of the general trend? Is it a first step towards a complete repeal of the British North America Act and the substitution for it of another constitution? Although some hon. members may laugh at what I am about to say, I say it in all seriousness. There are many people in this country who are thinking in that way.

An hon. Member: How many?

Mr. Low: A great many more than the hon. member who has interjected has any idea of; I will guarantee that. This is a matter which ought to be clarified; the people's minds ought to be set at rest on the issue.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, with regard to procedure I would say this. We believe—indeed we have already put ourselves on record to this effect—that at the earliest possible time a dominion-provincial conference should be called, at which conference a procedure should be laid down for amending the British North America Act in Canada. The procedure decided upon must, of course, be satisfactory to both the dominion and the provinces. There must also be a real effort to clarify permanently the whole matter of responsibilities as well as authorities and powers under sections 91 and 92. We feel that this resolution is a matter of grave concern to so many people across this country that it should not be passed at this time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of the resolution before the house is one of admittedly fundamental importance. In many respects it goes to the root of the whole structure of our nation. It touches on matters vital to national unity; and whether we remain here a short time or a long time I venture the prediction that nothing of more far-reaching importance will be dealt with, in the experience of any member.

It is, therefore, I believe, particularly regrettable that a matter of such vast importance should be dealt with under a procedure which permits of only one debate. Think of it, sir! In even the most ordinary and commonplace bills we have three readings, together with consideration in detail in committee of the whole. In this instance, on the other hand, we are dealing with a matter which goes to the root of confederation, and yet we deal with it only as a resolution. There will be no consideration in committee; there will be no review in detail in committee; and it will be before the house for only one debate.

That is serious enough from the point of view of the opportunity needed by hon. members thoroughly to sift through the significance of the proposals; but, if I may say so, it is more serious for the country at large, because we know that in a matter such as this it is only as the debate proceeds in the house and the various points of view are put forward by hon. members that the true significance begins to permeate the electorate, through the medium of the press and other avenues of information.

We know that when a measure in the form of a bill goes through the various stages in the house there is an opportunity for the public to form an appreciation of the significance of the measure under debate, and to bring public opinion to bear upon the subject matter before the house. We see that happening every day. It is because of the necessity of informing the public, as well as to avoid unduly precipitate action in the house, that provision is made in our procedure for consideration stage by stage.

Yet here today we have just one opportunity of reviewing this subject in debate. When the vote is taken on the resolution, that will end the matter in the house. Whether the debate continues long enough to give the people of Canada an opportunity to appreciate the full significance of the proposal remains to be seen. But I wish to express my view that it is most regrettable that the procedure of the house permits a matter of such far-reaching importance as this one to be disposed of in a relatively summary fashion.

In view of the ringingly clear statement made by my leader this afternoon I do not think it is strictly necessary to say what I am about to say. However, I do wish to put myself clearly on record as stating that the time has long since passed when Canada should have the right to amend her own constitution within her own borders, both from the point of view of recognizing her own status and autonomy and of relieving the parliament of the United Kingdom of what on some occasions has been a source of embarrassment. It was so in 1943, when the address presented by our parliament at that time was opposed by at least one provincial legislature.

It should not be possible now, with Canada a grown-up nation, to have a situation continue where embarrassment may be caused to the parliament of the United Kingdom in that fashion, and where we put ourselves in the position of having to go outside Canada to obtain amendments.

But, sir, to say that we ought to have in Canada complete power to amend our constitution as we see fit is a very different thing from saying that this parliament ought to have unlimited power to make amendments to the constitution. I think it is fair to say that in a good deal of the discussion of this subject in times past there has been a regrettable tendency to confound amendments made by Canada with amendments made by parliament, or at the instance of parliament.

I wish to say definitely that in subscribing to the principle that Canada ought to have within her own shores the power to amend her constitution in any way she sees fit, I do not mean at all that parliament should have untrammelled power to bring about amendments by itself. The question before us is or should be one of finding a formula for an amending procedure. With that should be linked the question of what method we should pursue at this time in relation to the legislatures and governments of the provinces in seeking that necessary formula.

I make it clear here and now that so far as I am concerned I do not think the method proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the method inherent in the resolution before the house today, is a satisfactory formula or even a helpful beginning toward seeking a satisfactory amending formula.

Something was said this afternoon about the need for amendments. Sir, there are many amendments needed in our constitution. I believe we would find ourselves on common ground if we were to say in the first place that Canada ought to have the right to amend her constitution and, in the second place, that amendments are necessary. We are not here engaged in merely academic discussion. It has been a matter of wonder to me for a long time why we allow sections 55, 56 and 57 to continue in the British North America Act. They may be a dead letter, but they remain. These are the sections under which power is reserved to the reigning sovereign in council to disallow measures of parliament. They confer on the British government the right of reservation of legislation and the right of disallowance. It is a fact that the power of disallowance has not been exercised since 1873, and that the reservation of legislation for the sovereign's approval under these sections did not long continue after that date. It seems to me that is one striking example of an amendment long overdue to remove a dead letter.

The Prime Minister maintained this afternoon that his government possessed a mandate to put this resolution into effect, and suggested that in the view of the government it was the first step it should take, even in advance of consultation with the provinces in relation to other matters arising out of the constitution.

I heard the statement made in the house by the Prime Minister about a year ago on this subject. I followed press reports of his speeches during the campaign, with some care, and I do say that unquestionably the government has a mandate, as I think every member in the house, regardless of party, must have a mandate from his electorate to seek for Canada the power to amend her own constitution. But I submit to you, sir, that the Prime Minister has yet to show the House of Commons where he has a mandate from the people of Canada to proceed by the method laid down in the resolution now under debate. Certainly it was not indicated in the speech he made to the house this afternoon.

Where is the mandate to select one field, a field the line of demarcation of which is not as clear to many people as it appears to be to the Prime Minister, and to say that without consultation with the provinces we are going right ahead with this subject in a manner which I think will prejudice the wider enterprise of seeking a comprehensive amending formula for the Canadian constitution in all its aspects?

Undoubtedly if the fathers of confederation did wrestle with this question of amending procedure, they had some difficulty with it. It is not free from difficulty yet. In his correspondence with the premiers of the provinces the Prime Minister referred to it as being a subject of great difficulty. Nevertheless, we should no longer continue to be the one dominion lacking this power.

But in my submission the formula by which a comprehensive amending procedure is to be achieved in Canada must be one that is acceptable to the provinces. It is the height of folly to proceed to carve up this subject. We are only inviting the defeat of any hope of effecting that comprehensive approach to the problem of devising an amending procedure which is long overdue.

So far as the government is concerned, the Prime Minister this afternoon tolled the death knell of the compact theory of confederation. If those who follow him in this house follow him in his speech, then the Liberal party has today tolled the death knell of the compact theory. There are some things about the compact theory about which I should like to remind Liberal members in this house.

Whether or not that theory is precisely recognized by the courts in interpreting the British North America Act, it is an incontestable historical fact.

I should like to refer to the letter of October 5, 1949, from the premier of Quebec to the Prime Minister. In that letter reference is made to the statement made by Lord Carnarvon when the British North America bill was introduced by him into the Westminster parliament. Lord Carnarvon said:

> The Quebec resolutions, with some slight changes, form the basis of a measure that I have now the honour to submit to parliament. To those resolutions, all the British provinces in North America were, as I have said, consenting parties, and the measure founded upon them must be accepted as a treaty of union.

When the bill was introduced in the British House of Commons by Mr. Adderley he said:

> If again, federation has in this case specially been a matter of most delicate treaty and compact between the provinces . . . it is clearly necessary that there should be a third party ab extra to give sanction to the treaty made between them.

That was the view of the government which introduced in the Westminster parliament eighty-three years ago the bill that later became the British North America Act.

But the evidence does not end there. It was the view of the Liberal party in its best days in this country that the British North America Act, certainly the scheme of confederation which found its legislative embodiment in the British North America Act, was a compact. I should like to refer to the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as reported on page 2199 of Hansard of January 28, 1907, when he said:

> Confederation is a compact—

I ask Liberal members of this house who heard the remarks of the Prime Minister today when he completely repudiated the compact theory to put alongside his words those of Laurier, in 1907, who said, "Confederation is a compact." I quote from page 2199 again:

> Confederation is a compact made originally by four provinces, but adhered to by all the nine provinces who have entered it, and I submit to the judgment of this house and to the best consideration of its members, that this compact should not be lightly altered. It should be altered only for adequate cause, and after the provinces themselves have had an opportunity to pass judgment on the same.

British North America Act

The view expounded this afternoon in this house by the Prime Minister and the view expounded by Laurier in that passage are as different as day is from night.

That view did not end with Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Speaking in this house in 1924, the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe said this, as reported on page 520 of Hansard of 1924:

> Now this treaty cannot be changed, it has been the contention of many constitutional authorities, and I think it is only fair that no change should be accepted, without the consent of all those who were parties to it. It is a sacred treaty just as is any other treaty; it is no scrap of paper.

A treaty—that was the view of Lapointe: it was not to be changed apart from consultation with those who were parties to the treaty. Put that statement alongside the doctrine expounded in this house this afternoon by the Prime Minister and you will find that they can never be reconciled until kingdom come.

Then speaking in 1925, as reported on page 301 of Hansard, Mr. Lapointe said this:

> I do not think there can be any attempt to change the mutual charter of both the dominion and the provinces by the arbitrary action of this parliament. I do not think it is possible to do it. To those who want changes, and I am willing to admit that there might be the necessity for changes, I would say that the only way to get them is the constitutional way, to ask the consent of the various parties to confederation.

That is all that the amendment that has been submitted to the house by my leader asks, that there shall be consultation with the provinces. Surely it is a reasonable request. That was certainly the view of the Liberal party until these later days.

I turn now to a very commendable speech made in this house on June 20, 1946, by the late Hon. P. J. A. Cardin. If I remember rightly this was the last speech made in this house by Mr. Cardin. It was a great and eloquent speech made by a man who had given long years of sincere public service in this house. Out of his long experience he made some significant observations upon a similar measure that was then under debate in the house, that an humble address be presented to His Majesty the King seeking an amendment of the British North America Act for the purpose of altering the basis of redistribution and membership in the house under section 51 of the British North America Act. Mr. Cardin was referring to the doctrine expounded in that debate by the present Prime Minister, then Minister of Justice, that except in connection with the subjects enumerated in sections 92, 93, 94 and 95, parliament had the right to obtain an amendment of the British North America Act without consulting the provinces. When the hon. member for Calgary West asked if that doctrine applied to section 133 of the act, when he asked if parliament had the right to obtain from Westminster an amendment to the British North America Act in reference to section 133, the Prime Minister, then the Minister of Justice, answered, "Yes, legally, I say it can". The Prime Minister expounded the doctrine that parliament, without consulting the provinces, has the legal power to secure amendments to the British North America Act at Westminster which could have as their purpose the abolition of any language rights under section 133. Following that statement, referring to the doctrine expounded by the present Prime Minister, Mr. Cardin is reported at page 2667 of Hansard as follows:

> And what is the consequence? We have heard the Minister of Justice say in reply to the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) that the federal parliament would have the authority to make representations to the imperial parliament to amend the constitution by wiping out section 133 of the British North America Act which protects the French language in this country, and that without consulting the provinces. That is one consequence of the theory which has been expounded by the Minister of Justice in this house, contrary to the views expressed by his distinguished predecessor, the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, and all public men in Canada since 1867.
> In all the discussions which took place in regard to amending the constitution it has always been contended by all parties that we could never touch the privileges of any province, of any race or any religion, without giving them the opportunity of being consulted and of expressing in detail their views on the proposition.

At page 2671 Mr. Cardin concluded his remarks with these words:

> The amendment asks for consultation with the provinces and the obtaining of at least their advice before proceeding with the resolution. I am in accord with that view, and in that stand I remain in the family of the old Liberals among whom I have been brought up in my political life. I stand with Blake; I stand with Laurier; I stand with Lapointe, and on that constitutional issue I also agree with leaders of the Conservative party in the past. No, I am not alone. I am at present preaching the gospel they all have preached, the gospel I myself have been advocating in my province and in Canada as a whole for the last thirty-five years.

That was a great speech by a great Canadian, and I put it to every Liberal member of the house: Do you stand today with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the government in the doctrine that has been expounded by him today, or do you stand with Blake, with Laurier and with Lapointe? You cannot stand with the Prime Minister today and stand with Blake, Laurier, Lapointe and Cardin. When the amendment and the resolution come to a vote the Liberal members today will make their choice because they cannot vote for both. They will make their choice with respect to the doctrine of the present Prime Minister. They will have the opportunity of standing with him or the opportunity of standing with Blake, Laurier, Lapointe and Cardin.

Mr. Ferrie: On a point of order, are we discussing the amendment? The new members of the house would like to know whether we are discussing the amendment or the resolution. I have listened for half an hour and it seems to me that nothing has been said about the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: The amendment is before the house.

Mr. Fleming: It is perfectly clear that the resolution constitutes a repudiation of the position taken by the great Liberal leaders of times gone by, and the Liberal party in its best days, on this subject of the constitution. Why should there not be consultation with the provinces? Would it not be the simplest thing in the world to enlarge the scope of the proposed dominion-provincial conference to include matters so obviously proper to be discussed there as those before the house today? Our provincial premiers, doing their duty, in reply to the invitation of the Prime Minister to attend the conference at the end of the present session, a conference that will have half an agenda in relation to amendments of the constitution, have taken advantage of the opportunity to state quite clearly the positions of their provinces.

This afternoon the leader of my party read the very telling observations of the premier of Alberta in relation to the proposed procedure. The premier asked that before any action is taken of the kind that parliament is being asked to take today there should be consultation between the dominion and the provinces, and that the conference which is to take place at the conclusion of this session between the dominion and the provinces ought to be enlarged to include this matter with others to be submitted to that conference. That is a very simple request by the premier of the province of Alberta, and he is not alone in making that request.

The premier of the province of Quebec has written two letters on the subject and I quote short passages from them. On October 5 he said, in concluding a letter to the Prime Minister:

> Once more I draw your attention to the fact that the Canadian constitution did not result from hasty decisions, nor was it the realization of a single political party or of a single government. We renew our request, Mr. Prime Minister, that you agree to postpone all legislation concerning the federative pact and call together initially the interested parties to study together in a spirit of co-operation the vital problems involved in an amendment to the British North America Act.

Surely that is a reasonable request, but it is one that the government is in too great haste to consider. Again the premier of the province of Quebec said this in a letter to the Prime Minister on September 21:

> In our opinion the Canadian constitution is a pact which cannot be amended in a unilateral fashion. We believe that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure, and it is appropriate that the provinces should be consulted beforehand rather than be left in the presence of an accomplished fact. We therefore ask, Mr. Prime Minister, that you delay all legislation relating to the federated pact and call together, in the first place, the interested parties—

Again he makes the same request that the provinces be called together so that they may work out this subject of amendment with the dominion in a spirit of co-operation.

The present premier of the province of Quebec is not the first premier of that province who has taken the same position as to the nature of confederation and the necessity of consulting the provinces before undertaking amendments. Mercier took it. Mr. Godbout, when he was premier of the province of Quebec, on June 22, 1943, wrote to the then prime minister of Canada. His letter concerns an amendment, proposed at that time, to the British North America Act for the purpose of postponing the decennial redistribution of seats in the house. This letter was quoted by Mr. Cardin in the same speech to which I have referred. It reads:

> Dear Mr. King:
> I regret to hear that you consider delaying the readjustment of representation in the House of Commons according to the 1941 census. This decennial readjustment is an essential part of the compact between the provinces out of which arose the Canadian confederation, and therefore the British North America Act cannot properly be amended, in this respect, without the assent of the provinces.

Could anything be plainer? Will hon. members from the province of Quebec choose to follow the view expounded by Mr. Godbout in 1943 or the contrary view expounded by the Prime Minister in this house today?

Then I turn to the letter of the premier of Ontario of October 7 in which he says:

> I am frankly in some doubt as to the advisability of dealing with the matter piecemeal—

That is the matter of the procedure for amending the constitution.

> —without first attempting general agreement. Obviously, matters which are purely a federal concern will have to be delineated from time to time by the courts. My consideration of the matter leads me to believe that abolition of appeals to the privy council may affect this very important side of matters more than is generally realized.

Then the premier of the province of Manitoba says in his letter of October 6:

> The government of Manitoba feels that there might be differences of opinion as to whether a proposed amendment to the constitution related only to federal matters or affected provincial interests, rights, or jurisdiction. Before agreeing to any specific proposal, therefore, our government will examine carefully the manner in which the provincial position is to be protected.

It is only natural that one should turn also to the letter from the Liberal premier of the province of Nova Scotia. In his letter of September 27 to the Prime Minister he said this:

I observe that the Minister of Justice has introduced a bill for the abolition of appeals to the privy council. It seems to me that the abolition of appeals to the privy council might well form the subject of study by such a general conference as is envisaged in your letter. I beg to suggest, therefore, that final consideration of the bill now before the House of Commons be deferred until the conference suggested in your letter will be held. There is, I believe, considerable support for the view that the abolition of appeals to the privy council is in effect an amendment of the constitution and that, therefore, it is a question which should be the subject of discussion at the dominion-provincial conference which you suggest.

There you have the very reasonable and sensible point of view put forward by the premier of the province of Nova Scotia that when a question involves an amendment of the constitution the provinces ought to be consulted. Again the Liberal members of the house will have the opportunity of choosing between the point of view of the Liberal premier of Nova Scotia and the view expounded in this house today by the Prime Minister.

Before I leave this subject of the pact and the desirability, indeed the necessity, of consulting the provinces if we are to have due regard for the essence of confederation, let me make this final observation. We are a parliament. We are not sitting as a court construing the terms of the British North America Act, an imperial statute. The courts cannot look behind the terms of the statute. They cannot look back at the Quebec resolutions; they cannot look back at the language used by those who introduced in the British houses of parliament the bill which in due course became the British North America Act. The courts are not permitted to go back of the language of the legislation they are engaged in construing. But we are not a court; we are a parliament. We are here making laws; and I say to this House of Commons that we have neither the legal nor the constitutional nor the moral right to shut our eyes to what preceded and led up to confederation. Yet in effect that is what we are being asked to do today.

We speak of precedent. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has given us a review of previous amendments, and he has claimed the benefit of precedent for the course the government is pursuing here. Among those he quoted I say there were some pretty bad precedents; but at best or at most—perhaps I should say at worst—he had precedent for a particular amendment. But this present resolution goes far beyond any amendment to the British North America Act hitherto obtained at the request of parliament. This is infinitely more far-reaching. This is something that goes to the basis of the amending procedure; and there is no precedent for this. In my submission a far better precedent would be the report of a committee of this house which studied this question in 1935 and made its report and recommendations in these terms, which appear at page 143 of its proceedings:

The committee recognizes the urgent necessity for prompt consideration of amendments to the British North America Act with reference to a redistribution of legislative power and to clarify the field of taxation.

It is further of opinion that the conference hereafter proposed should carefully consider the adoption of a recognized yet flexible method of amendment.

In view of the fact that the several provinces did not feel it advisable to give the committee the benefit of their views with respect to the method of procedure to be followed in amending the constitution, the committee is of the opinion that before any decision upon the subject matter of the resolution is finally made, the opinions of the provinces should be obtained otherwise, if at all possible, and for that reason recommends that a dominion-provincial conference be held as early as possible in the present year to study the subject matter of the resolution. The proposed conference should have ample time in which to study every phase of the question.

In view of the above recommendation the committee expressly refrains from recommending any form of procedure for amendment so as to leave the proposed conference entirely free in its study of the question, except that the committee is definitely of the opinion that minority rights agreed upon and granted under the provisions of the British North America Act should not be interfered with.

Within the realm which the Prime Minister says is quite clear, but which many of us do not find characterized by such clarity—that is, the federal sphere—we are being asked to put our constitution on the same basis as an ordinary statute of this house, capable of amendment in the same way as any other piece of legislation ever adopted by this parliament. Every federal constitution that I know anything about has drawn a clear line of distinction between ordinary legislative processes in the particular legislature that has been created, and methods of changing the constitution. The constitution is fundamental; it is the organic document from which legislatures—and I am speaking of federal constitutions in general—derive their existence. This proposal and the proposed amendment to the B.N.A. Act, if it were enacted at Westminster, would put our constitution, in matters which the Prime Minister says come under federal jurisdiction, in exactly the same position as any other statute of parliament. In other words, in relation to what the Prime Minister says are federal matters, the British North America Act could be changed here in precisely the same way as any other law of parliament.

I do not think that is the way to approach amendments to the constitution. A clear line of distinction should be drawn between ordinary legislation and changes in the constitution because, as I have said, the constitution is fundamental, and is the organic document from which this parliament derives its existence.

My time is passing, but I wish to make one more comment before I conclude. In most federal constitutions, certainly in the case of the United States, the senate was designed to be representative of the states. It was designed to be the protector of states' rights. It may be that our Senate is not the complete counterpart of the United States senate in that respect; nevertheless, in some respects our Senate was intended to be the protector of the rights of the provinces. But with all respect to the other house I say that as it comes closer and closer to being a one-party chamber, then by its very composition it is going to be more and more precluded from discharging that duty of protecting the rights of the provinces.

The resolution seeks to make an interesting exception of language and school rights, the reason for which I think you will find in the doctrine propounded by the Prime Minister in this house on June 18, 1946. That is a doctrine which has done much mischief; namely, that the rights of minorities in respect of language could be abrogated by amendment without consulting the provinces. An exception is to be made here; but let every hon. member of this house realize the position in which minority rights under section 133 of the British North America Act are left by this resolution. To hear the Prime Minister speak one would think that somehow these rights are being given additional guarantees. They are not. Parliament is creating one more precedent, a more far-reaching precedent than has ever been created in times past for automatically obtaining at Westminster amendments to the British North America Act simply on the request of both houses of parliament, by an address adopted by a majority of perhaps only one in each house. Remember that the parliament at Westminster is not divesting itself of the right to make further amendments to the constitution. It could not, because it is an imperial statute. The rights of minorities continue to have all the validity they now have under section 133 of the act—no more, no less—but if parliament passes this resolution parliament will have created another precedent for obtaining amendments to the British North America Act, including section 133, without consultation with the provinces. The rights of minorities under section 133 after this resolution is adopted, if it should be adopted, will not stand any higher, under the doctrine expounded by the Prime Minister, than the forbearance of a majority of one in each house.

That is no position in which to leave minority rights in this country. Those rights are sacred and fundamental. There would have been no confederation had those guarantees under section 133 not been given, and I say it is the duty of this house to seek a comprehensive method of amendment of the constitution which will embrace all features of the act, so there may be within Canada complete autonomy and complete power of amendment, and which will really preserve and safeguard the rights of minorities and will not leave them at the mercy of a majority of one in this house and in the Senate.

Mr. Speaker: This afternoon there was mention made of the fact that the amendment might not be in order. During the dinner recess, I read the amendment carefully and I have some doubt as to whether or not it is in order. It occurred to me that some hon. members might like to express their views with regard to whether or not the amendment is within the rules. If so, I would be glad to hear them now.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of expressing some views on the question of whether or not the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition is in order. Since no attack has as yet been made on the point of order, one is compelled to deal with it by anticipating what might be said. In this connection, I think it is fair to point out that, although the matter was referred to in passing by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), it did not appear that the hon. gentleman was entirely satisfied the amendment was out of order. As I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, he advanced no grounds for its being out of order and did not take the position that it was, in fact, out of order.

It seems to me there might be three grounds only upon which the amendment could be declared to be not within the rules. The first one would be that it is not relevant to the main motion. In this connection, may I refer Your Honour to Beauchesne, third edition, page 136, where citation 338 reads as follows:

> The object of an amendment may be to effect such an alteration in a question as will obtain the support of those who, without such alteration, must either vote against it or abstain from voting thereon, or to present to the house an alternative proposition either wholly or partially opposed to the original question. This may be effected by moving to omit all the words of the question after the first word, "That", and to substitute in their place other words of a different import. In that case the debate that follows is not restricted to the amendment, but includes the motives of the amendment and of the motion, both matters being under the consideration of the house as alternative propositions.

At this point, perhaps I should direct Your Honour's attention to the fact that this amendment does do exactly what is contemplated in that citation from Beauchesne, namely, to suggest an alternative proposition wholly or partially opposed to the original question. It does so by moving to strike out all the words after the first word "that" and to substitute other words.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, one is always conscious of the difficulty of complying with the various rules of the house in moving an amendment, particularly to a resolution. In speaking in support of the proposition that this amendment is in order, and in asking Your Honour to rule accordingly, I can say with absolute certainty that a most scrupulous attempt has been made to see that the amendment does, in fact, comply with the rules because it is our desire to have a discussion on the merits of the situation.

The citation which I have read from Beauchesne is a citation based on May, the great British authority, and it is supported by the ruling of a Canadian Speaker referred to by Beauchesne at page 595. This question of relevancy had been raised and Mr. Speaker Lemieux, on June 6, 1923, quoted and applied that ruling in May. Dealing further with the question of relevancy, there seems to be a certain amount of contradiction between the various citations. It is for that reason that I say a most scrupulous effort has been made to draft an amendment which will be in order.

It seemed to us that the amendment had to do two things. First, it had to deal, in part at any rate, with the subject matter of the main motion. Second, it had to deal with or suggest a new or further proposition which, in effect, adds something to or is different from the main motion. If Your Honour will look at page 137 of Beauchesne, you will see what he advances as the law on the relevance of amendments. It reads as follows:

The law on the relevancy of amendments is that if they are on the same subject-matter with the original motion, they are admissible,—

I would point out to Your Honour that this amendment is on the same subject matter as the main motion. The main motion deals with the question of enacting in Canada a means of amending our own constitution. The amendment deals with the same matter because it suggests that following the convening of a constitutional convention to devise a method of amending the constitution in Canada, then such method should be made the subject of an humble address. It can be seen, therefore, that the amendment deals with the same matter as that which is before the house in the main motion, but it suggests an alternative and entirely different procedure from that which is outlined in the motion. I submit, therefore, it is in order on these two grounds, which it is admittedly difficult to reconcile, that it may suggest a difference in principle and yet must be relevant to the subject matter of the main motion.

Further, if Your Honour will look at the various rulings of Canadian Speakers cited in Beauchesne where amendments have been ruled out of order on the ground that they are not relevant, I believe it will be seen that in every case in which the amendment was ruled out of order it did nothing more than deal with an entirely different subject. For instance, on page 580 of Beauchesne's third edition, there is a reference to a speaker's ruling in which an amendment was ruled out of order on the ground that it was not relevant. The operative part of the ruling is as follows:

The motion before the house deals with one specific question, the scale of payments to be made by Canada to the various provinces. The amendment proposes to deal with the representation of several provinces. It seems to me that is an entirely different question, and it is not relevant.

As I have pointed out, our amendment does deal with the subject matter of amending the constitution. It does not deal with an entirely different proposition and, therefore, I submit it does not fall within the scope of those previous rulings in which amendments have been ruled out of order on the ground that they were not relevant.

We come then to the second possible ground of objection, that it introduces new matter. I think, Mr. Speaker, that is dealt with in the citation to which I have already referred and which is to the effect that a member may move an amendment asserting a different proposition or advancing a different principle. It seems to me it would be quite impossible to comply with the strict interpretation of the rules when it is said the amendment must not introduce new matter and, at the same time, you are faced with a citation that an amendment may assert a different proposition. I am not one to suggest that the rules of the house should be disregarded or that they are merely an inconvenience to be overridden. I say the rules are for the purpose of regulating and guiding discussion. Nevertheless, I do suggest that there is such an apparent conflict between the two citations that Your Honour should exercise some discretion in interpreting the amendment. This amendment does, in fact, assert a different principle to be followed in achieving constitutional amendments; nevertheless, it does deal with the question of amending the constitution. I submit it is not out of order on the straight ground that it introduces new matter.

The third ground upon which objection might be raised is that it involves an expenditure of money. That is the old stand-by to which we always look when trying to have amendments ruled out of order.

In this connection I refer Your Honour to the fact that it does not directly involve the expenditure of money. If adopted, it constitutes a request to His Excellency the Governor in Council that a certain course be followed. It does not say that a constitutional convention must be or should be convened the day after tomorrow. It asks that His Excellency the Governor in Council be requested to convene a constitutional convention. So far as it can be made to do so, it merely asserts the principle that this is a proper way to go about solving this problem.

I am not going to take the time of the house or of Your Honour to deal with all the various conflicting rules on what is a money bill and what is not. I think it is sufficient if I remind you that the actual interpretation of what is a money bill is a strict interpretation and that if one applies that interpretation with a reasonable attitude toward amendments which are introduced into the house, it will be seen that this amendment clearly does not fall within that rule.

May I finally refer to a number of previous similar amendments which have been found to be in order; or perhaps I should say that by inference they were found to be in order because they have not been ruled out of order. I refer to the amendment introduced in 1946, when the British North America Act was being amended to change the basis of distribution of seats in the house. On that occasion the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) moved an amendment to the resolution then being discussed. His amendment is to be found at page 2235 of Hansard of June 6 of that year. The hon. member moved an amendment in these words:

> That the motion be amended by deleting the words: "A humble address be presented to His Majesty the King in the following words:" and substituting therefor:—
> And whereas it is desirable that the government should consult with the several provinces in respect of the said matter.
> Now therefore be it resolved that the government be required to consult at once the several provinces and upon satisfactory conclusion of such consultations . . .

To proceed with the redistribution. That amendment was not ruled out of order, although it was defeated in the house on a vote on the merits of the amendment itself. Similarly, in the spring of this year, at the last session of the last parliament when the agreement with Newfoundland was being discussed, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) moved an amendment in much the same words. The amendment, to be found at page 501, was as follows:

> That the motion be amended by deleting the words:
> "A humble address be presented to His Majesty the King in the following words":—
> and substituting therefor:
> "And whereas it is desirable that the government of Canada should consult with the governments of the several provinces in respect to the said matter;
> Now therefore be it resolved, that the government of Canada be required to consult at once the governments of the several provinces and that upon a satisfactory conclusion of such consultations . . .

And so on. On two occasions therefore you have amendments in much the same form as this one, with this exception. The wording of those amendments required consultation at once so that they are even stronger directions for the holding of a dominion-provincial conference than is this one. Those amendments having been found to be in order, although they required the holding of a conference and therefore, by inference, if that rule applied, would require the expenditure of money, I submit that this amendment, which is not nearly so direct in its requirements but merely suggests that His Excellency be requested to convene a conference, is also clearly in order on the precedents established by those two earlier amendments.

There is one final point in connection with this rule regarding expenditure of money. I would refer Your Honour to the principle set out in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, in dealing with bills, not resolutions. At page 170, citation 444, you will find the following:

> Private members may introduce resolutions that do not directly involve the expenditure of public money and have no operative effect but simply express an abstract opinion on a matter which may necessitate a future grant.

Here we have an expression of opinion that the proper procedure would be for His Excellency to be requested to convene a dominion-provincial conference, an abstract expression of principle which might possibly at some future time require a grant. But according to the citation I have read, it is within the power of a private member to move such a resolution.

For these various reasons I submit that this amendment is in order. I am sorry to have been so lengthy in my explanation but I offer this excuse. As I said at the outset, it is difficult to draft amendments to resolutions such as this which will be within the rules. This amendment has been as carefully drafted as we could do it, in order to comply with all the somewhat conflicting citations to be found. That is my excuse for the length of time I have taken on this submission that the amendment is within the rules of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Does any other hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Speaker: I am now prepared to give a ruling. First of all, I wish to thank the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) for the care he has taken to explain why he thinks that the motion is in order. He has cleared up for me several points on which I had some doubt. There is, however, one point which he has not cleared up and that is whether or not the amendment amounts to a motion for which notice must be given. He did not satisfy me with regard to that. I am not stating that he entirely satisfied me with regard to the other doubts which I had in my mind, especially the question as to whether this motion would require the government to make an expenditure and was not merely setting forth an abstract principle. It will not be necessary, however, for me to make a ruling on that point.

I would point out to hon. members that citation 355 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, makes it clear that an amendment must not raise a question which can only be considered as a distinct motion after notice. The principal motion before the house asks that an address be presented to His Majesty the King praying for a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom in amendment of section 91 of the British North America Acts, 1867-1949. The amendment, on the other hand, envisages the convocation of a constitutional convention to devise a method of amending the constitution of Canada. In my view the amendment is so different, in substance and effect, from the main motion as to require its introduction as a distinct motion after notice. I would refer hon. members to Canadian Commons Journals, 1929, pages 109-111.

It is not necessary for me to consider the other points which the hon. member has mentioned. My view is that this motion is so different in substance and effect from the main motion as to require its introduction as a distinct motion after notice. I must accordingly rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I have listened carefully, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon and evening to the views expressed by the various hon. members on matters connected with this resolution. I must confess that the more I have listened, the graver the matter contained in the resolution appears to me to be. The statute contemplated by the resolution may have far-reaching effects. This being so, I cannot see the need for the unseemly haste in the passage of the legislation.

Why is it that this legislation must be hurried? Is Canada losing face among the nations of the world? Is Canada not regarded any more as a sovereign power? What is to be gained or what is to be lost by this hurry? I heard one hon. member say today that it was to make Canada sovereign in all respects. But surely Canada has been a sovereign power since 1931. I believe that since the passage of the Statute of Westminster we can regard Canada as being a sovereign power.

In fact, I need only refer hon. members to what I believe can be called an official government publication. This is the British North America Acts and Selected Statutes, published on January 1 of this year by the King's Printer. It states in a headnote that all this material has been brought together, collected and annotated by Dr. Maurice Ollivier, K.C., F.R.S.C., joint law clerk of the House of Commons. At page 25 it states:

> It may be stated that responsible government was established in 1848, just as it may be said that Canada became a sovereign country in 1931.

Surely we must be all agreed, and the government must agree—or its booklet would not be published in this fashion—that Canada is a sovereign power, and has been since 1931. What is the reason then? Do we want to be regarded as a sovereign power, when we already are one?

I listened carefully to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) today upon which occasion I believe he said that this resolution was an implementation of an election promise. I read the letter addressed to the premiers of the different provinces, as it appears at page 25 of Hansard, and this is what I read—and I would presume this is the promise made by the Prime Minister prior to the election:

> Before the recent election I stated on several occasions that it was the view of the government that a method should be worked out to amend our constitution in Canada, and that any such method should include the fullest safeguards of provincial rights and jurisdiction, and of the use of the two official languages and of those other rights which are the sacred trust of our national partnership.

Then he goes on in the same letter, the next paragraph, to say:

> I stated also that it was the intention of the government, after the election, to consult the provincial governments with a view to working out a method of amending the constitution in Canada, which would be satisfactory to all Canadians.

Unless I am completely astray in my reasoning in this matter—and I could very well be—it would appear to me that the only interpretation which could be placed upon that paragraph is that the Prime Minister prior to the election made an announcement that, if he came into power as head of the government, legislation would be introduced to this effect, and that the provinces would first be consulted before such legislation was introduced. No other interpretation could be placed upon that particular paragraph.

I submit to hon. members that they should read it and decide for themselves what conclusion they are forced to. There is no other way it can be read. I have been listening to various interpretations of acts and agreements in respect to confederation, and what they mean. The conclusion I came to was by reverting to what might be described as the Newfoundland agreement, passed in 1948. The heading of this agreement between Canada and Newfoundland, and dated December 11, 1948, is "Memorandum of agreement entered into on the 11th day of December, 1948, between Canada and Newfoundland." This is called a memorandum of agreement. In other words, there was an agreement between Newfoundland and Canada, and I assume there must be similar agreements between Canada and the other provinces.

The agreement with Newfoundland was implemented by statute. But it is an agreement between peoples; and if any part of that agreement is to be altered, then I submit both parties must first be consulted. As I see it, that is only fair and just. But again I may be wrong.

I would refer once more to this 1949 edition from the King's Printer, where it states at page 27:

> There has been a certain amount of discussion as to whether the B.N.A. Act was a pact or not. This discussion has taken place amongst writers on constitutional law and the subject has been perhaps more frequently mentioned in political speeches. Strictly speaking it is impossible to say that the B.N.A. Act is a pact since it is an act of the imperial parliament which is supreme. On the other hand this statute cannot, in this day and age, be amended without the consent of Canada and, furthermore, it is based upon an understanding which had taken place between the different colonies. We might recall here that these resolutions constituted a compromise, a sort of pact or understanding, and we might add that our constitution is a re-edition of this understanding with very few changes.

And this from a government publication of 1949! It would appear therefore that the compiler of this particular book did have in his mind the thought that confederation between each of the colonies, including the last one, the present province of Newfoundland, was a pact or an agreement. As such, any alteration of that agreement would have to be made by agreement between the parties.

I have gone over some of the legislation passed, not by this parliament but by preceding ones, and I find that on prior occasions the British North America Act has been amended without consultation with the provinces. But, may I ask, do two wrongs make a right? In 1940 when an amendment of a minor nature compared with the present one was required, namely the amendment necessary for the introduction of a bill to bring about unemployment insurance, why was consent first asked and obtained from each of the provinces before the bill was introduced? If that was done in 1940, why should not the provinces be consulted in connection with this important matter and their consent obtained? I should like to refer to the letter written by the premier of Newfoundland in reply to the letter by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) of September 14. In his letter dated October 4 Premier Smallwood acknowledges the letter from the Prime Minister and makes this rather significant comment:

> —you wrote me on September 14 with regard to finding a suitable new procedure for amending the British North America Act.

He goes on:

> I have brought the matter to the attention of the government of Newfoundland, and they share fully my view that we, for our part, agree with you and your government that a new procedure should be found. We will be happy to co-operate with you in the endeavour. We will be ready at any time after prorogation of parliament to meet with you at Ottawa.

I hold no brief for the premier of Newfoundland who heads the Liberal government, but it would appear from his letter that he was agreeing to the consideration of a new method whereby the British North America Act could be amended. If the premier of Newfoundland thinks in that way, as would appear from his letter, surely he should be informed of what the real situation is before this legislation is passed. He is only one premier. There may be others.

Speaking only as one member from Newfoundland I must protest at the indecent haste in which this legislation is being put through. I see no need for the hurry and rush. We have been here a month and bills of the greatest importance to Newfoundland have gone through. This is a most important measure and I see no reason why we cannot have a little less hurry.

I think of Canada as a two-wheeled cart, one wheel being the federal government and the other wheel being made up of the ten provinces. That cart will run along quite well as long as the two wheels are of the same circumference, but it is now proposed to alter one wheel without altering the other and I think that will make for a very lop-sided cart. The only way we can keep this Canada of ours on the level is to make alterations to both wheels at the same time. It seems so sensible to me that I cannot imagine any one quibbling about the idea.

I know there are other hon. members who wish to speak so I shall sum up briefly. There is no need for haste. The premiers are meeting in a short time, as I understand the Prime Minister has received the consent of all to meet. We do not want to make a botched job of this most important matter. In conclusion I can only repeat the words used by the Prime Minister in his letter to the premiers, that a method should be worked out of amending the constitution which would be satisfactory to all Canadians. That is what we want to work out, a method that will be satisfactory to all Canadians, and that is not going to be done by adopting the procedure contemplated by this resolution.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, this is a most difficult question. I have listened with interest and an open mind to all the speeches that have been made this afternoon and evening. I think every hon. member who spoke did his best to speak on a high plane, and the subject matter before the house certainly deserves that treatment. I appreciate what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said, that we should have no inferiority complex when thinking of other nations of the world. I think every one agrees with him. When the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) was speaking—we are all glad to see him back in the house, in his usual good form—he said that there is no suggestion that we must assert our sovereignty or declare that we are no longer under any limitation; that we have asserted that and have demonstrated that. We all believe it, said he.

I do not believe that Canada is a sovereign nation at the present time. A number of years ago Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that Canada was a nation in the commonwealth. That was a fine phrase, but it meant nothing. A nation may be a group of people having the same language or following the same customs, but Sir Wilfrid did not mean that Canada was a sovereign nation in the commonwealth. At that time the only sovereign nation was Great Britain; all the other nations of the commonwealth were subservient to Great Britain. I have great admiration for Sir Wilfrid. It would have meant differently if he had said that Canada was a sovereign nation in the commonwealth, but he could not say that and he was honest enough not to say something that was not true.

Let us see if we have become a sovereign nation. Some hon. members are under that impression, but I do not think we are for the very good reason referred to by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). The disallowance provisions that were put in the British North America Act still exist. In 1931 there was passed an act called the Statute of Westminster, although there are thousands of other statutes of Westminster. Section 7 of that statute reads:

> Nothing in this act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.

That means that nothing has been changed by that enactment to the provisions of our constitution providing for disallowance of Canadian legislation by the British parliament. All hon. members are familiar with the British North America Act, and therefore it is not necessary for me to read to them the provisions concerning the disallowance of Canadian enactments. They are easily found. They are sections 56 and 57, and also section 90, which is quite interesting with regard to the disallowance of provincial enactments.

That is not all; there is more to it. Some Englishmen who have discussed our constitution have come to the conclusion that Canada is the only country in the world that cannot amend her constitution. It is right and it is not right. The constitutions of the other dominions have been double-barrelled constitutions. On one hand the British government gave to the other dominions the power to amend their constitutions, and on the other hand reserved to itself the right to disallow that legislation. What progress could any dominion make in amending its constitution if all or any of the enactments passed by the legislature of that dominion could be disallowed by the British government? It makes no sense, and it seems so unbelievable that I shall have to give my authorities.

Let us look at the old dominion of New Zealand. The act concerning New Zealand was passed in 1852 and is 15-16 Victoria, chapter 72. Bills were sanctioned in the first place by so-called superintendents who were elected by the people who had the right to vote and elect members in New Zealand. The superintendents of each province were elected by persons duly qualified in each of the said provinces to elect members for the provincial councils.

Section 28 of that statute says that the superintendent must send copies of bills assented to by him to the governor. Listen to the words of section 29, which reads:

> It shall be lawful for the governor at any time within three months after such bill shall have been received by him to declare by proclamation his disallowance of such bill, and such disallowance shall make void and annul the same from and after the day of the date of such proclamation, or any subsequent day to be named therein.

Let us look at the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act. It was passed by the imperial parliament in the year 1900 and is 63-64 Victoria, chapter 12. I quote from section 128:

> This constitution shall not be altered except in the following manner—

It is pretty long but I will quote a whole paragraph to show what kind of right to amend the constitution has been given to the commonwealth of Australia by the imperial parliament. It reads:

> And if in a majority of the states a majority of the electors voting approve the proposed law, and if a majority of all the electors voting also approve the proposed law, it shall be presented to the governor general for the queen's assent.

Let us revert to section 58, royal assent to bills. It reads:

> When a proposed law passed by both houses of the parliament is presented to the governor general for the queen's assent, he shall declare, according to his discretion, but subject to this constitution, that he assents in the queen's name, or that he withholds assent, or that he reserves the law for the queen's pleasure.

It is the same legislation that we have in the British North America Act, and the above was probably copied from the British North America Act. I quote again from the second paragraph of section 58 as follows:

> The governor general may return to the house in which it originated any proposed law so presented to him, and may transmit therewith any amendments which he may recommend, and the houses may deal with the recommendation.

Let us now take section 59, which deals with disallowance by the queen. It reads:

> The queen may disallow any law within one year from the governor general's assent, and such disallowance on being made known by the governor general by speech or message to each of the houses of the parliament, or by proclamation, shall annul the law from the day when the disallowance is so made known.

The power the commonwealth of Australia has to amend its constitution does not amount to much.

Let us look at the South Africa Act, an imperial statute of 1909. It is 9 Edward VII, chapter 9, part X, amendment of act, section 152. It reads:

> Parliament may by law repeal or alter any of the provisions of this act: Provided that no provision thereof, for the operation of which a definite period of time is prescribed, shall during such period be repealed or altered: And provided further that no repeal or alteration of the provisions contained in this section, or in sections thirty-three and thirty-four (until the number of members of the House of Assembly has reached the limit therein prescribed, or until a period of ten years has elapsed after the establishment of the union, whichever is the longer period), or in sections thirty-five and one hundred and thirty-seven, shall be valid unless the bill embodying such repeal or alteration shall be passed by both houses of parliament sitting together, and at the third reading be agreed to by not less than two-thirds of the total number of members of both houses. A bill so passed at such joint sitting shall be taken to have been duly passed by both houses of parliament.

That would be all right, but now I refer to the disallowance provisions which are dealt with in section 65 of the same bill:

> The king may disallow any law within one year after it has been assented to by the governor general, and such disallowance, on being made known by the governor general by speech or message to each of the houses of parliament, or by proclamation, shall annul the law from the day when the disallowance is so made known.

How can South Africa claim the right to amend her own constitution when every piece of legislation passed by the parliament of that country is subject to disallowance by the imperial parliament, just as it is in the case of Australia?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If the hon. member will permit a question, how often were any laws passed by South Africa or Australia disallowed by the king?

Mr. Pouliot: If my hon. friend will permit me to proceed I shall answer his question to his satisfaction. I say it is impossible for any of those dominions to claim sovereignty as long as the disallowance provisions remain in their constitutions. The hon. gentleman who just asked a question may tell me that those provisions are spent, to use judicial language; that they are not used any longer. Let me ask him a question which he may answer when he speaks. If those provisions are considered deadwood by the British parliament how did it happen that, when the Statute of Westminster was passed in 1931, section 7 stated very clearly and beyond doubt that nothing was changed in the British North America Act, meaning that the disallowance provisions in our constitution still exist?

This afternoon we had an assertion of sovereignty by the leader of the opposition

(Mr. Drew). I congratulate him on his statement, though it was not accurate. It was what Mr. Mackenzie King would have called good will; but it is not accurate for the reasons I have mentioned. How can we Canadians say that we are a sovereign nation as long as all our enactments are subject to disallowance by the imperial parliament? That is something I cannot understand. If we want to discuss constitutional matters in the right way, let us be earnest, let us not exaggerate our importance, and let us take things as they are. I admit that Canada is a great country, but Canada cannot be at the same time a great and a small country. We have a great deal of work to do to see to it that we have a constitution that fits Canada, one that is fair to the dominion parliament as well as to the provincial legislatures. At the time the scheme of confederation was discussed in the legislature of Canada my grandfather voted against it, because he saw in it some kind of legislative union. I am all for having the rights of the provinces respected; but when we realize that the imperial parliament passes all the legislation requested by the Canadian parliament for the amendment of our constitution, my first impression is that to go to London for such an amendment is just red tape. I do not see that it is anything else. What kind of protection is there if the British parliament is ready to approve and rubber stamp all that is requested by the Canadian parliament? Let us give Canadians an opportunity to discuss and decide their own business.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Were not the statutes setting up constitutions for Australia, New Zealand and South Africa in the exact language that was asked for by the governing bodies in those colonies or dominions, whatever they were at that time? In other words, following up your second argument that the British parliament is a rubber stamp in these matters, is it not a fact that the constitutions they got were exactly what they asked for, with all these powers of disallowance which you have just mentioned?

Mr. Pouliot: I agree with what my hon. friend has just said; but all those people were colonial-minded, they walked on stilts, stepping high. They claim they are autonomous, but they are not. This is like the opening chorus of "Tannhauser".

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The hon. member is very clear.

Mr. Pouliot: I mentioned a piece of music to bring harmony between us. My hon. friend knows very well—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am not disagreeing with you. Don't pick on me.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. Pouliot: No, the hon. member knows I have great admiration for him. I mean it, and he deserves it from every one of his colleagues. Those people asked for a certain type of constitution. They got one. Was it what they asked for or was it something else? I am not in a position to say. All I know is what I find on the statute books. Nevertheless, there is a tremendous disparity between what they claim to be, what they boast of being, and what they really are. It is for this reason that I am ready to support my leader to the limit in his suggestion that we find a means of amending our own constitution without asking the imperial parliament to do it. I will do so with a still greater measure of satisfaction if it is the intention of the government to consult the provinces of Canada before passing any amendment to our constitution. I shall go so far as to ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to consult the provinces before making any changes in the constitution. If the Prime Minister will answer that question in due course, it will relieve the minds of most of the members.

I remember that last year, when the question of union with Newfoundland was before the house, the leader of the opposition was satisfied with consultation with the provinces. He did not insist on having consent. On that question I went even farther than he did. This discussion is friendly. No harsh words have been said. The members are interested in a satisfactory settlement of a question which has been the subject of many discussions in the past. There have been some so-called changes in the constitution, but they amount to very little. The Canadian people, in common with the Australians, New Zealanders and South Africans, have boasted of what they did not have. In past years we did not have autonomy because there was an inferiority complex with regard to everything that was not Canadian. We suffered from it.

Today, we are in a new era; an era of sincerity and truth. How many times have we been told that some progress was made constitutionally by the enactment of the Statute of Westminster which repealed the Colonial Laws Validity Act. It was a step, but the disallowance provisions remained on the statute books and could be used. When? No one knows when. There was a possibility that any future government of the United Kingdom could take advantage of those provisions and disallow enactments passed by this parliament. As I mentioned the other day, when His Majesty came to Canada on the eve of the last war and gave the royal assent to some bills under the roof of our Canadian Senate, all those bills could have been disallowed within two years by virtue of the provisions that have been left in our constitution. Is it not absurd? The British government would have had the right to disallow enactments sanctioned by our sovereign. It cannot work.

This afternoon mention was made of the fact that in 1871 the provinces were not consulted. This might have been due to the fact that, at that time, there was a dual representation and those who were sitting in Ottawa also sat in the provincial legislatures. It is a very good thing that the dual representation was abolished. I understand, sir, this government wants parliament to have the right to amend our constitution without changing anything in it for the time being. Then, a meeting of the representatives of the ten provinces of Canada would be held to discuss the whole matter. Who could have any objection to that? Amendment to the constitution, subject to consultation with the provinces, is something that has been done only twice since confederation, and once not all the provinces were consulted, as was stated this afternoon.

The government does not want to infringe on the rights of the provinces. It merely wants to establish the sovereignty of Canada. The leader of the opposition agrees with that position, as does the leader of the C.C.F. group; and I am sure my hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit party shares that view concerning the sovereignty of Canada. At any rate, from what he said this afternoon, I understood that to be so. We are all agreed on that point. Now, let us accomplish it in the best manner possible. Some constructive suggestions have been put forward by the members who have spoken. Some other members have expressed opinions without offering suggestions. Do you not think, sir, that the simplest way of amending our constitution is to make it our own and to abolish the disallowance provisions? Owing to the fact that the Colonial Laws Validity Act is a thing of the past, only the disallowance provisions remain. The various countries of the commonwealth have made progress, and I presume that the imperial parliament would not now dare to apply the disallowance provisions to a constitution made by Canada or by any other country of the commonwealth. It is an exceedingly delicate matter. We do not know about the future. We are here now to decide this most important matter and to discuss it, leaving aside all petty political considerations. We are here to do a good job in the interests of the Canadian people who elect us and who also elect the members of the legislatures. We must be fair to the Canadian people.

I believe in the separation of powers. I believe in the respective exclusive jurisdictions of Ottawa and of the provinces; but I believe that if we are to do something worthwhile as to the sovereignty of Canada, this is the time to do it. Before we go further by making amendments to the British North America Act the provinces should be consulted. I am sure that the representatives of the provinces will offer constructive suggestions so that the whole thing may be done in complete harmony without affecting the rights and privileges of minorities and of provinces.

I congratulate the government on taking up with the imperial parliament a matter of such great importance. I wish the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) good luck in his dealings with the imperial parliament and with the provinces. I am sure that the provinces will co-operate in adjusting matters so that the constitution will not be amended in the future as often as it has been amended in the past.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Coming as I do, Mr. Speaker, from a western riding and believing as I do in my leader, I think I would be remiss in my duty if I did not say a few words tonight. Coming from possibly one of the most cosmopolitan ridings in Canada, I think I can say that my constituents view with great interest this resolution which is before the house. While we have today heard some hon. members of the opposition express their views on this matter, nevertheless they are not the views of my leader or those of the Liberal government. In view of the fact that my leader, before coming to this house, was regarded as one of the best constitutional lawyers in Canada, I do not think we on the Liberal side have anything to fear with regard to this resolution. We have had a long speech from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew); we have also had quite a lesson from the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and also from the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins). But nevertheless, this is a repetition of "kitty bar the door" tactics, as you might say, used in connection with the bill that was brought in to bring Newfoundland into confederation last session.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Where do you belong in the club?

Mr. Sinnott: If you will follow Time magazine, you can go back and get a college education. If this measure were to be considered in the same way as was the bill to bring in Newfoundland, it would be a long time before we could put this amendment through and call Canada a sovereign nation. I am sorry to say that many Conservatives were born to look backwards; but Liberals were born to look forward. With these few words, I want to express to my leader the appreciation and gratitude of my constituents for this forward-looking legislation.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): As one who has given some years to the study of Canadian history, and as a teacher of Canadian history, I have been intensely interested in the discussions that have taken place here this afternoon and evening. I want to make it clear that I am not speaking as a lawyer but rather as one who has followed Canadian history and our constitution. We all seem to be agreed, Mr. Speaker, upon the need for a revision of our constitution. Every group in this house appears to be agreed on the theory that the constitution should be revised within Canada by the Canadian parliament and without appeal to any outside power. Our difference of opinion arises in the matter of how that revision should be done. As I understand the resolution which is before us, it proposes that, in those fields over which the federal parliament has jurisdiction by virtue of the British North America Act, this parliament should take unto itself the right to amend the constitution without any consultation with the provinces. Those who oppose the resolution appear to oppose it on two grounds, the first of which is that it is a piecemeal job. They appear to object to the constitution being amended by what they call a piecemeal procedure. In the second place, they say that it should not be done without first having consultation with the provinces. The point I should like to call to the attention of the house is one which has already been emphasized by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and by others, and it is this. While many quotations can be given from the speeches of our political leaders, quotations which appear to support the theory that no amendment should be made to our constitution without reference to the provinces, throughout the years the actual practice of those same political leaders has been to amend the constitution, where federal matters only were concerned, without that consultation.

The Prime Minister gave us a résumé of the various amendments which have been made to the constitution. I should like to quote from this booklet sent out by the King's Printer in 1949, British North America Acts and Selected Statutes. In this we find the comments of Dr. O. D. Skelton, the then under-secretary of state for external affairs, to the special committee of the House of Commons on the British North America Act in 1935. He comments on each amendment made to the British North America Act from 1871 to 1935.

Concerning the amendment of 1871, an act the object of which was to settle doubt as to the competence of the Canadian parliament to establish new provinces out of the western territories, and to give them constitutions and representation in the federal parliament, he says:

> The procedure was that the act was passed by the United Kingdom parliament at the request merely of the Canadian government. There was no consent of or consultation with the provinces in 1871.

Then he states concerning the amendment of 1875, the object of which was to settle doubts as to the power of parliament under section 18 of the British North America Act:

> The procedure again was that this act was passed by the United Kingdom parliament, merely at the request of the Canadian government. . . . a resolution demanding parliamentary rather than executive action was introduced but withdrawn.

Concerning the amendment of 1886, the object of which was to empower parliament to provide for representation of territories in the Senate and House of Commons, he said:

> The provinces were not consulted, and did not ask to be consulted, though if the British North America Act was a treaty, modification in the representation in parliament, changing the balance of sectional power, might have been contended to require the consent of the existing provinces.

Then in 1907, after twenty years, there came the fourth amendment. This one is of particular importance, its object being to provide an increase in and a definite settlement of federal subsidies to the provinces. On this amendment there was consultation. He states:

> The procedure in this case was that the act was passed by the United Kingdom parliament in accordance with an address from the Senate and House of Commons based on a series of resolutions passed by a provincial conference in 1887.

Concerning an amendment of 1915, to increase the number of senators and alter the main senatorial divisions, the provinces were not consulted, and only one—Prince Edward Island—made representations before the House of Commons committee. Its representations were not accepted.

In respect of the amendment of 1916, the object of which was to lengthen the term of the existing parliament for one year, he states:

> The procedure was on an address by both houses. The provinces were not consulted and, as far as I can recall, they were not referred to in the debate.

Concerning the amendment of 1930, which was to ratify an agreement by Canada with the four western provinces, there was consultation.

Respecting the amendment of 1940, to include unemployment insurance among the classes of subjects enumerated in section 91, again there was consultation.

In respect of the amendment of 1943, to provide for readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons of Canada, again there was no consultation.

Concerning the amendment of 1946 there was no consultation, although an amendment was made in the House of Commons and negatived by a vote of 108 to 42, the main motion being carried by a vote of 107 to 22.

My point is that notwithstanding all that has been said through the years by political leaders in this parliament, in actual practice from 1871 to 1946 it has been the custom of this parliament to make representations to the United Kingdom for amendments to the British North America Act in those matters concerning the federal parliament alone. Only in those instances where quite obviously the interests of the provinces were clearly implicated, as in 1907, 1930 and 1940, were the provinces consulted.

The question in my mind is why at this stage, after having followed that practice from 1871 to 1946, and after having acknowledged the right of the federal parliament to amend the British North America Act in matters affecting the federal parliament alone, we should accept the principle that the provinces must be consulted before parliament can amend the British North America Act in this respect.

I am sure hon. members will recall that in the past occasions have arisen concerning which amendments to the constitution were necessary, and under circumstances that would have rendered it exceedingly difficult to have secured either consultation with or the consent of the provinces. It is not unreasonable to suppose that in our future history many such occasions will arise again. I would hesitate to accept as a precedent at this time a procedure which would tie us to the practice of having to consult the provinces before even in an emergency any amendment could be made to the British North America Act on matters coming clearly within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. Hon. members who have spoken seem to imply that those who are elected to the provincial legislatures have a greater source of wisdom or are much more interested in their provinces than are those elected to the federal parliament. It would seem to me that hon. members elected to this parliament are as interested in the welfare of their own provinces as are members elected to the provincial legislatures.

I doubt if members elected to this house would take steps that would deprive the provinces from which they come of any rights any more than would a member elected to a provincial legislature.

It has been argued that this is a piecemeal job but I suggest that every amendment that has been made to the British North America Act since 1867 has been a piecemeal job. I fail to see how we could possibly amend the British North America Act for all time. Any action that we took, any procedure that we followed, or any amendment that this parliament might make to the British North America Act would of necessity be in the nature of a piecemeal job. In the light of this reasoning I shall support the main motion.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, when one looks around the chamber and sees the large attendance of Liberal members—

An hon. Member: And Conservatives.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Are there any Conservatives here?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): —he cannot help but realize the importance of this debate and how highly it is regarded by them. Newfoundland has been a member of this great confederation of provinces for only a short time. When we came here as members from that province we were ignorant of the procedure and customs prevailing in this great legislature. We were presented with large volumes of rules stating how the house should be conducted. We are now thrown into a constitutional disputation of the most fundamental character.

Hon. members will be interested to know that during the campaign for confederation in Newfoundland those who now constitute the Liberal party in that province advocated union with the great British country of Canada. Does it not seem strange to see how self-conscious two distinguished speakers on the other side of the house were this evening about being considered British? They indicated that the silken ties which still bind this country to the United Kingdom are still too tight around the necks of the Canadian people.

I do not think there is any doubt about the desirability of Canada having the power to amend its constitution. I do not suppose that that has been in dispute for at least thirty years and I doubt if anyone has stated publicly that Canada should not have that power. The question before the house, and it is an important one, is how that is going to be done. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr.

Pouliot) seemed to interpret the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) somewhat differently from what I would imagine he would interpret it himself. He said that when his leader got this power from parliament he would consult the provinces before introducing any amendment.

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That is what the hon. member for Temiscouata said and it is for him to deny it if he wishes.

Mr. Pouliot: Does the hon. member object to it?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I think before I have finished the hon. member will agree with me to a greater degree than he does at the present time. There is no question in this house or in this country as to where the sovereignty of this country now lies. The hon. member for Temiscouata put forth a number of theories tonight that were as unrelated as anything possibly could be to this matter.

He took the trouble of making considerable research into the constitutions of Australia, South Africa and other dominions, and he read pertinent sections from those constitutions showing how they were bound in certain matters. I interjected to ask the hon. member if he could give an example of the disallowance by the king or queen of any law passed by those countries, but he evaded my question and I do not think he remembered to answer it before he sat down.

An hon. Member: He skated around it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I have only one reason for speaking tonight. I am not as familiar as hon. members from the other provinces with the great constitutional questions that have been discussed here. I would not venture to offer an opinion on such a complicated matter if it were not for the fact that since 1933 or 1934 we have had to give some attention in Newfoundland to the development of constitutional procedure in the British commonwealth.

The hon. member for Temiscouata is too astute a student of constitutional history not to know that the power of disallowance as affecting Canada has not been exercised since 1873. He should not need to be told that. A law that has not been enforced in 76 years cannot be said to be impinging or reflecting upon the constitution or sovereignty of Canada. I doubt if he can state an occasion when the powers of disallowance were exercised by the royal sovereign in regard to Canada, South Africa or Australia.

Lord Balfour more than anyone else was responsible for the development of the theory of sovereignty, the equal status of the various dominions, and the Statute of Westminster. I have read all his speeches I could find on these subjects. He stated, I think in 1926, that as far back as 1914 he had given it as his opinion that the dominions had equal status in the commonwealth with the United Kingdom. There was no doubt at all about it after the Statute of Westminster. Surely hon. members do not need to be reminded of what is said in the preamble to the Statute of Westminster and how it acknowledges the sovereignty of the different dominions. In case some hon. members have not read it, perhaps I should quote it now. It reads:

> "Whereas the delegates to His Majesty's governments in the United Kingdom, the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland, at imperial conferences holden at Westminster in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and twenty-six and nineteen hundred and thirty did concur in making the declarations and resolutions set forth in the reports of the said conferences:
> And whereas it is meet and proper to set out by way of preamble to this act that, inasmuch as the crown is the symbol of the free association of the members of the British commonwealth of nations,—

The free association, Mr. Speaker.

> —and as they are united by a common allegiance to the crown, it would be in accord with the established constitutional position of all the members of the commonwealth in relation to one another that any alteration in the law touching the succession to the throne or the royal style and titles shall hereafter require the assent as well of the parliaments of all the dominions as of the parliament of the United Kingdom:
> And whereas it is in accord with the established constitutional position that no law hereafter made by the parliament of the United Kingdom shall extend to any of the said dominions as part of the law of that dominion otherwise than at the request and with the consent of that dominion:
> And whereas it is necessary for the ratifying, confirming and establishing of certain of the said declarations and resolutions of the said conferences that a law be made and enacted in due form by authority of the parliament of the United Kingdom:
> And whereas the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland have severally requested and consented to the submission of a measure to the parliament of the United Kingdom for making such provision with regard to the matters aforesaid as is hereafter in this act contained:
> Now, therefore, be it enacted . . . as follows:
> 1. In this act the expression "dominion" means any of the following dominions, that is to say, the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland.

The purpose of the Statute of Westminster was to acknowledge the equal status that had been decided in 1926 and which had, as Lord Balfour said, been recognized by the British government as far back as 1914.

Mr. Pouliot: May I ask a question?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Surely.

Mr. Pouliot: As an experienced lawyer, a member of the bar and the bench, will the hon. member tell the house since when the enforcing part of any enactment is in the preamble, as it is in the case of the Statute of Westminster?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am afraid I do not understand your question.

Mr. Pouliot: I am sorry that the judge does not.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am sorry; I am not quite sure what you mean.

Mr. Pouliot: I will ask it again.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): All right.

Mr. Pouliot: In any statute there is always a part called the enforcing part of the legislation. The hon. member knows that. All I ask him is since when the preamble, which is only explanatory and has no enforcing effect, is the enforcing part of any legislation.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If I understand the hon. member correctly, he says that the preamble is not the enforcing part of a statute. I think as a lawyer he will recognize that in the consideration of any statute the preamble has to be taken into consideration. In a court of law the British government could hardly raise the point that it did not mean what it said in the preamble.

Mr. Pouliot: It was not written by lawyers but by two Fabians, Beatrice and Sidney Webb.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If the hon. member will have a little patience with me, as I did with him, I think I will satisfy him that he has no need to worry about where the sovereignty of Canada lies. What has happened since 1931? Where is the dominion called the Irish Free State now? Is it a member of the British commonwealth of nations now? Where did it get the power to secede from the British commonwealth of nations. It is not as far away as Canada is. No Atlantic ocean lies between the Irish Free State and the United Kingdom. Did the government of the United Kingdom make any effort to stop the secession of the Irish Free States and the setting up of a republic? If this country in its wisdom should decide tomorrow to set up a republic of Canada would the government of the United Kingdom intervene? Did the government of the United Kingdom intervene in the case of Burma, in the case of India, in the case of Ceylon?

Surely these questions, Mr. Speaker, admit of only one answer, that the Statute of Westminster meant what it said, that the countries named in that statute were sovereign, independent and equal in status with the United Kingdom. There is no question about that, and I am surprised that the hon. member should feel so great an inferiority complex as to think that Canada does not possess a right equal to those countries which have seceded from the commonwealth.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in his very matter of fact statement this afternoon, took up at least half of the time of his speech in stating what everybody admits, that Canada should have full power to amend her constitution. He very fairly went on to point out that power was given to other countries like Australia and South Africa, but he said in Australia it did not seem to work very well. Why has it not worked very well? Because the constitution seemed to be rather rigid; the government seemed to be hedged around with impediments. On reflection will hon. members not agree that there was some deliberation on the part of those who prepared those constitutions? When you are dealing with a constitution you are dealing with something fundamental. You are building a solid foundation upon which the edifice of state is to be erected. Are you going to make some impermanent structure when you are laying the foundation? There is the analogy of this great temple in which we are tonight. How solidly it has been built. Should the constitution of Canada be built on a less solid foundation than the building in which we deliberate?

The governments of Canada and South Africa were hedged around with powers. It almost looks as if the laws that were passed were not to give power to make amendments but to prevent amendments. When you look at that great republic to the south of us, our great ally, the United States of America, the greatest country in the world bar none, what do we find? Can they amend their constitution overnight? Can they, by a simple majority in one house or in the other, amend their constitution from time to time? No, Mr. Speaker! In the 173 years or more since that great country became a republic how often have they amended their constitution? How difficult it is to amend the constitution of the United States is seen by the number of amendments, which is not more than twenty-one. Why? Because it is a most dangerous thing to give to any government so great a power, so vast a power over its subjects.

I honour the Prime Minister as much as his followers. He has, as I have said before, a great reputation for probity and integrity, but how long will we have a man like him as the head of the government? Who knows but that tomorrow some scapegrace from amongst the Liberal party may take over?

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Which one?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is it wise to place such power in a government which might change overnight, which indeed might change from day to day? There is no guarantee that the Liberal party will be in power next year or the year after, certainly not after four years. Think of the uncertainty that would prevail in this or any other country if the government were given power to change the constitution whenever it suited it to do so.

That is not only my view. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is aware that many learned men in this country have given great consideration to this problem, and they are divided in their answers to the question of how the constitution should be amended. No one knows better than the mover of this resolution how difficult this subject is, and how thorny it is even in his own province. The leader of the government down there disagrees with him as to the method by which amendments should be brought about. According to "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty" by Dr. Ollivier, published in 1945, a member of the present government, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), is quoted as having written in 1929:

> "It is apparent that the provinces would require some check on the federal power of free amendment. In providing this check, we shall endeavour to see that the constitution be made as flexible as possible; that the check, while provincial, should as far as possible emphasize the national rather than the provincial capacity of the people; and that the provinces and minorities be given the rights secured to them by the British North America Act and as intended by the fathers of confederation, no more and no less.
> Keeping in mind these considerations, it is suggested that power be given to the federal government to amend the British North America Act by federal act with the consent of the legislatures of five provinces or, alternately, at the option of the federal government, a favourable vote on a referendum of the majority of votes in the country and in at least five provinces. An amendment affecting the rights of a minority would require the consent of the province concerned or alternatively at the option of the federal government, a favourable vote of the electors in the province concerned. It will be realized that the number of possible arrangements is practically unlimited. Once the principle is agreed upon the method would be worked out by the federal and provincial governments."

What has caused the hon. gentleman to change his opinion? Is it a case of follow-my-leader, that everybody must have the same opinion? Have the twenty years that have elapsed since 1929 provided any substantial reason which would make the hon. member change the opinion he gave on that occasion? In addition, Dr. Skelton, who I believe was then under-secretary of state for external affairs, is quoted as opposing the present plan, together with no less a person than Dr. Beauchesne, who on the opening day of parliament was unanimously made an honorary officer of the House of Commons. He gave evidence, in 1935, before the committee on constitutional questions, suggesting the drafting of a new constitution by a constituent committee. This is what he said:

> The time has come, in my humble opinion, when the British North America Act, except as to minority rights, should be transformed and a new constitution more in conformity with present conditions should be adopted. Amendments here and there would be mere patchwork which could not last. The people of 1935 are different from those of 1867. What we want is a new constitution.

He was asked by what procedure it should be adopted, and replied:

> Drafting a constitution is a serious matter . . ."

He went on to suggest how it should be done, and how amendments should be made. I do not want to read too much on this point, except to indicate that here was a man acknowledged by all parties in this house to be an authority, who said this was a very serious matter and that we should have a new constitution. In support of that I would read from the speech from the throne, which said:

> You will also be asked to approve addresses praying the parliament of the United Kingdom to vest in the parliament of Canada the right to amend the constitution of Canada in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces nor affecting the constitutional rights and privileges of the provinces or existing rights and privileges with respect to education or the use of the English and French languages.

That is the resolution we are dealing with tonight. But the speech from the throne goes on:

> My ministers will seek to arrange for early consultation with the provincial governments with a view to agreeing upon an appropriate procedure for making within Canada such other amendments to the constitution as may from time to time be required.

Well, despite the reluctance of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) we will still have to present to His Majesty an address praying that we may have the constitution amended. I am sure my hon. friend does not want that situation to continue.

Early in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I said that we in Newfoundland had some experience with constitutional questions, and I advanced that as a reason for speaking this evening. As all hon. members know, that constitution was altered when we became a province of Canada on April 1. Here are some of the things that happened within a short time, I should say less than a month after April 1. The upper house was abolished. The number of portfolios was increased to twelve. Under commission government there had been only six portfolios: natural resources, justice and defence, home affairs and education, public works, finance and customs, public health and welfare. Now, though customs have been taken away and posts and telegraphs have been taken away, the number of departments has been increased to twelve. In the old legislature of Newfoundland, before 1934, the sessional indemnity was $600 a year. That has been jacked up to $2,500. Ministers used to receive $2,600. That has been increased to $7,000. Prior to 1934 the franchise in Newfoundland was exercised by men over twenty-one and women over twenty-five. Now women over twenty-one have a right to vote. The representation has been increased by one member and finally, to make Newfoundland conform with other provinces of Canada, the life of the legislature was extended by one year. All these things took place within a month. What might happen in this country if the parliament of Canada were given unlimited power to amend the constitution? Those are some of the things that could be done by a government possessing a majority in this house and in the other place. They could abolish the Senate, which I am sure we all agree would be a terrible calamity. That could be done overnight. The government could give jobs to all its supporters. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said, it could extend the life of parliament. Why not give everyone in this house life membership, as they have in the Senate? That could be done, and I am sure it would be a popular move. The only thing that would stop actions like these would be the common sense, not of the people of Canada but of those responsible for the government of this country. But we do not always have a good government.

In this country we have been fortunate in that, for many years, Canada has been blessed with good governments—Conservative and Liberal alike. Today Canada is highly respected amongst the nations of the world. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said that those who attended conferences abroad were sometimes shocked at being asked such questions as, "How do you amend your constitution?" "What kind of court of appeal have you?" "Where is the final court of appeal?" I do not think ordinarily intelligent men outside this country are much impressed by that sort of thing. They look at Canada's achievements. They look at the part we take in world affairs, the part we took in two wars, and all the things the Prime Minister advanced as reasons why Canada should have the power to amend its constitution. Canada has no reason to be self-conscious. Canada has no reason to have any inferiority complex. Our country stands high on the list of nations today. I do not think it will stand one bit higher if the procedure outlined by the Prime Minister or the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) were followed.

I have a further suggestion to make in support of what Dr. Beauchesne said with respect to how the constitution of Canada ought to be amended. If the hon. members of this house are really serious, Mr. Speaker, about the sovereignty question that they have raised, how should the amendment of our constitution be accomplished? There should be a dominion-provincial conference. The whole question should be discussed from beginning to end, a new constitution drafted and the British North America Act repealed.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, a good deal has already been said about this subject today, but there are certain aspects of what is being done which I do not think have been clearly brought to the attention of the house and the country. I refer not so much to the immediate consequences of the passing of this resolution, if we were to pass it, as to the long-range view of what the situation will be if the principle of this resolution were adopted. If that principle is adopted, a well-conceived, deliberately executed plan to alter not only the method of amending the constitution but the very nature of the constitution itself will be brought to consummation. It is that position which I think it is important for the house and the country to realize before taking this next step which we are being asked to take in the resolution being discussed tonight.

I notice that the Prime Minister regards himself as so fully acquainted with what is being done that he apparently feels the matter does not warrant his presence in the house. It is nearly eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, so the debate will continue tomorrow and the Prime Minister will have an opportunity of saying then whether or not the consequences which I am going to suggest will flow from this resolution, and which are not the consequences he has so far indicated will be the result of the resolution, will in fact be the result of the adoption of it. He will have the opportunity of saying whether or not the situation will make for those difficulties and conflicts in Canada in the future, to which the right hon. gentleman has deliberately and conveniently avoided referring in the explanation which he gave this afternoon.

By a process which we have seen developing over the past two or three years, by steps which I shall outline in the course of my remarks, we see a development taking place which, if the principle of this resolution is adopted, will result in the control of the constitution being delivered into the hands of this federal parliament. Apart altogether from any question of whether the constitution is a compact, a treaty or a statute, apart altogether from the rights or wrongs of that discussion, in the past the greater volume of opinion has held that the constitution embodies an arrangement arrived at in good faith between the parties to confederation, and that this arrangement was not to be changed unilaterally, nor to be changed in important respects without proper consultation and a measure of agreement arrived at in good faith between those parties or their successors.

I do not take the view that the constitution should never be changed; nor do I take the view that consent is necessary for every particular change that it may be desired to make. I certainly subscribe to the view that the constitution should be a living, growing thing. I would not go so far as to say, however, that it should be made easy to change it. The hon. member who last spoke pointed out that the constitution is a broad base upon which the state is erected. If the state, and the rights of the people who make up that state, are to have any secure foundation, then the constitution itself must rest upon a secure foundation. This whole concept of the constitution is very different from that approach which says—and this is the position taken by the right hon. gentleman and it is a position which is the consummation of each of those steps of which this resolution is the final one—that the constitution can be changed by a majority vote of the Canadian parliament. That position makes the constitution a creature of the Canadian parliament, which certainly could never be said to have been the intention of the fathers of confederation when the constitution was designed; it has never been the intention or the position of any political constitutional authority in Canada. By that I mean any person having to exercise the responsibility of government.

So far as my study goes, I believe I may say it was never the position of any government until that principle was enunciated by the right hon. Prime Minister in 1946 when he was minister of justice. I believe it is important for us to trace the course which is now being followed as it has developed step by step over the past few years. I start with the statement made by the Prime Minister in 1946 when he was minister of justice to the effect that section 133 of the British North America Act could be amended by a simple majority vote of this parliament. I have to say that the right hon. gentleman is entitled to all respect for the consistency with which he has maintained that position. There is no doubt that is his view. He stated it in this house and he repeated it in his comments earlier this session. The fact that it is his view, and has been his view consistently, does not necessarily make it right. It certainly does not alter the fact that it is a view diametrically opposed to the views of those who thought that, whether the constitution be a compact, treaty or statute, there were certain inalienable, fundamental features of that constitution which could not be changed by a unilateral act of one partner to the confederation. That was, therefore, the first departure from previously accepted principles.

Then we go on to the next step, which is to be found in the statement made when the redistribution act was passed in 1946 when a position was taken to the effect that the dominion parliament has the right to say which matters are matters affecting the provinces and which are matters affecting only the dominion. Surely, Mr. Speaker, anyone taking a reasonable view of the position of our provinces would be entitled to assume that a matter of great concern to them is their representation in this House of Commons. Can anything much more directly affect the provinces?

Let us look at what is an obvious example. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is in his seat tonight. Would he not think that it was a matter affecting the rights of his province of Manitoba if it were to be said that his province's representation should be cut from its present number down to ten, without any justification on the basis of its population? Would he not think that a matter affecting the rights of his province? Would not every province placed in that position think so? But that is the logical conclusion from the position taken by the present government when the redistribution act was being passed, when it was said that in the matter of representation in the House of Commons the number of members from each province is a matter for the federal parliament alone and is in no sense a matter for provincial concern; and that therefore changes in the basis of representation, amendments to the British North America Act governing the very system of representation, can be made in spite of the previously accepted position, and were in fact made initially, by the simple action of a majority in the Canadian parliament.

If that is the position, namely, that change in its representation in this house is not a matter for provincial concern or one on which a province is entitled to be consulted, what more vital matter could be found? If there is no room for consultation on the matter of representation, nor any room for provincial rights in that matter, it does not take much of an extension of that principle before we arrive at the position that the federal parliament has the right to say what changes will be made with respect to any matter, simply because it says that the provinces are not concerned, that provincial rights are not involved and that it is a matter of concern only to the federal parliament.

Then we come to the departure from the provisions of the British North America Act in the matter of the admission of Newfoundland into confederation. I am not going to revive that debate, except to say this. The one and only point at issue at that time was that Newfoundland was brought into confederation by a method which constituted a complete and radical departure from the method laid down in the British North America Act; and that departure again, in a matter affecting a future province of Canada, was effected by unilateral procedure without any form of consultation with the provinces. Perhaps no one of these things, taken by itself, would seem to be a cause for great alarm; but it is the constant accumulation of steps, the unfolding of the process step by step towards the assumption of control and ownership by this parliament of our constitution, a process which we see resulting in the position being established that the constitution is the exclusive property of the Canadian parliament, which gives concern to those who see these steps being taken.

Then the next step was the position taken that the abolition of appeals to the privy council was a matter of exclusive concern to the federal parliament or a matter on which the federal parliament alone had the right to act, without consultation with the provinces, although the provinces under the British North America Act had the right to appeal to the privy council. It is a fact that by that single unilateral act of this House of Commons the provinces have been deprived of a right which was formerly theirs, namely, the right of appeal to the privy council.

Mr. Blackmore: One of their most precious rights.

Mr. Fulton: As the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has just said, many of the provinces regarded it as one of their most precious rights. A highly disturbing feature of this process to those who see it unfolding is that it is largely true to say that, as these steps have succeeded each other with ever-increasing rapidity, in each case it has been a little easier to take that step, and that it has aroused a little less interest and a little less controversy in the house and throughout the country.

On motion of Mr. Fulton the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue this debate. If it is concluded, we will take up second reading of Bill No. 12, to establish the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation and then second reading of Bill No. 62, respecting forest conservation. If those matters are disposed of we will move to go into supply, call one new department, and proceed with the estimates of the departments of Agriculture and Veterans Affairs.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—PROCEDURE IN AMENDMENTS

TEXT OF LETTER ADDRESSED BY THE PRIME MINISTER TO THE PREMIERS OF ALL THE PROVINCES

Office of the Prime Minister

Ottawa, September 14, 1949.

My dear Premier:

For some time the government has been giving consideration to devising a satisfactory means of removing the necessity, on every occasion on which an amendment to the British North America Act is required, of going through the form of having the amendment made by the parliament of the United Kingdom. It does not accord with the status of Canada as a fully autonomous nation that we should be obliged to have recourse to the parliament of another country, however close our association with that country, to determine our own affairs. Moreover, it has been made increasingly clear to the government that the parliament of the United Kingdom has no desire to perpetuate the existing anomalous situation any longer than is absolutely necessary.

Before the recent election I stated on several occasions that it was the view of the government that a method should be worked out to amend our constitution in Canada, and that any such method should include the fullest safeguards of provincial rights and jurisdiction, and of the use of the two official languages and of those other rights which are the sacred trust of our national partnership.

I stated also that it was the intention of the government, after the election, to consult the provincial governments with a view to working out a method of amending the constitution in Canada, which would be satisfactory to all Canadians.

My colleagues and I recognize that the working out of a satisfactory method of making all kinds of amendments will not be easy, and the government has accordingly decided to submit to our parliament, at the forthcoming session, an address requesting an amendment of the British North America Act by the United Kingdom parliament which would vest in the parliament of Canada the authority to amend the constitution of Canada but only in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces, nor affecting the rights and privileges of the provinces, or existing constitutional rights and privileges with respect to education and to the use of the English and French languages.

Such an amendment would give the Canadian parliament the same jurisdiction over the purely federal aspects of our constitution that the provincial legislatures already possess over the provincial constitutions, while giving both to provincial rights and jurisdiction and to the historic rights of minorities an express assurance of legal protection which we feel they should have.

We recognize that amendments may be required from time to time in the national interest of those provisions of the constitution which concern both federal and provincial authorities, and that it would be desirable to devise a generally satisfactory method of making such amendments in Canada whenever they may be required.

The federal government would appreciate the opportunity of consulting with the governments of all the provinces on this matter in the manner most convenient to the provincial governments, at an early date after the conclusion of the forthcoming session of parliament. If the provincial governments should desire, meanwhile, to have a preparatory conference of constitutional experts, we would be ready to have federal officials participate.

Our aim is to reach agreement, as soon as possible, on a method of amendment which will relieve the United Kingdom parliament of an embarrassing obligation, and establish within Canada full and final responsibility for all our national affairs.

To this end we are inviting the co-operation of your government and the governments of all the other provinces of Canada.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

Dear Mr. St. Laurent,

I hope you will overlook the delay which has occurred since you wrote me on September 14, with regard to finding a suitable new procedure for amending the British North America Act.

I was in Ottawa when you wrote, and your letter was here when I got back. I have brought the matter to the attention of the government of Newfoundland, and they share fully my view that we, for our part, agree with you and your government that a new procedure should be found. We will be happy to co-operate with you in the endeavour. We will be ready at any time after prorogation of parliament to meet with you at Ottawa.

Awaiting your further advice, and with all good wishes,

Very sincerely yours,

My dear Prime Minister,

Let me acknowledge, and thank you for, your letter of September 14 in which you deal with the question of devising a method of amending the British North America Act in Canada.

I note that the federal government would be appreciative of an opportunity of consulting with the governments of all the provinces on this matter at some convenient date after the conclusion of the current session of parliament. The government of Nova Scotia will be glad to have a representative or representatives at any conference to be called for consideration of this important matter. I doubt that a preparatory conference of constitutional experts should be held before a general conference between representatives of the dominion and the provinces.

I observe that the Minister of Justice has introduced a bill for the abolition of appeals to the privy council. It seems to me that the abolition of appeals to the privy council might well form the subject of study by such a general conference as is envisaged in your letter. I beg to suggest, therefore, that final consideration of the bill now before the House of Commons be deferred until the conference suggested in your letter will be held. There is, I believe, considerable support for the view that the abolition of appeals to the privy council is in effect an amendment of the constitution and that, therefore, it is a question which should be the subject of discussion at the dominion-provincial conference which you suggest.

Yours sincerely,
Angus L. Macdonald

Honourable Angus L. Macdonald, P.C., M.L.A., Premier of Nova Scotia,
Halifax, N.S.

My dear Premier:

I wish to acknowledge your letter of September 27, regarding the proposed consultation with the provincial governments with regard to the procedure for amending the constitution.

I thank you for the assurance of the readiness of the government of Nova Scotia to participate in a conference for this purpose, and I shall advise you in due course of our proposals in that connection. I have duly noted your observations regarding a preparatory conference of experts and will place them before my colleagues when I have been advised of the attitude of all the provincial governments.

I have discussed with my colleagues the suggestion contained in your letter that final consideration of the bill to abolish appeals to the privy council be deferred until after the proposed conference between the federal and provincial governments. We feel, however, that, since the judgment of the privy council indicated clearly and unequivocally that the federal parliament possesses exclusive jurisdiction to legislate respecting a final court of appeal for Canada, it would not be an appropriate subject for consultation with the provincial governments, but that parliament should, without further delay, discharge the responsibility placed upon it by the constitution.

Yours sincerely,
Louis S. St. Laurent

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I am this day in receipt of your letter of September fourteenth which has reference to a method of procedure for amending the constitution without resort to the parliament of the United Kingdom.

