Mr. Garson: This bill is a simple one, consisting in the main of procedural amendments. Clause 1 provides a new and simplified statement on one part of the exclusive original jurisdiction of the court which is now covered by section 18 of the act. There is no change in substance. Clause 2 provides a simplified procedure on appeal. There are only two new items, of which the first provides for appeal from interlocutory judgment and the second extends from thirty to sixty days the time in which an appeal may be lodged. Clause 3 provides that when an appeal is made on behalf of the crown, the usual deposit of $50 is not necessary. Clause 4 empowers the judges of the exchequer court to make rules and orders for regulating the practice and procedure of and in the exchequer court, as formerly, and adds two new subsections to provide: (1) for rules dealing with the examination for discovery in proceedings to which the crown is a party; and (2) for rules providing for the medical examination of a person in respect of whose injury a claim is made before the exchequer court.

I am informed that the judges of the exchequer court have already made rules of this sort, but that there has been some question as to their right to do so. The purpose of this particular clause is to remove any doubt upon the point. I believe the judges have also made one or two orders about medical examination of a person in a case of this kind. Some doubt also exists as to their right to do that. It is to remove that doubt that this clause is introduced.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Now that we are bringing in an amendment to the Exchequer Court Act, does the minister not think that consideration should be given to the whole problem of the right of the individual to sue the crown? If I am correct in my law—and I think I am, unless some amendment that I do not remember has been made—we are now in the position that we must get leave—from the minister, I take it—before we can bring any action. I have no doubt that hundreds of years ago there probably was a reason for such a rule. But in this day and age I can think of no legitimate reason why an individual who has been injured cannot sue the crown just in the same manner as he is able to sue the minister or me, provided that he alleges responsibility in us for the damage he suffered. There is nothing like making one bite of a cherry, and I really think the minister should give some consideration to that aspect of the matter. It is all right to say that the consent is given, and perhaps generously given. But there are times when, in my own experience, consent has been withheld perhaps not so much here as in provincial matters.

Mr. Garson: Consent is never withheld here.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Let me make it plain that I think it was in provincial matters that the consent was withheld; but it was in fact the crown moving in the right of the province. Many cases arise in which the government maintains army depots and institutions of that kind. If, as the minister has just advised me, consent is never withheld, why have the rule at all? Why should the individual not be in the same position to sue the crown as to sue any member sitting in this house? The minister has told me that consent is never withheld. That statement is the most complete support for my contention. If it is never withheld, why have the prohibition and put people to all the extra trouble involved and incidentally to the expense of paying extra lawyers' fees in obtaining that consent from the crown?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the Minister of Justice speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Garson: In reply to my hon. friend's question, may I say that I think no substantial injustice is done to anyone under the procedure which is followed by this government in respect of these claims. I would say that over ninety-nine per cent of the claims made against the government are those which arise in cases of negligence. That is one form of tort. Other torts, if indeed there are any others, are quite insignificant in number. In case of negligence I think the procedure that we follow is not without advantage to the subject, for this reason. When the claim is made and a fiat is requested, we have the claim investigated. In the course of that investigation we discover whether, in the opinion of our law officers, the applicant for the fiat has or has not a case against the crown. The judgment arrived at in that regard is the same type of judgment as that which would be arrived at by a lawyer advising an ordinary citizen against whom such a damage claim was made. Where the advantage of applying for the fiat comes in is that, in many of these cases, we are able by reason of that inquiry to arrive at a settlement before any damage action at all is started.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): But you must have arrived at a conclusion as to whether he had any claim before you made the settlement.

Mr. Garson: No. The application is made. We investigate the occurrence. We decide whether, in our opinion, the claim is a good one or not. If the claim is a good one, we endeavour to make a settlement that is fair before there is any litigation at all. In all those cases the applicant for the fiat is saved what otherwise would have been the costs of starting a case unnecessarily if he were able to launch it without any further difficulty.

What about the cases in which, in the opinion of the law officers of the crown, the applicant for the fiat has no case at all? I grant at once that if, in those cases, we refused a fiat, our position would be an unreasonable one. But the practice is such that, no matter whether we think there is no case or whether we think there is a case, the applicant does not suffer. If in our opinion there is a case, we try to make a settlement without litigation. If in our opinion there is absolutely no case for the plaintiff and he has not a leg to stand on, we nevertheless grant the fiat but we express our view that we do not think so much of the case. I think that procedure might be of some benefit to the plaintiff. While I concede at once that in the abstract it seems like an anachronism, shall I say, that in 1949 we are still following a practice that is fairly ancient, I would point out that, when you analyse the practical aspect of the matter, I do not think any substantial injustice is done. Indeed, it may well be—although I do not allege this as an assertion for which I take any responsibility—that upon balance those suffering damage as a result of the negligence of the crown are, in the mass, better off. In respect of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police activities, which come under my jurisdiction, I know that from time to time I sign cheques in settlement of claims of this sort, where settlement is arrived at without the necessity for any litigation at all. Those cases could not have been investigated before the writ was issued if the person who had the claim could rush into court and file his statement of claim without making an application to the crown for a fiat.

I will admit this in relation to what my hon. friend said about some of the provinces. A great deal depends upon the fairness with which the fiat is granted or refused. Where the fiat, as with us, is granted as a matter of course, after we have made an investigation, whether we have a defence or not, then no substantial injustice accrues. If, on the other hand, the crown, even in a minority of cases, were disposed to hide behind its immunity from liability and refuse a fiat arbitrarily, I will concede that there would be some injustice to the applicant for a fiat. But I assure my hon. friend that is not the case with this government.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Exclusive original jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): May I assure the minister that I accept everything he has said, and that he has given a completely honest view of the practice. May I discuss it on another basis? I am going to give the minister a concrete example where this thing might go completely wrong. I am glad he mentioned the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Let us assume that a citizen had some complaint about the way he was used by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. As we all know, they are enforcing many laws in nearly all the provinces of the Dominion of Canada. We then come down to the minister's department. The minister has one of his employees look into the matter. Through that employee we seek to get justice, some sort of reparation for injuries, whether physical or otherwise. The minister is then put in this difficult position of saying whether or not a fiat should be granted to the citizen who was injured or thought he was injured. The minister is then put in what seems to me to be the unenviable position of having to decide whether or not the fiat should be granted. Let us assume that we have another minister whose ideals of the administration of justice do not coincide with those of the present incumbent of that office, and he says, "I am running a good show; I am running this in the best way that I can and I am not going to have any lawsuits against any of my boys." That is just a natural human feeling that any minister may have under these circumstances. Therefore, sir, with the greatest respect I go back to where I started. It is all right to say that this is never done. Why not make it the law that it can never be done?

I intend to go back and answer one or two other points the minister made. He said that we did not want somebody to fly into the courthouse before the department, whatever department it may be, has had time to make some investigation. I have been in this business of law for a long, long time, and I have never known anybody to sue anybody else, seeking some sort of remedy, without first making a demand on him for the remedial action to which he thinks he is entitled. The minister may think that I am conjuring up something that does not happen, but in saying what he said I think that he was probably conjuring up something that, in the life of this profession, I will not say never happens, but has never been known to me to happen.

Suppose I have a bad lawsuit on my hands. What I would do first of all would be to make a big demand hoping that I would sort of overawe the other fellow. Having some doubt about what my client is entitled to, I think that half a loaf is better than no bread, and I make some settlement in that way. My point is this. If the minister is right in saying that a fiat is never withheld, then I come squarely back and ask: If it is never withheld, why have the prohibition at all? If that were done, then I would hope that the provinces might follow the excellent example which would be set by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Garson: Hon. members know that I have not been Minister of Justice for long, and therefore my statement that a fiat had never been refused applies only to the period of the past seven or eight months.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Generally I think it has been issued.

Mr. Garson: Anticipating the type of questions that my hon. friend would raise I took the matter up with my deputy, through a telephone conversation which was recorded. In our department we have an interdepartmental communication system which enables us to exchange instructions of this sort and have a transcript of them. I have the transcript here and this is what my deputy says:

> Well, mind you, we are in no difficult position here because we have had this law in force, well, for a great many years by admitting liability, that is, in the sense of granting a fiat for tort.

Then I said:

> Even where we think we are not liable?
> Oh, yes, oh, yes, we have never refused a fiat for many years.

You could not get anything more categorical than that, because that is not just myself speaking; that is the deputy, and he is speaking of a period under several ministers. In other words, the practice in relation to this discussion with my hon. friend, in which he said that it might depend to some extent upon the judgment and the temperament of the minister who was exercising it, is not to have even the discretion. I have personally signed fiats where the report from the law offices of the crown was to the effect that we had an excellent defence to the case and that they did not think the plaintiff could succeed.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The law offices of the crown have been wrong before.

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes, of course they have, but the point is this. My hon. friend asks, is not that a terrible responsibility in relation to my staff? I do not think so, because the only responsibility that the minister takes is that of saying: Let justice be done, let the courts decide that the plaintiff has a case against the employees of the department or that there is no such case.

To repeat what I said before: If there were any substantial miscarriage of justice as a result of the withholding of this, then I would be the first to admit the validity of my hon. friend's point. But where the practice is not to withhold the fiat, I am sure the practice does result in a large number of settlements before litigation—because, in relation to that, I have signed many cheques for such settlements.

Beyond a certain amount of delay and a certain amount of extra trouble—and one must admit that—there is no substantial miscarriage of justice at all, and no one is denied justice as a result of the practice followed.

Mr. Johnston: As hon. members are aware, I am not a lawyer. I understand, however, that no cases can be brought before this court unless they are against the crown. Am I right in that understanding?

Mr. Garson: No, that is not right. For example, this court deals with patent cases.

If my hon. friend would turn to section 19 of the Exchequer Court Act he would find the duties set out in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), (h) and (i). All these paragraphs deal with different types of jurisdiction the court may exercise.

Then, under sections 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26 and 27, the various jurisdictions of the court are set out, dealing with railroad debts, and so on. The court has a much wider jurisdiction than merely actions against the crown. However, that is one of the important jurisdictions.

Mr. Johnston: What would be the position where the crown is partner with another company—let us say an insurance company? Can such action be brought jointly before the exchequer court?

Mr. Garson: Would the hon. member detail a set of facts in respect of which a claim of that kind has arisen?

Mr. Fulton: The National Housing Act.

Mr. Johnston: Yes, the National Housing Act. There is a case pending now where the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are joint partners with the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company. That case was brought before the ordinary courts, and the ruling handed down that the prosecution could not be brought against the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in any court other than the exchequer court.

Mr. Garson: Right.

Mr. Johnston: What is the position when the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company is in partnership with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation? Can they both be prosecuted before the exchequer court, or must they be taken separately? My understanding is they cannot be taken separately because the court would not allow that to be done, and said the only place the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation could be prosecuted would be before the exchequer court.

Mr. Garson: What my hon. friend has said is that action could not be taken against them jointly in the ordinary provincial courts. But that still leaves the question as to whether action might be taken against them jointly in the exchequer court. I suppose it is the answer to that question the hon. member would like me to give at the present time. Unfortunately, I say frankly, I am not able to give it just now. However, I shall get that information, as to whether joint actions of that sort can be brought.

Certainly I would agree that it should be possible either in the provincial court or in the exchequer court to have the rights of the parties determined in a single lawsuit; and I think that is the objective my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. Johnston: I must repeat that I have no knowledge of the operations of the law in this regard, but when an individual such as a home owner under the National Housing Act finds himself in difficulties with the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company and the government, and finds that he must go to court —bearing in mind that his financial position is not strong—he finds himself in the position where the ordinary court rules that it cannot hear the case because a crown corporation is involved. Then, when further advice is obtained, they cannot sue the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company because if they carried it to the exchequer court they could not bring in the insurance company, which is not a crown corporation.

There you find a situation which confronts the individual whose finances are limited. He cannot sue the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation jointly with the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company in the ordinary courts. He cannot sue the insurance company and the mortgage corporation in the exchequer court because the insurance company is a partner.

It seems to me some provision should be made—and I do not know whether this would be the proper place to make it—whereby a crown corporation could be sued jointly with a private company in the ordinary courts. There are two reasons for that: the first is that the ordinary home owner under the National Housing Act may—and this is most problematical—be able to raise the money to press the prosecution in the ordinary courts. Certainly however he could not raise the money required to carry an action to Ottawa so that it might be heard before the exchequer court.

I hesitate to ask my question, because I do not know what the answer will be. I would ask however what the costs would be to the ordinary individual who prosecutes the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation before the exchequer court. I have no doubt that depends upon the length of the case, and upon other matters; but I have in mind an average case.

Mr. Garson: It would depend upon a great many factors. Even if one knew what the tariff was, and the extent of the court costs, I do not believe he could possibly give an intelligent answer to that question. He would have to know the nature of the claim, the number of witnesses called, and all such information.

However, when the hon. member says that it would cost more to prosecute the case in Ottawa, I suggest he is overlooking the fact that the exchequer court sits in different parts of Canada. It goes out on circuit. Proceedings can be instituted through Ottawa agents, following which it is not necessary for counsel in, let us say, Calgary or Edmonton or Winnipeg, to attend at Ottawa with their witnesses.

If all the witnesses on both sides of the case are in some city of Canada, the case can be tried there—provided it is one of the cities on the circuit of the exchequer court judges. In that way I should think the costs of prosecuting a case would be substantially the same in the exchequer court as they would be in the supreme court of a province.

I believe the real point in my hon. friend's remarks, if he will permit my saying so, is his suggestion that an amendment is required to the act to make it clear that in a case where a crown corporation, or the crown itself, is involved with a private company such as the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company, it would be possible to bring action against the crown in the exchequer court and in that action to join the private company as a party in such case, where it appears that there is some business connection between the private company and the crown.

This would enable the case to be brought in the exchequer court where, according to the information the hon. member has given, a court has held that it is impossible to bring a case against both party defendants in the provincial court. His point, as I understand it, is that a plaintiff should be able to get redress against both defendants in the same court at one time.

Mr. Johnston: Yes.

Mr. Garson: I believe we could agree on that.

Mr. Johnston: May I thank the minister for the observations he has just made. I would assume that this would be the proper place to make such a change in the act, and I believe it would be most beneficial if the minister would bring down some amendment at this time, so that it might be incorporated in the legislation.

I would join with the hon. member for Calgary West when he objects to the way a fiat is issued by the officers of the minister's department and by the minister himself. The case I have in mind—and it will do no harm to repeat it now—is that of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company versus these home owners I have mentioned.

Here was a case where almost every officer of the crown thus far has disclaimed any responsibility whatsoever in the matter. If it is left in the hands of the minister, or the hands of the officers who advise him, to decide whether or not a fiat shall be issued, before a prosecution may take place, then it seems to me that that is not a proper position for the minister to find himself in. This would be the time to enact legislation so that if such an action was brought the court itself could decide the merits of the case and not have the Department of Justice decide whether a fiat should be issued.

Mr. Garson: I am not sure whether I have made myself clear to the hon. gentleman. I must apologize to other hon. members because I think I have said about four times that we grant a fiat as a matter of course.

Mr. Johnston: But not as a matter of right or as an obligation.

Mr. Garson: As a matter of course. In no case is it refused. Once the fiat is granted the case is then proceeded with against the crown in the same way as it would be proceeded with against another subject.

Mr. Johnston: But it could be refused?

Mr. Garson: It could be refused. I am sure my hon. friend has been around the halls of parliament long enough to understand that when a settled practice is developed over a number of years in British countries like Canada the subject can depend upon that practice being followed. As I said before, my deputy minister, who has been at his desk for many years, tells me that he does not know of a single case where a fiat was refused.

Mr. Johnston: It is because I have been around these halls for over fourteen years that I would rather see it in the resolution.

Mr. Fulton: A point arises in my mind out of the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. Crown companies are entering more and more into the commercial life of the country. Because of their very nature these crown companies must enter into commercial transactions and I think they should be subject to suit in the ordinary way in the provincial courts. It seems to me that this is a matter that should be taken into consideration because there must be an increasing number of cases where the subject wishes to enter suit against crown corporations.

Mr. Garson: That could be taken care of either by a provision here or by a provision in the act of incorporation of the crown company, that the company shall have a right to sue and be sued in the courts.

Mr. Fulton: I suggest that the minister take that into consideration in view of the discussion which has taken place.

Mr. Garson: I shall.

Mr. Higgins: I should like to direct the attention of the minister to a rather unusual situation that exists in Newfoundland at the present time and which has existed for some two or three years. As the minister knows, there is a foreign power, a friendly foreign power, occupying part of our country. From time to time actions for negligence and indeed of a more serious character have taken place. I speak from a full personal knowledge of a couple of actions for negligence which were taken against members of the United States forces. An action could not be taken against the United States government.

In the one case a member of the United States forces was carrying out his regular duties when the cause of action occurred. He was taken before our supreme court where he was represented by United States officers from the judge advocate's office. Judgment was obtained against the soldier and formally entered. When it came to trying to collect the judgment we were informed that the United States army would not recognize it and that we would have to go through some claims commission procedure if we wanted to obtain the amount of the judgment. I know of two cases where that has taken place, where the judgment was not satisfied.

I know of another case where a judgment was obtained in the district court and a promise given that it would be recognized. Afterward that promise was disregarded and the plaintiff received no compensation of any kind. I do not know whether I am right in bringing this to the attention of the minister now, but it is certainly a rather extraordinary position of which the minister should be cognizant.

Mr. Garson: I understand why the hon. member would wish to bring up this matter but I point out that it is not relevant to what we are discussing here. My reluctance to discuss it is based on the fact that I do not want to discuss a matter which comes under the jurisdiction of one of my colleagues for fear that I might muddy the waters for him.

Mr. Higgins: Will the minister bring it to his attention?

Mr. Garson: I shall be glad to.

Mr. Hansell: Would the minister clarify something which has arisen in the last couple of days? He has been discussing the type of case that would come before the exchequer court. Yesterday I asked the Minister of Finance a question with regard to taxation. I am not going to read from Hansard because you might not permit me to do so, as that discussion took place on another matter. The minister said that the taxpayer always had the opportunity to appeal to the court. At the time I thought he said that the taxpayer always had recourse, and I do not know whether the word used was "recourse" or "court". Then when the hon. member for Peterborough West asked a further question the minister said that the taxpayer always had the right to appeal. We know that a tax appeal board has been set up and is in operation and I should like to know if a taxpayer who is not satisfied with the decision of the taxation authorities is to take his grievance before that tax appeal board; or did the Minister of Finance mean that he should take his grievance to the exchequer court?

Mr. Garson: There is another instance where I should not be undertaking to reply to a question which could be replied to more properly by the Minister of Finance. My recollection of the procedure is this: The officials of the income tax branch, having received an income tax return from a personal or corporate taxpayer, make an assessment of the taxes on the basis of that return. If the taxpayer disagrees or dissents from the assessment he has an appeal to this income tax appeal board. If he is dissatisfied with this disposition of the matter, he has an appeal to the courts.

Mr. Hansell: That is the exchequer court.

Mr. Garson: Ultimately the supreme court.

Mr. Fulton: While we are discussing the question of jurisdiction, may I ask the minister whether there has been further progress in the catching up by the courts with what was apparently a considerable backlog of judgments?

Mr. Garson: Yes, there has been. Since the time the matter was last discussed in the house the situation had improved materially up to the time I got a report at the end of August this year. At that time there were only four judgments which were in arrears prior to 1948. I made a check today, and those four are still outstanding, but I would hope they would soon be cleaned up. The others are within the last two years.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Appeals to Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Carroll: I do not know if anything was said about section 2 while section 1 was being discussed, but there is one instance where I think hardship might frequently occur. The new section reads:

82. (1) An appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada lies

(a) from a final judgment or a judgment upon a demurrer or point of law raised by the pleadings, and,

Exchequer Court Act

(b) with leave of a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, from an interlocutory judgment . . .

That puts a litigant to a lot of trouble and expense. I do not expect ever to practise in the exchequer court or in any other court again, but it seems to me it puts litigants to a lot of expense to come to Ottawa, or to retain counsel at Ottawa to go before a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada to obtain leave to appeal. In cases where there is a final judgment there is the right to give notice of appeal without obtaining leave.

Subsection 2 of the new section reads:

(2) An appeal under this section shall be brought by serving a notice of appeal on all parties directly affected—

And so on. There seems to be some confusion. You take away the right of appeal without leave from an interlocutory judgment. Then in the general procedure as to how an appeal should be made there is no distinction between the two.

Mr. Garson: I think what is intended there is that subsection 2 of the new section 82 applies to all cases where there is the right to give notice of appeal. In the case of an appeal from an interlocutory judgment the application would first be to a justice of the Supreme Court of Canada for leave to appeal. When leave to appeal had been granted, then the appellant would serve the usual notice of appeal on the other side.

As to the other point raised by the hon. member, I could agree entirely with him if it were an appeal from an interlocutory judgment of some provincial court; but in this particular case it is from an interlocutory judgment of the exchequer court which, although it goes out on circuit throughout the country, has its headquarters in Ottawa. I suppose there may be occasions when the interlocutory application might be made to a judge of the exchequer court when he was on circuit, but ordinarily I think it would be made by an Ottawa solicitor acting as agent for the party to the judges here. If it was not inconvenient for them to make their interlocutory application in Ottawa and have it disposed of here, then one would not think it would be any more inconvenient for them to go across the street in Ottawa and apply to a supreme court judge for leave to appeal.

Mr. Carroll: It seems to me it may develop into a hardship for people who have very little financial backing. I think that the minister should give serious consideration to the matter before the passage of the bill. It might mean that often litigants might not have sufficient funds to retain a lawyer in Ottawa, which would be necessary in practically all cases, unless the judges were on circuit.

[Mr. Carroll.]

Mr. Garson: The suggestion of the hon. member is that, in those cases in which it was desirable that they should be as economical as possible, counsel would make the interlocutory application to a judge of the exchequer court on circuit. Then, if the interlocutory judgment was unfavourable, does the hon. member mean they should be able to apply to an exchequer court judge on circuit for leave to appeal the interlocutory judgment to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. Carroll: No; I should like to see it left exactly as the first section puts it, that there shall be an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. Some of these interlocutory judgments are just as important as the final judgments to both sides of the case. I do not see why litigants should be put to the expense of asking for leave.

Mr. Garson: From anybody?

Mr. Carroll: From anybody.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Hansell: Six o'clock. I only have one short question.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the committee have leave to sit again?

Mr. Fulton: Later this day.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Next sitting of the house. The intention is to proceed with estimates after public bills.

Mr. Green: Which department?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We will commence with agriculture.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

MEAT PACKING INDUSTRY

WORKS AND UNDERTAKINGS DECLARED TO BE FOR THE GENERAL ADVANTAGE OF CANADA

The house resumed from Thursday, September 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North) for the second reading of Bill No. 5, to declare the meat packing industry works for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I notice the sponsor of the bill is not in the house.

Mr. Knowles: Is that necessary? The hon. member who moved the adjournment of the debate is here.

Mr. Speaker: We shall proceed with the debate.

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): The bill before the house has been put forward, I am sure, because of the difficulties the meat packing industry has known in the past. I wish to give credit to the sponsor of the bill for his good intentions in bringing such a matter to the attention of the house. The immediate purpose of this proposed legislation is to take away from provincial legislatures all matters pertaining to industrial relations in the meat packing industry and place them under the control of the federal authorities. To that end, the bill proposes to have the meat packing industry declared a work for the general advantage of Canada or of two or more provinces.

In my view the fate of this bill will rest entirely upon the interpretation of this qualification, "works for the general advantage of Canada". After listening to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), I have a definite impression, if not a conviction, that both of them are placing a broad interpretation on those words "for the general advantage of Canada." The introductory remarks of the sponsor of the bill, supported by the address delivered by the member for Vancouver East, would justify the introduction of a bill making other industries in Canada works for the general advantage of Canada. In my opinion, this broad interpretation does not give sufficient reason for singling out the meat packing industry.

If I may refer to the last issue of the Canada Year Book, that of 1948-49, I should like to give an illustration of the practical result of this attempt on their part. This latest issue contains a comprehensive table of the principal industries in Canada. It is found at page 566 and contains a listing of the forty most important industries according to the gross value of their products. I should like to mention the ten industries appearing at the top of that list.

The first one is the pulp and paper industry, with 113 establishments; slaughtering and meat packing, 147; non-ferrous metal smelting and refining, 15; saw mills, 6,001; flour and feed mills, 974; butter and cheese, 2,161; electrical apparatus and supplies, 266; petroleum products, 43; automobiles, 9; and clothing, women's factory, 1,108. The gross value of the first in importance of these industries is $527,814,916, while the gross value of the products of the tenth industry is $174,353,223. We can say, therefore, without any fear of contradiction that these ten leading industries in Canada would afford just as good grounds as the meat packing industry for the placing of their industrial relations under the federal authorities.

In order to better appreciate the table I have given, I should like to refer to another table appearing in the same year book at page 572. This table lists the leading industries according to the number of male wage earners employed. On that basis the tenth largest is the slaughtering and meat packing industry, so we find it has given way in importance to shipbuilding and repairs with 58,000 male wage earners; the pulp and paper industry with 36,000; railway rolling stock, 31,000; primary iron and steel, 28,000; aircraft and parts, 37,000; electrical apparatus and supplies, 23,000; machinery, 21,000; bread and other bakery products, 18,000; and miscellaneous chemical products, 26,000. The slaughtering and meat packing industry is listed as having 18,000 wage earners. I may say that those figures in the table I have just mentioned are for the month of peak employment during 1945.

Having regard to these important industries which operate in this country, and to which I have referred, one may ask himself how it is that the sponsor of this bill has drawn the special attention of this house to the meat packing industry. If it is because he considers that food is the main necessity for the ordinary consumer in this country, he might consider the same necessity existing in the matter of the flour and feed mills, the butter and cheese industry, bread and other bakery products, fruit and vegetables, fish curing and processing and so on. Outside of food there are other essential commodities that the ordinary citizen cannot dispense with, such as clothing, certain varieties of personal items, house furnishings, building materials and so on. The interpretation which is given to that particular word in section 53, paragraph (g) of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, which is in terms identical with section 92 of the British North America Act, subsection 10 (c), opens wide the door to the introduction of dozens of other similar bills which would surreptitiously take away from the ambit of the provincial legislatures' power a good number of matters which by our constitution have been left to their exclusive jurisdiction. There would be no way of drawing the line of demarcation after this bill in its present form has been adopted, if it is adopted.