While I have had no opportunity to discuss the matter with them I am sure that my colleagues would concur with me in a willingness to attend a conference between the dominion and the provinces to discuss this important matter.

M. L. Duplessis

Office of the Prime Minister
Province of Quebec

Quebec, 21 September 1949

Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

Mr. Prime Minister:

The members of the executive council of the province have today considered the letter which contains the very important constitutional changes that you mention. This was the first cabinet meeting since your letter was delivered to my office last Friday.

It is, I believe, not necessary to reiterate that the present government of Quebec is in favour of Canadian autonomy, but that it also firmly respects the autonomy of the provinces, particularly that of Quebec.

Provincial authorities in Quebec are always ready to participate in a Canadian intergovernmental conference seeking to study beforehand and apply subsequently the most appropriate and most just methods to give effect to the rights, prerogatives and liberties of the central authority, as well as the provincial authorities.

You write that your colleagues and yourself recognize that it will not be easy to find a satisfactory and general method of amending the constitution.

Evidently the many problems with which we would be confronted in amending our constitution require study and an appropriate delay, and also the co-operation of all the interested parties, that is to say, the governments of the provinces and of the country.

The Canadian constitution is not the work of an hour, nor is it the realization of hasty decision nor the realization of a single political party or single government. It seems to me that each and every one of us can profit by the example given to us by the fathers of confederation, who let the project ripen, and obtained, before deciding anything, the opinion and approbation of the administrations as well as of the statesmen of the time belonging to different parties, different races and different religions.

The government of Quebec, in accord with the highest constitutional and political authorities, without distinction as to race or party, is of the opinion that the British North America Act is a pact concluded between the four pioneer provinces, Lower and Upper Canada (Quebec and Ontario), New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia.

We share also the opinion expressed by the Hon. Honore Mercier, former premier of the province of Quebec, who declared, as did many other Canadian statesmen: "The existence of the provinces preceded that of the dominion; it is from them that it received its powers. They are sovereign within the limits of their attributions, and any interference with this sovereignty is a violation of the federal pact."

From this it follows that it is necessary that amendments which are to be proposed to the Canadian constitution should be submitted initially for the consideration and approbation of the provinces which gave birth to the central authority.

You declare in your letter that your government has decided to submit to the federal parliament at the present session an address praying the parliament of the United Kingdom to confer upon the parliament of Canada the right to amend the constitution of Canada, but only in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces, nor affecting the constitutional rights and privileges of the provinces, nor the existing rights and privileges in the matter of education or relating to the use of the French and English languages.

Do you not think that it would be arbitrary on the part of the federal government to decide ex parte and of its own authority which are federal rights and which are the rights of the provinces? It seems clear to us that it does not belong to one of the parties to a multilateral contract to declare itself the supreme arbitrator in the interpretation of this contract and to assume of its sole authority rights which profoundly concern the other contracting parties.

Do you not think that such an attitude would be incompatible with Canadian unity, well understood, detrimental to desirable Canadian co-operation and contrary to the true interests of the country?

In our opinion the Canadian constitution is a pact which cannot be amended in a unilateral fashion. We believe that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure, and it is appropriate that the provinces should be consulted beforehand rather than be left in the presence of an accomplished fact.

We therefore ask, Mr. Prime Minister, that you delay all legislation relating to the federated pact and call together, in the first place, the interested parties, in order that they may study together, in a spirit of co-operation, the vital problems which are connected with all amendments to the British North America Act.

Please accept my good wishes.

M. L. Duplessis

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa, September 28, 1949

The Honourable Maurice Duplessis, M.L.A.,
Premier of Quebec,
Parliament Buildings,
Quebec, Que.

My dear Premier:

I duly received your letter of the 21st September, in which you set out the attitude of your government respecting the constitutional proposals referred to in my letter of September 14.

I am pleased that you have said that the provincial authorities of Quebec are ready to participate at any time in a conference between the various Canadian governments with the object of examining and applying the right and proper methods of giving effect to the rights, prerogatives and liberties of the central authority and the provincial authorities.

I note also that you reiterate the opinion that the British North America Act is a compact entered into by the four original provinces. Without at this time entering into any debate regarding this opinion or the consequences which flow from it, I would simply recall that historically the federal authorities have always proceeded, when there was a question of making amendments to this act which touched exclusively on something within federal jurisdiction, by taking it for granted that those sections at least of the act do not have the character of a contract, but are rather statutory provisions capable of being amended by the legislative authority which enacted them.

In the present circumstances we do not ask anyone else to renounce a contrary opinion, but we believe we should proceed in the same fashion as has been done in the past. We believe that there is a line of demarcation (and that it makes very little difference whether this demarcation was by contract or by statute as long as it is respected) between what is exclusively in the federal domain, what is exclusively in the provincial domain, and what is of concern both to the federal and provincial authorities.

I stated in the House of Commons the other day that it was my personal opinion that it would be arbitrary for us to attempt to decide ourselves in a definitive way what was on one side and what was on the other side of this line of demarcation, and that I believed it was desirable, when transferring from the parliament of Westminster to the parliament of Canada the right to make amendments respecting matters which were exclusively of federal interest, that we should use language which would leave to the courts in case of dispute the task of determining the line of demarcation.

We do not ask you to renounce the opinion that you express in your letter, but we do not believe that you will expect us to renounce the one which has been constantly followed in practice in securing the different amendments which have been made to the British North America Act between 1871 and 1949.

I believe that what we suggest offers a practical means of achieving something without either of us on one side or the other having to acquiesce in an opinion that he does not feel he should admit.

The provinces have always had the right of amending their constitution except as respects the office of lieutenant governor. As for the federal authorities, every time they have considered it advisable to amend the provisions which concern them exclusively—and that has seemed advisable about ten times since 1867—they have had to have the amendment made by the parliament of Westminster.

When we have secured for the federal parliament the right to make these amendments instead of having only the right to have them made at Westminster at the request of our two houses of parliament, the problem will remain of providing for amendments, if any should ever be necessary, to the provisions which are not subject to amendment either by the federal parliament alone or by the provincial legislatures alone.

What we wish to examine with the provincial governments is what would be the right and proper procedure in this respect, and we wish at the same time to make provision in the constitution for express guarantees for the autonomy of the provinces, both with respect to their jurisdiction and to their rights and privileges, as well as for the rights and privileges with respect to education and the use of the French and English languages.

It is our hope that, subject to any reservations you may consider proper, your government will take part in such a conference.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

Office of the Premier
Province of Quebec

Quebec, October 5, 1949

Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

Mr. Prime Minister:

At the first meeting of council, held today, I submitted your letter of the 28th of September regarding constitutional changes which you have recommended, for the consideration of my colleagues.

You write: "I would simply recall that historically the federal authorities have always proceeded, when there was a question of making amendments to this act which touched exclusively on something within federal jurisdiction, by taking it for granted that those sections at least of the act do not have the character of a contract, but are rather statutory provisions capable of being amended by the legislative authority which enacted them".

Permit me respectfully to recall to you that your interpretation does not correspond with that of the fathers of the federative pact in the parliament of Westminster in 1867. Lord Carnarvon in the House of Lords, and the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Adderley in the House of Commons, have said as follows:

Lord Carnarvon: "The Quebec resolutions, with some slight changes, form the basis of a measure that I have now the honour to submit to parliament. To those resolutions all the British provinces in North America were, as I have said, consenting parties, and the measure founded upon them must be accepted as a treaty of union."

Mr Adderley: "If, again, federation has in this case specially been a matter of most delicate treaty and compact between the provinces . . . it is clearly necessary that there should be a third party ab extra to give sanction to the treaty made between them."

It seems evident to us that Lord Carnarvon and Mr. Adderley were fully aware of what they were discussing, that they were acting in good faith, and that they did not wish to mislead those who were interested, by statements which were not correct.

In addition, our Canadian statesmen of different political allegiances and different races have also expressed on several occasions the opinion that the act of confederation is a pact or a treaty.

We are persuaded that if the province of Quebec had believed that the federative act represented simply a piece of legislation always susceptible of being amended at the sole wish of the federal authorities, it would not have given its consent.

It seems clear to us that at the moment of confederation the statesmen of the time had in mind and sought confirmation of a pact or treaty. Further, there are several privy council judgments to the effect that not a law but a pact is involved.

If, as you have written, and once more we respect your opinion without sharing it, the Canadian constitution is a law which does not offer guarantees of permanence and stability as such, because it is subject to all modifications, how would a new law, also subject to amendments, offer greater guarantees?

Do you not believe that the many vital problems involved in an amendment of the Canadian constitution are of such magnitude that it is fitting that they be studied and given mature consideration, before proposing them, and even more before adopting them?

You invoke federal precedents for the proposed method of amending the constitution. Do you not believe that bad precedents ought not to be multiplied?—and moreover, none of the precedents to which you have referred has the importance nor is so far-reaching as what you now propose. We must not forget that very important amendments to the Canadian constitution, though not as important as those which you propose, have been made despite the opposition of the province of Quebec. In our opinion the more numerous the bad precedents are, the more necessary it is to put an end to them and to cease multiplying them.

I repeat that the present government of Quebec is in favour of the autonomy of Canada, but that it also holds firmly to respect for the autonomy of the provinces and of Quebec in particular.

I should like to renew the assurances that the provincial authorities in Quebec are always ready to take part in a Canadian intergovernmental conference whose aim would be to study beforehand and apply subsequently the most appropriate and just methods to give effect to the rights, prerogatives, and liberties of the central authority as well as of the provincial authorities.

Once more I draw your attention to the fact that the Canadian constitution did not result from hasty decisions, nor was it the realization of a single political party or of a single government.

We renew our request, Mr. Prime Minister, that you agree to postpone all legislation concerning the federative pact and call together initially the interested parties to study together in a spirit of co-operation the vital problems involved in an amendment to the British North America Act.

Yours sincerely,

M. L. Duplessis

Office of the Prime Minister

Ottawa, October 13, 1949

The Honourable Maurice Duplessis, M.L.A.
Premier of Quebec,
Parliament Buildings,
Quebec, Que.

My dear Premier:

I duly received your letter of the 5th instant with further reference to the constitutional changes proposed by the federal government, and I submitted it to my colleagues yesterday.

In your letter we were surprised to read the following paragraph:

"If, as you have written, and once more we respect your opinion without sharing it, the Canadian constitution is a law which does not offer guarantees of permanence and stability as such, because it is subject to all modifications, how would a new law, also subject to amendments, offer greater guarantees?"

That is not the position of the federal government at all. We do not claim, and have never claimed, that the federal authorities have any such sweeping right in respect to amendments to the constitution.

What we do claim, and what we propose to secure at the present time, is a practical method of having made in Canada, by the federal parliament alone, not "all amendments" to the constitution, but only amendments relating to provisions of the constitution which are the exclusive concern of the federal authorities.

We believe we already have the right to have such amendments made without consulting the provincial authorities, just as the provincial legislatures have the right, without consulting the federal authorities, to make themselves, any amendments they consider desirable of those provisions which concern them exclusively.

In order to secure a declaration that such amendments can be made by the federal parliament instead of having them made by the parliament at Westminster, we propose to use the procedure used in securing amendments in the past.

The amendments already made within the federal sphere have had beneficial results, notably those of 1943 and 1946, which assured to the population of Quebec a more equitable representation in the federal parliament.

In your opinion this procedure and these precedents are unsound. To that opinion we can only reply that "we respect your opinion without sharing it," and that, as in the past, there is no obligation to ask for your consent or your acquiescence.

We now believe that a change of venue for future amendments is desirable. We believe that, rather than have them made by a parliament representing the citizens of the United Kingdom, future amendments to our constitution should, depending upon the subject matter of the amendment, either be made by parliament alone or parliament and the legislatures, which represent the citizens of Canada.

There is no doubt about our power to have this change of venue made without consulting the provincial authorities and without their acquiescence, "except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces, or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other constitutional act granted or secured to the legislature or the government of a province, or to any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or the French language."

We claim we also have the right to have this change of venue made, without the consent or acquiescence of the provincial authorities. We cannot therefore accede to your request to postpone all action until there has been an understanding with the provincial authorities.

Once this first step has been taken, the federal authorities will be in the same position as the provincial authorities. If, under the pretence of making an amendment to the provincial constitution, a legislature encroaches on matters coming under federal jurisdiction, the courts would declare such an amendment ultra vires. The same rule will apply to federal legislation: to be valid, it will have to avoid encroaching on matters assigned exclusively to the provincial legislatures, or on rights or privileges granted or secured to the legislature or government of a province or to any class of persons with respect to schools, or as regards the use of the English or French language. If ever there should be legal disputes as to the validity of such federal legislation, the courts would be called on to decide them.

But there will remain, as I stated in my letter of the 28th of September, the problem "of providing for amendments, if any should ever be necessary, to the provisions which are not subject to amendment either by the federal parliament alone or by the provincial legislatures alone".

So long as the federal and provincial authorities have not agreed upon a right and proper procedure in this respect, all such amendments will remain within the jurisdiction of the parliament in London, instead of here in Canada.

There will also remain the problem of embodying in the constitution express legal safeguards of the rights of the provinces and of minorities which are not there now. All these things can be done, and we believe they should be done, and, when we of the federal government have accomplished all that we believe we can have done by ourselves, I shall renew the invitation to you to confer with us and representatives of the other provincial governments in order to devise means of completing the task of having transferred to the Canadian authorities what remains of the jurisdiction of the parliament in London over Canada's domestic affairs.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I have your letter of the 14th September relative to the amendment of our constitution. I shall be glad to attend the conference which you refer to, and which it is proposed to hold shortly after the present session of parliament.

I agree with your observation that the working out of a satisfactory method of making all kinds of amendments to the constitution will not be easy. I can assure you that we are prepared to give all proposals the utmost consideration. I am frankly in some doubt as to the advisability of dealing with the matter piecemeal without first attempting general agreement. Obviously, matters which are purely a federal concern will have to be delineated from time to time by the courts. My consideration of the matter leads me to believe that abolition of appeals to the privy council may affect this very important side of matters more than is generally realized. Following my conversation with you the other day, Mr. Garson wrote to me and I expressed some of my doubt in the matter in a letter under yesterday's date.

I make these observations because of the difficulties which were inherent in this whole matter. As stated, I shall attend the conference and, if it should appear desirable to have a preparatory conference of constitutional experts, we shall be prepared to participate.

Very sincerely yours,

As I am obliged to leave Ottawa in a few minutes and will be absent for two or three days, I am sending this acknowledgment at once and confining myself to expressing appreciation of your expression of the willingness of the Ontario government to participate in a conference to consider a suitable method of amending the constitution in Canada.

Province of Manitoba

Office of the Premier

The Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent, K.C., Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

My dear Prime Minister:

I am in receipt of your letter of September 14, 1949.

The government of Manitoba would be pleased to discuss with the federal government and the governments of the several provinces the questions mentioned by you at any time and place that is mutually convenient.

Your letter indicates that your government has already decided to ask the United Kingdom parliament to amend the British North America Act so that the parliament of Canada would have authority to amend the constitution of Canada, but only in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces nor affecting the rights and privileges with respect to education and to the use of the English and French languages. The government of Manitoba feels that there might be differences of opinion as to whether a proposed amendment to the constitution related only to federal matters or affected provincial interests, rights, or jurisdiction. Before agreeing to any specific proposal, therefore, our government will examine carefully the manner in which the provincial position is to be protected.

The main purpose of the conference, as I understand it, would be to try to evolve a method of making, within Canada, amendments to those provisions of the constitution which concern both federal and provincial governments. The government of Manitoba realizes that a conference such as this will be dealing with difficult and complex constitutional problems, and that progress towards a solution of them can be made by representatives of Canada and the provinces meeting together. Our government is therefore of the opinion that a preliminary conference, comprising constitutional experts, though not necessarily limited to them, would be useful in clarifying many of the issues involved. We would consequently welcome the calling of such a preparatory conference and will be glad to participate in it.

I assume that the Manitoba government will be furnished with an agenda for either the preparatory conference or a dominion-provincial conference in sufficient time to afford us an opportunity of discussing items on the agenda and to enable our representatives to make full preparations.

Yours sincerely,

Douglas Campbell

Office of the Prime Minister

Ottawa,

Honourable Douglas Campbell, M.L.A.,
Premier of Manitoba,
Winnipeg, Manitoba.

My dear Premier:

I wish to acknowledge your letter of the 6th instant regarding the proposed consultation with the provincial governments with regard to the procedure for amending the constitution.

I thank you for the assurance of the readiness of the government of Manitoba to participate in a conference for this purpose, and I shall advise you in due course of our proposals in that connection. As to a preparatory conference of experts, the government is awaiting word as to the attitude of all the provincial governments before deciding whether it would be helpful for us to take any initiative in arranging such a meeting.

As for the amendment we have already decided to ask the United Kingdom parliament to enact, I have pleasure in enclosing a copy of the motion which is already on the order paper of the House of Commons. Since it relates only to that part of the constitution which is of exclusive concern to the federal authorities, and leaves to the courts the responsibility for deciding any disputes as to the limits of our jurisdiction, it was our view that it would not be appropriate to consult the provincial authorities or to ask them to share our responsibility for a proposal which relates exclusively to matters within federal jurisdiction.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

Regina, September 20th, 1949.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,

My dear Prime Minister:

Thank you for your letter of September 14 advising me that at the forthcoming session you propose to take steps to secure an amendment to the British North America Act vesting the parliament of Canada with the authority to amend the constitution of Canada in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the provinces nor affecting minority rights.

The government of Saskatchewan has always held that Canada should have the right to amend its own constitution, and consequently we welcome the news that steps are being taken to this end in so far as purely federal matters are concerned. I would take it that this will be done in conjunction with the abolition of appeals to the judicial committee of the privy council; for it would seem anomalous to vest the Canadian parliament with the authority to amend its constitution and leave with a judicial body of the United Kingdom power to hand down decisions affecting the interpretation of Canadian law. If such a step is taken, may I respectfully suggest that some measures should be adopted to make the Canadian supreme court more representative than it is at present, in order that those who find it necessary to appeal decisions of the lower courts may feel more confident than they are at present that these matters are being approached from the broadest possible viewpoint.

With reference to your suggestion that the federal and provincial governments consult at an early date regarding amendments which may be required to deal with those provisions of the constitution which affect federal and provincial authorities and minority rights, I wish to assure you that the government of Saskatchewan will gladly co-operate with your government and the governments of the other provinces in seeking to find a satisfactory solution to this problem. We recognize that proper safeguards will be necessary in order to prevent any unwarranted infringement upon provincial or minority rights, but at the same time we are convinced that the power to amend these provisions of our constitution should lie solely with the people of Canada through their elected dominion and provincial representatives. We are equally certain that if this problem is tackled in a spirit of co-operation and good will, a modus operandi can be worked out which will be acceptable to the great majority of Canadian citizens.

Will you please advise us when such a conference is likely to be held, and if it is your intention to invite the provincial governments to send constitutional experts to a preparatory conference for the purpose of laying a basis for our discussions.

Assuring you of our willingness to co-operate in this matter, and awaiting any further particulars regarding the proposed conference, I remain,

Yours sincerely,

Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

My colleagues and I have carefully considered your letter of September 14, in which you invite the co-operation of the Alberta government in measures designed to alter the present procedure in the matter of amendments to the British North America Act.

The government of Alberta will be pleased to be represented at a conference between the dominion and the provinces for a full discussion of this important subject. Your suggestion that such a conference be held following the present session of parliament is satisfactory to us.

In view of the important legal aspects of the matter, we favour your further suggestion that a preliminary meeting of constitutional experts representing the various governments be held prior to the main conference.

I would like to refer particularly to your observation that it is the intention of parliament at the present session to request an amendment to the British North America Act by the United Kingdom parliament which would vest in the parliament of Canada the authority to amend the constitution of Canada in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces.

While this may appear to be a matter of concern only to the dominion government, my colleagues and I feel strongly that the amendment proposed concerns the provinces as well, in that federal policies initiated under future amendments to the B.N.A. Act, which the dominion government might make within its constitutional sphere, could well have far-reaching effects on the economy of the provinces. Furthermore, the privy council has held that under the B.N.A. Act all powers have been vested in either the provinces or the dominion. It is difficult, therefore, to see how a situation could arise where any amendment to the B.N.A. Act would affect dominion powers alone, without at the same time affecting at least to some degree the rights of the provinces. We feel it is extremely important, before any amendment is made to the British North America Act, even in the field of federal jurisdiction, that the whole question of dominion versus provincial jurisdiction be fully discussed at a joint meeting of representatives of the dominion and provincial governments. We strongly urge that this whole matter be held in abeyance pending the conference which you propose to convene at the close of the present session of parliament. It seems to us that this is the only way in which future conflict can be avoided and the unity of Canada, which we all desire, preserved and strengthened.

Yours very truly,

Ernest C. Manning,
Premier

Office of the Prime Minister

Ottawa, October 17, 1949

Honourable E. C. Manning, M.L.A.,
Premier of Alberta,
Edmonton, Alberta.

My dear Premier:

I wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter of October 12 regarding the proposed consultations with the provincial governments in connection with the procedure for amending the constitution.

I have pleasure in enclosing a copy of the motion which is on the order paper of the House of Commons embodying the address asking the United Kingdom parliament to empower the parliament of Canada to amend our constitution in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces, or in relation to provincial or minority rights. As you will see from the motion, the proposed amendment is not intended to affect provincial jurisdiction or the rights or prerogatives of provincial legislatures or governments, but relates only to that part of the constitution which is of exclusive concern to the federal authorities, and leaves to the courts the responsibility for deciding any disputes as to the limits of our jurisdiction.

In other words, the action proposed immediately will merely give to the federal authorities the same power to amend the constitution of Canada which the provincial authorities already enjoy under section 92 of the British North America Act to amend the constitutions of the provinces.

It is accordingly our view that it would not be appropriate to consult the provincial authorities or to ask them to share our responsibility for a proposal which relates exclusively to matters within federal jurisdiction.

All that is really involved is a change of venue for future amendments relating to provisions of the constitution which are the exclusive concern of the federal authorities. Since we are convinced we have the right to have this change of venue made without the consent or acquiescence of the provincial authorities, we feel we cannot accede to your request that the whole matter be held in abeyance pending the conference proposed after the close of the present session of parliament.

Once this initial step has been taken, there will remain the problem of providing for amendments, if any should ever be necessary, to the provisions which are not subject to amendment either by the federal parliament alone or by the provincial legislatures alone.

So long as the federal and provincial authorities have not agreed upon a right and proper procedure in this respect, all such amendments will remain within the jurisdiction of the parliament in London instead of here in Canada.

There will also remain the problem of embodying in the constitution express legal safeguards of the rights of the provinces and of minorities which are not there now. All these things can be done, and we believe they should be done, and, when we of the federal government have accomplished all that we believe we can have done by ourselves, I shall renew the invitation to you to confer with us and representatives of the other provincial governments in order to devise means of completing the task of having transferred to the Canadian authorities what remains of the jurisdiction of the parliament in London over Canada's domestic affairs. In this connection my colleagues and I are gratified by your assurance that the government of Alberta will be pleased to be represented at such a conference.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

Office of the Premier Province of British Columbia

Victoria,
September 28, 1949

The Right Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

My dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I have for acknowledgment your letter of September 14, which arrived during my absence on a trip through the northern part of the province. I note your desire to have a conference of representatives of your government and the provincial governments to discuss the possibility of amending the British North America Act.

I may say that the government of the province of British Columbia is willing to participate in a conference to discuss constitutional matters at a time to be designated by your government.

We feel that the question of a preparatory conference of constitutional experts should be held in abeyance until such time as the conference suggested has been held and an opportunity given to the provincial governments to study in detail the changes which may be considered desirable.

With kindest personal regards,

Yours faithfully,

Byron I. Johnson
Premier

Office of the Prime Minister

My dear Premier:

I wish to acknowledge your letter of September 28 regarding the proposed consultation with the provincial governments with regard to the procedure for amending the constitution.

I thank you for the assurance of the readiness of the government of British Columbia to participate in a conference for this purpose, and I shall advise you in due course of our proposals in that connection.

I have duly noted your observations regarding a preparatory conference of experts, and will place them before my colleagues when I have been advised of the attitude of all the provincial governments.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WELCOME TO MEMBER FOR COCHRANE ON HIS RETURN TO THE HOUSE AFTER ILLNESS

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am very thankful for the opportunity to welcome back to this chamber the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). There are few hon. members who have given better service or who are held in greater respect than he is. I pay my tribute to him. He is not an Irishman, but he is the next thing to it. I believe it would be in keeping with His way of thinking if I expressed to Him who brings all things to pass in the right way our gratitude for bringing the hon. member safely back to the service of the house.

UNEMPLOYMENT

NEWFOUNDLAND—QUESTION AS TO FEDERAL ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, of which I have given notice. In view of the serious unemployment situation in Newfoundland, as outlined yesterday by the premier of that province, what action, if any, does the federal government propose to take in the matter?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Up to the present time the government has received no official communication from the government of Newfoundland concerning the matter referred to in the hon. member's question. I should like, however, to call attention to the fact that the supplementary estimates for services in Newfoundland, which have been before the house and of which certain portions have been voted in a preliminary way, contain an item of $750,000 for public buildings, and another item of $575,000 for dredging, of which $200,000 is allocated to manual day labour. There is another item of $1 million for harbours and rivers generally. Serious attention has been given recently to expediting the work for which these moneys have been provided, and it is hoped that it will take up some portion of the unemployment which has developed in Newfoundland.

GOLD

STORAGE OF BULLION BY MINING INTERESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's reply to a question I asked on May 22, 1947, made on June 10, 1947, as reported at pages 3319 and 3968 respectively of Hansard, what action has he taken or does he propose to take to prevent profiteering by McIntyre Porcupine or other gold mines on alleged accumulations of gold and gold concentrates withheld for some time awaiting devaluation?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of his question. Perhaps I should first repeat what I actually did say. The gist of my remarks is to be found on page 3969 of Hansard of June 10, 1947. After referring to the fact that if gold were required to be transferred to the Bank of Canada, it would, under the present law, be required to be transferred at the old standard price of $20.67 per fine ounce, I went on to say:

> This would be probably too drastic a penalty to impose in a case of the kind we are considering—too drastic, that is to say, unless the country's need for the gold was immediate and urgent. On the other hand, after serious consideration I have not been able to think of any amendments to these provisions of the Bank of Canada Act which I would be prepared to recommend at this time, because I can see that there may be cases arising in future where it might be appropriate to apply the present provisions of that act. With this in mind, I am not proposing any action on this matter at the present time. I am content to defer action for the time being because any gold that is stored by mining companies will be in a few hands; we will know where it is and approximately what it amounts to. We can therefore take it into account as in some measure a substitute for a part of our official reserves and, finally, if the need should arise, we will be in a position to have it transferred to the Bank of Canada under the legislative authority I have mentioned.

That was my statement at that time. The fact is that in our opinion such need did not arise, and we did not feel it necessary to have the gold to which reference is made transferred to the Bank of Canada under the provision of the Bank of Canada Act to which I have referred.

Perhaps I might add what must be reasonably clear to everyone, that if a gold mine has held gold for the last two or three or more years, in expectation of a rise in the price of gold, the transaction could not have been very profitable to the company, having in mind the loss of interest or other earning power on funds tied up in an unproductive manner, and the storage and other charges necessarily incurred during this long period.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): What percentage of the excess profit would be obtained in the form of income tax?

Mr. Abbott: I suppose between thirty-five per cent and forty per cent of any profit made from appreciation in the price of gold would be paid in tax either to the dominion or to the province.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

DOLLAR SHORTAGE IN GREAT BRITAIN—AID BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT AND INDUSTRIALISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I should like to ask the government a question. Is any action being taken to aid Great Britain in her dollar troubles, (a) by private Canadian industrialists, or (b) by the government of Canada? I regret I did not have time to give the minister notice of my question.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The government of Canada of course has taken extraordinary measures to help Great Britain in her dollar difficulties. Loans in excess of a billion dollars have already been made, and a loan is currently being made at the rate of $10 million a month. So far as private industry is concerned, industry in Canada has joined with industry in the United Kingdom to set up a board to assist in the sale of British goods in Canada. I believe an announcement of the personnel of the board was made yesterday by Mr. Duncan, the chairman of the Canadian section of the board. I am meeting with the Canadian board this evening to discuss plans with them. I think that reasonable steps are being taken, so far as Canada is concerned, to assist in correcting the unbalance between dollars and sterling, and I can assure the hon. member that both the government and industry will continue to interest themselves in the problem.

DEVALUATION OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—CANADIAN EXCHANGE TEACHERS IN THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the plight of Canadian teachers doing exchange teaching in the United States, owing to the effect of devaluation on their Canadian salaries, been drawn to his attention? Will he see if anything can be done to relieve their situation?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): It has not been drawn to my attention up to the present time. I have no doubt it will be after the question the hon. member has asked today.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

INCREASE IN PRICES OF CRUDE OIL, GASOLINE AND FUEL OIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, a copy of which I have sent him. Can the minister state whether he will comply with the request of the Attorney General of Saskatchewan that an investigation be made under the Combines Investigation Act into the recent price increases on crude oil, gasoline and fuel oil?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The attitude of the government towards the request of the Attorney General of Saskatchewan is being set out in a letter from myself to the attorney general bearing today's date. As a matter of courtesy and fairness to the attorney general, I do not think I should publish the letter before he receives it, but I shall be glad to have it tabled tomorrow.

Mr. MacInnis: Does the government contemplate amendment of the Combines Investigation Act at the present session? If so, when will the amendments be introduced?

Mr. Garson: The answer is yes, in the fairly near future.

SALES TAX

INQUIRY AS TO REPRESENTATIONS WITH RESPECT TO ICE CREAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister received representations asking for the removal of the sales tax on ice cream? Will he make a statement in the matter?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): We have received a considerable number during the last few days, and I suppose there were several hundred both before and after the budget presentation last March.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING

The house resumed, from Monday, October 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King praying that a measure be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act, 1867, relating to the amendment of the constitution of Canada.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose last night I was in process of outlining a series of steps which have been taken, and are still being taken, the result of which will be, if this resolution passes, that the parliament of Canada will have exclusive control over the Canadian constitution. Among those steps I had outlined the first three or four, starting with the statement of the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), made in the house in 1946, that, contrary to the generally accepted view of the constitution, the language rights guaranteed under section 133 of the British North America Act could in fact be changed by a simple majority vote of parliament. Carrying on from there, the next stage was the redistribution act, when the position was taken that the federal parliament has the absolute right to say what matters are or are not matters of provincial concern, and that because it was said the representation of a province in this house was a matter for the federal parliament, then however strong might be the views of the provinces in the matter, it was within the competence of this parliament to pass an act changing the basis of redistribution—contrary to the views formerly held with respect to the constitution.

Then there was the further position taken in the course of the debate on the admission of Newfoundland to confederation—the method followed there being a departure from the agreed terms outlined in the British North America Act—that a departure from the procedure set out in that act could be made by the federal parliament without any measure of consultation with or consent by the provinces as to the propriety or necessity of making that departure.

Then at this session we had the abolition of appeals to the privy council, the effect of which was, amongst other things, to deprive the provinces of what had been their right since confederation, their right of appeal to the privy council. That right was taken away from them without consultation or any attempt to obtain their consent. I think that is an important matter to bear in mind in view of the correspondence which has been received, and which was tabled yesterday, from some of the provincial premiers.

These were the steps which I had outlined when the house rose last night. I would like to outline three more steps which have been taken or are now being taken to complete the process of gathering into the hands of this parliament exclusive control over our constitution.

First, in the discussion of the question of the abolition of appeals to the privy council no heed was paid to the suggestion—indeed, the request—that when the supreme court was made the court of final jurisdiction some constitutional protection should be given the composition of that court, so that it might be made a part of our constitution, as it were, and that its composition might be changed only by means of a constitutional amendment. At the present time the Supreme Court of Canada is the exclusive creation of this parliament, and its composition can be changed by a simple act of parliament. As I shall have occasion to point out in a few moments, among the letters from provincial premiers in reference to the conference it is proposed to hold in the near future are several in which they request that the composition of the supreme court be taken into consideration before the final abolition of appeals to the privy council.

The next step I wish to mention is the one now before us in this resolution. I think it is important for us to have clearly in mind, in order to appreciate fully the consequences of the steps already taken and of this step, that if this proposal is adopted—and the government is putting the resolution forward for consideration and adoption—the dominion parliament is asserting in its final form the principle that it can amend the constitution without consultation with the provinces, and is taking that position in spite of the protests of five of the provinces which have expressed their views by letter. I should like to refer in detail to some of the letters which have been written. I think I should remark that if the Prime Minister had desired to prevent the public from being fully informed as to the views held by the various provincial governments, or if he had desired to prevent the full and informed discussion which should take place on this matter, he could not have served that purpose better than by the course he followed, in refraining from tabling this correspondence until yesterday, the very day this resolution came up for discussion in the house. That, I think, is remarkable, when one sees the lengths to which some of the provincial premiers have gone in the correspondence in expressing their views as to the propriety of this procedure, and in requesting that this resolution be withheld pending the convening of the conference it is proposed to hold following this session.

I have here a letter from the premier of Nova Scotia, dated September 27, three weeks before this resolution came up for discussion —and, incidentally, before the debate on the bill to abolish appeals to the privy council was concluded. The passage from Mr. Macdonald's letter which is of interest is as follows:

> I observe that the Minister of Justice has introduced a bill for the abolition of appeals to the privy council. It seems to me that the abolition of appeals to the privy council might well form the subject of study by such a general conference as is envisaged in your letter. I beg to suggest, therefore, that final consideration of the bill now before the House of Commons be deferred until the conference suggested in your letter will be held. There is, I believe, considerable support for the view that the abolition of appeals to the privy council is in effect an amendment of the constitution and that, therefore, it is a question which should be the subject of discussion at the dominion-provincial conference which you suggest.

Two things emerge from that letter. The first is that the premier of Nova Scotia—and one or two other premiers held the same view—asked that the measure abolishing appeals to the privy council be deferred pending the conference. The second, and more important in the light of the present debate, is the view expressed in this letter that since it amounts to a constitutional amendment, it should be withheld pending that conference. Implicit in that view is the feeling that, before any positive steps are taken to amend our constitution, the provinces should be consulted, particularly before steps are taken to provide that the federal parliament, by its own simple majority, can amend our constitution without consultation with the provinces, in order that satisfactory assurances may be obtained that, in any such amendments, provincial rights will not be infringed upon.

Mr. Carroll: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Fulton: I have not a great deal of time left, but I will answer one question.

Mr. Carroll: Is it not a fact that the privy council, the highest court of appeal, has already decided that this parliament can do away with appeals to the privy council?

Mr. Fulton: That matter is not in dispute.

Mr. Carroll: Then how can it be a question of changing the constitution?

Mr. Fulton: That question was fully discussed in the course of the debate on the other bill, and if I were to refer to the details of that discussion probably I would be ruled out of order. I may content myself with saying that the view that it would be in effect a change in the constitution likely to have an influence on provincial rights in the future was put forward in that debate. The premier of the hon. member's own province held the same view, and wished that the matter might be deferred until the whole question of the basis of constitutional amendments and related matters might be discussed at a dominion-provincial conference.

The letter from the premier of Quebec has been referred to already and has been published in full in the press; therefore I need not read extracts from it. However, he is another provincial premier who holds very strongly the view that before the question of constitutional amendment is decided there should be a conference with the provinces. The premier of Ontario also expressed his views as to the propriety of the procedure being followed, that is to say the propriety of deciding that the parliament of Canada can amend the constitution now and in future without previously discussing with the provinces the method to be followed, and at least trying to work out some safeguard which would allay the doubts and fears of the provinces that the method now being adopted may result in their constitutional rights being infringed upon. Under date of October 7 the premier of Ontario wrote as follows:

> I am frankly in some doubt as to the advisability of dealing with the matter piecemeal without first attempting general agreement. Obviously, matters which are purely a federal concern will have to be delineated from time to time by the courts. My consideration of the matter leads me to believe that abolition of appeals to the privy council may affect this very important side of matters more than is generally realized.

The premier of Manitoba expressed himself in somewhat similar language. On October 6 Mr. Campbell wrote as follows:

> Your letter indicates that your government has already decided to ask the United Kingdom parliament to amend the British North America Act so that the parliament of Canada would have authority to amend the constitution of Canada, but only in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces nor affecting the rights and privileges with respect to education and to the use of the English and French languages. The government of Manitoba feels that there might be differences of opinion as to whether a proposed amendment to the constitution related only to federal matters or affected provincial interests, rights, or jurisdiction. Before agreeing to any specific proposal, therefore, our government will examine carefully the manner in which the provincial position is to be protected.

The letter from the premier of Saskatchewan, dated September 20, 1949, contains the following passage:

> If such a step is taken, may I respectfully suggest that some measures should be adopted to make the Canadian supreme court more representative than it is at present, in order that those who find it necessary to appeal decisions of the lower courts may feel more confident than they are at present that these matters are being approached from the broadest possible viewpoint.

Finally there is a letter from the premier of Alberta, from which lengthy extracts have already been quoted by the leader of the opposition, making it quite clear that the premier of Alberta holds the view that it is impossible for any one parliament to say what is a matter exclusively for its jurisdiction and what is a matter exclusively for the jurisdiction of other parliaments without giving some offence to the position and rights of those other parliaments. He therefore requests that this matter of working out a procedure of amending our constitution in Canada be left to be determined at the dominion-provincial conference which is to be called in the near future.

These are letters from five of the ten provinces, half the members of confederation, and representing well over half the population of Canada. They are written in terms which cast doubt upon the propriety of proceeding by unilateral action of this parliament to take into our own hands the power of amending the constitution in accordance with our views of what are federal rights and what may be provincial rights.

If only for the purpose, Mr. Speaker, of preserving unity; if only for the purpose of creating and preserving those conditions which would give some hope of success in trying to reach agreement at the dominion-provincial conference, I would have thought the government would have been willing for a few months to hold up the resolution now before us and to hold up these other matters which there will be five years to deal with, instead of completely overriding the expressed wishes of five provincial premiers and proceeding in the first month of this session with these important constitutional changes.

The final step to which I shall refer is again inherent in the resolution before us. It is the assertion, to which practical effect would be given by the passage of the resolution, that this parliament can decide what matters are federal and what matters are provincial. I know the Prime Minister said yesterday that no such thought is in his mind, that the decision on federal and provincial jurisdiction would be left to the courts. It is inherent in this resolution, Mr. Speaker, because it asks that power be given to this parliament to do what? To make amendments from time to time to the constitution of Canada, "except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures . . ." If these words mean anything, they can only mean that this parliament will have to decide what matters are assigned exclusively to the legislatures. Having decided that, it will be said that all the rest of the matters are assigned to the federal parliament.

If we are qualified to make the first decision, we are certainly qualified and have to be qualified to make the second. If those words mean anything; if that definition of the power which it is sought to give to the federal parliament means anything, it means we are to be given that right and must exercise it. Then, having made our decision on what matters are federal, we are to be empowered to enact legislation concerning those matters by a simple majority vote of this parliament; that is the situation. We are being asked to do just that. This is the final step in a series of steps, culminating in the delivery of the constitution of Canada, tied and bound, to the sole and exclusive custody of this federal parliament. It is a position entirely unwarranted by and entirely inconsistent with the spirit in which confederation was achieved. It is inconsistent with any possible hope that some measure of general agreement may subsequently be achieved at the dominion-provincial conference, because the premiers of the provinces are being asked to attend a conference to talk about an amendment to the constitution, and at the same time are faced with a fait accompli. The federal government can then say: We have all the power we need to amend the constitution; it does not matter whether or not you agree here; we have that power and we are in a position to exercise it if we so desire. That is the position in which the provincial premiers will be when they come to the conference. Nothing could be better calculated to promote disunity and to ensure that disagreement will be the result of that conference.

Let us examine the position. I am sorry the Minister of Justice is not in his place, because I wanted to ask him if he would be kind enough, in the course of this debate, to say whether or not I am right in this proposition I am about to put forward.

Mr. St. Laurent: We will assume you are wrong.

Mr. Fulton: The other day one of the other ministers had the same feeling, that he was a mind-reader. I am glad to find the Prime Minister numbers that amongst his accomplishments also, but perhaps since other hon. gentlemen may not be endowed with the gift of clairvoyance, the Prime Minister would be kind enough to make his answer later in the course of the debate, or the Minister of Justice might do it for him, so that we may all have the benefit of his great learning and his power to penetrate into the recesses of other people's minds. I would say he must be proceeding on that basis on this question of constitutional amendment.

The position is this. We now have it asserted that the federal parliament can amend the constitution without consultation with the provinces. The Supreme Court of Canada has been made the court of last resort in all cases arising in Canada. Parliament is now taking the right to amend our constitution in Canada. Based upon the result of those three steps, it will be only necessary for the federal government to insert in the preamble of any statute which it wishes to enact that whereas under section 91 of the British North America Act exclusive legislative power with regard to this matter was vested in the federal parliament, and whereas it is desirable to enact legislation dealing with the subject of the statute, therefore be it enacted, et cetera. By virtue of the declaration in the preamble that it is a matter assigned to the federal parliament, no matter what constitutional conflicts may have taken place previously with regard to the matter, the federal government takes power to legislate and thereby, in effect, amends the constitution with respect to provincial rights.

The hon. gentleman may say: But we have the Supreme Court of Canada; if any of the provinces object, let them appeal to the court. It is also a fact that the Supreme Court of Canada is the creation of the federal parliament. There is nothing in the constitution of that court to prevent the federal government from adding two, three, or half a dozen judges if it so desires. Let us suppose that a provincial government, in the course of a constitutional dispute, is faced with the necessity of submitting its case to the supreme court. It is faced with a court to which any number of judges may be added by the federal government, and the court itself will be faced with an act of the federal parliament declaring that "whereas legislative authority in this sphere has been assigned to the federal parliament under section 91, this parliament enacts as follows". The practical conclusion of the series of steps of which this is the final one is that the constitution becomes the property of this parliament of Canada, and the whole basis upon which confederation was previously founded has been altered by the unilateral act of this government and this parliament without so much as consultation with or the consent of any one of the parties to confederation.

The final point I want to make deals with the question whether or not the government has a mandate to enact this particular piece of legislation. Referring to this matter yesterday, the Prime Minister said that he and his government had a mandate to put through this resolution. I put it forward unequivocably and definitely, Mr. Speaker, that in my view he has no mandate to put through the resolution which is now on the order paper and which will have the effect I have been describing, namely, of giving to the Canadian parliament the exclusive right to amend our constitution not only in particular but in general. If we look through the statements made by the right hon. gentleman during the course of the election campaign, we can find none to the effect that he was going to take that power. It is true that we find a number of statements to the effect that he would seek, in consultation with the provinces, to work out a method of amending at home the Canadian constitution. Yesterday when the right hon. gentleman read his own radio speech, he read the words in which he stated that proposition. I have just about finished, Mr. Speaker, but I want to emphasize this point. In his radio speech the right hon. gentleman said:

> It is our intention, after the election, to consult the provincial governments with a view to working out a method, which will be satisfactory to all Canadians, of amending the constitution in Canada.

In my submission, sir, that is the only mandate that the right hon. gentleman received; but in the resolution that we are now being asked to pass he is exceeding his mandate in an entirely unwarranted and unjustifiable manner.

Mr. Roch Pinard (Chambly-Rouville): As this is the first time that I have risen to speak in this chamber since the opening of this session, Mr. Speaker, I want to take the opportunity of joining with the others who have already congratulated you upon your appointment to the high office you now occupy. We are all proud of the manner in which you are discharging the difficult duty of presiding over our deliberations.

In rising to participate in this debate, I feel that not many other opportunities will be given to us of discussing a problem of the importance of the one with which we are concerned in the present resolution. I think the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was right when, in the course of his speech delivered on the address, he referred to this first session of the twenty-first parliament as a constitutional session. Nobody will deny the fact that when the government of a country wishes to legislate in matters that directly or indirectly affect its constitution, it chooses then to legislate on matters of great importance not only to the present generation of its people but to future generations as well.

The resolution now under discussion will allow the realization of a constant wish of the Canadian people, and of what the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage), when he spoke on the address, described as a dream of his younger days. When constitutional measures have to receive our approval they must in the first place stand the test of time, and before we are called upon to consider them, they must also receive the sanction of the people.

In our democratic country no important measure of this kind should be dealt with by the elected representatives of the people before it has been submitted to the people of Canada and they have been given an opportunity of accepting it. Contrary to what has been said by the previous speaker, the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), the leader of the government, when speaking on the subject in every province during the recent election campaign, clearly asked the people of Canada for a mandate on this question. Therefore the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had a clear mandate from the people before introducing the resolution which is now before the house. As a result of the decision of the leader of the government to get that mandate before introducing his resolution, we say today that it is with the consent of the overwhelming majority of the Canadian people, and with the approval of the overwhelming majority of the members of this house who are behind the leader of the government, that he is introducing this measure in the House of Commons.

I think that the Canadian public, which so well expressed its confidence in the Prime Minister and his party during the last election campaign, will be pleased with the attitude of our Prime Minister, who chooses to define, as he did in clear-cut statements, his attitude in public and national affairs instead of indulging in political manoeuvres. That is why we feel that it is with the complete support of the Canadian people that we are now trying to make this progress toward the complete independence of our country.

I approve, with joy and pride, the resolution which has been introduced; and I think I have the right today to say that I approved the spirit of it in the past, not only in this chamber but wherever an occasion was offered to me to express my views on constitutional matters. For example, in 1946, during the course of the debate on redistribution which has been referred to in the present debate, I had occasion in this house to give my opinion on some of our deficiencies with respect to our constitution. At that time, as reported on page 2248 of Hansard of 1946, I ventured to say:

> Before concluding, I should like to say a few words with reference to the obligation resting upon us to have recourse to the imperial parliament in order to secure the remedy proposed by the terms of the resolution before us.

As I said before, it was a resolution on redistribution. I continue:

> Every time the occasion arose we proudly proclaimed our complete independence within the commonwealth of British nations. We wish to believe, and we have a right to insist, since our country is now of adult age, that the Statute of Westminster be not a dead letter and was not adopted in vain. The most serious obstacle to the proclamation and the recognition of our sovereignty and of our complete autonomy lies in the fact that we do not yet possess our own constitution. Our constitution is embodied in an imperial statute; it does not even constitute a Canadian statute. That is why we must on every occasion undertake, perforce, that pilgrimage to London to ask others to decide upon our own destinies. So long as this anomaly has not disappeared from our national life, we shall not have the right to claim that Canada is a sovereign country.

It may be noted, Mr. Speaker, that my suggestion at the time was that we should have our own Canadian constitution embodied in our own legislation. In other words, I went so far as to claim that we should ask the imperial parliament to repeal the British North America Act so as to allow Canada to enact its own constitution as part of its own legislation and not part of the legislation of any other country, whatever may be the bonds and ties we have with that particular country. But I also think that Canada should not go too far and too fast in the conquest of its constitutional liberties if it does not wish to jeopardize by hasty measures its internal security as well as its relations with other countries, especially those with which we enjoy common economic and political interests.

The ultimate goal must not be endangered by measures of that kind, because the means that we would employ would not have been accompanied by the necessary precautions. Our constitution is indivisible. That has been said in this debate by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), and it has been said before. I share the view of the leader of the opposition on that score, but I also think that when the Prime Minister expressed a desire to have a dominion-provincial conference to deal with these matters it was believed that that conference would give us the opportunity to make some progress in trying to give to our country complete independence one of these days by putting us in a position to have our own Canadian constitution. I think that is the meaning that one can take from the letter that was addressed by the Prime Minister to the premiers of the provinces.

Whether our constitution as it exists today is called a pact or whether it is called a statute, one thing is certain, namely, that we cannot cast aside the fact that there has to be, and there is actually, a division of powers between the original provinces and the central government. This division is clear with regard to certain powers that are plainly defined in the act, on which there can be no confusion. Section 91 defines the powers of the central government. In view of that clause in the British North America Act, which has been referred to as the residuary clause, we can say that the powers of the central government are exhaustive as they are set out in that act. On the other hand, the powers of the provinces are defined in section 92. This may look simple, but it is much more complicated than it appears on the surface. It is more complicated because there are powers which have been conferred not only on the central government but on the provincial governments as well. In different matters there is concurrent jurisdiction. For this reason it is difficult to define exactly what is the power vested in the central government and what is the power that belongs to the provincial legislatures. I do not know whether that was done voluntarily by those who consulted with each other to have the British North America Act enacted. I say that it might have been voluntary, but we cannot be convinced of that, because if we read with care the Quebec resolutions, and the opinions that were expressed at the time, and if we try to analyse correctly the speeches that were made by the consulting authorities, we cannot come to the conclusion that this concurrent jurisdiction was then decided upon and agreed upon.

In the wording of the text, Mr. Speaker, there is conflict; but it must be borne in mind that the conflict is much more serious than that. It is much more serious because the act itself is not complete and could not be complete at the time. There were domains that could not have been explored at the time; and for this reason the British North America Act—although we cannot say that it is a mere draft—is silent on many subjects. In spite of the residuary clause to which I have made reference and which seems to favour the central power, with the advancing years bringing progress and development in Canada, new powers were created, and those powers were to be allocated either to the provincial legislatures or to the central government.

Who was to be the master and the judge in deciding upon these things? Who was to decide whether a certain power should be given to the provinces or to the central government? Who was to say, for instance, whether a power existed already and was already comprised in the definition of the act, or whether it was a totally new power or privilege? Who was to say that the power was not only derivative, or, as it is called, ancillary to powers already existing by virtue of the sections to which I referred, namely, sections 91 and 92, as well as other sections of the British North America Act concerning the powers and privileges of the central government and of the provinces? I submit that is where the real confusion began.

In spite of the fact that the best jurists began to explore and experiment in that field of interpretation, there is today a good deal of confusion in the segregation of powers as between the provinces and the dominion. There were, and there still are today, many classes of opinion, and it is not enough to say that there are those who favour a greater centralization, and, on the other hand, those who are in favour, and only in favour, of provincial rights. There were other interests from outside of Canada—there were also interests inside of Canada—which, of course, brought about interpretations of the powers vested by the British North America Act either in the provinces or in the central government. As a result our courts and the privy council have had to hear a large number of cases, either concerned with private litigation or in the way of references from the central or provincial governments, in order to try to determine the boundary between the jurisdiction of the provinces and the central government. In spite of the fact that the judgments that have been rendered by those courts did not satisfy all interests, I think it can be said that a considerable job was done. The job was to try to establish the course to be followed by private interests as well as by the different governments in connection with matters affecting constitutional rights.

As the Prime Minister said last month when he answered the Leader of the Opposition, since the earliest days of confederation, judicial process has been one of the methods of deciding conflicts that have arisen from the division of powers as between the provinces and the central power. I submit that that is a normal procedure and undoubtedly it will continue. We shall still have to rely upon our courts to find out whether a certain matter is within the jurisdiction of the central government or of the provincial legislatures. That is the case not only in Canada but also in the neighbouring country to the south and in all other countries where there is a division of power between administrative groups.

For these reasons neither the provincial legislatures nor minority groups should have reason to fear that this legislation will endanger their rights or privileges. All one has to do is to read the resolution as drafted and one will conclude that both minority and provincial rights are being protected. There is to be a clear distinction made between provincial and minority rights and those of the central government. Paragraph 1 of the resolution reads:

> The amendment from time to time of the constitution of Canada, except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces—

Is that not a clear undertaking on the part of the government that in no case will there be an attempt made to amend the constitution in connection with matters that come within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments? The paragraph goes on to read:

> —or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other constitutional act granted or secured to the legislature or the government of a province, or to any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or the French language.

In these words I find a clear decision on the part of the federal government not to interfere in matters affecting minority groups or the provincial governments. I submit that the purpose of this resolution is not to determine the boundary between provincial and dominion jurisdiction, nor is it intended to segregate the powers vested in the dominion or in the provinces; the purpose of the resolution is to make the central government master in its own house, as the provincial governments are now in theirs under the provisions of the British North America Act. The central government is simply asking for the same powers as have been conferred by the British North America Act on the legislatures of the provinces.

When a provincial government decides to change the number of representatives in the legislative assembly, by virtue of section 92 it does not have to have recourse either to the central government or to the imperial parliament. As has been done by the government of Ontario and the government of Quebec, this change is carried out of their own volition. But when the central government desires to increase the number of representatives in this chamber because of an increase in the population, we had to have the permission of the imperial parliament. It is to eliminate anomalies of this kind that the resolution is now before us.

I think a conference with the provinces would be most helpful in trying to determine the way in which to amend the constitution when we are concerned with matters affecting the provincial and dominion governments. I do not share the fear that has been expressed in certain quarters that the purpose of such a conference would be to determine what are the federal government's powers and what are the powers of the provincial governments. The purpose of the conference would be to study the question in order to clear up this matter which for many years has caused confusion in the minds of the people at large.

The adoption of this resolution will be a step toward the recognition by others and the confirmation by us of our complete autonomy and independence. For this reason I hope all provinces will be represented at the conference. We are informed that they have all indicated their intention to attend, although in the letter from the premier of Quebec I cannot find an indication of a formal decision by that government to do so. I hope that the government of Quebec will share in the common task, not only in words but in acts, in order to try to achieve for Canada a more complete autonomy. The premier of Quebec has often proclaimed himself as the defender of the provincial legislatures. I am not saying that he has no reason for thus proclaiming himself, although there have been times when we have had difficulty in trying to find the measure of his sincerity. But if the premier is the defender of the provincial legislatures, as he contends he is, I hope he will not become an enemy of the autonomy of Canada. I hope the premier of Quebec will not become an obstacle in this march forward by Canada toward complete autonomy and independence. Let us hope that this conference will bring about the result that we expect. By the adoption of this resolution we will have made a great advance toward complete independence for our country.

I want to conclude by reading a few sentences from an article which appeared under the pen of Mr. J. A. Hume in the issue of Saturday Night of the 23rd of August. The excerpt reads:

> It will not be an easy task to work out these problems, but an adjustment of the constitution to changed conditions is necessary. No longer should Canada accept this strait-jacket which cramps her progress along the pathway toward adult nationhood.

I should also like to quote from the remarks of a former member of the house, made in a debate on a constitutional problem in 1935. He said:

> Let us remember that the written constitution of Canada should be the servant and not the master of the people.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion now before the house. There is one deficiency in it to which attention has already been called during the course of the debate, and concerning which I shall offer an amendment. When I reach the point at which I wish to move that amendment I shall take a moment or two to express to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the hope that he will see fit to accept it in the spirit in which it is offered, and the hope that it may be passed by the house.

At the outset I should like to say a few words about the main argument advanced by the members of the Progressive Conservative and Social Credit groups against the passing of the resolution. Hon. members of the house who are opposed to the resolution have made it quite clear that they are not opposed to Canada having within her own borders the power to amend her own constitution. Their objection—and it has been stated quite clearly—is simply that they do not like to proceed with even a part of this important job without consulting the provinces. The only part of the task that is now before us relates to finding a way of amending the constitution with respect to matters that are exclusively federal. It is against doing that without consulting the provinces that the opponents of the measure have been speaking.

I take it it is recognized by all groups in the house that it is the part of wisdom and good statesmanship to consult the provinces, whether or not we are legally required to do so, so far as dominion-provincial or exclusively provincial matters are concerned. The opponents of the resolution want the principle of consultation to be applied, not only to finding a way of dealing with things that are dominion-provincial or exclusively provincial, but also to the finding of a way to amend the constitution with respect to things that are solely federal.

In the course of a debate that has taken as long as this, naturally a good many things have been said that some of us feel do not carry much weight; but I think it should be said in all fairness that a number of members, including the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), have stated fairly well the argument behind their point. I felt that perhaps the high point of the speech made by the leader of the opposition yesterday came when he talked in terms of doing our best to achieve and maintain all possible good will between the federal government and the various provincial governments. In my view that argument has to be considered and has to be met head on.

In reply to it I feel, despite the plausibility of the argument about consulting the provinces—before we take even the first step—so as to have their good will, that it would be a very dangerous precedent for us to adopt at the present time. Let me put it this way. We have amended our constitution a number of times since 1867, but there is something pivotal about this occasion. We are not just amending the constitution in some one respect; we are amending the constitution with respect to the means of amending it. Whatever course is followed now will be a precedent that will be studied in years to come as we study today the things the fathers of confederation did prior to 1867.

Thus far the precedents are fairly clear. It is pretty hard to gainsay the argument advanced yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he pointed out that, out of eleven occasions on which the British North America Act had been amended thus far, in only three of those cases was consultation had with the provinces. In one case it was with only the four provinces that were affected, and in the other two cases it was with all of the then existing provinces. Therefore I suggest that if on this occasion we were to decide to consult the provinces we would be breaking the main trend of the precedents of the last eighty-two years, and we would be establishing a new precedent which, as I have already said, would be dangerous. Why do I say that? I say it because it really is quite clear what would happen if we consulted the provinces: it would convey the idea that we would be getting from them the right to amend the constitution as to federal matters. The very first time we sought to use that power the provinces would say: We gave you that power; consult us as to how you are going to use it.

I submit further that even the courts would have to pay same attention to the procedure followed in adopting the new class 1 of section 91. It seemed to me last night, when the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) was speaking, that he emphasized the first point I have just made. I think I am paraphrasing him faithfully when I say that he said he was prepared to go the whole way with his leader provided his leader would give him the assurance that there would not be any further amendments of the British North America Act without consulting the provinces. I feel that is exactly what would happen. If we were to consult the provinces about the first step we would have them saying afterwards: You got the right from us; consult us before you use that right to make any further changes in the British North America Act.

There is no doubt that in a country as large and as far-flung as Canada it is extremely important that certain rights and privileges in local areas should be recognized. I think it is that fact, rather than theory, that has led to the desirability of the federal structure. But surely the main aim of Canada should be to further the purpose of the fathers of confederation to fuse this far-flung land into one great nation. I think it is highly important at this pivotal stage in our constitutional history that we make it clear that we are acting as a nation and not as a group of ten separate units. I believe it has been read before, possibly in the course of this debate, but I should like to put on the record again a paragraph from a speech made by the Hon. C. H. Cahan before the Canadian Club of Toronto, on September 15, 1937. As hon. members are aware, Mr. Cahan was secretary of state in the last Conservative government, and this is what he had to say:

As a young man I knew personally, and I might also say intimately, several of the leading statesmen then living, who had been engaged in promoting and drafting the British North America Act. I knew their views as publicly and privately expressed, and I am confident that, as founders of the Canadian confederation and framers of that act, they undoubtedly believed that they were establishing on the northern half of this continent a new Canadian nation. With that end in view, they sought to reserve to the national parliament such extensive legislative powers as would prove adequate to meet all national responsibilities which might thereafter, from time to time, arise, and thus avoid those deplorable conditions which had then so recently resulted in civil war in the neighbouring republic.

I point out to hon. gentlemen to my right that this excellent statement of the aims of the fathers of confederation, this fine statement of something which is in the hearts and minds of all Canadians, was made by the secretary of state of the Conservative government under the late Viscount Bennett. So it seems to me that when hon. members ask what is the urgency of the resolution now before us, the answer should be not that there is haste in the matter of time, this week rather than next week or next month, but rather that the priority should be clear, and that we should deal with matters which are exclusively federal before we hold the dominion-provincial conference, and we should thus make it clear that we do not need to go to the separate provinces as the source of a power which was given by the British North America Act to Canada as one great nation.

Then may I also call as a witness in this story another outstanding Conservative figure in this country, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. I am referring now to remarks he made when this matter of amending the constitution was under discussion in 1925. At that time a motion was before the house dealing with the desirability of Canada securing power to amend the constitution. I am reading this quotation from "Constitutional Issues in Canada, 1900-1931" by Robert MacGregor Dawson. The speeches of several members, delivered on February 18 and 19, 1925, are put together; and they appear in Hansard for that year at pages 297 to 300 and 335 to 337. Mr. Meighen's speech was one of those quoted, and I quote from it as follows:

In the first place, I do not think it would be a matter of convenience that the whole of the provinces of Canada should in every case consent. If we are going to put those obstacles in front of our course, we are going to add to the difficulties, if any did exist, that we have had in the past.

Now listen to these words by Mr. Meighen:

We have amended the British North America Act many times upon address of this house without speaking to the provinces at all. Why? Because the amendments we asked for did not affect in any way minority rights, did not affect in the remotest way provincial rights, were amendments in which the provinces or minorities were not concerned at all. It would be cumbersome indeed in such cases to be compelled to pass first from province to province and obtain universal approval.

I would submit that the words used by Mr. Meighen on that occasion apply exactly to what we are doing at the present time. The amendment we now seek does not affect in any way minority rights, does not affect in the remotest way provincial rights, and it is an amendment in which the provinces or minorities are not concerned at all. For that reason it seems to me we clearly have the right to pass this amendment; and, as I have been trying to indicate, I feel that we should do it in this way rather than make the mistake of reversing the trend of the last eighty-two years, which has been pretty clear, namely, that in federal matters the federal parliament has the authority and does not have to go to the provinces for consent to exercise that authority. Perhaps I have said it too often already, but I repeat that if now we went to them to ask for that authority we would be establishing a precedent that would bedevil constitutional matters for years to come.

In connection with this whole matter I like very much the approach taken by Dr. Maurice Ollivier in his oft-quoted book, "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty". I refer particularly to the chapters headed "Statute or Contract" and "History of Amendments" and "Methods of Amendment," but I am going to quote specifically a few paragraphs. First I refer to pages 348 and 349, where Dr. Ollivier is dealing with the question whether the British North America Act is a contract or a statute, and also with the basic question whether the federal parliament has the right on its own to ask for amendments, without consulting the provinces. Here is what he says at page 348:

A confederation is a union of independent and sovereign states, bound together by a contract or treaty imposing the observance of certain conditions depending on the unanimous consent of the contracting parties who remain free to secede from the union. The states forming part of a confederation retain their political independence and are, from the point of view of international law, recognized as sovereign states. The best example of such a confederation is the confederation of the Rhine created by Napoleon in 1805.

It is easy to see, then, why Canada is not a confederation. In effect the provinces have been fused or federated so as to form a juridical state enjoying all the privileges and rights appertaining to a sovereign and autonomous nation.

Then a little later, developing another argument, Dr. Ollivier quotes the late Norman Rogers, who at the time was a professor. I am now referring to pages 349 and 350:

It is evident that difficulties arise the moment we attempt to identify the parties to the alleged treaty or agreement of confederation. Is the dominion a party? It did not exist prior to the passing of the British North America Act. Are Ontario and Quebec parties to the agreement? They were not distinct provinces during the confederation negotiations, although it is true that Upper and Lower Canada were accorded a separate status at the Quebec and London conferences. Are Prince Edward Island and British Columbia parties to the contract? They made no agreement with the other provinces but only with the dominion. Are Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan to be regarded as parties to the agreement? They were created by acts of the dominion parliament.

"The crown did not authorize the delegates at the Quebec conference to conclude a binding agreement among themselves. All that was sanctioned by the dispatch to Lord Mulgrave was a conference on the subject of a union of the provinces of British North America."

Now I go to another quotation on pages 351 and 352, which arises from the argument Dr. Ollivier has been putting forward:

The preamble of the British North America Act furnishes proof that it does not proceed from a pact. It commences thus: "Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united," and not "considering that the provinces have concluded a treaty, a convention," or even "drawn up a project of convention with a view to federal union."

From these two propositions—

That is, the fact that the provinces are not sovereign states, as is the case in a confederation, and the fact that it is difficult to pick out the parties to the alleged pact.

—showing that we are not a confederation and that our constitution is not a contract, the third naturally follows, that, except in the very special cases which I will cite later—

That is, in matters having to do with provincial jurisdiction.

—the consent of all the provinces to an amendment to the constitution is not required.

The author goes on to quote many people on that phase of the matter, until finally he reaches the exciting part of his chapter beginning at page 359. At that point he is recounting the statements of witnesses who appeared before the special committee which dealt with this matter in 1935, and the witness being considered at the moment was Professor Kennedy of the university of Toronto.

[Mr. Knowles.]

I quote again from Dr. Ollivier's book at page 359:

Mr. Kennedy goes much further and says: "I do not think there is the slightest necessity in law for the parliament of Canada to consult the provinces in the process. It may be very good politics, but politics is not the law."

The committee had reached consideration of matters of provincial concern. The next paragraph in that book reads as follows:

It is unnecessary to add that this last declaration by the learned professor caused a sensation in the committee as may be realized from the discussion which immediately followed and which is here reproduced without change:

"Mr. Cowan: Parliament could not do anything with the powers which come under section 92.

"The Witness: I think the parliament of Canada can present any address to the parliament of the United Kingdom.

"Hon. Mr. Lapointe: You would not advise this parliament to do so.

"The Witness: I do not think it would be a very wise thing.

So, Dr. Ollivier develops the argument that there is no question but that the federal parliament has the right, on its own initiative, to request Westminster to amend the British North America Act with respect to any matter. It is made clear, however, that everyone recognizes it is the part of wisdom or the part of good politics, which means the part of good statesmanship, that when you come to matters that are of provincial concern you consult the provinces before such changes are made. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that should be our approach to the problem at this pivotal point in Canadian constitutional history. We should do what this resolution calls for, so far as clearly and exclusively federal matters are concerned, without consulting the provinces, so that we may avoid the pitfall of having the provinces say the federal government derives its powers to do so from the provinces. That position would bedevil us from this time forward. As wise statesmen, however, we should consult the provinces with regard to matters that are dominion-provincial or exclusively provincial before any change is made in the constitution in respect to matters of that kind.

In passing, I should like to answer one or two of the arguments that have been advanced. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) said, as recorded at page 848 of Hansard, that no one was opposed to this country having the right to amend its own constitution, but he was opposed to unlimited power being reposed in this parliament. I am sure that when the hon. member reflects on the significance of this statement he will realize it was a bit far-fetched. The motion does not ask for unlimited power to be given to this parliament. The power is precisely limited by the terms of the motion that is now before us. The member for Eglinton went on to say that the line of demarcation between matters that are federal and matters that are provincial is not clear. It seemed to me that the Prime Minister had already answered that argument. He said the terms of this new section were deliberately left without too specific a definition, so they would not interfere with the other lines that are already drawn in the British North America Act. This means that the courts will protect the federal and provincial parliaments from encroaching upon each other.

Yesterday the leader of the opposition said he did not like what we were doing because it did not provide a procedure. As a matter of fact, what we are doing is following the procedure that has been followed through the years. We are seeking an amendment of the British North America Act in the same way it has always been secured, by an address to His Majesty the King. This amendment deals exclusively with federal matters, and it is being sought in the manner in which amendments dealing with exclusively federal matters have always been attained, namely, through an address to His Majesty by the federal parliament without consulting the provinces. The leader of the opposition also said that, if this amendment were passed, the federal government might amend the constitution in such a way as to interfere with the taxing powers of the provinces. Section 91, subsection 3, says that the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation is within the federal power. This government, therefore, already has unlimited power in that field, so that the possibility of a future amendment making it wider is out of the question.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there is another facet to this question about which we should be thinking, and that is the double-barrelled interest Canadian people have in this question. There is no doubt in my mind that there is interest in it of a sentimental nature. I use that word "sentimental" in its best sense. Canadians do look forward to the day when, as a nation within the British commonwealth, we will nevertheless have all the marks of national sovereignty. On that sentimental basis, I do believe Canadians want us to get on with this job of bringing the control of our constitution to our own country.

But the people of Canada are interested in this question of amending the British North America Act for reasons other than sentiment. They are interested for substantial reasons as well. I believe all hon. members will agree with me that in recent years many requests for legislative changes, particularly in the social security field, have been met with the reply that this or that cannot be done until the British North America Act has been amended. We are told that a proper contributory social security scheme cannot be put into effect until Canada can amend the British North America Act. It is because of these statements of a substantial nature that Canadians are keenly interested in securing amendment of the British North America Act. I want to say to the Prime Minister that unless the government speeds up a bit and does not act so much like the turtle to which the Liberal party has been compared in an interesting editorial in the current issue of Maclean's magazine, Canadians will not thank the Liberal party very much. Unless this government follows these constitutional amendments with an early use of the power to amend our own constitution to solve the social security problem, Canadians will not be grateful to the Liberal party for having taken these merely sentimental steps.

At times, when I have listened to the debate and heard the Liberals waxing eloquent about the steps that are being taken, and have heard the members of the Conservative party get all worked up about it, I have said to myself, "What are you quarrelling about?" The real issue is the next step. The real issue is the use of the power to amend the British North America Act so that this parliament will have the right to initiate over-all social security legislation as well as other things that the Canadian people want and have been promised time after time.

At the outset of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I indicated it was my intention to move an amendment. I shall do so in a moment or two, but before I do I should like to say that during the course of this debate my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), referred to the desirability and the necessity of entrenching the clause that has to do with the limiting of the life of a parliament. As a matter of fact, if the leader of the opposition had not moved an amendment which was so worded that no subamendment could be moved, my leader would have moved yesterday the amendment I am going to present to the house now. I believe everyone will agree—I am sure the Prime Minister will agree—that of equal importance with the necessity of entrenching minority rights, such as the use of the English and French languages, is the necessity of entrenching the right of all the people of Canada to be assured that a parliament will never run more than five years. Furthermore, the people should be assured that there will be a session every year.

British North America Act

At the moment, those two matters are guaranteed by specific sections in the British North America Act. For example, the section which deals with the matter to which I referred latterly, section 20, reads as follows:

> There shall be a session of the parliament of Canada once at least in every year, so that twelve months shall not intervene between the last sitting of the parliament in one session and its first sitting in the next session.

Section 50 is the one that deals with the limitation upon the life of a parliament or, more specifically, upon the life of a House of Commons. Section 50 of the British North America Act reads as follows:

> Every House of Commons shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the house (subject to be sooner dissolved by the governor general), and no longer.

I submit, and urge as strongly as I can, that those two clauses should be entrenched beyond any possibility of amendment. I feel sure that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will agree that that should be done. They deal with the most sacred relationships between the government and parliament, and between parliament and the people. Those are matters that are exclusively federal. If they were left amendable by this parliament, they could be changed at any time by a majority vote; and to make such a change would be breaking faith with the people of the country. This is not just a theoretical or hypothetical question. As my leader pointed out yesterday, it has been done twice by provincial governments, exercising the same unlimited power that they have under their constitutions. The two examples were the provincial government of Ontario and the provincial government of Saskatchewan, both of which during the war years presented to their legislatures the necessary motion to extend the life of those legislatures. My leader reminds me that in both instances they were Liberal governments.

This matter can be taken care of easily by the insertion of a few words in the clause which is in the motion of the Prime Minister that is now before the house. The clause as he has worded it, and as I understand it, is fairly clear in what it seeks to do. It says—and with him I am in agreement one hundred per cent—that we should have the right to amend things that are exclusively federal but that we should entrench certain matters which obviously we should not have the right to amend. In the Prime Minister's wording of the resolution he has named two sets of things or, shall I say, three things that obviously we should not have the right to amend: powers assigned to the legislatures, matters relating to education, and matters relating to the use of the English and the French language. I submit that in the same category as those things which obviously we should not have the power to amend goes this question of there having to be a session of parliament at least once each year and there having to be an election at least once in every five years. In fact, I regard these guarantees as two of democracy's most important bulwarks. Therefore I offer an amendment to take care of this matter, seconded by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). I move as follows:

> That the resolution be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the word "language," in the fourth last line thereof, the following words:
> "or as regards the requirement of section twenty of this act that there shall be a session of the parliament of Canada at least once each year, or as regards the requirement of section fifty of this act that no House of Commons shall continue for more than five years."

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

Mr. Fleming: How does the hon. member propose to prevent parliament, by a majority of one, from in future passing a simple address asking the Westminster parliament to amend section 20, to which he refers?

Mr. Knowles: There again we have the argument which we have been through a good many times. You must rely at some point on the good sense, the wisdom and the good statesmanship of the people who are sent here. We now have the power, by a simple majority vote, to pass an address to His Majesty to make any change. But there are some things that we simply would not change. Part of my argument today was, by referring to Dr. Ollivier's book, to show how the authorities have dealt with this matter; they have taken the position that we have the power, but that there are some things which, though legal, it is not the part of wisdom or statesmanship to do, and which are simply not done. My contention is that putting this in the same category in which we put minority rights is the best legal protection we can give it; and by giving it that kind of protection and by making it as difficult to change as possible, we make it even more the part of wisdom and good statesmanship not to touch it.

Before I go further, just so that it will not be too far apart on the record, I should like to read the entire section as it would read with my amendment put into it. If my amendment carries, as I hope it will, the new section 1 of section 91 of the British North America Act will then read as follows:

> 1. The amendment from time to time of the constitution of Canada, except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces, or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other constitutional act granted or secured to the legislature or the government of a province, or to any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or the French language, or as regards the requirement of section twenty of this act that there shall be a session of the parliament of Canada at least once each year, or as regards the requirement of section fifty of this act that no House of Commons shall continue for more than five years.

I deeply appreciate the attention the Prime Minister has given to the whole of this debate, and particularly the attention he has given to my remarks this afternoon. I hope that he will consider this amendment favourably. If I may say so in public, one thing about the Prime Minister that has appealed to us is the fact that on several occasions he has shown himself to be big enough to accept suggestions that came from the opposite side of the house. That is good statesmanship and good politics too. We get enough of the other attitude, of course; that is, of suggestions being thrown out simply because they come from the other party. I am sure the Prime Minister feels as I have indicated about this matter. He knows how significant is this date in Canadian history. He realizes that this amendment touches an important point. I am sure he will agree with me that it ought to be entrenched as much as the other points in his motion, and I hope that he will agree to its being done.

If he would like to have this wording looked at by the law officers of the crown, and have the amendment slightly reworded in some respects so that it will meet any points the legal experts might raise, I should be glad to agree to any change in its wording. In other words, I am appealing to the Prime Minister to look upon this proposal in the spirit in which it is offered, and to agree with me that some way should be found in which this house can afford this desirable protection to two matters fundamental to our Canadian democracy.

(Translation):

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to allow our country to amend its constitution without having to apply to a foreign parliament.

Unquestionably, this step has long been looked upon with favour by the country at large. It is hardly logical that a country like ours, whose part in world affairs is so important, should still have to go through a process so out of keeping with its status as a great democratic state.

It should be remembered, however, that the constitution of a country is the very basis of its nationhood; it is the document from which all statutes spring, not only those of the federal and provincial authorities but all laws applicable to the citizens of the country. In short, our constitution is the foundation of the Canadian nation. Therefore, parliament should be very cautious in bringing about any changes, especially as far as the allocation of amending powers to the various parties is concerned. In 1867, our country's population numbered only three and a half million inhabitants, of various races, creeds and cultures. If it has now developed into a strong and united country it is largely due to the foresight and political astuteness of the fathers of confederation.

It is only natural that a young country like ours, so rich in resources, should have developed beyond the expectations of these great statesmen. The time has now come to seek the power to amend the constitution ourselves, with a view to rendering it less rigid and more adequate.

All those who wish to see Canada take her proper place in the world as an autonomous and sovereign state are delighted to have this opportunity of providing the country with a new constitution, or rather of making it possible for Canada to amend her constitution with a view to rendering it more adequate and more practical.

The very fact, however, that we are a confederation makes it imperative that we should act with the utmost caution. To my mind, such caution is lacking in the procedure by which the government suggests to bring about this historic change.

As a matter of fact, a school of thought has always maintained, both here and abroad, that the British North America Act is a pact and not only a piece of legislation enacted by the parliament at Westminster. It is therefore contended that our constitution can be amended only after consultation with the contracting parties, that is to say with the various Canadian provinces.

The view that the B.N.A. Act is a compact or agreement between the provinces was expressed by the mover of the act in the House of Lords, Lord Carnarvon. He stated, in effect:

(Text):

The Quebec resolutions, with some slight changes, form the basis of a measure that I have now the honour to submit to parliament. To those resolutions all the British provinces in North America were, as I have said, consenting parties, and the measure founded upon them must be accepted as a treaty of union.

(Translation):

And Mr. Adderley, colonial secretary, stated in the House of Commons:

(Text):

If again, federation has in this case specially been a matter of most delicate treaty and compact between the provinces . . . it is clearly necessary that there should be a third party ab extra to give sanction to the treaty made between them.

(Translation):

This opinion held by English statesmen at the time of confederation was reiterated not only by Conservative leaders in this country but even by the Liberal party's French-Canadian luminaries, the predecessors of the right hon. Prime Minister, such as the hon. Honoré Mercier, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, the hon. P. J. A. Cardin and others.

The Hon. Honoré Mercier stated:

There were provinces before there was a dominion and it is from them that the latter derived its powers. They are sovereign within the limits of their jurisdiction and any infringement upon this sovereignty is a violation of the federal pact.

In 1906, Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated the following:

Confederation is a compact made originally by four provinces, but adhered to by all the nine provinces who have entered it, and I submit to the judgment of this house and to the best consideration of its members, that this compact should not be lightly altered. It should be altered only for adequate cause, and after the provinces themselves have had an opportunity to pass judgment on the same.

And the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe stated in 1937:

The British North America Act is the result of long and difficult dealings and finally of a compromise to which the provinces have adhered through their official and qualified representatives. Therefore, it is a legal agreement in due form and freely ratified. It then follows that the "qualified authority" to bring changes to our national constitution are the provinces whose good will has made the alliance possible and whose unanimous good will is indispensable to any amendment which may be decided.

I am surprised that the Prime Minister should break that Liberal tradition and I am also astonished that the French-Canadian members who support the government should disown the theories expounded by their great leaders. However, even though the government does not admit the theory that a pact was made, I cannot understand why it is unwilling to consult the provinces before a resolution of such paramount importance is passed.

Besides, the Prime Minister knows that the people of his province desire such a consultation. He has admitted himself having made, during the last election campaign, the following promise:

It is our intention, after the election, to consult the provincial governments with a view to working out a method, which will be satisfactory to all Canadians, of amending the constitution in Canada.

I do not know what caused him to change his mind in so short a time! It is claimed that there is no point in consulting the provinces because the last dominion-provincial conferences came to naught. However, the government did call such a conference at the end of this session. It must be admitted that, under the circumstances, the government's position is not logical, to say the least.

The government claims that in taking this step it is not jeopardizing minority rights nor the educational provisions of the British North America Act.

Nevertheless, it again sets as a precedent that our constitution can be amended simply by a joint address of both houses to the imperial parliament without consultation with the provinces.

It is true that the resolution which is now before us contains a clause whereby the government indicates its intention to refrain from amending section 133 at this time. However, the government is setting a precedent, thus greatly endangering the rights of minorities.

As I said, the government is upholding a theory diametrically opposed to that expounded by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, the Hon. L. A. Taschereau, and all champions of traditional Liberalism in Quebec.

This theory is contrary to the very principles of confederation. I doubt very much indeed that the representatives of the province of Quebec would have agreed to confederation had they not obtained a formal guarantee that the provisions of section 133 would not be thrust aside in such a summary fashion. One of the greatest difficulties in interpreting the British North America Act lies in the very interpretation of the various responsibilities of federal and provincial governments. There is the stumbling block of the whole system. The act of 1867 defines of course certain powers as falling within the federal jurisdiction, and certain others within the provincial jurisdiction. But there are several taxation fields to which the provinces as well as the federal authority claim certain rights.

If, up to now, federal-provincial relations have been strained and have brought about so much controversy, it is because matters of joint concern were involved.

I doubt whether the government's way of proceeding in that connection will ever solve the problem. The central administration should not be the one to decide what matters come within its jurisdiction. The provincial authorities may have different opinions on the subject and it is only through consultation with them that we can examine the various opinions put forth and reach an agreement that will be in the interest of the country as a whole. The government's action constitutes another step towards centralization which endangers national unity.

Canada is a confederation. Our people are satisfied with that mode of administration. I sincerely believe it is the duty of the federal parliament to strengthen the constitution and not weaken it. I feel that, in acting as they do, with this resolution, the government are undermining the very foundations of confederation.

I therefore deem it my duty to vote against the motion.

Mr. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): Will the hon. member for Three Rivers permit a question?

Mr. Balcer: Certainly.

Mr. Lesage: In his speech, the hon. member stated that the fathers of confederation considered the British North America Act as a pact that could not be altered without the unanimous assent of the contracting parties. How does he explain that twice, in 1871 and 1875, the fathers of confederation, without consulting the provinces, sought and obtained from London amendments to the constitution in matters pertaining solely to the dominion government?

Mr. Balcer: The fathers of confederation happened to be the representatives of the provinces as they existed at the time union was effected. That is why I believe that they represented the provinces, and if they altered the constitution, at that time they amended confederation.

There is no doubt but that the fathers of confederation may have changed their minds before reaching a final draft, but I believe that when they met they did so as representatives of the provinces and came together as such.

Mr. Lesage: Does the hon. member hold that in 1871 Sir George Etienne Cartier, as a member of the House of Commons, represented the province of Quebec more than I represent it now?

Mr. Auguste Maltais (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to speak for the first time in this house, you will allow me to congratulate you on your appointment to the office you now hold. From what I have seen in the past few weeks I am sure traditions of justice and fairness will continue to flourish in this house.

(Text):

I rise at this time because I feel it is my duty to state the reasons why I am going to vote for the resolution. I am going to vote for the resolution for three reasons which I shall try to explain to the house. According to the debate and discussion that have taken place so far it would appear that the feeling of hon. members is unanimous as far as the principle of the resolution is concerned. The main difference seems to be as to the procedure which has been suggested by this government to carry out the terms of the resolution.

I have listened to the speeches of hon. members of the opposition during this debate and have come to the conclusion that no concrete suggestions have been offered in connection with this resolution apart from the suggestion that there should be consultation with the provinces. Well, the government has consulted the provinces on this matter, and I would even go farther and say that they have consulted the people of the provinces. That was the main issue during the last election, and I know in my own riding it was the main issue.

The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) has stated that the premiers of the provinces should be consulted, but let me tell the hon. member that in my own riding the representative of the premier of Quebec, who claims to be the champion of minority rights, fought against me. Since I attended school, I have followed the discussions that have taken place in connection with this and similar matters. I have here a book containing the proceedings of the dominion-provincial conference of 1945. It has been said over and over again that it is most important that the premiers should be consulted on this matter, but I should like to quote to the house an excerpt from this report of the proceedings of that dominion-provincial conference. I should like to refer to the reason given by the premier of Quebec for leaving or breaking up, if I may use my own words, that conference. I quote:

> The Prime Minister of Quebec, for reasons already stated many times at this meeting—

At this point I ask the hon. member for Three Rivers to pay attention.

> —owing to the pressure of business, has been obliged to leave for his office in Quebec City.

Is the constitution that important as to permit a premier to give up by sidetracking the issue?

The constitution is the thing which permits me to sit in the house, it is the thing that permitted me to be elected as the representative of my constituents, but that was considered to be not as important as certain provincial problems. I am not completely convinced of the sincerity of those words.

Let us go a step further and consider the question of minority rights. Right in the body of this resolution the minority groups are given a guarantee which they did not have before. We have heard many technical arguments put forth in an effort to convince us that the constitution should be looked upon as a treaty or pact between the provinces. That may be so. Other views have also been expressed that it might be a statute or a law. Let us assume that twenty-five or fifty years from now the Liberal party is not in power and somebody else comes along and takes the attitude that our constitution is a statute. In the body of the resolution there is a further guarantee of minority rights to that contained in the British North America Act. Feeling my responsibility as a member of this house, and having been elected by the people, I must say that the mandate I have received tells me to support the resolution within the scope of what it means.

I have a further important reason for voting for the resolution, which also has its origin in the people. I receive many letters every day from people asking me about certain projects and the power of the federal government or the provincial government to do certain things in different fields. In the house the other day there was a discussion about whether irrigation in Saskatchewan was a provincial or federal responsibility. After eighty-two years I believe that the people of Canada are most anxious that we should take an inventory and try to proceed along definite lines in order to further the progress of the country. One hears many discussions in public places which do not seem to have any end. The matter of the welfare of the people is discussed and whether the passing of legislation is handicapped in any way by the lack of clarity as to the jurisdiction of the federal and provincial governments. Day after day and year after year we keep looking into the past to find out who is going to enact welfare legislation, and the people of the country suffer in the meantime because of discussions that do not lead us anywhere.

I believe some members raised a question about the urgency displayed in bringing this matter to an end. The reason for doing so springs right from the needs of the people. On June 27 the people gave the government a green light to proceed. They expressed their confidence in the government and are prepared to leave the means to it provided minority rights are guaranteed. In the resolution, consideration has been given as far as minority rights are concerned, a distinction is made between provincial and federal matters, and matters which may not belong wholly to provincial or to federal jurisdiction. Therefore I am justified, by the mandate I received on the 27th of June, in voting for the resolution.

[Mr. Maltais.]

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I did not think I would be called on until eight o'clock, but I wish to say something about the resolution moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) yesterday. The two old parties put me in mind of two old soldiers. They never die. The two old parties are being reconstructed and re-created in Canada today. Those who have gone before would not know them, if we are to believe what has been said in the past.

I wish to refer to a few matters which have come up in connection with the resolution. I have not had any opportunity to prepare. I had to attend the funeral in Toronto yesterday of a former mayor of that city, Mr. C. Alfred Maguire, and I did not arrive in Ottawa until midnight last night. Yesterday was the first day that I have been absent during this session, but he was my vice-chairman and I had to pay tribute to him and was glad to do so.

As to the resolution, I wish to say that I regret very much that the government has brought this question before the house and the country at the present time. As I said the other day, these matters are largely secondary. It is true that the resolution has been moved, and as far as the amendment is concerned I think it changes the resolution very little. The amendment only amends a minor part of the resolution, and the resolution and the amendment might be taken together so that members will not be speaking three or four times, lengthening the business of the house accordingly. In my view the amendment does not touch the matter at all. It simply provides for the submission to the house a little later on of some of the principles of the resolution. I regret very much that the house and the country have been troubled with amendments to the British North America Act at the present time.

As you know, the atomic bomb has been in the minds and hearts of the people of Canada a great deal lately. There are many other matters that are vastly more important than the resolution. You merely have to read together the resolution of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the other matters which have been proposed in the house and which were put before the country during the last election. For that reason I may say I am very much surprised at the electors of Canada. We are supposed to be the high court of parliament, and the resolution seems to ignore one of the cardinal principles of our constitution, namely, that the courts are subservient to the legislatures. That is one of the cardinal principles of the British constitution.

As much of the common law of England as was applicable to our circumstances was introduced into Canada by the Constitutional Act, 1791, at the time that act was passed. There are many matters which have been introduced into the debate on this measure. The other day the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) placed what I considered a totally irrelevant construction on the speeches which have been made so far regarding appeals to the privy council. He referred to the Canadian navy and all that kind of thing. He forgot that in 1938, before the second war, I pointed out in the house that on the Pacific, to which he was referring, we had an unprotected coast line from Puget sound to the southern Queen Charlotte islands, and had no defence there at all. He brought in the Canadian navy and the Canadian army and what they had done in the war, but I fail to see what that has to do with appeals to the privy council. It is far from it, and I think his reference was very much out of place.

I should like to say to him now that what has provided protection for our unprotected Pacific coast line from time immemorial, in the days of Louis XIV, Philip of Spain, the days of Napoleon, and twice in our generation, is the British fleet. Where would we have been in the Pacific but for the protection of the British fleet, and also in the Atlantic and everywhere else?

Coming to the resolution and the amendment, they must be taken together, though the amendment deals with only a very small part of the question. However, I am sure the house does not want two or three debates, but that we want to come to grips with this whole question. Is this the time for us to proceed in the method and manner indicated, or is it not? The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) the other evening was referring to the method and manner of this procedure when he asked for amendments to this act. As my friend the premier of Quebec has said, there is no doubt at all that the contract was made. How did this resolution come about? It is founded on the Statute of Westminster, to which I was referring the other day and which has done nothing but disrupt the empire. It is a mischievous statute, which has wrecked our empire. It brought about the situation in India and in South Africa, and has divided our own country. I am a great admirer of the people of Quebec, and have been ever since I entered this house. When I was mayor of Toronto I received the commander of the French army, the Marshal of France, at the city hall, and paid tribute to the 65,000 soldiers from our city who had gone to France and Flanders in the first war to aid the French people. I referred to the awful privations, the suffering, the trials and tribulations of the glorious French nation, which would live throughout history as an example of the most sublime patriotism.

My leader has taken a very fair stand in regard to this whole question. We had the Statute of Westminster. Then we had a royal commission appointed to consider amendments to the British North America Act, commonly known as the Rowell-Sirois commission. Its final report was very unfair to the two central provinces. If any changes are made in the British North America Act I am afraid it will be a bad thing. I am sorry that such matters as public health and education were not made matters of concurrent jurisdiction at the time of confederation, along with agriculture and other things. That was one of the mistakes made at that time. They do not have these provincial legislatures in Great Britain, where they have forty-seven million people. There they operate with local governments in charge of the municipalities, and it was a mistake in Canada to have two municipal systems, one within the other, created by section 92 of the British North America Act.

The members of this cabinet seem very much divided on this question. I regret that it has been brought forward at the present time because, as I say, it is only secondary. What is the reason for the rush to put this over now, in such a haphazard manner, without consulting the provinces, without consulting the bar association, and without giving anyone a chance to look into it? Apparently this house is supposed to adopt this resolution in the twinkling of an eye. I fail to see the reason for all the hurry. I believe the people should vote on it. Why should they not be given a chance to express an opinion on these changes? Many of the younger members have come up from the municipalities, where in many cases you cannot spend any money without a vote of the people. Here we are going to work and destroying the whole basis of confederation. It is by this resolution being made a political football, and you can call it nothing else. It is being kicked back and forth before the people of the provinces, and I believe the government was ill-advised in its attempt to rush this thing through in this way. As I have often said, the two old parties in this house are like old soldiers; they never die. In fact nowadays they are being re-created, with the hallelujah chorus; but the party opposite are forsaking the beliefs of their founders, and forgetting all about their former ideals, political and economic. Mr. Fielding and Sir Wilfrid Laurier would not approve of this. They were in favour of preferential trade in 1897 which, as I said the other day, has been hung on the sour apple tree like John Brown's body. My hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) said that was a good place for it. Well, that would be a good place to hang some of the principles he has been espousing in the Montreal district. It seems to me the Liberal party has a different policy and platform for each city and province.

We on this side of the house have followed the same principles ever since the days of Sir John A. Macdonald. This resolution is founded upon provincialism and other things than strict legal principles. In my opinion it is political. Here is what Sir John A. Macdonald said in 1844, one hundred and five years ago:

> I, therefore, need scarcely state my firm belief that the prosperity of Canada depends upon its permanent connections with the mother country—

He was the founder of this party, and just before confederation formed the Liberal Conservative party. He went on to say:

> —and that I shall resist to the utmost any attempt, from whatever quarter it may come, which may tend to weaken that union.
> Forty-seven years afterwards, speaking in the same city in February, 1891, in his last campaign—he was again elected—Sir John re-affirmed the same doctrine of our close relationship with the mother country. He said:
> "For a century and a half this country has grown and flourished under the protecting aegis of the British crown. Under the broad folds of the union jack, we enjoy the most ample liberty, we govern ourselves as we please, and at the same time we participate in the advantages which flow with association of the mightiest empire the world has ever seen. As for myself, my course is clear. A British subject I was born and a British subject I will die."
> In the course of half a century, Sir John never failed to make the stand of Canada known, in its relation to the rest of the empire.

This resolution is founded upon status, sovereignty and autonomy. During the course of the debate we have heard the word "colonialism". This new word has been introduced by the hon. Minister of Justice. Shortly, he will be the right honourable. Now, what is the answer to the hon. gentleman opposite? The answer is simply that a million men went overseas in the first war. They did not go over there under their own status to fight; nor were they worried about autonomy or sovereignty. They did not even consider whether they were being called "colonials". Those men went to fight for an ideal. One million went from the dominions and 130,000 of them fell on the field of battle. They are buried in Flanders. Sixty-five thousand from Toronto went to fight in France, and many are buried there. Those men went to fight for an ideal, the greatest ideal free people ever had. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition was one of them. He was wounded. There were many good Liberals and good Conservatives among those men. Many men went from the province of Quebec and they were good soldiers. I know something about them and I saw the work they did.

Those men were all satisfied with the status of Canada, and its autonomy and sovereignty. They were not called "colonials" because they were not colonials. They were representing the dominions. The same thing happened in the second war, only the number of men was increased fivefold.

The cabinet seems to be divided on this question. There are some in favour of one policy and some in favour of another. One has to link many things together into this resolution to see why this thing has happened, and why it is being rushed in the House of Commons. This measure received very little consideration in the other place where a lot of this work seems to start. I believe the government is badly advised in moving this resolution forward, because it is only a secondary matter. One has to link up a lot of other things. There is a motion to be introduced between eight and nine o'clock tonight to replace the word "Dominion" by "Canada", and another concerning the office of the governor general. There are also motions concerning the flag and the national anthem. Those men who went overseas in the first and second wars thought the flag was good enough for them. The Union Jack covered the bodies of many of the soldiers from our city who were buried in Flanders and in France.

I wish to speak for only a few minutes about this matter. I am opposed to the whole policy of the government. As the Prime Minister said yesterday, it is true that the first ten or eleven amendments made to the British North America Act were largely federal amendments. They were technical descriptions of many kinds and were not opposed by the provinces. Do not forget, though, that we had to wait until the Statute of Westminster was passed—this empire-wrecking statute, as I call it. I have with me a textbook, Wheare on the Statute of Westminster. This decision of the privy council was based on this statute. In my opinion, the privy council is not a court at all, but is a judicial committee of one of the houses of parliament of the United Kingdom. The only reason it meets in London is that that is the centre of the empire and is the place most convenient to the representatives of the dominions and the colonies.

London is the centre of the world. There is no reason why the privy council should not meet in the other dominions as well.

During the course of the last four parliaments I opposed and moved a six months hoist to private bills introduced by members of the C.C.F. which were related to this matter. There is a division of opinion on this matter amongst the members of the cabinet. The Postmaster General made a speech which is reported in the Montreal Star of September 20. I read this paper when I have an opportunity, but I have not had much chance to read even the Toronto papers recently. The Postmaster General was at a banquet and he attacked the premier of Quebec for his empty speeches.

The other day the premier of Quebec, Hon. Mr. Duplessis, made a speech in which he challenged the federal government on this matter. He was opening a bridge at St. Eustache and, in the course of his speech, he insisted on the province being consulted. The only way in which the parliament of the United Kingdom can be asked to pass a statute to amend the British North America Act is by an address of both houses of parliament. In this textbook to which I have referred, it is said that some of the provinces made a contract at the time of confederation. There is no doubt about that at all; there was a contract. There would be no confederation at all, there would be no British North America Act at all, had it not been for that contract which was broad enough to bring together the sectional interests of representatives who were four thousand miles apart. I say that when there is a division in the cabinet on this matter, the government should proceed cautiously.

At the opening of the bridge, the premier of Quebec and Mr. Sauve made speeches. The press report of that event reads as follows:

> In his speech, Premier Duplessis recalled the memory of the St. Eustache patriots who, in 1837, fought to obtain responsible government, also events of 1841, when Quebec and Ontario were united, only to fail to come to reach accord on major national questions. In 1867, he said, representatives of the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, had agreed on a confederative pact, handing over to a central government powers to deal with national problems, but retaining unto themselves the full authority to deal with matters pertaining to the protection of their rights and privileges. It was a pact, a contract, not a statute as suggested by Prime Minister St. Laurent, a pact that could not be changed without the full consent of the parties concerned, signatories to the pact.

Now that is correct; there is no doubt about that. Here is the Liberal party in this twentieth century, and what are they going to do? They are going to prevent a British subject from making an appeal to the foot of the throne, or what we call making an appeal of grace.

My friend the Postmaster General made a speech the other day and I shall read the newspaper report of that speech:

> The minister then attacked the speech made by Premier Maurice Duplessis of Quebec last Saturday at the Richelieu Club convention here. The premier had expressed fear that changes in the constitution as advocated by the Liberals at Ottawa, might reduce provincial autonomy and the rights and privileges of the French-Canadian people of Quebec.
> "Mr. Duplessis is fond of grandiloquent speeches which may sound agreeable to the ear but are empty of meaning when examined by an impartial observer," said Mr. Rinfret. "He likes to talk about provincial autonomy and the right of the people of Quebec to govern themselves without interference from Ottawa centralizers. He often pretends that the racial and religious traditions of French Canadians are endangered by the Liberal policies as applied at Ottawa. This is really taking too much advantage of the good faith of the Quebec people.
> Mr. Duplessis claims that nothing should be done by the Ottawa government to reduce the rights of the province to the full employment of its revenue derived from taxation," the minister continued.

That is right today too because in Ontario objection has been raised to the division of the school taxes between the two schools. It will be remembered that a different system was illegally foisted on Saskatchewan and on the prairie provinces accordingly. The article continues:

> "In fact, previous Quebec governments had to administer the province on a revenue of $50 million while the Duplessis administration finds means to collect $200 million in taxes. In addition, it obtains millions of dollars for education and social welfare from Ottawa" . . .
> Mr. Rinfret said that articles 91 and 92 of the constitution delimit the respective taxation powers of the central government and the provinces. They also determine the over-all taxation powers of the dominion government whenever these powers are not specified. The constitution, too, makes it clear that Ottawa can impose direct taxes. Mr. Duplessis knows that perfectly well. But whenever he is faced with reality, his only answer and argument is "autonomy."

He belittles Duplessis. The article continues:

> The minister scoffed at the Duplessis argument that the rights and privileges in respect of the Roman Catholic traditions and the French language in Quebec were endangered by the Ottawa plan—

And so they are, because as I say, the privy council had been the protector of minorities. They protected minorities by giving fair decisions. Do not forget that majorities have rights as well as minorities; and that is where he is wrong. The article continues:

> "Mr. Duplessis seems to think," he remarked, "that the French Canadians elected by the people to represent them at Ottawa cease to be good French Canadians or sound religious men. This would be preposterous if it were not so clearly ridiculous. The Quebec representatives in the Senate and the House of Commons have no lessons to learn from Mr.

Duplessis in that respect. They are just as zealous for the preservation of the Catholic and French traditions of the French-speaking element of Canada as is the Quebec premier. A proof of that is their desire to see the rights of the French language extended to all Canada,"—

Mark those words, "all Canada".

—"instead of being restricted by article 133 of the constitution to Quebec and Ottawa. This will be done when the constitution is amended."

There were 878,000 French Canadians in the other provinces of Canada who would welcome additional rights for their native language. All other measures contained in the speech from the throne, Mr. Rinfret said, were designed to extend the national rights of all Canadians, thus furthering national unity so desirable for the welfare of the Canadian people.

In a parting shot at Premier Duplessis, Mr. Rinfret said that while the Liberal governments at Ottawa were adopting or extending social welfare benefits, the National Union government in this province was destroying the good effects of school legislation adopted when the Godbout government was in power, including free text books, and was thus imposing an additional burden on Quebec families. He suggested that the premier be less generous with empty speeches and more generous in his treatment of the Quebec people.

I have a few minutes more until six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to conclude my remarks before then. I do not believe in this way of doing business in the twentieth century because you have to include all these other subjects. There is one up for discussion at eight o'clock tonight. There are those other things to be read into the statute. They have to be read into this resolution. There is no doubt about that. I have read the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He reads it into the statute but he amends only a minor clause. You have got to take them together in order to understand it. I regret that this resolution has been brought forward at this time when we are faced with other more important questions, and when we as an empire stand at the parting of the ways. Look at what Russia is doing today. She knows all about the atomic bomb. She has it now. May I say to the hon. gentlemen who come from British Columbia that, at the instance of the United States, Russia was invited to come into the Pacific ten days before Japan fell. Mr. Churchill denied that he ever consented to it.

In the Pacific today we have no protection whatever. I was referring to it as our back door. Everybody knows that a burglar does not go to the front door. He goes to the back door. That is what I call the Pacific. We should have some protection. We have lost the protection of the British fleet. As I say, a burglar does not go to the front door. He usually goes to the back door and finds out whether the people are out, as hon. members know. As I say, I see no reason for bringing these questions forward at the present time. It causes division in the country. It leads nowhere. We all know about being colonials. The biggest colonials I know of in the house are the Little Englanders, the little people who do not know where their protection came from for four centuries, in the days of Philip of Spain, Louis XIV, Napoleon, and twice in our generation. Where would we in Quebec and Ontario be but for that? The enemy were up the St. Lawrence. They came right up as far as Riviere du Loup. I saw the cove in which the submarine had been. A secret session of this house was held accordingly. Are these not more important matters than the one with which we are dealing? As a humble member of the House of Commons in all sincerity I ask: Is this what we call twentieth century Liberalism or not? If it is, I think twentieth century Liberalism is going back one hundred years, because the resolution goes back that far. It destroys preferential trade for ever. I remember what the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) said the other day, and I made some remarks accordingly. It destroys all that, and that is what saved the dominion in the thirties. The Liberal party started it in 1897, through Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding. It was never finally carried out until the Ottawa agreements made a great success of it. Otherwise you would have had unemployment ten times worse than in the United States. For all the defence we get in this country we are depending on the United States today, if we are attacked on the Pacific or at any other place. We have been surrendering too much political, military, economic and financial responsibility. Now by this resolution we surrender judicial supremacy. To whom? To the people of the United States. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) said the other night, we are getting into this bill the principle of the judicial system of the United States. We have been warned of the great dangers that confront this country at the present time. I referred to this matter the other day, and to what we owe to nationalism, to the mother country, the flag, the anthem and all that kind of thing. These things have got to be read into the resolution. If you ask me, it is weakening and destroying the very basis on which this country joined confederation. I referred to the two old political parties being like two old soldiers; they never die. But they are changing the basis established by the founders of confederation. I referred to the principles of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Mr. Fielding and others. Is that Liberalism today? No. You have not the Liberalism of the past. The Liberalism of the past believed in these doctrines, political, economic and financial. They believed in a real future for the country. You are going back on all those principles. True, it was not carried out in the thirties, but the authors of it were the gentlemen on the Liberal benches.

I do not doubt the sincerity of my hon. friends to the left. I do not question it at all. I have always been one of the hon. members who believed that anybody could have an opinion in this House of Commons. In 1923 I described the House of Commons as a large club where every hon. member could express his opinion freely, impartially and fairly as long as he had the floor. I have never denied the right to my opponents to have whatever opinions they wished for themselves. I do not think it could ever be charged against me that I showed a lack of ordinary Christian charity toward my political opponents. I have a great admiration for the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I have always had it. I knew him before he became a member of this house. At that time he was a leading member of the bar and one of the leading public men of Quebec. He used to visit our city as a member of the bar association. While I realize that, I believe that he is now raising secondary questions that could be left over, including all these that are wrapped up in it. He is causing a division in his own party on the subject from coast to coast. All these questions should be left for a better day until we know whether we are secure or not from the enemy which is now at the gates. He is going to be at the gates very shortly if he is not there already. We have to consider the questions in the manner which has been indicated. When hon. members look at the questions more fully they will find out that what I say is correct.

I should like to quote one or two paragraphs from what the Dean of Chichester said about the mind of man at the present time, because I believe there are greater issues than this for the government to deal with, namely, to be sure that we have security for all our citizens. This is what the dean said:

> Why do wars happen? It is sometimes thought that it is the possession of armaments, or of large armaments, that is the ultimate cause of war. It used to be said that it was the armament makers—"the merchants of death"—who brought war about for their private profit. So people have proposed to eliminate war by reduction of armaments, or by complete disarmament. It is urged that all armaments—if armaments there be—should be under the control of the state and manufactured in state factories. But this is to confound symptoms with causes.
> It is not armaments that make wars, but the people who have control of the armaments. Wars are not caused by things but by the mind of man. The United States, Great Britain, France, Holland, Belgium, and Norway had greatly reduced their armaments after the first world war. Denmark had practically abolished armaments altogether. This did not save any of these countries. There was another country, populous and powerful, that was bending all its energies to the preparation for war, which was greatly encouraged in its preparations by the weakness of the peace-loving countries and their obvious unwillingness and unreadiness for war.
> The truth is that wars in modern times are caused by the emergence of a group of determined men who are able to rouse and mobilize within their nation a passionate desire to expand and dominate. They aim at indoctrinating their people with a conviction of superiority, an imposing idea that they are destined to rule the world, because of their great strength and particularly because they alone possess the true political philosophy for which the whole of mankind is waiting. The kindling idea, universal in its scope, and simple in its expression, plus the sense of destiny, are essential to the war machine. Men and women need a great cause, or what appears to be a great cause, if they are to be keyed up to endure the vast sacrifices that war, and preparation for war, demands.

The dean gives this picture of Oak Ridge, Tennessee, where they are making the atomic bomb. He says they are making it a peaceful scene but it is the manufacturing plant which was the birthplace of the atomic bomb which is going to destroy the world. This is his concluding paragraph:

> Fortunately the west can confront Russia with overwhelming strength in industry, munitions and manpower, and has established a lead in atomic research which will be immensely difficult for the Kremlin to overtake. It is our duty to do all in our power to preserve that lead.
> Yet, assuming that a balance of power in our favour is maintained, the question remains, "Is this sufficient to enable the world to settle down? Is it conceivable that there can really be a secure and contented world while Russia holds half Europe in thrall? Can genuine peace be established while Europe is half slave and half free? Again, is not more than Europe involved? If Asia, besides China and including India, Burma and the East Indies, come under the Russian grip can there be world recovery?" These are questions for the second stage of the conflict in which we are all at present engaged. When retreat is forced on Russia somewhere, the scene may brighten everywhere.
> The main point to remember about the atomic bomb is that its use may depend on the gradual restoration of a more civilized world. Humanity may have to face the question—which is the less unendurable, a vast physical destruction, or the surrender of the whole of mankind to a diabolical tyranny such as the world has never seen?

This shows the importance of other matters. Are we secure, or are we not? All these matters which we have been discussing today are purely secondary. This is a political bill. It is not an economic or a legal bill. For that reason I wish to protest against it. If this is Liberalism of the twentieth century I should like to know, because they are upsetting the basic doctrines of the founders of the Liberal party, which was a great party.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on Friday evening we were debating a motion for the second reading of certain divorce bills. Many hon. members stated at that time that they were unfamiliar with the subject being discussed and therefore were not in position to pass an opinion. Feeling somewhat guilty in that respect I took the trouble on Saturday morning to go to the Senate clerk who was in charge of the petitions and the evidence in connection with these divorce bills and I saw the different petitions and the evidence that had been presented.

For the benefit of hon. members who are not familiar with the procedure perhaps I may be pardoned if I take a moment or two to outline it. First a petition must be made to the Senate by the person who feels himself or herself wronged. Then service is made upon the defendant or the respondent who may enter a defence if he so wishes. Then the case is called to be heard by the Senate and while the respondent has the right to appear, generally he does not. Counsel may be engaged by either side and a few members of the Senate sit as a court to hear the evidence offered by the petitioner praying that he or she be granted a divorce.

After the Senate court has heard the evidence it is sent over to this house where it is examined by the appropriate clerk and hon. members may inspect the evidence if they wish. I may say that the evidence is much the same in all cases and is not very elevating to those who may wish to read it. Then a bill is presented here and we are asked to decide upon it.

During the course of my remarks on Friday evening I gave it as my opinion that we should not be trying to make divorce easier. As I said, there has been a tendency in all countries, especially since the first world war, in that direction. That tendency had been in evidence for a long time before that because of the materialistic trend of the age. But it has been growing ever since the first world war.

I remember over twenty-five years ago hearing the late G. K. Chesterton, the famous English writer, speak during a debate on divorce at the Oxford Union. This was some years before he joined the Catholic church but even at that time he held the Catholic view on marriage and divorce. At that time he said that if divorce went on as it was the university of Oxford would soon have to give new degrees or the degrees they were giving would not mean the same thing as they had in the past. He said that if things went on a B.A. would come to mean "bachelor again" and an M.A. would mean "married again".

The frequency of divorce in England has increased greatly during the last 25 years, and the full Christian view of the indissolubility and the sacramental nature of marriage is not held as firmly as it was before. I think hon. members who have taken part in this debate are on sound ground when they object to parliament hearing these divorce cases. It is simply carrying out the theory, with which I cannot agree, that this is the high court of parliament and that parliament can do anything except change a man into a woman or a woman into a man. If parliament cannot do that then it has been trying to do the next best thing. It has been trying to declare that a husband is no longer a husband and a wife is no longer a wife. Personally I would not want to support any bill granting a divorce because I believe that "what God has joined together, no man shall put asunder."

When the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) was speaking I think he indicated that he did not realize the technical nature of the subject he was dealing with. He said that in the province of Quebec there was a way of dissolving a marriage; that it was not called a divorce but rather an annulment. He said that in any event there was a separation and the result was the same. I think I know what my hon. friend was trying to say.

Since no hon. member from Quebec rose to contradict him I feel that his statement should be contradicted for the purposes of the record. The teaching of the Catholic church in Quebec is the same as the teaching of the Catholic church in any country. When the hon. member said that in Quebec there was a way of dissolving a marriage, he was completely wrong. There is no way of dissolving a marriage. Once a marriage, always a marriage. He said that it was not called a divorce, but an annulment. Here it is necessary to make a careful distinction. The word "divorce" in popular parlance means to separate permanently; it is derived from the Latin word "divortium" which means to separate. However, in the English language it now is understood to mean a dissolution of marriage.

Annulment presupposes that there has been no marriage. All that the ecclesiastical court decides is that there never was a marriage. Many causes may exist to warrant the declaration that there has never been a marriage. As in the case of ordinary contracts, the court may say that there has never been a contract. I shall not enumerate all the causes that might induce an ecclesiastical court to say that there has never been a marriage, but I might cite an extreme case. If a man married his grandmother it could be held that that was not a marriage because it would have been forbidden in the first place.

"In any event", the hon. member said, "there had been a separation and the result was the same." There are several errors in that one sentence. The hon. member said that there was a separation. If he meant to say that in divorce there is a separation, he did not say enough. What we understand by divorce is a complete dissolution where the parties are allowed by parliament, or by the civil courts in the provinces other than Quebec and Newfoundland, to go their own way and to go through another form of marriage if they wish.

If the hon. member meant that by annulment there is a separation and the result is the same as in divorce, then he was completely wrong. A separation permits the parties to come together again when the bad feelings that may have existed between them have subsided. They may again take up their matrimonial duties and live as man and wife. In annulment according to Catholic teaching, the parties are perfectly free to marry, but in divorce, they may not marry again. It will be seen that this subject has many technical difficulties, and, as hon. members have indicated, it is probably the most unsuitable subject for parliament to deal with. Most hon. members have not the time or inclination to study the facts, and I feel sure there are many members who do not feel any disposition to deal with this subject at all. I felt that I should make these observations. As far as I am concerned I propose to vote against the bill.

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to prolong this debate. The other evening certain statements were made regarding the right of parliament to grant divorces. Like all Canadians I am against income tax, like most Canadians I am against sin and like most Roman Catholics I am against divorce. In the province of Nova Scotia we have a divorce law which we took over from England, together with other laws, at the time that the English, the Scots and the Irish came to our province. We had to adopt all the common law and statute law that was good for the circumstances of our province at that time. Among the laws that we took over was the divorce law. For years in the province of Nova Scotia there was one judge assigned to hearing divorce cases, and he could hear divorce cases only in the city of Halifax. It became more or less of a farce for those who had to inhabit the courthouse, which is the place where the judges of the court of appeal and the judges of the supreme court reside.

A few years ago a couple of us went to the government of Nova Scotia and then to certain of the law officers of Canada. We asked for a change in the method of hearing divorces. Today we have in the province of Nova Scotia a law enacted three years ago, I believe, whereby divorces are tried on circuit, and every judge must hear and determine divorce cases if they come before him. It was said at the time that greater opportunities would be afforded to those who wanted to procure divorces if they could get them in their own circuits. I took the ground at that time—and the bases of the ground have been fulfilled so far as I am concerned —that when people who were getting divorces on certain grounds came to the court at Halifax very few spectators were allowed and the people from their immediate neighbourhoods would not know that they were such scoundrels. I refer to collusion and that kind of thing.

The result is that today in the province of Nova Scotia there are less divorces proportionately than there were previously, and they are also published today. I had to try divorce cases. I took it as a responsibility. I think that the parliament of Canada is a judiciary so far as the hearing of divorces is concerned. Every person who sits in the house and votes on a divorce bill is acting as a judge. He is acting as a judge because he is giving a decision on a purely legal matter but he is giving a decision on evidence that is not heard before this house. It is the same situation when a judge hears a case, and after hearing certain evidence finds that it is necessary to send out a commission to take the evidence of persons who are unable to come to court, who may be in foreign countries, or something of that kind.

It is true that one cannot say that a witness whose evidence is heard on commission is either a liar or a truthful man, but a judge can make certain inferences. That is the position members of the House of Commons are in at the present time. The evidence is heard in the Senate. I understand it is heard and adjudged by lawyers who know the value of evidence and the causes for divorce. I suppose it is all right to use the word "Senate" in this case, Mr. Speaker, because this is a different question. We are really discussing a bill that comes from the Senate. I know the rule about using the expression, "the other place", but in discussing this particular bill hon. members might have some idea that I was referring to something else if I said "the other place".

That is the situation as I understand it. I spoke a moment ago about taking over the law on divorce from England in the province of Nova Scotia, and I presume Ontario was in the same category.

An hon. Member: Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

Mr. Carroll: There are well established laws regarding the causes for divorce. In our province there are two, adultery and mental or physical cruelty. I think perhaps the same is true here.

Mr. Croll: No cruelty.

Mr. Carroll: No cruelty. I know, however, what the law is in that regard in the province of Nova Scotia. The great difficulty in the present set-up, in the way of parliament granting divorces, is that, as I believe, the Senate often does not make sufficient investigation of these cases so far as collusion is concerned. I sat in the house from 1911 to 1921. I took a keen interest in the matter of divorce, and as a matter of fact in all private bills. On two occasions I was instrumental, along with others who supported my argument, in refusing to assent to divorce bills that came from the Senate. In one case there was not sufficient evidence, and in the other there was clear evidence of collusion. Because they were acting as representatives of the people and as judges in passing these laws, hon. members should take the time, and sufficient interest, in these bills to see that no bill passes the house unless there is ample evidence to lay a foundation for divorce.

I am making this statement because of certain things that were said the other night on these bills, and perhaps certain things that have been said tonight. I am a firm adherent to the laws on marriage of the Roman Catholic church so far as they have been promulgated generally up to the present time, and I hope for all time to come, but I do not think that justifies me in voting against a divorce bill when it comes to this house because I am a Roman Catholic or because I adhere strictly to the laws of that church on the question of divorce.

We are all against murder; we are all against all kinds of immorality, if you want to put it that way. But if the house should take the attitude that we are not supposed to legislate on murder or any other kind of immorality, then we would be placing ourselves in a most precarious position as legislators and as judges. I have looked at the evidence in most of these cases. Even if I had not, I know how these matters are carried on in the other place, the other good place. I have been following divorces in parliament over the years, not only during the time I was here. I have closely followed the procedure by which this parliament deals with divorces and passes these bills, and I feel quite sure that it is a rare thing for any bill to come to this house from the other place without an abundance of evidence, which would be amply sufficient for these people to get divorces if they went to the courts of the country.

I am making this explanation, Mr. Speaker, because there may be people in this house, as there are people outside it, who think that because a man follows the doctrine of marriage as promulgated through the ages by the Roman Catholic church he is in conscience bound to vote against divorces. As hon. members know, I occupied a position on the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, and I did not think I would be fulfilling the obligations of my oath if I did not decide divorce cases; for one of the reasons I was appointed was to take the responsibility for deciding any case that might be brought before me, divorce or otherwise. And I consider myself in exactly the same position tonight as when I held a responsible position in the judiciary of Nova Scotia.

The suggestion has been advanced that the province of Quebec should establish its own divorce courts. That is a matter for the legislature of Quebec. No person within or without this house has the right to say that Quebec should establish its own divorce courts.

Mr. Gagnon: We do not want divorce courts in Quebec.

Mr. Carroll: I know that, but suggestions have been advanced in this house ever since it has had to deal with divorces that as a matter of faith Quebec should establish its own divorce courts. I say that is their business, not ours. I remember reading some time ago that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), when Minister of Justice, went exhaustively into the matter of divorce in the province of Quebec, in an endeavour to find some method of removing divorces from the parliament of Canada. That seems very difficult to do. Personally I should like to see divorce divorced from this parliament, but the question is how to deal with people in Quebec who want divorces to which under our laws they are entitled.

I am sorry to have taken up so much time, Mr. Speaker. It was more as a personal matter, in order to explain my position, that I rose this evening.

Mr. A. C. Stewart (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has covered a great deal of the ground I intended to cover, and I compliment him upon the honesty of his remarks to this house. However, in view of the statements that have been made by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), I feel that a number of new members of this house may not be as familiar as they should be with these petitions to the Senate, and I propose to cover that matter briefly.

I regret that the hon. member for Nanaimo is not in his seat, though I presume he will be here later. In his remarks on this subject the hon. member said, at page 799 of Hansard:

> I feel humiliated that I should have sat here during the whole of the last parliament of Canada and on various occasions have seen twenty, thirty, forty or fifty bills asking for the relief of various individuals presented before this House of Commons. I wondered why these bills were presented to the House of Commons. I did not have the wisdom nor the courage to stand up on my feet and to ask why it is necessary that this type of bill should be passed through the House of Commons without any questions being asked. . . .
> I may be to blame. It may be that I should have examined more carefully the bills which had been passed in the other place.

The hon. member is a man of mature age, and admits having sat in this house for four years before this session. He had a galaxy of brilliant lawyers sitting on his side of the house, including our friend whom I may call "Buttercup", who would have been quite prepared to advise the hon. member on the law of divorce. In the army we would have called that very poor staff work, to say the least. In any event it seems to me the procedure here is quite clear. Any member of this house may attend when these bills are going through the Senate. As a matter of fact I understand that a member of the Conservative party in the Senate is in charge of that committee. The evidence is given under oath. The remarks of the hon. member for Nanaimo disturbed some of the younger members from Saskatchewan who are not familiar with the practice in this house. Not only may they go there, but I understand that members of the Senate will permit them to ask any question they wish, or to put such questions through a member of the committee. Some of the members of that Senate committee are skilled lawyers, who cross-examine the witnesses. They are put through the same type of cross-examination they would probably face in court. In addition to that, when these bills come to this house they are sent to the committee on private bills, together with a copy of the evidence taken under oath. In that committee hon. members have the right to re-cross-examine the witnesses if they wish, or to question any bill relating to divorce that may come before this house. So the fault lies with the hon. member for Nanaimo if he was disturbed and perturbed as a result of not being familiar with the procedure of this house, or following the facetious remarks of the hon. member for Yorkton.

As far as the law of divorce is concerned, we in the west always proceeded by petition until certain cases were decided by the courts of appeal of Alberta and Manitoba. Those cases were Board v. Board and Walker v. Walker, the citations for which I have before me, in which it was found that the provincial courts had jurisdiction in divorce matters. In Ontario, which perhaps sets a precedent for this house, they passed a divorce act in 1930 which was passed in turn by the federal government, under which the law of England concerning the dissolution and annulment of marriage, as that law existed on the 15th day of July, 1870, in so far as it could be made to apply in the province of Ontario was declared to be in force in that province. In Nova Scotia the law of divorce is different from that of the western provinces or Ontario. In Nova Scotia, under a statute of that province, a divorce may be obtained not only on the ground of adultery but on the ground of cruelty. So the laws concerning divorce are not uniform in our provinces.

Some question was raised about Newfoundland. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) has spoken twice on this matter but has not yet given us the law of Newfoundland with respect to divorce. Up to the time Newfoundland joined confederation, they had no law of divorce. In the consolidated statutes of Newfoundland, page 53, section 17, there is the following:

> Our said governor is not to assent in our name to any bill of any of the classes hereinafter specified, that is to say:
> 1. Any bill for divorce of persons joined together in holy matrimony.

In the white book that has been filed in this house relating to Newfoundland, being the report and documents relating to the negotiations for the union of Newfoundland with Canada, the memorandum of agreement entered into on December 11, 1948, between Canada and Newfoundland, contains in clause 7 the following:

> The constitution of Newfoundland as it existed immediately prior to the sixteenth day of February, 1934, is revived at the date of union and shall, subject to these terms and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, continue as the constitution of the province of Newfoundland from and after the date of union, until altered under the authority of the said acts.

Clause 9 of that memorandum reads as follows:

> The constitution of the executive authority of Newfoundland as it existed immediately prior to the sixteenth day of February, 1934, shall, subject to these terms and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, continue as the constitution of the executive authority of the province of Newfoundland from and after the date of union, until altered under the authority of the said acts.

Clause 18, subsection 1, contains a further provision bringing in the British North America Act. I believe the whole effect of the statute of Newfoundland is that the people of Newfoundland can now do the same as the people of the province of Quebec, namely, petition the Senate for a divorce. As a matter of fact, one petition has already been received and filed. The required sixty days will expire on the 13th of November. It is a petition for divorce from the province of Newfoundland, but out of deference to the petitioning parties I shall not do as the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) did, and mention the names of the petitioners.

In so far as the whole matter is concerned, I am not going to enter into a discussion of the pros and cons of divorce. Those of us who practise law, and there are many in this house, know something about this matter. I agree with many of the statements made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I seldom agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and did not wholly agree with the statements he made about divorce. After all, people are human. I believe the average practising lawyer who has handled divorce cases found that, during the last war when the boys were overseas for five years and away from their families, roughly seventy per cent of the divorces that went through the legal offices of the dominion were in connection with service people. It was an unfortunate circumstance, but it was there.

Many of us know of families whose lives have been unbearable because the parents cannot agree. The effect on the children has to be considered when the parents are disputing all the time or carrying on in an immoral manner with other people. That is not conducive to a happy family life. I agree with the previous speaker, who served as a judge. When I hear members say in this house that they cannot vote for a divorce bill, I wonder about the position of the judges of our high courts in those provinces of the dominion in which divorces are granted. Many of those judges are Roman Catholics, and some are Anglicans. I have talked with them and I know they do not feel any happier than the hon. members here about granting divorces. In view of the law of this land as it existed when the British North America Act was put into effect, however, they feel that they have to carry out their duty as citizens of this country. All of us, whether we are Protestants or Roman Catholics, have the greatest respect for the religion of the other party. I do not think there is any member from Saskatchewan on the Liberal side of this house who is going to suggest that the province of Quebec or the province of Newfoundland should establish their own divorce courts. That is a matter for the people of those provinces to decide in the future.

In this country, the only machinery provided for the people of those provinces to obtain a divorce is the machinery provided in the act of union, namely, the British North America Act, which gives to the parliament of Canada sole jurisdiction in the matter of matrimonial causes. It is our duty as members of this house to carry out the provisions of that section. In view of those circumstances, I believe more or less a tempest in a teapot has been raised for the poor chairman of that committee. I understand this matter has been raised continually in this house, but the divorces have been granted, regardless of what party was in power. This is the only procedure by which those parties can get a divorce. We do not want a political football made out of a matter of divorce or religion, so I do not believe any government is going to take it upon its shoulders to change these provisions. If the private members of this house are sincere they may arrive at some different method. Personally, I do not know what that method is and I do not attempt to suggest it.

In view of the discussion that has taken place and in view of the fact there are a number of new members in this house whom the remarks of the member for Nanaimo might have upset, I thought it was my duty to make this explanation.

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll), I noted that he was careful to underline the fact that he was speaking as a private member. I am speaking also as a private member. This is not a matter for politics. In view of the exalted position which the hon. member, before he entered this house, held as a member of the judiciary of the province of Nova Scotia, in view of the position he holds as a member of this house, and in view of the fact he has declared he is a Roman Catholic, but is nevertheless going to vote in favour of these divorce bills, I think it is my duty also as a Roman Catholic and a member from the province of Quebec, which is opposed to divorce, to make this statement. I am opposed to divorce, not only because my religion is opposed to it, but because it is the scourge of our modern society. I believe the less divorce we have the better.

I should like to point out to the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, who has preceded me in this debate, that he said that in voting on these bills he was acting in the same capacity as he acted when he was a judge in the province of Nova Scotia. I would beg leave, Mr. Speaker, to point out there is a great difference between the judicial and the legal process. Acting as a judge, the hon. member had to apply the laws as they were. When he took his oath of office he pledged himself to apply those laws. As a legislator, he does not have to pass laws to which he is opposed in his conscience. I should like to underline that point.

I should like to take issue with the comparison the member made when he talked about murder. It was his idea that if we decided in this house not to legislate about murder, because we are opposed to murder, we would find ourselves in a very difficult situation. May I point out that when we legislate concerning murder we legislate against murder in order to repress it or punish those who commit murder. When we legislate in favour of divorce bills, or when we vote in favour of divorce bills, we are not voting against divorce but are aiding and abetting divorce. For those reasons, I shall vote against these bills.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I was a member of the committee on private bills for a great many years. This system of granting divorces was considered then and is all wrong. I may say that, in my opinion, the state should look after the wives and children who are affected by desertion. Divorce follows every great war. Away back in 1801, the same problem was faced by the Addington administration. So did the two Pitts. They had to face the same thing. It is one of the consequences of war. In the church to which I belong, as a humble member—and that is the Church of England—the belief is this: those whom God has joined together, let no man put asunder. That was the principle of the conference in England for a great many years. Recently a committee appointed by the houses of parliament has been considering this whole problem. It is presided over by the Right Hon. and Right Rev. William Charles Wand, Bishop of London, who succeeded Bishop Winnington-Ingram. Over there, because of the way the country has been devastated by war, and for other reasons, the desire seems to be to extend the principle of divorce to include a great many things that were not considered before as grounds for it; one of these is desertion, and there are seven or eight other matters connected with it. I was glad to hear some of the members here tonight speak on this matter, including the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, who has just recently entered this house again. He is a learned man, formerly the Hon. Mr. Justice Carroll. I welcome the hon. member and congratulate him on his address tonight. He was formerly a member of the house and did a great deal of valuable work in connection with the national fuel supply. May I also congratulate the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart), who is a bencher of the law society from Regina. It is a wonder to me that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is not one of the benchers because I look upon him as one of the best lawyers in the prairies.

Let me say this one thing further. In my humble opinion the state should do something to look after the wives and the children. Every state has people of this type. After every war it has these people and they are a direct charge on the municipality. I know that because I was head of a municipality. I know that they become a charge on the municipality not only for school purposes but for housing and many other matters like that. I believe that the time is coming when we should have some other system adopted by parliament for this work. When I was on that committee I noticed that we knew nothing about the bills. There is a principle of Roman law to the effect that marriage is a contract. The common law of England has been largely copied from Roman law. That has been the principle which has been adopted in this country also. It seems to me that we should provide a better system accordingly.

In connection with this matter I want to point out that there is in existence a registration system. While I admit that it cannot be so in the province of Quebec, there is a registration system operated by the provinces. For what? For deaths and marriages. They have a register with the town or village clerk to that effect. In a great many of the provinces that law regarding these matters might prevail also; but in Quebec I admit that there is a different principle involved. No one wants to change their law. Far from it. I would never try to change their law because I believe that the majority of the people are entitled to have their say themselves.

In conclusion, may I say that I think we should have a conference of the two houses of parliament, because it has been largely the prerogative of the Senate to hear and examine witnesses and all that sort of thing. I do not believe in the system. In the United States, after many wars, divorce is becoming a canker in almost every state. As I say, it follows largely as a result of wars. There is a registration system for deaths and marriages in existence in some of the provinces. I do not see why that system cannot be adopted. No doubt a different system would be required in the great province of Quebec. The archbishop who was investigating this question is travelling in the United States at the present time. He succeeded Bishop Winnington-Ingram, the great bishop of London, England. He is visiting the United States at the present moment and is going into all these questions. He recognizes that the divorce laws should be extended to include desertion, and I think there are five or six other matters connected with it, where the children and wives are left as a charge on the state.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Moved by Mr. Winkler, seconded by Mr. Applewhaite, that these bills be now referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Carried.

Some hon. members having risen in their places:

Mr. Church: There are enough members for a division.

Mr. McCann: It is too late.

Mr. Speaker: I put the motion and it was carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Carried on division.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. LaCroix: We want a vote.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house wish to have me put the motion?

Mr. Weir: No. It is carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I declared the motion carried and hon. members did not rise.

Mr. Knowles: This is not the principle. This is referring it to the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Probably hon. members did not hear what I said. I put the motion on second reading, which approved the principle of the bills, and the motion carried.

Mr. Weir: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Then I put the motion that the bills be referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. Weir: That is right.

Mr. Speaker: And that motion carried.

Mr. Weir: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: We are now on the next order of business.

Mr. Weir: That is right.

REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA ACT

SUBSTITUTION OF "CANADA" FOR "DOMINION OF CANADA", ETC.

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure) moved the second reading of Bill No. 14, respecting the revised statutes of Canada.

He said: This bill, Mr. Speaker, is to amend subsection 1 of section 5 of the act respecting the revised statutes of Canada which was adopted during the session of 1947-48. The amendment provides for the addition of the following words:

—and whenever in the said statutes or acts, or amendments thereto, the expression "Dominion of Canada" is used, there shall be substituted therefor the expression "Canada," or "Canadian" or "federal," respectively, or such other adequate word as the context requires.

The reason for this amendment is to be found in the fact that, since Canada has ceased to be a dominion and has become a sovereign state, the word "dominion" as applied to Canada has entirely lost its original meaning. The word "dominion" is a very old one, Mr. Speaker. A statute of Henry VIII, dating back to 1512, refers to "the dominion honours". In 1688 a new commission in Britain was issued to Governor Sir Edmond Andros including within "the dominion of New England both New York and the Jerseys." The word "dominion" was then plainly synonymous with colony, plantation and possession. It certainly cannot be said that New York at that time was not in the constitutional position of a colony, yet it was called a dominion.

In Webster's international dictionary we find that the word "dominion" is defined as:

That which is subject to sovereignty or control. Territory governed, or over which authority is exercised.

In Funk and Wagnalls dictionary we find the word "dominion" defined as:

Obedience, servitude, slavery, subjection, subjugation, submission.

I hold in my hand the Winston dictionary published in Toronto as late as 1945 and I find that the word "dominion" is defined as:

A territory or country with a high degree of local authority, but subject to the control of another government; as the Dominion of Canada.

In the British North America Act, section 3, it is stated:

The provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall form and be one dominion under the name of Canada.

Section 5 enacts that not the Dominion of Canada but Canada shall be divided into four provinces, namely, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. In section 4 appears the following: the name "Canada" and not "Dominion of Canada". It also says:

The name "Canada" shall be taken to mean "Canada," as constituted under this act.

The generic term "government of Canada" is to be found in sections 11, 12, 13, 16, 116, 118, 132, 142 and 145. The expression "parliament of Canada" not "parliament of the dominion of Canada" is to be found in sections 17, 18, 19, 20, 35, 40, 41, 47, 51, 52, 58, 90, 92, 94, 95, 100, 101, 105, 120, 130, 131, 132, 133, 136, 141 and 146.

Section 22 refers to chapter I of the Consolidated Statutes of Canada. The great seal of Canada is mentioned in sections 34, 35, and 38. House of Commons of Canada is referred to in sections 87, 101 and 128. Therefore I contend that the official name of our country is not and never has been "Dominion of Canada" as is generally believed but "Canada" only. The word "dominion" was used only for the purpose of stating the constitutional position. It was recognized in 1867 that the new constitution did not constitute Canada a sovereign state. It was to remain in the position of a colony with a certain degree of self-government and of dependence. It was then merely a matter of deciding what term should be used to describe that position and the term "dominion" was selected.

Our Conservative friends are silent tonight, but there were bursts of protest—

Mr. Green: The hon. member had better be careful what he says about us or we may say something about him.

Mr. Arsenault: I do not care what you say about me. I have a lot more to say about you than you have to say about me. Various whispers and clamours of "No, no, never" came from the Conservative side when this bill was introduced into the house and given first reading on October 6 last.

May I recall to hon. members, and more especially to the Conservative members of this house, that at the time of confederation Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Etienne Cartier, certainly by far two of the most outstanding Conservative leaders Canada has ever produced, shared these views. I quote from page 38 of the book "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty" by Maurice Ollivier:

Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Etienne Cartier were of the opinion:

1. That the name of the federation be that of Kingdom of Canada.
2. That the federation should have the rank of kingdom.

Some hon. Members: Nine o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

On motion of Mr. Arsenault the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for public and private bills having expired, the house will resume the business which was before it at six o'clock.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King praying that a measure be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act, 1867, relating to the amendment of the constitution of Canada.

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse): We must recognize that Canada has gone a long way toward full political maturity when the leaders of all the parties in this chamber agree on the advisability of the country having full control over its constitution. For the government party, the Liberal party, it is the logical sequence to its long stand on the question of full national autonomy. It is the ultimate of a long series of steps taken gradually to ensure or to manifest our complete sovereignty. It is one of the last milestones on our way from colonialism to nationhood. For the Conservatives, as I have no doubt their leader has been authorized to speak for his party, it is a new step that deserves due notice. It is, if not an entire reversal of attitude, at least an evolution in its approach to matters of an emancipative nature as far as our constitutional position is concerned. We are of course faced with an attempt to delay a measure long overdue but the objections are founded on a different basis than heretofore, and the principles invoked for the advisability of delaying this measure are not openly based on the traditional Conservative ground of imperial solidarity or fear of dissolution of commonwealth ties.

As to the C.C.F. party, its leader has been consistent with himself and with the views usually expressed by his supporters on that question. I must recognize that they have usually expressed the desire, which they seem to share with the Liberal party, of supporting all constitutional measures tending to bring about our complete emancipation and to eradicate anything which might permit some people to ignore or disregard our status as a sovereign nation. Therefore, sir, this debate, which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has heralded himself as one of the most significant since confederation, marks what I would like to consider as the dawn of a new era in Canadian politics, when all Canadians, no matter to which party they belong, have at last agreed on the necessity of thinking and acting first as Canadians and not in relation to their country's position in the commonwealth.

For too long Canada has been an orphan, so to speak, in the minds of many of its citizens. They have been at fault for diverse but regrettable reasons for too long a period. There were many Canadians whose ancestors came from the British isles who put the empire or Great Britain ahead of Canada in their hearts. For much too long a time also there have been many Canadians of French descent who have considered that their country ended at the limits of the province of Quebec. It has taken many years of patient preaching by nationally-minded Canadians of both racial groups to do away with that trend of thought. Today I think those who hold that obsolete and un-Canadian way of thinking are in the minority in both groups.

This resolution provides a way by which Canada may amend such parts of the British North America Act as concern those matters that come within federal jurisdiction. It does away with the possibility of anyone in this house tampering with the language and school rights already granted by the act of 1867. Its only effect is to put us in regard to our constitution in the same position as the provinces already are with regard to their constitutions, no more, no less.

I cannot see what danger there can be in this for the provinces and why they should be consulted except through their elected representatives in this house. This afternoon my colleague, the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage), asked a question of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) who had just completed his speech. The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet asked if it was not a fact that the first amendment to the constitution, which was made without consultation with the provinces, had been suggested by members of the then government who were the fathers of confederation. The hon. gentleman replied that that was so, but that because they were the fathers of confederation they represented directly the provinces. The fact is that they were acting as members of the Canadian parliament, just as we are. The present government is consulting the provinces through their elected representatives in this chamber.

I am of the opinion that we should go much farther than this resolution provides, that we should find ways by which Canada could enact a truly national constitution. Much has been said and agreed about the necessity of amending the constitution; little has been said about the necessity of proclaiming a truly Canadian constitution. I shall have more to say about this later on. I think the time has come to take the first step toward proclaiming a Canadian constitution, but I also think it will take time to accomplish that. In the meantime it is advisable that we should take the steps we are taking during the present session and set up a court of last appeal and assume the right already possessed by the provinces of amending the constitution in connection with such matters as are of our exclusive jurisdiction.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) rightly pointed out that, of the eleven amendments which had been made to the British North America Act, nine had to do only with federal matters and were made without any consultation with the provinces. The new procedure being proposed by the government would simply confirm what has been done in the past. It will provide a way of doing this which is more consistent with our national dignity.

As I said, it may take some time before Canadians may be able to agree on the terms of a constitution and in this regard I should like to refer to an article in a newspaper which I think all hon. members have seen. The headline reads:

> We will never yield on B.N.A. Act—Duplessis

If before any discussions have been had, if before any meeting has been officially convened, one of the parties to that meeting declares that he will not do anything, that he will not co-operate or collaborate, what results can we expect from the conference? How long will it be before Canadians can agree on a constitution? But it is interesting to read, not only the headline, but what is reported to have been said by the premier of Quebec. If I may be permitted to say so, this is nothing but an appeal to parochialism and prejudice. This statement distorts the facts because nothing of what is mentioned here has ever taken place nor have the bogeymen that are brought forward in this declaration ever existed. The article goes on to say:

> "This is not a matter between Duplessis and St. Laurent," the premier said. "It is a matter of life and death. This is the time to express our opinions."
> "It is not a question of separatism or fanaticism, it is simply a question of patriotism, well understood," the Quebec premier said.

In spite of what he said I cannot find one argument by the premier of Quebec to show what he is afraid of. He just goes on to talk of the revolt of 1837, and I read from the report:

> He told delegates that their ancestors had lived for years in a "state of semi-slavery, having nothing to say about their government, and the public moneys spent."

We have long passed that stage. There is no danger of anyone in any party or in any part of Canada wanting to put Quebec in that position. It is simply an effort to make a bogeyman out of nothing. It is simply an appeal to prejudice. The report continues:

> He said they fought to obtain the right to elect representatives, and described the 1837 rebellion, which led, "after many efforts," to the Act of Union in 1840, which united Ontario and Quebec into one province.

No one wants to bring about that condition again. There is no one in this country who is uttering a word against the liberties or the rights of Quebec. They are not even mentioned. On the contrary, special effort is made in the resolution to exclude any rights which have been granted to the provinces. The resolution reads:

> The amendment from time to time of the constitution of Canada, except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces—

There is no mention at all in the resolution of anything that would have any effect on provincial rights. This is simply taking a step in the right direction which, as I said a moment ago, I hope will be followed by the proclamation of a truly national constitution. There is nothing in this resolution that menaces the liberties or autonomy of the province of Quebec. According to this report the premier went on to say:

"The authors of confederation decided upon a government based on the rights of the pioneer provinces . . . They decided on many autonomous governments instead of a central government which would have assimilated the (provincial) legislatures."

No one wants to assimilate the legislatures. The fact is that we are protecting their rights by this resolution. The only judgment that we can form on such a declaration is that it is a political appeal for political reasons to try to get the people of Quebec to find in Mr. Duplessis the defender of their rights. The province of Quebec knows now that it has at the head of the country and at the head of the Liberal party a man who will respect the rights of Quebec as much as those of all other provinces of Canada. We have had enough of such appeals to prejudice in this country. How can we expect harmony to come out of the next constitutional convention, the next dominion-provincial conference, when a man comes forward before he knows anything about what will be proposed at that conference and says: We will not do anything; we are in danger. It is just a plain farce for political reasons.

In the past the Liberal party, Mr. Speaker, has stood strongly in this house as well as in the provincial legislatures as the defender of provincial autonomy, long before Duplessis or people of his kind ever existed. But the Liberal party also stands as the defender of national autonomy, sovereignty and unity in Canada.

In introducing the measure the government's first consideration evidently is to do away with the necessity of going to another country for the amendment of provisions that concern only the federal powers. If the provinces had to come to Ottawa or to Westminster for amendments affecting their own prerogatives they would be the first to object to it and to claim their right of disposing themselves of their own privileges and prerogatives. Therefore there is no basic danger to any provincial rights in the present measure.

The strongest objection is that the government is proceeding piecemeal with its reform of our constitutional machinery, and that is quite so. I can see no cause for alarm in this but a determined effort to effect, when the moment is ripe and when public opinion favours it, the necessary changes that will affirm further our full autonomy and our national sovereignty, instead of waiting for the pleasure of a man like Duplessis to agree to the necessary measures. It is all very well to say that because Westminster will accept any change we ask for it is sufficient proof of our autonomy. Yet it is anomalous to have to put in motion this cumbersome machinery each time we want to act in our own right within the realm of our federal powers, and when the provinces can exercise their own prerogatives freely and alter the use or disposal of their rights within the powers given to them by the confederation act.

This afternoon the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), in a very eloquent speech, mentioned many Canadian statesmen and quoted at one time the Hon. Mr. Mercier, a former premier of the province of Quebec, who had stated that the existence of the provinces preceded that of the dominion, and that it was from the provinces that the powers of the federal government were derived. He said that they are sovereign in the limits of their attributions. We do not deny that. It is our contention that the provinces are sovereign within the limits of their powers. Elles sont souveraines dans les limites de leurs attributions. That is what we contend also. We do not want to alter any of those powers without a conference.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said that a conference will be called, and it must be for the purpose—although I am not in on the secret—of elucidation on the necessary changes that may affect some rights that are borderline rights or that are provincial rights. In this resolution, however, where we are dealing with our own prerogatives, nothing is proposed that would force the government to appeal to the provinces. None of the authorities that my friend quoted this afternoon apply to the present situation. We are not affecting provincial rights nor any of their prerogatives in any way. We do not want to alter or diminish any of their rights. By voting for the resolution we do not contradict in any way the views of previous leaders which applied to material changes in the rights of the provinces. That is what they meant.

I do not believe that the present Prime Minister, any more than any other hon. member, would want to infringe on the rights of the provinces without their consent or without a normal agreement having been arrived at. We do not endanger in any way the rights given to the provinces under section 133 of the British North America Act, as my friend suggested. On the contrary we certify them; we specify that we shall not have the right to make changes affecting schools and languages.

As to the fields where both sides may consider that they have rights, they can do as has been done in the United States or in any other confederation. They can go to the courts of justice to have them judged, and I think it is quite unfair to say that because the supreme court judges are appointed by the central government they will be biased. It is an insult to our judiciary and to the minds of our legal men. As I said in a previous debate, these people do not stand as arbiters. They are judges and they will judge the law as well as, and probably much better than, members of the privy council, and as well as the Supreme Court of the United States does for United States laws.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said at one time that no question of sovereignty was involved. Nevertheless he is too good a lawyer not to be conversant with international law, and he later recognized that the necessity of going to another country for amendments is a reminder of our colonial era that no self-respecting nation ought to endure any longer. He differed in his opinion on the question of when it should be done, who should be consulted, and in what way, but it is hopeful for the future to see that he agreed on the necessity of doing away with that procedure.

To my mind the present measure, and that which abolished appeals to the privy council, were long overdue affirmations of our national sovereignty, but they can be considered as the last moves we can take before we launch a truly national campaign for complete constitutional emancipation by way of a Canadian constitution proclaimed in Canada.

I am perfectly in accord on this question with the proposal that the leader of the opposition made at one time that a national constituent assembly be summoned, although I thought it was perhaps a way of delaying action. I am in accord that it should be the ultimate aim, but from what I showed the house a moment ago it would take a long time to come. I think we all should have as our aim that Canada should have its own constitution.

I should like to quote what I said on the matter on the 11th of June, 1946, in the debate on the redistribution bill. I stated:

> Canada has outgrown her outmoded, colonial style constitution, and it is time for her to assert her national will and to take her place among those nations of the world which have elaborated constitutional monuments as their basic law. Canada owes it to herself to nominate a constituent assembly and to draft a new constitution.

I think we can all agree on that when we see so many parties agreeing on the necessity of amending our constitution. There is only one step to go to realize that we should have a constitution that would not be the act of a foreign country.

The basis for a new constitution might well be, and probably should be, the British North America Act, but it need not be a full repetition of it nor a rehash, if I may say so, of its contents. When I say it should be the basis I mean that the religious, language and school rights granted by the British North America Act should not be tampered with and should not be diminished in any way or form. I mean that the division of power as between the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures should not be altered without agreement; but it would be useless to go to all that trouble if we were to repeat verbatim, of the British North America Act, what was suitable in 1867 but what may not be considered advisable in 1950. Yesterday the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) pointed to many clauses that would not be consistent with our status of today. If I am not mistaken he mentioned sections 55, 56 and 57, and quite aptly. There may be many others which we call spent clauses, that are of no further use and which should not be continued. Furthermore there are many conventions, precedents and grants of privileges by the former so-called mother country that have become part of our constitutional heritage and which, where applicable, might well be included in the new instrument. Referring to Ollivier on "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty", at page 44 the author says:

> We generally look upon our constitution as being a written constitution because it is to be found in the British North America Act, but here again this statement is only partly true, for it is correct to say that our constitution is also partly unwritten as it "includes all the great landmarks of British and Canadian history as well as generally recognized conventions and usages."

Speaking in 1946—and this may please the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker)—I said:

> . . . I personally would include in the constitution not only the provisions of the British North America Act but such an act as was suggested some time ago by the hon. member for Lake Centre, namely, a bill of rights, which should be part of our constitution.

Since that time the United Nations have drawn up such a bill of rights, much of which could be included in our constitution. Many of the countries emancipated after the first great war have such provisions in their constitutions. I have several before me, and it seems strange that I should pick up the constitution of Turkey, in which country many democratic rights may not be fully respected; but that constitution provides:

> All Turks are equal before the law and are, without exception, obliged to respect it . . .
> Natural rights of Turks include: inviolability of person, liberty of conscience, of thought, of speech, of publication, of travel, of contract, of work, of possession, the liberty of association and assembly, and to form commercial societies.

That is just one of many such constitutions; and I think that would be an advisable thing for us to consider when a national convention meets. The full sovereignty of the country should be proclaimed, and the democratic character of our form of government should be emphasized. When we think that there is nothing in the terms of the British North America Act to outline even the responsible form of the government that is ours, it is clear that such a declaration should be included in the constitution, because much was left unsaid in 1867.

Referring to the British North America Act we find a description of the executive council; then in section 48 it is provided that questions arising in the house shall be decided by a majority. These are the only references to confirm the fact that we have rule by majority and that we have a democratic form of government; nothing is stated directly. Britain's constitution cannot be found in one instrument, and it is thus called unwritten. But it has its source in many historical documents such as Magna Carta, the Bill of Rights, and innumerable precedents and laws that have sanctioned the evolution of constitutional customs. I doubt whether for a federal state like Canada it would suffice to re-edit the British North America Act and rest upon British customs and precedents.

We are a mature nation. It may be that economically, as some maintain, our part of the continent might have fared better had we become united with the thirteen states that formed the nation to the south in 1774. But our destiny has unfolded otherwise. We have evolved through a slow process into a separate and independent unit, no matter what may be the views of many as to what would have been our fate had we cut the ties with Britain when the other colonies did. That is useless speculation and wishful thinking. Now we must all play our part in the continuing evolution of our institutions toward full manifestation of our undeniable rights as a sovereign nation. We are a mature people, and our constitution should be the mirror of our enlightened conception of a young, modern and energetic state. The childish contentment at having grown out of our former constitutional shackles should not express itself in the copying of institutions which may have suited another country in other years. There is no immutable form of constitution, any more than there is an immutable form of government. As John Hawgood says in his book "Modern Constitutions since 1787":

. . . while certain individual constitutions might seem particularly admirable, no one type of ideal state could suit all conditions of people and all environments.

It would be folly to tie ourselves to a too rigid constitution; yet it would not suit our federal form of government to have a vague system of precedents and customs and conventions in a constitution loosely knit around a symposium of the principles of the British North America Act. It might not suit us either geographically or ethnically.

We need a really well defined constitution which will recognize our position in the world of today and will contain provision for amendment according to the needs of tomorrow, while safeguarding the sacred rights which are one of the bases of our unity in diversity. Several hon. members have quoted the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. I should like to put on record a statement he made in a lecture delivered in Montreal on January 16, 1932:

A constitutive agency, whatever it may be, agreed to unanimously by the citizens of a state, ought not to prevent the future modification of the regime which it established. Sovereignty is inalienable and imprescriptible, and one generation has not the metaphysical right to bind definitely the future generations and to remove from them the competence which they themselves have used. It cannot determine beforehand and in an absolute manner the kinds of political and social realities of the future. The reforms ought to be made difficult but not impossible. Their realization ought to be subject to forms, procedures and to delays, but when a constitutional reform is demanded by the political or social situation of a country, and desired by a great majority of its citizens, prohibitions enacted twenty years, fifty years or a hundred years before should not constitute an obstacle. They will then be either violated or turned around.

That is a statement by a gentleman who has been quoted frequently during this debate. It is strange how our friends make heroes and gods of our great men after they are dead, but do not recognize them when they are alive.

The modern constitutions owe much to the development of thought since the publication of Montesquieu's l'Esprit des Lois and the great words of the French encyclopaedists whose preachings have opened the way for recognition of the equality of men, of their rights and for the reshaping of constitutional institutions throughout the world. It is true that most modern constitutions, up to the new constitution given to Italy by Mussolini in 1920, have taken their inspiration from the French constitution of 1793.

There is one thing we are prone to overlook, however, and that is that if it is true that the United States is one of the young countries with regard to its period of existence, it is equally true that its constitution is one of the oldest of the democratic constitutions in the world. The constitution of the United States has also had a considerable influence on constitutional development throughout the world. It might not be inadvisable, therefore, to have a close look at it without intending to be any more servile in that direction than we ought to be in exactly copying the British customs.

The Prime Minister has let us know, Mr. Speaker, that a dominion-provincial conference will take place following this session. I wonder if this would not be the time to devise a means of forming a constituent assembly and to arrive at an agreement on the formation of a drafting committee charged with the task of formulating a truly Canadian constitution. I believe from what we hear of the feeling in certain quarters, no attempt should be made to discuss the details of the constitution or its amendments at that dominion-provincial conference. Instead of that, there should be a general discussion of the aims and purposes of a constituent assembly, the ways to compose it and the methods by which it might work. I think perhaps the drafting committee ought to be limited to, let us say, sixty members and made up of an equal number for both the dominion and the provinces. I agree with the leader of the C.C.F. party in his opinion that the committee should be composed of the different parties so that the various trends of thought in the country could be represented. Such a committee could study the problem and hear from the different constitutional authorities as to the things which should be included in the constitution.

This committee should, in turn, submit an agenda to the provinces and have those provinces submit a proposed draft constitution. After a period of about three months for the provinces to consider the matter, a meeting should be held to work out compromises on certain sections in the various draft proposals. After a final draft has been arrived at, it might be sent to the provinces for their consideration. They might be given, let us say, two months to consider that. After this committee had explored the whole situation, the convention itself might be summoned and the question studied there on its merits.

Any question arising on something in the draft should be settled only in a manner which meets with the approval of two-thirds of the delegates. My idea of the constituent assembly is that it would be a very large body of people and would include all the members of the federal parliament, as well as an equal number from all the provinces. Care would be taken to provide representation for the various trends of opinion based on the last election. If a province normally has ninety-eight seats and should send only seventy-seven people, it should not select seventy-seven from one party but a fair representation from all parties.

After this convention has carefully considered the situation, it might arrive at an agreement. The meetings of the committee should be in camera. There should be no publicity so we would avoid having the committee used as a platform for political purposes. Real work could be accomplished in such a committee before a constituent assembly is summoned. Worth-while suggestions could be studied by such a body and then submitted to an assembly of Canadian statesmen. This is just an idea of mine, but I believe it might be worth exploring.

The methods of amending that constitution would also of necessity be more elaborate than those which we find in most countries. I have not enough time to go into the details, but most modern states provide for a limited number of people to vote in one house before the constitution can be changed. It may need a two-thirds vote or a three-fifths vote.

In Canada today each of the provinces has the right to amend its constitution. I should think that in the new constitution there should be a provision to the effect that even in those legislatures, a two-thirds vote would be necessary before a change could be made. The same provision should be made applicable to changes with regard to the powers of the federal parliament. A two-thirds vote of the members of this house should be necessary. These rights the provinces already have and the federal parliament will have after this resolution is passed.

There would remain for consideration the minority rights, and I would think they could easily be safeguarded by making it necessary before any change is made in such matters to have it approved by two-thirds of the members in the federal house and by two-thirds of the members in the legislature of all of the provinces. I do not think we should fear any danger if such a provision were enacted. In any form of Canadian constitution, Mr. Speaker, provincial autonomy should not be violated, but the structure of our constitution should not be such as to weaken the nation as a whole. Canada cannot safely develop into separate units fighting against each other over the taxpayers' necessary contributions. The best methods should be devised whereby all governments, federal and provincial, may operate efficiently with a minimum burden on the citizens.

Complications can originate only in the minds of fearful people and also in the minds of political Machiavellis such as we now have at the head of the provincial government of Quebec.

The jurisdictional clauses of the constitution cannot extend to more than two classes of legislative authority, the federal and provincial. The latter already have the right to amend their constitutions. Once the measure now before us is passed, the federal parliament will have a right to amend the constitution in connection with matters falling within its jurisdiction. There would remain only those minority rights I mentioned a moment ago, school or religious rights. As I have explained, those could be safeguarded the same way. Only when we have achieved such a constitutional structure with clear-cut provisions for amending it, can we hope to take this problem out of the field of political speculation and political squabbling.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention the amendment that was proposed by the C.C.F. group. I do not think there is any danger that this government or any other government might want to extend its life; yet this amendment deserves consideration. I would think twice before I would vote against it. The amendment states that—

> . . . as regards the requirement of section twenty of this act that there shall be a session of the parliament of Canada at least once each year, or as regards the requirement of section fifty of this act that no House of Commons shall continue for more than five years.

I believe that is a sound parliamentary principle. Whether or not I vote for this amendment, I believe our future constitution should definitely and clearly settle that question. I consider that amendment a valuable contribution to the debate.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I firmly believe the measure now before us is in the national interest. It violates in no sense the spirit of confederation, nor does it endanger the rights of the provinces or minorities. What more can be demanded, Mr. Speaker, until such time as we are in position to proclaim a truly national constitution, which I hope may be given to this country at the instigation of the present Prime Minister.

Mr. Raymond Bruneau (Prescott): I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we in this house, the representatives of the people, are fortunate to be able to rise today and participate in a debate of such scope and importance on an act to amend the British North America Act, 1867, relating to the amendment of the constitution of Canada.

At the election held last June we were given a mandate by the people of our country; and it is a known fact today that all Canadians were aware of the intention of our Liberal government at the next, the twenty-first, parliament to propose a bill enabling us to amend our own constitution. On June 27 the same people of Canada gave those who advocated such a measure an overwhelming majority, thereby sanctioning the program that we have now decided to implement.

I will say here in this house that the people of my constituency—like those of a large number of other constituencies who have sent members here on the Liberal ticket—who have accepted my platform, which is the Liberal platform, have given me a majority vote well aware of our intention regarding this amendment. I am here today by the will of my people because I am a supporter of the present Liberal government of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent); and it is my duty to support this bill proposed yesterday by our Prime Minister.

Two world wars and an intense participation in world affairs have placed Canada among the leading countries of the world. Yet our country, which we like to call "Land of hope and glory, mother of the free", is not yet free to amend its own constitution. Until that objective is achieved, it is impossible to call it a sovereign country. It is true that when a child learns to walk it needs a helping hand and a good deal of coaching. But I believe that we have now passed that stage and that we are ready to walk. Yet we still are obliged to rely on the government of another country for a solution to our legal problems.

To those who advocate protection of minority rights I wish to say that I, as a French-speaking Canadian, belong to that minority and that I certainly have no fear as regards the rights and privileges of the people of my race. I have great confidence in the decisions of our own supreme court; I am sure that those rights and privileges are in good hands and that they will be well protected whenever we shall have recourse to this legislative body.

Since the creation of the supreme court in 1875, no unfortunate decision has yet been attributed to that federal court of justice; and let me say here that this body will be in a better position than a body in another country to understand our needs and to render the best possible solution. Other countries of the commonwealth have tried the experiment, and I have yet to learn that one of them regrets having taken such steps. Since 1900 Australia has been master of its own decisions. South Africa followed the example in 1909, and New Zealand has already taken a step in that direction.

Evolution is unavoidable. We have progressed in the art of governing ourselves since the British North America Act of 1867, which followed the Quebec Act of 1774, the Constitutional Act of 1791 and the Act of Union of 1841. We have now in 1949 to decide, by the present bill, to give our own supreme court power to amend our constitution. Let it be understood, sir, that such amendments will pertain solely to questions of a federal scope; and you may rest assured that the people of Canada will never tolerate our meddling in the affairs of the provinces. We ask from the parliament of Westminster this right, and nothing else.

Some hon. members will hold that it would be preferable to consult the provinces before going into such an enterprise. I am at a loss to see anything wrong in this attitude of ours which is, first, to secure the right to amend our constitution and then to consult the provinces as to the ways and means of doing so. Why not start with the first thing first, and with one question at a time? We have tried to do otherwise before, and the result has been a lamentable failure.

No hon. member in this house is against the idea of first establishing our sovereignty, which right we have certainly acquired through our participation in world conflicts and in our co-operation in the settlement of world affairs. When we have taken that step, we can consult the provinces on the next logical problem to be solved, namely, the amendments to the constitution which are in the best interest of the ten provincial governments. A man of outstanding sagacity has set forth the axiom of the art of governing with a precision that has never erred. Junius, the great legislator, said: "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." And with Sir Wilfrid Laurier I will add:

> The cabinet form of government lends itself marvellously to this necessary vigilance. On one side of the house you have those who govern and on the other side, those who watch.

As we shall most likely always work under the cabinet form of government, I will say, sir, that there will always be two sides; one to administer and to amend, and the other to watch; both sides, as a whole government, endeavouring to give to the country the best possible administration. One good way to achieve this aim is to secure this right to amend our constitution.

(Translation):

Mr. Henri Courtemanche (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, although I approved the principle of amending the constitution mentioned during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I must, in fairness to myself and to the principles advocated, oppose the resolution as it now stands. No one denies that the constitution must be amended since it does not fully comply with our needs; however, as I support the theory that the constitution is a pact, a treaty, a convention rather than mere legislation I cannot admit that the present government has the right to decide arbitrarily and of its own accord what rights come under dominion jurisdiction on the one hand, and provincial jurisdiction on the other.

The whole country is wondering why the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) feels impelled to take the place of all the great jurists in order to impose his own personal views. I am not loath to state, in the wake of the premier of Quebec—even though my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) starts at the very sound of this name—that:

> We are convinced that if the province of Quebec had considered the B.N.A. Act merely as a statute, subject at all times to amendments at the federal authorities' pleasure, it would not have agreed to it. It seems obvious to us that, at confederation, the statesmen of that time had in mind and sought to confirm a compact or treaty. Moreover, there are several judgments of the privy council to the effect that it is not a statute, but a pact.

I suggest it would be a calamity to do away with the proper safeguards provided by the fathers of confederation, which made it possible for Canada to grow and prosper, notwithstanding certain periodic depressions.

The Prime Minister's haste is understandable. He feels he has to hurry. He is no longer forty and wishes his name to be remembered by posterity. But let him beware. The proverb applies to him as well as to others, "Time does not respect what is done without it." What did the fathers of confederation think of their work? Let us refer to Sir John A. Macdonald who said:

> The government presents the proposal as a whole and will use all its influence to have it adopted without change and for a very simple reason. This proposal has not been prepared by the government of Canada or that of Nova Scotia, but is a treaty between the various colonies. all its clauses were thoroughly discussed and it was adopted through mutual concessions. . . . Those resolutions are like a treaty and if they are not adopted in their entirety, the whole process will have to be started all over again.

Sir George Etienne Cartier stated the following:

> The Canadians, said the British ministers, come to us with a constitution already written out and which is the result of a friendly understanding among themselves and of a ripe discussion of their interests and their needs. They are the better judges of what suits them best; let us not change what they have made. Let us approve their confederation. . . . Yes, it was in that spirit that England considered our request. We needed her approval and she gave it unhesitatingly, without any desire to interfere in our achievement.

The Hon. Ernest Lapointe, a former minister of justice and the predecessor of our present Prime Minister, was more concerned and careful with provincial autonomy. I wish to read what he had to say about confederation in 1937. I am sorry to repeat some of the arguments which were mentioned this afternoon or yesterday, but allow me, for the needs of this discussion, to quote them again. The Hon. Ernest Lapointe said:

> The British North America Act is the result of protracted and difficult negotiations, and finally of a compromise to which the provinces have agreed through their recognized official representatives. Consequently there has been a legal agreement in proper form, ratified in full freedom. It follows that the authorities empowered to bring about amendments to our national constitution—

These are the very words used by Mr. Lapointe.

> —are the provinces whose goodwill has made possible the union and whose unanimous goodwill is indispensable to any amendment which it may be decided to bring about.

The imperial parliament was not bound to sanction that agreement, but once it had consented to do so, it could no longer make unilateral changes in its terms without thereby infringing upon the juridical and moral rights of the parties to that agreement, no more than the dominion government, whenever Canada is empowered to amend its own constitution, will be able to make unilateral changes in that part of the constitution which unquestionably applies to provincial legislatures.

The Prime Minister says he will consult with the provinces before amending anything, but why does he not consult with them before submitting his resolution in order to determine what is and what is not within the purview of the federal government? Why should he seek to settle that much debated question by himself? Far from being a failure of his legislation, the withdrawal of this resolution as introduced would increase the Prime Minister's stature in the eyes of his people and his action would prove that he is anxious to meet the requirements of all contracting parties. Within their own sphere, the provinces enjoy powers of autonomous government just as much as Canada's parliament. In that case Canada's parliament cannot take upon itself to change the act granting the provinces the powers they enjoy. Ernest Lapointe once said: "The British North America Act is the charter not only of the Dominion of Canada, but of the Canadian provinces as well".

We derive our powers from the British North America Act. So do the provinces. They have no constitution other than the British North America Act. Would it be fair to assume the right to amend this act which is as much the constitution of the provinces as it is that of Canada? Are we justified in amending the constitution without their consent in such a manner that the provinces will be deprived of the rights they have owned since confederation? By virtue of the very provisions of the act of 1867, this parliament cannot, and should not, without consent from the provinces, seek the authority to amend the constitution which is theirs as well as that of Canada.

The resolution, as it stands, would be opposed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the great Liberal chieftain, whose name so readily comes up at each federal election in the province of Quebec to convince the electors that we are still adhering to the policy expounded by that great statesman. After what certain hon. members have said during this debate, let us hear what Laurier had to say on the subject in 1907, and I quote:

> Confederation is a compact, made originally by four provinces but adhered to by all the nine provinces . . .

And today by all ten.

> . . . which joined the union. I submit to the hon. members of this house that this pact must not be amended lightly. It should not be tampered with save in cases of real necessity, and only after the provinces have had an opportunity to make their views known.

Here is what Sir Robert Borden said at about the same time:

> True, the provinces are already represented at Ottawa, but as we are asked to amend a federal pact, it is only fair that each province be consulted and that its decision be based on the full right it enjoys as a separate entity.

The amendments required in the light of experience gained in past years can be effected only by legal and constitutional means. No arbitrary procedure can be followed; these changes cannot be brought about solely at the request and by the will of the dominion parliament. Other parties as directly concerned in this issue as the central administration must also have their say in the matter; it is necessary to consult with them and to secure their approval.

I suggest that this parliament take the legal and constitutional means at hand. This is also the friendly solution. Let all the contracting parties be called in consultation so that they may agree on the amendments required and give them their approval. I do not know of any other procedure.

If with the support of a submissive parliamentary majority the provinces are put in a strait-jacket, history and the electorate will hold the Liberal administration responsible. (Text):

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I shall not intervene in this debate at any great length because it has been going on for some time and most of the ideas that could be developed have been developed. However, I should like to say a few words about the so-called compact or contract theory of confederation. As luck would have it, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Courtemanche), who just preceded me, stated certain opinions on this subject with which I beg to differ.

The hon. member said that our constitution is a pact or contract, but I submit that it is not. I intend to develop my argument by showing that it could not be a contract or a pact because a contract must take place between existing parties who have the legal capacity to contract, and there must be some understanding. That is elementary in law and I intend to develop those three points briefly.

Before I do so I should like to say to the hon. member for Labelle that he is greatly mistaken when he says that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has taken it upon himself to impose his views on the subject of confederation upon those of the majority of well known jurists. Anyone who has studied the question must know that this matter has been debated back and forth for many years. There are two schools of thought. One school holds that confederation is a statute while the other school holds—this is the school of thought followed by the hon. member—that it is a contract. Nearly all the constitutional authorities now accept the theory that it is not a pact, that it is not a contract, but that it is a true statute.

I should like to refer to another argument advanced by the hon. member for Labelle. He says that the present government of Canada wishes to take away from the provinces the legitimate safeguards that were written into confederation by the fathers of confederation. Rather than taking away legitimate safeguards the government proposes to give to the minorities of this country, to give to the use of the French language and to give to the educational rights in this country, safeguards which have not existed under the constitution up to the present moment.

The hon. member for Labelle also said that the constitution of Canada as embodied in the British North America Act is based entirely on the resolutions passed at Quebec. He quoted Sir John Macdonald as having said that those resolutions had to be adopted in their entirety. Any student of constitutional law or of the history of our country knows that, far from being based on the resolutions of Quebec, the British North America Act actually embodied less than half of those resolutions while it embodied a good deal of additional material inserted in it by the British parliament at the time it was passed. In substance it is a statute of the British parliament and is not, as has been stated many times, based entirely upon the resolutions passed by the colonies before confederation became a fact.

For confederation to be a pact it would have to be a pact between existing contracting parties. At the time the British North America Act was passed the Dominion of Canada did not exist; it came into existence only as a result of the legislation passed at that time. The provinces of Ontario and Quebec did not exist; at that time they were united under the Act of Union. While Prince Edward Island existed at that time it did not enter confederation until some time later under an agreement. British Columbia came in afterward under an agreement. Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta were created by the dominion parliament. None of those provinces existed at that time. The Dominion of Canada, with which they are supposed to have contracted, did not exist either.

My second point is that they did not have the legal capacity to contract. The colonies that existed at that time were not part of the dominion and did not have the legal capacity to make treaties with one another to form a federal state. It was not done in that way. It was done by an address to the British parliament which was the only legislative body that had the power to create the Dominion of Canada. That was done by a statute of the British parliament and not by any pact or understanding. As I have said, the parties to that so-called pact did not exist and, in the second place, they did not have the capacity to contract.

My third point is that in fact there was no agreement which became the basis of confederation. It is easy to establish this by going back into constitutional history and looking at the so-called Quebec resolutions. If you examine those and the British North America Act which was passed subsequently you will see that there was no such agreement. The supposed agreement upon which those who advocate the compact theory rely was never incorporated into the British North America Act. Things were deleted and other things were added. It was not at all the same thing, not at all the same understanding.

In 1935 a committee of this house was created to consider whether confederation was a pact or contract. Some of the greatest constitutional authorities in Canada gave evidence before that committee, including Dr. Beauchesne, who was clerk of this house for so long. I am sure hon. members of this house have the greatest admiration for his learning and knowledge of constitutional law. All the constitutional authorities who gave evidence at that time before the committee were of the opinion that the British North America Act was in truth a statute and was not in any sense a pact or contract. It has been said that certain of our political leaders and writers have said that it is a pact and have used the word "pact" or the word "contract" when talking about confederation. I say, with all respect for those who have used those expressions, that they were not speaking from a strictly legal point of view. In this house we are a legislative body. Our purpose is to legislate and we are commonly known as legislators. Therefore I submit we must look at these matters from a legal point of view.

I have pointed out that the constitution of Canada, from a legal point of view, is not based on a pact or a contract. If these people used the word "pact" or the word "contract" they did so for sentimental or political reasons, or possibly as a figure of speech in order to make a comparison. It may be said that although it is not a legal contract there was a moral understanding between the two great races that constituted Canada at that time, but that is as far as we can go. We may say that there was a gentleman's agreement, a sort of pacte d'honneur, as one would say in French, between the French and English speaking races at that time with respect to one another's rights and privileges. That is as far as we can go. We cannot say that it is in truth a pact or contract.