What are the powers of this parliament in regard to this particular bill? Are we authorized to give any favourable consideration to it? To answer that question, I cannot do any better than to refer to the constitution itself. All the powers possessed by the federal authority derive from section 91 of the constitution, and all the powers possessed by the provincial legislatures derive from section 92. These two sections are the keystones of our system of government, predicated on the principle of division of authority. Section 91 and section 92 are, I would say, the agents of the distribution of all legislative authority and power in this country. They should complete each other and not come in conflict with each other. They should be interpreted in the same spirit that motivated the fathers of confederation when they wanted to build up a country which, though young, would develop to become one of the leading countries in the world. If one is to give to section 92, and more particularly to subsection 10 (c) thereof, an interpretation which would not conflict with section 91 but would complete it, one cannot be satisfied with the application which the sponsor of the bill has made of the words "for the general advantage of Canada" because section 91, which is the source of the federal parliament's powers of legislation, has a preamble which reads as follows:

> It shall be lawful for the queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces;

With regard to this idea of the federal parliament's taking over powers which have not been specifically assigned to it by the constitution, I cannot think of any better reference in the last few years than that of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. One may say that the situation was absolutely inevitable at that time, without any possible controversy. I would answer by saying that is true; but, if the situation was more far-reaching or sweeping, the character of the circumstances which were invoked at that time should not be any different from those which should be the basis of similar legislation, such as that now before us. I could not find any better authority to give an outline of the circumstances which brought about the introduction of this special legislation in 1945 than the statement made by the then minister of justice, now Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). When he moved the second reading of that bill he had this to say, as reported at page 2448 of Hansard of 1945:

> The adoption of the motion for second reading of the bill will mean two things, two very important things, both matters of principle: one, that in the opinion of this house the circumstances in which Canada as a whole finds herself during this period of transition to normal from the exceptional conditions existing during the war are still such as to give some matters comprised within the subjects enumerated in section 92 of the British North America Act aspects of such paramount significance as to take them outside the sphere of that section;

Then he went on with his second point, which referred particularly to the powers given to the governor in council. During his address on that occasion he referred to the jurisprudence laid down by the privy council in the Fort Frances case. He gave several quotations from that judgment, and I should like to draw attention to the following:

> In the event of war, when the national life may require for its preservation the employment of very exceptional means, the provision of peace, order and good government for the country as a whole may involve effort on behalf of the whole nation, in which the interests of individuals may have to be subordinated to that of the community in a fashion which requires section 91 to be interpreted as providing for such an emergency. The general control of property and civil rights for normal purposes remains with the provincial legislatures. But questions may arise by reason of the special circumstances of the national emergency which concern nothing short of the peace, order and good government of Canada as a whole.

The speaker then continued and gave a dramatic picture of the situation with which the country would be confronted in the event that the legislation would not pass at that time. In passing, I wish to draw my hon. friend's attention to a statement which the then representative of his party, participating in the debate from which I have quoted, made on that occasion. The gentleman to whom I am referring is Mr. Jaenicke, who was then the hon. member for Kindersley, for whom I have always had great admiration. I have always considered him to be an outstanding lawyer in his province, and I am happy to quote the remarks he made on that occasion. This is what he said, as reported at page 2462 of Hansard of November 23, 1945:

> The bill before us, however, enables the ministry to legislate and enact substantive law, and, generally speaking, that is intolerable in democracy in ordinary times, the more so under our constitution because the government by such legislation not only takes over the function of parliament but interferes seriously with the powers of our provinces with respect to subjects which are specifically assigned to provincial legislatures. If we were living in ordinary times, we would undoubtedly oppose the passing of such a bill most vigorously.

In my humble opinion, there is no difference in the character of the circumstances which should prevail in the country to allow the federal parliament by a mere act of parliament and under the authority of section 92 subsection 10 (c) to take away from the provinces some of the matters which had been given to them in a very exclusive and explicit way.

Hon. members who sat on the industrial relations committee in 1947 will recall that a doubt arose in the minds of several hon.

members of that committee about the possibility of the committee recommending what was termed a national labour code. It was thought appropriate to invite the Department of Justice to express an opinion on the jurisdiction of the federal parliament over labour matters. On July 3, 1947, Mr. Driedger, senior advisory counsel of the Department of Justice, appeared and made a lengthy statement, giving his comments and conclusions on the jurisprudence of the privy council which would have some bearing on the matter, and these are the final remarks which he made on that occasion:

(c) Finally, parliament may, in special circumstances, legislate with respect to labour relations under the initial words of s. 91, namely, for the peace, order and good government of Canada. This was done during the war. The Canada Temperance case (1946) A.C. 193 is the most recent decision of the privy council on the authority of parliament to legislate on this ground. Viscount Simon said that the true test must be found in the real subject matter of the legislation; if it is such that it goes beyond local or provincial concern or interests and must from its inherent nature be the concern of the dominion as a whole then it will fall within the competence of the dominion parliament as a matter affecting the peace, order and good government of Canada though it may in another aspect touch on matters especially reserved to the provincial legislature.

These are general principles and there may be difficulty in applying them to particular cases. No exact test has been laid down as to when or in what circumstances a matter goes beyond local or provincial concern but it is clear that some special circumstances must exist. The authorities are against the view that parliament can in normal times cover the whole field of labour relations in Canada. In the Snider case the point was expressly decided and although the doctrine as expounded by Viscount Simon in the Canada Temperance case is somewhat broader than indicated in the Snider case, it is to be noted that nowhere did Viscount Simon suggest that the Snider case was wrongly decided.

And so on. These are the descriptions referred to in the judgment as the circumstances justifying the federal government intervening in the provincial field of legislation: "abnormal circumstances"; "exceptional conditions"; "standard of necessity"; "some extraordinary peril to the national life of Canada"; "highly exceptional"; "epidemic of pestilence"; and so on.

The situation which now exists in the meat packing industry is something which in no reasonable way meets the circumstances which the higher courts of justice have described in a precise way to give rise to the transfer of powers from the legislatures to parliament.

During the war, under P.C. 1003, the meat packing industry was regulated by the federal government in its labour relations. Through the appointment of an industrial inquiry commissioner, or at the later stage in 1946 by the appointment of a controller and seven deputy controllers, a stoppage of work could be avoided. Yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) was kind enough to refer to the able and effective assistance which was provided by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and his officials in the settlement of that industrial dispute and of those which came about during the war years and in the immediate period thereafter. Since the war, jurisdiction over labour matters which did not belong to the federal parliament was returned to the provinces on May 15, 1947. Not long after, in August, 1947, a strike broke out in the meat packing industry which kept idle six plants of Swift Canadian, and shortly afterwards spread to eleven plants of Canada Packers and six plants of Burns and Company. In all, at the peak of the strike 14,150 men were idle and 47 establishments were closed. This strike situation lasted two months. On October 18 the Swift Canadian Company and the united packing-house workers reached a settlement. An agreement was signed granting a ten-cent-an-hour wage increase, and other difficulties were solved. A few days after that, so far as the other plants were concerned the conciliation machinery of the Ontario department of labour was put to work. A provisional settlement was reached which called for an increase of seven cents an hour, with the proviso that the additional wage increase would be submitted to an arbitrator, Mr. C. P. McTague. The matter was finally closed.

Since then, for the past two years, we have had in the meat packing industry a situation which does not warrant any special attention from a legislative body such as ours The constitution absolutely closes the way for this parliament in connection with matters concerning industrial relations in the meat packing industry.

I submit that the situation now, in that industry, does not justify our interference with it. This bill is predicated upon a situation of the past and the eventuality of further difficulties in the future. But if this is so, there is no reason why the bill should leave aside all the other industries of importance in Canada, which should be regarded as industries for the general advantage of Canada.

The sponsor of the bill may take to himself the credit for having drawn our attention to this matter. He referred particularly to the effectiveness of the federal Department of Labour during the war, and the transitional period thereafter. He has recognized the soundness of our labour code. The introduction of this bill, in itself, is a recognition of the great qualities of our federal legislation relating to labour relations.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): What does the hon. member mean by saying, "our labour code"? We all did that.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I submit the remedy for any abnormal situation which may exist in the field of labour relations, or which may develop in the future, should rest with the provinces themselves. They are the authorities, constitutionally, in these matters. I am sure the federal Department of Labour would be only too pleased to offer and to give the kind of co-operation it has given in the past. Does not section 62 of the labour code constitute a clear offer of collaboration in matters where the importance of a dispute in labour relations generally is nation-wide?

In view of the fact that in the immediate future there is to be a consultation between the provincial premiers and the federal authorities on matters touching the constitution, I suggest the wise course would be to let that consultation take place. There will be drawn a more precise line of demarcation between the responsibilities of the legislatures and those of the federal government. A matter such as the one we are discussing tonight, and other similar problems, could be discussed at that time.

I should think that the best way to achieve a reasonable degree of unity in labour relations, or in any other field of equivalent category, is through a process of consultation and co-operation with the provinces. In my submission, to a certain extent this has already been achieved—and achieved to an important extent, if one recalls that our labour code has already served as a model or inspiration for labour legislation in five or six provinces.

I suggest the bill before the house is not within the jurisdiction of this legislative body, and that we should not attempt to do anything which not only would be trespassing upon provincial rights but would be provocative to the provinces, the co-operation of which is so much needed at this time when, after having developed such a wonderful effort in production and in social legislation, our country now ranks among the most important in the world.

I suggest that in the interests of our country we should not attempt to lay the foundations of any further disagreement with the provinces, and that this bill should not be passed.

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I shall discuss this bill briefly. Ours is a federal constitution. I know that some trade union organizations have some knowledge of the jurisdictional disputes affecting labour organizations. It is my belief that the fathers of confederation planned better than they knew when they established a federal constitution in Canada.

This bill is predicated upon the assumption of taking over complete jurisdiction in connection with labour disputes and other matters of that kind in Canada. If it is logical—and I am not now discussing the legal aspect of it—to take over this one industry, then it is just as logical to take over all industries. As I have said before in the House of Commons, Canada is not a country in the same sense as are Great Britain, Germany, France, Belgium, Spain or Holland. This is a continent.

My hon. friends smile. Let me say this, in a kindly way, to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), that it was sweet music to my ears when he paid tribute to the Department of Labour during the war under the War Measures Act. It will be understood that I have heard different expressions of opinion.

In confirmation of what was said by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), when he interrupted a short time ago, let me say that I believe the labour legislation of this country compares favourably with any labour legislation under the canopy of heaven. If my hon. friend will wait just a minute he will learn something as he gets older. There is one difference between my hon. friend and myself; I know what I am talking about and he does not.

I think a tribute is due to all parties in this house for having framed our national labour legislation. We went through a stage during the great war when jurisdiction over labour matters was with the federal government. Since that time stronger labour departments have been developed in all the provinces, and in the main the basic principles enunciated in the federal labour legislation have been copied. This legislation has been in operation for two years and I think it should be given a fair trial. I think it has worked reasonably well; it certainly has worked much better than the legislation in force in other countries. In one country in particular strikes are in the offing in some national industries, something that we have not suffered in this country.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Touch wood.

Mr. Mitchell: I do not need to touch wood. Recently the workers' organization in the packing industry negotiated a national agreement with the large employers providing a six and a half cents per hour increase in wages. As I said before, you cannot negotiate labour agreements on the floor of the House of Commons. The proper place to do that is around the conference table and there is no substitute for it. There are countries in Europe where that is not done at the moment, and when certain ideologies come in through the kitchen, freedom goes out the front door.

From the very nature of things the people in British Columbia have a clearer understanding of the economic conditions affecting the large industries in that province. The people in Nova Scotia I believe have a better understanding of the broad industrial problems of that province. You can go on to New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, where of course there is not much industry.

An hon. Member: But good labour laws.

Mr. Mitchell: What is the use of having labour laws if you have no industry. That is merely window-dressing. My hon. friends who come from Saskatchewan know very well that in their scheme of socialization, so-called, they have run into trouble in the industries operated by the government. Even with the wonderful labour legislation they talk of, it was not possible to prevent dislocation in those small industries—I believe one was a box factory.

An hon. Member: Shoe factory.

An hon. Member: Horse meat.

Mr. Mitchell: I just point that out in passing. I wish I had more time to speak, but I have not.

An hon. Member: You have ten minutes yet.

Mr. Mitchell: It is far better to build with candour than it is with cant. I think we in this House of Commons, we in this Dominion of Canada, particularly those of us in the industrial provinces know something about the difficulties and complexities that exist in a practical way between labour and the great industrial structures of this country. I would rather rely on our experience than on the theories of some schoolteacher or some other person. In saying that, I do not intend to be disrespectful of the school-teaching profession, but I am sure that my hon. friends would object if I tried to read a lecture on how to teach children in school. That is not my profession.

I do not say that on proper grounds and in the proper circumstances a valid declaration could not be framed to declare a meat-packing plant to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, but I point out that the express purpose of the declaration in Bill No. 5 is to enable parliament to legislate in matters of labour relations in the meat packing industry. In effect it is an attempt to do indirectly what parliament cannot do directly, since labour relations fall under the heading of civil rights and are, therefore, within provincial jurisdiction. The advice that I have from the officers of the Department of Justice is that the declaration as proposed and framed in this bill is open to very serious objections as to its validity.

However, even if the legislation were valid, and even though I were in agreement with the views of the member who has proposed this bill, that the meat packing industry should in the matter of labour relations be under the jurisdiction of parliament, I would still vote against the bill as being the wrong method of procedure to achieve the desired purpose.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that?

Mr. Mitchell: There is no equivocation about it. There is in principle nothing to prevent the extension of the principle which it is proposed to apply to the meat packing industry in this bill to any other industry where there are establishments in more than one province, as, for example, departmental-store chains and mail order businesses of all kinds. If a man were fortunate enough to own a hotel in Ottawa and one in Hull he would naturally come under the jurisdiction, as would Canadian Industries Limited which have various types of industrial establishments in a number of provinces.

The device certainly provides a very easy method of procedure for the redistribution of the respective powers assigned to parliament and to the provincial legislatures by the British North America Act. I should think it is quite apparent that legislation of the type illustrated by Bill No. 5 would be regarded by the provinces as an unwarranted invasion of provincial rights and as an opening wedge and a precedent for unilateral action by parliament, having the same effect as an amendment to the British North America Act.

Mr. Fulton: May we quote the minister on that tomorrow?

Mr. Mitchell: You may quote me on that now. Even in the case of provinces that might be favourable to the ultimate transfer of jurisdiction, in labour matters in the packing industry, from the provincial to the dominion authorities, the procedure proposed in this instance for this purpose would be regarded as objectionable.