My conclusion is that, as the constitution is neither a pact nor a contract, our opponents, who base their arguments for safeguarding the rights of minorities, the right to use the French language, and educational rights on the theory that it is a pact or contract, are basing their arguments on very slippery ground, to put it mildly, on very dangerous ground. They are building on sand because they are basing their arguments on sentimental or political grounds but not on a sound legal basis. I say that after the legislation that the government is introducing has been introduced, after our constitution has been amended, and after the resolution has been implemented, then the rights pertaining to education, the use of the French language, and the protection of minorities in general will be on a sound legal basis, and that those who are interested in protecting those rights will be in a better position than they are now.

I do not wish to take the time of the house any longer. As I said, the debate has already been prolonged, but those are the reasons that I wish to give for voting in favour of the resolution.

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take up only a few minutes of the time of this house in order humbly to set out my views on the point at issue.

The question is to know if henceforth this country may amend its own constitution, without first obtaining permission from a foreign power. I hope that this phrase, foreign power, will not be taken in a disparaging sense.

It would seem that all here are agreed that Canada should have this power.

But the point on which our opinion is not that of several members of this house is, no doubt, the manner in which this change must be effected.

I think I may, indeed must, expose at this juncture an old theory, even though it might appear somewhat contradictory to several hon. members, whose authority I respect since most of them, being lawyers, are admittedly superior to myself. The soundness of this theory has been contested, it seems, by many.

Everyone is entitled to his own opinion in this matter. I shall have the fullest respect for any who oppose my views, and I only ask for the same fairness in return, so long as I deal with this matter with due frankness and dignity. Even though the idea may seem antiquated, I shall try to prove to this house that the confederative act is a contract, and one that cannot be amended without the unanimous consent of the contracting parties.

Every member of this house is aware of the events which brought about in this country the discussions, meetings and negotiations which led to the Charlottetown and Quebec conferences. At that time two groups in Canada controlled all political and economic life: Upper Canada, inhabited mainly by Canadians of British origin, and Lower Canada, inhabited almost exclusively by Canadians of French origin.

Needless to add, these two groups displayed a rivalry which was exceedingly harmful to their normal individual development and to the harmony which should exist between citizens of the same country.

For a time it was thought that the Act of Union in Canada, passed in 1841, would have solved the problem. Unfortunately it was not to be so, and it was only through the great ability and vast energy of a Canadian, Louis Hippolyte Lafontaine, that a possibly irreparable deterioration of the situation was averted.

Fortunately the leaders of the two groups, both French and English, understanding that everybody's interest was at stake, decided to attempt the impossible in order to arrive at an understanding.

The discussions began. The great majority of the English leaders were in favour of a legislative union. On the other hand, the French ones held out for a confederative union. Concessions were made on both sides, but the province of Quebec was nevertheless allowed certain privileges which it was unwilling to sacrifice at any price and which it had indicated as essential conditions of its entry into confederation. After study, discussions, concessions from both sides, an agreement was finally arrived at and consent freely and mutually given to a formula. It is that agreement that we call a compact.

Who, may I ask, Mr. Speaker, is better qualified to give the exact name to the act they brought about than the very authors of this agreement? Can it be thought for a single moment that these gifted and well meaning men, the pick of the two races concerned, did not know the nature of the act which they brought about? Well, what name did they give it? All agreed to call it a contract, a treaty. I have collected several quotations, but shall not read them to the house.

Mr. Arsenault: Would the hon. member allow me to ask a question? If, as he contends, the Brtish North America Act is a contract, would he please tell me whether the Quebec resolutions, which constituted this alleged contract, are textually included in the British North America Act?

Mr. Poulin: The resolutions are not included exactly word for word, but I do not believe that there are any changes important enough to alter the very nature of the resolutions then agreed to.

I should like to quote only Sir John A. Macdonald, as reported in the parliamentary debates on confederation in 1865, pages 16 and 17:

> . . . this proposal (confederation) has not been prepared by the government of Canada or that of Nova Scotia, but is a treaty between the various colonies; all its clauses were discussed . . . those resolutions are like a treaty . . . (page 32) this proposal may be considered to be a treaty agreed to between the various provinces.

And that treaty or contract, who made it operative? Having come to an agreement, the parties concerned did exactly what our people do after they have made an agreement. They go to a notary asking him to draw up an official act recognizing the validity of the agreement, sealing it and telling the contracting parties that they are bound for the future, that they cannot change what has been decided upon, unless they come back and ask, by mutual and unanimous consent, that another agreement be drawn up.

Mr. Arsenault: Will the hon. member permit me another question?

Mr. Poulin: I am sorry, but I have already discarded some quotations—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): The member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) knows very well that he cannot ask his question without the hon. member's consent.

Mr. Poulin: I believe I have been condescending in permitting one question and if another were granted, it would take too much of my time.

Under the circumstances, the notary—it was the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe who coined that expression—was the imperial parliament. The notary had long side-whiskers, rather narrow glasses, but was very broadminded and compliant. He did not object to the provisions of the contract but very obligingly helped the parties to draw their terms in legal form.

Mr. Arsenault: Was the province of Quebec really a signatory of the British North America Act?

Mr. Poulin: The years went by. The parties to the treaty got used, more or less, to the yoke they had submitted to, of their own free will.

In 1907, a matter was brought up which reopened the discussion on the nature of the political constitution of Canada. A provision was being introduced to increase federal grants to the provinces.

What were the views expressed by the statesmen of that time? I shall give only two quotations from many that have been gathered.

In the Debates of 1906-1907, page 2199, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said during a discussion on legislation providing for an increase in the grants to the provinces:

> Confederation is a compact, made originally by four provinces, but adhered to by all the nine provinces which joined the union.

And on the same page, Sir Robert Borden is reported as saying:

> I agree with what has been said by the right hon. gentlemen regarding the undesirability of lightly amending the terms of our constitution—although of course all the provinces are represented here. But inasmuch as it is a federal compact which we are asked to vary . . .

Then more recently, in 1925, a full debate took place in this house on a resolution quite similar to the one before us now.

Let us review briefly what was said then by our statesmen, by our great party leaders who, after all, were as able as we are to appreciate events which were closer to them by some twenty-five years.

I wish to quote from page 332 of the Hansard of February 19, 1925, where the Right Hon. Mackenzie King stated the following:

> Due regard should be had to the view that a compact was made at the time of confederation, and that an amendment of the importance that such an amendment certainly would have, ought only to be proposed after there had been a conference and agreement between the dominion and the provinces.

According to page 335 of Hansard of February 19, 1925, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen said:

> Undoubtedly, the pact of confederation is a contract and there are rights involved therein not represented by the parliament of Canada . . . The speech of the Minister of Justice determines, I think, without power of dispute, that there should never be suggestion of amendment affecting other parties to the contract save after conference and consent of those other parties.

I shall now quote the opinion of the hon. Senator Thomas Vien, who must enjoy much consideration since he has been so well rewarded. Here is what he had to say on February 19, 1925, as recorded on page 310 of Hansard for that year:

> I fully agree with the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that a pact which was entered into at a conference where all the component parts of what was then Canada were represented should not be lightly dealt with or amended, without a conference where the opinions of the representatives of all those provinces which now form part of the Dominion could be collected and fully considered.

And further on:

> Our country is one of the contracting parties and no one can have the contract altered, except with the unanimous consent of the contracting parties.

And at page 313:

> As in the case of a contract between private individuals, you cannot change the British North America Act without first convening a conference similar to that as a result of which the act originally came into being.

And the Hon. Ernest Lapointe expressed himself as follows, as reported in Hansard of February 18, 1925. I quote from page 298:

> Now, has it (the Canadian constitution) been considered as a treaty? I heard it suggested some time ago that this idea at confederation of a treaty is an antiquated idea. Maybe it is. But, Mr. Speaker, truth does not cease to be truth when it gets old; an old truth is always true. You cannot prevent facts from being facts whether you like them or not.

Mr. Lapointe went on to say:

> The British North America Act says itself that the Parliament of Great Britain merely enacted, put into a statute, the wish of the people of the provinces of Canada.

On that occasion, in 1925, there was scarcely an hon. member who did not agree in the house that confederation was a treaty.

And now, Mr. Speaker, all those opinions are worthless. We must forget all that. What was true yesterday no longer holds today. Everything has changed, everything has altered. Yet there are things that remain unchanged.

What has happened during the past twenty-five years to give a different aspect to historical facts?

Faced with the pressing needs of the second world war, we doubtless acquired the habit of compromising in a way we should never have countenanced in different circumstances.

It may be claimed that the theory of a constitutional compact has often been disregarded and, on such occasions, no objection was raised by the very people who are now protesting. In this respect, those whose duty it is to watch over the interests of the provinces are perhaps blameworthy, but the argument cannot justify anyone in perpetuating the evil done and still less in setting it up as a system.

I have the deepest respect for the Prime Minister. I think very highly of his personality and of the great office he fills with such distinction. On September 23, 1949, as reported at page 196 of Hansard of the same date, he stated the following in the house:

> The leader of the opposition says that whenever there has to be any kind of amendment whatsoever to any part of the constitution there should be consultation with the provinces. That is an opinion that is very frequently voiced, but it is one which we cannot accept. It would imply that the British North America Act is a contract . . .
> With that theory we are in diametric disagreement.

And yet, on February 18, 1925, another great Canadian, Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, also a Quebec representative, made the following statement in the house, as reported in Hansard:

> If the British North America Act is the charter of the provinces as well as the charter of the dominion, I ask again, how can we alter it without communicating with the provinces? . . . Would it be fair to take upon ourselves the right of amending this legislation which is the constitution of the provinces as well as our own?

On page 301:

> They cannot be made arbitrarily; they cannot be made only at will and at the request of the dominion parliament; but those who are just as much interested as the dominion parliament in this matter must have their say, must be consulted and must give their assent.

And further on, on the same page:

> To those who want changes I would say that the only way to get them is the constitutional way to ask the consent of the various parties to confederation.

Mr. Speaker, since so many Canadians of sound judgment, so many experienced statesmen have always considered confederation to be a contract, let us at least give the contracting parties the opportunity to meet, to discuss, to try to agree in order that, unanimously, a new statute or a revised statute be introduced, in which, undoubtedly, the parties concerned will again have to accept some sacrifices, just as they did in 1867. It has been said that after this act was passed by the house, the provinces would be consulted and that, if a "satisfactory agreement" could be reached, an address would be presented to the parliament at Westminster.

It would be important to know, before this discussion ends, just what is meant by "satisfactory agreement".

Is it an agreement adopted unanimously by the provinces, such as that of 1867? If not, words and not powers will, in the future, form the bones of contention.

By satisfactory agreement do we mean exaggerated, even vexatious concessions, which the provinces will be practically compelled to accept, because, when faced with a fait accompli, they will be afraid to lose everything?

When referring to a fait accompli, I am obviously referring to the present act which will have been accepted by parliament and in which it will be nowhere specified that the unanimous consent of the provinces, or even of one of them, is required to amend our constitution.

I cannot believe for a moment, Mr. Speaker, that the prime motive of the movers of this resolution has been to have this legislation passed so that they might afterwards use it as a sword of Damocles at the provincial conference.

However, if such had been their objective, I believe they could congratulate themselves on having very well succeeded.

On the other hand, I know quite well that the cause which the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) and I, along with many others in this house are upholding is a forlorn cause. In view of the huge majority the government has in this house, I do not make the mistake of thinking that our views will be accepted but when someone has decided to engage in a fight known to be hopeless, it is generally because he has also decided to hold fast to ideals which to him are sacred and immutable.

Granting this, Mr. Speaker, I now appeal to the Prime Minister's sincerity and good will, and I trust I shall not be deceived.

Far be it from me to think that the government and its leader want to sacrifice some of the inalienable rights which are granted to one or more groups, one or more provinces, in our beloved Canada. I believe we more likely differ on the procedure to follow in order to better ensure those rights.

Well, as the government will have the best of it, being in a position to make full use of the procedure it considers the most effective and which we deem dangerous, I would at least ask it to be careful, not to move too fast, mindful of the fact that the fathers of confederation took years and years to reconcile their minds towards an agreement.

I humbly suggest to the government, when the house has passed this legislation, to be very obliging, conciliating and patient with the representatives of the provinces who I understand are to be called to a conference. The government should give as much latitude as possible to the provinces, bearing in mind that the first Canadian constitution was drafted by the provinces, a historical fact that can never be gainsaid.

Mr. Speaker, I am not obstinate, I am not stubborn and if I could be useful to the government in its very difficult endeavour, I would offer my humble co-operation; but that, I know, is not necessary.

Let us not forget, Mr. Speaker, that the individuals pass away rapidly, that generations follow as quickly and that the task we are undertaking today for their sake will be appreciated according to the earnestness with which we settle down to it.

However, since I cannot approve of the procedure followed by the government, I shall have to vote against the resolution.

(Text):

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is all to the good that long and careful consideration should be given by this house to the address that has been moved by the Prime Minister. It will only be through discussion and deliberation on the part of parliament that the nature of the procedure being requested by the government, and the arguments both for and against the adoption of that procedure, will be fully understood. I feel that one course that should be adopted in connection with the consideration of this address—if it indeed be a fact that what we are doing on this occasion will constitute a landmark in our constitutional set-up in this country or a milestone that we will look back upon over the years—is that the matter should be brought before a committee of the whole house. Such a move would enable the members of this house to secure information regarding the reasons leading up to the adoption of this plan, and the departure from the pledged word of the Prime Minister as given during the election campaign.

Even at this late hour in the discussion, I should like the Prime Minister to consider whether it would not be fitting and proper to have this matter discussed by a committee of the house so that we may obtain full information relative to the address as well as the answer to various questions, which will not be answered unless the house moves into committee. I am sure that hon. members in all parts of the house have waited for the answers to many questions that arise in their minds.

This debate has been conducted as one would expect a debate of its kind to be conducted in a deliberative assembly under a democracy. The address of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was a historical symposium and a record of the steps taken to effect amendments since confederation, while the speeches of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), the leader of the C.C.F., and the leader of the Social Credit group indicated that, as we all do, they approach the consideration of this problem with the consciousness and pride of Canadians. That attitude is, I think, worthy of all those who have contributed to the debate.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that you found it necessary under the rules of debate to declare that the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition could not be discussed by parliament nor be considered an amendment to the main address. In my opinion it deals with a matter that deserves to be voted upon by parliament. The constitution of our country is not the monopoly of the government of this day, with its overwhelming majority in both houses of parliament. It belongs to every one of us. The amendment moved by the leader of the opposition would have permitted a discussion by members of this house and a vote on the question whether or not there should be set up in this country a constitutional convention of representatives of the dominion and provincial governments to devise a method of amending within Canada the constitution of Canada, and of safeguarding minority rights so that such method might become the subject later of a humble address—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ruled the amendment out of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

An hon. Member: You cannot read it.

Mr. Speaker: I doubt if the hon. member can now discuss it as an amendment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not in any way suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it had not been ruled out of order. I was suggesting however that, if it had been in order within the rules, this parliament would have had an opportunity of voting on a matter that is of pre-eminent interest to the people of this country as a whole. I made it clear at the beginning that there was no suggestion that you could have done otherwise than you did, having regard to the rule you invoked. I take it that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), with his close relationship to the previous minister of justice and his senior position in this house, must have been speaking for his party when he spoke of the necessity of the convening of such a national constitutional convention with a view to arriving at the means of amending our constitution. That statement was indeed interesting. By this procedure we are today laying the foundation in part for future amendments of this constitution.

We believe that the Prime Minister should have carried out the undertaking he gave when he spoke on the radio on May 19 last. At that time there was no circumscription which would in any way allow him to proceed in the manner in which he has proceeded in moving an address that provides only for parliament having the power to amend those things that are peculiarly within the federal jurisdiction.

I shall read his promise. If he and his party received a mandate, that mandate was with regard to something about which there never was any dispute, namely, that there is indeed need of amending the constitution in order to meet changed and changing conditions. No political party in this country, in the last fifteen years, has at any time enunciated a policy that denied the necessity for amendments to the British North America Act, subject of course to the protection of the rights of minorities, school rights and the like. But subject to those things, it has been agreed that a means must be established of amending the constitution. I ask the Prime Minister, when he speaks, to answer one question. Where in this country did he say: If my party is returned to power, we will amend the constitution in a dual way; we will secure for parliament immediately the right to amend the federal portions of the constitution and then a little later on we will convene an assembly of dominion and provincial representatives with a view to arriving at a method of amending the constitution in its entirety. Here is the promise:

> We Liberals also believe that a method should be worked out to amend our constitution in Canada.
> That won't be easy.
> We do not want the Canadian constitution to be too rigid, but we do want to make sure it contains the fullest safeguards of provincial rights, of the use of the two official languages, and of those other historic rights which are the sacred trust of our national partnership.

And this is the undertaking:

> It is our intention, after the election, to consult the provincial governments with a view to working out a method, which will be satisfactory to all Canadians, of amending the constitution in Canada.

That, Mr. Speaker, was the undertaking given by the Prime Minister.

Mr. St. Laurent: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Certainly.

Mr. St. Laurent: Does the hon. member suggest that he is so naive as to have believed that that was an undertaking by the party of which I was the leader to renounce the right that has been exercised for the last eighty-two years in this house, to have amended without consultation with the provinces those parts of the constitution that do not affect the jurisdiction of the provinces?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The people of Canada must have been naive. The words of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) are incapable of any other interpretation, naïveté or anything else to the contrary. The undertaking was given as well at Moncton. I could quote his exact words. He said that the government would seek provincial government co-operation in drafting ways and means of amending our constitution in Canada. He did not say that we would amend it piecemeal. He said "our constitution", not a part of our constitution, not a portion designated by the Prime Minister and those associated with him, but our constitution, which meant, and could only be understood to mean, the constitution of Canada without division. Some of us would like to know when the change came about and the reason for it.

There is no question whatsoever that there is almost unanimous opinion in this country as to the need of amendment. There has never been any question about that over the years. In 1925 the then prime minister of this country spoke of the need of amendment. The then minister of justice, Mr. Lapointe, spoke of the need of amendment. At that time Mr. Meighen spoke of the need of amendment. All of these men also stated the grave and difficult problems that would face any government that endeavoured to secure a general principle upon which amendment could be based.

There is no question that there is agreement in parliament and throughout the country as to the necessity of the protection of constitutional rights inherent in the constitution. There is no question that we wish to bring our constitution up to date in order to meet those changed and changing conditions which have occurred since 1867. May I go back beyond that and quote the words of Lord Brougham which indicate that he had a perception of the need of constitutional reform. He used these words:

> Constitutions must grow if they are to be of any value; they have roots, they ripen, they endure. Those that are fashioned resemble painted sticks planted in the ground—they strike no root, bear no fruit, swiftly decay and ere long perish.

There is no argument about the necessity of amendment, but I think that, not in a party sense, not in a political sense but in a national sense, each of us in this parliament and in the country should do what the fathers of confederation did. They joined together. Many of them were personal enemies but they joined together for the purpose of achieving confederation. I feel that through a national constitutional convention we would be able to secure that measure of agreement, that measure of unanimity based on our pride as Canadians that would achieve a permanent and complete amendment of our constitution.

Before I go on I wish to refer to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). What a strange amendment it is! He believes that parliament should have the right to make the necessary amendments to the constitution in so far as the federal authority is concerned. In effect he says: "Give us that power". At the same time through this amendment he asks the British parliament to diminish the power of this parliament to do that which he says is so necessary to take a step in the direction of an amendment of our constitution. What a position this parliament will be in, going to Westminster and saying that we demand the power to amend our own constitution within the federal ambit of authority, then adding four lines at the end declaring that we do not want the power in so far as section 20 of the British North America Act is concerned. We want to ensure that the parliament of Canada will never deny a session every year and an election every five years.

Mr. Knowles: Does the hon. member not agree?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I agree with the necessity of such things being embodied in our constitution by precedent, but I do not agree that if we go to Westminster and ask for power we should at the same time say that we are afraid to trust ourselves in the years to come. As a matter of fact, by that amendment my hon. friend indicates that while he asks for that much he is afraid that if too much power is exercised by this parliament democracy is indeed in danger by reason of the amendment that he says he supports.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the hon. member permit a question? Will he say that the same condition applies to the English and French languages?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I must answer that question. I shall come to the question of compact, to which the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Cannon) referred. He said that there is no compact. In 1925 the then prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, called it a compact. In 1925 in the same debate Mr. Meighen referred to it as a compact. As far as constitutional rights are concerned, we in this party have always taken the stand that they are inviolable and are part and parcel of the basis upon which confederation was built.

On motion of Mr. Diefenbaker the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: Wednesday is private members' day.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, October 19, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

INCREASE IN PRICES OF CRUDE OIL, GASOLINE AND FUEL OIL

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a copy of the letter of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) to the Attorney General of Saskatchewan in answer to the latter's request for an investigation into the prices of crude oil and gas, requested yesterday by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue).

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF SUMMARY—OCTOBER 1, 1948, TO JUNE 30, 1949

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to an undertaking given at the last session of parliament at the request of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), I wish to table a summary of orders in council for the period October 1, 1948 to June 30, 1949. These orders total 11,461, of which 6,589 are treasury board minutes. The summary runs to 423 pages, and, as can be appreciated, its compilation has taken a considerable amount of the time of the staff of the privy council office.

The hon. member asked that in tabling the summary it be indicated opposite each of the orders which ones had been tabled or gazetted and which ones had not. This has been done. The government is naturally anxious to meet the wishes of the hon. member and of the house, but it has occurred to us that the information which the hon. member is really seeking has reference to orders in council that are not treasury board minutes, because treasury board minutes are purely administrative in character.

When the undertaking was given, I had not appreciated the amount of work involved; but, having given the undertaking, I felt it should be carried out in the exact terms in which it was given. It would greatly expedite the work of providing this information in future if it were understood that the summary would refer only to orders other than treasury board minutes, and that it would not be necessary to indicate whether the orders have been tabled or gazetted. In this way I think the house would have the information in which it is interested, and the summary could be prepared and tabled much more expeditiously and would be more useful to members of the house.

I might add that I have looked up what the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) said on this subject on April 25, 1949, and the proposal I have made would appear to meet his wishes and facilitate the bringing down of these summaries in a much shorter time after the passing of the orders. If it is satisfactory to the house to have that done the next summaries will be so prepared. If, after the summaries have been tabled, hon. members feel that they are not getting sufficient information, the matter can be brought up again. We wish to provide hon. members with any information they may regard as helpful to them in considering the matters with which they are concerned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What the Prime Minister has said as to the course that he has in mind entirely covers the situation so far as I am concerned. I do not think anyone has any interest in the treasury board minutes. The purpose is to have a summary of the orders in council tabled.

SUGGESTION AS TO COMMITTEE ON MINISTERIAL POWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I wish to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister a suggestion I made on September 22 last in reference to the setting up in this house of a committee on ministerial powers. The Prime Minister, in tabling the summaries of orders in council, has gone a long way toward meeting the desires of parliament, and it is in that spirit that I now ask him whether, having regard to the trend, which I mentioned on that occasion, toward delegated authority, consideration might be given to the setting up of such a committee as I have suggested.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The hon. member was kind enough to let me know in advance that he intended to refer to the suggestion he made in his speech on the address on September 22, and it has been given some consideration. I do not think the government would be prepared to recommend the setting up of such a committee at the present session of parliament, but I do feel that the suggestion has merit.

The hon. member pointed out that such a committee had been set up in the parliament at Westminster. All I would care to say at this time is that between now and next session the government is prepared to give careful consideration to the operation of that committee in the House of Commons of the United Kingdom, and, in the light of its operation and of such other considerations as may seem relevant, to indicate at an early stage in the session of 1950 whether we would be prepared to support the establishment of a similar committee in Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the Prime Minister.

Mr. Church: How many of these orders in council ever reached the Supreme Court of Canada, may I ask?

Mr. St. Laurent: To answer that question might require a further considerable amount of work in the privy council office. Having tabled the summary of the orders, I think I will have to leave it to the hon. member himself to see them and select those he thinks have reached or should reach the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Church: A return to the house indicated that there were 160,000 orders, and only two ever reached the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Gagnon:

What was the amount paid to the federal government by (a) individuals; (b) companies, corporations, partnerships, etc., of the province of Quebec, in (1) income taxes; (2) succession duties, during the last fiscal year?

Mr. McCann: Collections by the taxation division in the province of Quebec for the fiscal year 1948-49 were as follows: Individual income tax, $200,834,119; Corporation income and excess profits tax, $149,611,161; Succession duties, $5,405,580; Other collections, $17,663,335; Total collections in fiscal year, 1948-49, $373,514,195.

GANDER AIRPORT

Mr. Higgins:

1. What are the landing fees at Gander airport, Newfoundland?
2. Have the landing fees been changed since March 31, 1949?
3. Are such fees to be increased?

Mr. Chevrier:

When all-up weight does not exceed 11,000 pounds, the landing fee is $18.75 and $3.75 for each additional 1,000 pounds thereafter, up to and including 24,999 pounds.

When all-up weight does not exceed 25,000 pounds, the landing fee is $60 and $7.50 for each additional 1,000 pounds thereafter, up to and including 109,999 pounds.

When all-up weight does not exceed 110,000 pounds, the landing fee is $150 and $15 for each additional 10,000 pounds thereafter.

The fee shall be computed to the nearest five cents.

Up to but not over 15,000 lbs., licensed gross take-off weight 10c per 1,000 lbs.

Over 15,000 lbs. and not over 30,000 lbs., licensed gross take-off weight 12½c per 1,000 lbs.

Over 45,000 lbs. and not over 75,000 lbs., licensed gross take-off weight 20c per 1,000 lbs.

Over 75,000 lbs., licensed gross take-off weight 25c per 1,000 lbs.

Flying clubs: For aircraft owned and operated by an approved Canadian flying club based at the airport, the rates shall be thirty cents per hour flown by club aircraft; provided, however, that, in the case of a continuous flight in excess of two hours' duration when the aircraft is in charge of a licensed pilot not under instruction, no charge shall be made unless the aircraft weighs 5,000 lbs. or more.

Commercial flying schools: For aircraft owned and operated by a commercial flying school based at the airport, the rates shall be thirty cents per hour flown by school aircraft.

Private aircraft: For privately registered aircraft based at the airport, with licensed gross take-off weight over 5,000 pounds, the rates shall be one-half of the rates shown in paragraph one above.

Air line training schools: For aircraft belonging to a bona fide training school of a licensed air line and engaged in the training of aircrew personnel of the air line, the landing fees shall be the subject of negotiation between the air line and the Department of Transport.

Exemptions: There shall be exempt from landing fees:

(1) State aircraft as defined in air regulations, part 1, section 2, except such aircraft as are employed in commercial air services.

(2) Noncommercial aircraft of foreign governments.

(3) Visiting aircraft owned and operated by flying clubs.

(4) Visiting aircraft, not over 5,000 pounds licensed gross take-off weight, owned and operated by commercial flying schools.

(5) Privately registered aircraft not over 5,000 pounds licensed gross take-off weight.

(6) Aircraft in distress executing forced or precautionary landings.

(7) Such other aircraft as the minister may direct.

2. Yes, domestic flights.

3. Landing fees at departmental airports are continuously under review.

EMPLOYMENT OF PERSONS OVER FORTY YEARS OF AGE

Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the government received representations asking that inquiry be made into ways and means of preventing and combating discrimination against persons over 40 years of age when seeking employment?

2. If so, has consideration been given to such representations, and is anything being done about the matter at the present time?

Mr. Mitchell:

1. Yes.

2. Yes. The situation is summarized hereunder:

The Department of Labour has had this problem under study since late in world war II, at which time it was anticipated that in the transition from war to peace older workers might be faced with discrimination. In the post-war years the Department of Labour and the national employment service, aided by local, regional, and national employment advisory committees, have kept in close touch with the problem.

Instructions contained in employment circular No. 172 of July 18, 1949, reads in part as follows:

7. Officers doing employer relations work should at all times endeavour to impress upon employers that there are applicants for employment in the older-age group who are well qualified to perform various tasks. They should endeavour to see that age limits are omitted wherever possible and that older-aged workers are considered for employment if they are really capable of such employment. When an older worker appears to be the best qualified for an employer's order, except that he is older than the stipulated age, the officer should diplomatically approach the employer concerned with a view to arranging an interview for the applicant. The whole approach should be that older-aged workers will only be referred when they can perform the particular task as well as, if not better than, the younger workers. It should be emphasized that older workers have mature skills, experience and stability. The program must be an educational one, based on the fact that where older workers can be used they should be used, and not based on an appeal to the sympathy of the employer.

Publicity is carried out by means of newspaper releases, special articles, radio talks, films and personal contacts with employers. In this publicity an attempt is being made to impress employers, not only as to the economic necessity of providing employment to a group which constitutes approximately one-third of our total working population, but also as to the advantages to be gained by the full use of the experience and skills of the worker past forty.

Co-operation is maintained by the Department of Labour with the Department of Veterans Affairs in a campaign for the employment of older veterans. This co-operation extends to the corps of commissionaires. Recruiting for the corps is done to a large extent by the national employment service.

The problem is kept under consideration by the national advisory committee and regional and local committees of the unemployment insurance commission, and a subcommittee on the older worker problem has been established for the sole purpose of ascertaining the best methods of dealing with the situation. Meetings with businessmen in various cities have been held with a view to widening co-operation.

In December, 1947, a counselling service for applicants for employment over forty-five years of age was set up in Toronto by the national employment service on an experimental basis. From this experiment much valuable information has been made available for counselling at other local offices.

An important factor in the program has been the efforts of officers in local employment offices. These officials, fully aware of the situation, are, in their day-to-day contacts, placing older workers wherever possible. Their contacts with employers prove a means of acquainting industrialists with the seriousness of the problem.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON COAL

Mr. Hodgson:

What action has the government taken in connection with the recommendation of the royal commission appointed to investigate the Canadian coal industry (Carroll) relating to mechanization of the Nova Scotia coal industry?

Mr. McIlraith: Consideration is being given to legislation relating to the subject matter of this question.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

NAVAL PERSONNEL—TRANSFERS BETWEEN RIVERS, MAN., AND DARTMOUTH, N.S.

Mr. Wright:

1. Were any naval personnel transferred from the Canadian joint training centre station at Rivers, Manitoba, to Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, at any time since August 1, 1949? If so, on what date or dates and how many were involved in such transfer?

2. Were any naval personnel transferred from Dartmouth to Rivers subsequent to the transfer east noted above? If so, on what date or dates and how many were involved in such transfer?

3. Were any of the personnel transferred east, as noted above, the same personnel as those transferred west, as noted above? If so, how many were thus transferred both ways?

Mr. Blanchette: Return tabled.

ACCIDENTAL DEATHS

HIGHWAYS, LEVEL CROSSINGS, DROWNINGS, FIRES—SUGGESTED CO-OPERATION TO CURTAIL LOSS OF LIFE

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, in view of the deplorable loss of life in Canada from accidents on the highways and at level crossings, drownings, fires and other causes, the government should seek the co-operation of the provinces, municipalities and organizations throughout Canada in acquainting our people with this appalling toll and seek to find means of curtailing same.

Mr. Speaker: It occurs to me that this motion does not merely express an abstract opinion, and that its adoption would necessarily involve the expenditure of money. A few days ago—see Hansard of this session, page 578—I gave a ruling on a similar motion by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and I believe this motion would be out of order on the same grounds as the one moved previously. Accordingly I must rule the motion out of order.

Mr. Church: I rise to a point of order. I call attention to the fact that this motion involves no expenditure of money whatever, it simply calls for expression of opinion on the part of this house. It does not deal with the same subject matter as the bill I introduced some weeks ago. With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I fail to see why the motion is not in order. As I say, there is no expenditure of money involved. It is simply an effort to help the unfortunate people who may be involved in these accidents. It will not cost the country one dollar to have this motion discussed in the house.

Mr. Speaker: I would not contradict the statement of the hon. member that it will not cost anything to discuss the motion here, but if it were carried, the government would be bound to comply with its terms, and it would therefore be in the nature of a direct order. It would necessarily involve an expenditure of money, and for that reason I must rule the motion out of order.

Mr. Church: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I appeal from your ruling.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows: The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), seconded by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), moved a resolution standing under notice of motion No. 9, which reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, in view of the deplorable loss of life in Canada from accidents on the highways and at level crossings, drownings, fires and other causes, the government should seek the co-operation of the provinces, municipalities and organizations throughout Canada in acquainting our people with this appalling toll and seek to find means of curtailing same.

I ruled that in my view this resolution does not express an abstract opinion. I further ruled that if it carried the government would be bound to comply with its terms, and therefore it is in the nature of a direct order, which order could not be carried out without the expenditure of public money. On these grounds I ruled the motion out of order. From this ruling the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and others have appealed.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the chair was sustained on the following division:

EDUCATION

EQUALIZING OF OPPORTUNITY—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration means of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada, by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you that this motion is out of order for the identical reason that you gave in respect to the motion of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church).

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, with reference to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), before you give a decision, may I point out that there is a striking difference between the resolution that was just ruled out of order and the one now moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight). The difference is that the motion now before the house asks that the government take a certain matter into consideration. In his motion the hon. member for Broadview did not ask that something be taken into consideration. He said that such-and-such should be done.

Furthermore, may I draw your attention, sir, to the fact that on May 1, 1946, a motion similar to the one which has now been moved was presented to this house by the then member for Dauphin, Mr. Zaplitny. It appears on page 1090 of Hansard for May 1, 1946. I ask hon. members to notice how similar it is to the one that is now being moved. It reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration ways and means of equalizing educational opportunity across this dominion and granting financial assistance to the various provinces for this purpose.

That motion was accepted as being in order and it was debated on that occasion, namely, on May 1, 1946. I submit that this established a precedent which makes this motion also in order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West has raised a point of order as to whether the motion moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon is in order. The hon. member for Calgary West says that it is out of order for the same reason that I ruled the motion of the hon. member for Broadview out of order. It seems to me that there is a difference in these two motions. The motion that I ruled out of order, if carried, would be a direct order from this house which the government of necessity would be required to put into effect, and would require the expenditure of money. The motion now moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon, if carried, would not be a direct order from this house which the government would be required to put into effect. It would merely require the government to take the matter under consideration. I think there is a difference, and I must rule that the motion of the hon. member for Saskatoon is in order.

Mr. Knight: I shall begin by thanking you, Mr. Speaker, for your ruling in regard to this motion.

I may say at the outset, sir, that I did not think it was within the realm of possibility that I should be called upon to debate this motion today, because it was preceded by the motions of many other hon. members. But it is a subject about which I know something, and I do not have to make too much reference to notes. In addition I happen to have in my desk some data which I can use in connection with the subject. Furthermore, it is a subject which in my opinion is of such vital importance that I cannot ignore the opportunity to say what I have to say about it, in case that opportunity should not again present itself this session.

I do not think, sir, that I need spend too much time in this enlightened body in discussing the need for education. Interesting debates have taken place lately in this house, one of them upon certain undesirable influences for which education was advanced as a possible remedy. Education is now fundamental to our civilization, as we know it; it is fundamental to the preservation of our democratic system, and perhaps to our very existence. Certainly it is necessary for national prosperity in these days when other countries, as well as our own, are becoming enlightened through education. It is one of the vital needs for national unity, for national security and indeed, as I have said before, for our very existence.

Advanced countries have reached the conclusion that education is the birthright of every child. There is, however, a divergence of opinion as to just how much of the education of a child should be at the expense of the community. There are other tendencies which might be noted, the first being the tendency to increased expenditures in almost every civilized country for educational purposes. There is a tendency toward raising the level of the age at which the child may leave school, and a tendency to give the same opportunity to every child in the matter of education, irrespective of that child's race or creed, the financial circumstances of his parents, or, for that matter, his geographical position.

What I hope to say today is predicated upon the principle of social justice that every child should have as his birthright in Canada a measure of education. This, as it were, puts a floor under a child's training, a certain minimum to which every child should be entitled, by law. One must admit that there is inequality in this regard. One finds a wide divergence in educational opportunity as one travels across Canada. I shall not weary the house by placing on record many statistics; the matter has been debated before in the house and it is one with which I believe most hon. members are familiar.

A bulletin issued in 1945 by the dominion bureau of statistics shows some startling inequalities as between province and province and as between rural and urban municipalities. There are inequalities even as between district and district of the same type, some of which I shall choose at random. Perhaps a fair measuring stick would be the amount of salary received by teachers in these respective communities. We find that in 1945 teachers in Prince Edward Island received an average salary of $633, whereas teachers in British Columbia received $1,552, about two and one-half times as much. Surely there should not be this great discrepancy. In 1943 the average salary of city teachers in Canada was $1,784, while that of rural teachers was $852, or in the proportion of about two to one. I believe conditions in the maritimes in this regard are worse than in other parts of this country. Dr. Argue's report shows that while one province was spending $31 per child for educational purposes, another was spending $83. At the same time, of the teachers employed in these provinces, in one instance only two per cent had university degrees as against 31 per cent in the other instance.

Speaking in another debate, but in respect of a related subject, I said that in a time of war education is the first casualty. Let me prove that statement by pointing out that in 1945 there were 4,550 people teaching—and I do not call them teachers, because they did not hold teaching qualifications. They did their work by virtue of a temporary certificate, following the issue of what is known as a permit.

I am reviewing this subject from the point of view of social justice rather than from that of the teacher. I have in mind the interests of the children concerned—the children who will one day become the men and women who may have to shoulder the responsibility of running the affairs of this nation. I would urge therefore that this be not considered as a political matter; and in this I am hoping to have the support of the new members who have come to the House of Commons from Saskatchewan, a province which is well enlightened in this regard.

Let us look at Canada from the point of view of the inequality which exists in connection with the educational careers of children. We are told that thousands do not complete their public school training, and more thousands do not finish their high school grades. The number who attain university degrees is small indeed. One learns from the census that 668,000 people over five years of age are totally illiterate. In 1941, the last year for which I have the figures, only 85,000 living citizens had university degrees, while at the other end of the scale there were 360,000 people between the ages of six and sixteen—and this will be recognized as about the public school age—who were not at school at all. What freedom, what opportunity are those people to have in this land where we boast of our freedom and of our opportunity?

Mr. Goode: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knight: I would ask the hon. member to wait until I have finished.

Canada is the only part of the British commonwealth in which the central treasury does not provide to the extent of at least fifty per cent for the education of the children. Universities are passing through critical times. They are trying to adjust themselves after the work of the last few years when great numbers of veteran students passed through their halls. I believe the universities should be given some assistance. In passing may I say that the educational aid given to veterans by the federal government proved to be eminently successful, and upon this I should like to congratulate the government.

I have here an article from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix which, under the heading of "Federal Aid", states:

> One lesson which can be drawn from the record of achievement of D.V.A. reviewed on this page recently is the possibility of federal aid to education. One hundred and thirty thousand veterans have received technical and university training. The training of these men and women to take their places as successful citizens is a sound investment for our country. The experience of D.V.A. could now be drawn on to develop a permanent plan whereby all our young people could be given educational opportunities in keeping with their natural ability and ambition.

Endorsation of this proposal comes from all parts of Canada, and I am glad to say it is in increasing and not decreasing volume. Almost all public bodies that have sufficient connection with education to make a study of it have the same opinion. Here is a Canadian Press dispatch, dated the 14th of October at Winnipeg, giving the view of the Canadian Legion. It reads:

> Winnipeg, Oct. 14.—A plea for federal aid for education from elementary school to university level was made Thursday by the Canadian Legion. In a brief to the royal commission on arts, letters and sciences the Legion urged adoption of a plan patterned after the federal public health scheme now in effect. "If it can be done for public health there is no reason why it can't work with education," said Lieutenant-Colonel Wilfrid Bovey, of Montreal, honorary counsellor of education for the Legion, in presenting the brief.

May I point out to hon. members that the Legion represent a great and important body of public opinion in Canada. I am glad that they have gone on record in endorsation of the resolution which I have now presented to the house.

As to the way in which federal aid might be extended, I might read some of the details set out in the article. It continues:

> The Legion endorsed fully earlier submissions made by the national council of Canadian universities, and Major General E. L. M. Burns, assistant deputy minister of the Department of Veterans Affairs, at the commission's Ottawa sittings in August. The universities then outlined their critical need for funds and recommended direct government grants and establishment of government scholarships and fellowships in all faculties. Major General Burns' brief urged the setting up of a government scheme of university scholarships, which eventually would grant scholarships in all faculties to 1,000 young Canadians a year.

In dealing with the opinions of public bodies, I need hardly mention the opinion of the Canadian Teachers Federation, because it has been quoted often in the house and elsewhere, and is well known. As to whether or not the teachers federation is representative, let me say that there are about 60,000 members of the organization scattered throughout the country. Hon. members from Newfoundland can tell you that there are 2,200 teachers in that province, about half of whom are now voluntary members of the Canadian organization, and at the moment they are negotiating a professional act by which they will become statutory members of the Canadian Teachers Federation. This particular body, of course, has presented briefs upon occasion to the federal government. I believe the last one was in February, 1949; it contained a resolution passed at their Ottawa convention. I should like to quote a few words from the resolution. It was resolved——that each provincial teachers' organization be requested to discuss federal aid with its minister of education, and that every effort be made to gain the support of the provincial governments in the appeal to the federal government for financial assistance for provincially controlled education.

There is little to say so far as teachers are concerned, because for years they have been strongly of this opinion.

I should now like to refer to what I might call lay bodies which are interested in education. The first one about which I have a note is the Canadian Education Association, with which there used to be embodied the Newfoundland Education Association. It is a lay body interested in education. It met in Fredericton, New Brunswick, from the 12th to the 15th of September, 1949, and heard prominent educationists express views as to federal aid. One of them, a man who is becoming nationally known in matters of education, was Dr. Althouse, president of the Canadian Education Association. Another one was Dr. A. W. Trueman, president of the university of New Brunswick. I should like to read the following extract from a news letter of the Canadian Teachers Federation:

Dr. A. W. Trueman, president of the university of New Brunswick, speaking to the C.E.A. convention stated that in his opinion equality of educational opportunity in all the provinces cannot be secured without considerable federal aid.

I shall not read the rest of the paragraph. That is the gist of the matter. Speaking of federal aid, Dr. Althouse, president of the Canadian Education Association, in his address to the Canadian Teachers Federation convention, used the expression, "straws in a wind of increasing volume and velocity". He used those words in regard to the fact that federal funds have been available in the realm of higher education for bursaries and scholarships to encourage and to maintain research.

[Mr. Knight.]

I have suggested that the resolution should be a non-political matter, and a matter with which lay bodies in Canada should be concerned. Then there is the Canadian School Trustees Association. I suppose a good many of us have been trustees of either little rural schools or town schools. Trustees are men from all walks of life, men of all political opinions, men of all creeds. They are not grinding an axe for the teaching profession. They are interested solely in one thing, the welfare of the children of Canada, and, through them, the welfare of the nation. I should like to read a resolution passed by the Canadian School Trustees Association which held its convention in Fredericton from September 10 to September 12, 1949. May I mention in passing that I am proud that a lady from my own city, Mrs. W. Walker, of Saskatoon, presided over their proceedings. The resolution is interesting; it reads as follows:

Whereas various educational bodies in all provinces are concerned with the present inequality of educational opportunity throughout the nation, and whereas present sources of finances are insufficient;

Therefore be it resolved that we ask the federal government to give grants in aid in order that the provinces may be able to provide equality of educational opportunity.

I believe that members of all political parties are interested in this matter. I have another quotation that I should like to read. It is taken from an address made in the house by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) on September 19, and reads:

Now that the matter of Canada's right to amend her constitution has arisen, and we believe that the constitutional rights and privileges of the provinces must be recognized and protected—

Perhaps I am answering the question my hon. friend wished to ask.

—we believe that ways and means must be found by agreement to assist the provinces in improving other public facilities, particularly those having to do with education. A modern system of education involves large expenditures in plant and equipment, but of the most vital importance is the type of person engaged in the teaching profession. As I have good reason to know, unfortunately many of our most able, most gifted and best fitted young men and women either leave the profession or do not enter it because of the lack of opportunities and remuneration it offers. The limited financial resources of some of the provinces, and the communities comprising them, simply cannot cope with this situation. In the discussions with the provinces I should hope that some consideration would be given to the problem of providing federal aid for education in all its branches, without restricting the rights of the provinces in that regard.

I think I have shown without fear of contradiction that a great body of public opinion across this country is in favour of that which I am advocating here today; but something must be done to educate a small and, I think, decreasing minority who have set themselves against federal aid in this connection, largely because of a lack of understanding. It is unfortunate that it should be always easy in this house to befog an appeal to reason by an appeal to emotion; and I have discovered that there is no more successful method of befogging an issue than to bring in something in regard to the autonomy of the provinces. Apparently in this country there is a minority who cannot discuss that question without letting past history enter into the argument. Somehow there seems to be a great fear and a great lack of trust on the part of one group with respect to another group. If we are ever to be a nation, if we are ever to have this national unity that we are forever talking about, we must learn to trust our people. Every time this matter has been brought up in the house some well-intentioned but misinformed hon. member has always regarded it as a deep, dark conspiracy by means of which someone, presumably the federal government, is somehow seeking to get control of the educational policy of a province or some provinces. Nothing could be further from my own intentions as sponsor of this resolution. The idea is simply that we would like a floor placed under education; that we want the federal government to guarantee to every child born in Canada, of whatever race, nationality or religion, a certain minimum education.

There is only one control that would be necessary by the federal government, as far as I can see, in granting—and note the words that follow—assistance to the provinces to get on with their own type of education. That control would be to see that money voted for the purpose of education was spent for that purpose and not used for the construction of roads or something of that kind. I want to direct the attention of hon. members to an address delivered by Mr. P. J. Kennedy on Education and Catholic Leadership, a copy of which came to my desk just recently. I wish hon. members would read this with some care. It is printed and distributed by Ottawa council 485 of the Knights of Columbus, educational committee, and presumably the address was delivered to that organization. Here is what Mr. Kennedy had to say; it is not very different from what I have said, except that perhaps he was more eloquent:

> I purpose to devote the major part of my remarks to the question of federal aid to education. In so doing I am not unmindful of the substantial contributions now made by the provinces and the municipalities and especially of the increased assistance given by our own department of education in recent years. Nevertheless, as a Canadian it is my duty to look upon education from the national point of view. Consequently, I favour federal aid to education as the best, if not the only means of effectively eliminating the glaring inequalities in educational opportunity which now exist among the provinces. I am convinced that unless such aid is given tens of thousands of children in Canada will continue to be denied that level of educational opportunity which is demanded for the development of their potentialities and for the progress of the nation. In addition, I accept the view that the federal government has power under the constitution to make grants for general education in the same way as it has been making them during recent decades for vocational and other types of education.

Before I broke off my general remarks to read that quotation I was referring to the arguments which no doubt will be advanced again, as they have been advanced before, against my suggestion to the effect that somehow or other the acceptance of money from the federal government would involve some interference in the policy and the content of provincial education. The gentlemen who advance that argument are the same gentlemen who had their hands out during the distribution of federal funds under what is generally called the family allowance. After all, is that not a form of federal aid to education? Is not that money supposed to be used for the good of the children in the family? Any parents who have the good of their children at heart certainly will see that education is not the sphere in which those children are deficient.

I have mentioned that one grant. What about the other grants that have been made by the federal government over the course of the years to aid education? There was an act in 1919 granting federal aid to technical education. Has that interfered with provincial autonomy? Has that interfered with the rights of anyone in regard to religion, language or anything else? What about the Vocational Education Act of 1931, under which there was a grant of $750,000 a year for fifteen years to be allotted among the provinces on the basis of population? Has that interfered in any way with provincial rights? What about the Youth Training Act of 1939 and the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act of 1942? Last but not least, what about the great scheme under the Department of Veterans Affairs, which has contributed so enormously to the general enlightenment of the people of this country?

Those are just some of the items. In its brief presented to the federal government in February, 1949, the teachers' federation goes into that argument. Let us see what they have to say on the matter. There are one or two pages of it from which I should like to make brief quotations:

> Federal aid for education is a need born of a shift in taxation. Meeting this need may involve fiscal control safeguards in the spending of funds from the federal treasury—but not policy control.

In other words, there would be no interference with the curriculum, but merely a means of ensuring that those funds, if turned over to the provinces for the purpose of education, would be used solely for that purpose.

The brief continues:

> In any plan of federal assistance, it would be understood and agreed that the expenditure of funds by the government of Canada would in no way be deemed to confer upon any minister or official of the government of Canada any right of supervision or control—

That seems to be definite enough.

> —over any school or educational institution with respect to which any federal government funds are expended.

I believe that is equally clear.

I continue to quote from the brief:

> The Canadian Teachers' Federation has never deviated from its stand that complete control of administration, supervision, teaching personnel, the curricula, methods and material of instruction, must remain with the provinces.

Why any educational authorities in any province should be so zealous in refusing money by which they could promote and encourage their own particular educational programs, I fail to understand. I can only put it down to a lack of understanding of this matter on their part.

I would urge once again that the government of this country see to it that this country does not lag behind the other civilized countries of the world in this particular matter. I believe, sir, I shall leave it at that.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the resolution under debate provides that—> —in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration means of expanding and equalizing educational opportunity across Canada, by the granting of financial assistance to the various provinces for that purpose.

I regard this as a subject of very great importance. So that I may be careful to avoid all possible pitfalls or any possible misunderstanding as to the extent to which I do advocate federal assistance in the field of education, I wish to make it abundantly clear in everything I have to say that I believe that the autonomy of the provinces in respect to education must be scrupulously observed. Great harm will be done, even approaching this subject with good intentions, unless we put beyond the realm of argument or contest the complete autonomy of the provinces and their exclusive control over the subject of education as applied to the content, curriculum and structure of the educational system.

Section 93 of the British North America Act leaves no room for doubt upon this subject. In part, it provides that:

> In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:—

The following provisions, Mr. Speaker, concern the things put beyond the reach of the provinces, such as certain of the guarantees given to separate and religious schools prior to confederation. Subject to that well-established exception, the provinces have been given complete and exclusive jurisdiction over education by the British North America Act.

Now, sir, the motion puts emphasis upon the necessity for equalizing opportunity. I am in complete agreement with that aim. I could not be more wholly in agreement with any subject than with the desirability of equalizing opportunity in Canada for all Canadian children—in this case just as far as education can effect that worthy purpose. I approach this subject with due regard to the great importance of education in Canada. One of the factors which has been of the greatest assistance to Canadians in making the great strides which Canada has made in the world in the past several generations has been the high quality and standard of Canadian education. I do not think, sir, that any Canadian needs to have anything but a feeling of intense pride as he surveys the quality and standard of education in this country.

Every one of us is a debtor to the educational system of his province. I am sure everyone in this house would be only too happy to recognize the value that educational opportunity has played in his life. At the same time, sir, everyone knows quite well from his own experience that there have been others, with talents which could have been developed with the assistance of higher education, who have not enjoyed the full opportunity of developing their talents because they were denied the opportunity of pursuing their education. I believe most of us can look back in our experience and recall many bright youths or young women who have been denied the opportunity to develop their talents fully because, for some reason or other—usually a lack of means—they were unable to carry their educational courses into the fields of higher education.

It is unfortunate that education is costly. Education is becoming increasingly costly, and that is one of the factors with which we must reckon. On the one hand, the provinces enjoy exclusive jurisdiction over education and, at the same time, bear exclusive responsibility for education. On the other hand, they have been ground between the upper and nether stones, with limited sources of revenue out of which to meet this heavy responsibility they are called upon to bear under our constitutional division of jurisdictional powers as between dominion and provincial spheres. As a matter of fact, education has become so costly in recent years that it may fairly be said that it has been going through something of a crisis.

I see this problem expressed in two forms; one in terms of inequality of educational opportunity as between Canadians in different provinces and the other in terms of the inequalities of opportunity as between individuals. Obviously, there is a limit to the extent to which the dominion may properly participate in meeting the cost of education. I affirm, sir, however, that there is no doubt that for some time there has been a general need throughout Canada for greatly increased participation by the dominion government in meeting the burden of the still rising cost of education in Canada. For dominion assistance in this field there is already abundant precedent and, I think in all cases, wholesome precedent. I shall mention some of these just briefly.

In the first place, in the field of technical education in times past, not always consistently throughout the years, but at least for the past generation, in most years there have been federal grants to assist technical education in the provinces.

In the second place, a beneficial and far-reaching dominion-provincial youth training plan has been carried out as a joint enterprise between the provinces on the one hand and the dominion on the other, operating through the Department of Labour. Since 1937 literally hundreds of thousands of young Canadians have enjoyed the benefit of training through the assistance of that co-operative plan.

In the third place, one thinks of course of the outstanding success that has been achieved in the training of veterans since the war as a result of this co-operation between the dominion government and the provincial departments of education. I consider it a triumph of co-operation. It shows what can be accomplished in this country when the governments in the two spheres, dominion and provincial, meet a problem in a spirit of co-operation. The number of veterans assisted through this beneficial plan is 130,000.

In the fourth place, in order to emphasize the fact that too narrow a view of education should not be taken, I cite the dominion assistance to another scheme carried out in co-operation with the provinces under the provisions of the National Physical Fitness Act.

As a fifth example, I mention a useful means by which the dominion has given assistance, through the Department of National Health and Welfare, to our schools of social work in Canada. These grants, distributed throughout the various schools of social work operating in conjunction with universities right across Canada for several years past, have been most helpful. The contributions have been timely. When the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare are under consideration in this house at a later date this session, I hope that hon. members generally will not only commend the provision made for assisting schools of social work but will also urge an increase in those grants. Increased assistance is greatly needed by the schools of social work attached to the various Canadian universities.

There is another project which I am satisfied will be a precedent—it should have been a precedent before this—and that is the establishment of a national library.

Mention has already been made, and I do not need to retrace the ground covered by the hon. member who introduced this resolution, of the study given to this problem by teachers and by the various organizations representing school trustees and boards of education.

Some will say that such bodies approach a problem of this kind with a certain interest. I do not think their representations, which have been frequent, should receive any the less consideration on that account. After all, teachers and those who are daily coping with the problems of meeting the cost of education are entitled to be heard on a subject of this kind. It is an incontestable fact, Mr. Speaker, that as between the various provinces of this confederation, the educational opportunities are not equal. The provisions made for school teachers' salaries in the various provinces are sorely lacking in equality. There are places in Canada where the school teachers are carrying on with simply miserable pittances. I speak with some feeling on this subject. My father was a school teacher and I know something of the problems in connection with school teachers' salaries. They have been notoriously low in this country from the beginning. At the same time I concede that noteworthy advances have been made, particularly in some provinces, in more recent times.

I should like to say to this house that my leader, in the five and a half years during which he was premier of the province of Ontario, at the same time held the important portfolio of education; and in the period of his administration of the Department of Education more was done to advance the educational system of the province of Ontario and more was done to raise the level of school teachers' salaries to a more reasonable height than had been done in the previous seventy-five years. I think that is a record upon which all the people of Ontario, regardless of party, will always commend my leader.

There cannot be any question about the power of the dominion to make contributions. The present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), in a public debate on this subject in Montreal in 1945, held under the auspices of an educational association, used these words:

> But the constitution does not prevent the federal government from giving substantial assistance to education. Direct assistance might be given in different ways.

Having regard to the needs prevailing in Canada, Mr. Speaker, I think the time has come when steps must be taken to give effect to the fact stated in that passage by the present Minister of National Defence.

Assistance should be given through the provinces. That is necessary and is urgently required. At the same time I hope that through the form of scholarships it may be possible to extend greatly assistance to worthy students in pursuing their education into higher fields, students who have proven their merit and their willingness to work but who, by reason of lack of means, do not have available to them today the opportunity of pursuing their educational careers.

About a year and a half ago I had the privilege of sitting in the gallery of the United States senate and listening to a debate on this very question. A bill introduced by Senator Taft was before the senate at that time; under it federal funds were proposed for the assistance of educational opportunity. A small minority who were in opposition of course raised the cry: Oh, but you are going to interfere with the exclusive jurisdiction of the states over education. But that view did not prevail. In the opinion of the majority of the United States senate, it was a view without foundation. If I thought for one minute, Mr. Speaker, that federal grants through the provinces, under agreements entered into with them, would be, or would be suspected to be, any interference with the autonomy of the provinces in the matter of the content of education, I would not be speaking as I am today in support of this proposal. But I believe that federal grants can be made available without interfering with the autonomy of the provinces, provided that this matter is pursued through agreement between the dominion and the provinces. This is one more reason why a general dominion-provincial conference ought to be reconvened at the earliest opportunity. Here is a need existing in Canada today, a pressing need, a need which I submit to you, sir, the dominion, with its ample sources of revenue and its ample budget surpluses in these days, dare not ignore, a need that can be met if the dominion will seek to provide financial assistance without interference with the autonomy of the provinces.

Sir, it is for these reasons that the party of which I am proud to be a member has pressed insistently for the reconvening of the dominion-provincial conference in order that agreement may be reached on this subject as upon other subjects of urgent importance, and that fruitful co-operation between the dominion and the provinces may result in great benefit to many Canadians. That is why also the party of which I am proud to be a member has advocated federal grants on the basis of fiscal need for the assistance of the provinces in relation to such provincial matters as education, health and welfare.

(Translation):

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, as I have not had, so far, an opportunity of addressing you while you were in the chair, you will no doubt permit me to congratulate you on the manner in which you are guiding the discussions of this house. We are all glad that you have been raised to that high position and we have absolutely no doubt as to the ability with which you will fulfil your duties, irrespective of the political affiliations of those who sit here.

The motion now before us is identical—in fact the wording is exactly the same—to the one which was moved by a former member of this house to whom the fortunes of election were not favourable. I refer to Mr. Zaplitny, former member for Dauphin.

I recall that on that occasion Mr. Zaplitny had made a very eloquent speech, giving reasons—which we think it is necessary to repeat at this time—why not only the provinces but the different organizations having to do with the education of both the young and the older people, should be asked to grant all the necessary aid. We should incite fathers and mothers to keep on giving to their children, or rather to their children's education, all the attention called for by their enlightened patriotism. Evidently education is necessary. Everyone should be educated to a certain extent, provided naturally that those who wish to benefit from the advantages of education possess the means of getting educated.

It often happens—and this is even more true in the province of Quebec where many families are indeed very large—that the tenth, eleventh or twelfth child has not the means to enter college or to complete his education according to his parents' wishes.

There are many reasons for this but I shall not give them all. Firstly, the parents have a large family to support and their income is not sufficient to give all the children a satisfactory education. However, in my province under agricultural programs which were drafted and carried out when I was a member of the legislature, it was often possible to add somewhat to the education of our farmers' sons. I am quite sure that very often tables submitted by various organizations at their conventions are not exhaustive. They could be supplemented by statistics from dominion agricultural training schools, experimental farms, and agricultural schools like those we have at Deschambault and at Ste. Martine where a short course is provided for. Statistics from schools of higher learning in agriculture could also be added. Perhaps the tables read into Hansard by the former member for Dauphin did not take into account the secondary school agricultural education—if I may use that term—given farmers' sons.

Parents, organizations and governments, everyone, in fact, appreciates the value and importance of studies that complete the training children receive at home.

In my opinion—and it is my first impression—the resolution, should it carry, might well encroach to a certain extent upon provincial rights. I come from the province of Quebec and respect the government to which the people have entrusted the administration of the province; however, I am of the opinion that before passing this resolution, the federal government and the members of this house should obtain the approval, co-operation and agreement of the provincial government. I am not saying that I doubt whether the present Quebec government would co-operate. Yet, judging from what has been done in the past, I am inclined to believe that we would not obtain its entire co-operation, which would be essential to grant the provinces the financial aid mentioned in the motion submitted by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), and to equalize educational opportunities across Canada.

I remember that during the recent dominion and provincial election campaigns, and during consideration of national health and welfare estimates in the house, I drew the attention of the house to one aspect of the National Physical Fitness Act passed by the dominion government in 1944. At the beginning of last April, only two provincial governments had still not agreed to seek the benefits of this federal legislation. During that month, perhaps following changes made in the dominion regulations or among who administer the act, the Ontario government agreed to co-operate in implementing this legislation. I remember the statement of the then premier of Ontario, who had replaced the present Progressive Conservative leader in the house. With the support of figures, which I have not before me, he outlined the advantages which the implementation of this act would make available to community centres. In my own constituency of Portneuf, as in the majority of Quebec constituencies, we had understood the meaning of this act, we had anticipated that, after this act had been approved by my province, we could obtain grants that might be allocated for the construction of what we call recreational and educational centres. The construction of these centres is controlled under the physical fitness act.

I make no effort to conceal that I may have used, during the elections, rather scathing expressions to describe the provincial government. I am not in the habit of using stinging words, but I wanted to make things clear. I was asking the people of my constituency and the provincial government to contribute to the enforcement of this act, which I believe is absolutely necessary and which would allow various parish and other organizations in my constituency and in the other constituencies to receive substantial grants that would make it possible to build recreational and educational centres. Everyone is aware, of course, that such centres can include bowling alleys, pool tables, a library and various pieces of gymnasium equipment for our young people.

My friend the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin) is looking this way. He is doubtless thinking of the axiom mens sana in corpore sano, we are taught in medical school. Events have shown, however, that it is not always so. Those who have read history and the account of the wars waged by the Grand Condé will remember that he was defeated by the army of Count Fontaine while the latter, stricken with paralysis, was rooted to his chair while directing his troops. An axiom is therefore not always true, but there must needs be an exception to confirm the general rule.

In any case, I am convinced from personal experience, that physical fitness centres would be a great asset not only to the youth of our cities but more particularly to the young people of our rural communities.

If in the past we were right up to a certain point, we are even more justified in deploring the present situation and in complaining about the desertion of rural areas. Statistics are there to prove it. Perhaps we are somewhat to blame for not having known how to keep our young people on the farm, how to interest them more and more in matters pertaining to rural life.

I will now quote words which were spoken in the Quebec legislature and in my presence by a former provincial secretary, the Hon. Athanase David:

"Too often, when giving an example in arithmetic, we mention city buildings having ten, fifteen or twenty storeys, and so many rooms per storey. How many rooms in the building? Instead we should give our children an example of a fruit tree bearing apples, the very sight of which makes the mouth water, and say: 'There are so many branches on this tree, so many apples on each branch. How many apples are there on the whole tree'?"

The attention of our young men has not been sufficiently drawn to rural problems. We have not directed our youth towards rural life, nor have we shaped its mentality accordingly.

You, Mr. Speaker, and a number of others who are listening to me now and who, born in the country, now live in cities, know that rural life is not without charm; however, you also know why so many young men wish to come to the cities.

In any case, we are not discussing farm desertion but education, and I believe that if the provincial government would but accept the physical fitness act, we could co-operate with that government and make adequate grants, but especially more of them.

If my recollection is good, the federal quota fixed by the council established under the physical fitness act is $120,000 a year. Let Quebec province match this amount and the total would reach $240,000 per annum. In ten years, the sum thus paid out would run up to a fairly large figure and could be spread throughout the province. Subsequently an understanding could be reached leaving the administration of these grants to the provincial government so as not to infringe upon provincial autonomy.

These two grants, put together, would enable us to set up these recreational and educational centres which would go a long way towards attracting and holding our young people on the farm.

Therefore I believe that the Quebec government should reconsider its refusal to apply that act. Something must be wrong, because all the other provinces have put it into operation.

When I listen to our hon. friends to the left speaking on this famous question of provincial autonomy, I am led to believe that the representatives of the province of Ontario are as much in favour of autonomy as the representatives of the province of Quebec. I notice the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) smiling his approval. Since the province of Ontario has accepted, provincial autonomy is therefore not in jeopardy because of this act. So I have no doubt that my hon. friend and colleague, the member for Three Rivers, will want this act to be accepted by the province of Quebec, so that we may receive some of those substantial grants.

I have no doubt that, being convinced beforehand as he is, he would be a most efficient spokesman in an interview with the prime minister of the province of Quebec. I personally would hesitate to make such a request, as I have had occasion to feel that I did not have the necessary political complexion to achieve success, and I would confidently entrust such steps to the hon. member for Three Rivers.

However it may be, I am sure that if the prime minister of the province of Quebec, or rather his government, would reconsider their decision, we could obtain those grants.

I believe that discussions like the one prompted by the motion introduced by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), even though we are wont to call them academic or full-dress debates, are absolutely necessary. It is worthwhile to have such discussions from time to time. It allows us to burrow more fully into big books which would otherwise remain unopened. They are such good friends, and I believe they have a right to complain that our attention is rather directed somewhere else. I congratulate the hon. member for Saskatoon for having brought up this discussion.

You know, Mr. Speaker, there is no minister of education in my province, to look after these matters. We have a provincial secretary, and he is the one entrusted with the task of upholding in the legislature all bills on education.

There is however a superintendent of education who takes instructions from the council of education, which, I feel, is a very good way to manage education in my province. I am not in favour of a department of education, as I would like the administration of education to remain as it is at present. I have confidence in the council of education, in the superintendent of education and in the provincial secretary, and I know the government, generally, wishes to adopt the legislation I mentioned a few moments ago.

During the course of five years, if I may say so, we have lost a considerable amount in grants which we could have used to build educational and recreational centres.

I am not at all convinced, Mr. Speaker, that the government of my province would have recognized and accepted the necessity of co-operating in the implementation of the act.

The hon. member for Saskatoon, I believe, stated that there is no danger of encroaching upon the rights or autonomy of the provinces, because after the war the dominion government inaugurated what is known as vocational training. I do not believe that the same principle applies as far as the army regulations implemented by the Department of Veterans Affairs are concerned. One cannot assert that there is no danger of encroaching upon provincial rights, since the federal government has already made grants for vocational training following the war. That assistance arose from the need of training men who had volunteered for service overseas and risked their lives, especially those who attended seminaries, classical and commercial colleges or universities. In all fairness to those who had spent five years of their lives overseas in the fighting forces, it was imperative to find a way of helping them carry on with their classical and business studies or with their special training. Since this was an emergency, I do not think that we infringed upon the rights of the provinces. If, however, provincial autonomy is encroached upon in this instance, I believe that agreement could be reached after consultation with the only province that has not approved the legislation mentioned earlier, just as we came to an understanding in matters such as old age pensions.

This is not the first time that a member has, in this house, urged federal grants for the education of our young people. During the dominion and provincial election campaign, every candidate spoke about a specific piece of legislation.

Many have stated that the law had really been drafted by the provincial government. Others, not quite so bold, did so in quieter tones. There is no better set-up than that of family allowances and it is the government which I support which gave us that act.

The Family Allowances Act was approved without any encroachment upon provincial rights. Passed by the Liberal government of Canada, it is of great help in the education of our children. If I remember rightly, and if my understanding of the act is fairly correct, children who receive family allowance benefits must attend school until they are sixteen. This proves that in addition to giving mothers the means to clothe their children and to give them, when they often go barefoot in the snow, unmindful of the danger of respiratory diseases, the necessary medicine and medical care, the government has provided mothers with better means to buy those things which are necessary for their children.

This legislation will also help mothers to send children to school, when they reach the age of five or six. At this early age, they already attend the rural school or, in the city, kindergarten. Family allowances help the mothers to provide better clothing for their children; their little darlings are just as well dressed as the rest of the small fry. They will take legitimate motherly pride in the fact that their children are as well dressed as their little friends. In their hearts they will thank the government that so kindly thought of helping them to keep their children in school until the age of sixteen, and to provide them with educational opportunities which will fit them for further study in business and classical colleges, if they so desire, where they will be trained to become professional or business men and even, as everyone has the right to hope, representatives in the House of Commons.

That is why we are now discussing this motion which deals with the education of our children. As my hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Langlois) points out to me, we now have a foundation; we have a plan called the youth training program, which is implemented through the co-operation of the dominion and provincial governments. That program has been accepted by my province, which has received the grants given for the building of commercial and technical schools. That evidences a desirable and beneficial co-operation between the provincial and dominion governments, in the best interests of the people.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak at greater length, but I feel that others intend to speak. However, I would again ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to grant tax exemptions to those who have children in secondary schools or in universities. I am not unaware, though, that this request has also been made by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage), as also by every member in the house.

It is not perhaps entirely up to the children to continue their studies, but I understand that some find it possible, whenever the opportunity arises, to earn a few dollars during their holidays. Because tuition fees are high, in many cases the father's income does not allow him to provide for a son or daughter in high school or college. The father is sometimes not in a position to see his child through.

So, if he were permitted to deduct a certain amount and thus to enjoy an exemption, I believe that would be, on the part of the dominion government, another step, on top of many others already taken in the interests of our young people's education. I hope my appeal will be heard this time. Nevertheless I do hope the Minister of Finance will kindly grant a more substantial exemption to heads of families, so that they may give their children a university education.

(Text):

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to deal with some points that have been raised in connection with this motion, and also with the purpose of the motion itself, which seeks to place before the government for consideration recommendations which I personally have had occasion to make, both in my official capacity while minister of education, and publicly since that time in the position I now hold.

There can be no doubt about the fact that the ability of provincial governments to finance education in a way that will give real equality of opportunity to children growing up in their own provinces is one of the most important considerations of our combined system of government within the Canadian federation. I have advocated that for some time; I advocate it now. This resolution, however, only deals with part of a much broader problem though, even so, I intend to support the motion. I would point out that the amount required by any province to give adequate educational opportunities within that province under its own educational system can be determined only when it is also known what actually is the over-all financial position of the province. For that reason I have stressed, both in this chamber and elsewhere, the urgent necessity of calling a dominion-provincial conference to consider the whole relationship between the dominion and provincial governments so the financial requirements of the provincial governments for all purposes may be fully considered and the amount required to provide adequate educational opportunities may therefore be determined with some knowledge of what is required by each province for that particular purpose.

The hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) has spoken of the necessity and desirability of co-operation between the dominion and provincial governments. He mentioned one particular and very limited subject which has been considered by the departments of education of the various provinces, a relatively small item in comparison with the general over-all problem; but he has not mentioned certain of the much wider subjects already being dealt with by agreement between the dominion government and the province of Quebec, as well as the province of Ontario and the other provinces of Canada. Mention was made by the mover of this resolution of the remarkable results obtained in the education of veterans following the last war, and in the rehabilitation instruction that was given under agreement between the dominion and provincial governments. Scores of thousands of young men and women received a remarkable education under new plans of education which in themselves have been extremely helpful to the departments of all provinces, because new methods were used which have produced very satisfactory results. In those cases plans were worked out satisfactorily and in complete harmony between the dominion and provincial governments. Very considerable sums of money were spent by the provincial departments of education, which were received from the dominion government under agreements which left the whole setting up and administration of the educational system entirely under the direction of the provincial departments once the general plan had been settled. That worked out extremely well. Certain aspects of that program are still being carried forward; and if evidence were required of the possibility of effective co-operation between the dominion and provincial governments—all provincial governments—it can be found in the success of that plan. Nor is that the only case in which there has been effective co-operation of this kind. In certain apprenticeship training and similar matters there has been extremely good co-operation, and this has been going on for many years.

I would point out that the important consideration is that the assistance given from the dominion treasury should not be used as an indirect control over the educational systems within the provinces. I mention this only because the point has been raised by the member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier). I can speak only for the Department of Education of the province of Ontario, but the reason that department did not accept the relatively small amount offered by the dominion government for a physical fitness program for some time was that there was a direct attempt to exercise control over that program in the schools of the province. Again being in a position to speak with regard to this matter only for the province of Ontario, because of my official contact with the problem, I may say that the Ontario government did avail itself of this relatively small amount when the attempt to exercise that control was discontinued. I can say most definitely from my own experience that the fact the attempt was made in this case to exercise control by an indirect method is an indication that, in providing for grants of this kind, there must be a definite understanding that the independence and discretion of the provincial departments of education will be retained, no matter what the amount of the grants may be.

Just to keep this in proportion, in view of the fact that it has been placed on the record, I should like to point out that the physical fitness grant which was offered by the dominion government to the province of Ontario while I was minister of education amounted to $74,000 a year. The Department of Education of that province is spending several million dollars a year on its physical fitness program.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I never denied that.

Mr. Drew: I am not suggesting the hon. member for Portneuf did. I am only pointing out that the amount is not one which bears very much relationship to the over-all problem. The Department of Education for the province of Ontario is spending approximately $50 million a year on education so that, while $74,000 is an important amount of money, it is a comparatively small amount in relation to the total sum which is being spent by that province. The grants, which are on a basis proportionate to the other provinces, would bear a corresponding relationship to the general problem of education.

I mention that, not because I have any thought that the hon. member for Portneuf attempted in any way to misinterpret the situation, but because on certain occasions elsewhere there have been attempts to magnify this subject. Attempts have been made to create the impression that certain facilities were being denied because of the lack of co-operation. I say that not one single thing that could be done about physical education or community centres was withheld because that $74,000 was not available. The only reason that particular amount was not received at that time was that there were strings attached to it which would have given an indirect measure of control over certain matters that were the responsibility of the provincial Department of Education. I am very pleased to say that the restriction was removed, and because it was removed that amount is now being received.

May I also point out that the cost of education has mounted enormously during the past few years. Speaking from my personal experience in connection with education, and just to indicate the extent to which those costs have been increased, I should like to recall that, in the case of Ontario for example, the year before I assumed the office of minister of education the total contributed to school boards from the provincial treasury was $7,830,000. The amount now contributed is in excess of $35 million a year. This illustrates the growth of the expenditure on education within a comparatively few years.

Mr. Fauteux: This amount which the hon. member has mentioned is not solely for physical fitness?

Mr. Drew: Oh, no.

Mr. Fauteux: It is for general educational purposes?

Mr. Drew: While there are adequate physical fitness programs, I have departed from that subject. I am not suggesting for one moment that $35 million per year is being granted for physical fitness. What I said was that the year before I had responsibility for education in the province the grant to school boards amounted to $7,830,000, and to indicate how educational costs have grown I said the grants for that purpose are now around $35 million. The over-all budget in that one province approximates $50 million. The increase in cost has been general throughout Canada. For that very reason the provinces must have added sources of revenue to maintain education and to give the opportunities that are becoming increasingly available through the advances that have taken place.

The mover of this resolution has referred to the work of the Canadian Educational Association and to the emphasis of that association on the need for greater financial support of education throughout Canada. The Canadian Education Association affords an excellent example of the way that matters of common concern to the provinces can be advanced by the co-operation of the different provinces. The experience of each province is pooled to the common advantage of every province in Canada. This education association is a semi-official body. The Department of Education of every province is represented and, almost invariably, the senior officials of the association are members of the various departments of education or leading educationists. This association does not attempt to lay down a uniform pattern for the whole of Canada, but the officials of the different provincial departments meet and explain what is being done by the various provincial departments to advance education in the provinces. Out of that exchange of experience, there has been a tremendous advance in educational standards throughout Canada and a general improvement in understanding how to deal with the problems of education.

One of the reasons that education is costing a great deal more money than it did a few years ago, and that it is bound to demand increasing expenditure, is the very real effort that is being made to raise the salaries of the teachers and to provide modern facilities for education in the most remote areas of the country as well as in the urban centres. In the past few years a great advance has been made in the type of schools that are being built. Not only are the modern schools using the advances made in construction, new methods of lighting and heating, and improved design, but they are also being built in order to make full use of the increased facilities for transportation which make it possible for schools to accommodate the pupils of much larger areas. In that way it is possible to bring into single schools, even in remote rural areas, a number of teachers who can have the advantage of their combined efforts. There is also the advantage of making it possible for teachers to specialize in different subjects and exchange information in the different classrooms.

There is, however, this important consideration which cannot be emphasized too often. Even if we built in Canada the finest schools that have ever been constructed anywhere, we would have done nothing to advance our educational standards unless those who are teaching in those schools are highly qualified to teach the children that come under their direction. For that reason, wherever the school may be and whatever type of school may be under consideration, the effort of all those concerned with the advancement of education in Canada should be to raise to a level that is in keeping with their responsibility the salaries of those to whom we are entrusting to a considerable extent the whole future of Canada.

This may be an obvious statement, but it is one which should be repeated over and over again. The standards of our national life in the years ahead will depend to a considerable degree not only upon the technical and academic standards of our education but more than on anything else upon the ethical standards of our education and the character that is implanted in our youth by the education that is given in our schools.

I am not forgetting for a moment that education does not begin in the schools. It starts in the home, at the mother's knee. Then the next stage of education is in the churches where it carries on. The broader phases of education are the responsibility of the schools of all types in every part of the country. The character and the spirit of our youth, the confidence of our youth in their own future, will depend upon the character of our teachers and also in great measure upon the spirit of the teachers and the feeling on their part that the value and importance of their work is being recognized by those who employ them.

One of the most remarkable things about the advancement of this country of ours is the unselfish spirit of service and sacrifice that has inspired our teachers at times when many of them must have felt the importance of their work not being fully recognized by those who engaged them. There have been improvements, however; in many places there have been great improvements. But having regard to the place that the education in our schools will take in the building of our nation, I think it can properly be said that next to the church itself there is no higher calling to which men and women can devote their brains and their service than that of teaching the youth who will guide the destiny of Canada tomorrow and in the years ahead. In approaching this subject, therefore, and in considering the importance of giving to it the attention that it deserves, emphasis must be placed not only upon the necessity of meeting the physical and structural requirements of education but also upon the necessity of advancing the opportunities of the teachers themselves, of not only raising their salaries to levels that are in keeping with their responsibilities, but of also opening to our teachers even wider opportunities of continuing education in their own chosen profession.

There is great need for educational opportunities for teachers themselves, because education is advancing all the time in the facilities that are available and in the way in which it can be imparted to the children. Just in these last few years great strides have been taken in the use of moving pictures in the schools. This is a field in which an agency of the dominion government, the national film board, can be of great assistance, because there are almost infinite opportunities for advancing the education of our children in many lines through the impact of the visible impression upon their minds. Whether it be in such subjects as history, biology, or the practical subjects such as physics and chemistry, or whether it be in the cultural subjects such as music and art, the possibilities of the film are almost limitless. There is a field in which an agency of the dominion government can co-operate effectively in the work that is being done. But in mentioning that, it also needs to be emphasized as well that to give these facilities to all the schools a very considerable expense must be incurred in providing the equipment that will translate those films into actual educational opportunity in the schools themselves.

Then, also, great advances have been made in the opportunity for education by the radio. At the present time most, if not all, of the departments of education in Canada are making use of the radio within their own provinces for the purposes of carrying education into the classroom. There is another mechanical device which is not being used to the extent that it could be, but which is extremely useful, namely, the sound record. Now, with the development of modern records that will play for fifty minutes, whole courses of instruction can be given on particular subjects, and through this device the most highly trained educational experts available in the whole country can, with their own voices, give instructions in the subject in which they are so highly qualified, and in that way the most remote classroom, whether it be in the Arctic or in the remote northern coast lines on the Atlantic or on the Pacific, can have the advantage of personal contact with the greatest brains in this country, in a way that never before was regarded as possible.

These things are only the beginning. Perhaps at the moment television may be regarded as highly experimental, but past experience with new devices teaches us that this also will experience great advances in the years ahead. Each of these things, as it comes along, provides new opportunities to bring to our children the best training, the best standards of skill, the best qualifications, right into the classroom. It is no longer necessary for a single teacher, teaching all the classes in a single classroom, to try to teach the children to sing when that teacher was never gifted with a talent of song. Now, by bringing into the classroom by radio, by record or by the film, instruction in music, the greatest voices in the world can impress upon the children the quality of music and what it means to their own satisfaction.

The same is true of the things that are taking place from day to day. They can actually hear history as it is being made, and the great speeches at momentous times in the world's history can now be carried into the classrooms at the very moment they are being made, instead of being brought at some distant day in the form of the written word to leave its first impression upon the child's mind.

I have taken the time to review these things only to impress the fact that, along with these vastly increasing opportunities, will come vastly increased expenditures on the part of every school board in every part of Canada. For that very reason I believe it is important that the provincial departments of education be assured of that measure of financial support which is necessary to bring to reality the desire that I am sure is shared by every hon. member, that real equality of opportunity in education shall be extended to all Canadians, no matter where they live or what the material circumstances of their parents may be.

There is no single thing upon which money can be better spent than upon this great subject of education. There is another aspect. We are being called upon to provide increasing sums of money not so much for the health of our people as for their sickness and, in many cases, to deal with permanent and irreparable damage to the human system. The old Latin maxim mens sana in corpore sano is one which also carries the reverse connotation; because while it is true that we usually find a healthy mind in a healthy body, we shall also be most likely to find a healthy body where a well-trained mind has given to the individual that measure of self-discipline that, having regard to the physical ability of any individual, will make it possible for him best to meet not only the general test of life, but the physical test as well. Many of the crippling accidents that are limiting and impairing the whole future of so many of our children today would never happen if our education were on a level where the self-respect, the self-discipline, the ethical standards of our youth imparted by education provided the greatest possible safeguard against some of these misfortunes.

At a time when we are seeing millions upon millions being spent for those whose minds are gone beyond repair, and when we see millions upon millions being spent upon those who are incurably disabled as a result of personal weaknesses, and accidents which were themselves the result of failure to apprehend obvious dangers, and at a time when we see the increasing burdens of sicknesses that could have been avoided—that is the time for us to recognize that education is not something only to teach people how to make a living and how to enjoy living; rather it is also something to equip people to meet the physical as well as the other tests of life.

Therefore while this resolution covers only part of the problem, I do believe it is one which merits the wholehearted support of every member in the house. Before closing these remarks however I would emphasize that it is essential that there be an examination of the whole field of dominion-provincial relations, so that the provincial requirements in respect of health, education, and all these other responsibilities, considered to be provincial responsibilities under our constitution, may be fully examined, and that we shall not deal with these things piecemeal but that we may place the provinces in a position of being able to meet the demands properly made upon them by the people who have chosen the provincial governments as their servants.

In any event it will be helpful to have emphasized the need for support in educational matters; and if this debate serves no other purpose at the moment, I hope it will help to emphasize that there is a high degree of unanimity within the House of Commons as to the desirability of assuring to every child in Canada, wherever they may live, or under whatever conditions, whether they have parents capable of taking care of them, or whether unhappily they may be orphaned and dependent upon others, that to the limit of our power we shall make the words "equality of opportunity" a reality, so that in the years ahead we may build a nation based upon character and upon educational understanding of the great opportunity it is to be a Canadian and to live in this land of ours.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would be impossible for me during the two or three minutes remaining before six o'clock to attempt to deal at all adequately with the resolution before the house. I am sure all hon. members have welcomed this opportunity of focusing their attention upon this assertion, one which certainly appeals to each and every one of us, that there should be across Canada the greatest possible degree of equality of opportunity for the education of our young Canadians, the Canadians of the next generation.

Whether or not the granting of financial assistance by the federal government to the various provinces could be arranged in such a manner as to avoid exercising any direct or indirect control over the field of education, which is essentially within provincial jurisdiction, is a question offering greater possibilities of controversy.

There is no doubt that every one of us, as a Canadian citizen, is vitally concerned with the necessity of there being maintained in this country adequate educational facilities to produce the kind of citizens who may be able to make the best possible use of the bountiful resources with which Providence has blessed our great country. And there can be no doubt that, since the cessation of hostilities, the program devised to provide educational facilities for veterans of war has been of great assistance in the maintenance of the efficiency of our educational institutions. I think many of us feel that, without the assistance it was possible to provide during that period, many of our institutions would have found it very difficult indeed to maintain their activities to the high degree which is so satisfactory to the Canadian public.

Personally I have no doubt that it will be necessary to find some way in which these institutions can continue to be supplied with that which is necessary to them to maintain that high standard in their educational activities. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) referred in a most interesting manner to some of the facilities which modern developments in science and equipment make available now to promote education in our institutions of learning. Some of them are activities in which the federal government is engaged.

Hon. members know that, at the present time, there is a royal commission investigating the problem as to whether or not we are making the best possible use of the public moneys being expended for the promotion of the development of the aspect of national life in Canada which is not measured in statistical trade returns, or in dollars and cents, or pounds and shillings. Though the reference calls upon that body to confine its recommendations to matters which are within federal jurisdiction, it will be impossible for them to formulate such recommendations without looking at the whole picture throughout the Canadian nation, and without seeing the other activities under provincial jurisdiction which contribute to the same development. It will certainly be a matter of months before we can obtain a report from that commission, and I should think it would be wise not to attempt to determine with any degree of precision how the purposes can best be served until we have had that report.

It may be that there are other hon. members who would wish to participate in the discussion of this problem, and perhaps at this time the most convenient thing to do would be to adjourn the debate.

Mr. Knowles: No. On a point of order, would the Prime Minister just ask that it be called six o'clock, rather than move the adjournment of the debate. I have in mind the effect of standing order 27.

Mr. St. Laurent: Then if Your Honour would call it six o'clock, this debate would remain unfinished.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, and it will be first next time.

Mr. Church: It involves a change in the British North America Act, and would extend to all the civil service, including the police.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not wish to engage in a discussion of the point at the moment. However, it being six o'clock, I suggest that further debate on the matter might take place at some other time.

Mr. Knowles: Next Wednesday.

Mr. Church: It could be done by a subvention, could it not?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: It being six o'clock I understand that the Speaker leaves the chair without question put. Tomorrow the first order of business will be the continuation of the debate on the resolution standing in my name with respect to amendment of the British North America Act. If that is disposed of we will proceed with second reading of Bill No. 12, to establish the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation; then Bill No. 62, respecting forest conservation. As has already been announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), whatever progress may be made on those measures, at eight o'clock he will reintroduce the budget resolutions. I assume that, in accordance with the usual practice, after his speech and some remarks by one of the hon. members of the opposition, the debate will be adjourned. If it is adjourned and the other matters have been disposed of, then estimates will be resumed.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, October 20, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

PANDIT JAWAHARLAL NEHRU

ARRANGEMENTS FOR ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT ON OCTOBER 24

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members are aware, the Prime Minister of India, Pandit Nehru, will be in Ottawa during the early part of next week, and arrangements are being made to have this distinguished gentleman address the members of both houses of parliament in this chamber at three o'clock on Monday afternoon. Because of the proposed visit it will be necessary to delay the opening of the ordinary proceedings of the house until 4.30 o'clock on Monday; and if I have unanimous consent I should like to move:

That when this house adjourns tomorrow it stand adjourned until Monday next at 4.30 in the afternoon.

Once this motion is adopted, arrangements for this visit will be completed.

It would be appreciated if hon. members would arrange to be in their seats just before three o'clock on Monday. Seats are being arranged for members of the Senate on the floor of the house. His Honour the Speaker has directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to cancel all the ordinary sessional gallery tickets for this occasion, with the exception of tickets to the Senate and Speaker's galleries. Hon. members are being provided with special tickets to the galleries for their ladies. These tickets are being distributed to the whips today, and the arrangement suggested is that the ladies of members be admitted, before other ticket holders, between 2.30 and 2.35. Other ticket holders will be admitted to the galleries between 2.35 and 2.45, at which time the galleries will be opened to the general public.

If this arrangement appears to be satisfactory, it will be carried out.

Motion agreed to.

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY—APPLICATIONS FOR RATE INCREASE

Mr. Fulton:

1. Does the dominion government telephone service base its rates for service in whole or in part on telephone rates charged by commercial telephone companies?

2. If not, on what basis are its rates assessed?

3. Is the dominion government opposing or otherwise the applications of the British Columbia Telephone Company, a Bell Telephone subsidiary, and the Bell Telephone Company for increases in telephone rates?

Inquiries of the Ministry

4. Is the dominion government or the Department of Transport to be represented in any way before the board of transport commissioners on the hearing of the above-mentioned applications? If so, how is it to be represented?

Mr. Chevrier: Stand.

Mr. Church: I should like to call the attention of the house to the fact that last Friday I asked a question similar to this, and it is not on the order paper. In the standing committee I moved that no increase in rates be allowed for three years.

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. gentleman will put his question on the order paper, we shall be very glad to answer it, along with the question of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton).

Mr. Church: The board of transport commissioners has exclusive jurisdiction over railway rates. A royal commission has been appointed, but it is not finding out anything.

Mr. Speaker: Question stands.

RENT CONTROL

QUESTION AS TO FEDERAL POWER OF ENFORCEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. J. Henry (Rosedale): I should like to direct two questions to the Minister of Finance. Is there a lawsuit pending in the Supreme Court of Ontario in which certain property owners ask that court to determine whether the federal government has ceased to have legislative power to enforce rent control in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Henry: What steps is the federal government taking to be sure that all possible facts will come before the court in evidence to enable the court to decide whether or not the federal government has power to continue rent control in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: It seems clear that the questions which the hon. member has asked are ones which should be placed on the order paper.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

VANCOUVER HEADQUARTERS—TRANSPACIFIC SERVICE—ALLOCATION OF PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Transport. Reports from Vancouver indicate that a proposal is now under consideration by Trans-Canada Air Lines to transfer a substantial portion of the shop work away from Vancouver and to transfer or lay off a considerable number of employees. Will one of the ministers make a statement on this report?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Some time ago there was a plan to organize Vancouver as the terminal for the transpacific service of Trans-Canada Air Lines. Since then it has been decided to grant the franchise for the transpacific service to Canadian Pacific Air Lines. The result has been that Canadian Pacific Air Lines have concentrated their headquarters for both domestic and overseas services at Vancouver. The fact that the overseas service will not be operated by Trans-Canada Air Lines makes some rearrangement necessary in the plans that had been made for Vancouver. To what extent changes will be made, I do not know, but it was described to me as a minor change in the allocation of personnel.

Mr. Green: Does the minister know how many men will be involved?

Mr. Howe: I do not know.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I ask a supplementary question? Since Abbotsford is the only fog-free airport in British Columbia, will consideration be given to transferring the Trans-Canada Air Lines airport from Vancouver to Abbotsford?

Mr. Howe: Abbotsford is kept in reserve for emergencies. When any emergency arises, a transfer may be made to that field.

REPRESENTATION OF WESTERN CANADA ON BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he has received representations from the Winnipeg chamber of commerce requesting that western Canada be represented on the board of directors of Trans-Canada Air Lines? If so, will consideration be given to such representations?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Speaker: I believe that question also might be put on the order paper. I do not know that there is great urgency about it.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of privilege, may I say that I intended to do that—

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Knowles: —but the question was related to the question asked by the member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), and I felt it might well be answered at this time.

FRUITS AND VEGETABLES

TOMATOES FROM THE UNITED STATES—DUMPING RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, this question is urgent, and I should like to direct it to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture. The Minister of Finance said on October 4 that dumping restrictions were still in force in respect to fresh fruits and vegetables imported into Canada. Will the parliamentary assistant say why tomatoes are allowed to be dumped into Canada from the United States?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): I shall take notice of the question and give an answer later.

Mr. Fraser: May I ask whether an answer will be given before the tomatoes go bad?

FREIGHT RATES

NEWFOUNDLAND—MARITIME FREIGHT RATES ACT—SHIPMENTS VIA CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is it correct that, through a misinterpretation of the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada and a misapplication of the Maritime Freight Rates Act, Newfoundland importers and businesses are paying twenty per cent more than they should for freight shipments via the Canadian National Railways?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Speaker: I may say that it is extremely difficult for the Speaker to determine whether or not the question is one which should be placed on the order paper when there is so much noise in the house. From what I did hear of the question, however, it would appear to me it would be better if it were placed on the order paper.

Mr. Higgins: It is a very important matter.

Mr. Speaker: As I say, I could not hear the question. I do not know whether the minister heard it.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I did, Mr. Speaker, and I think perhaps there is some urgency about a part of the question. It is worded in such a way that it gives information rather than requests it. In any event, I must tell the hon. gentleman that I am not aware of any misinterpretation of the terms of union; neither am I aware of any misapplication of the Maritime Freight Rates Act. I doubt very much whether businessmen or manufacturers in Newfoundland are paying twenty per cent more for freight than they should. My understanding is that the freight rates in Newfoundland are much lower than they were prior to union with Canada. I am sure the hon. gentleman will understand that when a new freight rate structure is established in a province, there are bound to be some complaints. I should not be surprised if there were complaints, and perhaps discrimination. I am sure that the parties aggrieved will wish to present their case before the board of transport commissioners and have it dealt with there. I understand that is already under way.

Mr. Higgins: The question is based on a statement by the premier of the province.

WAR SERVICE MEDALS

QUESTION AS TO ENGRAVING OF NAME AND REGIMENTAL NUMBER OF RECIPIENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence or his parliamentary assistant whether it is true that the war medals now being distributed to veterans are not engraved with the name and regimental number of the recipient.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): It is true. The medals which were distributed after the first great war did have engraved upon them the name and number of the recipient. But this time there were a great many more. As hon. members know from the publicity given to the matter, a man might be able to win eight. Some three and a half million medals have been produced by the mint. It was estimated by my colleague the Minister of National Defence and myself, when this matter was undertaken, that it would delay the production and the sending out of the medals by something like two years if the names and numbers were put on them. For that reason mainly, they were not put on, and the medals are going out without being so inscribed.

UNITED NATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO NOMINATIONS FOR ELECTION TO SECURITY COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or, in his absence, to the Prime Minister. Has the government indicated to the Canadian delegation at the United Nations its wishes with regard to the election of the three new members of the security council for the year 1950, specifically as between Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia? If so, is the government prepared at the present time to make a statement of its intention?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The government has indicated its views as suggestions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) who heads the delegation at Lake Success. But, as has been the unbroken practice of Canada since the beginning of these meetings, we do not disclose in advance how we intend to vote—the vote is secret, and by ballot—for these offices.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

GALLERY OF PRIME MINISTERS' PORTRAITS ON SIXTH FLOOR—MR. ATTLEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can he say why the portrait of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom has not been added to the portrait gallery of distinguished prime ministers on the sixth floor?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I do not really know why it has not been added to that gallery, but I assume it is because the officials of this house and of the other place have no portrait available. It may be, Mr. Speaker, that having heard this question, you will see fit to arrange that one be made available and added to the portrait gallery of distinguished prime ministers.

Mr. Speaker: If it is the wish of the house, I shall be pleased to do so.

POST OFFICE

CHARLOTTETOWN—SPECIAL ALLOWANCE TO STENOGRAPHERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I desire to direct a question of importance to the Postmaster General. I have been waiting a couple of days—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McLure: In his absence I will put it on record. Will the Postmaster General give a full explanation of the withdrawal of the special stenographic allowance of $5 a month that the stenographers at the Charlottetown post office have been receiving?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I think, Mr. Speaker, the question is one which might very well be put on the order paper; it is of the kind that the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) could not be expected to answer offhand; he would have to secure the information. I think that the most convenient way of handling the matter would be to have the question placed on the order paper, whereupon I am sure it will receive careful attention.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING

The house resumed, from Tuesday, October 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King praying that a measure be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act, 1867, relating to the amendment of the constitution of Canada, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Knowles.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): It is always difficult, Mr. Speaker, to resume a debate after an interval of days.

As I said the other evening, this debate has been singularly free from any manifestation of the national pride which permeated the hearts and minds of those in the United States who, from 1840 to 1866, both before and after the civil war, contributed to a discussion of the fundamental principles of the United States constitution. One thing has been pre-eminent in the outstanding addresses made in this debate by the four party leaders and other hon. members. There has been a realization on the part of all of us that we are not temporary tenants of freedom. We are actually making provision for the rebuilding of our constitution, discharging our responsibility as trustees for freedom of those who follow after us.

We can understand the reasons for the lack of national interest in a debate such as this; for all of us in this country accept the great heritage of our freedom. The British North America Act contains no charter of liberty as does the constitution of the United States. It is not couched in grandiloquent language. It is marked by simplicity. It advances no principles of government or of political philosophy. It makes no declaration of the rights of man, as our cousins south of the line do when from time to time they speak with eloquence and power of a constitution that is couched in magnificent language.

I think the precise draftsmanship of the British North America Act has in large measure denied to us the opportunity to express the pride which the people of the United States have in their constitution, and which in such large measure has given unity to the people of that country. All of us who read extensively on this subject must be impressed by the fact that our great leaders in parliament have not left personal records of the history of their time as it came within the ambit of their public life and experience. One can go into the library and read the records of the steps in the development of our nationhood, but except for Pope's "Life of Macdonald" and Skelton's "Life of Laurier," which involve in part a reference to state papers, our national leaders other than Sir Robert Borden have failed to leave an intimate record of day-to-day experience as it has come to them during their period of office. I hope that the former prime minister of this country, Mr. Mackenzie King, will proceed with his memoirs and thereby give to posterity a record of one of the most challenging periods in our constitutional history. I hope, too, that Mr. Arthur Meighen, whose contribution to parliamentary government was, I believe, among the greatest in this country, will not only prepare a book containing his speeches, but will also give to posterity a record of the great developments that took place during his period of office, and particularly during the days of the first great war. These things animate peoples. The records of our great leaders become the history of this country. These are of the things of which the national spirit is built.

Our constitution contains no provision for amendment. All of us must have endeavoured to secure some information as to the reason why no provision for amendment was made. It suggests itself to me that the reason was this. There is only one way to amend a statute, namely, by act of parliament. One of the things that has held back the national development of our country which we might reasonably have expected has been the fact that our constitution, in its rigidity, has denied a development in social spheres which would be in keeping with the advances made during the last thirty or forty years.

In his book, "The Governments of Europe," Dr. W. B. Munro gives the reasons why it is necessary to have provision for an amending process in relation to the constitution in these words—

> The amending process may fairly be called a most important feature of any constitution. The purpose of a constitution is to preserve order, but it cannot preserve order unless it promotes progress—and it cannot promote progress unless it is capable of being amended either formally or by judicial interpretation to meet the new needs that arise. A constitution should not be too easy to amend; for in that case it will fail to secure order, stability and continuity in the nation's political life.

We should mark these words so far as constitutional freedoms are concerned. I continue:

> Nor, on the other hand, should it be too difficult to amend, for it will then clog the wheels of political progress and serve as an incentive to coups d'état or revolutions. The ideal amending process is one that assures stability without impeding the normal development of political and economic activities among the people. On this general principle all makers of constitutions have been substantially agreed.

Our constitution is amendable in three ways. One is by custom or convention. A reading of the British North America Act will indicate the extent to which, as a result of custom and convention throughout the years, many of the provisions of the act have become inoperative. In the British North America Act there is no provision for a cabinet. The right of the dominion to dismiss lieutenant governors of the provinces, or to a lesser extent to disallow provincial statutes, has fallen into disuse; yet it is part of our constitution. The power of reservation to the king of legislation passed by parliament is no longer effective. Custom has changed that. Indeed, in 1929 at a conference of the dominions it was agreed that the power of disallowance of Canadian legislation by the king no longer existed. The same process of constitutional change by custom has taken place in the United States; the electoral college was set up as a body to ensure that the best qualified in the United States and the greatest potential leader of that country would become the president. Within ten years that express provision was no longer in effect.

Having agreed that there is a need for constitutional amendment other than through custom and judiciary interpretation, one arrives at a point on which there is diversity of opinion among hon. members of this house and the people of this country. To amend the constitution, as has been pointed out over the years, is not a simple matter. The seductive simplicity of the plan now before the house will not spell the end of controversy in this country. As I see it, the problem is not one of urgency at this session of parliament, because the part of the constitution with which we are dealing belongs to all our people. Earlier I mentioned the doctrine of the compact theory. I care not what one's views may be, Mr. Speaker—whether one believes that the British North America Act was a pact, a compact, a treaty or a contract; above everything else, being the possession of all the people of Canada, the constitution, if unity is to be preserved, should be amended only in a spirit of co-operation on the part of the federal and provincial authorities.

I do not believe in the veto of any one province of portions of our constitution, other than those preserving constitutional freedoms; for to accept the principle of veto would be to deny the onward march of events. Having said this, I deny as well the propriety of an attempted coercion of the provinces to achieve amendments to the constitution.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) mentioned—and they have been referred to since—the precedents that have been established year by year since confederation. The precedents until 1946 were on matters regarding which there was little or no dispute. But in 1946, by a simple majority of parliament, a change was made in the British North America Act that did in effect concern the dominion and the provinces. Some ask me: What foundation have you for that? Well, Dr. Ollivier has been quoted on a number of occasions. In his evidence on the subject before the parliamentary committee he said that section 51 should be amended only with the consent of a majority of the provinces and the dominion.

The amendment of 1946 became a precedent, and that precedent is being applied in the present case. The necessity of amendments is generally agreed to in the house. The British North America Act endeavoured to reconcile the great and abiding principles that are our British tradition, with the experience in the United States that resulted in the civil war in the sixties, but could not be expected to meet all of the complex problems arising over eighty years.

The amendments that are necessary are those which will readjust the terms of our constitution—let me make it clear that in no case do I refer to the constitutional freedoms when I say that—to make it a charter of progress which will permit the realization of the yearnings of the people—not too flexible, not too rigid; flexible, but not too fluid; not too rigid, for if so it brings about the kind of stultifying limitations we have in respect of social services; and it should be sufficiently elastic to meet the needs of changing conditions. I remember hearing a former minister of justice in this country, a great constitutional lawyer, giving evidence in 1935 before a committee set up by parliament, say that what the constitution needs—and I use his own words—is "elastic rigidity".

I wish to refer for a moment to the question whether the pact theory is historically correct. Mention has been made of the stand taken by Mr. King in 1925, and by Mr. Meighen in 1925 and on other occasions, both of whom described the act as a pact, as a treaty or contract.

On February 18, 1925, a resolution was brought before the house by Mr. W. F. Maclean, seeking the amendment of our constitution. I shall not read it in detail, but it is of interest to note that Mr. Woodsworth, a former leader of the C.C.F., and a great Canadian by any measurement, did not hold the view of hon. members who now sit to my left. Perhaps I should read the resolution, which stated:

> We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects . . . pray that you may graciously be pleased to give your consent to submitting a measure to the parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act, 1867—

To which Mr. Woodsworth moved in amendment, asking that these words be added—

> Upon first obtaining the consent of all the provinces of Canada.

That was in 1925.

Mr. Coldwell: I know that is correct; but did not Mr. Woodsworth subsequently change his opinion?

Mr. Diefenbaker: In 1925 Mr. Woodsworth moved that amendment. I have not followed up for any variations and changes of opinions. I do say, however, that in 1925 he said that the consent of all the provinces was necessary. Not satisfied with that, Mr. Irvine on February 19, 1925, as reported at page 323 of Hansard, moved a further amendment respecting minorities—

> . . . that, before action be taken on the proposed resolution, the same be referred to the conference proposed in the speech from the throne for consideration and recommendation.

That, sir, is exactly the stand we take in the matter. We say it should be submitted to a conference. We say there is need of compromise between federal and provincial authorities if the aims and desires of our people are to be achieved. The spirit of tolerance which animated the fathers of confederation must animate us in all parts of Canada. We have two divergent groups in this country to consider, one of which is for ever speaking about our lack of sovereignty and our subservience.

Where is the lack of sovereignty? In 1925 Mr. Mackenzie King, speaking in the House of Commons, indicated that to ask for amendments to the British North America Act through the British parliament was no evidence of subservience. It was simply an indication of the failure of the Canadian people as a whole to agree as to the method to be adopted. He concluded, as reported at page 334 of Hansard—and I shall only summarize what he said—that Canada could have her constitution amended any time she asked for it. Yet there are still political Don Quixotes who, every year or so, are wresting from the imperial parliament imaginary powers long since obsolete. They are afflicted with what the Prime Minister calls an inferiority complex. They are for ever dilating on badges of colonialism—which have become out of date, by custom, and have ceased to exist since the Statute of Westminster, following the Balfour declaration of 1926.

Had I time I would refer to quotations indicating that the Balfour declaration in fact represented the consensus for many years in all parts of the commonwealth. Then there are the strong and outspoken imperialists who believe that any advance in the process of self-government will lead to disruption of our relationship with the commonwealth and empire. No Canadian can but be proud that through the warp and woof of our constitution are the golden threads of our British heritage.

I believe in the British relationship—and I speak as one whose racial origin is not all British. My paternal ancestors came here for freedom under the British crown. I want to see that relationship continued and expanded in the closest concept of our commonwealth. Our problems will not be solved by extremists. There must be a spirit of compromise, lacking in the resolution before parliament. What we are in fact setting out to do is to delineate by a definition of parliament the responsibility and jurisdiction of the federal authority. The Prime Minister shakes his head to say no—in appearance, no; in actuality, yes.

I find it necessary often to quote Mr. Ernest Lapointe, for in the years that he occupied high positions in Canada he epitomized that statesmanship which brought together many of the adverse elements in our country. An experienced statesman, he knew the problems of this country. The Prime Minister has contended that the dominion will not secure the power under this amendment to interfere in any way with provincial jurisdiction. Is the line of demarcation clear? On May 11, 1931, the former minister of justice (Mr. Ernest Lapointe) said:

> I have said that the system to amend the constitution is vague. We really do not know what are the amendments in respect to which the assent of the provinces should be first received and those in respect to which such consent is not necessary.

And he referred to the shadowy boundary between them. The right hon. gentleman said that the government does not intend to infringe upon the jurisdiction of the provinces. When did they develop that attitude? Since 1922, in the Fort Frances case, the government of which he has been a member has on more than one occasion infringed upon the jurisdiction of the provinces under the doctrine of emergency. Only ten years ago the doctrine of economic emergency was extended to the doctrine of defence emergency.

My right hon. friend avers that the courts will prevent invasions of the provincial jurisdiction. The United States supreme court is part and parcel of the constitution, and actually rewrites the constitution in the judgments it gives. I would point out that in the United States—I am not advocating that system—while the judges of the supreme court are nominated by the president the appointments must have the support and acquiescence of the United States senate, thereby assuring that under their constitution as far as possible no consideration other than judicial fitness will be a reason for appointment.

The question arises: What procedure should be followed? I shall not deal with the question of procedure, except to say that in the dominion-provincial conference of 1927, to which the Prime Minister made reference, the matter was discussed. What happened? Page 11 of the report sets out what actually took place when no agreement could be arrived at. It was not a case of truculence or lack of patriotism on the part of those in attendance, because I think almost all the representatives were of the Liberal party. They could not come to any agreement.

The matter continued to be referred to until 1935, when there was another dominion-provincial conference. If ever a dominion-provincial conference met under auspices which might lead one to expect the dove of peace to be present, it was that conference of 1935. There was only one dissenter in the group so far as politics were concerned, and that was Mr. Aberhart from Alberta. There were representatives from eight Liberal governments. Who was it that dissented? Mr. McNair, the present premier of New Brunswick, was the one who dissented from the recommendations.

In 1927 Mr. Lapointe suggested that the proper way to proceed was by joint resolution of both houses of parliament, with the approval of five of the provinces. In the case of sections 93 and 133, and subsections 12, 13 and 14 of section 92, the consent of all the provinces should be required. Much the same general viewpoint was expressed by Dr. Ollivier in the evidence which he gave before a parliamentary committee in 1935 that there are 53 sections where consent is not required, of which some are out of date. There are 40 sections where the consent of the provinces would not be required; there are 12 sections where the consent of one province would be sufficient, and there are 39 sections—including section 51, which was amended in 1946 by a simple majority of parliament—where the consent of a majority of the provinces would be required. Finally, the consent of all provinces would be required in connection with sections 5, 6, 7, 93, and 133, as well as subsections 12, 13 and 14 of section 92.

It is dangerous for this parliament in effect to say to the provinces: You could not agree during all these years, so we intend to go as far as we can and divide this constitutional amendment into two parts. Anything that can be interpreted as coercion would deny the desire of the Canadian people to achieve that confederation which we all desire. Coercion, or any suggestion of it, will spell disunity and is a denial of the faith of the fathers of this country. Our democratic system is a matter of compromise, not of counting. Under a dictatorship the individual is counted; under a democracy he counts.

There are those who say that the doctrine of compact has no application. I do not intend to argue that question for I cannot speak with the assurance of those who say definitely that the B.N.A. Act is a compact and those who say definitely that it is not. We want to preserve this federal union. There can never be a dictatorship in this country as long as our federal union is preserved. A dictatorship comes only under a unitary state.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired, but I am sure he has the unanimous consent of the house to continue.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not make it a practice to speak beyond the period allotted to me, but I shall complete what I have to say in a matter of a few minutes. I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, and through you the hon. members of the house, for granting me this courtesy.

On October 13, 1943, the Prime Minister spoke to the Women's Canadian Club in Montreal on this subject, and the report in the Montreal Gazette reads as follows:

> The only remaining restriction standing in the way of complete freedom from the British parliament was that which makes it necessary to apply to Westminster for an amendment to the British North America Act, which constituted Canadian confederation.
> That restriction, said Mr. St. Laurent, was placed there "at our own request."
> "We are all, I think, agreed that whenever it (the constitution) has to be amended, that operation should be performed by our own representatives right here within our dominion," he added.
> "But we have not devised a scheme to make such amendments which will provide proper safeguards for the rights of the provincial authorities and of minorities, now secured under the terms of the British North America Act."

That is what the Prime Minister said in 1943. As we are not to have a committee of parliament on this subject, I now ask the Prime Minister what plan the government of Canada will submit to the dominion-provincial conference. What subjects of legislation is it intended shall be exchanged between the dominion and the provinces? What are the safeguards to be provided in respect of section 133 and the other fundamental sections which provide for freedoms? How is section 133, which deals with languages and other matters, to be preserved for the benefit of future generations? I ask the Prime Minister whether it is intended, when this address passes this parliament and finally becomes law at Westminster, to amend section 133, and if so, in what particulars? These are some questions which the people of this country would like to have answered. Why the inordinate haste, if the situation be as clear as the Prime Minister says it is, and only matters coming under federal jurisdiction will in fact be dealt with by legislation? What are the matters coming under federal jurisdiction that will shortly find their way into this parliament in the form of legislation introduced as a result of this amendment? The house as a whole has a right to full information.

Why not wait until a constitutional convention is called, such as was recommended by Mr. Bennett in 1937 and approved by Mr. King as the ideal way to go about it? That method was conceived many years ago in the mind of Sir Clifford Sifton, one of the great statesmen who came out of western Canada. It was his idea that such a conference should be convened, giving equality of representation to the provinces and to men of all political faiths. It was his hope that their deliberations would have the same result as the deliberations of those who formulated the constitution of the United States, and of those who on occasions since have made recommendations for the content and scope of constitutions in other states. It was his hope that those attending such a conference could join together, not as partisans but as Canadians, to recommend changes in the constitution to remedy provisions which constitute a detriment to the development of this country. Again I refer to Mr. Ernest Lapointe, who, on February 19, 1925, pointed to the dangers of arbitrary action. We are not here to fight over the internecine difficulties that exist as between the Prime Minister of Canada and the premier of Quebec. We are here as Canadians to try to work out a solution to a problem that has tested and challenged the statesmanship of Canadians through the years. Is there anything new in this partly bifurcated step? Mr. Meighen thought about this in 1925, but realized that it would create an anomalous situation in dividing the manner and means of amendment of the Canadian constitution without first having consultations with the provinces.

With the overwhelming majority the government enjoys, sometimes it seems futile to speak here. We cannot hold them back. We cannot determine their course. Warn we can that to bring in this measure before convening either a dominion-provincial conference or a national assembly for the purpose of considering methods of amending the constitution augurs danger for the future. For it may well turn out that this address, instead of being a landmark in our forward march, will be the gateway to constitutional confusion. Cynicism, despair, fear that we cannot get Canadians together, should not prevent the convening of a conference before this address goes to the British parliament, and where there is unfairness or injustice on the part of anyone in the conference or a refusal to co-operate, the Canadian people will know the facts. We shall never secure what we all want, the kind of Canada pictured by Vincent Massey in his monumental work, by expressions of animosity or truculence as between dominion and provincial authorities.

So once more, Mr. Speaker, I ask, why the haste? Why not postpone this measure until the next session of parliament? Call a conference. If it proves abortive, if we have the power to do what the Prime Minister contends must be done, I will join with him, no matter what others may do, and support him. I shall make my contribution, humble though it may be, to the rebuilding of a foundation that will bring about a constitution in keeping with our responsibility as a nation.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise at this time to reply to the arguments which have been advanced against the course proposed by the government. It will be my privilege to do that at a later stage of the debate. But let me say at once to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that no matter what disposition may be made of this resolution, I hope we will have his support in our forward march toward the destiny that lies ahead for our country.

I would point out to the hon. member that there are some of us who, in the face of what has been going on, and with all the precedents that have been referred to and commented upon, prefer half a loaf to no bread at all. Though it may be said that this is doing things piecemeal, we would rather have this piece than not have anything.

Because of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I thought at this time I should say that, in spite of what the hon. member for Lake Centre said the other evening, many of us do see some merit in the principle embodied in that amendment. If no reservations were being made in this resolution, there would be no occasion for the amendment proposed by the hon. member; but I think we all recognize that there are no greater safeguards for the democratic institutions of our nation than the right of parliament to be assembled at least once a year and the right of the people periodically to express their satisfaction or dissatisfaction with those who represent them in parliament. I am as firmly attached as any Canadian could be to the other privileges mentioned—with respect to education; with respect to the use of the English and French languages in this country, and so on. They are rights which I do not think would ever be interfered with by any free parliament, but as to which there is a feeling that it would be more comfortable to have a safeguard expressed in formal terms. If that be so in connection with the rights of a part of the citizens of Canada, be they majorities or minorities, it does not seem illogical that there be some expressed formal guarantee of the right of the whole of the people of Canada to have their representatives called together at least once a year, and also their right to have their representatives come before them periodically to receive the verdict of the people as to whether they are satisfied or dissatisfied with the manner in which their representatives have been attempting to represent them in their parliament. After all, parliament is not the parliament of the government, nor the parliament of those who are elected to sit on these benches; it is the parliament of all the Canadian people.

Though I am convinced that neither this parliament nor any successive parliament would lightly attempt to interfere with any of those rights, I see no logical objection to having them expressed, when other rights are being entrenched by the proposal that is now before the house. It does seem to me, however, that there might be an occasion when a large majority of the members of parliament would feel it would be against the interests of the country to have an immediate election. It is conceivable that that could be the case, for instance, in times of war. It did happen once. It is conceivable that an overwhelming majority would feel it would be contrary to the best interests of the nation to have an election. It takes about three months to hold an election, and there are periods when it would be most embarrassing to a government charged with the responsibility for the security of the Canadian nation to be thrown into the midst of an election campaign.

During most of the last war I was charged with part of the responsibility of government. There were many, many months during that war when I think it would have been dangerous to the country to have held an election. I believe it would be wise, if we do entrench those provisions, to have a proviso that could not be lightly relied upon, but would be there in case an overwhelming majority did feel that, under war conditions, it would be dangerous to the safety of the state to have an election. That happened in the United Kingdom during the last war. I think it was the feeling of the overwhelming majority in the country that it was wise to avoid having an election.

I would, therefore, ask one of my colleagues to move an amendment to the amendment, which would strike out some of the words that appear to be unnecessary in a constitutional amendment, such as the reference to section 20 and section 50 of the act. Certain words would be added at the end of the amendment. The amendment to the amendment which I would have proposed would strike out in the fourth and fifth lines the words, "requirement of section 20 of this act," and substitute therefor the word "requirements;" and strike out in the seventh and eighth lines thereof the words, "or as regards the requirement of section 50 of this act," and substituting therefor the word "and". Then, at the end of the proposed amendment there would be added, after the words "five years", the following words, "from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the house." Then, this proviso would follow:

Provided, however, that a House of Commons may in time of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection—

I may point out that those are the words in the War Measures Act which describe that condition.

—be continued by the parliament of Canada, if such continuation is not opposed by the votes of more than one-third of the members of such house.

My experience has been that in times of stress, most if not all of the members of parliament sink their partisan feelings and do endeavour to act in a manner which they believe in their hearts and consciences is in the best interests of the country. I would think that if this proviso were worded in that fashion, then a continuation of parliament could be prevented by a third of the members of the house and the constitution would take its course. If there were an overwhelming majority, and I can conceive of a condition in which there might be no objection whatever from any quarter, it would be possible to postpone an election for a reasonable time. It would have to be a reasonable time, otherwise the members would not give it their support.

I do not propose this amendment because I apprehend there will be any circumstances during our lifetime when it would be apt to be used. If, however, the resolution is passed and implemented by the parliament at Westminster it is something which will go into the constitution. In my view, it will not be wise to have a constitutional convention for a long time, and to disregard eighty-two years of our experience since confederation. We had a very interesting and sincere debate the other day upon the doctrine of stare decisis. A great deal has been decided under our constitutional act of 1867. I think it would be a mistake to throw all that aside and to start with new language and new texts. In such a case, the whole process might have to be gone through again. The decisions rendered might no longer be applicable to the kind of language that would be used.

After all, the very preamble of the British North America Act is an expression of the desire of the people of the colonies of that day to have a constitution modelled on the British constitution. The British constitution is the result of experience, the fumbling, if you will, the trial and error of centuries. It seems to me it would be the part of wisdom to retain the old structure and make such alterations or improvements from time to time as the living generation may feel it in order to do. We should retain the substance of that which has been the outgrowth of the language used in the original act. Because I foresee the continued existence of much of the language of the British North America Act, and because no one in these days can be sure what the future may bring, I think it would be wise, if we do entrench these essential rights of the Canadian citizen with respect to his parliament and his government, and to have a proviso that might some day be useful.

I would therefore ask my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), if he would move, as an amendment to the amendment, the words I have cited. If that subamendment were adopted, it would mean that the amendment as amended would read as follows:

The amendment from time to time of the constitution of Canada, except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces, or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other constitutional act granted or secured to the legislature or the government of a province, or to any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or French language, or as regards the requirement of section twenty of this act that there shall be a session of the parliament of Canada at least once each year, or as regards the requirement of section fifty of this act that no House of Commons shall continue for more than five years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the house, provided however that a House of Commons may in time of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection be continued by the parliament of Canada if such continuation is not opposed by the votes of more than one-third of the members of such house.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Before this motion is put, will the Prime Minister permit a question purely for clarification? When you speak of one-third of the members, I take it that you mean one-third of the members present and voting?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, Mr. Speaker; I thought that would then be a serious matter and that anyone who was not in agreement that an election should be postponed would come forward and say so. It could not be done except with an almost overwhelming majority. In drawing this amendment I felt that it would be a matter of such gravity that anyone who took the view contrary to that of the majority should come forward and register his vote against the proposed continuation. I am not making this answer to the hon. member as an argument, but merely to clarify what I had intended in drafting the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You did consider the point?

Mr. St. Laurent: We considered it, and it was done purposely to accentuate the gravity of the matter with which it was supposed to deal.

Mr. Fleming: Will the Prime Minister permit another question in order to elucidate the effect of the amendment? In the case indicated by the Prime Minister, suppose the two-thirds vote is not favourable; what is there then to prevent parliament, by a simple majority in both houses, proceeding to pass an address asking the parliament at Westminster to suspend those two sections of the constitution which require the holding of an election every five years and a session of parliament once a year?

Mr. St. Laurent: There would be nothing but the sense of responsibility that would have developed in the Canadian nation by exercising at home its control over its own affairs. There would be no other thing than that. But I would imagine that if and when this is done, and if and when, after a conference with the provinces, the other provisions are subjected to a process of amendment in Canada, it would then be rather distasteful to members of parliament to recognize the fact that they could not, under the machinery they themselves had set up, do what was required and that they had to ask a parliament responsible to other electors than their own to do it for them.

Mr. Adamson: May I ask the Prime Minister this question? It would then take eighty-eight recorded votes in this house to postpone an election?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, provided there were no vacancies and there was a majority that felt it could take the unusual step of refusing to the electors an election at the given moment.

Mr. Adamson: It is just a question of procedure.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is something which, during the whole of the last war, my predecessor always stated he would not take the responsibility of proposing. The hon. gentleman will remember that there can be diverging views in perfectly good faith about that, and even changing views. If my memory serves me correctly, the leader of the opposition in 1915 agreed to or did not oppose the extension of the life of parliament; then in the next year, when a further extension was proposed, he did oppose it. It is a matter which I think members try to deal with according to their own views of what is at the moment in the best interests of the nation.

Mr. Green: May I ask the Prime Minister a question, Mr. Speaker? As I understand it, this amendment would mean that the present government, which has over two-thirds of the members of the house, could, if it so wished, extend the life of parliament beyond the five years.

Mr. St. Laurent: That question is, I suppose, merely for clarification, Mr. Speaker; but a hypothesis like that would not arise except in the case of war, real or apprehended. I can give the hon. member the assurance that for the duration of this parliament there is no thought at the present time that there need be any fear about war, real or apprehended.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the Prime Minister this question? Where does the Senate come in?

Mr. St. Laurent: The act would of course have to be passed by both houses of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does it say that in the amendment?

Mr. St. Laurent: It says by an "act of parliament". An act of parliament is something that is passed by both houses and is assented to by the crown. What it does add to the ordinary formalities of an act of parliament is this fact: If one-third of the members of this house are opposed to it, it shall not be enacted and become law.

Mr. Church: It just makes a scrap of paper out of the British North America Act.

Mr. Garson moved:

That the amendment proposed to the resolution be amended by striking out the words "requirement of section 20 of this act" and substituting therefor the word "requirements" and by striking out the words "or as regards the requirement of section 50 of this act" and substituting therefor the word "and", and by adding at the end of the proposed amendment after the words "five years" the following words:

"from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the house; provided however, that a House of Commons may in time of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection be continued by the parliament of Canada if such continuation is not opposed by the votes of more than one-third of the members of such house.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): This amendment to the amendment, Mr. Speaker, merely serves to emphasize why this motion should not be proceeded with at this time. It recognizes that there was considerable concern, in the minds of the provincial governments and of those who understand our federal system, about a course of this kind. In the original motion there is a reservation with regard to education and with regard to minority rights. The fact is that if this motion were as clear as the Prime Minister and those who have spoken in support of it say that it is, there would be no need for a reservation of any kind. But the very fact that the reservations are there recognizes the uncertainty of this procedure; and now when another matter of concern is raised, a new reservation is introduced, this time one not affecting directly the rights of the provinces as provinces, but affecting the rights of the parliament of Canada to continue its life beyond the ordinary period of five years. With the purpose behind this amendment of assuring that there will be a meeting of parliament once a year, and an accounting to the electorate at least once every five years, I am sure there will be agreement everywhere in this house. But it is only one of many things that are of concern in regard to the amendment or possible amendment of our constitution. True, the periodic accounting of the elected representatives of the people to those who elect them is the very hallmark of democracy; and certainly the representatives of the people in this democratic assembly should make sure that nothing is permitted to limit the right of the people to have those they have chosen appear before them to give an account of their stewardship during the time that they have sat in the parliament of Canada. The desirability of assuring such an accounting, the desirability of making sure that parliament will meet regularly and not be suspended, as it was on one historic occasion in Great Britain many years ago, may be a very commendable thing, but the fact is that this amendment to the amendment is simply something to attract attention and produce no practical results.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was asked whether there would be anything to prevent a subsequent submission to Westminster to remove this limitation he said, as he had no choice but to say, that there would be nothing to prevent such a submission being made by the parliament of Canada except that measure of responsibility that would exist in the minds of the members of parliament because of their experience. Is the Prime Minister suggesting that we who have been boasting of our sovereignty have not developed that responsibility yet? Certainly we have. And that responsibility has been demonstrated for many years. It is because of that responsibility that every one of us believes that we should have the full right to amend the whole of our constitution here in Canada for Canadians by the elected representatives of the Canadian people without anyone outside Canada having the right to say how any part of the constitution shall be amended in the future. But this limited concession to a natural concern about the danger of the unlimited extension of parliament is only an admission that there is no clear procedure, and nobody knows what would happen if this amendment goes through.

This amendment itself, and the amendment to the amendment, constitute themselves the very best argument why this motion should stand. The very fact that it is considered desirable to put this amendment and the amendment to the amendment before this house is evidence of the concern that does exist about the fact that there is no established procedure now known to hon. members as to how our constitution will be amended if this motion passes. This amendment, with its subamendment, does not in any way lessen the basic weaknesses of what is now proposed in this house.

It seems to me that one thing has been overlooked by hon. members in the discussions that have taken place. Since I had the privilege of speaking earlier on this debate on the motion itself a number of statements have been made which have indicated that those who are supporting this resolution are of the opinion that its adoption will give to the parliament of Canada the right to amend the constitution only in regard to those matters that are exclusively federal. I ask every hon. member to read the resolution again, because that is not what the resolution says. The resolution says the very opposite. The resolution does not follow what has been said in this house. At pages 833 and 834 of Hansard the Prime Minister said in this debate:

This resolution deals only with matters which concern exclusively the federal authorities.

And that is what has been put before hon. members; but that is not what the resolution actually says. The resolution is something entirely different. The Prime Minister pointed out something that should not be forgotten at any time in the consideration of the effect of this resolution. He pointed out that there are three fields of legislative and administrative responsibility that are affected by the constitution of Canada under our federal system. The first is that field that, subject to definition and judicial decision, may be regarded as exclusively federal. The second is that field that may be regarded as exclusively provincial, and the third is that field that is occupied to some extent by both the dominion and the provincial governments, or in which there may be a common interest. Bearing that in mind it is very important in the consideration of the effect of this resolution when we are told that this relates alone to those matters that are exclusively of federal concern. This is what the resolution says. After that part which calls for an amendment to the act it would provide that the following would be inserted:

> The amendment from time to time of the constitution of Canada, except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

That is a very different thing. If this resolution were passed there would be the power to amend the constitution of Canada in regard to all matters which are not exclusively within provincial jurisdiction. If these words mean anything they mean that the power to amend would cover not only the field of exclusive federal jurisdiction but also that intermediate field as well where there is some overlapping interest from the legislative or administrative point of view so far as the dominion and the provinces are concerned. Instead of this resolution calling merely for the power to amend those things which are exclusively federal, it would give to the parliament of Canada the right to amend all those things that are not exclusively provincial.

Mr. St. Laurent: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he not think the expression, "or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other constitutional act granted or secured to the legislature or the government of a province", does include everything that would be the provincial part in joint matters?

Mr. Drew: No, I do not agree that that covers it. I certainly do not agree that that covers it, because there are a number of matters where there is very real overlapping in administrative responsibility at the present time.

An hon. Member: Such as?

Mr. Drew: Such as agriculture; such as health; such as public welfare. And, Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if there is not, behind the haste for this resolution, some hidden reason that has not been disclosed to the house. I am wondering if the real reason behind the resolution is not that there is an intention to avail themselves of the power which would be conferred to invade that middle area, and by presenting this submission to Westminster now to be free at the next session of parliament to deal with something that is not at this time being disclosed.

Mr. St. Laurent: I hope the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) does not intend that as an insinuation that anything is being withheld in this debate by members of the government.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I have a very definite reason for being greatly concerned about the adequacy of that information, and it goes back to a reply made by the Prime Minister on February 4 of this year to a question relating to this very subject. At page 232 of Hansard there is a record of a question and answer which, I believe, has a real bearing upon the extent to which the members of this House of Commons should be perfectly sure that they do know all the implications of this resolution. At page 232 I asked this question:

> Mr. Speaker, there is a matter which I suggest does require that some information be given to the house, in view of other proceedings which will be taking place. In a radio speech last night the Prime Minister said, in part:
> "You all know that the terms of confederation are set out in the British North America Act. That act is the foundation of the Canadian union. The British North America Act is a most important part of the Canadian constitution. But it is also a statute of the British parliament. Every time we Canadians want any change made in the British North America Act we have to go through the form of getting the change made by the parliament of the United Kingdom. As a Canadian, I do not like to have to do that. What is more, I feel sure the United Kingdom parliament does not like it either. I believe we Canadians should work out a method of making our constitutional changes right here in Canada."
> In view of the fact that certain matters are before the house which may well raise a question as to the necessity of amendment of the British North America Act, I believe the house should be informed this afternoon whether it is the intention of the government to take proceedings which would have the result of empowering the parliament of Canada to change our constitution, and if so, whether that is to be done without consulting the provincial governments.

To that the Prime Minister replied as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, no one could contemplate anything of that kind without consulting the provincial governments. As the leader of the opposition knows, there was a consultation with the provincial governments ten or twelve years ago, perhaps more than that. The negotiations reached a stage where it was required to have the provincial governments consider the situation as it had developed throughout the conference. While that consideration was being given by some of the provincial governments, there was a provincial election in my province which brought about a change in government, and the matter dropped. The procedure which I believe would be required to deal with a question of the kind would be similar to that which was followed at that time, some twelve or fourteen years ago.

May I repeat that sentence, because that, after all, is the undertaking by the Prime Minister of Canada as to their intentions concerning amendments to the constitution:

The procedure which I believe would be required to deal with a question of the kind would be similar to that which was followed at that time, some twelve or fourteen years ago.

I was astonished to hear the Prime Minister say that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) must be naive if he thought that his undertaking to consult the provinces had related to that part of the constitution which affected the affairs with which the dominion parliament is concerned. But the Prime Minister of Canada on February 4 gave a definition which is open to no misunderstanding. He did not merely say that they were going to consult the provinces; he said they were going to follow the course that was followed back in 1935. Therefore every one of us has the right to examine what happened in 1935. We had the right then, and we have the right now, to see that his undertaking was clear, and that the government will ask the house and parliament to follow the procedure agreed upon back in 1935 at the very conference to which he referred.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Consultation if necessary, but not necessarily consultation.

Mr. Drew: That was the effect of it. As I pointed out earlier in this debate, the discussion of this subject at that time had the unique importance that it began in the spring of 1935 under the government of Mr. Bennett, when a committee dealt with this matter. Among their recommendations was the one that the committee further expressed the opinion that before any decision upon the subject matter was finally made, the opinions of the provinces should be obtained, and recommended that a dominion-provincial conference be held to study carefully the adoption of a recognized yet flexible method of amendment.

Then I also referred to what took place later in the year, when a government headed by Mr. King had taken office. Following the recommendation of the committee appointed in the spring by the Bennett government, a conference was called in December. At that conference Mr. Taschereau, as premier and attorney general of the province of Quebec, presented a resolution which was adopted by the conference, and which made it perfectly clear that they expected the procedure would be the result of a meeting between the dominion and the provinces, and that there would be an agreed procedure as to the method of amendment.

Paragraph (c) of that resolution read in this way:

That the minister of justice convene at an early date a meeting of appropriate officials of the dominion and of the provinces to prepare a draft of such method of procedure to be submitted to a subsequent conference.

(d) That a conference be held at an early date after such draft has been prepared to consider such a method of procedure.

The Prime Minister has referred to that conference and has pointed out that following that resolution presented by Mr. Taschereau and approved by the conference certain general features in regard to procedure were adopted. We must examine those now in the light of the assurance given by the Prime Minister on February 4. An examination of what took place at that conference makes it clear that all the discussion was directed to a procedure which would embrace the amendment of the whole constitution. At no single time was there any suggestion that our constitution should be ripped down the middle and that those who were claiming to end subservience to Westminster would be the very ones to perpetuate it by following a course that would make it extremely difficult, if not impossible, ever to obtain consent in regard to the amendment of our constitution.

Mr. Church: It would make it only a scrap of paper.

Mr. Drew: That is what this would do, make our constitution a scrap of paper. It would proceed to amend the constitution in a way that was never contemplated before. Naive? Well, if accepting the assurance of the Prime Minister of Canada given in clear words is being naive, yes we are naive. If accepting the clear assurance of the Prime Minister of Canada that there would be consultation with the provinces was naive, yes the people of Canada were naive.

We are being asked to accept the assurance that there is no danger in dealing with this because the responsibility of the members themselves would be a safeguard against the infringement of our basic constitutional rights. If we are to feel confident in that, then certainly the whole procedure that was worked out and advanced to a considerable degree in 1935 and 1936 should be continued and the undertaking given by the Prime Minister on February 4 should be observed.

Desirable though the purpose of the subamendment and the amendment may appear, they in no way meet the serious weaknesses that exist in this resolution. When so important a step is being taken it is more important than at any other time that an attempt should be made to obtain the wholehearted support and co-operation of all provincial governments so that when our new constitution takes form it will be acceptable to all governments of Canada and all the people of Canada and not be one that has simply been put through by a majority vote in the parliament of Canada.

When it is so clear, and it is abundantly clear, that all hon. members of this house are anxious to have the amending of our constitution carried on here in Canada under our own parliament, surely every step should be taken to avoid those misunderstandings and unnecessary conflict which can only defeat the very purpose for which it is said this resolution is presented to the house. As the Prime Minister said when introducing this resolution, this is an historic milestone in the history of Canada. Let us not mar that step by following a course that will precipitate constitutional arguments and misunderstandings in different parts of Canada for years to come.

Even suppose that all in this house were agreed, think of how strong the government's position would be if it followed another course, namely, that even if the premiers of five provinces in Canada, who represent about eighty per cent of the population, are wrong when they express concern about this matter, the government met them to discuss the subject so that any misunderstanding might be avoided before so important a step is taken.

After all, we have concern expressed by the premier of Nova Scotia in regard to one aspect of this problem. We have concern expressed by the premier of Quebec in regard to procedure on a very broad base.

An hon. Member: Politics.

Mr. Drew: When I hear an hon. member say "politics" I wonder to whom that expression is being applied?

An hon. Member: Duplessis.

Mr. Drew: If this matter is as important in the minds of hon. members as they claim it is, they will look for every possible way of avoiding any conflict. The way to avoid that is to bring the provinces together and find out whether there cannot be agreement before a course of this kind is followed which is certain to precipitate disagreement in the years to come.

An hon. Member: You are naive.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: That laughter indicates cynicism in regard to this matter which is out of keeping with the importance of what we are discussing. We have had a perfectly clear undertaking that the provinces would be consulted. We have perfectly clear evidence from what we have read that certain provinces feel that there should be discussions before this proceeds any further. If we want agreement and if we want the whole constitution to be an indivisible Canadian constitution, let us make sure that we do not tear this constitution in two and that we do not just take part of the constitutional authority and leave the rest in a position where the dominion government and the provinces must still go to Westminster under the disabilities that are being created by this course.

The procedure is the important thing. The procedure has not yet emerged. Unless there is some reason for this being dealt with now, a reason which has not been stated to the hon. members of this house, the opportunity to amend our own constitution will be greatly hastened by postponing consideration of this resolution until the next session of parliament and until after all the provincial governments can be consulted in regard to the possibility of finding an acceptable means of amending our whole constitution which will cause no conflict in the years ahead.

Debate has proceeded on the main motion, on an amendment which was ruled out of order, on a further amendment and a subamendment. In all earnestness, regardless of what the government may feel to be their strict right in this matter, having regard to the unanimous desire expressed in this house that there be the right to amend our whole constitution here in Canada, I do urge the Prime Minister to leave no possibility of suggestion that there has been a breach of faith. I urge the Prime Minister to follow a course which will encourage the good will of the provinces. I urge the Prime Minister to bring the governments here and then, and only then, if agreement cannot be reached will any member of this house have the right to say that any province was opposed to an agreed procedure in amending our constitution. It is too early yet; there is nothing but guesswork, nothing but suspicion to justify the statement in this house by any hon. member that such a procedure would not work out, because no attempt has been made since the governments met in 1935.

Therefore in stating that we will oppose the subamendment because, desirable though its purpose may be, it is simply an amendment to a motion that will be disastrous in its consequences if it is proceeded with at this stage, I do urge the Prime Minister to avoid any possibility of misunderstanding by agreeing to let this motion stand until the next session of parliament.

Mr. W. E. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The second intervention in this debate by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) only emphasizes the point he made in his first speech and, as I recall it, the point he always made in the last parliament; that he agreed in principle with what we were doing, but did not like the method. That seems to be the unfortunate position in which we find the leader of the opposition almost every time we approach the problems of Canada. It is not that we ever depart from a principle which he wishes to maintain; it is simply that he disagrees with the method adopted.

Following the hon. gentleman in the debate, and following the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), I think it can be said that if there is one thing in common between those two speeches, and in fact the speeches of all members of the official opposition, it is that they agree that the Canadian constitution should be amended in this country. At one time when I heard the leader of the opposition make that statement I had some hope that he would proceed to help us do that very thing. However, he takes the view that, desirable though it may be, now is not the time and this is not the method.

Under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to examine the arguments of the members of the opposition to see the nature of their objections and whether in fact they bear any relation to the motion before the house. In particular, I have no hesitation in following the hon. member for Lake Centre, because his address this afternoon was completely different from the address he began the other evening. There were some points in that part which, as he tried to say in his introductory remarks this afternoon, were hard to gather up; and upon reflection I fancy he will agree that perhaps they would have been better left unsaid.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What were they?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I shall come to them; in fact I may refer right now to what was said. Throughout the whole of the last parliament, and at practically every opportunity in the country, the hon. member for Lake Centre was foremost in the presentation of what he felt were certain fundamental rights and freedoms of Canadian citizens, and in fact there is on the order paper a resolution in his name having to do with that subject. When I heard the amendment suggested by the leader of the C.C.F party (Mr. Coldwell) and moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) it occurred to me that almost the first person in this house who would stand up and vote for that amendment would be the hon. member for Lake Centre. If any single thing has been part and parcel of his criticism of this government, it has been his constant iteration that we have been exercising arbitrary power at one time or another, and I thought he might consider this a means of preventing us from doing so in future. Yet for reasons of his own he has taken the position that he will not support what on its face must be taken as a safeguard against the possibility of the use of arbitrary power.

When one reads sections 20 and 50 of the British North America Act one thinks it would have been likely, if the hon. member had to do it over again or perhaps if he had thought of it, that the hon. gentleman would have spoken about the great past of parliament. He might have drawn attention to you, Mr. Speaker, as a successor of the great Speakers of the past. He might have seen in your person Mr. Speaker Lenthall, who, on one memorable occasion, defended the rights of parliament against the exercise of arbitrary power. He might have summoned up all the great men of the past who have made parliament possible; and perhaps in conclusion he would have demanded an absolute restriction against this and succeeding parliaments extending their life. Those thoughts were in my mind, as I think they were in the minds of those who suggested these amendments, and I am quite sure they were in the mind of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in having his amendment moved this afternoon. Because if there is one great advantage we now possess, it is the advantage of periodically registering our approval or disapproval of those to whom we have entrusted the affairs of the country, and of being given the opportunity of putting the seal of approval upon them or of dismissing them if they have been either unfaithful or unsatisfactory. Perhaps we might think, also, when considering those who in the past made it possible for us to meet here, of those in Canada who, in more recent times, by what they did in two world wars, saved us from having arbitrary power imposed upon us from abroad. Under these circumstances I appeal to the hon. member for Lake Centre to reconsider the arguments he has advanced in this house, and to see if he cannot find it possible to support the amendment now before the house.

Now I should like to come to a few remarks which have been made by two other members of the opposition, in opposing the resolution itself. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), having reiterated the position of his leader that of course they agree that the amendment of the Canadian constitution should be carried out in this country, went on to say:

> But, sir, to say that we ought to have in Canada complete power to amend our constitution as we see fit is a very different thing from saying that this parliament ought to have unlimited power to make amendments to the constitution.

By the use of the word "unlimited" the hon. member entirely passed over the wording of the resolution and committed an error which unfortunately was continued by a subsequent speaker on the other side of the house. Let us examine the resolution to see how much the hon. member was in error when he used the phrase "unlimited power to amend the constitution of Canada in this parliament".

The resolution reads in part as follows:

> The amendment from time to time of the constitution of Canada—

I agree that it is unlimited in time, and the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) is correct in that respect. The resolution continues as follows:

> —except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces,—

It seems to me, sir, there are sixteen subheadings under section 92 of the British North America Act. Section 93, I believe, deals with education. Those seventeen subjects are seventeen exceptions to the power to amend as contained in this resolution; so that while the member for Eglinton may be right in one instance, he is wrong in the following seventeen.

Now, sir, if we will proceed with the resolution, it goes on to make a further exception "with regard to the rights or privileges by this act granted or secured to the legislature of a province." That is a further exception upon our unlimited power to amend the constitution in this parliament. This makes the eighteenth exception to our power to amend our constitution. Then it goes on to say:

> —or as regards rights or privileges by any other constitutional act granted or secured to the legislature of a province,—

This makes the nineteenth exception to our power to amend the constitution in this parliament.

Then, there are two similar exceptions with respect to the rights and privileges granted to the government of a province, so that there are twenty-one exceptions to my hon. friend's so-called unlimited power of this parliament to amend the constitution.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): He is five per cent right.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is the independent view, is it not?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): There is also the clause with respect to schools which makes the twenty-second exception to our right to amend the constitution in this parliament. There is also the exception with regard to the use of the English or French language which makes the twenty-third exception to the power of this parliament to amend the constitution of Canada. If the member for Eglinton is right in the first instance as to time, he is wrong twenty-three times thereafter.

Unfortunately, the new member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) was obliged to follow the hon. member for Eglinton and assumed he was right when he said there was unlimited power in this parliament as the result of the amendment. Further than that, the hon. member for St. John's East raised one question with respect to his own province which I think it is desirable to settle at this moment. He spoke of the compact theory as it applied particularly to his own province. The hon. member for St. John's East referred to the memorandum of agreement between Canada and Newfoundland as to union. He asserted at one stage that, because of this agreement and because of the compact theory which he thought it established, the province of Newfoundland had rights secured under this agreement so that the British North America Act might not be amended by this parliament without the consent of the provinces.

I should like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that section 3 of the memorandum of the terms of union with Newfoundland reads as follows:

> The British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, shall apply to the province of Newfoundland in the same way and to the like extent as they apply to the provinces heretofore comprised in Canada, as if the province of Newfoundland had been one of the provinces originally united, except insofar as varied by these terms and except such provisions as are in terms made or by reasonable intendment may be held to be specially applicable to or only to affect one or more and not all of the provinces originally united.

Then, by section 17 of that memorandum, under the heading "Education" there is a specific clause about education in Newfoundland. There is nothing in the agreement which asserts the proposition that the British North America Act has been given to Newfoundland in any different way than to the other provinces. In other words, there is no agreement that the British North America Act might not be amended in due course in the proper manner. On the basis of this agreement and the special interest in education granted to Newfoundland by section 17—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Newfoundland being a dominion and defined as a dominion under the Statute of Westminster, did it not make an agreement with the Dominion of Canada when those terms were settled? Was it not an agreement, therefore, between those two countries?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I think perhaps I can answer that by referring to the comments of the hon. member's seatmate, the member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins). Somewhat to my surprise, he said that the agreement between Newfoundland and Canada was an agreement between the peoples of those two places and had been approved by their people. To my knowledge, neither of the hon. gentlemen had made that argument before he entered this house.

Mr. Fleming: That is no answer to the question.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The terms of the agreement between Newfoundland and Canada are contained in the pamphlet, "Report and Documents relating to the Negotiations for the Union of Newfoundland with Canada." Newfoundland became a province of Canada in precisely the same respect as the other provinces, subject only to a variation of the terms as may be set out in the agreement.

Mr. Fleming: But as a result of an agreement; that is the point.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): Nobody denies there was an agreement. It is there, and it has been tabled in the house.

Now, sir, we come to the references of the hon. member for Eglinton, and throughout his speech he was quoting from the various leaders of our party in the past, evidently seeking to convince the house that the Liberal party has departed from former policies. I do not suggest that the quotations he gave were inaccurate, nor do I suggest they were unfairly taken from the various speeches that he used. I do suggest, however, that there is a radical difference between an abstract discussion on an abstract principle, such as a general resolution of this house, and the more immediate duty of legislators who are confronted with a problem which has to be solved.

In many of the cases which my hon. friend has cited, there were discussions on resolutions as to the desirability or otherwise, and as to a final method of amending the Canadian constitution. I should like to draw to the attention of the house not what has been said under those circumstances, but what has been done by the governments of Canada in the past with respect to amending the Canadian constitution. In particular, I should like to refer to the action taken by the very gentlemen to whom the hon. member referred.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

In the first instance he quoted Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and I intend to refer to what Sir Wilfrid did as well as to what he said. The first occasion on which Sir Wilfrid had to deal in this house with an amendment to the Canadian constitution was in 1886. That was an address to the United Kingdom parliament for the purpose of obtaining for this parliament the power to grant representation in this house to the Northwest Territories. It cannot be alleged that that was an academic discussion. It cannot be alleged that whatever action was taken might not be of detriment, in theory, to those provinces who might rely upon the compact theory. Throughout the whole of this debate, Sir Wilfrid Laurier made no suggestion that the provinces should be consulted.

To indicate what the public as a whole thought of that particular action, the following year there was an interprovincial conference at which most of the then provinces were represented. Remember, this was only twenty-one years after confederation. No one at that interprovincial conference suggested that the parliament of Canada had gone beyond its legislative right in seeking that power the previous year. It is a long time from 1886 to 1915, but I will speak of that year and then go back to 1907.

In 1915 there were further discussions in this house having to do with the representation of the western provinces, both in the house and in the Senate. Once again it could be argued that what they were doing might in some sense upset the balance of confederation in the representation of members from the various provinces. One person in that debate did suggest that it might be desirable if they did consult the provinces. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in speaking, made no mention of that matter. He did not support the contention at that time that we needed to consult the provinces on that particular question. Yet it cannot be denied that what parliament was doing was in fact amending the constitution of Canada by that proposal. I should like to read what he did say in that 1915 debate, and this will be found at page 1460 of Hansard 1915:

> It has been a grievance with the maritime provinces that their representation in the House of Commons has continued to decrease from decade to decade. It has been explained, and it is the true explanation, that at the time of the formation of confederation no one anticipated the extraordinary developments which were to take place west of lake Superior and in consequence of which the representation of the maritime provinces in the House of Commons has decreased from decade to decade. We had to deal with the matter in 1902. At that time the province of New Brunswick, in particular, felt very much the diminution in representation which it had to undergo. It was a special grievance in the province of Prince Edward Island, which always contended that under the terms of confederation they should at all times be entitled to six members. Whatever may be the merits of this contention—it is true the record does not show it—I believe that what is now proposed is a fair compromise, and ought to be so accepted by all the provinces, so that henceforth, whatever may be its fall in population, the province of Prince Edward Island shall be entitled to a representation of four members.

Nowhere in that speech did he suggest that the provinces need be consulted on that particular motion to amend our constitution.

In 1916, once again, we have an amendment to the constitution in the sense of extending the life of parliament. Laurier consented, as I understand it, and made a speech on the occasion, but did not suggest that the provinces were interested in that particular phase of our constitution. So that on those three occasions on which action was taken in this house, at no time did he suggest that the action being taken was contrary to the interests of the provinces. It is only fair to say that in 1907 all the provinces were consulted, but they had a special interest in the financial part of the British North America Act, which was the subject of that particular amendment.

That is not the record only of the leader of the Liberal party. It happens to be the record of both Sir Robert Borden and Mr. Arthur Meighen when they were leaders in this house. Sir Robert Borden went through the 1915 and 1916 constitutional debates without saying that the provinces should be consulted with respect to those particular matters. In 1920, when he was about to leave the government, preparation was being made for another address to the United Kingdom parliament, and in this particular matter no consultation with the provinces was suggested. Mr. Meighen, when he became prime minister, continued those representations to the United Kingdom but did not in fact consult the provinces, nor in the debate did he suggest that consultation was necessary. That particular amendment had to do with the obtaining for this parliament of the right of giving extraterritorial effect to our legislation. It is quite true that the address was not passed, for those reasons which the Prime Minister has given. But the fact that these Conservative leaders did not think it necessary to consult the provinces is, I think, significant of their belief in that particular matter.

Now we come to 1924 when the late Ernest Lapointe had to deal with the very same subject of giving extraterritorial effect to dominion legislation; and on that occasion Ernest Lapointe did not suggest that the provinces should be consulted. On the contrary, he was faced with the argument in a most particular manner and I should like to read to you from what he said in order to show you how he felt on the subject. The premier of Ontario, who at that time was the leading exponent of the compact theory, had intervened in the discussion of this resolution by making a speech at that time, and this is Ernest Lapointe's answer, which is to be found at page 4778 of Hansard of 1924:

> I now desire to refer to a statement which has been made concerning this matter by the hon. premier of Ontario, at a meeting held at Prescott on the 12th of July last. He stated that the adoption of this resolution was a blow to the constitution and an infringement of the rights of the provinces, which ought to be consulted every time an amendment to the British North America Act was sought. The charge is not justified, and is not altogether fair. My only answer is that the provinces were in no way interested and in no way concerned in our demand of the imperial parliament to recognize that our purely federal legislation has an extraterritorial effect.

On those occasions on which the hon. gentlemen quoted by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) had to face concrete cases to be dealt with by this house; in every case having to do with the federal jurisdiction, none of them thought it necessary, and most of them refused to agree, that the provinces need be consulted.

I should like to continue the quotations down to 1931, when there was a discussion, this time not on a concrete case, I agree, but on a resolution moved by Mr. Woodsworth, that it was desirable that we should have the right to amend our own constitution. It is interesting to see what the late Mr. Guthrie—at that time minister of justice, I believe—had to say in this house. Mr. Guthrie preceded his remarks, which are to be found at page 1473 of Hansard of 1931, by saying:

> . . . I agree that the time has come when we should seriously consider this whole question of amendments to the Canadian constitution.

Later in his remarks he goes on:

> My contention has always been that in all matters appertaining to the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada the parliament of Canada has the right, and should have the right expressed, to make such amendments to the constitution as it shall see fit.

And in the same debate both the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) have taken a quotation from Ernest Lapointe. The latest quotation given by the hon. member for Lake Centre is as follows:

> We really do not know what are the amendments in respect to which the assent of the provinces should be first received and those in respect to which such consent is not necessary.

Let me go on and quote what he did say on the particular subject of this kind of resolution. At page 1479 he is reported as follows:

> . . . to insist on having the consent of all the provinces to every change would be asking almost an impossibility; to ask that either British Columbia in the west or Prince Edward Island in the east should be able to block a change with which it is essential for the federal power to go ahead within the limits of its jurisdiction on certain matters, I do not think would be right.

I therefore sum up this part of my remarks by saying that a great many of these discussions were of abstract resolutions having to do with the amendment of the constitution; and it is quite true to say, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said, that in those discussions everybody was considering a comprehensive rewrite, I think the word is, of the Canadian constitution. But these were abstract discussions. In the House of Commons we are engaged in doing the business of Canada and perhaps doing it piecemeal at times. In this chamber we are under the necessity of doing something about a particular subject rather than discussing general subjects all the time.

I think it was the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) who first wanted to know why the haste in this particular matter. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) have repeated that question. But it is the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Lake Centre and all the hon. members of the opposition who have repeatedly said: "Of course we agree with the principle. Of course it is not a matter of dispute that we should amend our constitution in Canada." In fact the hon. member for Lake Centre suggested that for the last fifteen years, at least, it has not been a matter of political disagreement in this country.

There is no one in this house who has gone through law school who has not at one time or another debated this subject. I recall a debate in law school in my first year, in which it was unanimously agreed that we should have the right to amend the Canadian constitution in Canada. But when I realize that there are hon. members here who were not born at the time we passed that resolution I am of opinion that it is time the Canadian parliament did something about it.

I should now like to deal with some of the remarks of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). The hon. member indicated fairly clearly that since he came from British Columbia it was not possible for him to subscribe wholeheartedly to the compact theory. In his address the hon. member spent most of his time conjuring up the most terrible consequences which might follow upon the passage of this resolution. Having recited one or two steps which were taken in the past parliament to amend the Canadian constitution he went on to indicate what he thought our next steps might be, and he ended in this way, as reported at page 883 of Hansard:

[Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce).]

This is the final step in a series of steps, culminating in the delivery of the constitution of Canada, tied and bound, to the sole and exclusive custody of this federal parliament.

Sir, I cannot imagine the day when such a conclusion will be reached, no matter who may be in office in this country. Let me say that it is neither the intention nor the desire of any member of this party that we should come to that end, nor that we should take from the provinces not just the right to amend their constitution, but not one single part of their jurisdiction unless for their own reasons they wish to give it to us under terms acceptable to everyone.

In his argument the hon. member for Lake Centre pointed to a change in section 51 of the British North America Act, which was made in 1946. He said that that was a new departure and something that had not been contemplated by the provinces, and that they should have been consulted. I suggest, sir, that section 51 as amended had to do only with the representation in this house. It did alter the method of computation; it did change the number of hon. members in the house; but, sir, no one can suggest that the result was detrimental to any province or to any interest in any province.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was quoting from Dr. Ollivier, who had been placed before the house as an authority. In 1935 he gave evidence to that effect.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): That only confirms what I said earlier, or if I did not say it I intended to say it. Hardly a speaker of the opposition has actually pledged his own word that he believes in the compact theory. It is easy to quote someone, but as I understand the rules of the house, when one does that he does in fact indicate a personal belief in the quotation. Yet I point out that not a single member of the opposition, except the leader, said that confederation was a pact and that he believed unequivocally in that theory.

Let me return to the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre. I said that the amendment of 1946 had certain consequences but did not have others. There is no question whatever that the prior amendments to the constitution of 1915 and 1886 were quite different in principle to the one of 1946. If, at that time, any of the provinces had felt that this was a matter in which they had some vested interest I am sure they would have had more right to feel aggrieved in those years than they could have had in 1946.

I should like to conclude with the hon. member for Kamloops by pointing out that to further his imaginings of dire results he, along with other hon. members of the opposition, did suggest, by reference to the Prime Minister's speech of May 19, that there had been something in the nature of broken faith connected with this resolution. The leader of the opposition has repeated that. He quoted part of the address of last February; but every hon. member of the opposition has pointed to the address of May 19 and indicated, perhaps not directly, though in one case directly, that he believes the Prime Minister had been guilty of a breach of a pledge, and suggested bad faith in this resolution. It seems to me, sir, that some hon. members will never learn. In the last parliament there was hardly a debate in which my hon. friends did not suggest bad faith. They suggested that there were some dark and devious intentions behind the simplest of words in bills, and, throughout the whole four years, they tried to convince the Canadian people that there were motives which were not disclosed, such as the leader of the opposition suggested this afternoon. I thought, in fact, I am sure, that suggestion of bad faith in a leader in public life in Canada had been consigned to oblivion on June 27. If the address of May 19 was the only address made by the Prime Minister an hon. member of the opposition would feel justified in asking for an explanation of it. An explanation has been given. But it was not the only address that the Prime Minister made during that campaign touching on the constitutional question. I should like to read from another address he delivered in Kingston on a later date than the one to which reference has been made. He said:

> The Liberal party has always stood for the maintenance of the Canadian constitution as a federal constitution. And we have always stood for proper respect for provincial rights.
> Now, in the early days of confederation, many Liberals felt that the Conservative party was trying to centralize too much power at Ottawa, and the great Liberals of the 19th century and the early years of this century, with Laurier at their head, gained great fame for upholding the rights of the provinces as set out in the constitution.
> But the Liberal party never took the view that the powers given by the constitution to our national parliament should be placed under the control of the provincial legislatures or provincial premiers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): A speech delivered by—

Mr. Diefenbaker: But who gave you the speech? Is it a press report?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): It is a speech made by the Prime Minister at Kingston on June 18. What I have just quoted may be used as an illustration of what seems to be the difference of opinion as to the manner in which this resolution should be dealt with. No one has suggested from this side of the house, and no one will suggest from this side of the house, that any action should be taken by parliament, or certainly by this government, which would infringe upon the rights and privileges of the legislatures of the provinces. Not only have we not suggested that, but we have put in the plainest words in the resolution a provision to that effect.

On the other hand the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) suggested throughout his speech that what is needed now is not so much an amendment of this kind, but that we should have a constitutional convention, perhaps, to rewrite in large part our constitution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I never said that. I never said anything about rewriting the constitution. I referred to considering the necessary amendments for recommendation, the same plan referred to by Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. R. B. Bennett.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): I quite agree that the hon. member for Lake Centre restricted his suggestion to that effect. But constitutional conventions are something which have been known to many countries. Constitutional conventions are different from ordinary conferences between premiers and a prime minister. They are conferences resorted to at a time when there has been a serious breakdown in the working of the constitution of a country, or perhaps when there has been a more violent change in government than is usual in this country.

I believe every member of the house would agree that not only are the people of Canada happy, contented and prosperous, but that, in large measure, they are working their constitution out so that it will best serve the interests of the Canadian people.

We are here asking for an amendment to the constitution. Therefore, as everyone has said, we consider amendments necessary. But the constitution has not yet reached the point where a breakdown is imminent—and I doubt very much if it ever will. A constitutional convention along the lines I believe the hon. member has in mind would at this time probably create that confusion which he says he wishes to avoid.

The difference in approach between the government and the official opposition on this resolution is easily understood. Every provincial premier and every attorney general, by reason of his oath of office and by reason of his election, is charged with the responsibility of protecting the interests of a provincial government, and the interests of the people in his province. We are sent here as members—in my case from Grey-Bruce—to represent our local constituencies, our provinces and the dominion. We must see that provincial interests are not improperly infringed upon—in fact we must see that they are not infringed upon in any respect.

But that is a different matter from saying that here in the House of Commons we must take the attitude that our first duty is in the protection of those interests. On the contrary our first duty is to see that our rights and privileges are equally preserved for the future parliaments of Canada—and in my mind it is not difficult to balance the two. I should not like to suggest that it is the duty of an opposition or a government to think first of provincial rights. I would rather suggest that our attitude should be that, as members of the House of Commons from our local communities and our respective provinces, we should see that the government and the executive of Canada would not improperly discharge their duties by attempting in any way to infringe upon provincial rights.

As I said before, we have an equal duty to maintain, support and uphold the rights and privileges of this parliament, and consequently to be in a position to exercise those duties which the Canadian people have entrusted to us.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, we have had a long and learned discussion on this resolution, and the subsequent amendments. I am frank to admit that I have learned a great deal from what has been said, and I am sure most hon. members would speak in a similar fashion.

We have listened to a legal analysis of the resolution; we have heard a good deal of historical background from hon. members who are capable of analysing the matter from that viewpoint. My reason for taking part in the debate is to attempt to tell hon. members exactly the way I view this resolution, from the standpoint of the man in the street. Because, in the final analysis, if any constitutional amendment does not bring about the greatest good for the greatest number, it is the man in the street who will be most affected.

In my opinion the resolution moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) required no amendment, despite the fact that the party to which I belong did offer one. After listening to this discussion for several days, and after a careful reading of the resolution, I am convinced that we are not at this time amending the constitution. The Prime Minister has placed before the house a resolution in which he asks members of the House of Commons if they are prepared to take the responsibility of amending the constitution in Canada. If they are, then he wishes to have a change in section 91 to give us that right. No amendment to the constitution is involved; any amendment will come afterwards. That is my understanding of it. The government is asking merely for the right to amend the constitution. Following that, any amendment will be made by the members of the House of Commons. So what are hon. members afraid of? Are they afraid of themselves?

This is something that has been needed in Canada for many years, if we want to be masters in our own home. We do not want unemployment insurance and other national legislation held up year after year because ten little Canadas cannot agree. Each one wants to hang on to its own jurisdiction.

After listening to the discussion I am convinced that the amendments which have been offered were not necessary. The argument has been offered by the official opposition that this resolution has been presented in great haste, and that the provinces should be consulted. I believe the Prime Minister made it quite clear that before any amendment to the constitution would take place a conference of the provinces would be called and a formula worked out as to how such amendments would be made. That provides for a dominion-provincial conference after we have obtained the right to amend the constitution, and before it is amended.

Second, the people of this country have been led to believe from the discussions here and the reports in the press that the constitution had never been amended before unless there had been a dominion-provincial conference or agreement by the provinces. That is not so. The constitution of Canada has been amended eleven times in the last eighty years and on eight of those occasions the provinces were not consulted. On one occasion only four of the provinces were consulted and on another occasion British Columbia disagreed. Despite that there was no revolution, none of the provinces pulled out. The amendments were made and Canada went on and has developed. I just wanted to stress that we are not doing something that is new.

The fact of the matter is that we are adopting a most democratic procedure because we are placing responsibility where it belongs, on the members of the House of Commons. If and when amendments are made in the future the formula will have been worked out. The amendments will be made here and not as they have been made on eight occasions in the past with the dominion government deciding what is going to be done without consulting the provinces and then the amendments being made in another country.

I think the procedure suggested by the Prime Minister is one hundred per cent more democratic, more in keeping with Canadian mentality, than the procedure that has been followed in the past.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) made a wonderful address, as he always does, but I found it rather difficult to follow him at times. There is one point I should like to clear up in connection with something he said this afternoon. He looked over at the leader of this group, shook his finger at him and said that the late J. S. Woodsworth, the founder of this party, had said that no amendments to the constitution should be made unless the provinces were consulted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a question of privilege, that statement was not made. I simply quoted the amendment that Mr. Woodsworth had moved when Mr. Maclean moved a resolution to the effect that parliament should have the authority to amend the British North America Act. I simply said that Mr. Woodsworth moved an amendment stating that that should be done only with the consent of the provinces.

Mr. Gillis: If the hon. member had let me finish, it would not have been necessary for him to get up. He did not go far enough back into history, or he went back too far. The resolution he referred to was moved in 1925, but the resolution I am going to refer to was moved in 1931. After more experience and a more mature judgment, on May 11, 1931, Mr. Woodsworth moved the following motion:

> That, in the opinion of this house, it is desirable that Canada should have the right to amend her own constitution, but that in proceeding to make any amendment, scrupulous care should be taken to safeguard the rights of minorities.

That is exactly the position we are taking today. Members of His Majesty's loyal opposition have taken the position that there is great haste in doing this. They want to know why we are in such a hurry, why the necessity for this. I do not think there has been great haste. I think this matter has been hanging in the sling since 1935. It is unfinished business.

The dominion-provincial conference of 1935 decided that we should do what is being done here. That conference suggested, first, that changes concerning parliament and federal matters only should be made by parliament; second, that changes affecting some provinces should be made only with their consent; third, that changes affecting all provinces, such as minority rights and education, should be made only with the consent of the large majority of the provinces. Thus the procedure to be followed would depend upon the nature of the proposed change.

That formula was worked out at that time and the dominion government had every right to go ahead and do what the Prime Minister is now doing. There were the instructions. Instead of this being done in great haste I see this in the same perspective as I would someone who was climbing a mountain. He gets to the top and he cannot go any farther. The dominion government climbed the mountain and they have been sitting on the top since 1935. They were afraid to go back and they were afraid to go forward. I compliment the Prime Minister upon climbing to the top, upon taking over where his predecessor left off. He is prepared now to go down the other side and have a look at the valley.

There has been no great haste. The reverse is true. This has been hanging in the sling since 1935. I say that we should do this thing if for no other reason than the position in which the Canadian delegates to the United Nations have been placed. They have had to refrain from voting on resolutions dealing with human rights and fundamental principles or with the instruction and teaching throughout the country of matters coming under the United Nations because the national parliament under the present arrangement cannot deal with these matters without consulting the provinces. Our delegates have been placed in an awkward position when attending this international forum. They have had to tell delegates from other parts of the world that they cannot vote on these resolutions even though they represent the national government of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I move that the debate be adjourned until later this day.

Motion agreed to.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 28 FOR THIS DAY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, under standing order 28, on Thursdays and Fridays when the order of the day is called for the house to go into committee of supply or of ways and means, Your Honour leaves the chair without putting any question. When this Thursday was selected for the motion to go into committee of ways and means on the budget, it was not intended in any way to deprive hon. members of the privilege they usually exercise to debate that motion. In order that they may not be deprived of that opportunity, I would ask leave of the house to move:

That the provisions of standing order 28 respecting the committee of ways and means be suspended for this day.

If the motion is adopted, the motion to go into committee of ways and means can be made as if this were an ordinary day, and can be debated in the usual manner.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in the special circumstances in which I am proposing this motion, hon. members will neither expect nor desire me to give as full or as complete a review of our economic and financial position as is customary in bringing down the annual budget. Although this is a new parliament, and more than one-third of our present members are new members, I am sure that almost all hon. members, old as well as new, are acquainted with the general trend of the exposition and with the broad lines of the proposals which I presented to the last session of the previous parliament. My task this evening, therefore, can properly be limited to three things.

First, bringing up to date the general analysis of our economic and financial position and prospects;

Second, giving the house certain revised statements and estimates of our revenues and expenditures; and Third, re-introducing, with a few modifications, the tax changes which I proposed last March.

ECONOMIC REVIEW

First, then, may I bring up to date the general economic review which I gave to the house nearly seven months ago. A great deal has happened in this period of time. Some trends that seemed obscure then have become clearer now, and some new developments have occurred. But taken as a whole the general assessment of the situation which I made last March has proved to be sound, and the changes in taxation which I proposed were in the right direction, and I think, about right in degree.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

In so far as the trend of events on the domestic side of our economy is concerned, I have no changes to suggest in the general conclusions I had reached. Production, employment and incomes are continuing at levels as high as or higher than those upon which my budget proposals were originally predicated. Prices and the cost of living have held well within the limits I forecast. Variations in the general level of wholesale prices and in the cost of living index have been of a fractional character. The latest figure for the wholesale price index is one per cent below a year ago, and for the cost of living index two per cent above a year ago. Average hourly earnings and average weekly earnings in industry are both up about seven per cent over a year ago. So far as one can see at the moment, the net effect of the recent world-wide realignment of currency rates does not require any significant revision in my estimate that the level of prices during the current fiscal year will not vary significantly from that of last year.

It is obviously more difficult to see further into the future. Our total exports, which is one of the basic supports of our economy, were higher during the most recent twelve months' period than in any other peacetime year in our history. Nevertheless, some declines in our overseas export markets have already occurred and some further declines can hardly be avoided. The government will do everything in its power to limit this decline in overseas trade but much will depend on the progress which our overseas customers make in overcoming their dollar difficulties.

The decrease in overseas exports has so far been more than offset by increased sales to other markets, particularly the United States. Any change in economic conditions in the United States will directly affect the level of our exports to that country. Any sharp downturn in American economic activity and in American willingness to import cannot but have sharp and embarrassing repercussions all over the world. Despite the decline in the rate of activity which took place in the earlier part of the year, United States production and incomes have been maintained at levels which have rarely been exceeded in the past. Furthermore, we must recognize the extent to which the United States has moved during the past decade toward adopting measures designed to moderate swings in economic activity. Nevertheless, we cannot afford to overlook the possibility of short run declines in the absorptive capacity of the American market.

It is with these possibilities in mind that the government is actively reviewing measures to counteract any serious downturn that might develop in our export markets and in the level of economic activity at home. As hon. members know, we have already taken steps to give still greater encouragement to housing construction, and we are in the midst of discussions with the provinces regarding both the magnitude and the timing of extensive work on the trans-Canada highway. Other development projects are also under review, so that they may be undertaken at the most appropriate time. We have also been considering measures to deal with any special situations or difficulties which have already emerged or which may emerge even though general economic activity remains high.

Nevertheless, for the balance of this fiscal year, we continue to expect high levels of employment and income, and see no reason to change the financial and fiscal policies embarked upon earlier in the year.

THE INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC OUTLOOK

The most significant change in economic conditions since my budget speech last spring has been in the field of international trade and finance. Events have followed quickly upon one another and reached their climax one month ago with the announcement of the devaluation of the pound sterling by 30½ per cent in relation to the United States dollar. This action was followed closely by a widespread series of devaluations by other countries. The adjustments which have taken place during the past month constitute a realignment of currencies in relation to the United States dollar, which is greater, both in scope and degree, than anything that has ever taken place before. These far-reaching changes abroad created an entirely new situation for Canada. It was immediately necessary to consider the position of the Canadian dollar and on September 19 I announced to this house the decision of the government to reduce the parity of the Canadian dollar by what works out at 9·1 per cent.

I should like to review very briefly the developments which led up to these events. Hon. members will recall that the announcement of the United Kingdom reserve position early in July revealed that a sharp fall in the dollar receipts of the sterling area had taken place during the second quarter and was still in process. The consequent drain on the central gold and dollar reserves of the sterling area had reached alarming proportions, in spite of the assistance which was being received under the Marshall plan.

This serious deterioration in the dollar position of the sterling area was much more than an isolated problem of the United Kingdom. This was a critical development in the economic relations between North America and the whole sterling area. Consequently, it was immediately decided that the situation should be examined by representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada as well as by the members of the sterling area. The discussions held early in July between the secretary of the United States treasury, the United Kingdom chancellor of the exchequer and myself as Canadian minister of finance, were followed by a meeting of commonwealth ministers of finance.

At these talks consideration was given both to short-term measures for reducing the heavy immediate drain on the central sterling area reserves and to the lines along which the longer-term and more fundamental solutions should be sought. In order to reduce the immediate dollar outgo, the commonwealth members of the sterling area agreed to endeavour to limit their dollar buying during the 1949-50 fiscal year to about 75 per cent of the 1948 rate. Canada, not being in the sterling area, of course took no part in reaching that decision. With regard to the longer-term and more positive approach, it was agreed that the objective for all of us must be the achievement of a pattern of world trade in which the dollar and non-dollar countries can live together within one single multilateral system—a system under which a balance will be achieved by the expansion and not the contraction of trade. As the Canadian representative, I was particularly anxious that this should be the common purpose.