I believe therefore that, if and when there is agreement, that jurisdiction in matters relating to labour relations in the meat packing industry should be vested in this parliament, the proper method to follow is by amendment to the British North America Act, as was done prior to the enactment of the unemployment insurance legislation.

Meat Packing Industry

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): What about Beauharnois Light Heat and Power Company?

Mr. Mitchell: I will come to that if you wish. I say to my hon. friend that I am making this speech and I think I know what I am talking about. While there have been a number of instances where specific works have been declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, in any instances involving a substantial number of industrial establishments the purpose was to enable parliament to legislate so as to regulate the management and operation of the industry as a whole as, for example, in the case of grain elevators, which were declared by parliament to be works for the general advantage of Canada. The enactment of the Canada Grain Act, which regulated grain elevator operations, followed upon this declaration.

Reference was made in the debate to the legislation which was passed declaring the Flin Flon works of the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company to be works for the general advantage of Canada, and it was represented that the declaration in that case constituted a precedent for the legislation put forward in Bill No. 5.

The two cases are clearly distinguishable. In the case of the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company operation, the work declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada was a mine shaft which runs across the interprovincial boundary line between Manitoba and Saskatchewan. As a work connecting two provinces, it was the opinion of the Department of Justice, as I recall it, that this undertaking fell within dominion jurisdiction without the necessity of special legislation. The two provinces concerned, however, desired to have the work declared a work for the general advantage of Canada so as to fortify the assumption of federal jurisdiction.

I should like to say to some of my hon. friends, the jurisdiction of whose provinces is very dear to their hearts, that if we in the federal parliament were to do what the hon. member wants us to do in this one particular instance, I am certain that some of the provinces would object. I am certain if I were a member of one of the provincial legislatures I would object.

I should point out, however, that the declaration in that case was an unqualified declaration. The important distinction, however, is that the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company declaration covered a unique situation, and does not, therefore, establish a precedent. It also had the concurrence of the interested provinces.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Do not overlook the fact that when an industry is brought within the exclusive legislative authority of parliament, workers in the industry lose the benefit of provincial labour legislation regulating wages, hours and conditions of employment enacted for the benefit of industrial workers in provincial industries.

Consequently, in a case such as this one which affects a large number of local plants and a large number of local workers, and in fact the major part of an entire industry, a very strong case must be made for the necessity of the declaration in order to justify it. I do not believe that those who propose this bill will have such a case.

May I say in conclusion that I suppose my department has probably worked in co-operation, and is still doing so, with the provincial governments on more matters than any other department of the federal government. I think if there had been a serious disagreement on policy we would have heard something about it in the House of Commons. I can say in all sincerity, I know that my personal relations as minister with every province in the Dominion of Canada have been excellent. I hope they will continue so, and I hope I will not be charged with the responsibility of saying to them, in contravention of the B.N.A. Act, that we are endeavouring to take away from them jurisdiction which belongs to them. I hope that when the house votes on this measure it will agree accordingly.

On motion of Mr. Byrne the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Production service—

21. Grants to fairs and exhibitions, under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council and subject to allocation by the treasury board, $475,900.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Just a moment. You did not give me time to get my book open. I do not know what item 21 is. It is item No. 22 in which I am interested, grants to agricultural organizations.

Mr. Quelch: I wish to draw to the attention of the minister a matter that at first may not appear to be relevant, but I believe the point which I wish to make is directly connected with the item. I think the minister is aware that until quite recently it was the practice of the railways to allow a reduced rate on exhibits sent to fairs and exhibitions. I understand that rate was discontinued quite recently. Has the minister or his department made any representations to the railways to try to get that rate reinstated? If the railways are not prepared to reinstate the reduced rate, would it not be worth while for the government to take steps to provide for a subsidy or grant? I think the minister will agree that it is to the advantage of Canada that farmers from the far corners of the nation should be able to ship their exhibits to central points. I have in mind, for instance, the royal winter fair at Toronto. It is quite an expensive matter for farmers to ship stock from western Canada to the royal winter fair. They used to receive a reduced rate, but I understand that it has been cancelled. It may not cost much to ship an exhibit to a local fair, but it is quite a heavy cost to ship livestock a long distance from western Canada to the royal winter fair or to the United States or, vice versa, for farmers of the United States to ship stock to exhibitions in Canada. Has the minister considered that matter?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): For many years the railways gave a special rate on livestock moving to fairs, and livestock moving for certain breeding purposes, but they gave notice some time ago that the rate would not continue beyond the end of this year. It is still in existence, and has applied up until now, but we understand their intention is to remove it. We have made protests with regard to it, but up to the moment we have no definite undertaking from them that the rate will be continued beyond the end of the year.

Mr. Laing: I should like to say a word on behalf of the Pacific national exhibition. At Vancouver we have a fair that has developed very rapidly. Its president is Dr. Harry King of the university of British Columbia. Our fair is overbalanced as to agriculture for a reason that I shall try to explain. The minister is more fully aware than I am that these magnificent herds of stock go on show circuits, and they would not go out on the prairie circuit unless there was that inevitable pot of gold at the end of the rainbow in the form of considerable prizes. The Vancouver exhibition has a heavy prize list in the livestock section of the fair. To that extent, it is thereby assisting and subsidizing those herds that are on the show circuits. I would ask that some consideration be given, not a large grant by any means, but a token grant to acknowledge that that assistance is being given towards the maintenance of the show circuits.

While I am speaking, Mr. Chairman, I want to take this opportunity of joining with the members on all sides of the house in complimenting the minister on the excellent work he has done for agriculture in this country. I believe agriculture is one of the two great sources of funds for expenditure in this country, the other being the wages of labour. I believe the administration of our agricultural department has been admirable.

I should like to comment on the remark of the hon member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie), who seemed to be somewhat concerned about irrigation in the province of Alberta. I want to assure him we are proud of our minister from British Columbia for the work he has done in connection with irrigation in the federal riding of Kamloops. Unfortunately for some of us on this side of the house, those who are happiest about irrigation are the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones).

Mr. Fulton: I should like to make a remark or two about this item, Mr. Chairman, but before doing so may I thank the hon. member who has just spoken for his reference to irrigation in my constituency. While appreciating all that he has said, perhaps I should point out to him that in the part of the country from which he comes the need is not so much for irrigation as for a little drought.

Mr. Cruickshank: That is what you think.

Mr. Fulton: The Fraser valley found that out last year. A lot of dams and dikes were required.

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes, and the government treated us very well.

Mr. Fulton: What we require is irrigation, extra moisture. In looking at the detail for this item as shown on page 109, I notice that practically every other province in Canada receives grants of $5,000 or more while British Columbia receives only $900. I feel that is a most inadequate grant, not only in consideration of the work that is carried on by the various fairs in British Columbia but in view of the importance of the cattle industry in that province.

Speaking from my own knowledge, we have two very important fairs in the interior of British Columbia sponsored by the British Columbia Beef Cattle Growers Association, which receives this grant of $900. Those shows are the Christmas fat stock show in the month of December and the spring show in the month of March. Both of those exhibitions attract large numbers of exhibitors from every province in Canada. I believe all members from British Columbia will feel a sense of justifiable pride when I point out to the committee that most of the beef cattle prizes at the Ontario Royal Agricultural Winter Fair in Toronto last year were won by an exhibitor from British Columbia. I refer, of course, to the Earlscourt herd of Colonel Victor Spencer, which is bred at Lytton and on his other farm, the Diamond S ranch, up in the interior.

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes, it used to be in the Fraser Valley riding.

Mr. Fulton: Lytton once was, but the main Diamond S never was. However, let us not enter into a competition. I believe I am speaking for the whole province when I say I think a grant of $900 is most inadequate.

Mr. Fair: Is there a fair interested in agriculture—

Mr. Fulton: Could the minister give us some reason why we get only $900 when the others get $5,000? I do not believe he can.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know just what my hon. friend was talking about.

Mr. Fulton: I shall be glad to tell the minister. I was talking about item 21 on page 109. Perhaps he would like to turn up the page.

Mr. Gardiner: I did turn up the page, but I did not find what you are talking about. That $900 is a grant to the British Columbia Beef Cattle Growers Association; it is not a grant that goes to the Vancouver A fair.

Mr. Fulton: I was not talking about the Vancouver A fair because that is not sponsored by the beef cattle growers association.

Mr. Gardiner: That is one of those sales that are held from time to time.

Mr. Fulton: I do not see any grant for the Vancouver fair here either.

Mr. Gardiner: I have it here, if you will sit down long enough for me to read it to you. The Pacific national exhibition grant is $1,000 for junior works, $500 for judges, and $3,000 for permanent improvements, making a total of $4,500, which is the total amount allowed any class A fair. The Vancouver fair, which is known as the Pacific national exhibition, has received the same grant as similar fairs are receiving. In addition to that, we have a two-way arrangement with the exhibition in Vancouver under which capitalized grants over a period are received.

I think my hon. friend remembers that some years ago I went out and opened that exhibition as the first act in starting a building program which resulted in the largest building there is on the grounds. This building was partially financed by Ottawa, just as similar buildings in Ottawa and London, Ontario, are partially financed. In other words, the exhibition in Vancouver has been well treated. I believe my files contain more letters from Vancouver congratulating us on what we have done than from any other fair in Canada.

Mr. Fulton: If you gave them $4,500, I would not be at all surprised. The item $4,500 is included in the grants to class A and B provincial summer fairs. There is an item for grants to winter and spring fairs in which I see items varying from $50,000 down to $4,500, with the exception of the miserable grant to the British Columbia Beef Cattle Growers Association of $900. It is that I am protesting, because that association, in spite of the meagre assistance from the dominion government of $900, puts on two shows a year. As I said, those shows attract exhibitors from many other provinces in Canada.

I believe hon. members will agree with me, certainly the members from British Columbia will, when I say the centre of beef cattle producing in the province is Kamloops. As I have said, the beef herd of Colonel Victor Spencer from Lytton won every major award for the white-faced class at the Toronto fair last year. I certainly believe that a grant of $900 to an association which stages two major fairs a year is most inadequate, particularly in comparison with those other grants ranging from $50,000 down to $4,500.

Mr. Gardiner: For his information, I may tell my hon. friend that that is the only show in Canada that gets that $900 grant.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, I know. The others get $5,000.

Mr. Gardiner: No, the others do not. Here is the list. For class A fairs, at Calgary their total was $3,500; Canada's Great Eastern exhibition, $4,500; Canadian National Exhibition Association, $4,000; Central Canada exhibition, $4,500. To come down to the Pacific national exhibition the amount is $4,500. The grants are just the same for all those fairs.

Mr. Fulton: I am not asking about the Pacific national exhibition.

Mr. Gardiner: In addition, this $900 grant you are talking about is not paid anywhere else except through the association you are talking about. So you are not being deprived of anything that anybody else is getting. You are getting something that others do not get.

Mr. Fulton: Look at the Great Eastern winter fair at Sherbrooke, which gets $5,000. Is Sherbrooke a great beef cattle producing area?

Mr. Weir: It is a great dairy cattle producing area.

Mr. Gardiner: That is a winter show. If you put on a winter show in Vancouver, you will get the same amount.

Mr. Fulton: We do not put on a winter show at Vancouver. We put on a winter show at Kamloops.

Mr. Gardiner: If you put on one that is similar and get the same classification for that show, they will get a grant. These grants are paid on that basis right across Canada.

Mr. Fulton: We put on a much better show. We get exhibitors from a wider area than any other show in British Columbia in connection with the cattle industry. As a matter of fact, for two years in succession the show in Vancouver was not even held.

Mr. Gardiner: It is a beef cattle and ranchers association only. It is not like those other shows at all. That other organization is a beef cattle and ranchers association, and they have obtained that grant of $900.

Mr. Fulton: May it be increased?

Mr. Cruickshank: In order to solve this problem, I should like to make a suggestion to the minister. I should like to back up the hon. member for Kamloops—anything for British Columbia—but he is all wet in his argument. The one is a fair and the other is a beef show. He knows that perfectly well. I think the solution is that this $900 be transferred to Chilliwack. We will take it.

Mr. Fair: Has the government considered replacing, if necessary, the assistance that has been given by the railroads to those who are sending exhibits to the various exhibitions?

Mr. Gardiner: If I were to answer that question in the affirmative, I am sure it would be the surest way of seeing to it that the railways would never provide it again. I am not going to give any such undertaking as that tonight. We are still discussing the question with the railways.

Mr. Fair: We will discuss that matter a little bit later on when we find out definitely what the railroads' answer is going to be.

Mr. Higgins: Is there a grant of any amount to Newfoundland for fairs or exhibitions?

Mr. Gardiner: Newfoundland will be entitled to grants on exactly the same basis as organizations in other provinces in Canada. I can assure my hon. friend that the matter will be checked up and they will be treated just like everybody else.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): This is the season for fairs. I think it is worthy of comment to point out that there is no vote, either here or in the supplementary estimates, for Newfoundland fairs during this season.

Mr. Gardiner: There is nothing voted in that way in connection with any of them. There is a vote of $250,000 to make provision for grants to fairs. If there is a fair in Newfoundland that meets the conditions required in order to put it in the B or A class, it will be treated the same as a similar fair anywhere else is treated.

Mr. Higgins: Can we get the balance that is left from the $250,000?

Mr. Jones: Will the minister explain the classifications for fairs. The fair at Vernon could not quite qualify because it is a semi-agricultural and a semi-industrial fair. I think they are doing good work. They are promoting a good deal of assistance to the agriculturists of that area and are deserving of help. They have been turned down on a technicality.