It was not possible in the time available at the London talks to translate these aims into concrete measures. It was therefore agreed that this task should be resumed at tripartite economic discussions to be held in Washington in September. Hon. members are familiar with the results of the Washington meetings. I need only recall the highlights, and perhaps point to some of the significant features of what took place. I have already told hon. members about the excellent spirit of co-operation which prevailed, and about the deep realization on all sides of the importance of the issues which were at stake.

The discussions resulted in a number of specific arrangements that would help to reduce the immediate impact of the dollar deficiency, such as arrangements for ECA financing, stockpile purchases, and so forth. The main attention, however, was directed to the underlying causes of the dollar shortage and to a re-examination, by each of the three participants, of their policies in the light of these causes. It was necessary to endeavour to change the trend of events away from the repeated dollar crises which were threatening to divide the western world into two economic blocs. It was necessary to achieve an increasingly better balance in the trading relationships between the dollar and non-dollar countries instead of the widening gap with which we were being confronted. It was clear that the remedy was not to be found in the extension of further extraordinary financial assistance beyond that which was already being given under the Marshall plan and the Canadian loan. It was agreed that the solution must be sought primarily in a rapid and substantial increase in dollar earnings through an expansion of trade.

In the achievement of this necessary increase in dollar earnings, each side has an appropriate part to play. A common responsibility was clearly recognized in the Washington communiqué. The first essential, of course, was that the deficit countries should pursue policies and create incentives which would make it possible for them to expand greatly their sales to dollar areas. The dollar countries in turn would have to facilitate these efforts through the maintenance of conditions and the removal of barriers which would provide adequate opportunities in their markets. In particular, the surplus countries would have to refrain from measures which would frustrate the attempts of the deficit areas to earn their way.

I think hon. members will agree that this course of policy, charted at the Washington conference, is the guide which governments should seek to follow. We must not underestimate the magnitude of the problem. In the Washington talks it was understood that extraordinary aid from North America will come to an end in 1952. The deficit countries will have to overcome not only their present dollar drain, but over the next few years get themselves into a position where they can do without the assistance which they are now receiving.

The initial steps in the achievement of this task have been taken. The major devaluation undertaken by the United Kingdom, by virtually the whole sterling area and by many other countries, is an integral part of their determination to correct the disequilibrium in their trade by selling more to the dollar area. It gives their producers a new and greater incentive to sell in dollar markets. Where their prices were not competitive, it provides new scope to make them so. It is, of course, much too early to say what the full effects of the new situation will be.

All of us, the dollar countries and the non-dollar countries, must do everything possible to enable these measures to achieve the result which is intended. On our part, we must be willing to receive the goods which our customers overseas should now be able to send to us. If we place restrictions in the way by increased tariffs or otherwise we shall defeat the purpose which, we all know, must be accomplished in our own interests.

It can be expected that a considerable part of the increased imports from the sterling area and western Europe will replace supplies which we have been buying from dollar sources. To this extent they will assist us in meeting our own dollar problem and help to bring our trade into better balance. It is possible that a part of the increased imports from overseas may result in greater competition with some of our domestic producers. Some adjustments may be necessary but this will be a small price to pay compared with the inevitable results which would flow from the inability of our customers to earn more dollars in our country. I do not need to remind hon. members how heavily the prosperity of our great primary industries, of agriculture, forestry, mining and fishing, are dependent upon adequate markets overseas. We must not expect that these markets will be maintained indefinitely through credits and gifts from this continent. Sooner or later our customers must be in the position where they are able to pay for what they buy from us, out of the proceeds of what they sell in dollar markets. We cannot afford to be short-sighted about a matter so vital to the welfare of every industry and every region of this country.

In this general problem of how to achieve a better balance in world trade, the position of Canada is of course not the same as that of the United States. We are a dollar country, but we have our own dollar problem. We are a member neither of the dollar area nor of the sterling area, though we are inextricably linked to both. We have a large trading surplus with the sterling area and western Europe and a large trading deficit with the United States. The United States has, as for many years in the past, a substantial export surplus with the rest of the world. In Canada we now have a very small margin of safety in our international accounts as a whole. Our imports from all sources, in the broad sense of that term, are today almost as large as our exports. This is the situation which we must constantly keep in mind. Our policies should work in the direction of attempting to achieve a relative increase in our imports from non-dollar sources and an expansion of our exports to the United States. We should look to positive measures of this kind rather than to restrictive devices for the means to overcome our dollar difficulties and to achieve a better balance in our trade.

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS: 1948-49; 1949-50

When I brought down the budget in March, I gave to the house a series of statements showing revenues and expenditures for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1949, and estimates for the year ending March 31, 1950. The accounts for the past year—that is, the year ended March 31, 1949—have since been closed and we are now more than half way through the current fiscal year. I am therefore in a position to give to the house the final figures for 1948-49 and closer estimates of probable revenues and expenditures for the year 1949-50.

All details of our financial operations for the year ended March 31, 1949, are shown in the public accounts for that year, which are now in the hands of the king's printer and should be ready for tabling in the near future. The final figures of our revenues turned out to be $2,771 million or $3 million more than I estimated last March, and the final figures of expenditures were $2,176 million or $17 million less than I had estimated. Our surplus for last year was therefore $595 million, or $20 million greater than my earlier estimate.

For the convenience of hon. members and with their consent, I should like now to table and have printed as an appendix to today's Hansard the usual tables showing details of revenues and expenditures for the fiscal year 1948-49 and comparable figures for each of the four preceding fiscal years, together with the balance sheet as at March 31, 1949.

I turn now to operations of the current fiscal year ending March 31 next. Six months ago my forecast of revenues for this year was $2,800 million before taking account of any tax changes, and $2,477·5 million after taking into account the effect of the tax changes I then announced. Since that time the yields of several of our important sources of revenue have been somewhat more buoyant than I had expected and I would now be inclined to raise my revenue forecast moderately, say to $2,885 million before any tax changes and to $2,550 million after allowing for the tax changes announced in March.

But there have also been offsetting changes on the expenditure side of the account. Last March I estimated total expenditures for the year at $2,390 million. At that time I had to make a guess as to the probable amount of supplementary estimates which would be proposed at this session of parliament; we now know the exact total of those estimates, namely, $62·7 million, and we can also make a more accurate forecast of the probable total savings in the estimates of all branches of government. Moreover, we must now take into account the effect of two new developments. The first of these is the assumption by the government of Canada of the sterling debt (the 3 per cent guaranteed stock) of Newfoundland, in accordance with the terms of union, which became effective at the beginning of this fiscal year. This transaction has added $62·3 million to the net debt of Canada and for bookkeeping purposes has therefore to be treated as an expenditure in the current fiscal year. In the second place, there is the effect of the recent currency devaluations on our external liabilities as well as on our holdings of gold and our cash balances in New York and London. As hon. members are aware, it is our practice to value our sterling and United States dollar liabilities at the current official rates of exchange and the recent revaluations have been appropriately reflected in our accounts. In regard to our holdings of gold and United States dollars, we have taken into our own accounts only the profit resulting from revaluation of such assets held directly by the Minister of Finance and not the profit from those held on his behalf by the foreign exchange control board, which profit is reflected only in the exchange fund account, an account kept separate, as hon. members know, from the consolidated revenue fund. The net total of the various debits and credits which have passed through our premium, discount and exchange account as a result of the revaluation of liabilities and assets is a debit or expenditure of about $12 million.

Including these expenditures, which are in the nature of bookkeeping charges, along with the other probable expenditures of all government departments and agencies, and making due allowance for the inevitable savings in so large and varied a program, I would now estimate that our total expenditures for the year 1949-50 will be of the order of $2,460 million.

If these over-all estimates of revenues and expenditures prove accurate, our budgetary surplus for the year will amount to around $90 million. Even after taking into account certain additional tax changes which I shall propose, I believe that the budgetary surplus for the year will be fairly close to the $87 million which I forecast on March 22 last.

A budgetary surplus of this magnitude would mean, of course, a corresponding reduction in the net debt of Canada. That would bring the total reduction which we have been able to achieve in this and the preceding three fiscal years to about $1,730 million. Of this achievement we have every right to be proud but, on the other hand, we have no right to be complacent, as under the assumptions made the total net debt of Canada on March 31 next would still amount to about $11,690 million—surely no inconsiderable burden for a nation of thirteen and a half million people.

In the budget speech of last March I stated that it was particularly difficult this year to estimate the amount of the probable cash surplus. I believe that hon. members are now familiar with the distinction between this concept and the more common term "budgetary surplus", which is simply the excess of revenues over expenditures in the strict accounting sense. If we exclude the non-cash items from both revenues and expenditures, we find that cash revenues are likely to exceed cash expenditures not by $85 million but by about $250 million. To this we must add various receipts in pension and trust accounts and similar deferred liability accounts which are likely to run about $75 million, thus bringing total available cash funds to about $325 million, before taking account of the proceeds of any sales of government securities held temporarily in our securities investment account. Actually so far this year sales out of this account have amounted to $445 million.

A substantial part of our available cash resources is required, of course, to make loans, advances and investments which are authorized by legislation and which are carried on our books as active assets. We can make very rough and tentative estimates as to the probable amount of cash required for some of these outlays, including loans for housing, loans to veterans and farmers, loans to the Canadian National Railways and other crown corporations, and for the current fiscal year I now estimate that, after taking account of repayments in respect of loans or advances previously made, we will require a net additional outlay of about $165 million for these purposes. However, I would not like to make even a guess as to the amount of cash we shall have to find to finance our export surplus for the year—using the term "export surplus" in the broad sense as meaning our total surplus on international account. In this connection, we must of course finance the United Kingdom's current drawings of $10 million a month on its credit less repayments in respect of other export credits previously granted and we also have to provide cash to the foreign exchange control board to finance any addition to our gold and United States dollar reserves resulting from all our transactions on international account. It is only after taking care of all these extra-budgetary requirements that we have available cash to devote to the reduction of our outstanding debt.

[Mr. Abbott.]

In this connection I wish to refer very briefly to the notable record of financing for which this government has been responsible already this fiscal year.

In the United States market the government of Canada had a strikingly successful flotation in the latter part of August. To provide United States funds with which to redeem three called issues bearing our guarantee, two of the Canadian National Railways and one of the national harbours board, we offered $100 million of our 2¾ per cent bonds at a price of 100·25 to the public and the issue was immediately oversubscribed. To the best of my knowledge, this was the cheapest long-term borrowing ever done not merely by the government of Canada but by any foreign government in the United States market.

In the domestic market, aside from the normal refunding of various issues of short-term securities, we have arranged for the redemption or refinancing of a very heavy volume of security issues which have either matured or been called for payment in order to take advantage of lower interest rates. On September 2 we redeemed out of cash $100 million deposit certificates held by the chartered banks. On October 1 we paid off from our cash resources $324·9 million of 3 per cent second war loan bonds due October 1, 1952, but called for payment at the earliest call date. On November 1 there will come due $267·8 million of 1¾ per cent eighth victory loan bonds and there have been called for payment on the same day $289·7 million of 4½ per cent conversion loan bonds due November 1, 1959. To provide cash in part to redeem these two issues totalling $557·5 million, the government has arranged for the sale to the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks of $300 million of 1½ per cent three year bonds due November 1, 1952, at a price to yield 1·69 per cent. It should be realized that this $300 million short-term issue replaces a substantially larger amount of the called and maturing issues previously held by the banking system and therefore represents a contraction rather than an expansion of bank financing. The remaining cash required to pay off the called and maturing securities will be provided from the treasury. Our depleted cash balances will be replenished in part from the proceeds of the fourth series of 2¾ per cent Canada savings bonds which went on sale on Monday. In this connection I wish again to pay my tribute to the splendid work which has been done both by voluntary and professional workers in promoting the sale of the various series of these bonds and again to appeal to hon. members and others to give their enthusiastic support to the present campaign. I am happy to say that our first reports indicate that sales through the payroll savings plan will be higher than in any previous campaign. This seems to confirm our belief that wage and salary earners as well as the general public welcome the continuing opportunity for systematic saving afforded by these offerings.

Apart from this fourth issue of Canada savings bonds, the government has decided not to make any general public offering of its securities during the present fiscal year.

To summarize the end result of these domestic financial operations, the government has during the last few months provided for the redemption of $982·4 million of its outstanding securities which had matured or were called for payment in order to take advantage of lower interest rates. To the extent of $682·4 million, it was able to do so out of its cash surplus and the proceeds of sales of securities out of the securities investment account, the account in which the government temporarily holds some of its own securities rather than holding larger cash balances.

TAX PROPOSALS

Our four preceding post-war budgets—those of 1945, 1946, 1947 and 1948—were all brought down at times when shortages of commodities, materials and men were either acute or serious, and when the fundamental economic conditions called for anti-inflationary policies. The 1949 prospects were different. Production, employment and incomes were at very high levels—indeed, at record levels—but over most sectors of our economy production and demand had come into better balance and the post-war price inflation had passed its peak. The international economic position, while still difficult and full of uncertainties, had improved greatly, production in Europe and in other overseas areas had shown a gratifying improvement, and our own balance of payments position had shown a remarkable recovery from the low point of December, 1947. The principal area still affected by shortages and inflationary pressures was the field of capital construction and housing.

Under these conditions, it was appropriate that we should modify our fiscal policy by moderating its anti-inflationary aspects and aiming at a closer balance in over-all revenues and expenditures. On the expenditure side, in addition to practising the most careful economy and efficiency in all departments, it seemed wise for the immediate present to continue the policy of postponing wherever practicable all major construction work under our control, except in those few areas where some local unemployment was coming into evidence. On the revenue side, we could propose tax reductions which would bring revenues within a safe margin of total expenditures.

Having decided on a general policy of limiting expenditures and reducing taxes, our next question was where should the major tax reductions be concentrated. The supply of consumer goods had come pretty well into balance with even the very high level of consumer demand, but boom conditions and inflationary pressures still characterized the capital goods field. It therefore seemed appropriate to concentrate the tax reductions in the field of consumer incomes and consumer purchasing. At the same time we were anxious to initiate certain changes in the corporation tax field with a view to encouraging small businesses and reducing the element of double taxation that exists on corporate profits and personal incomes received in dividends with a view to stimulating equity financing.

These are the main considerations that were in our minds as we prepared the 1949 budget, and as I have already said, conditions have not altered sufficiently to warrant any significant changes in our tax proposals.

I can now summarize briefly the tax changes which I proposed last March, and which I am reintroducing this evening, together with a few additions and some revisions. In accordance with the traditional practice most of these changes became effective on the night of the budget, subject of course to later parliamentary approval.

First, as to the personal income tax, it was proposed that the personal exemptions, which have been $750 for single persons and $1,500 for married persons, be increased to $1,000 and $2,000 respectively; that the exemption in respect of children eligible for family allowance be increased from $100 to $150, and in respect of other dependents from $300 to $400; that the schedule of rates applicable to various levels of income be substantially lowered; and that the exemption from the extra tax on investment income be raised from $1,800 to $2,400. All these changes were to be effective from January 1, 1949.

There are, as the house will recall, a great many individual employees for whom tax deductions were made at the source by their employers during the first few months of this year but who now will have no income tax liability for 1949. It had been intended to expedite refunds to these individuals during the spring and early summer months. However, the dissolution of parliament before the budget legislation had been passed made it impossible to do so. Work, however, has gone ahead in preparing for the issuance of these refund cheques and they are now ready for mailing. They will be mailed just as soon as parliament approves the legislation.

Our only record of those persons entitled to refunds is their name and that of their employer. The cheques, therefore, will be made out in the name of the individual concerned but will be mailed to the employer through whom the deduction was made. Individuals affected, who have changed employers since last March, should therefore apply to their former employer for the refund cheques. Employers who find themselves unable to deliver these cheques to the proper persons will return them to their local district income tax offices and we shall then endeavour to locate the payees.

I repeat, however, that no cheques can be issued until after the legislation has been passed and employees should not apply to their employers until after that date.

In the second place, no changes were proposed in respect of succession duties, since the 1948 budget completely exempted all estates up to $50,000.

Thirdly, substantial changes were proposed in the corporation income tax. Instead of the former flat rate of 30 per cent, it was proposed to make the rate 10 per cent on the first $10,000 of income and 33 per cent on all income in excess of $10,000. I had proposed also that individuals be granted a credit against their personal income tax equal to 10 per cent of the dividends they receive from common shares of Canadian taxpaying corporations. This proposal has received a great deal of constructive criticism in the press and I have had a considerable number of representations from a variety of sources, some asking for clarification and others pointing out practical difficulties in the proposal as it stood or making constructive suggestions. As a result of these representations and public discussion, I am prepared to modify the application of my proposal by extending the 10 per cent tax credit to include dividends from all classes of shares, both common and preferred.

This change will remove a great many technical difficulties and anomalies which would have arisen in attempting to administer my original proposal of limiting the tax credit solely to shares "having no preference of any kind". It recognizes the fact that it is extremely difficult, if not indeed logically impossible, to determine where the burden of double taxation finally rests under a good many complicated capital structures used in modern corporate financing. Finally, it is calculated to accomplish the real objective which I was seeking of encouraging equity investment and thereby lessening the incentive to finance corporate enterprise by undue reliance on borrowed capital.

I might add that while it is difficult to measure precisely the loss of revenue resulting from this modification, I believe that it will not exceed $1 million a year.

It was also proposed to extend the present three-year period for the carrying forward of losses to a five-year period. There were in addition proposals respecting depreciation allowances, respecting expenditures on oil, mineral and gas exploration, and respecting a number of other minor or technical matters. All these changes were to be effective from January 1, 1949. I understand from my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, that drafting of the regulation providing for the new depreciation allowances is practically completed and that it will be promulgated as soon as the bill to amend the Income Tax Act has been passed.

Fourthly, no further changes were proposed in the customs tariff. I informed the house last March that new trade and tariff negotiations were to be started in April with a number of countries at Annecy. The results of these negotiations were officially announced last week, and the new rates of duty will be put into effect by order in council in accordance with the procedure laid down in the Customs Tariff Act. Their effective date will be January 1, 1950, or as soon after that date as the other countries concerned are able to take reciprocal action.

In my budget address of last March I said that it was the policy of the government to seek another trade agreement with the United States, similar to those entered into in the past, in which we would attempt to secure a further reduction in trade barriers between our two countries. The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act has now been renewed by the United States congress. In commenting with approval on this action by the congress, President Truman made these remarks respecting the policy of his government:

> From the long range standpoint it is clear that only by a large expansion of our purchases of foreign goods will the needed readjustment in international economic relations be possible, on a basis consistent with a liberal world trading system and the richer world it offers.
> We must reduce our own barriers, wherever possible, to permit our people the freest access to the foreign goods they may want to buy. The maintenance and the enlargement of our export markets are impossible without a substantial expansion of our imports.

This leadership given by the President of the United States in the task of removing barriers to world trade is most encouraging.

Plans are now under way as the house is aware for another set of multilateral trade negotiations during the course of next year, under the procedures established in the general agreement on tariffs and trade. At that time we shall seek to negotiate further tariff reductions with the United States and with the other signatories of the Geneva agreements.

Finally, in my budget proposals of last March extensive revisions, reductions and removals of taxes were proposed in the field of commodity taxes. These included the complete repeal of the special taxes on soft drinks, candy, chewing gum, transportation tickets and telephone, telegram and cable charges. Special taxes on jewelry, watches, cosmetics, luggage, cigarette lighters and sundry smokers' supplies were to be reduced from the former rates of 25 per cent or 35 per cent to a straight 10 per cent. The structure of the tax on matches was to be recast and reduced. These changes in commodity taxes were to be effective as from March 23, 1949, and since that date collections have been on the reduced basis.

In addition to these commodity tax reductions, I have two new proposals to make. I propose that, effective midnight tonight, the sales tax be removed on all fuel oils, that is, on all petroleum-based oils used for heating or lighting in homes or in industry, but not including fuels used in internal combustion engines. There is at present no sales tax on coal, coke, wood, gas or electricity, and there has been some element of discrimination in keeping it on these fuel oils both for domestic and industrial use. The removal of this tax on fuel oils will reduce costs of production and remove the element of discrimination in those industries, particularly certain sections of the pulp and paper and steel industries, where fuel oil rather than coal is the principal fuel used. It should serve as well to enlarge the market for oil producers in western Canada who are now reaching the position where current output exceeds their present marketing facilities. It should also largely offset the recent price increases arising out of the premium on the United States dollar. For all these reasons I think it appropriate to make this change at this time. Our loss in revenue from this tax change will be about $10 million in a full year and about $4 million in the balance of this fiscal year.

I have one other minor change to suggest which I am making now as it may be of assistance in enabling the apple industry to dispose of an additional quantity of apples. The proposal is that the present tax on cider and other wines containing less than 7 per cent of proof spirits be reduced by one-half, that is, from 50 cents a gallon to 25 cents a gallon. The loss of revenue, if any, which we will forgo as a result, will be very small.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that at an earlier point in my remarks I estimated that had no changes been made in the tax structure we had in effect last year, our total revenues for the current fiscal year would probably amount to about $2,885 million. Our revised estimates of the loss of revenue occasioned by the tax changes I proposed last March indicate a total reduction of about $376 million in a full year and of about $335 million in the current fiscal year. The additional tax changes which I have proposed this evening are expected to cause a further revenue reduction of about $11 million in a full year and about $5 million in the current fiscal year. However, as I said a few minutes ago, even after taking into account the effect of the additional tax changes I have just announced, total revenues for the current year are likely to be maintained at a figure which, after deducting the total expenditures I have estimated, will produce a budgetary surplus very close to the $87 million which I forecast last March.

With the consent of the house, I now wish to place on Hansard a table showing our forecast of probable revenues from each major source before taking account of any tax changes, the probable loss of revenue caused by the major tax changes, and the resultant probable revenues for the year 1949-50.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister the consent of the house to table the statement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Abbott: The statement follows:

There is little that I need add, Mr. Speaker, by way of conclusion. The budget resolutions which I am now tabling differ only slightly from those which I tabled last March. They represent, both as to general policy and as to practical substance, a program which seems to have commended itself to all sections of the country—a program upon which the people of Canada, after careful reflection, have already placed the overwhelming stamp of their approval.

I beg leave to table the resolutions:

INCOME TAX

Resolved that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and the Income Tax Act and to provide, amongst other things:

1. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, the following shall be the exemptions from individual income tax:

(a) $2,000 in the case of a married person and persons allowed a deduction equivalent to that of a married person and $1,000 in the case of all other persons; and

2. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, the schedule of graduated rates for individual income tax be replaced by the following schedule:

On the first $1,000 of income or any portion thereof, 15 per cent per annum; or

$150 upon the income of $1,000; and 17 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $1,000 and does not exceed $2,000; or

$16,160 upon the income of $40,000; and 55 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $40,000 and does not exceed $60,000; or

$67,910 upon the income of $125,000; and 70 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $125,000 and does not exceed $225,000; or

$269,160 upon the income of $400,000; and 80 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $400,000.

3. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, there may be deducted from tax payable by an individual resident in Canada 10 per cent of the amount of his income that is from dividends on shares in a corporation resident in Canada that was liable to corporation tax in the taxation year: Provided that in the case of dividends deemed to have been received from a personal corporation the deduction shall only be 10 per cent of that part of the income deemed to have been received by the shareholder as a dividend that the income of the corporation derived from dividends is of the whole income of the corporation.

4. That, with respect to income of corporations earned on and after January 1, 1949, the present rate of tax of 30 per cent shall be reduced to 10 per cent on the first $10,000 of income and increased to 33 per cent on income in excess of $10,000 with corresponding changes in the rates in the case of consolidations.

5. That interest on unpaid taxes on incomes of the 1948 and subsequent taxation years for which no assessments have been issued will cease to accrue twelve months after the date for filing the return in place of twenty months.

6. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, the business losses that may be deducted from income shall include losses sustained in the five years preceding and the year following the taxation year in the place of the three years preceding and the year following the taxation year.

7. That, for the purpose of computing income of the 1948 and subsequent taxation years of a member of the clergy or of a religious order or a regular minister of a religious denomination there may be deducted the value of the residence or other living accommodation enjoyed by him as such member or minister to the extent that it would otherwise be included in his income or the rent paid by him for or the fair rental value of such a residence or living accommodation.

8. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, the exemption from income of an individual in respect of a spouse supported by him shall not be reduced because of exempt income of the spouse.

9. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, all amounts whether in the form of lump sums or otherwise, received by employees from their employers, whether before, during or after their employment, shall be included in computing income of the employee unless it is established that they cannot reasonably be regarded as consideration for entry into the employment, remuneration for services or consideration for restrictions on the activities of the employee.

10. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, payments made for a wheel chair may be included in the medical expenses for which a deduction from income may be made for the purpose of computing taxable income.

11. That, for the 1949 and subsequent taxation years, $500 may be deducted from income for the purpose of computing taxable income of a taxpayer who, throughout the whole of the taxation year, was necessarily confined by reason of illness, injury or affliction to a bed or wheel chair.

12. That special deductions from income to taxpayers engaged in exploring or drilling for natural gas, oil or minerals be allowed for expenses incurred in the 1950, 1951 and 1952 operations on the same basis as for expenses in 1949 operations.

13. That special deductions from taxes to taxpayers engaged in exploring or drilling for oil for expenses incurred on deep-test oil wells be allowed for such expenses in 1950 operations on the same basis as for such expenses in 1949 operations.

14. That the provision for the exemption of income derived from a metalliferous or industrial mineral mine that came into production during the calendar years 1946 to 1949 inclusive during the period of thirty-six months after the mine came into production be extended to exempt income from such mines that come into production during the calendar years 1950, 1951 and 1952.

15. That tax concessions under Statutes of Newfoundland shall not apply in respect of taxes imposed by any act of the parliament of Canada.

(For details of the budget, see appendix, pages 997 to 1009.)

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): It is not my intention to follow the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) at any length tonight. I do not think anyone can fail to appreciate his genial, pleasant and satisfied style. I always find it pleasant to listen to him whether I agree with him or not. In fact, I find it pleasant to overlook the things he does not say as well as to listen to the things he does say.

It is a unique experience in my many years in this house to hear the same budget presented twice in the same year. The Minister of Finance presented his budget last spring in a most fluent, pleasant, jovial and happy style.

Mr. Cruickshank: The same government too.

Mr. Rowe: As an hon. member says, the government was the same as it is tonight.

Mr. Cruickshank: The people thought they should come back.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. member is lucky to be back. As I say, it is a unique experience. After hearing the rehearsal tonight I think the eloquence of the genial minister has improved with practice, as might be expected. But in view of the alarming changes in international trade relations and world currencies during the past summer I am sure the house is somewhat disappointed to find the government presenting the same old plans that were presented last spring.

Through the courtesy of the Minister of Finance I have had a copy of this important document. It is important because we all contribute to it more or less. Even we farmers contribute to it. I feel it would be lacking in respect to my genial friend, the Minister of Finance, and a denial of my responsibilities on this occasion, if I spoke impromptu, without careful consideration of the minister's presentation. I always sleep well, but tonight I shall spend a few hours studying the budget in an effort to discover some of its strong points, which I cannot see in it tonight. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—ADDRESS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King praying that a measure be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act, 1867, relating to the amendment of the constitution of Canada, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Knowles, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Garson.

Mr. St. Laurent: With the consent of the hon. member who is to resume his remarks and of the other hon. members of the house I should like to state that my attention has been called to the fact that in moving an amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I referred to certain lines as the fourth and fifth lines and the seventh and eighth lines. Those references were to lines in the typewritten copy which I had received of the hon. member's amendment, but it will be printed in much smaller type in Votes and Proceedings. I should like to ask the consent of the house to authorize the clerk to make the wording conform with what is in Votes and Proceedings. If it is the pleasure of the house to have that done perhaps the Clerk would see that it is corrected.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, when we took recess at six o'clock I was attempting to draw the attention of the house to many weaknesses in the arguments of those who are opposing the resolution moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I should like to remind hon. members that in discussing this suggested method to permit Canada to change its constitution there are really three propositions before us. The original motion of the Prime Minister merely suggests that we should have the right to amend our constitution in some particulars. In the original motion he did not suggest that the constitution should be amended in all particulars. There were certain reservations in connection with education, minority rights and the use of the two languages in this country.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggested an amendment that would place another reservation upon those matters on which we might constitutionally legislate in this country. He suggested that a proviso be added that this parliament should not be placed in a position where it might perpetuate itself merely by a majority vote in this house. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) now suggests a subamendment adding still another reservation. In addition to what has been suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the Prime Minister would add that parliament should have the right to extend its life in the event of war, rumours of war, and so on.

When we come to vote on this matter I believe we should keep these things in mind. Earlier in the discussion I said that perhaps there was no need for an amendment to the original motion. On further consideration I think perhaps the steps now proposed in the subamendment and the amendment are necessary, so we may understand that we are not taking unto ourselves the right to amend the constitution as a whole but that there are certain reservations. If it is considered advisable to deal with those matters by legislation, it will still be necessary for us to go to the United Kingdom parliament for that authority.

Earlier in the debate I pointed out that amending the constitution without consulting the provinces is nothing new. The constitution has been amended eleven times, and on only three occasions were the provinces consulted before those amendments were made. On one occasion of the eleven an amendment was made after only four provinces had been consulted. On another occasion British Columbia dissented; nevertheless the amendment was made. I suggested that nothing was upset as a result, that Canada went along and none of the provinces pulled out of confederation. The argument now put forward that the provinces should be consulted first falls flat, I think, in view of the reservations made in the amendment and subamendment as to certain things which may not be done in regard to the constitution.

I also pointed out that there was a mandate to amend the constitution from a dominion-provincial conference held in 1935, and I put on record the suggestions made at that time. I am not going to waste time in repeating them. Many hon. members have advanced legal and technical arguments in this debate, and have suggested that there is no hurry. Well, certainly there has been no hurry up to the present; this has been unfinished business since 1935. As I said earlier, I compliment the Prime Minister on giving us action now, and I think this is the time to take this step, at the opening of this parliament. We have more than 260 members here, most of whom will be here for the next four years. Any amendments to the constitution that have to be made probably will be made during that period, so the members who are deciding this question of constitutional change now will be here to see that any changes are made in the right way.

I do not think any province has anything to fear. Quebec is strongly represented in this parliament, with some 67 members. Knowing most of them as I do, I believe Mr. Duplessis may rest assured that if there is any interference with the rights of his province he will have 67 vocal and explosive members here who will see that those rights are protected. As far as Nova Scotia is concerned, our premier also takes the stand that he wants to be consulted. Well, he was a member of the federal cabinet here all during the war, and I think he is pretty well acquainted with many members of this house, particularly the members of the government. He has been a member of the Liberal party all his life, but he does not appear to trust them very much. He wants to hang on to his jurisdiction. He wants a dominion-provincial conference first. Well, it was not so long ago that he attended a dominion-provincial conference in this city, and if my recollection serves me right at that time the dominion made some very good proposals to the provinces. But the premier of Nova Scotia was one of those who joined with the premiers of Ontario and Quebec in blocking that conference, and I believe they did the people of Canada a great disservice. I think we lost a great deal, particularly in the over-all health program for this country which was to cost the federal government some $200 million. If the premier of Nova Scotia wants another dominion-provincial conference now so that he may veto what the federal government may have in mind with respect to amending our constitution in this country, as far as I am concerned he can stay at home.

I do not see what he wants to hang on to. Sometimes it amazes me when I hear them talk about dominion or provincial rights. What rights? As far as Nova Scotia is concerned, they have had their rights since confederation. What have they done with them? In the province from which I come they leased the birthright of the people of that province to corporations for ninety-nine years. They sold them out. Since confederation some two hundred industries have been siphoned off from Nova Scotia and moved to central Canada; and those who talk most about provincial rights presided over that liquidation of their own province. I want to get clear of all that kind of thing. I want to see Canada welded into a nation, and I want to see the stumbling blocks of the past removed. The powers most of the provinces have had since confederation have militated against the best interests of the people in those provinces. For example, for many years as a member of the trade union movement I spoke in halls and write resolutions which were sent to provincial and dominion governments on the question of an unemployment insurance act. For years we were denied such legislation because the federal government did not have the authority and provincial governments would not agree to it. Then when war broke out the Prime Minister took the bit in his teeth and put that legislation on the statute books; but it was held back for many years because of this question of jurisdiction. Again, under existing conditions it is impossible to establish an over-all health plan in this country, though I am sure every member of this house and ninety per cent of the people of Canada agree that this is absolutely necessary. The provincial governments have the authority but they do not have the finances to look after the health of the people. The federal government has the means but does not have the authority. Under the legislation now proposed by the Prime Minister the responsibility will become ours of changing the constitution to make the national government supreme in that field, so I think it is up to us to go ahead with it whether the premier of Quebec or the premier of Nova Scotia or any other individual in this country agrees with it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Does the resolution do that?

Mr. Gillis: I think it does. It will be up to us if we take to ourselves the right to amend the constitution in this country.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Will the Prime Minister agree with that?

Mr. Gillis: I don't know, but I am selling him ideas, and I hope he accepts them. Then again, there is a matter of a national labour code. Many of the members in this house who were here during the war went through the strikes after the war, and watched the industrial relations committee in action. Those members will also remember our attempts to hammer out a national labour code in this country, something that is absolutely necessary in order to secure uniformity of labour legislation across the country. Every time a member started to talk about a national code, one of our legal friends started waving the British North America Act. We were told we could not do that because section so-and-so of the British North America Act prohibits it. We were told we had to go over to the old country to get it amended. All right, now is the time to change it.

There is a national labour code, so-called, in existence. It is not a national labour code at all because it only embraces a very few industries that fall within the jurisdiction of the federal government. It is still not national. I want this parliament to have the right to change the constitution to enable us to establish a national labour code in this country which will empower the government to fix minimum wages and vacations with pay. No restrictions would be placed on the provinces if they wanted to raise those minimums. I believe, however, there should be a national minimum wage rate applicable all across Canada.

I should like to ask my friends from Quebec this question, and through them Mr. Duplessis, who so strongly guards the rights of the provinces. How much did he respect the rights of his municipalities in events which occurred not so long ago?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gillis: I remember when the asbestos workers, who were working for very low wages and who were in a union known as the Catholic Syndicate—which could not be considered radical or communistic by any stretch of the imagination—used every piece of machinery Duplessis made available in order to settle the dispute. In the final analysis they were forced to take a stand to settle that dispute. Did Mr. Duplessis respect the rights of the municipalities when he sent in his police to smash the strike without any solicitation from the municipalities? He invaded their rights, smashed things up, and was not very particular at that time about democracy or conferences with the municipalities before he usurped their privileges. I am afraid that Mr. Duplessis and those who oppose the steps now being taken by the federal government merely wish to retain a veto. It is not a matter of sitting down and reasoning out some methods for changing our constitution; it is a matter of retaining the machinery so that one province in this country can veto anything that means progress and advancement for the people.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What province is that?

Mr. Gillis: It could be Alberta.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You know quite well it could not be that province.

Mr. Gillis: I do not know, but I will let you know after I hear my hon. friends on my left speak.

I just wish to say this, Mr. Speaker, that in these matters we cannot continue to think in terms of the past. So far as I am concerned, I believe we have reached the end of an age. We have closed the old book and are starting to write a new one. Society is developing new mechanics. I should like to remind those who argue that we should continue to go to the parliament of the United Kingdom for amendments to our constitution, and to retain the privy council as the final court of appeal, that the country to which we are still clinging on that basis has gone through a revolution and is going through a revolution. Canada today has to begin thinking in terms of the future and close the book on the past. The past offers us no guide for what is going to take place in the future in this world.

Great Britain no longer represents what it represented in 1867. Drastic changes have been made and will continue to be made in that country. It is time Canadians began to think for themselves in terms of building a nation and working out our own destiny in this world. There is no going back. We will either have to go forward or become stagnant and fall into disrepute in the eyes of the world. When I pick up a newspaper and see that the Canadian delegates at the United Nations are not in a position to vote on a certain question because the federal government has not authority to legislate on that matter, I feel it must be very embarrassing to those delegates.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my time has nearly expired but I should like to leave this thought with the members of the house. So far as this group is concerned, it is not a matter of politics. On many occasions, we are accused of supporting the government. It is immaterial to us who proposes the legislation. If our group believes it is a step in the right direction, we will support the proposal. The measure may not go as far as we want to go, but if it is a step in the right direction, no matter who proposes it, we will support it. I believe the step the Prime Minister is now taking is a step that should have been taken back in 1935. It is unfinished business since that time. I complimented the Prime Minister on his courage in bringing this measure forward at this time so early in this session. The members who are debating the question will be able to carefully scrutinize what changes may be made.

In 1935 the dominion-provincial conference recommended this change. It is unfinished business since that time. I do not believe either Quebec or Nova Scotia, or any of the provinces who are sceptical about it, have anything to fear. I have been looking over the members of this house for the past month and I believe they compare favourably with the members of any house since I had the privilege of coming to Ottawa. Most of them are young and vocal. They have no inferiority complex; they are prepared to debate issues and have been debating them. I believe that with the sort of parliament we have now we should have no fear of accepting the responsibility of regulating the future of this country.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we have all listened with much pleasure to the address by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. He takes part in a good many of the debates in this house and always adds something to them. At the outset of his remarks, I was interested in hearing him take the Prime Minister on what might be termed a Cook's tour up the side of a high mountain and leave him at the top of that mountain. I might point out, Mr. Speaker, that the top of a mountain is a rather cold and slippery place, and even with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) as his guide I am sure the Prime Minister would have to watch his step.

The hon. member also spoke about the humiliation which certain of our representatives feel when they attend the United Nations conventions because of their inability to carry out certain ideas which are within the jurisdiction of the provinces. It is that very thing, Mr. Speaker, to which the provinces are objecting. The hon. member seemed to indicate that he was willing for the provinces to lose some jurisdiction they now have, without being consulted as to why it should be taken from them. In closing his remarks, the hon. member also said that we are no longer going to Great Britain to have our constitution amended. During the course of this debate I have not heard one speaker advocate going to Great Britain to have our constitution amended. I am sure there is no member in this party who has advocated that our constitution should not be amended by the representatives of our own people. But what we are asking is that the whole constitution be amended at the one time. What we object to is its being amended piecemeal, as the resolution of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) would suggest. Unless it is amended as has been suggested by our leader I am satisfied that, as he has clearly pointed out, we shall have to do the very thing that the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) objects to.

It is not my intention to prolong this debate to any great extent; but coming as I do from New Brunswick, which was one of the pillars of confederation, I felt that I should say a few words in this debate, particularly as no one from my province has already spoken.

At the present time New Brunswick does not constitute as important a part of this dominion as we did in 1867. At that time, together with the province of Nova Scotia and the province of Canada, as it was called, we were the pillars or the basis of the confederation of Canada. We were therefore quite important then. Today we are not so important. Quite a number of changes in our constitution have taken place since those early days, but most of them have not worked out to the benefit of my province nor to the benefit of the other two maritime provinces, or perhaps I should say the other three maritime provinces as there are today.

In his remarks this afternoon the Prime Minister said—and it has been repeated by some other members—that the people of the dominion knew well that constitutional changes would be brought before this house at this session. I remember that, during the election campaign, the Prime Minister spoke rather casually of this matter in the city of Moncton in my own province. But I want to say that, outside of the Prime Minister himself, I never heard any of the candidates on any side mention constitutional issues during the election campaign. As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister himself tried to impress upon the people of Canada the idea that there were no issues; he said there were no issues in this campaign. The issues which we heard most of during the campaign were the family allowances and the old age pensions. Those were the issues in my own constituency; they were the issues all over my province, as they were in most parts of Canada. Instead of being told that their constitution was to be changed, the people were told that if they did not vote for the Liberal government they were going to lose their baby bonuses and their old age pensions. Those were the chief issues during the campaign, Mr. Speaker.

As I say, I think there is arising in this dominion at the present time an interest over this matter which was not manifested at all during the election campaign. I was rather disappointed at the response of the premier of New Brunswick, Mr. McNair, when he replied to the Prime Minister's letter with regard to the resolution and with regard to the calling together of the various provincial premiers. The Prime Minister's letter was sent out on September 14. The premier of New Brunswick replied to it on September 16. He said:

I am this day in receipt of your letter of September fourteenth which has reference to—

And so on; he mentions this matter of the constitutional changes. My point is this. Instead of giving any consideration to this matter, the premier of New Brunswick simply acknowledged the Prime Minister's letter. He did not even call together his cabinet, as was done by the premiers in most other provinces of the dominion.

Reading the letters, I gather that the only other premier of a province who did not call together his cabinet was the premier of Prince Edward Island, who wrote a three-line letter in acknowledgment of the Prime Minister's. He said that if and when that conference was held, he and his cabinet would be pleased to attend.

The premier of Newfoundland took some time to reply. His letter is dated October 4, and in it he indicates that he had brought the matter fully before his government. Then the premier of Nova Scotia, Hon. Angus L. Macdonald, who has just received some attention from the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), replied on September 27. He also took the matter up with his colleagues. Despite what the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said this evening, I think that the premier of Nova Scotia reflects the feeling of the people of the three maritime provinces. He said:

There is, I believe, considerable support for the view that the abolition of appeals to the privy council is in effect an amendment of the constitution and that, therefore, it is a question which should be the subject of discussion at the dominion-provincial conference which you suggest.

I believe that paragraph expresses the opinion which is quite generally held by the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

I will not quote further from the letters of the premiers of the various provinces, but the point I wish to make is this. They all took time to consider the letter which was written by the Prime Minister of Canada, except the premier of Prince Edward Island and the premier of New Brunswick. In their replies they also gave considerable attention to the subject matter. But if the premier of our province has not given much attention to this matter, I feel that the people of the province today are giving considerable attention to it. I base my opinion on a report in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal of Monday, October 17. This is an article written by Dr. A. P. Paterson, former New Brunswick minister of education and federal and municipal relations. He was a minister in the Liberal government in the province of New Brunswick. The heading of this article written by Dr. Paterson is as follows:

An Appeal to the People of New Brunswick, in all Walks of Life, to Protect Their Rights and Interest from Misuse of Authority by the Government and Parliament of Canada.

That is a strong heading, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. St. Laurent: He is a man of strong views.

Mr. Brooks: As the Prime Minister has said, he is a man of strong views; but he is also a man who has spent most of his life in discussing and studying constitutional matters. I do not know that everybody agrees with him; but then, everyone does not agree with the Prime Minister. Dr. Paterson, however, is a man whose views, I think, are held in quite high esteem by a good many people. In this article Dr. Paterson says:

In the face of Ottawa's speech from the throne, if at any time since New Brunswick was established as a province, we, the people of New Brunswick, needed competent leaders in all walks of life to protect our rights and interests we need them now.

I should like to quote further from Dr. Paterson. In speaking about confederation he had this to say:

The legislatures of the original provinces created the original Dominion of Canada and only the legislature of New Brunswick has the power to agree to amendments of Canada's constitution lawfully so far as this province is concerned. All the authority delegated to the government and parliament of Canada by the provinces, for particular objects, is defined in written documents and Canada's constitution is something sacred not something to be changed or amended by a group of political leaders, except by following the procedure by which it was created.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that at the time of confederation the province of New Brunswick was a sovereign state. When speaking the other day an hon. member said that the provinces were not sovereign states. New Brunswick was never a colony. It was made a province in 1791. In discussing confederation they discussed the problems with Nova Scotia, which was also a sovereign body, and with the province of Canada, which at that time was made up of upper and lower Canada under the Union Act, and afterwards it became the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

We had such men as Sir Leonard Tilley from New Brunswick, Sir Charles Tupper from Nova Scotia and also Joseph Howe who, as hon. members know, was opposed to confederation. These are some of the very able and outstanding men whom we had in the maritime provinces discussing this matter. I would also point out that in both Nova Scotia and New Brunswick there was a very strong feeling against confederation. These provinces came in not because there was a great feeling in the provinces that we should join with the rest of Canada, but because Sir John A. Macdonald, and other statesmen from what was known as upper Canada at that time, visited the maritime provinces and begged that New Brunswick and Nova Scotia become a part of confederation. I doubt very much whether Canada would ever have become the great country she is today had New Brunswick and Nova Scotia refused to enter confederation at that time. I point out these things, sir, simply to show the importance of our two provinces at the time of the confederation pact.

Since that time New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have lost in importance, but there are two matters that are important to us in these provinces today. One is the matter of taxation, and the other is the matter of representation. So far as representation is concerned, we wish to be assured that we who in the past have lost so many members to the rest of Canada will not lose our representation in the future. That is one of the main points so far as our provinces are concerned. At the time of confederation New Brunswick had a population of around 250,000 people. At that time she was given a representation of fifteen members. Nova Scotia had a population of over 400,000 people. She was given a representation of nineteen members. Today, after all these years, when our population has increased from 250,000 to almost 500,000, instead of fifteen members we have ten. Nova Scotia instead of having nineteen members has thirteen. That is one of the main reasons why we in these little provinces are jealous and afraid of any tampering with the constitution.

Sections 21 and 22 of the British North America Act deal with the composition of the Senate. The representation in the House of Commons is covered by sections 51, 51A and 52 as amended in 1946. Today under these sections the representation of New Brunswick cannot be fewer than the number of senators we have, which is ten. The representation of Prince Edward Island cannot go below four, because that is the number of senators from that province. If, as we sometimes fear, the responsibility of amending our constitution rests entirely with the Dominion of Canada, changes may be made in that representation. Today there are sections in Canada —and I have heard it expressed in the House of Commons—which say that these small provinces down by the sea have been accorded special treatment. They say that we have too much representation. As a matter of fact the late Mr. Woodsworth, who was the leader of the C.C.F. party at one time, said that we were receiving special privileges and it was something which should be corrected. This sentiment exists in Canada. As I have said, I have heard it expressed by hon. members since I have been in the house. For this reason we are exercised over the fact that the provinces of Canada, especially New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, should not be consulted before any changes are made so far as representation is concerned.

Another important matter is taxation. Today New Brunswick has the largest per capita debt of any province in Canada. We pay the highest taxation of any province in Canada. A few years ago when I happened to be in London I met Sir Andrew Rae Duncan, the man who was responsible for the Duncan report. He asked me what part of Canada I came from. I told him New Brunswick. He said, "You are long-suffering people in the maritime provinces". He told me about making his report for the betterment of conditions in the maritime provinces. He said, "That report has never been implemented. If you depend on the rest of Canada I fear that it never will be implemented". It is on account of the treatment that we have received in the past, not only in the matter of representation, but in the matter of taxation, that we fear this method of amending the British North America Act.

I might also refer to other amendments of the British North America Act. When the territory of Quebec was extended, which was done by an amendment to the British North America Act, we in the maritime provinces received no compensation, although we had helped to pay for the Hudson bay territory which was bought by the dominion government and taken over at that time. The same was true of the boundaries of practically every other province in Canada. Our boundaries were fixed by the British North America Act. The province of Nova Scotia could not expand. New Brunswick could not expand, neither could Prince Edward Island. While we helped to pay, and while I believe these territories belonged in part to these provinces down by the sea, we received no compensation.

We hear hon. members in different parts of the house say that we in the maritime provinces have received special favours as far as representation is concerned. The British North America Act was passed, first, to unite this country into one great dominion; second, to protect minorities; and third, to protect the people who lived in the smaller provinces not only for the time being but for all time. I am emphasizing this because I believe that, unless the provinces are consulted when amendments are made to the British North America Act, they may suffer in the future. These are matters which are not under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

If for instance the representation was under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces we would need have no fear; but this is something which is under the jurisdiction of the federal house. The same applies in the matter of financial arrangements which have been made with the different provinces.

Some time ago I spoke on the matter of redistribution, and on that occasion I quoted a statement made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1907 regarding confederation. We have heard it stated continuously in the house that confederation is not a compact. However, we find that in 1907 Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> Confederation is a compact, made originally by four provinces, but adhered to by all the nine provinces, who have entered it, and I submit to the judgment of this house and to the best consideration of its members, that this compact should not be lightly altered. It should be altered only for adequate cause, and after the provinces themselves have had an opportunity to pass judgment on the same.

Those are the words of a leader of the party of hon. members opposite. He was addressing his remarks to the then hon. member for York, Mr. Crocket, and said:

> My hon. friend from York, New Brunswick, stated in the course of his argument that we have announced in the speech from the throne that we are going to ask parliament to alter the financial terms of confederation. That is very true; but my hon. friend should know that we did not come to that conclusion except after conference with the provinces and after all the provincial governments had united in a prayer for the same.

That was a matter of financial arrangement, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier said at that time that they did not come to any agreement until they consulted all the provinces. Surely the arrangements we wish to make regarding the change in our constitution are just as important as was the financial arrangement of 1907.

[Mr. Brooks]

Sir Robert Borden spoke on the same day. I think all hon. members will agree that he was a great constitutional lawyer. On that occasion he said:

> I agree with what has been said by the right hon. gentleman regarding the undesirability of lightly amending the terms of our constitution and am inclined to agree with him on the necessity of some consultation with the provinces, although of course all the provinces are represented here. But inasmuch as this is a federal compact which we are asked to vary, it is only right that each province should be consulted and its decision given, in the right of its separate entity. But I am not inclined to agree altogether in some of the suggestions urged by my hon. friend.

I have many other quotations here, but I shall not weary the house by quoting them. Most of them have already been placed on Hansard.

Another point has been brought up, namely the suggested inferiority complex of the Canadian people brought about by their having to go to London so often to have our constitution amended. I have seen very little inferiority complex among the people of Canada. We in the maritime provinces fear more the superiority complex of some of our friends from other parts of Canada than we do any inferiority complex which has manifested itself.

Canada is a nation, and has been a nation for many years. I remember reading as a schoolboy some lines of Kipling written over fifty years ago, where he said, in pointing out that Canada was at that time recognized by the British people:

> A nation spoke to a nation,
> A queen sent word to a throne:
> "Daughter am I in my mother's house,
> But mistress in my own."

England recognized Canada as a nation in those days; she recognized her as mistress in her own home. I am sure that there was no inferiority complex to be found among the men who took part in the first war. They held their heads high, and felt that as Canadians they were the equal of, indeed if not better than any people with whom they came in contact. The same was true of the men in the second world war. If there was any inferiority complex in Canada, certainly it was not from the men who made Canada the great nation she is. If such a complex has ever existed it may have come from those who possibly did not see the necessity of bearing the burden at that time as did some others.

In closing I would make only two points. The first is that, whatever is done, provision should be made for the protection of the smaller provinces which, I contend, are not in a position either financially or in the matter of population to protect themselves. In my province we always look to the privy council for protection. I have no doubt that the government's intention will be carried out; there is no question in my mind about that. I have no doubt that whatever amendments the government wishes to make it will make. I do appeal to them however to make amendments such as will protect those of us in the smaller provinces. We would prefer to have the provinces consulted, and I feel they should be consulted in all matters pertaining to their future.

I hope, too, that whatever changes are made in the constitution, within the ambit of that constitution there will grow in Canada a stronger nation, and that in future there may be no suggestion of any inferiority complex. We have had none in the past. I believe it is the destiny of this Canada of ours to become the greatest nation in the British commonwealth. I trust that, whatever is done in this parliament, it may be done with that object in view.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at great length. I have no quotations from the dead or from big books to offer. Since the beginning of this debate there have been countless quotations from big books or from the speeches of the illustrious dead. These provide interesting reading. However, if we are going to go on like that I suggest we might better adjourn to the library or to the reading room, so that everyone would have an opportunity of becoming a bookworm.

I like better to hear a personal opinion expressed by any one of my colleagues. That is why I enjoyed so much the first portion of the speech by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), wherein he voiced the grievances of the maritime provinces. And although I am a great admirer of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and of the other gentleman he quoted, this time I suggest we should consider the proposal before us. I have already congratulated the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) upon his courage in taking this stand to amend the constitution. It is a difficult task. But where would we be if we followed the suggestion made by Mr. Beauchesne before the committee in 1935 and attempted to draft a constitution before a constituent assembly of 225 members? Whoever would think of doing that? We would have something like what happened in France at the time of the assemblée constituante. It would be nothing but chaos and a tower of Babel. It could not be otherwise.

As hon. gentlemen know, the work of the many must be preceded by the work of the few or sometimes by the work of one man. There are those who prepare drafts of legislation or of the work to be handled by a committee so that there may be unity in the subsequent work that is done. There should be direction; there should be a start. First there should be the decision and then something should be offered to the legislative body which is concerned.

Complaints have been made by hon. gentlemen on the other side who are brilliant members of the bar that this matter should be discussed in committee of the whole. That is not necessary because this address will be followed by a bill which will go through all the stages of ordinary legislation—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pouliot: —first reading, second reading, committee of the whole—

Mr. Fraser: This is just a resolution.

Mr. Knowles: This goes direct to His Majesty.

Mr. Pouliot: This is an address to the British government asking the right for the parliament of Canada to amend our constitution. That amendment will be made by the parliament of Canada, not by order in council. Who would ever think of that? If the amendment to the constitution is made by the parliament of Canada it will be done by means of legislation in connection with which each hon. member will have an opportunity to ask questions of the government.

Mr. Knowles: If the hon. member is now referring to amendments to the constitution that may be made by this parliament after this measure passes, then I agree with him.

Mr. Pouliot: Exactly. My hon. friend should have agreed at first.

Mr. Knowles: That is not what the hon. member said at first.

Mr. Pouliot: That disposes of the objection that no questions may be asked.

Mr. Knowles: Just to be clear. When could an hon. member ask questions of the government?

Mr. Casselman: When it is too late.

Mr. Pouliot: The hon. member made one suggestion with respect to holding a session of parliament every year and the term of a parliament, and apparently that was the principal thing that interested him. The question now is not whether amendments will be made at this time; the question is to get permission for this parliament to make amendments later on by means of regular legislation. There would then be an opportunity for all members to ask questions of the government and when that is done I assume that most hon. members will have their minds satisfied by the answers given.

British North America Act

Strong arguments have been put forth by those who contend, on the one hand, that the British North America Act is a compact or contract and those who, on the other hand, contend that it is imperial legislation. It is quite easy to solve that problem; nothing is simpler. In the first place, unquestionably it is an agreement. All we have to do is look at the Quebec resolutions passed in 1864, at the London resolutions adopted at a conference of delegates from the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick held at the Westminster Palace hotel, London, December 4, 1866, and at the British North America Act which was assented to on March 29, 1867.

It is clear that the fathers of confederation proceeded by stages. They met first in Charlottetown, adjourned to Quebec, and then to London. While in London they discussed the matter further with the British government. The British North America Act is not composed of the text of the London resolutions, and the London resolutions were not composed of the text of the Quebec resolutions. The British North America Act indicates that there was progress in the discussions, that finally agreement was arrived at and there was a drafting of the act. Not only was there agreement itself; that agreement is wrapped up in an imperial statute. Every time an amendment was made to the constitution the bag was opened.

The main essence of the British North America Act is to be found in the separation of the powers. I have just noted the number of times that the words "exclusive" and "exclusively" are repeated in the two sections which deal with the distribution of powers between parliament and the various legislatures. Section 91 reads:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say,—

Then paragraph 29 of that section reads:

> Such classes of subjects as are expressly excepted in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.
> And any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section shall not be deemed to come within the class of matters of a local or private nature comprised in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Now I come to section 92, concerning the exclusive powers of provincial legislatures:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively—

"Exclusively" again.

> —make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say...

In section 93 the question of education is dealt with, and in each province the legislature is given exclusive power to make laws concerning this matter. Then we come to section 130, which provides:

> Until the parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all officers of the several provinces having duties to discharge in relation to matters other than those coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces shall be officers of Canada . . .

and so on. It strikes me that the important parts of the act concern the distribution of powers as between Ottawa on the one hand and the provinces on the other. It is abundantly clear that the principle which guided the fathers of confederation in the first place and those who sponsored the act in the second place was to apply to the dominion and the provinces respectively the doctrine "Mind your own business." I believe that is clear. Ottawa was given exclusive jurisdiction to do certain things. On the other hand the provinces were given exclusive jurisdiction to do other things. And so there would be no controversy, no conflict of jurisdiction, it was established in the most definite manner. If in turn the dominion or the provinces have applied to the courts regarding encroachments upon the jurisdiction of the other, it was because in each case someone was complaining that the other party had transgressed the provisions of the act. So the separation of powers was the principal part of our constitution and I do not see how it could be otherwise, unless you wished to change the whole thing from A to Z. But it is an entirely different matter to deal with what concerns only this parliament, without touching what has been left to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

It is said also that the British North America Act protects the rights of minorities with respect to separate schools and the use of official languages. So there may be no misunderstanding I shall put on record the text of section 133, concerning the use of the English and French languages:

> Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.

The acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

That is all we have with respect to the protection of the English and French languages. We can hardly say that is great protection for the French language, and in that respect the constitution has been overrated. With respect to separate schools we have section 93, which hon. members have read and with which they are familiar. That is all.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke of the distribution of powers as between the central government and state or provincial legislative and government bodies; and at page 831 of Hansard he had this to say:

Another consequence of the fact that there is no procedure indicated in the British North America Act for its amendment is that there is no prescribed legal protection in that act for the fundamental provisions of our constitution.

Then on page 832:

It is our own responsibility to see that the fundamentals of the Canadian constitution are protected and preserved.

Then, quoting what he had said at Moncton, he went on to say at page 833:

The record of Canadians in two world wars demonstrated beyond any question our ability and our capacity to bear the responsibilities of full nationhood. But our adult nationhood is not yet fully recognized in our constitution and our laws... A method should be worked out to amend our constitution in Canada.

That won't be easy.

That is true.

We do not want the Canadian constitution to be too rigid, but we do want to make sure it contains the fullest safeguards of provincial rights, of the use of the two official languages, and of those other historic rights which are the sacred trusts of our national partnership.

It is our intention after the election to consult the provincial governments with a view to working out a method, which will be satisfactory to all Canadians, of amending the constitution in Canada.

If we are to reaffirm the declaration of the rights of minorities, so much the better. It would be a fine gesture for the parliament of Canada to reaffirm, in a stronger and more decisive manner, what was indicated eighty-two years ago. Here I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, how satisfied I was to listen to all the speeches that have been made, especially the speech by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). He said something I appreciated greatly, something I have never before heard from any leader of his party. At page 837 of Hansard the leader of the opposition said:

There is no suggestion that we must assert our sovereignty, or declare that we are no longer under any limitations. We have asserted that; we have demonstrated that, and we all believe it.

Well, what is the difference between sovereignty and independence? It shows that the wind is turning. Progress is being made towards Canadian emancipation. On the other hand, we cannot get away from the tradition that has been established in this country. Our ancestors had to fight for their liberty. It was not given to us on a silver platter. Those who contend that it was, ignore and distort history.

At first, our forefathers had great difficulties. They had difficulty in managing their own finances, and they fought for responsible government. I can speak of this because my great-grandfather voted for the ninety-two resolutions that established responsible government in this country. When Baldwin was defeated in York my great-grandfather gave his seat to him. My grandfather voted against confederation. His fear was that it would be a legislative union. My father supported Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was the leader of the party at the time, and I am satisfied to support the Prime Minister as well as I can in his endeavour to do something that is really a gesture of fine Canadianism.

There may be some disagreement. No one expects unanimity at first in the drafting of such an important piece of legislation as the constitution of this country. I am sure that if the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the leaders of the other two groups met with the premiers of the provinces, these sons of Canada would do an even better job than was done by the fathers of confederation. It may seem surprising at first, but the only way in which we can arrive at an understanding in the drafting of that part of the constitution which concerns the parliament of Canada is to weed out all the obsolete sections and redraft that act in the same spirit as it was drafted in the first instance.

It is seldom, sir, that the necessary distinction is made between what is ancient and what is antiquated. Some parts of the constitution are antiquated, but it is not because the constitution was drafted and passed eighty-two years ago that it should be changed. I hope that the good spirit that has prevailed in this house since the beginning of the debate will continue until we have a new constitution, which will be accepted not only by this parliament but by all the provinces of Canada. It is my earnest hope because we are now building for the future.

Why should so much importance be given to the opinions of some people who have made a study of this question? Their opinion does not count in this house. They come from outside. They have given some thought to our problems, but why should we quote their books as if the words were gospel. Let the members express their own views. The people of Canada are much more interested in those views than in the views of any author. Let the members support their own opinions by reading the text of the constitution. I am sure all members have done so, but perhaps it would be a good thing to read it again. Then, everyone might realize there is so much good in it that we cannot dispense with it entirely.

For many years, sir, I was concerned about the future of this country. During the war, the policies of all parties and groups were the same with regard to the relations between Canada and Great Britain. In my heart I thought that the destiny of the Liberal party should be to serve Canada first. I expected my party to be a real Canadian party. For many years I waited and suffered in silence, as I said last year. It was only after the present Prime Minister took over the reins of government that we realized the country was advancing in the right direction in matters that have been discussed here with sincerity. I am sure that if the present Prime Minister had not been the leader of the party during the last election, the result would have been different. If he was returned to power with a large majority, it was not due solely to his speech in Moncton about amending the constitution. It was due to the fact that he made speeches in every constituency and appealed to the heart and common sense of the people. A tremendous response was given him because the people realized he was sincere, and was doing his best to promote the welfare and the happiness of our citizens.

I cannot speak much longer, but I sincerely hope that no amendments prejudicial to national unity will be sponsored by this government. I am sure that will not be the case. I shall ask my colleagues, and I shall urge upon them, the necessity of showing the same spirit in this house as should prevail at a meeting of those who would be called to draft a new constitution. The speeches that have been made during the course of this debate are a credit to each member. I make no exceptions. Whether the members spoke from this side or the other side of the house, they have done their best. Sometimes they have used hasty words, but that is of no consequence. The tenor of the debate has been good. I congratulate all my colleagues on what they have done; I congratulate the government. I again wish them success. I hope that there will be amicable discussion with the provinces of all phases of the act. I also hope that the provinces will show the same spirit as Ottawa has shown. There is no question of encroaching upon the rights of anyone. If the thing is done by the legislation that would follow the permission to amend the constitution, they will all be there to see to it and to defend the traditions of the past.

But I will tell my friend the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), whom I admire, and who has the natural gift of eloquence and persuasion, that he should come to the province of Quebec. It is a bit late now, but next summer if he wishes to come to my constituency I will drive him around and will give him the opportunity of meeting the people of my province. Then I am sure that he will change his views.

Mr. Gillis: May I say this, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). In my short discussion on this particular subject I had nothing to say about the people of the province of Quebec. I did have something to say about their premier.

Mr. Pouliot: We will go to see him together.

Mr. Church: May I ask the hon. gentleman this question: Where do we go from here if this resolution passes?

(Translation):

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, on June 19, 1946, during the debate on redistribution, I stated, in this house, that the British North America Act was a compact which could not be amended without the consent of the parties thereto.

The resolution before us gives me the opportunity of coming back briefly to this argument and of pointing out once again that the consent of the provinces is needed to amend the Canadian constitution. The late Minister of Justice, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, whose name has been repeatedly mentioned in the debate, stated in this house in 1925 that confederation was based on a compact between the provinces who reached a compromise and granted certain rights to the federal authority, but the central power may not alter the constitution without first securing the permission of the provinces, which are responsible for it and work with the federal authority under a well-balanced division of powers and responsibilities. Sir Robert Borden, during the course of a debate, also stated:

> There is no need of changing the terms of our constitution and I am inclined to believe that it would be necessary to consult the provinces.

It is also the opinion of Mr. Arthur B. Keith, an authority on constitutional law. In his book "Responsible Government in the Dominions" he states that it was explicitly recognized by the imperial government in 1907 that confederation is a pact which cannot be altered without first obtaining the consent of the provinces. Lord Carnarvon and Viscount Haldane, both eminent jurists, were always of that opinion. The same applies to the fathers of confederation, Sir John Macdonald, George Brown and Thomas D'Arcy McGee, who said:

> The document on the clerk's table is a contract.

I now come to Lord Sankey who stated:

(Text):

The process of interpretation as the years go on ought not to be allowed to dim or to whittle down the provision of the original contract upon which confederation is founded.

In 1938, in the minimum wage case Lord Atkin, in delivering the decision of the privy council, speaks of the distribution of powers between the dominion and the provinces under the act as "the interprovincial compact".

The attitude of Downing street may be found in a dispatch of March 18, 1865, to the Hon. Arthur Hamilton Gordon, Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick. The cordial approval of the proceedings of the Quebec conference is here given.

Measures based on the plan drawn up by the delegates at the Quebec conference would be submitted to the imperial parliament if the provincial legislatures should sanction that plan.

It is evident from this undertaking that the right was conceded to the provinces to conclude an agreement which was in the nature of a treaty among themselves.

(Translation):

In pretending that the B.N.A. Act is only a statute, the Prime Minister sets aside the aside the unequivocal opinions and expressed views of statesmen and jurists such as Alexander Campbell, Langevin, Cartier, Galt, Taché, Adderley, Laurier, Mercier, Meighen, Ferguson, Bennett, Borden, Mignault, Loranger, and others. He asserts that we have been wrong for eighty years and that we must henceforth abide by his point of view with respect to the act of 1867. And yet, since the time of confederation, all our leaders, without exception, have recognized that it is impossible to amend the B.N.A. Act without consulting the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that never would the French Canadians have agreed, in 1867, to the passing of a law liable to interpretation and amendment according to the wishes of only one of the contracting parties. If it had been the intention of the fathers of confederation to wrong us, to deceive us and to leave us at the mercy of an encroaching central power, they would simply have deprived us by stealth of our rights and prerogatives, taking away from us the freedom to live as we thought fit, to be our own masters. In that case, we would not be bound to observe the provisions of this act. Lower Canada did not want a legislative union and we do not want it any more today.

Mr. Speaker, no province is as highly concerned as the province of Quebec with the procedure to be followed in amending our constitution.

Because of our mentality, our traditions, our language and our faith, this is a vital matter. Let us not forget that in 1867, at the time of confederation, the province of Quebec negotiated on an equal footing with the other provinces and represented, above all else, a national entity. Nowadays, people scoff at our claims. Yet, the hundreds of millions of dollars which, every year, we pour into the dominion treasury should give us a voice in the affairs of the country.

Confederation was more than a pact between nations; it was also a pact between two great races. No one can amend the British North America Act without consulting the province of Quebec, cradle of the French-speaking community in Canada. The Canadian state owes its existence to the provinces that brought it into being. These same provinces also continue to provide it with the funds it needs to survive.

If the British North America Act does not afford sufficient protection for the rights of the provinces, what assurance have we that future amendments will guarantee us more? Under the pretext of rendering our constitution more pliable, they are endangering rights and prerogatives that are much more important than such pliability itself.

The constitution is above the federal government; it cannot be amended by that government alone since it is the result of a compact between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, as well as Upper and Lower Canada—that is Ontario and Quebec—to which were subsequently added our other provinces. We are told about this procedure not having been followed in the past, and about the number of times the constitution was amended without prior consultation of the provinces. We are now asked to add a new precedent to those already established. We do not wish to be tied down by what has already been done; we refuse to be the accomplices of previous violations. If we did not act properly several times, are we justified in doing it over again? Repeated illegalities have never produced anything legal. There is no clause in the British North America Act indicating the way in which it can be amended. Was that omission not deliberate?

The province of Quebec is now being attacked because it has no faith in the gospel of centralization. Yet we know very well that Messrs. Mercier, Gouin and Taschereau, former liberal prime ministers of my province, were violently opposed to centralization and highly in favour of provincial autonomy. The men are no more, but the doctrines and principles remain unchanged.

In establishing the supreme court, whose judges are appointed by the governor in council, as the final tribunal on constitutional disputes, this parliament, which determines the powers and duties of those judges, thereby indicates that henceforth our constitution will be amended at the discretion of the party in power. So much the worse if a mistake is made. In fact it is not easy, as was seen in the past, to determine what matters come under the central power's jurisdiction and what matters are within the purview of the provinces.

(Text):

Writing in the Toronto Saturday Night on September 27, Mr. B. K. Sandwell said:

> Many of the provincail fields have extremely vague boundaries and these boundaries could be contracted without the slightest trouble by an amendment merely asserting a hitherto uncertified power of the dominion. Civil rights, as a provincial field, could be reduced to the area which it occupied in the 'seventies, before the provincializing tendency began, by merely enacting that the dominion has power to do things which it actually did in that period but which later judicial decisions prevent it from doing except under the emergency doctrine. A sympathetic supreme court would declare that this amendment relates "to matters not coming", et cetera, and there you are; the thing is done.
> The provinces will certainly maintain that they have rights, or at any rate vested interest, extending far beyond the limits of section 92. The definition of the powers to be vested in parliament would certainly, for example, enable it to reduce the number of members sent to Ottawa by Prince Edward Island, which is specially provided for by the constitution but has nothing whatever to do with the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature.

(Translation):

We are exhorted to have respect for and confidence in our judicial system; we hear a lot—and rightly so—about the integrity of those who hold the foremost place in that system. Fine, I am all for it. However if we want that system to remain what it is, if we want justice to be above politics, we should not confront judges with the alternative of having to displease the party who chose them or the members who set the limit of their sovereignty.

Being free of the necessity of going to Westminster to amend our constitution is one more step towards our final emancipation. I am highly pleased about it but that liberating step should not be taken at the expense of the sacred agreements which were signed in 1867. The adoption of the procedure suggested by the government would place before the provinces a fait accompli. We would bring them into subjection, deprive them of their autonomy to make that of Canada more secure. Might has never made right, and I do not think that the procedure resorted to today by the federal government is likely to promote harmony and good understanding between the different parts of this dominion. Certain provinces want to be consulted; well, let them be consulted! Good manners would at least require that they be informed as to the way in which it is intended to proceed to destroy the last trace of their autonomy.

The extreme haste displayed by the government authorities in the settlement of this all-important matter is surprising and disturbing to those who are concerned with Canada's future.

We are assured that not one minority right is endangered at present, but who knows what tomorrow has in store? The effects of this measure will be felt much later. The future generations may deplore our having thus upset the constitution of 1867 which, although it was not always very efficient in preventing encroachments by the central power, has at least restrained efforts of centralizers. If dominion governments had always respected the spirit of the constitution, if part of the population had not been brought, through propaganda and election speeches, to believe that the time had come to modernize the British North America Act, that the latter no longer met the needs of the Ottawa politicians; if instead of a constant effort toward centralization, an endeavour had been made to bring about a decentralization of powers and administration we would not witness the jurisdiction conflicts which confront us today.

The refusal on the part of the Prime Minister to consult the provinces before taking action is more than regrettable, and I desire to register my protest in this regard.

(Text):

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Since it is so late in the evening and since we have had so much fine debating I hesitate to rise to take part in the debate. My only reason for doing so is to show how the question before us appears to an ordinary Canadian like myself unlearned in the art of analysing constitutions.

Before I start to develop the points I wish to make I want to make it abundantly clear that I am personally supporting the resolution that is now before us. I am supporting it because, first, I do not believe that it interferes in any way with the rights of the provinces; second, I believe that it would be a mistake for this government to approach the provinces before it has gone as far as it is possible to go without that consultation. I believe that it would weaken the position of this government and be a disservice to the country to do that.

I think we have made progress. We all agree on at least one point, namely, that we should take to ourselves here in Canada the full power to amend our constitution. So far I have not heard any difference of opinion on that point. Our disagreement arises when we begin to consider how we are to take to ourselves that power. I will agree at once that there are legitimate grounds for differences. The government proposes to make the change in two steps, the first of which is proposed in this resolution, whereby we should petition the parliament at Westminster to amend the British North America Act where matters concerning federal jurisdiction only are concerned.

The question has been raised as to who shall define the field as between federal and provincial jurisdiction. It seems to me that that is not a difficult question to answer. If this resolution carries, and if the British parliament makes the change asked for, the line between federal and provincial jurisdiction will be defined as it has always been defined, namely, by the courts of the country.

After this resolution is passed and the amendment is made, if the federal parliament encroaches upon the field of provincial jurisdiction, I am quite sure the courts will declare such action ultra vires, just as it would have been ultra vires before the passing of this resolution. I do not believe, therefore, that there is any great difficulty in that respect.

This party agrees with the government's method of amendment. As I have already said, we believe it would be bad policy to approach the provincial governments seeking agreement with them on this first step. It might not be possible to come to agreement, and I doubt if we would be then in as good a position to proceed with this resolution as we are today. The official opposition and the Social Credit party disagree with this method, and, as I said before, there are legitimate grounds for disagreement. In my opinion, however, the argument is now all in favour of the government's method. Like the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), I am not greatly impressed by quotations from the speeches and opinions of the great men of the past. I must admit however that I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member for Temiscouata make that statement, because of his profession—a profession in which nearly all opinions are based upon some hoary and musty precedents of ancient times.

Mr. Knowles: He went back to his grandfather.

Mr. Knight: Stare decisis.

Mr. Knowles: That was his grandfather.

Mr. MacInnis: I am of the opinion that it is much more difficult to be a great man under the conditions we have today than it was to be a great man at the time of either Sir John A. Macdonald or Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I think, too, that we have today men who are just as great as were those men, great as they appear to have been. Perhaps they only seem great to us, because we know them only by tradition. I should not like to detract anything from that tradition which has grown with the years. While a person sitting as I do on the opposition side of the house should always be careful not to give comfort to the enemy, I am of the opinion that the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), when history is written, as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) would say, will stand up with the best of them.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): And you say it in a kindly way.

Mr. MacInnis: Yes. I hope that will not be used against me at some future time.

An hon. Member: You will not get to the Senate that way.

Mr. MacInnis: Well, you can't say I didn't make a good try.

Those were placid and simple times in comparison with the swift-moving conditions which the statesmen of today have to meet. And here may I point out that it is world economic conditions, and how those conditions affect Canada, that cause us to give so much attention to changing our constitution. Changes have become necessary to meet the needs of today, which have changed so much since 1867.

It is really only since the thirties that there has been any great demand in this country for constitutional changes. The need for change began to become apparent around that time, because under the British North America Act the provinces were charged with responsibilities they did not have the resources to discharge. And we will soon reach the same condition again, when the post-war period of prosperity is over, where the provinces will not be able to discharge the responsibilities given them under the constitution. When that day comes the provinces themselves in conjunction with the federal government will initiate and work out the changes that will be necessary to enable them to discharge the responsibilities with which they are confronted.

This afternoon the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) referred to an amendment moved to a resolution in the house in 1925 by the former leader of this party, the late Mr. Woodsworth. He pointed out that Mr. Woodsworth wanted changes made only with the consent of the provinces. Like other men—and I think like all other men whose opinions are worth anything—Mr. Woodsworth held his views only so long as they were supported by facts. If the facts no longer support them, it would be a foolish man indeed who continued to hold the same opinion.

I find that in volume I of Hansard for 1935

British North America Act

Mr. Woodsworth introduced a resolution, to which reference has already been made, asking the house to set up a special committee to study and report on the best method by which the British North America Act might be amended. In support of that resolution he said, as reported on page 219 of Hansard:

> Further I think it is fairly generally conceded that the consent of the provinces is not necessary, at least from the legal standpoint. There was a time when we were told that we could not amend the British North America Act without the consent of all the provinces, that in fact confederation was something in the nature of a treaty and that it could not be changed without the consent of all parties. I think that theory has been absolutely discarded, and we need not continue to debate it.

Then on page 218 of the same Hansard appears a report of what the late Mr. Lapointe said on May 11, 1931, which reads as follows:

> Again I say that to insist on having the consent of all the provinces to every change would be asking almost an impossibility; to ask that either British Columbia in the west or Prince Edward Island in the east should be able to block a change with which it is essential for the federal power to go ahead within the limits of its jurisdiction on certain matters, I do not think would be right; but on essential matters, such matters, for instance, as the protection of minorities, of language, of schools, as they are inserted in the British North America Act, I believe it should not be possible to make a change without the consent of all.

The matters mentioned by Mr. Lapointe, which were not to be interfered with are the same as in the resolution now before us. I think that his is the only position anyone can take. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) made what I thought was an unfavourable comparison between the constitutions of Canada and the United States. He mentioned that there was no charter of liberty or declaration of the rights of man in the Canadian constitution. I think if history has demonstrated anything it is that paper constitutions are very poor things on which to lean. I think history has amply proved that if freedom, liberty, toleration and justice are not written into the traditions, habits, hearts and souls of a people, there is little protection in a written constitution, as so many people in the United States and elsewhere know at the present time and have known for many, many years. I think I can give this house a good example of the value of written constitutions by quoting from "Men and Politics" by Louis Fischer. I think most hon. members have read this book as it was a "best-seller" a few years ago. Referring to the Soviet union he says this at page 335:

> The constitution, now the supreme law of the Soviet union, does two things: It describes a system of government and it enunciates a bill of rights. The bill of rights is inspiring. But there is nothing in the system of government to safeguard the rights. The popular enjoyment of the rights thus depends on the good will of the person or persons who control the government, and they have chosen to ignore the right. One of the latest violations of the bill of rights is the introduction of payment for tuition in high schools and colleges. This contravenes article 121 of the constitution which says:
> "Citizens of the Soviet union have a right to education. The right is implemented by universal, compulsory, elementary education and by free education, including university education."
> The government did not ask the people or parliament whether it could introduce paid education. The constitution was not amended to allow paid education. The government simply decreed paid tuition by ukase and that was all there was to it except for the pain in the hearts of many silent people.

I do not say that, in a country such as Canada where government by majority has been accepted for so long a time, where it has become a tradition in the minds and hearts of the people, safeguards in our constitution are not a good thing. That is why I support the resolution with the safeguards that were originally in it as well as those which have been added by the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the amendment to that amendment moved by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson).

On motion of Mr. MacInnis the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: It is understood that the debate on the budget resolutions will be resumed tomorrow. If it is completed or adjourned the Minister of Transport will proceed with his motion for the second reading of Bill No. 12. The minister intends to ask that it be referred to a committee as soon as second reading is completed. Then the Minister of Veterans Affairs would resume discussion of his estimates. If they are completed, they would be followed by the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the Prime Minister if some time before tomorrow at three o'clock the clock behind him might be fixed. I would not like to see the government continue to be so far behind the times as they have been this afternoon.

Mr. St. Laurent: We were ahead of the times by a couple of hours according to that clock. Perhaps I should mention that it is hoped that during the hour from eight to nine, if private bills can be disposed of, we will continue with the debate on the second reading of the bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops to amend the Criminal Code in connection with the portrayal of crimes.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, October 21, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON OCTOBER 20

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of privilege I should like to make a short explanation to the house with respect to an answer given to a question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I am reported as having answered his question in the following way as appears at page 959 of Hansard:

> That question is, I suppose, merely for clarification, Mr. Speaker; but a hypothesis like that would not arise except in the case of war, real or apprehended. I can give the hon. member the assurance that for the duration of this parliament there is no thought at the present time that there need be any fear about war, real or apprehended.

When I received the transcript from the reporter, instead of the word "fear" there was the word "care"—"any care about war, real or apprehended". I do not reproach the reporter. It may be that in answering the questions which were being asked I was not speaking very distinctly. I corrected it to the word "fear", which I believe is the word I used. The advance copies had gone to the press galleries, however, and in quoting me in their newspapers the reporters quite properly used the text as it appeared in the advance copies. Apparently the newspaper reporters were not misled by it, because the headline given to the article in one newspaper was, "P.M. says no war for five years"; another newspaper said, "Five years' respite from fear of war foreseen by P.M". Nevertheless I thought it desirable that I state I did make a correction in the advance sheet for two reasons: one, to absolve the members of the press gallery from any implied reproach that might arise in the minds of people who compared their report with Hansard, and, second, to correct any impression that I might have said that preparation for war was not one of our cares at the present time. It is precisely because of the care being taken by the nations of the North Atlantic security pact that we are able to feel there is no fear or apprehension at this time. Principally I wanted it to be clear that the newspaper reporters had justification for the use of the word "care" as it appeared in the quotation mentioned.

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 28 FOR THIS DAY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is suggested that because of standing order 28 it might be irregular for you to remain in the chair while debate was continued on the motion made by the Minister of Finance last night that you do leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means. To avoid any suggestion of irregularity, if I have the consent of the house I would move:

> That the provisions of standing order 28 respecting the committee of ways and means be suspended for this day.

As I said last night, there is no intention of curtailing the debate on this motion to go into committee of ways and means, but there is some suggestion that under the terms of standing order 28 Mr. Speaker, without this motion, should leave the chair without question put and without debate.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 66, to incorporate Alberta Natural Gas Company.—Mr. Maybank.

WAR SERVICE MEDALS

QUESTION AS TO ENGRAVING OF NAME AND REGIMENTAL NUMBER OF RECIPIENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): I should like to direct to the Minister of Veterans Affairs a question supplementary to the one I asked him yesterday. Will his department recall the war medals now being distributed, in order that they may be properly engraved?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The answer is no.

CEMENT

SHORTAGE OF SUPPLY—PRIORITIES FOR HOUSE BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Does he know that there is in Canada a great scarcity of cement which is impeding the building of houses? In Peterborough alone the building of houses, especially the construction of the foundation—even Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation houses—has been held up owing to the fact that we have had just a trickle of cement coming in there this year. Can the minister do anything to help the situation? Previously about a million barrels were obtained from England. Perhaps something like that can be done now.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am aware that the production of cement in Canada is not adequate for the requirements this year. The hydroelectric plants that are being built are this year taking something over two million barrels of cement. This type of construction requires abnormal quantities of cement, and the result has been a shortage. I believe the cement companies imported about a million barrels in an attempt to correct the situation. I am informed that the situation is correcting itself rapidly, and that next year Canadian production will take care of Canadian requirements.

Mr. Fraser: May I ask this further question, Mr. Speaker? So many concrete foundations have to go in this year that construction of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation houses is being held up. I wondered if there should not be some priority for those houses and others.

Mr. Howe: It is the purpose of the cement companies to give priority to houses and to work that is urgent. I shall be glad to draw the attention of the companies to the situation referred to by my hon. friend.

TELEGRAPH SERVICES

OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION ACT—HALIFAX CABLE SHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon B. Isnor (Halifax): I desire to direct an inquiry to the Minister of Transport. In view of the proposal of the government to establish the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, is it also the intention of the government to enter into an agreement covering repairs and maintenance of cables, which will enable the cable ship to continue to be based at Halifax?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The bill now before the house with respect to the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation provides for the expropriation of telecommunication assets only. It is not contemplated in the bill that an agreement will be entered into concerning the maintenance and repair of these cables.

COMBINES

BAKERY FIRMS IN WESTERN PROVINCES—QUESTION AS TO PROSECUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Have prosecutions now been launched under the Combines Investigation Act in respect of the alleged infractions of that act by certain bread companies in western Canada? If so, when are the preliminary hearings to take place?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Not having received notice of his question from my hon. friend, I think I should delay the answer until Monday. I shall have to refer to counsel who is in charge of the case in order to ascertain what his latest action has been.

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO DISTRIBUTION OF POSTCARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Finance. Does he know that throughout Ontario, in the English-speaking sections, Canada savings bonds advertising has been sent out in the French language? A number of postcards in French were received in Peterborough, and on them was a picture of the Prime Minister's home town. I thought that I should bring this matter to the minister's attention, because it is a waste of money to send them in French to this area.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I thank my hon. friend for bringing the matter to my attention. There may be some waste of money in sending these cards to Peterborough, but I should not think so.

Mr. Cruickshank: That will hold you.

Mr. Fraser: I wish to ask the minister another question, Mr. Speaker. Does he not know that Peterborough has always gone over the top in victory bond campaigns and in every other way?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I have a supplementary question to ask the Minister of Finance. Does he know—and if he does not, he should—that the best advertising he has sent out through these cards is taken from the Calgary stampede, and they are being distributed in Ottawa?

Mr. Abbott: I thank my hon. friends for the compliment.

INSECT PESTS

TERMITES IN TORONTO AREA—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture and his parliamentary assistant, may I ask the member of the government who is Acting Minister of Agriculture today whether that department will take action to assist in meeting the situation caused by the plague of termites that is attacking certain areas of Toronto?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps I should make it perfectly clear that I am not necessarily referring to the members of the Liberal party. Will the Department of Agriculture give some assistance with a view to preventing the spread of infestation of these insects?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The hon. member may be assured that the proper officials of the Department of Agriculture will take cognizance of his question.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Thursday, October 20, consideration of the motion of Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, before adjourning the debate last night I had listened to the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), and I promised you, sir, that I would look it over in the meantime. I have done that, but I did not find many surprises in it. I was more shocked by the lack of additions to the speech than to read what I had read before. No budget has been practised so much and presented so often before being passed by the house. However, I feel that one cannot be unmindful of the great changes that took place during the past summer. The government's political success in the recent election is evidenced by its top-heavy majority in this house; in fact this is the first time that I have been almost completely surrounded by Liberals. Judging by their promising appearance I suppose one should call them statesmen. They are in front of you, behind you and on both sides of you. It is only natural that such a victory should bring to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his colleagues a sense of pride and satisfaction, indeed a sense of supreme confidence. With all due respect, one can say that at times we almost see a growing complacency coming out of that great victory. I sometimes wonder whether the victory was too great. I observe that the Minister of Finance seems happier than usual, and he is always happy. He seems to think that everything is all right. The Prime Minister himself is not even afraid of war for the next five years. Everything is rosy; everything is fine. I am reminded of a description that was once given of optimism—in saying this I mean no disrespect to hon. gentlemen whom I see in front of me and the sincerity of their purpose in serving this country. The man who gave the description said that the best explanation he ever heard of real optimism was a fellow who did not care what happened so long as it did not happen to him.

I say in all sincerity that I hope this all-powerful government, with an unprecedented number of members so ready to support it, will not develop an optimism so blind as not to observe the swiftly changing conditions on our economic front. If I should remind the Minister of Finance and his government of the possible far-reaching effects of conditions that have arisen lately to becloud our economic future with great uncertainties, I hope that such will not be recklessly regarded by those who sit to your right merely as what an opposition critic might be expected to do—to view with alarm for the sake only of alarm.

May I, however, assure the minister that no political motive actuates my remarks of today. The government have just won a general election. Indeed they have won it in no uncertain terms. Nothing I can say now can alter that situation. In fact it is apparent that anything I said before the election had no effect on it.

I am not unmindful of my responsibilities. I know that, despite what has been said or has not been said, or how much joy or applause there may be over the victory that some organizations have had, if our prosperity withers and dies because its roots have been torn out of the export markets on which it was based, then it will be the Canadian people as a whole who will suffer, without any distinction between Grit and Tory. None of us wants that to happen. Certainly I do not. And so today I speak not from any partisan motive; I speak with a keen sense of my responsibilities to the people of Canada. May I, however, ask the Minister of Finance, who needs no lecture from me on the great responsibility he carries, to concede to me the same sincerity in the lesser responsibility that is mine on this occasion. It is my hope to bring to the attention of this house the importance of the government's shedding at this time its political battledress and meeting in a business way the economic challenges of the hour.

The presentation of the annual budget has been an event of growing importance in the life and progress of our people. But, it is unique in the experience of this house to have, as I have said, a budget presented so often and practised so much before being passed by this House of Commons. In fact it has been back and forth in this house so often that it is almost worn out. It is also passing strange to me that while the economic face of literally the whole world has been changing swiftly during recent months, the government's fiscal proposals of today are only a rehash of the proposals that were unwrapped last March to dress the stage for the June election. It gave temporary cash relief. I am sorry that it did not go a little further in some respects and increase the exemptions of the poor man, as the party to which I have the honour to belong suggested. It gave cash relief to many Canadian taxpayers; therefore it had a distinct appeal to millions of taxpayers. It was, Mr. Speaker, a great election handbook, and served as a successful political expedient for a hasty election campaign. It lacked inspiration; it lacked the semblance of ability to observe obvious signposts that everyone else but the government saw last spring. It is obsolete now in the sense of meeting world conditions that have changed so much since. The minister and his advisers refused to see that the devaluation of the Canadian dollar would so soon be inevitable.

I do not propose to trace, in their elaborate and confusing detail, recent economic world events. Indeed, the rapid development of international bilateralism in trade, and diminishing overseas markets for our agricultural, forestry and fishery products, were obvious at that time—I speak of last March when this budget was first presented—to all hon. members of the house except the government itself.

The serious aspect of this misleading official attitude lies not alone in its strange lack of relationship to the facts, but especially in its striking similarity to the "wait and see" policy of the Liberal party just before and during the 1930 election. I can well recall that, despite the fact that a serious recession had started in the latter part of 1929, our international trade channels were drying up, every elevator in Canada was filled with unsold wheat and every lumber yard was bursting with unsold lumber—despite these facts, at that time the Liberal party to your right, Mr. Speaker, were taking exactly the same attitude as they are taking today, even though it was followed by the serious economic depression of the early thirties.

During the recent election the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) for whom I have a very high regard—I hope this is mutual, although I am not so sure—made certain statements. I do say of him that he is an optimist, and he is reasonably practical in everything else except his politics. But he should understand what is happening. I can remember being in certain parts of Canada while the minister was there—sometimes even in the same city. On every occasion he said that the outlook for Canada's trade was never brighter. I think he must have meant political trade, because his department of statistics only last week stated emphatically that for the first eight months of this year Canada's favourable balance of trade was less than it had been in any year since 1938. This was the condition, despite the fact that we had a greater volume of trade—and I will not overlook that, because the Minister of Trade and Commerce mentions it every time he is on his feet. He reminds me of the fellow who is doing more business—buying more and selling less. The statistics show that in the first eight months of 1949 we had an unfavourable trade balance—more unfavourable than we have had at any time since 1938. Despite the rosy pictures which were painted to the public, he must be honest.

Now, if I may refer to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner)—I regret he is not in his seat today; and in passing let me say that I am glad he is restored to good political health—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: I did not mean "political health"; I meant that I was glad he had been restored to good physical health. I know his political health is always pretty good. I think he will need good physical health in the future to endure the political associates he has had in the past.

Our farmers, from one end of Canada to the other, were told by the Minister of Agriculture that we had more markets for our agricultural products than we had agricultural products to sell. He was telling them this story to the point where they were eating twice as much as they did before—putting twice as much butter on their bread, and cutting their bacon twice as thick. The other evening in the house that same minister said that during the first six months of this year we sold to the United Kingdom, the greatest market we have had in the last fifty years, only one-sixth of the amount we sold the year before. And, despite all this brightness for the future, he added that now the United Kingdom did not care whether we sent them anything at all from our supply of foodstuffs. They would just as soon not have our bacon.

These trends which developed early this year were recklessly, or designedly, or both, disregarded by the government.

We all know that in recent weeks we have had a shocking currency devaluation on a broad international front. Some of us may be a little hazy as to the real reason for it, but none of us is doubtful as to what happened. We know how suddenly the United Kingdom devalued her currency—almost overnight, despite the fact that they had said they would not do it. They devalued their currency to the extent of thirty per cent. Then they followed with government-controlled currency—something like the hunter who chased the rabbit so far that it had to climb a tree, even though no other rabbit had ever done it.

We found the same thing here. Our great experts in the Department of Finance, the Minister of Finance himself as well, just laughed and said: "Me, too. Get on. We will go for the ride, whether it is a broncho ride or not. We shall have to take it". When the United Kingdom devalued its currency thirty per cent, all empire countries followed suit. The Argentine has devalued to the extent of forty per cent—with, it is true, extensive and highly complicated reservations. Canada has devalued to the extent of ten per cent, in other words twenty per cent less than the United Kingdom. It might have been made twenty, twenty-five or thirty per cent. They just got together and said: We have got to devalue; it might just as well be ten per cent as twenty per cent. Call it ten per cent, and let it go at that.

Canada devalued twenty per cent less than the United Kingdom, other commonwealth countries, and European countries associated in the sterling bloc. My hon. friends laugh, but they were not laughing over there in the east block—in fact they were all too much embarrassed to have good judgment.

Mr. Cleaver: We are all laughing at the Tory policy of devaluation.

Mr. Rowe: The inevitable results of these startling facts are bound to have a far-reaching effect on our economy. In the first place it will be obvious to any schoolboy economist that Danish bacon; Danish cheese; Scandinavian newsprint, pulp and paper; Australian and New Zealand dairy products; Argentine beef; electrical supplies from Sweden, and hundreds of other commodities from the sterling area nations will be available to the United Kingdom market at a price at least twenty per cent below their cost from Canada, the cost at which Canada could put her products there. That is obvious, surely, to everyone.

Despite our country's potential resources in her present period of post-war prosperity, we must not recklessly disregard these economic danger signs. We have had prosperity not because of but in spite of the present government. This is a great country. There is nothing mysterious about that. There is not one hon. member in front of me today who can give me a specific reason for our prosperity for which the government has been responsible. The government has been riding on the crest of world affairs, with the result that we have had prosperity. It has been kidding the people of Canada that it has given them that prosperity—just like the fellow who had his bank credit extended because he was out with the bank manager the night before, and was able to borrow more money than he had ever borrowed previously.

One-third of our whole national economy is dependent upon export trade. Every hon. member in the house knows that the United Kingdom is by far the greatest and the most important market we have for our agricultural surpluses. No other market exists on a scale sufficiently large to replace it. How long shall we continue to hold that market if our goods are priced twenty per cent above the prices of competing goods from sterling area sources?

The effect of this bureaucratic trading dollar creates in fact, if not in intention, for the first time in the history of empire trading relationships, an empire preference in the United Kingdom markets from which Canada alone of all empire countries is now excluded. That is automatically the effect of Britain and the commonwealth countries other than Canada devaluing to the extent of thirty per cent, while Canada devalues her dollar by only ten per cent. This gives them an advantage, as everyone can see, of twenty per cent right across the board. Non-British countries of the sterling area devaluing thirty per cent have for the first time a preference over Canada of twenty per cent in the British market—and Canada is the senior partner in the British commonwealth.

That is the position we are in today. It is a strange economic situation indeed, and I submit it will have many repercussions on business, unless the government makes some move other than that indicated in the dusty document presented last night.

The general prosperity we have recently been enjoying must not blind our vision, if we are to safeguard our economic future from these dangers. This is a twenty per cent disadvantage to the lumbermen of British Columbia, a twenty per cent disadvantage to the fishermen of the east, to the grain and meat producers of central Canada, to say nothing of the secondary industries—textile and farm implement industries. Can anyone say that that will not be a matter of serious concern to every person connected with the business life of this country? Since no one laughs at that, sir, I think at least hon. members to your right understand it.

Despite our present prosperity there are signs all around that we should not ignore. I say to the minister with all respect that, despite the changes in the budget, he has brought down off the shelf the very same program. There are a few exceptions. The sales tax is being taken off fuel oil—something which should have been done last year or the year before. In fact the government should have taken off all the sales tax. This budget seems to be just the same as it was last spring, something that blindly ignores our economic problems and consequently offers no solution so far as the long-range viewpoint is concerned. It is good, and I compliment the minister upon the splendid way he presented it. I also compliment his departmental officials upon the form of the document they have prepared. But after all, it is just something that an auditor might present. There is no more inspiration in it now than there was last spring. At that time it was full of political craftsmanship; today it is no less barren of economic statesmanship to meet changing conditions.

During the past decade, and directly as a result of the war, our agricultural markets have been largely dependent upon contractual bulk trading purchases. Much of our production went to supply the British market, often at prices far below world prices or far below what the British might have been able to pay. This policy was pictured to us as being one with great long-term advantages, but in fact it was the most reckless experiment in international trade in Canada's history. This policy of government-directed selling was admittedly at great cost to the Canadian farmer, but it was expected to give long-term stability so far as the United Kingdom market was concerned. Of course it also served to keep down the prices of the commodities the farmer had to sell.

Unfortunately a shortage of dollars and a return by Great Britain to her traditional markets in Europe, coupled with the adoption by that country of a policy of bilateral trade agreements with soft currency countries, resulted in our loss of those markets to the point where the Minister of Agriculture is unable to assure the primary producers of this country of any contracts beyond the contract year 1950. The stark truth is that those markets which we hoped to hold after the war and which are essential to a healthy agricultural economy in this country, and have been for the past fifty years, are practically lost. Those markets are necessary to the economic health of this great basic industry. This costly bulk-trading experiment has proved a failure because it has choked off future market stability. Even during a time of rationed foodstuffs in Great Britain we have lost a market which we had held for fifty years.

The full effect of this has not been felt, because there are still a few contracts. We have the benefit of support from the European recovery plan and the Marshall fund in the purchase of our wheat, but these markets have a definite limitation because the Marshall plan is scheduled to finish in 1952. The discontinuance of purchases in Canada through this medium will have a serious effect upon this country unless an alternative means of retaining these or other markets is rapidly found.

The alternative market which we have been able to secure for our surplus production in the United States is not at all assured for the future. Surpluses are now beginning to appear in that country, which means that our ability to sell there will become less favourable as time goes on. Our similarity of production, coupled with the capacity of the United States to produce, makes that market most hazardous at best.

The history of trade shows that our most secure agricultural markets for the last fifty years have been found in Europe, and especially in the United Kingdom. These traditional markets for Canadian products have been diverted to eastern Europe and other commonwealth countries under long-term bilateral agreements. The problem of trade in this sphere is made more difficult by the fact that these long-term bilateral trade agreements, such as Britain's five-year agreement with Poland, project far past the time in the future when it was hoped that trade channels would have been cleared of the obstructions resulting from dislocations caused by the war. As a nation with its agricultural economy dependent upon the export of surplus production to reasonably stable markets, we can no longer ignore the fact that the trend today is in a direction adverse to the future welfare of this country's basic industry.

Last week the representatives of ten western European countries met at Rome to prepare a report to be submitted to the world conference of the food and agricultural organization scheduled to meet in Washington next month. The substance of the report which will be presented at that time is that the western European countries purchase more of the food they must import from eastern Europe and less from this continent. In other words the system of bilateral trade, which now expresses itself through some three hundred bilateral trade agreements among European nations, and which is slowly but surely closing its door to exports from this country, is to continue and constitute the order of trade for some indefinite period in the future. This should cause serious thought on the part of all businessmen and farmers in Canada.

Countries within or under the shade of the iron curtain are replacing Canada in the British market, in many cases under bilateral deals which extend up until 1955. Bacon which was formerly supplied by Canada is now being obtained from Denmark, Poland, Hungary, and other countries. Our present cheese contract for 50 million pounds is for an amount lower than our sales in this market at any time during the past fifty years. Our contract for eggs calls for the purchase of only three-fifths of our exports to the British market last year, which were below what they had been the year before—and this at a time when the farmers of other European countries are increasing their sales in the British market.

This market, which took as high as a million cases a year of evaporated milk and 8 million pounds annually of milk powder, has been lost to Poland, Australia, New Zealand, Denmark, and other countries. It is not surprising that the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford)—who by the way, has never been accused of not giving the Minister of Finance and his party full support—stated in the house the other night that this phase of agriculture has become the orphan of the dairy industry. That is even worse than anything that has been said on this side of the house. The hon. member stated that there were 2,500 farmers in his county who depended upon this branch of agriculture for their living. He said that 8 million pounds of evaporated milk have been stored in the county because there is absolutely no market at home or abroad. I wonder at the hon. member bringing this matter to the floor of the house and not taking it up with the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who say they have markets for more than we can produce. I think it would have been better to take it up there. If those ministers had such markets during the election, I would suggest that in fairness to the 2,500 farmers in Leeds, some of whom may have supported the present hon. member for that riding, the hon. member should ask the permission of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture to use their names to set up a Howe-Gardiner sales corporation in Brockville to sell the 8 million pounds of milk now in storage. Those ministers are the past-master salesmen who during the election said that they could sell more than we could produce. It is not long since the election. I wonder if something along that line might not provide a lead for the business mind of the hon. member for Leeds.

Mr. Knowles: Speak a little louder; the minister does not hear you.

Mr. Rowe: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to disturb him. I think it is just as well that I do not. He is exercising a parliamentary privilege. I will not enlarge on that, but I have listened to him often when I would rather have been doing something else.

A similar situation exists with respect to the markets we previously held for beans, poultry, canned salmon, flax fibre, fruits and fruit juices, vegetables, oats, barley, and numerous other agricultural products. Probably when the Minister of Trade and Commerce gets into action he may find markets for those products, but nobody else seems to know where they are going to be sold under present conditions.

In the field of non-metalliferous mining and quarry products, our exports to the United Kingdom markets have dropped to one-third of their 1938 volume. In the field of tobacco exports, Canada built up a considerable market in the United Kingdom, as everyone knows. Last year our exports of tobacco to that market were reduced to approximately 12½ million pounds from the 22¼ million pounds we sold them the year before. At the same time Turkey, which had exported less than half a million pounds in 1947, increased that to over 10 million pounds in 1948, taking the market that we formerly had for our tobacco growers.

A similar story prevails with regard to leather and leather products. Our exports to the British market fell from over 5,000 hundredweight in 1947 to less than 1,000 hundredweight in 1948.

As I have already stated, the full impact of this loss of markets has been temporarily deferred by our finding markets in the United States of America. There is now every indication of a surplus of many articles in the United States, and the likelihood of holding those markets is very doubtful, as it always has been. To find new markets for surplus Canadian production, or have the domestic market absorb even a considerable portion without disrupting trade, presents a considerable problem indeed.

Efforts are made from time to time by members of the government to detract from the disastrous implications in our present trend of foreign trade by placing the entire responsibility on the shortage of dollars experienced by British purchasers. But that answer does not offer any solution. Since the close of the war, agricultural machinery has been a large export factor, but now the greater devaluation of sterling compared with that of the dollar is making the export of Canadian farm machinery very doubtful. As a result, as the minister knows, unemployment is beginning to mushroom in these important machinery factories.

The government's policy of holding the Canadian dollar at an artificial valuation is now anchoring the strategically important ocean shipping industry. Even before the United Kingdom and Scandinavian countries devalued their currencies, Canadian ocean-going bottoms were operating on a slender margin, as the minister knows, compared with shipping under other flags. Owing to higher wages, higher shipbuilding costs, higher standards of crew treatment, and higher operating efficiency, we believe, Canada faces a most difficult situation. To this difficult picture competing rates are reduced by thirty per cent, whereas Canadian rates can drop only by 10 per cent to maintain the same equilibrium. Thus, today, in every seaport of the nation, ships of Canadian registry are becoming known as "the mothball fleet". They are dropping their anchors and paying off their crews. They are unable to compete for cargoes against vessels of Scandinavian, British and other registry. The government certainly will not deny that several of its leading ministers have from time to time, as other hon. members have, emphasized the importance of our great merchant marine in the carrying of ocean cargo. Indeed, during the last war the part that the merchant marine played was the pride of many Canadians; in fact, many have said that victory would not have been possible had it not been for the great services it rendered. Today, because of the currency policy of the country, we find shipping services being crippled, which emphasizes the imperative necessity of getting down to solid common sense so far as currency values are concerned.

What has been the effect of this violent currency change upon our industries which cater to the domestic market? Clearly one effect of the British devaluation of thirty per cent is the equivalent of a cut in the tariff against the British goods. Can our textiles, our rubber and leather goods industries, our footwear industry, and a whole host of others, compete with British tariffs thus cut down to almost nothing overnight? In addition they pay lower wages than we do.

For the past few moments I have been tracing—and I know that some will think haphazardly—the effects of devaluation on the major aspects of our national economy and the business life of the country. No one realizes more than I do that I have fallen far short of exhausting this subject, which today is bothering everyone who thinks seriously about our national economy. I have dealt with only a few concrete examples, because time prevents me from dealing with many others.

May I now discuss briefly what I consider to be the vital question underlying the whole situation, namely, what is the road that has led us into our present difficulties? Why have we had to resort to devaluation so suddenly and to this reckless tampering with our currency? It will be clear to all of us that we arrived at our recent crossroad of devaluation wholly and solely because some years ago, accepting the advice of experts, the government adopted what is known as foreign exchange control. If we had not retained foreign exchange controls after the war there would have been no problem of devaluation harshly and ruthlessly confronting Canadian industry almost overnight. Our dollar would have been fluctuating in accordance with the balance of our import and export trade, and would have been regulating that balance automatically from day to day. Its value would not be an arbitrary one fixed by some government decree. We have said that repeatedly, and now that the election is over, surely the government believe it. Their actions would indicate they do.

Mr. Abbott: Then the actions are misleading because the government believe very strongly in foreign exchange control.

Mr. Rowe: Yours mostly have been. Its value would not be so arbitrarily fixed. I wonder if members of the house have paused long enough to realize just what it is that we do when we withdraw our dollar from the free currency market and place it under foreign exchange controls, or government decree. In effect we simply delegate to a departmental official, who neither buys, sells nor manufactures, the task of placing a rigid arbitrary value on our currency, independently of what it will buy or sell from day to day in the market places of the world. Actually that is all that we do. But it should be obvious to us that no government official or group of men should be asked—even with the Minister of Finance being called in—to be expert enough to price the dollar exactly, or even approximately at its real value, over any long period of time. If by some freak one of them had such genius—and I refer to departmental officials for whom I have all respect—he would do much better elsewhere; if, by some even more mysterious freak, there might be one of those master minds among those you see to your left and right, Mr. Speaker, one who could fix the value of the dollar exactly where it should be, the Prime Minister could not keep him in his government. He would be too successful somewhere else. Anyone who had that type of supreme genius would be able to make a far greater fortune for himself by pricing the stock market than being a mere dollar pricer for the government. But no such expert exists either in the departments or in those surrounding the minister. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) looks very bright, but I do not think even he would undertake that sort of thing. Mr. Speaker, I sometimes wonder why, in view of that fact, we continue to entrust the valuation of our currency to government and political decree. Such action is bound to bring us in a period of time to the necessity of rude and disturbing adjustment, the shock of which may indeed mean fortunes for a few and insolvency for those unprepared for the violent storm that follows.

That is the ultimate fate of all currency controls. None of them has ever led to expansion of trade. That is their record. To expect success for the first time from such a policy in Canada is dangerous and reckless optimism. I realize, of course, that such a view is heresy in the eyes of the so-called experts. Ever since these experts first succeeded in binding us in the chains of currency controls, they have sought to wrap the entire subject of foreign exchange in mystery and to establish it as far too technical a subject for comprehension by the ordinary lay mind. To a large extent their efforts along this line have been only too successful in increasing their popularity amongst those who do not understand the problem.

All my life, regardless of any other interests, I have been a practical farmer. I have been schooled in the belief that the Canadian farmer is equipped with the intelligence to understand any problem upon which his own economic welfare may ultimately depend. Consequently, I refuse to accept the subject of foreign exchange policy as a mystery too intricate for lay Canadians to concern themselves with. I simply translate it into the homely terms of my farming background. I realize that when the government guesses at the price our dollar should bring in the markets of the world, it is only a guess. To me it is like the farmer who takes his eggs to market and insists on pricing them at ninety cents per dozen, regardless of the fact that all the other farmers in the market stalls around him are selling eggs at seventy-five cents per dozen. Naturally, the public is not going to buy from him until he is willing to accept the prevailing market price. Similarly, foreign countries will not buy from us if they can get the same goods cheaper elsewhere. They will not pay the extra twenty per cent to secure our currency, except in respect to goods that they can get nowhere else. The range of such goods is far too narrow, Mr. Speaker, to be made the basis of a prosperous foreign trade. It is infinitesimal in comparison with the broader range of our national economy and trade.

May I express the same truth in another way? My common sense convinces me that we cannot obtain more for our dollar than it is worth. The way to find out what it is actually worth is not to have the government write and tie its price tag upon it, but to take it into the market-place to discover what world traders will give in return for it. Only when we release our dollar from exchange controls and allow it to function freely will we have assurance, not only as to its real worth, but also as to the basic soundness of our own economy. For a sound currency the meeting of the daily market test of free exchange against other currencies acts as a balance wheel or regulator of a nation's economy. It must not be too dear to prevent other nations buying from Canada. It must not become too cheap to prevent Canada using it to buy needed supplies abroad. The narrow fluctuations of each day warns that it is departing from equilibrium. Imports or exports then adjust themselves to bring it back into balance. That is how simply the free dollar works. It has worked that way throughout history whenever it has been given a chance unaffected by government decree and monopoly.

By contrast, Mr. Speaker, exchange control has never worked. In essence, it is a tampering with a nation's currency. When kings used to tamper with the currency in the old days, they lost their heads. Today whenever governments try tampering with their people's currency under the pretext of controlling exchange, the people invariably end up with an economic headache. Today we are discovering that from sad experience.

The question now arises as to whether or not during the past decade, under the system of state-controlled bulk purchasing which existed, we have lost much of our ability to buy and sell in competitive export markets. It is questionable whether or not we have forgotten how to do business by trading. Our loss of traditional markets for Canadian exports, and our failure to facilitate purchases of United Kingdom exports in short supply in Canada and which we have had to buy with scarce American dollars, warrants the immediate attention of the government. True, we have set up what is called a continuing trade committee and a dollar-sterling trade board. I think this indicates that the people outside are becoming so alarmed that they are going to do something on their own. I believe the government has given its blessing to that effort. I do not know how the government could have done otherwise because it has not done much about the problem. These efforts are creditable but are, at best, only exploratory efforts.

Our loss of traditional markets is of such concern to our future economic welfare in Canada that I suggest the problem be dealt with at top government levels at the earliest opportunity. Towards this end, I suggest that the Canadian government inaugurate steps for the holding of an empire trade conference at the earliest possible date. I make this suggestion, not with any idea of reverting to a policy of tariffs or violating our commitments under the Geneva trade agreements or the Annecy agreements, but in the firm conviction that this problem if tackled by top government representatives from all parts of the commonwealth can result in material advantage to all countries concerned.

The great British commonwealth of nations, Mr. Speaker, is not written off yet as one of the greatest trading forces in the world and is one in which Canada should be interested. Over five hundred million people are involved, and Britain has stood the longest of any of the world's great international organizations. In the early 1930's, an empire conference was held in Ottawa, following that debacle of the depression. I believe the result of it has been overlooked too often, Mr. Speaker, even by some of those to your right whose judgment, at times, is sound. Those people should know that no effort has been made in trade relations that has been so discounted as the British empire trade agreements of 1932 which were made in Ottawa. If anyone doubts me, Mr. Speaker, then I would ask him to look at the record. It would be found that inter-trade within the commonwealth in the five years following these empire trade agreements increased no less than fifty-two per cent.

We are a part, Mr. Speaker, of this great international institution, and despite our close association with the great republic to the south, we must not neglect a market that has been our best outlet for fifty years. The inroads being made today by communists or communist-dominated countries into traditional Canadian markets prove conclusively, I submit, the possibilities and advisability of such a conference as I have suggested. These clear challenges to our long-range economic security and national defence far transcend the shifting fortunes of government or opposition parties. They demand more than a nonchalant political approach. They demand our best business approach. The prosperity we enjoy now must be weighed in the light of stern realities of world conditions. Our optimism as to its continuity must be tempered by the powerful factors that can alter it so abruptly. If we are to build a firm economic foundation for the future, we must discount the artificial financial stimulants so simple to apply in good times but so difficult to practise in hard times. We must plan for that day when we will be on our own economically, when the United States Marshall plan may no longer supply United States dollars for our overseas customers to pay for our wheat and bacon.

I have no doubts about the potential greatness of Canada. I am not preaching blue ruin, but I have had enough experience in farming to know that, no matter how prosperous you may be now, it is well to look ahead. There is an old saying about the goose hanging high. But no matter how high the goose may hang, a man would be more than I should like to describe parliamentarily if he did not look into the future to see how this prosperity, artificial or otherwise, can be sustained and to what degree. I am not preaching that we have not prosperity. I have emphasized the fact that we have.

I have no doubt about the potential greatness of Canada, with her resources and her possibilities. Under sound common-sense development the energy, genius and initiative of her people are sufficient to provide an ever-advancing standard of living for more people and greater national security for peace and prosperity in the future. No other country today has such latent strength with so few people. The government of today has the greatest opportunity of any government since confederation, despite the problems I have pointed out. Temporary expedients for political power are now no longer necessary to a government that enjoys an embarrassing numerical power surplus, even if some of that support has been gained by astutely discounting free enterprise itself. Of course it would be doubtful sportsmanship on my part to suggest to the government that they should repent at this time after such a great victory; but with all respect I suggest that with the serious economic and defence problems that stare us in the face and scream for solution, the hour has struck when every hon. member of this house, no matter to what party he belongs, should shed his political armour, put on his working clothes, and face the difficult trade realities that so stubbornly ridicule our folly.

The members of any other sound executive board would stop and take stock at this time, and count the costs. If we are to safeguard our growth and development in this country we must start playing more economics and a little less politics.

In the field of social legislation we have progressed far in the years that are past, especially since 1920. We have not reached the peak of our endeavour or even the desire of our people in this regard. All parties in this house subscribe to the objective of making benefits under welfare legislation as adequate as possible. However, Mr. Speaker, this nation must have keen regard for the costs of those services, and our abilities to meet them as permanent fixed charges against the changing fortunes of our economy.

Social security expenditures in the present year will exceed $800 million. That amount is double the total tax and non-tax revenue of Canada in the year 1935. In periods of prosperity, with the high national income we now have, the costs of these services may not be too burdensome. There is no one in Canada so unkind as to suggest that we should not do all we can in the way of these services as long as we can pay for them. But we must realize the costs of these services and make sure that they are not too great a burden on our economy.

We have no assurance that the national income will continue at its present high peak. We have, however, a fair indication of the social services that the people of this country demand and that the people who are in politics want to give. I think the time has come for a careful re-examination of our whole approach to the question of financing the social security measures we now have and which, as a nation, we must sustain and expand in the future.

To the extent that unemployment insurance, old age pensions and family allowances may tend to keep up purchasing power, they will help this nation to meet problems that arise in a depressed economy. But let there be no illusion in the minds of our people about how social security measures are financed. They are paid for out of national income which, in reality, is the product of those who work. In other words, these services are, in the final analysis, made possible and are maintained, not by the government but by the national production and initiative of the Canadian people. Let us recognize that if it were not for the great wealth of our natural resources, combined with the industry and initiative of our great people, we as a nation, with such a small population, could never begin to take care of social security obligations involving $800 million this year. This is saying nothing of the welfare state that is suggested and the social services that many of us believe should be brought into being. There can be no true or continuing security for anybody without production of wealth, production that gives work, and opportunity for work that gives production.

The Minister of Finance closed his remarks last night by citing the tax reductions made each year since 1945. These reductions were, in the minds of the Canadian people, both welcome and necessary, and many of them were overdue. What the minister did not point out, however, was the relationship of government expenditures, or cost of government, to the gross national income of the country. If he was in his private business office, these are matters with which, I submit, he would deal, in any business concern he might be connected with. I do not mean to say that he is not just as honest in his public service, but he has so many miscellaneous problems that it makes it difficult for him to practise exactly the same in politics as you often have to practise in business. Now that the election is over I hope that the minister will get back to sound business practices.

I find that in 1938 our expenditures totalled $553 million. That was a great deal of money. At that time our national income was $5,100 million. This year our expenditures, according to what the Minister of Finance said last night, are going to be around $2,400 million. The national income that is flourishing so greatly, that he and the Minister of Trade and Commerce said during the election campaign was mushrooming all across the country—they were getting volume and dollars so mixed up that the people believed they were producing more volume than they ever did before—is approximately $13 billion. That is a great deal of money.

Mr. Abbott: Closer to $15 billion.

Mr. Howe: Sixteen billion.

Mr. Rowe: I know that two or three billion do not make much difference to hon. gentlemen opposite. Perhaps it has grown in the last few days. I am not like the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), who one night said that a million dollars did not seem to matter. I do not want to imply that I am so reckless that a billion or two does not seem to matter much. But I do know this, Mr. Speaker. Our national income this year is up two and one-half times what it used to be in days gone by, but our national expenditure for the same period is up four and one-third times. It is only a matter of mathematics for some of the experts in the Department of Finance to figure out how long we can go on in that way, where no matter how much you get in you are paying more out.

Mr. Abbott: If we have to fight many more wars, we shall be worse off.

Mr. Rowe: The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) says there is not going to be any more war for five years, so my friends have nothing to worry about in that regard.

Buoyant revenues, resulting in surpluses for the past few years, have resulted in a decreased attention to the need of strict economy in administering government services. Our commitments for social welfare measures now on the statute books and as well measures contemplated and projected, plus the interest charges on our public debt, are inescapable.

To meet the danger of such a situation loading the economy of this country with a burden it is not yet prepared to bear, I would make the following recommendations in the sincere hope that this government, no matter how complacent they may feel with the great majority behind them, will give them every possible consideration. I would like to suggest to the Minister of Finance: One, the inauguration at once of a government-wide economy policy without creating undue hardship or hindering the economic development of this country. As a suggestion, I would like to see a survey undertaken to ascertain the percentage cost of the collection of revenue today as compared with the last year before the war. Two, in order to assure the ability of this nation to sustain the social security policies, the various price support programs, and the other fixed charges of government to which we are committed, and as well provide the necessary defence preparedness program Canada must have—no matter who says we are not going to have any trouble, I believe it is most essential—I suggest the inauguration, in co-operation with the provinces, of a national development program.

While economies can and should be undertaken at once, I do not believe that the effect of these economies alone, no matter how rigid they may be, would be sufficient to meet the staggering burden of increasing fixed charges on our national economy. We must increase production and if we are to stabilize our economy and make a sound recovery this must be accomplished. This can only be achieved by the genius, enterprise, and thrift of our people in expanding and developing more rapidly the great natural resources of our country. That is the only way we can develop our resources as rapidly as we should.

If we are to maintain our high standard of living, an adequate policy of social welfare, a high percentage of employment which is desirable to us all, and adequate defence preparedness, which no one wants neglected even if it means more taxes, then we must direct our efforts to those avenues that will create new wealth. To do these things we need a policy of development as much as we needed it in the days before 1900. Only a new accelerated production will create this national income sufficient to sustain those things to which the government now stands committed. We have built great structural buildings for a small population of about 13,000,000. If we are to live better than anyone else, be happier and nicer to each other and do all the things we want to do, we have to enlarge and expand our genius, initiative and hard work to develop the greatest resources that any similar number of people have ever enjoyed. Fortunately, in this country we are endowed with great resources. The oil and coal fields of Alberta, the mining fields of Ontario, Quebec and Newfoundland, the productivity and diversification of the agricultural industry of our provinces, the large timber areas of British Columbia and other parts of Canada, coupled with the industrial expansion of this nation, have in the last decade divulged more wealth than this country ever dreamed of.

The challenge now is one of fuller utilization of these resources, and the leadership for this must be encouraged rather than discouraged by the government. That leadership, however, must not be restrained by government controls and currency restrictions. It must not be restrained by the stagnant hand of socialism. Commitments must not be increased further in the future without serious regard for the fixed charges that are involved so that we may be able to meet them in times of recession as well as in times of prosperity.

I suggest that when the Prime Minister reorganizes his cabinet, which I understand he is going to do immediately following this session, he give consideration—

An hon. Member: Oh, Oh.

Mr. Rowe: An hon. member laughs. It sounded like a laugh of satisfaction. Perhaps some will go to the Senate.

Mr. McCann: You fellows are reorganizing it every three months.

Mr. Rowe: Judging by the size of the majority in the Senate you have been doing it every three months. I hope that when the Prime Minister reorganizes the cabinet those who go over to the quiet halls of the red chamber will come back to some of these midnight meetings and urge the Prime Minister to establish a separate ministry that will give full attention—

Mr. Cruickshank: We do not change our leader every three months.

Mr. Rowe: I hear a voice from British Columbia. Perhaps the hon. member is ready to take it on, I do not know. I hope they will direct their full attention to the development of the great resources of this country.

Canada needs foreign capital. As the minister knows so well, she needs enterprise and development. Our fiscal and taxation policies must be sound and attractive to those within and without Canada whose faith in our great potential resources prompts them to venture and risk their savings in the enterprise of our country's expansion.

In order to assist the government to try and open up greater opportunities in this country, to try to broaden the basis of taxation and to try to have our great resources flourish and expand so that the people can get the most out of them and this country reach her destiny, in order to assist the government in that and in safeguarding our economic security and progress generally, I beg leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris):

That all the words of the resolution after the first word "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

This house regrets that the government has failed to take effective measures to prevent the present decline in our trade with the sterling area and is of the opinion that the government should consider the advisability of inviting the nations of the commonwealth to a conference in the immediate future for the purpose of working out arrangements to preserve and enlarge those traditional markets on which jobs and opportunities for Canadians very largely depend.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Before I begin my remarks this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I should like to take exception to a report which appears in today's Toronto Star and which was just handed to me. It reads as follows:

To serve their own political ends Progressive Conservatives and the C.C.F. are conniving to "block, hinder or delay" the Liberal government's low-rental housing program, Perry Ryan said last night at his Toronto-Greenwood campaign headquarters. The Liberal contestant in Monday's by-election said both parties "automatically" opposed the government's plan for rental relief because it had been offered by the Liberals. They were against the program, he said, "because they would rather see appalling housing conditions continue than admit the Liberal government had a good plan to correct conditions."

I say, Mr. Speaker, that such a statement is a deliberate misrepresentation. Whether the Liberal candidate is a lawyer or not he should look at the libel laws of Canada, because we may have occasion to use them if he does not watch his statements. In the C.C.F. group in this house there are thirteen members. I believe the Liberal party has 186. The candidate in Greenwood gives our thirteen members a great deal of credit if he suggests that we can hold up the Liberal party's housing program. This group has asked for low-rental subsidized housing ever since the end of the war. If the city of Toronto has not low-rental subsidized housing today it is the fault, not of our thirteen members, but of the Liberal party, the party of which he is a candidate. I am sure that responsible Liberal leaders would not approve of the statement he made last night in Toronto, and on behalf of this group I wish to take the strongest possible exception to it.

At the outset of my remarks this afternoon I must admit frankly that this is not the easiest budget in the world to criticize, for two reasons: It is difficult, first, because it was originally presented to the house more than six months ago, and secondly because, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) pointed out last night, the government which presented it has since that date received an overwhelming mandate from the people of Canada.

May I say however that I am privileged to be speaking this afternoon—even though possibly my hon. friend from Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) will wonder why I am doing so.

Mr. Cruickshank: I certainly do.

Mr. Thatcher: If the purpose of the budget was to win an election for the Liberal party, or to help win it, then very obviously it has been a successful budget.

A few weeks before the election was announced the minister and his colleagues were able to give a great many gifts to a great many people. For instance, the minister was able to promise tax relief to hundreds of thousands of Canadians. He was able to increase old age pensions for a large number of old age pensioners. Indeed I believe he was able to promise the building of a new bridge in the Cape Breton area. Thousands of prairie farmers were refunded millions of their own money in the form of participation certificates.

And so it went. The minister and his colleagues were able to give many things to many people; and from the viewpoint of the Liberal party the budget can be described only as a clever, effective and well-timed election—

An hon. Member: Bribe.

Mr. Thatcher: —bribe. That is as good a word as any—or an election instrument. Certainly the minister was most successful, in a political sense.

However the election is now over and I think that today we might leave the political aspects of the document behind. Some people look upon the budget only as a balance sheet of the nation's affairs. If it shows a surplus, then for the most part those people consider it a fairly good one. I know most hon. members would consider such a viewpoint to be superficial. It seems to me that, first and foremost, an effective budget should contain proposals to meet the major economic problems facing the nation. In our opinion this budget before us today fails to do that.

Probably the most critical problem facing Canada at this time is our steadily developing trade crisis. Most authorities agree, I believe, that before many months go by, the standard of living of most Canadians might well be affected by that trade crisis. As reported at page 1802 of Hansard for March 22, 1949, when the minister presented the budget, he said:

> The Canadian government has taken and will continue to take all feasible steps to encourage the expansion of British trade with Canada.

I feel I must challenge the validity of that statement. The C.C.F. group in parliament feels that, far from taking all feasible steps to meet the deteriorating trade picture, the government has been apathetic, indeed it has been negligent, in its efforts to improve British-Canadian trade. In our opinion that negligence and apathy is the chief shortcoming of the budget we are discussing today.

It is so evident that Canada is facing a trade crisis that I do not think I have to labour the point this afternoon. During the recent election, as the hon. member who preceded me said, many cabinet ministers in various parts of the country made election speeches stating that Canada, after all, really had no trade problems.

For instance, the Regina Leader-Post carries the following report of a radio speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture:

> He asserted that, despite claims to the contrary, neither the home nor export markets were in danger of being lost.

Then a press report of the minister's speech delivered at Simpson, Saskatchewan, a few days later states:

> Market is Safe Gardiner Says
> Hitting out at political opponents who have been accusing the Liberal government of losing Canada's markets, Agriculture Minister J. G. Gardiner declared at a public meeting here Wednesday night there is no truth in such suggestions because Canada has no surplus of farm products to sell.

I ask hon. members to note the headline, "Market is Safe Gardiner Says." That was a few weeks before the election. Then the election came along. I happened to pick up an issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail a few weeks later, and I find that in this article the minister is reported to have been again talking about markets. This time however he had a different story. The article is headed "Gardiner Unsure Canada Can Hold U.K. Food Markets", and states:

> We are trying to maintain Canada's markets in Britain, but there is no certainty that we can do so.

Please note those two statements: Gardiner before the election, "market is safe"; Gardiner after the election, "market is unsure". What happened in that time to change the situation?—unless it was the election. If I did not know the Minister of Agriculture so well, if I did not know his reputation, I would almost think he was trying to delude the electors of Canada.

An hon. Member: He would not do that!

Mr. Thatcher: Some of the other ministers were equally confident of trade prospects during the election. On June 18 at New Westminster we heard from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). A Canadian Press dispatch carries the headline —"Howe Tells B.C. Liberals He's Stuck for Something to Sell". Then, over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation stations, on June 3, the minister said, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star:

> Anyone who suggests trade relations between Britain and Canada are deteriorating is talking nonsense.

Certainly the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his speeches before the election simply oozed confidence. I wonder if his statements were in accordance with the facts. I wonder if things were as good as he pictured them. Certainly many people in Canada did not think they were.

Here is what the Canadian exporters association had to say—around the time the minister was speaking—and I quote from the Montreal Gazette:

> The federal government is charged by the . . . Canadian exporters' association with misleading the public as to Canada's export position through false statistics and unqualified announcements of trade progress.
>
> The government is further charged with allowing continued and accelerating deterioration of the country's position and is asked to take constructive steps to recover a loss in world markets.
> As a result . . . Canadian producers and the people of Canada are largely unaware of the markets Canada has lost abroad, of the danger that threatens our export trade.

That is not the statement of a C.C.F. member, or a C.C.F. organization; rather it is the statement of a group of businessmen whose duty it is to look after the Canadian exports.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce went back last night to address the same body. I believe he spoke at a banquet, but this time he had an entirely different story to tell. In effect he told them that the situation was pretty serious. I do not think the minister would suggest that, as he put it, the Canadian exporters association was talking nonsense when it said that the trade crisis was deteriorating. When the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce told the people of Canada several months ago that our traditional markets are safe, I do not think they were speaking correctly. They know now, as they knew then, that our traditional markets—particularly our market in Great Britain—have never been in greater jeopardy.

Our markets in Britain have been shrinking ever since the close of the war. This has been true particularly of our manufactured and processed goods, upon which we depend so fully to maintain full employment. But it has also been true of such pre-war staples as farm products, lumber products and the products of our fisheries. Our exports to Britain have been shrinking despite the fact that we have been making substantial gifts and loans to Britain. They have been shrinking despite the fact that the Americans have granted heavy ERP aid to the British to finance purchases in Canada.

As a matter of fact Britain today is buying from countries in western Europe many of the products which formerly she obtained in Canada. The causes of our present trade difficulties are well known to most hon. members, and I shall not take the time of the house to go into them. Prior to the war Britain bought three times as much from Canada as we purchased from her, but because of the devastation of war she is no longer in a financial position to do that. Great Britain has been forced by harsh realities to buy from those countries that will buy from her. It is not a case of ingratitude, as was suggested by some hon. members early this session; the fact is that she has not been able to trade with us on the old basis simply because she lacks Canadian dollars to do so. Unless we can do something to let Great Britain earn more Canadian dollars, then the chances are that our primary markets will disappear to an even greater extent.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and other ministers have been telling the country that all is well, that our trade markets are safe. How can they reconcile those statements with some of the statements British officials have made when visiting this country? On his trip a few months ago Harold Wilson, the president of the British board of trade, is reported in a Canadian Press dispatch of May 13 as having said:

> We are faced with the knowledge that Marshall dollars will progressively decline between now and 1952.
> So unless we manage to push up our earnings of United States and Canadian dollars faster than offshore dollars decline, we shall be able to buy less from Canada in future rather than more . . . even maintenance of the present rate will be dependent on a great expansion of our exports to Canada.

The Right Hon. Ernest Bevin told us precisely the same thing when he was here in Ottawa several weeks ago. Prime Minister Attlee, Sir Stafford Cripps and other British statesmen have told us, not once but many times, that the only way we can avoid this trade deterioration is by buying more British goods.

Last evening the minister told us that in the last twelve-month period our exports had been greater than in any similar period in the past. That may be true, but those exports are greater, first, because of the huge loans and credits which have been extended by our government; secondly, because of the ERP expenditures made in Canada which I understand will total $800 million this year, and thirdly, because we have not had to face German, Japanese and Czechoslovakian competition in the last few years.

ERP aid will probably be discontinued in the near future and at the same time competition from the countries I have mentioned will become progressively greater. Surely there is no cause for complacency in our trade picture. When he spoke last night even the minister hastened to point out that a decrease in exports was inevitable.

I believe the government has sought alternative markets for our primary products, particularly in the United States, but in spite of that search I think it is safe to assume that our best markets for lumber, wheat, farm products, fruit and the like will continue to be in Great Britain. The one way we can protect that market is to increase British imports. It seems to me that the government has been particularly apathetic in finding methods of increasing those exports.

Last night the minister spent about fifteen minutes telling us about the seriousness of the trade situation. He told us why some action had to be taken to increase British imports. He informed us that the dollar countries would have to remove tariff barriers, and then suddenly when we thought he was going to tell us about the action the government proposed, he changed the subject and was content to say: "This is the situation which we must constantly keep in mind"; the government is "weighing action"; the government is "actively reviewing measures", and so on. In other words, he did not announce any concrete steps. He did not announce any immediate program. He did not make any attempt to translate his words into action of some kind.

Far too often, it seems to me, we in Canada forget that in order to be an exporting country we also have to buy. Our failure to realize that fact has caused a great deal of resentment, and rightly so, in Great Britain. They feel that perhaps Canada is not doing as much as it could to solve the present crisis, which after all is ours, as well as theirs.

Some weeks ago the British took drastic and courageous action to try to get into the North American markets when they devalued the pound. I think it is fair to say that if the tariff barriers on the North American continent had not been so high the British would not have had to devalue to the extent they did. But they brought about that devaluation despite the fact that they knew their cost of living would be forced up. They realized that devaluation was only an initial step which presented no permanent solution. They knew that it would allow them a little time, but if it is to prove of any real value they will have to find a long-term solution.

I suggest that it is in Canada's interest and in the interests of this parliament to help Great Britain find that long-term solution.

The Liberal party so far has failed completely in my opinion to adopt a vigorous import policy. They have been active on exports, but they have not been active in encouraging imports. The government has stood idly by, and is still standing idly by, while the British and European buyer has been gradually choked out of the Canadian market because of a lack of Canadian dollars. Surely it is the duty of parliament to rectify that threat.

I believe it would be in the national interest if this government set up an import board whose duty it would be to encourage British imports and imports from sterling countries, whose duty it would be to take imports now being obtained from the United States and reallocate them to British manufacturers. It is true that a private board was set up this week by a number of private citizens. I believe it is called the dollar-sterling board and is under the chairmanship of Mr. Duncan. We think that is a step in the right direction. It might be of some help, and we hope the government will give it every assistance, including financial aid. But we do not think it is the final answer. We believe there should be a government board set up with all the support of the government behind it, manned by men who would spend their full time on this problem. This is a step which the C.C.F. party hopes this government will take in order to meet this trade crisis.

If we are as anxious as many have said they are, to give the maximum encouragement to British imports, certainly the time has come to grant the British tariff concessions. It seems to me that government tariff policy in recent years, particularly where Great Britain is concerned, has been very shortsighted. When delivering his budget speech on March 22, 1949, the minister said, as reported on page 1801 of Hansard:

> In view of the pending tariff negotiations at Annecy and other trade discussions which are envisaged . . . I am not proposing any tariff changes at this time.

He said that in March. That is strange language coming from a minister of a government which for years has paid lip service to the principle of freer trade. Several years ago the Geneva trade agreements were announced in Canada with a great deal of fanfare, but to this moment the government has not presented those agreements to parliament and allowed us to either approve or disapprove of them. As a matter of fact, many of the benefits which would have accrued to Canada from the Geneva agreements were nullified by government embargoes and the like.

The Annecy agreements were tabled several weeks ago but I do not think the most ardent Liberal will suggest that their effect can be anything but minor. About $20 million out of a total of $2 billion will be affected, less than one per cent of our trade. The Annecy trade agreements do not even touch Canada's basic trade problem. The government is only nibbling at the fringe of our trade difficulties. It has been making a great deal of fuss about very little when it talks about the Annecy agreements.

Of course Canadians will welcome the changes, but most of them will realize that the Annecy agreements are only a drop in the proverbial ocean. In his budget speech this March the minister piously said that it was government policy to facilitate the efforts of United Kingdom exporters to regain their historic share of the Canadian market, and that that was particularly so in the case of cotton piece goods. That was a sensible policy, but while in one breath the minister enunciated a policy of helping the British, in the next breath he announced higher tariffs on British textiles. The minister talked one way and acted another. At the very moment when we should be doing something to increase British imports, at the very moment when lower tariffs are called for, the minister, a minister of a free trade government so-called, brings in higher tariffs. I do not see any consistency in that policy. As a result, British textile manufacturers have found it increasingly difficult to sell to the Dominion of Canada. A Canadian Press dispatch dated October 6 from London bears the following heading:

Tariff on Textiles Termed "Almost Disastrous"

The article quotes a British board of trade official as saying:

Reimposition of a Canadian preferential tariff on British textiles last July has had an "almost disastrous" effect on efforts to sell more cotton and rayon goods in Canada, a board of trade spokesman said yesterday.

Last night the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said that he was most encouraged and pleased to see President Truman giving leadership where tariffs were concerned. We think it is time that Canada also gave a little bit of leadership. Must we always play follow the leader? At this time we call upon the Liberal party to implement its long-standing pledge of freer trade. We ask for an immediate and substantial downward revision of tariffs on British commonwealth goods and on goods from the sterling areas, first, to allow those nations to earn Canadian dollars to buy our goods, and, second, to help lower the cost of living of the Canadian people.

I know that the Minister of Finance will probably say that such action is not feasible because of the Geneva agreements. I would point out to him in the first place that the Geneva agreements have not been ratified by this parliament. I would point out in the second place that, as I understand the Geneva agreements, there are various escape clauses which can be used to give the British preference if it is necessary, or if there is an emergency. I think there is an emergency today. Lower tariffs then are the second step which the C.C.F. suggests to solve our present trade crisis.

There is one further step which should be taken. During his budget speech the Minister of Finance repeatedly stated that he was opposed to bilateral trade agreements. I must say that I agree with a good deal of what he said. Yet no government can decide on its own what it is going to do and then pursue that policy regardless of the wishes of the nation with which it is trading. It is not a question whether or not we like to trade by bilateral methods. It is a question whether, in order to keep our British markets, we are willing to trade bilaterally if the British wish us to do so. Therefore we think that, if Great Britain wants to make a bilateral agreement, rather than lose those markets the government should be willing to do so, where it is practical.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier the main criticism which this group has of the budget is its failure to take adequate steps to meet the deteriorating trade situation, and particularly British-Canadian trade. We do not think it is enough for parliament to indulge in talk, drift along, and do nothing, because it lacks a program which will result in action. We urge the government to take the following steps without delay: (1) establish government import boards whose purpose it would be to encourage imports from British and sterling countries generally; (2) reduce substantially tariffs on goods coming from the British commonwealth and sterling area; (3) enter into bilateral agreements with the British if they so desire; (4) endeavour to sign long-term agreements for primary products such as wheat, livestock, fish, lumber, et cetera.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue):

That the amendment be amended by deleting therefrom all the words after the word "should" and substituting therefor the following words:

"Give immediate consideration to a reduction of tariffs sufficient to encourage an increase in imports from the United Kingdom and other sterling countries."

Hon. members of the Liberal party will see that there are no strings attached to that amendment. Anyone who believes in freer trade should have no difficulty in voting for it. I call upon my Liberal friends to vote the way they have been talking for the last fifty years.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the financial year is more than half gone, and here we are, the elected representatives of the people of Canada, just now getting down to the consideration of the government's financial policy and program for the fiscal year 1949-50. I think that is an absurd situation. I say that for this reason: In spite of the fact that we as members of the House of Commons, the people's elected representatives, should be exercising control of the purse strings of the nation, the executive have gone ahead for more than seven months with plans of their own for which they have absolutely no legislative sanction whatever.

That is one of the things that lead me to a conclusion that I want to discuss briefly a little later this afternoon, namely, that Canada is rapidly developing in absolutism. That is a serious situation. It seemed to me that, as the jovial Minister of Finance (Mr.

Abbott) presented his budget speech last night, he emphasized, if not by his actual words at least by a number of implications at several points, that the buoyancy of revenues, the condition of high production, the very satisfactory employment situation, and the general prosperity accompanied by those other circumstances, are entirely the result of the policies that have been pursued by the Liberal party. It seemed to me he suggested that they were all Liberal achievements for which the Liberal government of course quite readily wished to take the credit.

Anyone listening to the minister last night would agree that he was making no unmistakable claim that all these conditions came about as a result of the wise guidance of his colleagues in the cabinet of the Liberal party. Yet it has been my belief all along that the prosperity and the buoyant revenues of the various countries of the world—and by the way Canada has not been the only one which has experienced such things; they have taken place under governments of different stripes, Liberal, Conservative, Socialist, or what not—arose as the result of the action of one Schicklgruber who brought on the war. It is unfortunate that Hitler, who started the war, is the one to whom we have to give credit for the prosperity we have had since 1940 and 1941. That is tragic, but it is true nevertheless.

I am quite prepared to give the Liberal government full credit for full employment, revenue buoyancy, debt reduction, high production and prosperity if at the same time they are prepared to take credit for bringing on the war. I wonder if they are prepared to take the responsibility for the suffering and the anguish of the thousands who lost dear ones as a result of the war. I wonder if they are prepared to acknowledge that they are responsible for the tremendous increase in the national debt which has risen from about three and a half billion to around sixteen billion gross since 1938, and the interest burden that rests so heavily on the people, which has risen from approximately $140 million a year to about $450 million. I have not heard them declare that they are ready to take the responsibility for the increase in taxation by more than four times what it was in the last year before the war. I only inject these comments into the introduction of what I have to say by way of a sober reminder that the government must be careful about what it takes credit for, and a sober reminder to the government that most of those things for which they did take credit came about as a result of the circumstances of the times, coupled with the superhuman efforts of all the Canadian people.

[Mr. Low.]

In the minister's speech last night, under the heading of "Economic Review", he had this to say:

> The latest figure for the wholesale price index is one per cent below a year ago, and for the cost of living index two per cent above a year ago.

Now, sir, during the course of my comments on the budget last spring, I emphasized the tragic results of the minister's failure to do something about the cost of living. It was not impossible for him to deal an effective blow against the continued rise in living costs in this country. At that time I contended, and I still contend, that the government should have overhauled the whole of its tax structure, beginning with the sales tax and other hidden taxes. On a number of occasions in this house, I have shown how the hidden taxation to which the government is addicted gives rise to a deadly upward spiral of consumer prices and the cost of living.

The eight per cent sales tax that is collected by the manufacturers from the wholesalers becomes a part of the wholesaler's cost. His regular mark-up, therefore, has to include the sales tax and so it increases the cost of the goods to the retailer. In due course, the retailer increases his price to the consumer in proportion, so there is a pyramiding effect all the way along through the imposition at different levels of these hidden taxes. It must not be overlooked, Mr. Speaker, that the sales tax is added to the tax paid on imports which further increases the cost of production and prices to the consumer on many items in daily use throughout this country. There are quite a number of other hidden taxes on products which are not called sales taxes. They are added at different levels of production and distribution, but they really have the same effect of pushing up the cost of production. All of these taxes contribute to the almost unbearably high cost of living under which the Canadian people have had to live for a number of years.

Everybody has had to pay these taxes. I contend, sir, that it is unfortunate that they bear more heavily in proportion on the poor than on the rich. These hidden taxes are just another way of freeing the rich from taxation and putting upon the poor the major burden of the taxes that are paid in this country. Even at this late date, the government should have wiped out the sales tax with one stroke. It only brings in, Mr. Speaker, approximately $350 million a year. By eliminating this tax, and by coupling it with action which would have given some concession perhaps to manufacturers and to industry, a very substantial reduction in the cost of living could have been ensured quite quickly.

Instead of this desirable action, last night the minister merely brushed a crumb or two off the ministerial table for a few of the poor people of this country when he removed the sales tax from fuel oil and cider. Few poor people can buy cider or wine anyway.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And it would not affect the price anyhow.

Mr. Low: No, that is quite true. I should like to speak for just a few moments on this problem about which we have heard a good deal this afternoon. I do not intend to repeat at any length any of the things that have been said. I shall try to deal with the subject from an entirely different point of view. In the minister's speech last night, he admitted we do face a trade crisis.

Mr. Abbott: No, I made no such statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Low: I know the minister did not make that statement in so many words. While it is true, Mr. Speaker, that during the recent election campaign the Liberals denied that there was a trade crisis, last night the minister used these words:

> Nevertheless, some declines in our overseas export markets have already occurred and some further declines can hardly be avoided. The government will do everything in its power to limit this decline in overseas trade but much will depend on the progress which our overseas customers make in overcoming their dollar difficulties.

This is mild language, sir, that is intended to soften somewhat the seriousness of the whole trade situation that we have been facing, not for just a few weeks but for months. The minister's attendance at both the London and Washington conferences, together with what was done there and the statements he made while he was there, indicate rather more clearly than his words last night the seriousness of this whole situation. By the way, it is not of recent origin; Canada has faced a serious trade crisis for almost a year.

In referring to the two conferences at London and Washington last night, the Minister of Finance referred to the consideration that was given to both long-term and short-term measures which it was hoped would provide solutions to the trade impasse that has most of the countries of the world thoroughly worried. The minister said the long-term, positive objective must be the achievement of a pattern of world trade in which the dollar and non-dollar countries could live together within one single multilateral system under which a balance would be achieved by the expansion and not the contraction of trade. I believe those are his words.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to our mind that is a most worthy objective. At least, it is a good start. The minister did not say, however, along what lines the discussion took place in efforts to find ways of achieving that objective. For instance, I should like to ask the minister and perhaps when he does speak in rebuttal he might deign to answer it—although on a number of occasions before we have asked questions which have received only a polite silence from him: Did the representatives at these two conferences, and particularly the Washington conference, consider as one means of getting on the right road towards the adoption of this multilateral type of trade a conversion of goods balances basis rather than the old basis of the convertibility of currencies which has failed? If not, I appeal to the government and the minister to give this idea of multilateral trade on the basis of convertibility of goods balances careful study to see if it would not be possible to adopt it as one means of helping to straighten out this world tangle.

I am sure the minister knows that multilateral trade on a convertibility of currencies basis is at the present time an utter absurdity, and it is likely to remain so until two very important changes have been made in the world. When I say "two important changes" I refer to the attitude of the United States concerning favourable trade balances, and the fact that international exchanges are and have been in the hands of manipulators who promote currency wars for their own benefit.

Why do I say that multilateral trade based on the convertibility of currencies has failed? In the first place, the convertibility of currencies has been rendered impossible. The whole world has suffered from a shortage of United States dollars which has resulted from the determination of the United States to have a favourable balance of trade year after year. To ensure this, the United States must export more than she is prepared to import each year. Under such circumstances, anyone can see that there can only be one end and that is a world crisis in trade developing out of a shortage of dollars. I should like to illustrate what I mean by quoting some figures which I obtained from the United States embassy showing the amount of American favourable balance of payments for last year. They are as follows:

Exports goods (exclusive of Marshall aid)	$13,398,000,000
Interest on investment	1,257,000,000
Services	2,171,000,000
Total	$16,826,000,000

Turning to their import side:

Imports goods	$ 7,711,000,000
Interest on investment	274,000,000
Interest on services	2,506,000,000
Total	$10,491,000,000

In that series of figures I want to note particularly the tremendous sum for interest on services, $2,506 million as a result of investment policies over the years. Exclusive of any Marshall aid or ECA funds, that makes a favourable trade balance, for the year 1948, of exports over imports of $6,335 million.

Mr. Abbott: It was balanced by Marshall aid.

Mr. Low: No, that is not true.

Mr. Abbott: Largely.

Mr. Low: This is exclusive of Marshall aid. These are figures that we obtained from the United States embassy today. If you add the Marshall aid, it brings the total favourable balance for the United States for last year to something around $11 billion. No wonder the world has suffered a shortage of dollars! There could be nothing else under those circumstances.

Surely the whole solution of this problem turns on whether the United States in future will make available to the world an adequate supply of their dollars by balancing her trade with the world. It simply means of course their willingness to import into their country goods which they have purchased with their dollars in the other countries of the world, or to export less; in other words, buying from all of the countries of the world an aggregate of goods and services equal to the aggregate of those same things which they export to the rest of the world. That seems fundamental. But I am convinced that to achieve such a desirable end the commonwealth nations will have to draw closer together and will have to stand side by side, solidly shoulder to shoulder, to provide that balancing factor which is necessary to bring the world successfully out of its terrible position of unbalance in trade. As far as I can see, there can be no other way. It will certainly be necessary to modify or to suspend the most-favoured-nation clause in trade agreements until all the nations have demonstrated their willingness to balance their trade with the rest of the world. That unconditional most-favoured-nation clause will have to be modified.

I should now like to turn to something which is closely allied to this whole situation in trade, and that is the industrial development in our own country. The problem of industrialization cannot be divorced from our trade problems. Canada is twenty-five years behind the times in the development of her resources and her industry. I have here some figures which I obtained recently from our own bureau of statistics; they will indicate what I mean and will drive home the seriousness of this situation.

One of the things which are cluttering up our trade position is this. These figures indicate that last year we purchased from the United States, with cold United States dollars that are so scarce, coal to the value of $203,415,929. We bought in that country and from dollar countries oil to the extent of $187,241,729. We bought steel, raw and manufactured, to the value of $713,126,672, with United States dollars that have been so scarce; and we bought sugar to the extent of $560,551. One of the great reasons why we have been drained, almost bled white, of our reserve of United States dollars is the fact that we have not taken the bold course in developing our own resources and industry to the point where we can supply many of these things ourselves; and there is not anyone here who can deny that we could produce many of these things by ourselves and do so economically.

Canada should be pursuing a most vigorous national policy toward self-sufficiency in the essentials of living so that we can have a goodly measure of independence, a thing we do not possess today. Every time a strike takes place in the United States or in some other country of the world, it makes Canadians go short of things which we could be providing for ourselves. Right today the people of Ontario and Quebec are living in the shadow of fear for this winter because of the coal strike in the United States. Yet all the time we are living in a land that was abundantly blessed by the great Creator who placed right here in our own land forty-nine billion or fifty billion tons of coal that has not been developed.

I know of deposits of coal in large areas in Alberta, where the coal can be mined almost with strip methods at low cost. That is hard coal that can compare quite favourably with coal which we import from Ohio and Pennsylvania. That coal can be brought down and put onto the market of the east, in the central provinces, in competition with coal that is being brought in from the United States. We have lacked the vision or leadership to develop those mines and our transportation facilities so that we could bring that coal down here and satisfy this eastern market, thus making ourselves independent at least to that extent.

What I have said about coal is true of other things, steel in particular. There is no reason in this world why we should be purchasing sugar from any dollar country today or why we should be under that necessity. I say that in times of crisis, in times of stress, Canada must be in a position of independence. We must encourage industrialization to the greatest extent possible and as fast as possible. It must be done on a regional basis with widespread dispersion for safety's sake in these times. We must see to it also that justice is given to the various regions of Canada where justice has been absent hitherto. My friend the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) dealt to some extent with the problem of devaluation and I do not intend to labour it at all. I spoke about deflation once before and placed our views before the house, but I should like to say just a word about it. I think the minister described it as a short-term measure to improve world trade. It does seem strange, but it is true, that from a world point of view somebody seems to be able to drum up a crisis almost any day. The modern crisis, as revealed by the administrator of our finances last night in his budget speech, is that we are short of dollars. The minister and his counterparts from other countries met in London and in Washington. Evidently they believed that the way to meet the situation was to make dollars dearer, which they proceeded to do by devaluation. This was done evidently on the understanding or in the belief that it would make it possible for Britain to sell more in the United States, and of course to obtain less dollars from the sale. We have to keep that in our minds, and it would also enable Britain and Canada to buy less goods in the United States for more pounds or more Canadian dollars. I suppose one could use up a good many minutes of time discussing the merits or demerits of this whole thing as a short-term objective; but my inclination just now, Mr. Speaker, is not to launch out in discussion of the objectives but to try to probe the question that goes to the very root of our economic discontent of which devaluation is but one of the symptoms.

I speak of the widely held belief that money is and should be treated as a commodity in itself. It is a vicious conception. A mass of evidence to support my contention was placed on record before the banking and commerce committee of this house in 1923, and also before the Macmillan commission in London in 1930, I think it was. Out of the masses of evidence collected in these two hearings one gets clearly that the idea of money as a thing itself to be bought and sold like beans or rice or automobiles was very widely held at that time, and held almost with the fervour of a religion. This accounts for the fact that many of our most respectable Canadian citizens would throw up their hands in holy horror at the suggestion that they use an elastic tape measure; that they can see nothing at all objectionable in a rubber unit of account. That is a thing that is astounding to many of us who have studied this matter. But a rubber unit of account is exactly what the manipulators have made of the Canadian dollar, of the pound sterling and of the United States dollar. There is a very real objection, sir, to a rubber unit of account. We Social Crediters object to it because it is destroying civilization step by step. Such things as forced devaluation, tariff and other barriers, trade crises, policies of unemployment and depression, poverty in the midst of plenty, and wars, all have their roots in the frantic effort to keep people thinking and acting as if the unit of our money is a commodity, and a rubber one at that, which can be stretched or contracted in almost unlimited degree to suit the whims of the propagandists who are the only beneficiaries of the system.

We Social Crediters strenuously object to that concept of money. We contend that money, the chief mechanism for distributing goods and services, should be looked upon and treated as units of account. We believe further that until such a financial policy, that is a financial policy based on that concept, is built and applied faithfully in this country, as well as in other countries of the world, there can be little hope for solving the problems of world trade or of the economic ills that confront us today.

History reveals that the root of the success of parliamentary institutions in the past has been that parliament controlled the purse strings of the nation. Resistance to the divine right of kings in the day of that policy, or to any totalitarian policy of any day, has been successful only where the people have kept control of their own money, and where the executive never got control of the purse or of any attributes of that purse or nation. A mass of evidence is available to support the view that since 1914 governments, including the Canadian government, have been moving toward absolutism.

As I mentioned earlier in my remarks, the people of this country no longer control the purse strings, nor their own money. The executive have usurped that control. Some effective way will have to be found, and applied very soon, of stemming this trend or the Canadian people will one day wake up as vassals of a supreme state. Perhaps the most effective remedy would be the institution, in this house particularly, of a responsible vote, independent responsible vote, that would pin any loss resulting from the exercise of it on the voting members, and not on the nation or on political opponents of the government in power. If this can be achieved then, sir, the way can be cleared for a reasonably incorruptible money of account, which is simply a policy that would ensure that all currency and credit in circulation in our land would be fully covered by wealth and readily exchanged for it under a reasonably stabilized pricing technique. We have that technique and we propose it and are prepared to advance it wherever it is possible and necessary.

Let me emphasize this point, sir. A practical solution of the crises with which we are now faced all over the world can be reached through the development in each and all countries of a science of consumption that is not based on taxation. A solution cannot be reached by restricting consumption, nor by living a life of austerity, nor by maintaining a heavy weight of taxation.

In conclusion, sir, just a word about this whole situation of business recession. Only a short statement was made in the budget speech relative to the government's program for meeting the business recessions or depressions which may face us in the years ahead. I noted that housing construction and the construction of the trans-Canada highway were mentioned, but only in a general and nebulous way. The minister admitted the possibility of economic trouble in Canada as a result of possible failure of foreign markets for Canada's production. Surpluses of many of our products are already visible. The past summer I visited one section, Yarrow, British Columbia, where I saw all of the 1947 crop of berries stored in 400-pound barrels in the basement of a jam factory. Think of it! All of the 1947 crop of berries; and all of the 1948 crop of berries were stored outside the railway right of way in 400-pound barrels. They were lying out there in the blazing sun to rot. It was estimated at that time that fully the equivalent of a million cases of pure strawberry and raspberry jam was lying there and could not be sold at any price.

In storage in Canada we have 48,000,000 pounds of butter, much of which is surplus to our need. The condensed and powdered milk situation, as has already been mentioned, is becoming serious. These and many other item that could be cited indicate the way the wind is blowing. Let it not be forgotten that any unsaleable surpluses on the shelves in the storehouses of the nation usually precede unemployment and depression, with poverty in the midst of plenty. We think that so far the government has been so busy playing politics that it has neglected to draft and bring forward any adequate program of action to cushion the Canadian economy against possible depressions. In the United States President Truman has taken leadership in this matter, and through a committee he has set up has assured the nation that the United States has something ready, in case of difficulty. I hold in my hand "U.S. News and World Report" of October 14, 1949, and at page 18 I find a reference to the Truman ten-year plan, described by the magazine as The Fair Deal Goal. Evidently it was issued under the direction of Leon Keyserling, vice-chairman of the council of economic advisers, and the No. 1 White House adviser on economic issues who, according to the magazine, has spelled out the fair deal goals for use by the President and the party in power.

The article goes on to say:

> If the goals are realized, everybody is going to be well fed, well housed, well clothed.

That is a worthy objective, and evidently it has been developed to a certain degree, and in some detail, through a proposed program of action to ensure that this goal is reached. For example I notice that their 1949 level of production in the United States is approximately $260 billion. Under the fair deal goal they propose to stimulate production so as to bring it up to the $350 billion level. Ninety billion dollars of increased production they propose to use in the following ways: $45 billion is to go toward raising the living standard of two-thirds of American families to a $4,000 minimum. This is physically possible, and if it is physically possible we contend it must be and can be made financially possible.

Then I notice that $12 billion of the excess $90 billion is to go toward health insurance, old age pensions, unemployment benefits and aid to the needy, to ensure that they may have a future without fear.

I see that $2 billion is to be used for the development of natural resources. In connection with this I notice that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation made a huge loan of $34,400,000 to the Kaiser-Frazer Company to make plans for a new low-priced automobile in that country. That is a substantial amount, and will go far toward stimulating the development required if production is to be increased to the extent of $90 billion.

Then, $2 billion is to go to the nation's school system by way of federal aid to education—the very subject we were discussing the other night as being vitally necessary to our country, if we are going to remove some of the inequalities suffered by children in various parts of the country.

Then, $6 billion is to go toward housing, part for slum clearance and part for city planning.

The last item of $23 billion is for the improvement of public roads and for plant improvement.

These figures indicate that they are not asleep down there; they have a plan. They have at least an objective that has been worked out in detail. I am a great believer in objectives, and in my view we should plead with our government in the months between now and the next session of parliament to develop their program in detail. They should make a statement of the objectives by which they hope to stave off any ill effects of the economic difficulties of other lands, and to cushion the Canadian economy against the impact of such disturbances abroad.

In concluding I would say that the people of Canada would like to be able to face the years ahead with a feeling that their government has taken every possible precaution to protect their economy against the impacts of disturbances elsewhere, wherever they may be. They have every right to expect their government to bring forward the details of their program for ensuring to every Canadian the opportunity to obtain for himself and his family a reasonably high standard of living—just as high as our abundant resources can make possible.

I appeal to the government to prepare carefully and to bring before the next session of parliament a comprehensive program of sound and adequate proposals for reform, for social justice and for national development and security, so that our people can feel like driving ahead, in confidence that everything possible has been done to remove fear and worry, and the spectre of needless suffering.

On motion of Mr. Weir the debate was adjourned.

OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION ACT

CORPORATION TO TAKE OVER PROPERTY AND EQUIPMENT OF MARCONI AND CABLE AND WIRELESS LIMITED

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, to establish the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, before the minister speaks, would he mind answering a question I am going to ask, and thus set at rest some fears in the minds of employees in Montreal. I understand that the Anglo-American Telegraph Company deals exclusively in overseas telecommunications. The company is owned and operated by the Western Union Telegraph Company of the United States. Under the agreement it serves exclusive cable connections to the Canadian National Telegraph Company. Would the minister say whether this company is involved in the bill, or not?

Mr. Chevrier: The answer to the hon. member's question is no.

The purposes of the bill are twofold, first to acquire the external telecommunication assets of Canadian Marconi Company Limited and Cable and Wireless Limited in Canada and, secondly, to establish a crown company in order to co-ordinate the maintenance and operation of these two commonwealth-controlled telecommunication systems.

Before going into the details of the bill, may I be permitted to say that the assets it is intended to expropriate under the bill are, with respect to the Canadian Marconi Company Limited, the following:

Their receiving station at Yamachiche; their transmitting station at Drummondville; the building and equipment at Montreal; and certain small holdings at Toronto and Vancouver.

Dealing next with Cable and Wireless Limited, the following:

Land, buildings and equipment at Bamfield; electrical equipment at Halifax, Montreal and Harbour Grace; certain furniture and stationery at Toronto and Vancouver.

Mr. Green: Nothing in Newfoundland?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, at Harbour Grace. The total value of these assets should not exceed $4 million, as set out in the bill—the additional $500,000 referred to in the bill being required for working capital. No assets are to be acquired which relate to the manufacturing, radio broadcasting and ship-to-shore activities of Canadian Marconi Company Limited. And I should like to dispel immediately any impression that what is being taken over is a liability. As I have stated already, the telecommunications side of Canadian Marconi showed a substantial profit in 1948.

These assets are being taken over for two reasons: First, because it is important that we should have control over these services for strategic purposes, and, second, because for many years the telecommunication services controlled by Cable and Wireless and their policies were not acceptable to the commonwealth countries. For the reasons already stated, which it is unnecessary to repeat at this time, and because of meetings which finally culminated in the commonwealth telecommunications convention in London, it was decided to proceed on this basis, namely, that each commonwealth country would take over the telecommunication assets in its own territory.

Mr. Green: What is to be done with the cables as distinct from the cable stations?

Mr. Chevrier: This bill does not provide for the expropriation of cables, only for the expropriation of the assets I mentioned earlier in my statement. Why is it done in that way? I suppose it could be done by setting up a division in one of the departments of government, but after giving that careful consideration it was thought that as these operations would compete with other operations it would be better to set up a crown company. Furthermore, we would like to continue these telecommunication facilities as they were operated heretofore. We feel that the best way to accomplish that is by means of a crown corporation.

Some mention was made that this is likely to create a monopoly. I have looked at the figures mentioned by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in so far as the control of Cable and Wireless is concerned. I believe the leader of the opposition was correct in stating that the move to nationalize commonwealth telecommunication facilities would result in control to the extent of some eighty per cent of the cable system by the British government. I should like to remind the house that the other twenty per cent is quite active. There is keen competition from the United States companies I mentioned before, the Anglo-American Cable Company and the Commercial Cable Company, both of which conduct telecommunication services to and from Canada. Because of that I do not believe that this bill will create a monopoly in any sense.

The bill may be divided into five parts. First, it establishes the crown company; second, it states the powers and purposes of the company; third, it provides it with staff; fourth, it defines its financial requirements and limitations; and, lastly, it stipulates the rules and regulations to govern its operation.

A portion of the bill provides for the appointment of five directors. One director will be the president and general manager and the governor in council will have the power to fix his salary as well as that of the vice-president. I should say at this point that these men will be appointed for a period of seven years. Of the other four directors, one is to be appointed for one year, one for two years and two for three years. These men will receive fees for attending directors' meetings only, and no salary.

It is stated in the bill that the corporation is to be an agent of the crown with restrictions on entering into certain agreements. For instance, the corporation may not without the approval of the governor in council enter into an agreement involving an expenditure of more than $50,000. It may not, without the approval of the governor in council, enter into for a period exceeding three years any agreement or lease that involves an expenditure in any year of more than $5,000. Finally, it may not without such approval acquire any real or personal property, the cost of acquisition of which exceeds the sum of $50,000, or in any manner dispose of any such property having an original or book value exceeding the sum of $5,000.

Under another portion of the bill the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is authorized to advance the corporation the amount of money mentioned earlier in my statement, $4,500,000, for the purpose of taking over these assets and to provide working capital. The Minister of Finance may also lend the corporation money for temporary purposes not exceeding $100,000. The crown corporation must pay interest on capital advances and deliver certificates of indebtedness for the amounts of money that are lent from time to time by the Minister of Finance. If funds in excess of the requirements exist they are to be paid into the treasury and if there is a deficit on the operations it will be voted in accordance with the usual practice by means of an item in the estimates. The bill provides for an audit and the usual annual report.

During the discussion on the resolution several hon. members, particularly the leader of the opposition, suggested that it would be well to send this bill to a committee. I have no feeling one way or another. If the house feels it would be preferable to send the bill to a committee, I am quite willing to concur in that suggestion. After the debate on the second reading has been concluded and if the motion is approved I would move that the bill be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, if that is the wish of the house.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the bill is to be referred to a committee there is little need to discuss it in detail at this stage. The official opposition asked that the bill be referred to a committee and we are glad that the minister has agreed to do so. It is particularly important that that be done with this bill because there seems to be quite a long story behind it. While the minister has given us considerable by way of explanation, it probably would be difficult for him, or for anyone else for that matter, to go into all the details on the floor of the house. Furthermore, the subject appears to be quite complicated and technical and we believe that this is a case where the bill should be considered in detail by a committee.

We agree also that the proper committee to give the bill consideration is the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines; the government already operates telegraph lines and we presume that anything having to do with such lines would be referred to that committee; this bill having to do with telecommunications would fit in well with the functions of that committee.

There are some matters arising out of this bill about which we are particularly concerned. I am going to run over a few of them hurriedly. The first is that apparently Canada signed an agreement with the other nations of the commonwealth about this matter some four years ago. We believe that agreement should be carefully reviewed. Having made a treaty, Canada certainly must see that its terms are carried out. The minister mentioned this afternoon that one reason why this course was being followed was for strategic considerations. That being so, it is all the more important that the house should carry out the agreement entered into some years ago.

The minister, however, was not very explicit about the board which is now to be set up with membership from each of the commonwealth countries. If I remember correctly the name of that board is the commonwealth telecommunications board, and each nation is to have one member. I believe the committee should examine the powers of that board very carefully. There was some mention made that it would regulate rates. The house will remember that the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray), when the resolution preceding the bill was under discussion, mentioned the high cable rates on the Pacific. That is one question which we believe should be thoroughly investigated by the committee because it would appear that the commonwealth telecommunications board has the power to set rates, and rates which are too high could be adjusted by it.

Very little has been said about the relationship of the new crown company and the commonwealth telecommunications board with the United States. Apparently the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley made a statement about this matter on the 8th of November, 1945. In that statement he mentioned that United States-British commonwealh telecommunications conferences were being held. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) did not mention such conferences either in the debate which took place the other day or in his remarks this afternoon.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes. On the discussion concerning the resolution—I did not go into it in detail—I referred to the visit of Lord Reith, the chairman of the commonwealth telecommunications board to the various commonwealth countries, the conference that took place in Australia, and finally the telecommunications conference in London.

Mr. Green: The minister has not heard me correctly. I am referring now to a United States-British commonwealth telecommunications conference which took place in—

Mr. Chevrier: Bermuda?

Mr. Green: November, 1945. We have not yet been told what tie-up there is with United States telecommunications services. I believe that question also should be thoroughly investigated by the house committee. Little or nothing has been said about the method of operation. For example, the minister has just mentioned that the new corporation is not to take over any interest in the cables. We should know who is to maintain the cables. That is particularly important on the Pacific where there is such a long cable. I am not clear from the statements made whether it is to be maintained by Cable and Wireless Limited—

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Green: —whether the government will look after that maintenance, or just how the cable is to be kept in shape. In his remarks the minister also said very little about losses. He seems to think there will not be any losses, and I hope he is correct; but as I read the bill there is provision in it for Canada to pay whatever losses are suffered by the corporation. There is no limit set to the amount of money that can be advanced in case of a loss. The bill provides for a certain set amount for capital funds and a certain amount for operating expenses, but it does not set any limit on the amount that can be paid for losses. I believe that is another point which should be carefully considered by the committee.

The minister has given us some idea of the assets that are to be taken over, but he did not say anything about how the amounts are to be divided; how much is to go to each company. In the bill there is mention of a power to specify that certain properties shall not be required. In the committee I think we should be given details of all properties belonging to these corporations which are to be taken over.

So far as setting up a crown corporation is concerned, the official opposition do not believe in crown companies. We think that is one method of getting away from control by parliament. In the committee we shall expect the government to make it clear why it is felt that there must be a crown company in this instance. In the United Kingdom the post office has taken over overseas telecommunications. I understand that is the case, but the minister will correct me if I am wrong. We now have a department of the government in charge of dominion telegraphs, and we should like to be shown why this work could not be handled by the particular Canadian department which is in existence at the present time.

There is another feature about the bill which the minister did not mention, and that is that it covers all communication systems between Newfoundland and the rest of Canada, in other words, between one part of Canada and another, but no power is taken between any of the other provinces. That is done only in the case of Newfoundland. There may be a very good reason for that, but it should be explained by the government.

Finally there is in the bill a provision which appears to be a very welcome one. It is that the corporation may pay municipal taxes. I do not believe there is such a provision in any other dominion act. I hope that this particular section means that from now on the government is going to pay taxes in all of the municipalities where there is crown property. The situation has become very unfair to many municipalities. All hon. members of the house must clearly recognize that fact. The section in question does not say that the corporation must pay taxes but that it may pay taxes. I hope we will get definite assurance that the intention is to pay those taxes.

These are just some of the questions in connection with the bill about which we would like further clarification when the bill goes to committee. We heartily approve of the proposal of the minister to send it to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

PORTRAYAL OF CRIMES BY PICTURES IN MAGAZINES, ETC., TENDING TO INDUCE VIOLENCE

The house resumed, from Friday, October 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fulton for the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the Criminal Code (portrayal of crimes).

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, may I preface my statement tonight with congratulations to the mover of this amendment and to all those who have taken part in a high-class debate, including the hon. members for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) and Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), who have supported this amendment with misgivings of the most honourable and intelligent kind. The action of those members, and of the house itself so far, has been an example of sensitivity to public opinion and concern for the common weal which our democratic system displays when it is functioning properly.

This is not the first time this matter has come up. The hon. member who introduced it referred in the debate to the action which he took in connection with this matter during the time of my distinguished predecessor, the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley. I suppose it can be said that we have not been hasty in acting in this matter, either as a government or as a parliament. There may be those indeed who would say we were dilatory. But I am sure, sir, that all the members of this house, regardless of party, would deliberate most anxiously before taking any action against freedom of expression by writers or artists. But when publishers and disseminators of various kinds of crime comics and obscene literature are heartened and emboldened by this concern of ours for the preservation of literary and artistic freedom, and become steadily more impudent in their degradation of that freedom so that they transform freedom into licence, the time comes, and I think we all agree that it has come, when we must take further action to curtail their offences.

I therefore rise tonight, not only to support the amendment which has been offered by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) but also to suggest that, to be effective, we must go further than this amendment does. With great deference, I do not think that the mere passage of this amendment will, of itself, cure the situation. I should like to offer some suggestions as to how, in my opinion, the code may be strengthened so that this amendment and section 207, of which after it is passed, it will become a part, will become more enforceable. The suggestion which I will make will have certain inherent and unavoidable defects to which some members will no doubt object on grounds which I will admit in advance are very good grounds. In my view, we are faced in this matter with a rather unpleasant dilemma. Either we shall follow the course which I shall suggest, with all its faults, or we may avoid those faults by letting matters stand in the present unsatisfactory condition.