Mr. Gardiner: The fact that they are partly industrial and partly agricultural does not disqualify them. All of the fairs I have been speaking of are partly agricultural and partly industrial. The fair must have paid for three years a prize list amounting to at least $3,000. If they have fulfilled that condition each year for three years, they are entitled to be considered as a B fair. It is to B fairs that we are making payments, and to A fairs. The A fair has a higher qualification than the B fair.

Mr. Fraser: The grants for permanent buildings amounting to $3,000 were put in force many years ago; I think it was nearly fifteen or twenty years ago. Am I right on that point?

Mr. Gardiner: This particular system, as it is now provided for, was established in 1945. Prior to the war we had a system of making grants, but it was not exactly the same as it is now.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, but it was the same amount, was it not?

Mr. Gardiner: It was a similar amount; I do not think it was exactly the same.

Mr. Fraser: I just wondered if the minister had considered raising that amount for permanent buildings, because the fairs find it hard to get their buildings put up, and they all need new ones.

Mr. Gardiner: At the beginning of the war we discontinued all grants to exhibitions. Before the war began there was a good deal of difference of opinion as to how these grants should be based. Then at the end of the war the Canadian National Association was called together, and they met with representatives of the government and worked out this present plan. It was unanimously agreed that this was the system that was to be brought into effect and it was finally brought into effect.

Mr. Fraser: What I am getting at is this. In 1945 the cost of buildings was not as high as it is today. The cost has gone up nearly one hundred per cent. I think the minister ought to consider the suggestion I have made.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Before the item carries I would ask the minister if he would furnish the committee with detailed information as to the distribution of the amounts paid out under this heading in the last fiscal year. Under the heading, grants to class A and class B fairs and provincial summer fairs, the amount shown is $206,500. Will the minister give the committee the information, or put it on Hansard, as to just where this sum of $206,500 was distributed last year?

Mr. Gardiner: I read that information into Hansard the last time we were on these estimates.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Do I understand that information is now on Hansard?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand so.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): That is satisfactory.

22. Grants to agricultural organizations, as detailed in the estimates, $43,500.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The details of this item are to be found at page 110. The item in which I am interested is Canadian national livestock records. The amount is only $18,000, and it is exactly the same as it was last year. These records represent the government's keeping track of records of various associations having to do with livestock. I am anxious to say at the outset that the records with respect to cattle are well kept and have a splendid reputation and are accepted for example at the Chicago livestock exhibition as being final and first class. In regard to thoroughbred horses, they are not worth a nickel. You cannot race any thoroughbred horse on any track in Canada, for example the Calgary track, unless that horse be registered with the New York Jockey Club. What I am saying is not a criticism.

Then, coming to the animals in which I am so much interested, I am glad we have a new member for Regina City because he is interested in the same animals, namely, hunting dogs. Suppose I have a dog and he is worth $50 as an unregistered dog. I registered it in Canada and it is probably worth $45 by the time I have done that, irrespective of what it costs me to register it. It is nothing; it is no good; it does not mean anything. The only place you can register a purebred dog and get any assistance from that registration is in Chicago, in a newspaper which I think is called Kennel and Bench. My hon. friend who was so annoyed with me a moment ago thinks that you bench only judges. You bench dogs occasionally. Some of the judges I know would be better on another bench, but that is neither here nor there. What I am talking about, trying to get suggestions from the minister, is this. I am trying to get some way of improving the character of registration of purebred animals in Canada. It seems to me that we have, or should have at least, come out of our swaddling clothes in connection with these things. I do not know what the $18,000 is spent for. It is not very much; but, whatever it is spent for, we are getting nothing from it. We might just as well save our money and get one of these machines on which you copy things out and put them on files which are never read by anybody. It seems to me that these Canadian livestock records could be elevated into a lot higher position than they hold in North America.

With respect to purebred racing stock, I think, although I am not sure, there is some arrangement between the stud book in England and the New York Jockey Club under which animals are registered in either place and may race in either country. I know that it applies to France. I think there is an interchange between the three countries. But I have no race horses. Perhaps that is the reason I was able to pay my way down here. I mean the sleeping accommodation. The rest I got on a pass. The point I am trying to make is that with a little life, a little initiative, a little enthusiasm somewhere there is no reason why Canada should occupy the backward position which we do occupy.

May I make it plain, Mr. Chairman, that I know this grant is only in aid of organizations. The government does not register animals, be they cattle, thoroughbred horses, or Dr. McCusker's dogs, which of course are a breed all their own. Surely we can do something with this $18,000—make it $36,000 or some other figure—to elevate the classification given our purebred stock in other countries.

I gave the minister notice of my question in an informal way. He has Mr. Taggart in front of him. I am sure he is tired of dealing with dead animals. He was in the meat business for a long long time. I should like to hear from the minister on the matter. I am quite sure that we can get some assistance here to put our livestock records on a par with, or perhaps even better than, those immediately to the south of us. I would not spend 10 cents on registering an English setter in Canada. It is no good to you. The same thing applies to the Labradors of the hon. member for Regina City. We heard a lot from the Minister of Justice about the badge of colonialism. This is a badge of inferiority. If he interested himself in it he would go a great deal farther than he did the other night on the badge of colonialism.

Mr. Gardiner: The records work in connection with the pedigrees of livestock is not taken care of by the government. The records are kept by an organization that is set up by the breeders' association. It is an organization of Shorthorn breeders, Holstein breeders, Clyde breeders and all breeders of livestock. I think these records are accepted by people who are desirous of purchasing purebred stock as of much the same standard or on much the same basis as are the records either of the United States or of Great Britain.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I agree with that.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not think our records are ever questioned in the United States on any of our livestock or on any of the animals that are registered under it. We pay $18,000 to that organization in order to assist it in conducting an office here in Ottawa, set up by itself and not by the government, just as we do make grants to some other organizations that are carrying on work in connection with agriculture.

With respect to horse racing, that is an entirely different thing. My understanding has always been that those who own thoroughbred running horses here and who want to race them in the United States, or want to have the benefits of the much wider range of the races they have there, must register them with that organization, and that there is reciprocity back and forth. Their horses come here and our horses go there. That is an arrangement among themselves.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): They are all registered with the New York Jockey Club.

Mr. Gardiner: That is an arrangement that is carried out as between the people who are interested in racing all over the United States and this country. There must be some central place of registration—I presume there must be—and they compel the registration of all horses there. That is not something that the government does or can undo. We do not know what action we could take in order to undo it.

With regard to dogs, perhaps there is some justification for the criticisms which are made. The kennel association has no more authority than has the Holstein association or the Shorthorn association or the Clyde association or any other. They have no more authority than these others have, but I must say, in so far as our experience with the kennel association is concerned, there has been more trouble in connection with the manner in which it has conducted its affairs than there has been with some of the others. I am not going to try to say what the reason for that is. All I am going to say tonight is that last session we introduced a bill. It was introduced in the Senate. It passed through the Senate, and had its first reading in the house before parliament was dissolved. That bill was brought in in the first instance to correct a difficulty which had been experienced among dog breeders, and those who were showing dogs, by amending the whole act and not giving the range of authority to any of the associations that they were presumed to have before. I am not sure that the bill has yet been introduced into the Senate at this session, but if not it is on its way there. It will be in the house immediately after it passes the Senate again.

We can then discuss this whole question as to whether the bill takes care of the difficulty mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary West. We realize there are difficulties. For two or three years we have been struggling with them, and we drafted legislation two years ago in the first instance. That legislation reached the house last year, but unfortunately it had not gone all the way through before parliament dissolved. It will be back this session, and I hope it will have its final reading.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will they include tomcats too?

Mr. Pearkes: In these exhibitions where there are classes for thoroughbred mares and foals, and thoroughbred yearlings, do they have to be registered with the New York Jockey Club before they can be shown in the exhibition class?

Mr. Gardiner: No, I understand not—just for racing.

Item agreed to.

23. Marketing service—marketing service administration, $150,090.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word with respect to an item which perhaps is as applicable here as at any other point in the estimates. Hon. members opposite spent an hour discussing matters connected with meat packing, and it should be a comparatively simple transition now to discuss the matter of meat wrapping.

The other day a distinguished visitor expressed himself as being amazed at the pains we take to wrap meat in what he considered fancy packages. He was astonished that under the present condition of the high cost of living we should spend our money in that way rather than spending it on more of the material wrapped. I wonder whether we as consumers actually insist upon these fancy wrappings, or whether they are forced upon us?

It was by sheer accident that only this morning I happened to pick up the report of a questionnaire and the answers thereto sent out by, I presume, a body of women, known as the Canadian Association of Consumers. They circularized their members with questions in regard to this particular matter, and the answers are interesting. Some of them maintained—and I suggest that some department of government should take note of this—that it was impossible to buy many products in other than these so-called fancy packages in their particular districts. The answers mentioned several commodities, emphasized the needless expense involved in fancy wrappings of certain items, and mentioned in particular some of the lithographing appearing on these wrappings.

But, sir, there are some marketing practices which are perhaps even questionable. Before the cost of foods became so high, certain vegetables and fruits were put out in 20-ounce cans. It was discovered however that with the high cost of living the average family found that these items were somewhat expensive. The result was that the manufacturers produced a 15-ounce can, these being placed on the shelves currently with the 20-ounce can.

The difficulty however was that after a while the 20-ounce can began to disappear, and it was discovered that the 15-ounce can became the regular item available for purchase. But somehow or other, the price of the 15-ounce can began to approach the price of the 20-ounce can, with the result that we have the substitution of 15 ounces of food for what was formerly 20 ounces, but at the same price.

This reminds me of the days when I was homesteading. I remember the transitional period between the five-pound tin of jam which eventually turned into a four-pound tin of jam, but at exactly the same price charged for the larger can. This is an old device.

[Mr. Knight.]

This matter of packaging may be a small thing to bring up in parliament; but after all we come in contact with these small things in our daily lives and in our housekeeping arrangements. These matters have some importance to us in the House of Commons who represent the people, and particularly the housewives of this country.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley is not in his seat, but hon. members will recall the agitation which developed and the great joy taken by the hon. member for Fraser Valley in pointing out the miserable, little green and worm-eaten peaches with which Ontario had been afflicted in that particular season. Let me say to the hon. member who provided us a few days ago with some very fine peaches that there was no condition like that this year.

On that occasion the hon. member for Fraser Valley protested against the glamorizing of those hard and unpalatable peaches by the use of pink gauze, which made them look rather attractive, and resulted in their being purchased readily, but were the source of great disappointment when the fruit reached the buyer's home.

I understand that the use of deceptive devices of that sort, and in particular that type of netting, was declared illegal—and in my opinion properly so. I do not know by what process, whether it was by a dominion or a provincial law.

At previous sessions the minister and I have had occasional arguments about the quality of Canadian bacon. Tonight I intend to talk for a few moments about the wrapping on that same bacon. I was surprised the other morning when, after someone had bought a package of bacon—I was going to say at our house, but we have never had a house or a dwelling of any sort since coming here, although we still do have bacon—we discovered this peculiar wrapping.

I notice the minister is looking toward me and I am sure he would imagine that what I now hold in my hand is a nice, clean piece of back bacon. May I inform him that it is no such thing. When it is sold in sliced form bacon is wrapped in cellophane. If this were a nice, clear piece of cellophane through which one could see clearly, I would have no complaint to make about it. It is a sanitary packaging, even if it is costly.

Formerly packaged bacon was wrapped in clear cellophane. It was noticed, however, that in the packaged bacon the slices were laid in the package so that the lean showed and the fat did not show. The fat showed on the last slice—but there has to be a last slice of everything. Otherwise one would think that it was all lean. However when it is opened up, and you are prepared to try it, you find that you are buying lard at the same price as you expect to pay for lean meat. Now they have thought up this new dodge, and I think they have crossed the borderline between honesty and deceit.

I do not know whether the practice is universal, but I can say that in respect of the two brands we have purchased—and this one I hold in my hand is Maple Leaf brand, from Canada Packers—the bacon is now wrapped in cellophane with red lines on it. This bacon is wrapped in cellophane on which a series of red lines are printed. From across the counter it makes bacon look pinker and perhaps encourages the customer to buy, because he thinks he is buying lean bacon. I suggest that it might be a device to cover up the fatness of the bacon in the package. I do not know whether there has been any change in the quality since this device has been adopted. When you see a package of this bacon you might think you were getting a bit of Irish bacon, that nice bacon with alternate strips of lean and fat. In my opinion that result is obtained only by the farmer who keeps one pig that is fed preferably on buttermilk and potatoes, corn meal and table scraps. They have never been able to achieve that result when hogs are fed in quantity. They are generally fed too much grain and too little of other things.

Having talked a bit about bacon, I shall come back to the package. I shall conclude my argument by submitting that this type of package should be prohibited by law in that it is deceptive. When I picked up this morning the questionnaire I mentioned, I was surprised to find that this very subject had been dealt with. I did not know that these ladies had taken cognizance of this matter. At the bottom of this particular pamphlet put out by the Canadian Association of Consumers I find set out the answers received to questions asked in connection with this very thing. One question was:

What is your opinion of the red and white striped bacon wrapping?

The opinions were compiled as follows:

(a) Over 61 per cent thought it deceiving.

(b) About 15 per cent were indifferent or had not noticed that type of wrapping.

(c) About two per cent preferred that type of wrapping.

(d) Less than two per cent thought it better quality.

(e) Over 19 per cent stated they preferred plain wrapping.

Some of the comments were:

Misleading and annoying, deceptive, too much fat, think they are trying to fool the buyer, the dye comes off, detracting to quality, a snare and a delusion, taints the meat, looks messy, keeps too moist and hastens molding, silly and unnecessary, takes the clerk's time opening it up to show the customer, eye appeal and draws the crowd.

I would not think the red dye would have anything to do with the molding, but that that would be due to the close cellophane wrapping. There are too many ways in which businesses, large and small, set out to deceive the buyer. I admit that it may be fair enough to offer a horse on the end of a halter, as the dealers say; I know that caveat emptor, or let the buyer beware, is an admonition that one should heed, but when one buys a horse on the end of a halter he has a right to expect at least that his blemishes have not been disguised with paint of the same colour as his hair. I say to the minister that this practice of deceptive wrapping and others like it should be discouraged. If there are laws preventing this sort of thing they should be enforced. In the meantime I should like to have the minister's comments.

Mr. Gardiner: In so far as cans are concerned I think there used to be 145 different sizes and forms. Through agreement and regulation this number has been reduced to about 40. This was not done for the purpose of increasing the cost; it was done for the purpose of lowering the cost.

I realize that one can say that for a period of time the price of meat has been going up, but the fact is that the price of meat has been going up constantly since 1938. It is very difficult to say whether it has stopped going up or not at this time. Anyone could quote figures for any part of that period to indicate that no matter what you did with cans or what you did with wrappers the price of meat has constantly gone up.

The hon. member referred to the bacon wrappers. I do not know very much about that because when bacon is bought for our house I do not buy it. However, I do notice that often it is in these wrapped packages and I notice also that that is true right across the country. I suppose those who have the product for sale are trying to put it up in the form in which people are most likely to buy it. If somebody in Canada Packers has made a mistake in the type of package they are using, if it does not suit the public, then I presume it will not be very long until Burns or Swifts will find that out and put out some other form of package. In any case the public buys it.

The hon. member wants to know who has control over this. In so far as the last few weeks or possibly months are concerned, this government certainly would have no control or at the most very little. We have not been able to get any bacon to send out of the country and our control is confined to the regulation of products in international or interprovincial trade. There is very little bacon crossing even the provincial boundaries at the present time as most of the bacon produced is consumed in the province where it is produced. Therefore the control would be entirely with the provinces.

The province in which we are now meeting is perhaps the highest producer and the greatest consumer of pork products. If there is anything seriously wrong with the conditions under which this particular product is being marketed I have no doubt they will see fit to take action in connection therewith. In so far as we are concerned, we could take action only with regard to a very small percentage.

During the period when we were sending 700 million pounds of bacon to Great Britain we had considerable control over what was done. We had the War Measures Act, but even if we had not we still would have had considerable control when such large quantities were being shipped.

Mr. Knight: Just as a matter of interest, would the minister state what method was used to stop the use of coloured gauze on peaches?

Mr. Gardiner: We put out an order and if my hon. friend will go back and read the newspapers of the time he will find that we were told the next morning that it was really none of our business. As a matter of fact our order did not have much effect, but the Ontario government took some action and others took action and the final understanding was that the gauze would not be put on peaches.

Mr. Fraser: The minister will remember that it was the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and the member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) who did a lot of talking against it in the house, and public opinion eventually demanded that it be taken off.

Mr. Hatfield: Is anything being done in regard to recovering our markets in blocked sterling countries such as the West Indies? They will not allow sterling to be sent to a dollar country. We have a Canada-West Indies treaty. We have a steamer service, and our boats are going down there empty. We are not allowed to ship any goods there. We have lost that market. Has anything been done since sterling was devalued? When sterling was at a higher level Great Britain had to protect it up to $4.03, but it is now $3.07¼ and they do not have to protect it. Has anything been done to persuade the British to allow sterling to come out of the British West Indies for agricultural goods purchased from Canada?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know whether or not the house will permit me to put this table on Hansard, but I will indicate what the purport of it is, and if it is desired to have it on Hansard that can be done. I think it will at least refute some of the suggestions that are made in asking for certain information.

The Department of Agriculture is concerned of course in seeing to it that all of the produce of the farms is sold. We are not so much concerned whether it is sold in the West Indies or whether it is sold somewhere else, but we are concerned that it all be sold. I should like to place on Hansard a table which I compiled this afternoon from much more complete records I have here, but which would take far too much space in Hansard. I should like to indicate just what the position has been. I have purposely left out of this table all of the years except 1938, 1944 and 1948. I stopped with 1948 because that is the last year for which we have information. I have had to take 1947 as to apples and potatoes, and also with regard to some items of honey, because complete records for 1948 were not provided to me for those products.

By way of illustration, let us begin with one of the grains that all farmers are concerned with, oats. If I were to take wheat —I have wheat in the table and it will be there if the complete table is put on Hansard— it would not concern so many farmers as oats does. The production of oats in Canada in 1938 was 371 million bushels. In 1944 the production was 500 million bushels, and in 1948 was 358 million bushels. The year 1948 was not a good crop year in many parts of Canada, but the margin between 1938 and 1948 is not very great, 371 million in 1938 and 358 million in 1948.

As to barley, production in 1938 was 102 million, in 1944, 195 million, and in 1948, 155 million. In other words, barley production has risen considerably, and that is partly because the acreage is up.

The domestic disappearance of oats in 1938 was 332 million bushels; in 1944, 424 million bushels; and in 1948, 325 million bushels, just 7 million bushels difference between 1938 and 1948. The figures with regard to barley are 81 million, 172 million and 136 million.

In those figures as to the production and consumption of grains I have omitted the years 1942 and 1943 because we were paying farmers to do certain things with regard to those grains and the figures would be much higher than the figures I have used here for 1944.

Taking exports, we exported 13 million bushels of oats in 1938, 86 million bushels in 1944, and 23 million bushels in 1948. For barley the figures are similar, but if I am permitted to do so I will put the whole table on Hansard and then I will not need to read all these figures. So far as oats are concerned, we had a carryover of oats at the end of the year 1938 of 49 million, at the end of the year 1944 of 98 million and at the end of the year 1948 of 58 million. The set of figures that refers to oats and barley has to do with grains that are used to feed other products.

When we come to beef we find that in 1938 the production was 588 million pounds; in 1944, 924 million pounds; and in 1948, 891 million pounds. Taking domestic disappearance, consumption of beef, it was 563 million pounds in 1938, 785 million pounds in 1944, and still remains at 734 million pounds in 1948. It was considerably over 800 million in 1947, the year before.

As to pork products, production in 1938 was 646 million pounds; in 1944, 1,737 million; and in 1948 it is still 1,046 million pounds. That is as against 646 million pounds in the year before the war; and for the last year for which we have figures it is 1,046 million pounds. When you come to home consumption, it was 483 million pounds in 1938; 1,056 million pounds in 1944, even in the middle of the war, away above what it was before, and even higher than it is now. It was 839 million pounds in 1948, which is very close to double what it was in the years preceding the war. We are consuming the pork in this country.

Our exports of pork products in 1938 were 178 million pounds; in 1944, 717 million pounds; and in 1948, 226 million pounds. Our exports were still higher in 1948 than they were in 1938 by a considerable margin. We had a carryover of 27 million at the end of the year in 1938, 49 million in 1944, and 16 million in 1948.

I do not think it is necessary for me to read any of the other figures if I am permitted to put the whole table on Hansard. I have here butter, cheese, poultry, eggs, apples and other products. There is a very interesting thing about apples. When you look at these figures you find that our production of apples in 1938 was 15·6 million; in 1944 it was 17·8 million; and the production in 1947, which is the last year for which I have a record, was 15·6 million. The production for 1948 was a little over 13 million.

Let us take domestic disappearance, which is the important factor in connection with apples. In round figures the disappearance in Canada, that is, the marketing of apples in Canada, was 7 million bushels in 1938, 12 million bushels in 1944 and 14 million bushels in 1947. In other words, there were twice as many apples marketed in Canada in 1947 as there were in 1938. I have always understood the problem in connection with apple marketing in this country was the fact that, prior to the war, fifty per cent of our apples were marketed in Great Britain.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister say from what country we imported apples last year?

Mr. Gardiner: I have not any figures here for imports.

Mr. Fulton: I did not know we imported any.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not know that we had, either.

Mr. Fulton: You said we consumed a million more bushels than we produced. You said we produced 13 million bushels in 1948.

Mr. Gardiner: When I started to give the figures relating to apples, I explained that the production figures were for 1947, not 1948. The production figures for the year 1947 were 15·6 million bushels and the Canadian consumption was 14 million.

Mr. Fulton: When you said "last year" you meant 1947.

Mr. Hatfield: I asked the minister a question about blocked sterling and he goes on to talk about grain.

Mr. Gardiner: You based your statement about sterling on the fact we were not marketing our farm products. I am trying to show you that statement was not correct. Of potatoes, which my hon. friend has on his mind when he talks about the West Indies, our production in 1938 was 60 million bushels; in 1944, it was 82 million; and in 1947, 75 million. Our domestic disappearance in 1938 was 58 million bushels; in 1944, 72 million; and in 1947 it was 68 million. After the war, our disappearance was about 10 million bushels more than it was before the war.

Mr. Hatfield: What about 1948?

Mr. Gardiner: As I explained, I have not the figures for 1948 for apples or potatoes. I think my hon. friend will find production was very high in 1948, and some trouble was experienced marketing potatoes. Something over a million dollars was spent in order to help market those potatoes, and I think they were successfully marketed.

Mr. Hatfield: A million dollars was spent to help us dump them.

Mr. Gardiner: You fed them to your pigs just as you did before, and were paid for doing so.

Mr. Hatfield: Some were resold, but most were dumped.

Mr. Gardiner: The purpose of this chart is to show members just exactly what has happened in connection with production and domestic consumption. If I have the permission of the committee, I should like to have this table reproduced in Hansard.

With regard to exchange, I may say that exchange is not my particular responsibility. I am not going to attempt to explain the intricacies of it tonight. If my hon. friend wants to find out what the views are with regard to the possibility of accepting sterling instead of dollars for our products, then I would suggest he discuss that matter on the financial estimates because those officials are familiar with the whole question.

Mr. Hatfield: We are talking about the marketing of agricultural products.

Mr. Argue: While the minister is dealing with production figures, I wonder if he could inform the house what stocks of butter are on hand and whether or not he thinks those stocks are excessive? Does he expect the government will be able to get rid of that butter? Will the floor price under butter be continued for another year?

Mr. Gardiner: A long-term record is about 63 million pounds of butter in storage at this time of year and, in previous years, that butter has been held by various concerns. This year, on a similar date, there are 66 million pounds of butter in storage. The government holds about 46 or 47 million pounds of that and the trade holds the remainder. I may say that the trade has taken much more into storage since the announcement in August of our intention to market the butter at a price that would give us a clearance above the 58-cent floor price. After that statement I presume the trade has taken for granted that they will be permitted to do the same and will, therefore, carry on business in the usual way.

The government's intention is not to go into the wholesaling or retailing of butter. We have all the records of the stock these companies have held in storage in the past and we have records of what they required in order to supply their customers. From time to time these companies will be supplied with butter and the butter will be sold at wholesale and retail in the same manner it has been previously. Our estimates indicate there will be no great difficulty in connection with the handling of the butter. We have not experienced any difficulty in connection with the trade or anyone else in the handling of it up to date and we have no reason to believe we will.

I may give some further figures which may be of interest to the committee. We have now about 15 million pounds more butter in storage, held by both the government and the trade, than was held on the same date a year ago. It will be recalled, however, that we had to purchase 15 million pounds of butter in order to supply our own market. From this it will be seen that we have no more butter this year than was made available last year. To answer the question more fully, I shall read the figures with regard to butter similar to those I read with regard to the other products a few moments ago. In 1938, butter production amounted to 360 million pounds; in 1944, it was 403 million pounds; and in 1948, 407 million pounds. In 1938 the domestic disappearance was 345 million pounds; in 1944, 357 million pounds; and in 1948, 375 million pounds. The exports were very small, being 4 million pounds for the first year; 5 million pounds for the second year; and ·8 million pounds for 1948. The surplus we had in Canada in 1938 was 45 million pounds; in 1944, 41 million pounds; and in 1948 it was 32 million pounds. Those figures will be in the table which I have indicated will appear in the records. It would seem that our position now is not any different, to any considerable extent at any rate, from what it has been in any one of the fifteen years I have been in the department. I am sure it is not much different from what it was 20 years before that. I will hand the table to Hansard:

Mr. Harkness: I want to ask the minister if he thinks he was quite fair in relating the stocks of butter on hand at the present time to the stocks that were on hand on the same date in previous years? He must realize, as everyone else does, that people are now able to buy margarine, which I am sure will have quite an effect on the disappearance rate of buttter. I should like him to comment on that particular phase of the matter. Has the department made an estimate of how much butter is going to disappear as compared with the disappearance rate in the past? This is the season when butter that was accumulated during the summer is released to the trade. I am sure the minister does not want us to expect that the same thing that happened in the past will happen today, and that this butter will rapidly disappear.

Mr. Gardiner: The same thing is not going to happen this year as happened some years ago when other governments dealt with oleomargarine. We have seen to that. A floor price has been put under butter. I am not going any further into the matter than to say the same thing did not happen this year with regard to butter as happened when oleomargarine was brought in before. At that time butter was up, as I recall it—and I am speaking from memory now—around 70 cents a pound, and before they got through with the experiment it was down in the twenties. This time butter was held up around 70 cents a pound when oleomargarine was introduced; and there is no doubt in my mind that, if the government had done nothing about it, butter would again have gone down to at least 40 cents and might have gone down further. But the government put a floor under it and kept it at 58 cents during the summer. The policy that is being followed is one of stabilizing the price; it is not one of holding the price up to the consumer but one of stabilizing the price at around 58 cents. The government has some 46 million or 47 million pounds of butter in its possession in order to see to it that no one charges an outrageous price for butter between now and next spring, when our cows go out on the grass again to produce butter in great quantity. In other words, there is some regulation upon it. While the farmer benefited during the summer months by the fact that the price did not run down, the consumer will benefit during the winter months by the fact that it will not run away up out of all proportion to what it should be.