The amendment we are discussing now, sir, deals only with crime comics, but I think it may be said that the debate has made it quite clear, as it has developed, that at least equally offensive and at least equally injurious to the morals of our youth is the rising tide of pornography which has flooded the bookstands of this country for some time past. The few samples of this which have come to my attention, thanks to the courtesy of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) and which he tells me are fair samples, have no redeeming features of any kind; no distinction of conception or style; no humour; no sentiment; certainly no idealism; not even any genuine realism; nothing but hack-work filth seeking filthy lucre.

While no judge of such matters I should have thought, sir, that the influence of these obscene books and magazines would probably be worse than the crime comics. Yet these obscene books and magazines are now covered by section 207 of the Criminal Code and have been covered by that section for over half a century. This provision was first enacted, in, it is true, a slightly different form, in 1892. It was elaborated upon somewhat in 1900; re-enacted in the revised statutes of 1906, and enacted in its present form in 1909. During the whole of this interval prior to 1909, and since 1909 continuously until now, obscene literature has been covered by this section. Yet, sir, judging by the mass of evidence which the members of this house have brought forward in this debate alone, section 207 does not now seem to have been any great deterrent to the production or sale of this obscene literature.

Obscene books and magazines are covered by section 207. Crime comics are not covered —indeed, the purpose of this amendment is to have them covered by that section. Yet the obscene books seem to flourish at least as much as the crime comics. It is significant, I think, that in reply to an inquiry recently made by our department, Nova Scotia could not recall any prosecutions within the last ten years; Prince Edward Island, no prosecutions since 1942; New Brunswick, no information available of any such prosecution within the last five years; Ontario, a few prosecutions which usually failed because of the word "knowingly" or because the jury ruled against the obscenity element. Manitoba had no general statistics, but there were eight prosecutions in Winnipeg since the beginning of 1946 and none at all from 1944 to 1946 inclusive. In Alberta, there were about ten prosecutions in the last five years, while British Columbia recalled only one conviction within five years in respect of moving pictures. Prosecution considered in other cases was dropped because of this word "knowingly" and also a feeling that the persons who should be prosecuted were the publishers in eastern Canada. Of all the provinces of which we made inquiry and which I have named, Quebec, with one hundred prosecutions in the last five years, is the only one in which there has been prosecution on that scale which would seem to be warranted by the observations which have been made in this debate by the members who took part in it.

Now, sir, this amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops, when passed, will merely bring crime comics as paragraph (d) under the same section 207 of the code of which paragraph (a) now makes the publication and sale of obscene literature an offence. This is all that Bill No. 10 does; and if the experience in regard to obscene literature is any criterion, it is certainly not enough.

I admit I am not a criminal lawyer nor an expert in these matters, but it must be obvious even to lay members of this assembly that the great likelihood is that the crux of this matter is in certain words in the beginning of section 207, which reads as follows:

Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who—

And these are the words.

—knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse . . .

publishes or sells obscene literature or, as we now seek to have it amended, crime comics and so on. In my judgment it is these words, "knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse," which would appear to make conviction so difficult and prosecution so apparently hopeless that but few prosecutions have been started.

Yet the reason for including these words in the description of the offence is, I submit, a good one.

On the face of it, it seems most unfair, in any country that has the conception of civil liberty that we in Canada have, that a bookseller, who in the ordinary course of his business sells thousands of books that he can never hope to read or to censor himself, should be convicted of an indictable offence and be liable to two years' imprisonment—for what, sir? For selling merchandise like chairs or boxes of soda biscuits that are all alike? No, for selling a book which is unlike the thousands of other books which he sells and which, without any necessary knowledge or fault on his part may, for all he knows, be obscene. It is therefore unjust and unfair to the honest bookseller that these words "knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse" should be absent from the definition of the offence. Yet when to protect the honest bookseller—and the law should protect honest people—these words are inserted in the definition of the offence, it apparently becomes next to impossible to convict a dishonest bookseller; for, if he is prosecuted, all he has to do is to maintain a naive and wide-eyed innocence of any knowledge of the contents of the books that he has sold in the ordinary course of business, in order to establish a good defence to the prosecution.

It may then be asked: Why not prosecute the publisher? Surely he must read what he publishes.

There are two points to be noted with regard to this suggestion, the first of which is this. I am credibly informed that a good deal of the publishing of this kind of literature in Canada consists in printing it in Canada from plates made in the United States; and it is conceivable—although in my opinion not at all likely—that the Canadian publisher may run off this print job of a particular book—for example, the one upon which the prosecution against him may be based—as a routine business without informing himself of its text. Under those circumstances he could come into court, and if he could persuade the magistrate that he did not know it was an offence, then he would escape conviction.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That he did not know it was an offence?

Mr. Garson: I beg hon. members pardon. If he could persuade the magistrate that he did not know that the book he was publishing was obscene he would escape conviction.

In the case of crime comics the publisher would have difficulty in escaping knowledge. Thus, while the publisher could plead a lack of knowledge in the same way as the bookseller, this defence upon the part of the publisher, I think we must all agree, would seem to be much more difficult to maintain and to establish than upon the part of the bookseller.

The second point in connection with this suggestion—why not prosecute the publisher?—is, I think, a somewhat more difficult one. While this parliament, as a federal parliament enacts the criminal law, the enforcement of that law is exclusively a provincial right and provincial duty. Therefore, if he is prosecuted, the publisher can move his operations—and if they simply consist of printing from plates that are brought in from the United States it would not be a matter of great difficulty to move them—into and seek sanctuary in a province where the police and the law enforcement officers are less diligent in the enforcement of section 207.

At this point, in justice to the government of which I am a member, to my distinguished predecessors in this high office, to the officers of the Department of Justice and, I think, to truth itself, I feel that I must indulge in some plain speaking. The constitutional responsibilities of the federal parliament, and the federal government on the one hand and of the provincial legislatures or the provincial governments on the other, are in this matter as plain as a pikestaff. To the federal government is assigned, as class 27 of section 91 of the British North America Act, the power to make laws with regard to:

> The criminal law, except the constitution of courts of criminal jurisdiction, but including the procedure in criminal matters.

To the provincial governments and the provincial legislatures is assigned as class 14 of section 92 of the British North America Act:

> The administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance, and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and of criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts.

I know that we lawyers are twitted, even in this parliament, for raising this matter of constitutional law when other matters such as the one we are discussing are brought up for discussion. I know that the courts have difficulty in determining whether certain subject matters fall under federal or provincial jurisdiction. But so far as I know there has never been any doubt or controversy over the division between federal and provincial jurisdiction in this field of criminal law. The enforcement of criminal law, as distinguished from its enactment, is neither a federal responsibility nor a federal right. There is no federal invasion of provincial rights which would be more quickly and more justly resented than that which would take place if the federal Minister of Justice were to go into a province over the head of its attorney general who, under our constitution, is its chief law enforcement officer, in order to enforce law and administer justice there, not in the name of the provincial attorney general but in the name of the federal Minister of Justice. I cannot recall a single case in Canadian history where the federal minister of justice has ever done such a thing. Quite obviously it would be the gravest sort of reflection upon both the integrity and the competence of the provincial attorney general were the Minister of Justice to do so.

Now, sir, there has been what, from my point of view, I must regard as a rather regrettable tendency on one or two occasions in this debate to imply at least shall I say, and in some cases to state explicitly, that it is the federal Department of Justice which is responsible for and has been remiss in the enforcement of section 207. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) made an excellent presentation of his viewpoint in this debate, and to him I am particularly indebted for the loan of his file of samples, without which our staff would have had much greater difficulty in dealing with this matter. It pains me to have to make the remarks that I am about to make, but in fairness to ourselves I think they must be made. I am sure that it was unintentional that the hon. member, during the course of a speech which was in every other respect an admirable one, made this remark. He said, as reported at page 518 of Hansard:

> Might I emphasize once again that, apart from crime comics, if the Minister of Justice, who has the administration of the R.C.M.P. under his department, or if the various cities with their own police forces would take that section of the criminal code and enforce it, sending a few of these publishers to jail for a couple of years. I have no doubt but what it would make a difference in the type of publications in this country.

I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that with a part of that statement I am in agreement. Very probably the result which my hon. friend envisages here would come about. I have not the slightest doubt that sending a few of these gentlemen to jail would have an effect upon that type of publication in the country. But the point I wish to emphasize is that this action is not within our federal power and it is not our federal responsibility.

Even the reference to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is misleading. It is quite true that they are administered under the Department of Justice, but in that capacity the only offences that they prosecute under my authority as Minister of Justice are offences like those under the Foreign Exchange Control Act, the Excise Act and similar federal statutes.

The governments of Alberta, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and several other provinces, under an arrangement that is in the highest degree in the interest of the taxpayers of this country, pay to this government a large sum of money for the use of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in these various provinces. Having only one police force to administer both federal and provincial law is much more economical; but what is more important is that it commands a much greater respect for law enforcement and for the administration of justice. But, sir, if under the guise of this police contract, we were, by the control which we exercise through the Justice department over the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, to try to siphon away provincial rights by attempting to direct the mounted police in respect of those matters upon which they are supposed to take directions from the attorneys general of the provinces, it would not be long before the provinces would refuse to renew these police contracts. The plain fact of the matter is that the agreement which covers the renting of these police services to the provinces specifies that, when the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are engaged in the enforcement of all of these laws which come under provincial enforcement, they are the instrument not of the Minister of Justice but of the provincial attorney general and subject wholly to the latter's control. For that reason, the exhortations and the strictures of the hon. member for Macleod should be addressed not to me but to his good friend, the attorney general of Alberta. When I say that I want to make myself perfectly clear that I am implying no criticism of the attorney general of Alberta, who is an equally good friend of mine.

It may very well be that in that province, under conditions with which I am not familiar, the words "knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse" in section 207 would make it hard to secure a conviction against the booksellers in Alberta. One of the things that the prosecution has to take into account in this connection is that in offences of this nature against morals nothing is worse from every standpoint than an abortive prosecution. To the offender and to the offending publication the advertising value of an unsuccessful prosecution is simply beyond price. I believe it is said that Mae West claimed she got her start in life from having been so prosecuted. Therefore, sir, if there are no such publishers in Alberta—and my information is that there are none—it is not difficult to understand that the crown prosecutors in that province, like the crown prosecutors in those other provinces whose statistics I mentioned a few moments ago, will not be over-enthusiastic about taking on the difficult task of prosecuting Alberta retailers of books, when the crown prosecutors of other provinces have not done anything in the apparently easier task of prosecuting publishers within their jurisdiction.

The debate upon this amendment has shown that upon the one hand there is a huge volume of pornographic literature exposed for sale upon the newsstands of this country and, upon the other, that in relation to this huge volume of exposure and sale there have been in all of the provinces except one a relatively small number of prosecutions. It seems to me, as I have indicated before, that the apparent reason for this inconsistency is most likely to be found in these words "knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse."

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow one question? What would be a lawful justification or excuse?

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend will wait just a moment I shall come to that.

Mr. Graydon: The minister will be lucky if he does.

Mr. Garson: I shall get there if I am not interrupted. I should like to deal first of all with the question of knowingly. As I said, my reason for the view that these words are the crux of the matter is some of the case law of this country. One of the leading cases is the case of the King v. Britnell, where it was held that the owner of a bookstore containing thousands of books could not be convicted of knowingly exposing for sale any obscene books under section 207 of the Criminal Code, and that in order to warrant a conviction under that section for selling and exposing for sale an obscene book it must be proved that the accused was aware of its obscene character and that it was sold or exposed for sale with his knowledge.

Mr. Fulton: Was that the Ontario case of 1925?

Mr. Garson: Yes, the Ontario court of appeal.

To come to the question asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). He said, does it mean without—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is lawful justification?

Mr. Garson: I think I have a case here exactly on that point. It is Rex v. Woolland, decided in the province of Manitoba by county court Judge Armstrong. The headnote reads:

> On a charge of keeping without lawful excuse goods unlawfully imported into Canada contrary to section 217 (2) of the Customs Act it may not be necessary for the prosecution to prove knowledge on the part of the accused.

That is, the word "knowingly" was not in that section. Therefore it was not necessary for the crown to prove that it was done knowingly. But proof offered by the defence of no knowledge, and the absence of any suspicious circumstances to place one on inquiry takes him out of the class of "one without lawful excuse," the onus on the accused being merely to show lawful excuse and not lawful importation or payment of duty.

And in this connection—and this, I think, will answer my hon. friend's question—the county court judge said:

> I cannot conceive of any more lawful excuse than the absence of any criminal intent and the carrying on of a legitimate business in the ordinary way.

It would seem that the removal of these words "knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse" would result in an absolute prohibition so that the bookseller could not plead as an excuse ignorance of the contents of the books upon his shelves. This undoubtedly would place a very heavy burden upon him. It would mean that he would have to satisfy himself as to the contents of all the books upon his shelves, or depend upon some system of censorship by his distributor or publisher, or take a chance. And the question this house has to decide—and this is where the unpleasant dilemma comes in—is whether or not the abuse of the sale of these books has grown to the point where it is most unfair to the children and to their parents, and to the taxpayers of this country who have to put up the money to take care of the crime which is caused by the sale of these books.

It may well be that upon a balance between these two groups, the booksellers and publisher on the one hand, and the children and their parents, and the taxpayers, on the other, there is less injustice in being unfair to the honest man who unwittingly publishes or distributes or sells obscene books and crime comics than in being unfair to the children, parents and taxpayers.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What about the distributor of a newspaper libel? He takes all those chances, does he not?

Mr. Garson: Yes, but knowledge has to be brought home to him.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Every newsstand in a hotel.

Mr. Garson: Yes, that is right. But heretofore in the carrying out of the ideas we have had as to freedom of literary expression, freedom of artistic expression and freedom of the press, we have not seen fit to have this definition in any form other than the form in which it now appears.

My reason for labouring that point is that I do not think it is going to be much of a solution, at all, to pass Bill No. 10. We have only to look at statistics to see that that is so. If we are really going to grapple with this and produce an enforceable section, we have to face up to the hard decision I have been trying to outline.

If we do this, there is another difficulty we must face as time goes on—one which we have not yet faced. That is the problem which arises under an enforceable prohibition of obscene literature in drawing a line between what is obscene and what is not—because there is a great variety of opinion on that score. One will find a crank who will regard as obscene some books which by others are regarded as the greatest gems of literature. The reason, borne out by statistics, why we have not encountered this problem to any great extent so far is that section 207 has not been sufficiently enforceable. But to the extent that we make this section enforceable, we shall, as time goes on, meet this other problem. And in that regard I do not think we could do better than to leave the section as it is, that is leave the obscenity content of the offending publication to be judged as a matter of fact by the court, upon the basis of the evidence presented to it.

From this debate I suggest seven points have emerged:

1. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), would merely bring crime comics as paragraph (d) under the same section 207 of the code, of which paragraph (a) makes the publication and sale of obscene literature an offence.

2. The prohibition of the publication and sale of obscene literature by section 207(a) of the Criminal Code has not deterred the publication and sale of obscene literature to any significant extent. In all provinces except Quebec there have been a very small number of prosecutions under this paragraph.

3. Therefore, without more determined prosecution the mere adding of crime comics to this section 207 is certainly not likely to be a solution to the problem.

4. In drafting an enforceable amendment, the most valuable suggestions which we could secure would be those from the crown prosecutors and law enforcement officers of the provincial governments whose responsibility it is to enforce the Criminal Code.

5. The federal Department of Justice has received no representations upon this subject from any of the attorney general's departments of the provinces, with the exception of Ontario and British Columbia. Both of these departments say that the presence of the word "knowingly" in the definition of the offence under section 207 makes difficult the prosecution of shopkeepers charged with selling these books.

6. On the other hand, the presence of these words in the definition of the offence does not seem to have deterred the law enforcement officers of Quebec from instituting some hundred prosecutions in that province during the past five years.

Mr. Low: How many prosecutions were successful?

Mr. Garson: We made inquiry on that point but there were no statistics to be had, in a compendious form, and it would take some time to secure them. We would have to go to the localities where the prosecutions were instituted. I would deduce, however, that Quebec must have been successful, because I cannot imagine an attorney general's department going to the expense of having a hundred prosecutions if it were not getting some convictions.

Then, the seventh point is that the elimination from the definition of the offence of the words "knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse" would result in an absolute prohibition of the sale of obscene literature, so that the retail sellers—and that refers to the bookstand, the cigar store, the book shop, the magazine stand and the like—could not plead, as an excuse, ignorance of the content of the books upon their shelves. I think we must all admit that we would be putting a great hardship upon them.

Therefore the suggestion I would venture to make is that it would seem that these words should not be eliminated until the publishers as the source of this objectionable reading matter shall have been prosecuted, and it shall have been demonstrated in such prosecution that it is impossible to convict the publishers under the law as it now stands, as amended by adding crime comics as material banned by section 207.

In other words the only step which it seems will put some effective teeth in the law, this matter of removing these words, is going to be quite a hardship upon many hundreds if not thousands of honest small dealers throughout the country. Before that step is taken surely some attempt should be made to prosecute the publishers who are for the most part concentrated in two or three cities, with one city having more than all the rest of the country put together.

The second condition to the elimination of these words is that the law officers of the provinces, who are the ones who know, the ones who have the responsibility for prosecution, assure us that section 207 cannot be enforced effectively without the elimination of those words. They have already told us so in Ontario and British Columbia. Thirdly, the provincial law officers should tell us that section 207 can be enforced effectively if these words "knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse" are eliminated. I think the answer to that is likely to be, "yes."

For these reasons I should like to urge upon hon. members that we approve of the principle of this bill on second reading. Then when it gets to committee we should leave it there until we have secured from the attorneys general of the provinces, who have the responsibility of enforcing this section, the invaluable suggestions of their prosecutors as to the form that this amendment should take in order to prohibit crime comics and also make the whole of section 207 more enforceable than it has been.

In addition I should like to get the views of our committee on the revision and consolidation of the Criminal Code. We have already had a subcommittee of that body working on this section but I should like to have the views of the whole committee.

In making this suggestion I want to make it clear that there is no thought that we should delay action in this matter until another session. Nor are we, in seeking advice from those who have the responsibility of enforcement, in any sense abdicating our responsibility for passing criminal legislation. Whatever amendment we adopt is of little use if it is not enforceable. Our duty here is to turn out an enforceable law. It is to this end that I urge that we secure the best advice that we can from those extremely important sources, the men whose prosecution and enforcement of this section is an indispensable ingredient in its effectiveness.

I suggest that we hold this bill in committee in order to get the benefit of as many of these opinions as we possibly can, with the understanding, of course, that in any event we shall pass it in as effective a form as possible before prorogation.

Mr. Fulton: When the minister refers to "prorogation" does he mean the prorogation at the end of this session?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The minister made a distinction in connection with the elimination of these words. Any person who published or distributed such material would be liable just the same as the publisher.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): He has protection.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): He has no protection except under the different provincial statutes which provide for apologies and a lot of nonsense of that kind. He is liable to be prosecuted under the Criminal Code. No one has been hurt very much by that. I am not advocating one thing or another, but is it not a fact that if these words were eliminated it would put these scurrilous magazines—if I may call them that—in exactly the same position as a newspaper which publishes a criminal libel?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I should like to say a word at this time—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I merely asked a question.

An hon. Member: We are not in committee.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): As a matter of courtesy I expected an answer; as a matter of rule I am not entitled to it.

Mr. Garson: With the permission of the house I would be delighted to attempt to answer my hon. friend. The analogy my hon. friend has drawn between his point and my own is hardly a true one. The point I was trying to make was that, where in section 207 of the Criminal Code you have the words, "knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse" as part of the definition of the offence, it is likely to be easier to make out a case and thus secure a conviction against a publisher who has to set up the obscene material in type and run it through the press than it would to obtain a conviction against a bookseller who may have that particular book among thousands of others on his shelves without necessarily having any exact knowledge of its contents. I was not discussing the question of liability, because the publishers and booksellers are equally liable under section 207 of the Criminal Code. But there would be much greater difficulty in bringing home knowledge to the bookseller than there would be bringing it home to the book publisher. The point of the hon. member for Calgary West was in connection with criminal libel. This point is somewhat different from the one I was discussing, although knowledge has to be brought home to the seller of printed libellous matter in order to secure a conviction against him.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The minister has dealt with the word "knowingly" and the difficulty of prosecuting. Is it not a fact that any two people who might happen to read one of these publications could go to the publisher and say it is obscene and then if he distributed it after that he would be distributing it knowingly?

Mr. Garson: Certainly.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): It would be a simple matter for any representative of an association to go along with a witness and prove that it was done knowingly.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to say anything at this time as lawyers in the house have had their full say on this matter, but as a humble publisher I thought probably I should interject a word or two. This country is deluged with filth from the publishers of the United States and no effort is made to stop this material coming past the border. We have the right to impose a tariff upon the plates and illustrations and literature generally imported into this country. Unless we do that I think we can expect to continue to pay great profits to the publishers in New York, Chicago and elsewhere.

If one looks at a Canadian paper one will see that at least half of the news content is made up by material from news services originating in New York, Chicago or elsewhere. We have capable journalists in Canada who would be only too glad to write those articles, but apparently it is more desirable to import this material and along with it the so-called pornographic material which has been discussed here tonight.

As a publisher may I say that I do not think we alone are competent to judge what is good or what is bad. That is something for public opinion. We get just what we ask for. You can take the Bible and hold it up as an example of a publication which contains within it articles and items which might be mentioned here tonight. I think we should encourage our Canadian press, our Canadian writers and our Canadian artists to build a healthy Canadianism. We are cutting ourselves off from the privy council by passing the Supreme Court Act. We could do much more for Canada by establishing a Canadian literature. We must encourage Canadian talent to take such a part in the publication of our papers that it will not be necessary to depend upon writers and artists and syndicates from other lands.

Mr. Adamson: Before you put the question, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister what his motion is? I am all in favour of the question being put, but I want to know what it is.

Mr. Garson: I merely suggested that we leave the bill in its present form. I did not move an amendment to it. My suggestion was that we give second reading to Bill No. 10 and then leave it in committee of the whole so that we can follow along from there.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Since it is very close to nine o'clock I hope the house will pardon me if I do not express as fully as I should like to my appreciation of the support which the bill has received and the generosity and courtesy which all members have shown to the idea in their discussion of the proposal. I should like to spend more time in expressing that appreciation, but I am sure hon. members will understand the reason if I cut my remarks short.

For myself I should like to say that the proposal made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is one which I appreciate, and which I think should be accepted without reservation. I understood him to say that for his part he is willing to have the bill given second reading, which means approval of the principle behind the proposal, and then while it is committed to committee of the whole to obtain the opinions of the provincial law enforcement officers, with the assurance, as I understand it, that the bill will be reported out of committee, and some legislation will be enacted before the end of the present session. If I am correct in my understanding, that proposal is perfectly acceptable to me.

As for the points put forward by the minister, I feel it would be more appropriate to deal with them in committee in the discussion which the committee stage is designed to afford. I wish to conclude at this time merely by thanking the minister for the consideration which he has given the matter, and for the proposal which he has made. I should like also to express on my own behalf, and I am sure on behalf of all members of the house who are interested in this matter, our appreciation to the various organizations throughout the country which have done so great a service in arousing the people of the nation to an awareness of the problem. Some of them have been mentioned before, and I have a partial list here. I should like to refer to the federated women's institutes of Canada, the federation of home and school associations, the Ontario teachers federation, parent-teacher federations across the country, and one of the latest organizations to express its view, the national council of the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire. To those organizations, as well as to those which I have not had time to mention, I wish to express on my own behalf, and I am sure on behalf of all hon. members, our appreciation of the work they have done.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Portrayal of crimes by pictures in magazines, etc., tending to induce violence.

Mr. Abbott: Stand.

Mr. Fulton: I take it to be the minister's desire that it should stand at this stage?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: If so, I will ask you, Mr. Chairman, to report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock, and the hour reserved for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Soldier Settlement and Veterans Land Act—

545. To provide for the cost of administration of Veterans Land Act; soldier settlement and British family settlement, $4,447,443.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Chairman, two weeks ago tonight, when we started my estimates, hon. members gave expression to thoughts covering a wide field on the first item. Perhaps I might take advantage in like manner of item 545 to attempt, in so far as I can, to reply to some of the questions that were asked then, and to which I requested an opportunity to give further study. I do not want to be accused of holding up my own estimates, but I should like to answer those questions in recognition of the co-operative manner in which members from all sides of the house assisted in getting a large number of items through two weeks ago.

The hon. member for Wentworth raised the question of paying transportation of veterans who are admitted under class 5 (a) of our treatment regulations. I understood him to say that if a veteran were admitted to an outside hospital in an emergency, and later transferred to one of our own hospitals, he was required to pay his own transportation. I should like to correct this impression. If, because of requiring emergent treatment, he is admitted to an outside hospital and we accept him for treatment under class 5 (a), we not only pay his bill at the outside hospital, but we also provide transportation if we find it necessary to bring him to one of our own institutions. Whilst the regulations in the past may not have been very clear in this regard, recently instructions have been issued clarifying the whole situation.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and many other members discussed the training of merchant seamen. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is reported in Hansard as having said that only 47 out of 518 applicants had been accepted for vocational training. As of September 30, 1949, the actual facts are that out of 770 applications received 118 were rejected because of being over the age provided, 100 were withdrawn, 317 were approved, and of the remaining 235, 195 were declined on the ground that they were not eligible through not having left the sea, the remaining 40 being in process for one reason and another.

One other perhaps minor matter was that the hon. member for Vancouver East stated to the house that he had been informed that investigations under the War Veterans Allowance Act were performed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I find that this is only in extremely isolated areas where it would be impracticable and unwarrantable to undergo the expense of sending in a departmental official, such as the Northwest Territories, the Yukon and similar regions. I might add, I am sure hon. members would agree with me that if we happened to be in such territory we could think of no more acceptable bearer of veterans' benefits than a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

In reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) with regard to the number of applications for payment under the war veterans allowance assistance fund, I will give the following information. Total applications received to October 7, 1949, 3,155; the total applications declined, 740. The total number of applications approved to date amounts to 2,415. The financial commitment on the part of the department for those approved applications is $160,747. It will be noted that covers approximately a six-months period and, I should add, the best six months of the year. The six worst months in this connection are still to come.

The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) raised a question of beneficiaries under the Veterans Insurance Act. As I explained the other day, it was the intention of this act to provide protection for a veteran and his immediate relatives. I now state, however, that the department has currently under consideration a request to amend the regulations which would extend the list of contingent beneficiaries to include uncles, aunts and related family.

In the discussion of liquid assets of war veterans allowance recipients, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) made reference to a specific problem. The problem was that if a veteran in receipt of war veterans allowance owns a house and sells that house, his liquid assets are increased and may be in excess of that set by the regulations of the war veterans allowance board. Of course, that is the case.

The hon. member requested that the veteran be allowed to retain the proceeds from the sale of his house, without jeopardizing his war veterans allowance, for a certain period provided he intends to reinvest in another house. I believe that interprets the hon. member's suggestion. On investigation, I find that that is the principle followed by the board in dealing with such cases. No account is taken by the board of such liquid assets for a period of one or two years, according to the circumstances. In other words, the veteran is permitted to retain the proceeds from the sale of his house for a certain period, for the purpose of buying another house, without being penalized as far as his war veterans allowance is concerned.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) made some suggestions with regard to settlement of veterans on provincial lands, particularly as that problem is related to British Columbia. I am glad to inform the hon. member that working arrangements between the provincial authorities and the Veterans Land Act have been developed to a marked degree. I would suggest that the member contact the director of the Veterans Land Act, who will be only too glad to go into this whole problem with him and explain some of the projects in which his branch and the provincial authorities are jointly concerned.

Hon. members will recall that some questions were raised in connection with the recovery rate of $9.75 per day charged by this department for treatment at our hospitals. It is obvious that considerable misunderstanding exists in connection with that, and I should like to place the facts on record in order that this matter may be better understood by all concerned.

In the first place, I wish to emphasize once again that $9.75 is an all-inclusive charge for hospitalization, including drugs, medicines, and medical attention by the leading physicians and surgeons of this country who are associated with the treatment services of this department. This rate is based upon the actual costs of operating the department's active treatment hospitals, and if anyone has any idea that this is an excessive charge, I should like to give him the actual figures for the cost of a normal appendectomy performed in an urban hospital with which I have recently communicated in order to obtain a comparison.

The hospital concerned quoted the cost as follows: Ten days' hospitalization at $6 per day, $60; drugs, extras, etc., $28; services of an anaesthetist, $15; surgeon's fee, $100; The total cost is $203. As opposed to this, the cost in a D.V.A. hospital would be ten days at $9.75 per day or a total of $97.50.

It was stated in this house during the previous discussion on my estimates that veterans had decided to obtain treatment at a civilian hospital rather than pay $9.75 per day in a D.V.A. institution. This is quite incorrect, as any veteran with entitlement receives treatment from this department entirely free. If the veteran has no entitlement then the department has no authority to treat that veteran in the hospital. The exception to the latter is that a veteran can be treated in a D.V.A. hospital in case of an emergency, such as an acute illness or accident which occurs near the D.V.A. hospital. In such cases, the veteran is theoretically supposed to pay $9.75 per day, but departmental regulations provide that the cost of treatment of these classes of patients shall be recouped by the department "wherever possible".

This department does give treatment to a considerable number of individuals at the request of provincial workmen's compensation boards, the Canadian Paraplegic Association, foreign governments and other federal government departments, upon repayment of the current recovery rate of $9.75 by those organizations, not the individual veteran. In addition, our treatment facilities are available to the Department of National Defence and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for treatment of their forces at the recovery rate of payment.

A question has been asked by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) as to the revenue received for the treatment of patients. In answer, I will give the amounts received for the first six months of the current fiscal year, ending September 30, 1949. The total collected was $386,015.62, of which $367,347.21 was collected from organizations such as provincial workmen's compensation boards, the Canadian Paraplegic Association, and so forth, but does not include the amount yet to be recovered from the Department of National Defence and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The difference between these two figures, namely $18,668.41, represents the total amount collected by the department for the first six months of this year for hospitalization of individual veterans. However, I am given to understand that most of this money is paid by insurance companies and the various prepaid medical schemes, inasmuch as a large number of the veterans concerned appear to be covered by protective medical insurance policies. I am quite sure, therefore, that all hon. members will realize that in actual practice hospitalization of veterans, other than those who have entitlement or who are sponsored by some organization, is not extensive and that very little cash is collected from the veterans themselves.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) made some comments the other day with regard to the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act, but on the whole my department has found that the branch managers of the chartered banks now possess a good general knowledge of the act, the regulations and the procedure. When in difficulty they undoubtedly refer the issue to their head office, and in all cases the services of the Department of Finance are available for advice and information. It must be borne in mind that the bank is obligated under the act to treat every application for a loan with the same care as is exercised in the conduct of ordinary bank business. Consequently, an opinion as to whether the venture is sound must vary as between individual bank officials in different localities.

I should like to add also that the responsible minister for the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act is the Minister of Finance, but I would advise the hon. member for Kootenay West that I will refer the matter to that minister in order to see if it is considered desirable to communicate with the various head offices of the banks to ensure that all necessary regulations are available to the branch managers.

If I remember correctly, I think that covers most of the miscellaneous points. Those that I now come to deal more specifically with pensions. The hon. member for Cape Breton South, who has been a member of many committees on veterans affairs, referred to divorce as applied to pensioners, and to one particular case wherein the Canadian pension commission do not pay additional pension on behalf of a wife. He mentioned a conversation with the Minister of Justice on this subject.

I assure the hon. member that the chairman of the commission had brought this subject to my attention a long time ago and has done so consistently since, and it is most actively being considered as a follow-up to the report of the subcommittee to the veterans affairs committee of 1948. Some hon. members who are here tonight were members of the committee in 1948. The chairman was the hon. member for Grey-Bruce, the parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister. That subcommittee brought in a report which at that time, as hon. members will recall, did not make any specific recommendation for a solution, but we are still working on it.

Mr. Brooks: I do not think they were dealing with that particular point. I think the question which was before that committee had to do with divorces in England.

Mr. Gregg: I think hon. members will agree that this particular point was part of the terms of reference of that subcommittee.

Mr. Brooks: I was a member of the committee. I do not recall that.

Mr. Gregg: Another case was mentioned by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and I will quote what he said as reported at page 606 of Hansard, column 1:

> A boy joined the air force early in the war, went through all the training, and qualified as a pilot. He was posted to one of the civilian flying schools as an instructor-pilot. My information is that he did not ask for that posting, he was sent there. While on a joy-ride one night he fell off a hay wagon and his skull was fractured.

He was refused pension for disability and my hon. friend suggests that it is our responsibility to award one to him. It happens that the commission knows this case well. A review of this claim indicates that the veteran volunteered for duty as a flying instructor at a civilian school in Canada and was granted leave of absence without pay for that purpose. He signed an application form dated June 5, 1943, asking to be released from the R.C.A.F. for nine months for employment as a staff pilot, and on January 18, 1944, this leave without pay was extended indefinitely. These civilian flying schools were provided with insurance covering disability or death on a scale equal to that of the Pension Act. Unfortunately, in this case the disability was not incurred while on flying duty but as the result of an off-duty accident on the evening of August 26, 1944, when he fell off a hayrack while going on a picnic and suffered a head injury.

The commission, of course, here as elsewhere, must be governed by the Pension Act in adjudicating upon claims, and in this one ruled that, having regard to section 11 of the act, the disability was not pensionable as it was incurred while on leave of absence without pay.

The hon. member for Acadia touched upon a few points affecting the Pension Act regarding which I should like to give him the information promised. He referred to the deletion in 1948 of the term "wilfully and deliberately concealed" from section 11 (1) (c) of the act and asked how many cases had been reviewed and how many veterans had benefited as a result of that change.

The chairman of the commission advises me that, ever since the amendment in 1948, the commission has actively pursued a review of each known case and that at the 11th instant the records show that out of 2,012 cases reviewed, the following decisions were rendered:

Pre-enlistment aggravated, pension for entire disability	1,628
Pre-enlistment recorded, aggravated, not pensioned for entire disability	292
Pre-enlistment obvious, not pensioned for entire disability	86
Entitlement granted as incurred during service	6
Total	2,012

Hon. members will recall that those two words "recorded" and "obvious" were inserted in place of those I mentioned a moment ago.

The two other pension points raised by the hon. member had to do with disabilities of pre-enlistment origin and the question of the benefit of the doubt. I am sure hon. members realize that where there is evidence of pre-enlistment origin, the commission must take cognizance of the fact. They must determine whether the injury or disease or aggravation thereof resulting in disability or death was attributable to or incurred during service. That is a statutory requirement.

With regard to the benefit of the doubt, I am sure the commission welcomes the provision in section 63 and takes full advantage of it. There must be a doubt, however, before the commission can exercise their discretion.

Each day this section is invoked on many occasions, but we do not hear so often when pension is granted after that study.

The hon. member for Kamloops made some interesting observations with regard to adopted children, and they are being made the subject of renewed study. I would, however, point out once again that the commission must be governed by the statutory requirements. Section 22 governs payment to children and subsection 3 thereof states:

> No pension shall be paid to or in respect of a child unless such child was acknowledged and maintained by a member of the forces in respect of whom a pension is claimed at the time of the appearance of the injury or disease which caused the disability for which he is pensioned.

That portion of the section deals with any children adopted after the time of acquiring the disability. Then of course the section concludes with these words:

> Provided, however, that a legitimate child born subsequent to the appearance of such injury or disease shall be entitled to a pension.

Subsection 4 gives the commission discretionary power in very special cases and they are glad to exercise that discretion.

The hon. member for Kootenay West made some kindly references to the work of my department, for which I should like to thank him. I can assure him that my officials sincerely appreciate them. He advanced the suggestion that appeal boards of the commission should sit in the smaller places and, as he said, "show the flag". His suggestion is good and the chairman of the commission advises me that the policy is to hold hearings at any centre where the number of cases to be heard and the accommodation available warrant such action. This week one sat for two days in Kingston and one for the same two days in North Bay. At present the commission is considering one for the interior of British Columbia.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra made a special plea on behalf of educational benefits to the children of those members of the forces who lost their lives. I am sure we all feel strongly on this question. I take it that what he has in mind is something beyond the provision in the Pension Act which allows of the continuation of additional pension to the age of 21, where the child is satisfactorily pursuing a course of higher education and the parent is without adequate resources. The national organizations of ex-servicemen, and other organizations as well, have advanced similar pleas; and, I need hardly say, they meet with my great personal sympathy and are receiving study on the part of the government.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin asked:

> How many veterans have had their pensions reduced since January 1, 1949, and how many have been reduced by 25 per cent or more?

I trust the following will meet his request. World war I: disability pensions reduced after medical re-examination during period January 1, 1949, to September 30, 1949, inclusive, 47. Of the above, the number reduced by 25 per cent or more is four. In all these cases pension had not been stabilized as the assessments were adjusted following treatment and had not been in effect for three years or more.

World war II: the statistics are not available and would involve the review of thousands and thousands of review cards. The hon. member will appreciate that, following discharge from service or treatment, disability is assessed and pension put in payment. Initial awards are in many cases generous, particularly following surgery. The Canadian pension commission reviews these cases and pension is awarded in accordance with the extent of pensionable disability as found on medical re-examination from time to time.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin also asked:

> When a pensioner has been re-boarded, is there any court of appeal or tribunal to which he can appeal if he feels he has been aggrieved by the finding of the board?

The question is not clear. If it relates to a re-board for medical examination, the pensioner can apply to the local pension medical examiner. If the case is one wherein the veteran has appealed his claim before an appeal board of the commission, then the decision of that appeal board is final under section 52 (4).

There is, however, provision in section 58 (4) of the act whereby an application for leave to reopen the claim may be considered by a new appeal board of the commission subject to the statutory requirements of that section.

In answer to a number of questions I said that, for the information of all hon. members, I would try to put on the record as briefly as possible an outline of the procedure in effect by the Canadian pension commission in dealing with claims generally under the Pension Act. I must apologize to the committee for taking the time, but I think it may be worth it.

Let us start at the point of demobilization. An arrangement was entered into whereby the proceedings of each medical board on discharge from the service were forwarded to the pension commission. These proceedings or records were reviewed by the medical advisory staff and, if a disability was shown to exist, the case was prepared and submitted to the commissioners for decision. It is significant to note that this action was taken by the commission without any application whatever on the part of the veteran.

Where entitlement was conceded by the commission, that the condition was incurred or aggravated during service, notification was sent to the pension medical examiner in the district where the veteran resided to call him in for pension examination. This included a complete physical examination and a reference to the departmental specialist for reports and opinions when these were indicated. When this information reached Ottawa, it was reviewed by the medical advisers before submission to the commissioners and the disability was assessed and the file passed to the chief treasury officer to implement the commission's decision and get pension into payment.

It will be appreciated that in dealing with claims the commission came across a great number wherein it was clearly established on the record that the disability existed prior to service and, as a matter of fact, in thousands of cases was recorded on the attestation form. Where the review of the documents indicated no worsening due to service, the commission ruled "pre-enlistment condition, not aggravated during service". The decision rendered in that regard is known as an initial one and the applicant has the right to proceed further with his claim; and this is the procedure provided by the statute.

One, the applicant has the right to renew his application before the commission with additional evidence. Actually he is not limited to one renewal but may come back as often as he desires in an endeavour to establish his claim. The commission thoroughly and sympathetically reviews the application in the light of the history contained on attestation, that which is completed during service and, now, the post-discharge history, and renders a renewal decision.

Two, the applicant has the further right, when his claim is not upheld, to request an appearance before an appeal board of the commission sitting in his own locality. The claim is heard by three commissioners, none of whom has adjudicated upon his claim previously. It reaches them as an entirely new one and their decision is based upon the evidence adduced at the hearing by the applicant, his advocate and his witnesses. Incidentally, the applicant and his witnesses are compensated for out-of-pocket expenses and lost time when attending such hearings. These appeal boards of the commission travel throughout Canada and usually two appeal boards, in different centres, are sitting each week, and I am happy to report that most cases are heard within a short time after their certification as being in readiness.

Three, the Pension Act states: "The decision of an appeal board is final." There is provision in section 58 (4) of the act, however, whereby the commission may entertain an application based upon any error in the decision of the appeal board by reason of evidence not having been presented or otherwise. Such an application is heard by three commissioners who are designated by the chairman for the purpose. Should the board grant leave to reopen the claim, it immediately constitutes a new one in so far as procedure is concerned. That is to say, it proceeds to initial hearing and, if necessary, from there to renewal and appeal.

Hon. members will be interested to know the Pension Act provides that, whenever an application is not wholly granted, the commission:

> Shall promptly notify the applicant, in writing, of its decision, stating the grounds therefor, and shall inform such applicant that he may renew his claim, before the commission on the submission of additional evidence, or before an appeal board of the commission in person or by or with a representative, with or without additional evidence, and that he may have the assistance of the veterans' bureau free of charge or of a service bureau of a veteran organization, or other representative at his own expense, in the preparation and presentation of his application.

Each decision rendered by the commission contains the reasons leading to the decision and, when the application is not granted, the applicant has, generally speaking, full information regarding the grounds on which his claim was not granted.

I might add that the veterans' bureau, which is a branch of my department, has a chief pensions advocate and staff at Ottawa, and in each district office of the department there is an advocate, or there are advocates who are, generally speaking, barristers, and are specially trained in the preparation and presentation of claims. They have access to all the documents completed during service and, of course, to the records on the departmental files. This service is rendered without any charge whatsoever to the applicant. In addition to this, the service bureaux of some of the national organizations of ex-servicemen render very excellent and much appreciated service in the advancement of claims.

I have given an outline of the procedure in effect when an applicant claims entitlement for a disability and to complete my statement it might be well to give an indication regarding the procedure in effect in arriving at the amount of pension to be paid for a service accepted disability. Previously

I have indicated that examinations are carried out by pension medical examiners in the various districts, and wherever possible, and I am referring to world war II claims, the commission endeavours to make the award of pension permanent.

Some complaints, but as a matter of fact relatively few, reach my office, and no doubt have been received by hon. members, that an award of pension has been reduced, and a word in that regard might be helpful. The commission, in their initial awards, had a general policy of being generous. I am speaking now of world war II. I will deal later with world war I. It was their desire to make sure the pensioner was fully compensated, and particularly so in the early stages when the injury or disease imposed a greater disability, because it must be understood that in many instances there was an improvement with time. Re-examinations were called for, generally speaking in a year or so, and the disability assessed in accordance with the degree found on examination at that time.

There are instances where the pensioner has complained regarding his assessment and there is provision in the Pension Act whereby such a complaint can be heard by the commission. The general policy is to endeavour to adjust the complaint locally and, if such cannot be done, the next stage is through consultation with the medical advisers of the commission at head office. When satisfaction is not reached, the case is referred to the chairman who, in accordance with the provisions of section 7 (3) of the act, arranges to have one or more commissioners hear the complaint in the pensioner's home locality, and I am advised this procedure has met with very great success and satisfaction to all concerned.

I am happy to bring these remarks to the attention of hon. members because although, fortunately, the minister is given no discretionary powers in the Pension Act—and I say "fortunately" advisedly—nevertheless I am closely in touch with the work of the commission and the commissioners, all of whom are ex-servicemen with a good record of service. They are charged with a very heavy responsibility, one which I feel they discharge with sympathy and understanding, but they cannot go beyond the statutory provisions. There are now nearly two hundred thousand disability and dependent pensioners, and the monthly liability for these awards closely approximates eight million dollars.

Mr. Green: I asked the minister for figures respecting disability decisions in which entitlement was refused on the ground of a pre-enlistment condition not aggravated by service. He promised to obtain those figures for me.

Mr. Gregg: I will have to ask the hon. member's patience in this regard, because this question involves a tremendous amount of searching. However, I shall undertake during the course of the session, and as early as possible, to have that information for him.

Mr. Lennard: At the outset of his remarks the minister referred to a question I had asked earlier regarding the hospitalization of veterans under class 5(a) for veterans having meritorious service. Does his reply this evening indicate a decision later than the one set out in a letter from the deputy minister on October 7?

Mr. Gregg: I can assure the hon. member that my reply tonight is up to date, because in preparing it I consulted with the deputy minister.

Mr. Lennard: Is it a decision made within the last day or so?

Mr. Gregg: The point covered in my remarks dealt more particularly with bringing a veteran from what we call a civilian hospital to a D.V.A. hospital, when he was taken to the former hospital as a result of an emergency. I think the hon. member has in mind the case where the veteran did not go into a civilian hospital.

Mr. Lennard: No, where he did, in an emergency.

Mr. Gregg: The hon. member will note when he reads my remarks that I stated we have full authority to pay his expenses in, and whatever expenses he may have incurred legitimately at the other hospital.

Mr. Lennard: Would it be an extreme case of emergency?

Mr. Gregg: I believe I would be correct in saying it would be a case where circumstances were such that it would be difficult or impossible to get the veteran into one of our own hospitals.

Mr. Pearkes: This particular item deals with the administration of the Veterans Land Act. When we were discussing the first item I had advanced some observations with respect to the administration of the small holdings sections of the act, and had called attention to the fact that a year or so ago the committee on veterans affairs had recommended that the amount of small holdings be reduced to half an acre. Since then the amount of land required for a veteran under the small holdings section of the act was increased to approximately three acres. The result of that has been that a great many veterans who have taken up small holdings have found it impossible to maintain that amount of land, particularly when they have more or less permanent jobs in a city.

In most sections of the country three acres is not enough to sustain a family. The small holdings section of the act was not intended to provide a means of permanent livelihood for a veteran but rather to augment what he might be earning from his regular trade, or to augment some pension he might be receiving.

There seems to be some misunderstanding as to the actual extent of land a veteran must have before he may have the benefit of the small holdings section. I was always under the impression, until a few days ago, that it now had to be three acres; but I was informed that it has to be three acres provided the value of the land is less than $500 an acre. If it is more than that amount the extent of land may be reduced to two acres. Even then the director under the Veterans Land Act has some discretion in the matter, and may reduce either a three-acre or two-acre holding by ten per cent, if he considers such reduction desirable in order that a veteran may have the benefit of a particular small holding.

Furthermore if a veteran is drawing a pension and has a war disability which makes it impossible for him to operate two or three acres, as the case may be, at the discretion of the director an even smaller extent of land may be allocated to him.

I do not believe those conditions are generally known, and I would ask the minister whether the figures I have given concerning the extent of land are correct. If it is recognized that either because of the price of the land, or because of the disability from which a veteran may be suffering, the three acres may be reduced to a smaller amount, then I believe it would be in the interests of veterans who are taking advantage of this small holdings section in the act that the extent of land be reduced for all. If a man wishes to take up a small holding outside the limits of a city there are certain restrictions imposed so that it will not clash with some Central Mortgage and Housing scheme. It is therefore necessary that there be still greater flexibility. It should not be necessary for a man to take up more land than he can operate profitably and keep in a suitable condition. When land is left idle, weeds develop and become a menace to the people in the immediate neighbourhood.

I should like to ask another question with regard to the length of time that must elapse before a veteran can obtain a clear title to his land. I understand the period varies from ten to fifteen years according to the risk, if I may use that word. A man who is getting on in years is not considered as good a risk as a younger man and therefore must pay up in a shorter period of time.

There are many veterans who have been able to meet all their payments well ahead of the period they contracted for but are not able to obtain clear title to their land until that original period has elapsed. Recently the Department of National Defence wrote to many veterans across the land asking them if they would consider rejoining the services. I have had letters from some of these men who have taken up small holdings and they tell me that they would be willing to rejoin the services but they do not feel they can do so because they have not free title to the land they have taken up. They do not want to be saddled with a home in one part of the country and perhaps be stationed in another part when they rejoin the services. A man might have to transfer his family from Alberta to Ontario for instance. If a man who had met all the payments could get clear title I think he would be more disposed to rejoin the services as they desire.

I presume the time limit was placed there to prevent speculation, but surely after a reasonable time has elapsed the opportunity or desire to speculate in connection with a small holding would have passed. Could consideration be given to granting full title to these lands at an earlier date? If it is not considered expedient to do it in all cases, I would ask that it be done in the case of the man who intimates that he intends to rejoin the services. At the present time a man who has met his payments may still have to wait some years before his original contract is completed.

Mr. Gregg: The first point raised by my hon. friend was in connection with the acreage and I know this is a matter of interest to many hon. members as it is to us. As it stands at the present time it is three acres where the price of the land and a suitable water supply is less than $500 per acre, and two acres where the price of the land and a suitable water supply cost more than $500 per acre. The hon. member was right when he said that the director has discretionary power up to ten per cent.

Replying to the second point raised by my hon. friend, may I say that the veteran on a small holding may get full title at any time provided he pays the full amount of the cost to the director. After ten years he would have the benefit of the 23½ per cent discount which amounts to approximately $2,300. I am sure that the motive in placing a limit of ten years was to discourage speculation.

In his third question the hon. member has put his finger on one of a number of rather difficult points that have turned up in the administration of this act. I am glad to say that that is one of the things that will be coming forward for consideration in the amendments announced in the speech from the throne. Those amendments are all of a category to try to eliminate bottlenecks and the Department of Justice is now studying them. I hope to have a resolution on the order paper before long covering these amendments.

Mr. Pearkes: Did the minister say that a veteran could get free title at any time?

Mr. Gregg: If he pays the full amount of the cost of the property and is prepared to forgo his conditional grant or discount.

Mr. Quelch: When this act was first introduced and was before the veterans committee of the house it received pretty well the support of all hon. members. I think most of us felt that it was a good act, at least we considered it to be generous in comparison with the old Soldier Settlement Act. I remember when the act was being explained we were told that it was based upon the experience that in order for a farmer to be able to maintain his land he should have at least a forty per cent equity in it at the time he purchased. Therefore the veteran was required to pay a certain amount down in order that he might have approximately that equity in his place.

In 1945 there were many veterans anxious to settle on the land but quite often the Department of Veterans Affairs went out of its way to discourage them. I have had many talks with the superintendents in Calgary and Edmonton and they said that this was done because it was hard to get good farms, because there was a shortage of equipment at that time and because it was felt that prices were going to come down and it would be of benefit to the veteran to hold back for a year or two. In some cases they actually told the veteran that he would have to work on a farm for a year or two before he would be allowed to go on a place of his own, and in many cases the veteran had been reared and had lived on a farm all his life.

Apparently the intention was to make it difficult for the veteran to go on the land. They were told that if they would wait two or three years the price of machinery and equipment would come down, but just the opposite happened. In 1945 you could buy a John Deere tractor for $1,800, whereas in 1948 the price had gone up to $2,700. The result was that when these veterans finally tried to get in under the scheme practically the whole of their $1,200 grant had been wiped out by the increase in prices. I think the minister will agree that was a most unfortunate state of affairs. Mind you, I am not blaming the Department of Veterans Affairs because there is no doubt that at that time they thought prices were going to fall. In 1945 I do not think anybody expected that we would have the kind of price increase that we had from 1945 to 1948, but it was a very unfortunate situation so far as the veterans were concerned.

I recall that during wartime the Minister of Finance told us what had happened to the veterans of the first war, that when they came back they found that prices had become inflated and they suffered the consequences. The Minister of Finance said they were going to see that the same thing did not happen to veterans of the last war. It has happened even to a greater degree than it happened after world war I. I say the result of the inflation of prices wiped out entirely the amount of the grant that was given for the purchase of machinery and equipment.

Of course it also hurt the veteran who had to buy land, because by 1948 the price of land had gone up so high it was almost impossible for a veteran to buy a good half section of land for $6,000 or $4,800, with the result that he had to put up a considerable amount of his own money in addition to the money he got from the Department of Veterans Affairs. Consequently he had very little money left with which to buy equipment. In order to get a start many of them assumed obligations which are making it quite difficult for them at the present time.

I will be quite frank and say that in so far as the veterans in my district are concerned the vast majority of them are doing quite well. I think they have been fortunate. They have had good crops, and the prices of the things they have to sell have been good, so generally speaking in the district where I reside it is quite a happy picture. I wonder if the minister could tell us what the general picture is throughout Canada. I refer only to veterans engaged in full-time farming. For example, will he tell us how many veterans, engaged in full-time farming under the Veterans Land Act, have made their current payments? How many, if any, have paid up in full? How many are in arrears, and how many, if any, have signed quit claims? Perhaps the minister might be able also to tell the committee how many veterans have taken advantage of order in council 4559 which deals with the crop share payment agreement.

Mr. Gregg: While I am getting those figures I should like to say that, while I was not here during the period in 1945 which the hon. member mentioned, from observation outside I can say—and I am assured by my officials—that there was no active discouragement of veterans going on the land. It is true that now, as then, those who administered the Veterans Land Act have perhaps been prudent or cautious, whichever word you choose, from their experience with the old soldier settlement board. I am not going to say whether or not they have been too cautious. There would be differences of opinion on that. At any rate, it is one feature of our rehabilitation plan which is still very much alive.

Today our great university training plan is on the way out. Next spring the main body of students will be through. Our vocational training is practically through. Veterans have been taking up professional loans in their small businesses, and so on, but a steady stream of young men and women are still finding their way into farming even four years after the war. I think it is only natural because in 1945, when demobilization took place so rapidly, a great many young veterans were offered jobs which provided more money than they were getting before the war. Some of them had never worked before. They jumped into employment and after a while began to wonder whether that was the type of work for which they were best equipped. Perhaps they came from the farm and had some youthful experience in farming.

A number of those, whose wives are in accord with the idea, are now coming forward, wanting to go into full-time farming, a few into commercial fishing, and many of course retaining their jobs under small holdings. The more extensive figures wanted will be given, but perhaps the committee might be interested in a brief summary I made for myself, which I have called statistical highlights. The total number of veterans who have had assistance towards rehabilitation under the Veterans Land Act up to August 31 has been 43,986.

Mr. Wright: Small holdings?

Mr. Gregg: Everything—farming, commercial fishing, small holdings. The total amount of the expenditure approved by way of loans is $214,781,000 in round figures. The number of applications approved for full-time farming is 21,818, and side by side with that one may put the number of applications approved for full-time farming on dominion and provincial lands—we keep that separate for obvious reasons—which is 4,158. That is in addition to the 21,818 I have mentioned. Applications approved for commercial fishing total 719. That is not a large figure, but I can assure the committee that it is serving a very useful purpose for our veterans along our seacoasts.

[Mr. Gregg.]

The number of applications approved for small holdings is 20,890. That includes all small holdings, both individual and incorporated within subdivisions.

Mr. Green: That is about half.

Mr. Lennard: How many of them were half-acre small holdings before the act was changed?

Mr. Gregg: It is estimated that of the 20,890 small holdings approximately 40 per cent would be on the half-acre holdings within subdivisions.

Mr. Lennard: Were the half-acre small holdings becoming so popular and requests for them so numerous that the government more or less made the decision to change the act because they feared the number would be so great that they could not handle it?

Mr. Gregg: No, Mr. Chairman. I should like to try to deal with that point later in all its aspects, because I know hon. members are interested in it. But the suggestion submitted was not the real reason at all, as I understand it. The total number of houses constructed or under construction under this act is 10,132. That includes new houses that may have been built on small holdings, for commercial fishermen, or for farmers. Of course some of the farm houses were there when they purchased their farms. The percentage of houses now under construction, where the veteran is his own contractor, is 65·2. The percentage of payments and still owing in all categories up to April 1, 1949, this year is 6·3. The 6·3 per cent does not include prepayments made by individual veterans amounting in total to $1,748,000. In other words, the $1,748,000 constitutes moneys that have been paid over and above what was actually due. Profit from revenue on backlog property held by the Veterans Land Act administration, less carrying charges on that property, is $719,737. That is property that was held in between the time it was purchased some years ago by the Veterans Land Act and the time it was disposed of to the veterans, having been rented and been a source of revenue.

The total number of the Veterans Land Act staff is 1,387.

The number of contracts cancelled in all categories is 1,656. Does that answer my hon. friend's question?

Mr. Quelch: I asked the minister whether he could say how many veterans have signed crop share agreements under order in council 4559?

Mr. Gregg: Eight hundred twenty-four.

Mr. Quelch: There is one other point I should like to raise. At the time this act was first under consideration, many members urged that the merchant marine should be brought under the act. At that time, the Minister of Veterans Affairs pointed out that at the conclusion of hostilities there would be a shortage of seamen and, therefore, the department did not want to encourage them to leave the sea and go on the land. The minister stated quite definitely, however, that a few years after the war it might be possible to widen the scope of the act to include merchant seamen. I was wondering whether or not that question is now under consideration. I understand there are quite a few seamen looking for work, and no doubt they would like to have the opportunity of coming under this act.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I am speaking now from memory, but I cannot recall any demand on the part of merchant seamen, or anybody on their behalf, for this particular benefit. There was a request for vocational training, and that, to some degree at least, has been fulfilled. I am assured by my deputy minister that he has not had, and I certainly have not had many inquiries for the benefits of the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. Green: I presume that is because the seamen know they are ineligible.

Mr. Quelch: That is the reason. The seamen know they are not eligible now, but certainly many representations were made by members of the committee asking that they be included. If the minister feels there will be very few anxious to take advantage of it, then the government would have very much less responsibility and I would think the government would be more willing to bring them under it.

Mr. Brooks: In that connection, I might state that the Canadian merchant navy representatives appeared before the veterans affairs committee, and the following is a report of their request:

> Mr. Chairman, we ask your committee to recommend to parliament that the veterans of the merchant navy be given the benefits of one, the vocational and educational grants; two, Veterans Land Act; three, rehabilitation grants; four, housing legislation; five, civil service preference.

I know that the merchant marine did make a very special request for the benefits of the Veterans Land Act, and I think that they made the request not only at this particular meeting of the veterans affairs committee but at a number of other committee meetings which I attended.

Mr. Gregg: That is true, as part of the background of the request that the merchant seamen be treated in all respects as ex-members of the armed forces.

Mr. Harkness: I should like the minister to clarify the situation in regard to mineral rights on lands taken up under the Soldier Settlement Act. The minister will remember that not long after he took over the department I saw him in connection with this matter and he succeeded in straightening it out very well. I should like to take this opportunity to thank him for that. Regulations had been in effect for many years which prevented a veteran who had taken up land under the Soldier Settlement Act from obtaining the mineral rights to that land. Those regulations were changed later enabling him to get those rights.

During the past few months, I have had complaints from two men in connection with the fees charged them in order to secure those rights, and the difficulties they had in connection with them. One man apparently had to pay two fees. In this man's case, the land had been in the family before. It had belonged to his father and the veteran had purchased it from some member of the family under the Soldier Settlement Act. This man lost the opportunity to sell his mineral rights or lease them during the oil boom in the Turner valley. He now has to pay these two fees, and as a result feels rather annoyed. Could the minister explain what these fees are and what the necessity for them is?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for his remarks. As the matter stands now we are in a position where we are able to return to the veteran, under the old soldier settlement board, all the mineral rights if the director of the soldier settlement board was in possession of those rights. I believe that is working out well in so far as it possibly can work. The fee charged was $25 to cover the cost of searching and drawing up documents—that sort of thing.

Mr. Harkness: For what was the second fee charged?

Mr. Gregg: I do not know of any second fee.

Mr. Harkness: Just on that point, could the minister tell us how many soldier settlers did obtain their mineral rights?

Mr. Gregg: I have not the figures here but I will get them for the hon. member.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I should like to ask the minister if the rights of the soldier settlers at Montney in the Peace river country in British Columbia are being protected with respect to the oil rights on the land which has been taken over from the Indian reserve? There are 38 settlers in the neighbourhood of Fort St. John who have been very profitably settled on the land. The land having been taken over from an Indian reserve, it carried, of course, the oil and mineral rights. It would only be proper that those rights should go to the returned veterans who have now taken up land and have cultivated it. I understand the department made a deal with the Indians whereby the Indians were given other land back in the mountains suitable for trapping and so forth, in return for this fine agricultural area for soldier settlement which is now being so successfully operated. I may say that oil is being found in that vicinity and it might very well be that these soldiers are in the centre of a great oil basin.

Mr. Gregg: May I ask the hon. member whether that is the Bobtail reserve?

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): That is the Montney reserve near the Alaska highway in the neighbourhood of Fort St. John.

Mr. Gregg: I think I should like to look into that matter and be sure of my answer.

Mr. Brooks: Before the item carries, there is another question I wish to ask the minister. It is an old perennial, and I am sure if the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) were here he would ask the question. It has to do with the old soldier settlers. As the minister knows, there has been an agitation in practically every veterans affairs committee to have the soldier settlers given title to their land.

It is not necessary to review the history again. These men settled there after the first war. Many of them settled on land which was submarginal and they have not been able to make their payments. These men have raised their families and their sons have gone overseas. Many of them are now over sixty years of age and have not title to their land. There is no possible chance of their ever gaining title. I understand that the number of these men is now less than 2,000, whereas originally, I think, it was over 25,000. Of that 2,000, many of the men have paid the price of their land two or three times over. I think there are only about 21 who have no equity in the land at all, if I remember correctly the statements that were made before the veterans affairs committee. I should like to ask the minister if there is any disposition on the part of his department or of the government to include in the amendments to the Veterans Land Act a gift to these old soldier settlers of the titles to these lands. After all these years I think that could well be done. I do not think it would establish a precedent. I know that in our veterans affairs committee we would sometimes be met with the argument that it would establish a precedent; but the Canadian Legion has recommended it on many occasions and I am sure that the sympathy of all the soldiers, whether they have paid for their own lands in previous years or not, is with these men. If the department is not already doing so, I should like to ask the minister if they would sympathetically consider granting the titles of these lands to these old soldiers who have lived on them for so many years, who now are old, and who have no title.

Mr. Gregg: The department has considered the matter, but not in exactly the same wholesale fashion that my hon. friend indicates. Perhaps he missed it, but when our estimates were up for discussion before, as reported at page 623 of Hansard, in the second column, I gave a fairly detailed picture of how the matter stood now on the basis of doing it piecemeal. For the reasons given there, we feel that this method is obviating any hardship and is doing it better than it would be done by making a wholesale, sudden forgiveness.

Mr. Brooks: Doing things piecemeal seems to be a habit of the government.

Mr. Gregg: My hon. friend may not agree with me, but he knows as well as I do that in his own province a great many of the old veterans under the soldier settlement board are getting cleared off in this fashion. Last year there was an item of $150,000 in the estimates; this year there is an equal amount; and I hope to ask for the same amount next year.

Mr. Brooks: The idea is eventually to see that these men are given the free title to their land.

Mr. Gregg: That is correct.

Mr. Brooks: I thank the minister for the information he has given.

Mr. Gregg: The report there will indicate that substantial progress has been made.

Mr. Brooks: I recall that the former member for Yukon, Mr. Black, spoke about getting certain land for the construction of homes in the Yukon. I believe some difficulties arose, and that the minister said he would investigate and see what could be done in that area. Has there ever been any investigation, and what is the situation with regard to those veterans in the Yukon?

Mr. Gregg: Yes. If all the items related to the Veterans Land Act had come to as happy a conclusion as that, it would please me greatly. I think it was three weeks after the veterans affairs committee disbanded that the director of the Veterans Land Act and my parliamentary assistant took a plane to the Yukon. While there I think they consulted with Mr. Black and the veterans organizations. I accused them of closing one eye in the interpretation of the act and certain legislation which comes under the Department of Mines and Resources. Nevertheless, it was approved by Justice that a formula could be found whereby they could do what they wanted to do, not under the small holdings section but under the same terms as applied to taking up provincial lands.

Mr. Brooks: They could eventually own the lands?

Mr. Gregg: They could eventually own the property. I can assure my hon. friend that the veterans there are all very happy.

Mr. Brooks: I thank the minister for the information he has given.

Item agreed to.

Soldier Settlement and Veterans Land Act—

547. To provide for the payment to the government of the United Kingdom on account of losses under the 3,000 British family agreement of August 20, 1924, and the New Brunswick 500 British family agreements of August 4, 1927, and August 27, 1935, $25,000.

Mr. Brooks: This item has to do with some settlers in New Brunswick. Some twenty or twenty-five years ago these settlers were brought out from the old country and settled in New Brunswick. I am rather surprised that we still have to pay $25,000 a year to Great Britain, it would appear, on behalf of these settlers. I should like the minister to explain just what the situation is. I thought these men had bought their farms long ago. Some of them are now grandfathers and their grandchildren are growing up on the farms.

Mr. Gregg: The settlers were non-veteran settlers that came out away back in 1929.

Mr. Brooks: In 1927, I think it was.

Mr. Gregg: I am told that this item is to reimburse or to continue reimbursing the United Kingdom government for certain moneys on their account. When we sell the properties, if a loss is involved it is borne pro rata by the Canadian government and by the United Kingdom government, in accordance with the original investment. This item is to take care of our share.

Mr. Brooks: It was a three-party agreement?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. MacInnis: I too was looking at this item, and I noted that 3,000 families were brought out in 1924, I believe, and 500 at a later date. How many of these families are now settled on the land and how long will this payment on this item continue?

Mr. Gregg: As of March 31 this year, there are 593 of those contracts outstanding. That does not indicate that there are only 593 of those remaining. I have not the total number that are on the farms, because when the contracts are complete we do not carry them any more.

Mr. Wright: How long will this payment of $25,000 a year continue?

Mr. Gregg: I am unable to answer my hon. friend's question. It will depend. Until their contracts are fulfilled. I have not before me the exact dates of those contracts or any extensions thereof.

Mr. Wright: The minister could at a later date give us the figures as to the total amount that has been paid for the settlement of these 3,000 families, and what payment we still owe.

Mr. Gregg: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. Brooks: I might say that it was a good investment.

Mr. Gregg: With regard to any item such as that on which I promise to bring forward information if the item passes, I will undertake to bring forward the information when the amendments to the Veterans Land Act are under consideration.

Item agreed to.

548. To provide for the payment of grants to veterans settled on provincial lands in accordance with agreements with provincial governments under section 35 of the Veterans Land Act, 1942 (as amended by order in council P.C. 2122, dated 13th April, 1945), and payment of grants to veterans settled on dominion lands, in accordance with an agreement with the Minister of Mines and Resources, under section 35 of the Veterans Land Act, 1942, as amended (P.C. 1550 of 18th April, 1946), $2,536,000.

Mr. Herridge: I was greatly pleased to hear the minister's remarks with reference to the settlement of veterans on provincial lands and projects under consideration. But at the same time I am interested in the reduction of this vote by $1,464,000. While I mentioned this previously when the minister's estimates were under consideration, I do again want to stress, and bring to the attention of the minister, the possibilities that exist under this vote for the settlement of veterans in the southern interior of British Columbia for full-time farming, possibly in the first place to a limited extent. There are great possibilities for the settlement of veterans on small holdings, particularly the type of veteran who is employed within three or four miles of a small village, or a pensioner or a veteran who qualifies under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

In the interior of British Columbia we have a great opportunity in that respect. I can understand, Mr. Chairman, that it is not likely that a pensioner or a war veterans allowance recipient would want to settle on a small holding in the Acadia riding, but many of them are very much taken with the southern interior of British Columbia, particularly on account of our climate. That section of the country contains a large number of good lake locations where one can settle on a few acres of land beside some of our excellent lakes and enjoy the location, scenery and so forth. In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I do want to suggest that there is a splendid opportunity for the Department of Veterans Affairs to take even more positive action in this respect. The minister's officials can acquaint themselves with the opportunities in the southern interior of British Columbia. Many of the locations are still held within forest reserves. As the minister knows, the minister and the deputy minister of lands of British Columbia are sympathetic toward this sort of thing and are willing to co-operate with the department here in taking land out of the forest reserves wherever it is indicated as suitable for the settlement of veterans for full-time farming or for small holdings. I am bringing this to the attention of the minister again to emphasize the unusual and particular opportunities in the constituencies of the southern interior of British Columbia for settlement under this section of the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. Gregg: I should like to comment on that. I thank the hon. member for that suggestion. I can assure him that there is no intention whatever to cut down on these loans provided the veterans want to qualify for the work. In 1948-49 the appropriation was $4 million, and we spent only $2,620,809. The figure given here is an estimate of what will be required for this year. If it is not enough we shall certainly ask for more.

With respect to the other point, there are more things going forward in conjunction with the Department of Agriculture and with the province of British Columbia in regard to settling veterans on provincial lands in the interior of that province. I can assure my hon. friend that the Veterans Land Act officials will be glad to follow that up.

Mr. Quelch: Some weeks ago I discussed with the minister the question whether or not an agreement had been reached with Alberta to pay a grant where land is leased in special areas on a ten-year basis. Has anything developed since that time?

Mr. Gregg: I am not in a position to answer the hon. member now, but I shall get him an answer.

[Mr. Herridge.]

549. To provide for the payment of grants to Indian veterans settled on Indian reserve lands under section 35A of the Veterans Land Act, 1942 (as amended by order in council P.C. 2122, dated 13th April, 1945), $600,000.

Mr. Harkness: I am interested in the success of the scheme of rehabilitating our Indian veterans on their own reserves under the Veterans Land Act. Can the minister tell us how many of our Indian veterans have taken advantage of the act? Can he give us a breakdown of the number who have used the act in order to get into full-time farming operations on the reserves, and the number who have used it really as a small holdings scheme in order to secure homes and thus improve their living conditions? Is the limitation, imposed in the ordinary small holdings scheme, of three acres to enable a man to take advantage of the act, imposed upon the Indians on their reserves?

Mr. Gregg: The number of full-time farming Indians is 505; small holdings 179; provincial lands, 3,474.

Mr. Harkness: That has nothing to do with Indians.

Mr. Gregg: I am sorry. The last figure was wrong. The number of Indians settled under the act is 1,014.

Mr. Harkness: Where are the remainder settled? The number given as settled on full-time farms and in small holdings on reserves is 684. Then the minister gave a figure of 3,474 which was applied to something else.

Mr. Gregg: My hon. friend should cancel the breakdown I gave on full-time farming. I have not that breakdown here. The total number of Indians, which is the only figure I have for all purposes is the one I gave, 1,014, in which the first figure would be included. The amount of money involved is $1,123,560.

Mr. Harkness: What about the matter of limitation of buildings in which three acres were available? What is the situation in regard to that on the Indian reserves?

Mr. Gregg: I stand corrected on this. In this connection we work in close co-operation with the Department of Mines and Resources under which the Indian administration comes. In the first place, the dominion government owns the land and our department furnishes the money. Offhand I am not aware of the limitation in regard to acreage.

Mr. Harkness: The limitation of acreage was being enforced in so far as the Indians building houses on the reserves were concerned. I know the thing is under consideration. I had hoped that by this time the limitation would have been removed on these people because it is not a limitation which should apply to Indians on the reserve where the land is held in common in any event. The most that the Indian has is a ticket, as it is called, which more or less guarantees him the possession of that particular piece of land and enables him to leave it to his direct heirs, if he has any. I do not think it is a limitation which should be kept in force. If it is in fact still in force, which is what I want to find out, I suggest to the minister it should be removed so far as these people are concerned. I was one who was strongly in favour of the amendment to the act to make it possible for our Indian veterans to take advantage of small holdings. Originally, under the provisions of the act respecting Indian reserves, they were not able to take ownership of land. I am rather disappointed that more of our Indians have not been able to take advantage of these provisions. What the various reasons may be, I do not know.

I would recommend to the department and to the Department of Mines and Resources that any of our Indians still eligible for benefits under the Veterans Land Act should be encouraged to take advantage of those benefits. All hon. members know that the general situation of Indians in Canada is deplorable, and any scheme of this sort which they could take advantage of would be worth while. When the legislation already exists, and the opportunity exists, I suggest every encouragement should be given to them to take advantage of its provisions.

Mr. Gregg: I agree most heartily with the hon. member and shall discuss the matter with the Minister of Mines and Resources. Should any case come to my hon. friend's attention that could be remedied, I should be pleased to have him bring it to my attention.

Soldier Settlement and Veterans Land Act—

550. To provide for the reduction of indebtedness to the director of soldier settlement of a settler under the Soldier Settlement Act, in respect of a property in his possession, the title of which is held by the director, by an amount which will reduce his indebtedness to an amount in keeping with the productive capacity of the property and his ability to repay his indebtedness to the director, under regulations approved by the governor in council, $150,000.

Mr. Quelch: This provision is in lieu of a grant of free title to soldier settlers. When we were dealing with the first item I asked the minister a question to which I did not receive a clear answer. I am familiar with a number of cases where local supervisors have called upon veterans and have come to agreements respecting reductions in amounts of debts. A veteran may have agreed that he will pay so much cash at the time, and that after harvest he will make another payment to pay off the balance. If the second payment is made the veteran gets clear title, but if he is not able to make that second payment the amount of indebtedness goes back to the original amount, and the amount he has paid can be returned to him.

Where a veteran is not able to complete an agreement by making a second or third payment, owing to crop failure, is it the policy of the department to extend the agreement for another year, or does the agreement automatically die and the amount of the indebtedness go back to the original amount?

Mr. Gregg: I believe I am correct in saying that, as in many other things, the director under the Veterans Land Act has given a great deal of latitude to his district superintendents. An amount has been estimated that could be apportioned to the various districts. The district superintendents who are familiar with local situations and know the settlers under the soldier settlement board attempt to carry out the intention of this particular item.

I can assure the hon. member that the whole matter will be open to negotiation at any time. It has been explained to me, when talking with men working in the fields, that there would be another side contract under which it would be understood that a settler would be getting in some money when he sold his crops, and he would say, "If you will keep it open, I will be able to pay so much this fall, and probably so much next fall." I can assure my hon. friend however that this new contract does not cover any long period of time. It is just for a short period to see if the settler cannot take some part in the final liquidation of his land.

Mr. Quelch: There is every possibility that there may be a crop failure this fall so that the veteran could not complete his agreement. I want to know whether the debt will go back to the original amount, or whether he is given another chance for another year so that he would not lose the benefit of the agreement. I agree that the reductions being made are substantial. A veteran does not wish to lose the chance of having the debt reduced just because of a crop failure, and his not being able to pay the second half.

Mr. Gregg: There are not very many of those cases and, in the second place, as reported at page 626 of Hansard, it will be seen that my hon. friend asked a question and I replied that the matter would be taken into consideration. I did that with the director, and he assured me that the object aimed at by the hon. member is being carried out.

Mr. Brooks: I understand that settlers under the Veterans Land Act or the Soldier Settlement Act have to make payments at certain stated periods in the year. In New Brunswick, for instance, where the potato crop is gathered in the fall, occasion has arisen where a soldier settler has been more or less compelled to sell his crop in the fall in order to meet his obligations to the board, whereas if he had been allowed to hold the crop for a few months he might have got a better price. Is there any discretion left with the officials of the department to allow a soldier settler to hold his crop, when by doing so he could probably get a better price? My information is that they are more or less compelled to sell at some particular time in order to meet these payments.

Mr. Gregg: He has discretion. If it were held too long interest might accrue on it; but he has discretion.

Mr. Brooks: It might be a gamble, I understand.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and reconversion—

551. Post discharge rehabilitation benefits including out-of-work allowances, university and vocational training including the training of merchant seamen and salt water fishermen pensioners, awaiting returns allowances, temporarily incapacitated allowances and unemployment insurance contributions, $28,850,000.

Mr. MacInnis: A number of matters are covered in this item. Would the minister give a breakdown or, if he has not the complete breakdown, would he give the information with respect to merchant seamen vocational training. How much of the item is allocated for that purpose?

Mr. Gregg: That subject comes more properly under the Department of Transport. However I placed on record earlier the figures the hon. member wants. The breakdown under the various headings is as follows:

Out of work benefits	$ 50,000
Vocational and technical training	3,700,000
Awaiting returns	1,010,000
Temporarily incapacitated	10,000
University training	18,005,000
Unemployment insurance contributions	6,000,000
Transportation and travel for applicants for and recipients of rehabilitation benefits	75,000

Mr. MacInnis: Would vocational training for merchant seamen come under that item, or is there a separate item?

Mr. Gregg: All vocational training is included in that.

[Mr. Gregg.]

Mr. MacInnis: How many merchant seamen are receiving vocational training at the present time under this item?

Mr. Gregg: The number is 317.

Mr. MacInnis: There seems to be considerable dissatisfaction among merchant seamen with the administration of their vocational training. I am glad the Minister of Transport came in a moment ago because I had some correspondence with him during the summer on this matter. On discussing the matter with officials of the merchant seamen's organization I am convinced that they have a legitimate complaint. I believe that the Minister of Transport is interpreting the order in council too narrowly. On the other hand, it may be that I am interpreting it too broadly.

I mentioned in a letter that I wrote to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and which he passed on to the Minister of Transport that I felt that merchant seamen should be treated the same as persons who had served in the armed forces when vocational training was involved. The Minister of Transport replied that their training was under the Department of Labour. I have read the order in council through carefully and I can find no mention in it of the Department of Labour. The governing section, as to training, in P.C. 5983 of December 29, 1948, reads:

Sections 13, 14 and 17B of the Veterans Rehabilitation Act shall be deemed to apply pari passu to a merchant seaman receiving training under this order.

My knowledge of Latin is not extensive but I understand that means that their rehabilitation training shall be the same as that of men who served in the armed forces. I cannot find where the Department of Labour comes into the picture. The letter of May 12, 1949, from the Minister of Transport states:

I notice that you regard the training of merchant seamen as a return for services rendered on the same basis as educational grants for services in the armed forces, whereas, the intention of order in council 5983 is to provide rehabilitation in the form of vocational training through the Department of Labour to merchant seamen under thirty years of age, to avoid the disadvantages they would suffer when seeking shore employment in competition with older and more experienced men.

As I have said, I think that is a rather narrow interpretation of P.C. 5983. Another objection the seamen have is the shortness of the time for making application for training under the order in council. I understand the order came into effect on January 1, 1949, and applications had to be made within six months or before June 30, 1949. I have a letter in my file from a seaman who went to sea early in January, 1949, but who did not return to his home port until after June 30, 1949. Because of the time limitation this man is shut out from receiving vocational training even though he may be eligible in all other respects.

Many Canadian ships have been sold to foreign owners. The number of ships being operated has dropped from 43 to 18 which means that a large number of seamen have had to give up their occupation as sailors. Because of the present shipping situation they are not able to get work at their former vocations. The order provides for training only to those under 30 years of age with the restriction of the six months' limit.

I should like to hear from the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Veterans Affairs that they intend to give a more generous interpretation of this order particularly in regard to age and the extension of the time limit for receiving applications.

Mr. Green: I had intended to say a word on this matter and perhaps I can add a little to the submission made by the hon. member for Vancouver East. Just this week I had a return showing the number of merchant seamen who had applied under this order in council and stating what had happened to their applications. This return shows that 770 seamen applied under order in council P.C. 5983. Of that number, 118 were ruled out because they were over the age of 30 years. One hundred applications were withdrawn voluntarily before the cases had been referred by the different district officers to Ottawa. Three hundred and twenty-one applicants were accepted for training. This evening the Minister of Veterans Affairs gave that figure as 317 so there appears to be some slight variation. Nine applications were rejected on the ground that the men had served on ships of a registry other than Canadian. With regard to that I understand that in many cases men were ordered to go to allied ships. If that is so they should not be disqualified on the ground they did not serve on Canadian ships. One hundred and thirty-two were rejected on the ground that they had not signed a manning pool agreement. My understanding is that many of these lads were so young that the manning pool authorities would not sign them up, and hence it is unfair that they should be ruled ineligible. Then others were at sea at the time, and for that reason did not sign a manning pool agreement.

The return also showed 26 had been rejected on the ground they already had employment or a vocation. This evening the Minister of Veterans Affairs said there had been 195 rejected on the ground that they had not left the sea. That is the first time I have heard of that reason for rejecting them, and I think it is not a very good reason because, as the hon. member for Vancouver East said, the number of men who can get such employment is being reduced steadily.

Another question I had answered showed that there are only about 4,100 officers and men now in the Canadian merchant navy, so that it would seem that these men, who will probably have to leave the sea, should be allowed to get vocational training.

In any event, the figures show that less than half of the number who applied were able to qualify. I suggest to both ministers that the age limit should be lifted. I do not believe there should be any restriction imposed for that reason. The war service these men rendered was some years ago, and if they were twenty-five at the time they went into the merchant navy they are now too late to get vocational training. Of course with the lifting of the age limit there should also be a lifting of the time limit for application. Quite wide discretion is given to the departments to rule on these applications, and that should be sufficient without imposing an age limit or a time limit.

Apparently they can only take the type of vocational training approved by the Department of Transport. I brought up a case the last time these estimates were considered. It was the case of a man who wanted to get a type of training that the Department of Veterans Affairs would give, but the Department of Transport would not approve of it. Since that time the Department of Transport have given in and now this man is going to get the training that the Department of Veterans Affairs would have given him all the time. Training actually comes under the Department of Veterans Affairs, and I suggest if they have a course of training these men should be able to take that course.

Really the order in council in question, P.C. 5983, is based on the Department of Veterans Affairs Act. The order in council itself refers to the Department of Veterans Affairs Act, so that the Department of Veterans Affairs is directly responsible here. The vocational training is given because of the provisions of the Department of Veterans Affairs Act. Section 5 of that act gives the department power not only to help men who served in the armed forces but also reads in part:

> . . . any person who has otherwise engaged in pursuits relating to war, and of any other person designated by the governor in council.

Therefore there is power under the Department of Veterans Affairs Act for that department to give training to merchant navy veterans. The responsibility really rests on the Department of Veterans Affairs rather than on the Department of Transport. I urge that the two ministers concerned give further consideration to the matter, not only to vocational training but also to educational training. Very few of these men can qualify now for educational training, and many of those who could qualify have been paying their own way to date. I suggest they should be helped now for the remainder of their courses.

I would point out to the Minister of Transport particularly that in the last annual report of his department which we have, that for the year up to March 31, 1948, there is a section dealing with nautical services, and in it we find that one of the responsibilities of the nautical services branch is:

> Issue of campaign stars and the War Medal 1939-45 to merchant seamen in recognition of service at sea in dangerous waters during the second world war.

We also find that another of their responsibilities is:

> Issue of Memorial Cross to mothers and widows of Canadian merchant seamen who lost their lives at sea or died as a result of service in the second world war.

Just the other day, in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo with regard to what procedure should be followed by ex-members of the Canadian armed forces and the merchant navy who are now resident outside Canada, in order to obtain their campaign stars and medals, the Minister of Transport brought down an answer which read:

> Canadian merchant seamen who have taken up permanent residence in the United Kingdom should apply for their general service medals, earned for service in the merchant navy during the second world war, to the registrar general of shipping and seamen, Llantrisant road, Cardiff, Wales.

Then the answer goes on to say where Canadian merchant seamen should apply who have taken up residence in South Africa, Australia or New Zealand. The answer ended by saying:

> Canadian merchant seamen who have taken up permanent residence in United States, or other countries not named above, should apply to the supervisor of nautical services, Department of Transport, Ottawa.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Green: I am just about finished. Surely if any proof is needed that these men should be given vocational training and treated as though they were members of the armed forces, those two actions by the Department of Transport furnish that proof. I would ask the two ministers concerned to give serious consideration to the suggestion.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: On Monday the house will not meet until 4.30 in the afternoon because of the address by the Prime Minister of India. The first item of business will be resuming the debate on the budget. If it is completed or adjourned, we should like to open two or three new departments.

Mr. Green: There are only three left.

Mr. Chevrier: There are more than that. We should like to open National Health and Welfare, Post Office, and Finance.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the Postmaster General be here?

Mr. Chevrier: Then we should like to go into supply with the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us how many departments remain to be opened? I understand there are only three, and the agreement the other night was that only one would be opened on the next motion to go into supply.

Mr. Chevrier: I was not here when any agreement was made, but I shall be glad to look at the record. Speaking from memory only, over and above those I have mentioned this evening there are at least two, if not three, more departments to open.

Mr. Green: Three are already in.

Mr. Chevrier: Three are already in, and with these sixteen—there would be more than three.

Mr. Green: Will the minister check up the undertaking given by the Minister of Public Works the other day?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order, until Monday, October 24, at 4.30 in the afternoon.