To answer the other part of the question, as to what difference oleomargarine has made, I am not too sure. Last spring everybody was telling me that no one knew the difference between oleomargarine and butter, but along in the middle of the summer oleomargarine went down from something over 40 cents to around 30 cents, while butter was holding at 58 cents. Some people must have known something about it.

I was just telling someone across the floor tonight that I had something to do with a massive Great Dane dog that was fond of butter. His mistress gave him bread with butter spread thickly on it; but being Scotch, she came to the conclusion that there was no use spending so much money, so she went and got a pound of oleomargarine and spread the bread with it. The dog sniffed at it, put his tail between his legs and went and lay down in a corner as far away as he could get from it. In other words, if individuals do not know the difference between butter and oleomargarine, dogs do.

I do not know whether or not oleomargarine is entirely responsible for the lower consumption recently; but the consumption of butter during the last few months, as compared with the months immediately preceding, is down about 3 million pounds. That does not get it down to the long-term average, but it is down by 3 million pounds. That is shown by the records that we are able to compile. Our records are confined to the storages, and are based upon the records in a number of cities across Canada. But everyone in this committee knows that today there is a great deal of butter stored in freezers all over the country; and I am not so sure that the 3 million pounds that is indicated as the reduction, on the general statistics as we have compiled them over the years, indicates the true picture. There is a possibility that the consumption is not down as much as has been suggested by the figures I have given. But the outside figure in any case is 3 million pounds down in the last few months as compared with those immediately preceding.

Mr. Fulton: On this item, is the minister able to say anything in connection with the marketing act which was introduced at the end of last April, at the end of the session of the previous parliament? Have any requests been received from the provinces for application of dominion authority in the marketing of any of their produce, or has the act been applied as yet?

Mr. Gardiner: There have been three occasions on which it has been applied. The Nova Scotia apple marketing board made application quite early, and they were granted the authority; the tree fruits board of British Columbia also made application and were granted authority; and only today I signed an order in council granting the authority to the vegetable producers of British Columbia.

Mr. Fulton: Apart from the Nova Scotia application, which I think was in connection with export trade, were the other applications concerned with interprovincial trade or export trade?

Mr. Gardiner: They will include both, but I imagine that quite a part of the operation will be interprovincial. They have, however, power to do both.

Mr. Herridge: I was happy to see a news item in the paper a few days ago to the effect that a considerable quantity of apples was going forward from Canada to Great Britain out of this year's crop. According to the news item, a portion of those apples was being paid for by Britain and a portion was being paid for by Canada. Can the minister give the committee some information as to the quantity and the distribution of those shipments in Canada? In addition to that, I notice that the statement indicated that the British government had agreed that the fruit organizations of this country or others could ship gift apples to Britain direct to the consumer. Will the minister tell the committee what the situation is?

Mr. Gardiner: As I remember the transaction, it was to this effect. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce was over in Britain he negotiated an arrangement with the British government whereby there would be taken from Canada $3 million worth of apples; and at that time what was in their minds mostly was Nova Scotia apples. The arrangement was that Britain would pay the first $1,500,000 and that the Canadian government would finance the second $1,500,000. Up to date the Nova Scotians have agreed to ship 400,000 barrels of apples. The item in the press the other day stated, I believe, that British Columbia had also undertaken to ship approximately 450,000 barrels. That should have been boxes, which means that the amount is a little more than one-third of what Nova Scotia has agreed to ship up to now. But I understand that there is another quantity of something over 100,000 barrels which has still to be taken up. From what I said a few moments ago, it will be evident that there will be no difficulty about the financing of them. The quantity which it has already been arranged should be shipped from Nova Scotia and the quantity being shipped from British Columbia will much more than make up the $1,500,000 that Britain has agreed to pay, and the remainder will go forward to all intents and purposes in the nature of a gift, because the Canadian government is paying for them; and they will go forward. There cannot be any question about the total amount going in due course and the apple growers receiving the full amount for the arranged shipment.

Mr. McLure: A little while ago the minister was speaking about margarine. What is the cost of manufacturing a pound of margarine as compared with a pound of butter? There has always been some dispute over this matter. Surely the Department of Agriculture will have some figures on the actual cost of margarine.

Mr. Gardiner: I cannot say what the cost of producing oleomargarine is. I can only assume that, when the manufacturers reduced the price from somewhere in the forties down to somewhere in the thirties, they would still get their cost of production. I do not think they would have reduced the price below that. I assume it is somewhere in that neighbourhood. I am not in a position to say how much. I am bound to say it would be very difficult to state what the cost of producing a pound of butter is. It is certainly much less in the summertime than it is in the wintertime in most sections of Canada, and at 58 cents as a floor price I am quite sure that in most cases the farmer should make a profit. There may be some areas where he does not, but I do not think he would produce very long if he could not make a profit at 58 cents in the summertime. In the winter there may be places where it may be difficult for him to produce at 58 cents. I would not like to argue that point with anyone. But I think it is right to say that over the whole twelve months in any part of Canada where they should be producing butter to be marketed farmers ought to be able to make a profit at the present level.

Mr. McLure: Margarine is manufactured from oils which are imported. It should be easy to find out the cost of a pound of margarine. The Department of Agriculture must know that it is different from manufacturing a pound of butter. Different things go into it. These people are buying the oils. The minister knows the set-up. The government took all the duties off so that they could make it as cheaply as possible and get as high a margin of profit on it as they could. If we had the figures, this committee would learn that it does not cost 20 cents to manufacture the finest margarine that is put on the market.

Mr. Fulton: That is still no good.

Mr. Higgins: Did I understand the minister to say that he had a list of the average retail prices of butter in the different provinces?

Mr. Gardiner: I presume what my friend has in mind is the average price in each province.

Mr. Higgins: Yes, that is what I meant. What would the average price be in the province of Newfoundland?

Mr. Gardiner: The table which I put in dealt with the setting of the floor price. It takes 58 cents at Montreal as the basis. Basing it on 58 cents at Montreal it is about two cents lower in Winnipeg, which makes it 56. It is 2½ cents lower in Regina, which makes it about 55½. As we go west it goes up again in British Columbia. The reason for that is that their butter is largely supplied from Alberta; that is the butter which is brought in from the outside. Going in the opposite direction from Montreal, it is one cent higher in Halifax. When the table to which I refer was made up, Newfoundland was not one of us. I am sorry I am not able to give the figure for Newfoundland.

Mr. Higgins: What price does the minister believe it should sell at in Newfoundland?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, whatever the profit margin is in the freight costs as between Halifax and the island of Newfoundland.

Mr. Higgins: If the figure is 85 cents would the minister consider that high?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, I would say it is very high.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister say whether the powers which the dominion government has been able to transfer to the provinces, or to the provincial marketing boards, in connection with marketing will extend to the regulation of imports from the United States? The reason I ask that question is that in British Columbia in the marketing of tomatoes for a time this summer we were faced with a certain influx of United States tomatoes which resulted in a sudden deterioration of the market for local producers. After consulting with the producers and the marketing board officials, it seemed to me that they were powerless to control that situation. I just wondered whether the marketing act passed last April would be of any assistance in that connection.

Mr. Gardiner: My understanding is that once fruit gets into British Columbia they can control the price of it within their province, and that would be true of any other products. I do not think there would ever be any question about that. I think that is the position that was taken. On the other matter which the hon. member raised with regard to Newfoundland, I would say that if anybody is paying 85 cents a pound for butter down there he had better get in touch with our board and get some 58-cent butter.

Mr. Fulton: The actual importation and the price at which it is imported into the province are not within the control of the marketing board of the province even under the marketing act which was passed last spring. Is that correct?

Mr. Gardiner: There is no way in which the British Columbia authorities can say at what the Americans from the state of Washington must sell apples, let us say, or any other fruit in British Columbia.

Mr. Cruickshank: They would never be able to sell their apples into our province.

Mr. Fulton: Tomatoes are much more perishable than apples.

Mr. Gardiner: It does not matter what the product is. I presume the people in British Columbia will not buy a product if it is at a higher price than that at which it can be supplied by their own people. But if an attempt is made to break your market price in British Columbia by dumping products out of the state of Washington into British Columbia, then your organization certainly has control, under this legislation, of the price factor in relation to what has been brought in. In other words, they can hold the price level to their own people if anything of that kind is attempted.

Mr. Fulton: That is the point. I am not trying to get a sort of offhand admission from the minister, but it is quite an important point as to whether the marketing board can control that situation, or whether it involves some anti-dumping legislation under the Tariff Act. That is actually the point I have in mind. I am not trying to get some admission from the minister which on reflection he might not wish to have made.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member is a better lawyer than I am, and he might give himself an opinion on that.

Mr. Fulton: I am asking for an opinion.

Mr. Gardiner: I think it is a matter of practical common sense that no one is going to buy apples out of Washington, or any other fruit, tomatoes or anything else, at a price which is higher than he could get it supplied for in the province. On the other hand, I do not think that the board is going to permit someone to come in from outside and dump a product in there and have it sold at any lower price than the other. I would think that that is a matter of just ordinary common sense; but so far as the local authority that some people have to act in connection with dumping is concerned, I am not too sure about that.

Mr. Fulton: I will put it this way. My impression is that they felt that they had no power as a marketing board to prevent the importation of tomatoes into the province at a lower price than that at which the domestic growers could produce them, even under the powers given to them in the recent marketing act.

Mr. Gardiner: But they could prevent anyone from selling them at a lower price in British Columbia. They could not prevent a party from getting fruit from across the line into British Columbia but once it gets there they can prevent that individual from selling it and dumping it in competition with the other growers.

Mr. Charlton: I question the minister's statement in that regard because, unless the board bought that fruit as it came across the border, I do not see how they could control the price of it in the province. The fruit does not belong to the board itself. If that is true, the board have no need to worry about tariffs because they can control it themselves. But they are worrying about tariffs.

Mr. Gardiner: I think the hon. member had better go out to British Columbia and have a look around. The population of that province, or a very considerable part of it, is concentrated in a large city where most of the marketing is done. In the days when I was out there, when these laws were first brought into effect, one could not get across a bridge into the city except by passing a policeman who made a very careful check of what you had and what you took into the city. That, as I recall, has been a matter of interest out there for some time.

On the other question, I agree that no one proposes to stop the articles from actually crossing the boundary line, unless it were done under the old dumping laws which the federal government has. However, once it has got there, either through smuggling or in some other way, anyone who handles those apples in British Columbia is subject to prosecution. And my understanding is that they do not hesitate to prosecute in British Columbia under that act.

Mr. Jones: There is one other difficulty in connection with the possibility of dumping of inferior fruit in British Columbia, and that is the regulation regarding containers. I find the inspection service or control of the fruit within given containers is lax. I have seen cull apples or inferior apples placed in Okanagan apple boxes for sale in our larger cities. I have seen it in Vancouver. Has the minister an item in his estimates to take care of some facilities for checking the nature of the contents of a given box or package, or a given quality?

Mr. Stick: Is the price of butter pegged in Canada, and what is that price? I ask this question because I understand something was mentioned a moment ago about the price of butter in Newfoundland being eight-five cents retail per pound. I know it was eighty-five cents before the union, but the retail price is now seventy-five cents. I am asking this question because, if I am given the pegged price, I can figure out exactly what the price should be in Newfoundland, and find out if some of our people down there are charging us too much.

Mr. Gardiner: There is no pegged price, but there is a floor price. Last spring we said that for a twelve month period we would take delivery of butter at 58 cents a pound, grade A. If anyone else wanted to get the butter he had to pay at least 58 cents for it. They might in some cases have to pay a little more than that; but they would have to pay at least 58 cents, because we were on the market all the time to take it at 58 cents. We had about 46 million or 47 million pounds of butter, and we will probably have a little more before the winter season comes on. Everyone else who has butter has about half that amount, or not quite half that amount.

We are in a position of holding that butter. If anyone is selling butter at 75 cents where he should be charging only 65 cents for it, some trader there will find that out and will apply to the government for butter. If he gets butter from us under the policy we are following it will be at 58 cents, plus the freight to the point to which it has to go, and all other costs of setting it down in that place. This leaves us with our return of 58 cents, grade A butter. The butter will be regraded and put out at its proper grade and at whatever the price is in relation to 58 cents.

Just stating what I would do if I were doing it—they usually ask me about these things—if we found that a certain individual, after getting butter down there, could retail it and get the same profit as men are getting elsewhere across Canada by selling it at 65 cents, let us say, and if he were selling it at 75 cents, he would not get any more butter from the board. The butter would go to those who were selling at reasonable prices to the consumer.

If butter is out of line in Newfoundland, we will be looking very shortly for places to put our surplus butter when it comes in, and we will look to Newfoundland as well as to other places.

Mr. Ferguson: The county of Simcoe, as I am sure hon. members are aware, has been given the highest award for the finest apples grown in the world. That is well-known, of course. Owing to the fact that there will be several by-elections in Ontario in the not far distant future, might not the government be well advised to pay the farmers in Ontario a bigger price than was paid in the Annapolis valley to farmers who had to cut down their trees? I should like to know that, so that I could inform our farmers in Simcoe whether it might pay them to burn them down, or to take off the apples.

Mr. Cruickshank: The class of apples you grow, I think it would.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to ask a question or two in connection with the hog industry. At the present time there is a certain amount of perturbation in the minds of people engaged in the production of hogs as to just what the situation is likely to be in the coming year. This feeling of alarm arises from several factors.

First of all there is the matter of the devaluation of the British pound. As everyone familiar with the hog industry knows, for some considerable time we have had in Great Britain a market for our surplus bacon. In other words, they have taken the surplus of our pork products above what we consumed ourselves. During the last year a floor price had been in effect under hogs, owing to the existence of the British contract.

The question in the minds of a large number of producers of hogs is whether that contract can be renewed on anything like the terms we have had in the past, or whether the devaluation of the British pound is going to make it impossible for us to sell our bacon to Great Britain in competition with that from soft-currency countries?

Allied with that, of course, is the fact that in the past year we have not come anywhere near meeting our contract with Great Britain for bacon. The contract is for 160 million pounds. I notice in this publication put out by the department, dealing with the livestock and meat trade, it is stated, in the issue for September 22, that the total amount of bacon sent to Great Britain up to September 17 of this year was just over 25 million pounds. Only three months of the year are left, and it is quite clear that we are not going to come even close to meeting our contract.

The thought in my mind, and in the minds of many producers, is what effect this will have upon our ability to get another contract. Naturally, when one enters into a contract and does not fulfil it, there is bound to be a certain amount of wonder as to whether or not another contract will be offered. Therefore this is a natural fear. The fact that we have not made our contract is certainly not the fault of the people engaged at this time in the production of hogs. It is due to other factors I have discussed with the minister at various times, and the basis of which I shall not go into at the moment.

There is another factor which adds to the alarm, namely the large corn crop in the United States, and the fact that their pig crop in that country is greater than it has been normally. The probability is that the price of pork will drop in that country owing to the over-supply of feed, and that will likely make available a considerable amount of pork and pork products for export. Of course, that is bound to affect those overseas markets in which our pork might be sold. I should like the minister, so far as he can, to outline to the committee and to the country at large what the situation is likely to be or what the government estimates it is likely to be in 1950 as far as hogs are concerned.

I should like the minister to tell us to what extent production in this country is down. The department has very good figures, some of which they put out from time to time, and I think the minister would be in position to tell us what the departmental estimate is for hog production during the first six months of 1950. It may be that on the basis of that estimate we will not be producing any more pork than we can consume in Canada and therefore the fears entertained by the hog producers will be considerably allayed.

Mr. Gardiner: Current marketings are running a little ahead of last year; they have been increasing week by week for some time over the marketings of a year ago. At the moment production is on the upward march and the estimate is that that will continue. We do not think that production will be lower in the first six months of 1950 than it was in the first six months of 1949.

Coming to the other question of what effect our deliveries may have upon the British market, I can only say what I said during the last session, namely, that when the British came here about two years ago they did not want any bacon; they did not want any of our products except wheat. For anyone to say that there is any reason for disappointment in Britain because we did not deliver any of these products is to fail to take into consideration the facts of the case.

The British said two years ago, "We have not the dollars with which to buy anything but wheat." Then a year ago they took the position that they only had dollars with which to buy wheat and cheese. We said to them at the time, "We do not think it is a good thing, either for our people or for your people, to drop these agreements just because you have not the dollars. We think it would be much more to the advantage of both of us if we did enter into contracts."

We gave them a definite undertaking at the time that we would try to hold our contracts down to realities.

In the years during the war and immediately before the war we were writing into the contracts more than we anticipated our farmers would be able to produce. In other words, we were trying to increase production because Britain required the bacon during the early part of the war. When it would be suggested that so many million pounds be put into the contract we added another fifty million pounds and said to everybody, "Go out and produce it." Our farmers produced it, and more on top of it.

When we got down to the latter part of the war, when Britain wanted grain instead of meat products, we did not say to the farmers, "Do not produce hogs as you produced them before." But apparently, looking at the records that were coming over the radio and from Great Britain in one way or another, those farmers who wanted to grow grain particularly, and there are farmers in the west who have always been accustomed to producing grain and who like to grow grain better than anything else, finding they could make more money doing that, or could make some profit thereby—we were not urging them to produce more hogs, because the British had already told us they did not want to buy them—were told to go ahead and do the thing they felt they were best equipped to do and which they wanted to do.

The result has been as I indicated by the figures I gave a few minutes ago. They are producing more hogs than they produced before the war, but our people are eating around seventy per cent more pork products than they did before the war. The result of those two things leaves us with less pork products to send to Britain than we have sent over a long term of years.

We have said to the British, "We have always met your contention that you do not want to buy bacon. We have almost made it unnecessary for you to put up dollars to buy bacon, but some day this thing is going to turn". It has turned already with cheese. We got the quantities down in the cheese contracts to a figure of 50 million pounds. When we wrote that figure into the contract we did not think we would be able to fill it, neither did the British. But the price of canned milk went down and farmers switched over to the production of cheese with the result that we got 60 million pounds which we could have sent to Britain. Then we said to the British, "In view of the fact that you are not getting bacon and do not want to get it, in view of the fact that you were prepared to pay so many dollars for the bacon, why not take the other 10 million pounds of cheese?" But they would not take it.

All I am suggesting is that there was no lack of understanding with regard to bacon between those who negotiated the contracts. They understood that if we could persuade our own people to eat it at a better price than they were paying for it, or if we could send it to the United States at a better price than they were paying for it, that was quite all right with them; they did not want the bacon. Perhaps I should not say they did not want the bacon; they did not feel that they had enough dollars to be able to buy the bacon. There has not been any misunderstanding created in Britain that would take that market away from us. We have said to them that they do not have to pay dollars for products that we can sell for dollars in our own country or in the United States.

Then with regard to next year. I am not in position to report what the British are prepared to do next year with regard to contracts, but I am in position to say that we are insisting in every way we possibly can that we do have a contract on bacon, whether we can deliver it or not. We think it would be a good thing, both for Britain and for ourselves, if they were prepared to say, "If you do have a surplus, we are prepared to take at least a certain amount of it". We would like a contract with regard to cheese. I do not think we will have much difficulty getting one in regard to cheese. We would like a contract in regard to eggs.

We would like contracts with regard to the four products, cheese, bacon, eggs and wheat, the four products in connection with which we now have contracts. We are still trying to negotiate contracts for the year that is ahead and for a longer time if we can. That is the position at the present time. I do not think that anything we have done up to date has jeopardized our position in the British market. On the other hand, what we have been doing has got rid of the production of our farms.

Mr. Fulford: I should like to direct a few remarks to the Minister of Agriculture about what may be termed the orphan of the dairy industry. When I was a boy we were always told that Leeds leads in the production of cheese, but through the years our cheese factories have gradually diminished with the advent of milk condenseries. Today we have three milk condenseries looking after 2,250 milk patrons. That is the equivalent of 75 cheese factories, figuring 30 patrons to a factory. At the present time 520 of those patrons who have been going to the condenseries are sending their milk to the cheese factories but this is only a temporary situation. Apparently the condenseries have cut their production by 20 per cent. In fact they have cut it to such a serious degree that they cannot economically produce evaporated milk. Stocks of evaporated milk have increased enormously. I should like to quote some figures from the bureau of statistics. Last year there were 26,892,000 pounds in storage, and on the first of August of this year there were 55,147,000 pounds in storage. In the county of Leeds alone we have over 8 million pounds in storage. One plant has leased a Canadian Pacific roundhouse; it has it stocked to the roof, and they are still looking for further storage space. When the cold weather comes it is going to be a problem to keep it heated. Another plant has leased an old church, and it is rapidly being filled with milk powder.

I commend the minister for the attitude of his department in bonusing premium cheese, and in buying up supplies of cheese now that we have filled the British contract. I commend the minister for maintaining a floor price on butter, and also for purchasing the surplus production of butter, but we are facing a very serious situation in those sections of Canada where condensed milk and evaporated milk are being produced. In the spring, stocks of powdered skim milk were bought up, but this year stocks have increased in one year from 9,130,000 pounds as at September 1, 1948, to 12,162,000 pounds. There are no bonuses and no premiums paid to the producers of evaporated milk, and yet these factories are paying the highest price to their patrons for their milk.

The situation is getting quite desperate. Milk is being sold on world markets at a loss to reduce inventories. Evaporated milk is being sold in Canada today at a loss. The same thing may be said in respect to heavy shipments to Belgium, western Germany and Cuba. The sterling zone of the British empire used to be the biggest market for Canadian producers of evaporated milk. Today that area is buying its milk from Holland and Australia, both being soft-currency countries. Last year Great Britain withdrew orders for 300,000 cases of evaporated milk, which means that not one drop of Canadian evaporated milk has entered the British market in nearly two years. Today evaporated milk producers are facing a loss of markets even in the British West Indies, which has been a constant market since long before the war, and a heavy consumer of Canadian evaporated milk products during the war.

I wish the Minister of Trade and Commerce were here, because I know that to a large extent marketing comes under his department. It seems to me that markets could be found abroad for evaporated milk in the central American countries. We could buy their citrus fruits and their coffee and sell them some of our surplus milk. They are tropical countries, and it is hard to produce milk products there. I also suggest that we try to get into certain parts of the empire such as Malaya, India, Pakistan, South Africa and West Africa, and that further negotiations be conducted. I understand that we are going to buy more tin and rubber from Malaya. Could we not buy peanuts from West Africa, and cotton from Egypt? Surely some method can be devised to diminish these stocks which are now becoming a serious problem for all producers of evaporated milk across Canada.

An attempt might be made to increase the domestic use by asking bakers to include a certain amount of evaporated milk powder in their bread. I believe that was done during the war in the standard loaf served to the armed forces. Perhaps we could get rid of a large surplus in the home market. I understand that it makes better-tasting bread and increases its vitamin content.

I repeat that in the county of Leeds alone there are 2,250 farmers dependent on the condenseries for their livelihood, and they are naturally becoming anxious about their future. May I suggest that attention be paid first to finding methods of regaining markets that we have lost, second, to increasing home consumption of evaporated and condensed milk, and skim milk powder, and third, to the purchase of surplus stocks of processed milk products by the government in order to relieve a situation that is now assuming really serious proportions. Farmers producing milk for condenseries in the county of Leeds are becoming so apprehensive that they hardly know which way to turn. They are asking that some course be followed that will assure them of a constant market for their products, because I can imagine no greater calamity befalling the farmers in this great dairying section of Canada than if it were necessary for any of these plants to close their doors.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Monday is private members' day.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

21. Grants to fairs and exhibitions, under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council and subject to allocation by the treasury board, $475,900.

22. Grants to agricultural organizations, as detailed in the estimates, $43,500.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, October 3, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

THANKSGIVING DAY ADJOURNMENT

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Monday next, October 10, will be Thanksgiving day. In common with many others, I feel sure that the Prime Minister has a good deal to be thankful for, and I was wondering whether he would permit the members of this house to have next Monday as a holiday.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The Prime Minister is always susceptible to any suggestion that comes from the other side of the house. I take it that the applause means that there are several in the house who agree with the suggestion which has been made. If it appears to be the desire of the house, the government will take the necessary steps to see to it that when the house adjourns on Friday night it stand adjourned until three o'clock the following Tuesday.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WHEAT—DELIVERIES UNDER BRITISH AGREEMENT

Mr. Fair:

1. What quantity of wheat was delivered under the British wheat agreement during the crop year 1948-49?
2. At what price per bushel was this wheat sold?
3. During the same period what quantity of "class II" wheat was sold?
4. What was the average price per bushel obtained?
5. During each of the crop years 1946-47, 1947-48 and 1948-49, what quantity of wheat was sold to millers for Canadian consumption as flour?
6. At what price per bushel was such wheat sold?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Wheat delivered under the Canada-United Kingdom wheat agreement as wheat or flour for 1948-49 amounted to 146,342,802-25 bushels.

2. $2 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver, plus 5 cents per bushel carrying charges.

3. During the same period approximately 74,013,774 bushels were sold as wheat or flour at class II prices.

4. The average price obtained on the bushels recited in part 3 was $2.22471 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver.

5. Wheat sold to millers for manufacture of flour for domestic consumption in Canada was as follows:

Crop year 1946-47, 53,615,866 bushels; crop year 1947-48, 49,342,532 bushels; crop year 1948-49, 39,281,098 bushels.

6. Such wheat was sold at the following prices:

Crop year 1946-47, approximately 29,041,927 @ $1.25, approximately 24,573,939 @ $1.55; crop year 1947-48, 49,342,532 @ $1.55; crop year 1948-49, 39,281,098 @ $2.00.

1. All prices basis No. 1 northern in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver.

2. In addition to the above prices, the board recovered carrying charges of approximately 3½ cents per bushel from August 1, 1946 to July 31, 1948, and 5 cents per bushel from August 1, 1948 to July 31, 1949.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. Knowles:

1. What is the average monthly amount on account of the basic old age pension now being paid in each province?
2. What supplementary amounts are now being paid by each province?
3. What medical or other additional services are now being provided to old age pensioners by each province?

Mr. Martin:

1. As at June 30, 1949:

Province	Old Age	Blind
Alberta	$32.23	$29.98
British Columbia	29.29	29.31
Manitoba	37.86	38.55
New Brunswick	30.15	38.85
Nova Scotia	30.24	38.47
Ontario	37.06	37.64
Prince Edward Island	26.42	28.63
Quebec	28.94	29.68
Saskatchewan	37.12	38.78
Northwest Territories	28.75	30.00

Note: At the end of the quarter April 1 to June 30, 1949, all provinces had not completed the work of adjusting pensions in accordance with the provisions of new agreements bringing into operation the amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act passed at the last session of parliament. The average pension paid in Newfoundland and the Yukon Territory as at June 30, 1949, is not yet available. Information for the quarter July 1 to Sept. 30, 1949, will not be completed before October 31.

2. According to information furnished by the provinces, supplemental allowances are being paid as follows: Alberta, $7.50 a month; British Columbia, $10 a month; Manitoba, nil; New Brunswick, nil; Newfoundland, nil; Nova Scotia, nil; Ontario, nil; Prince Edward Island, nil; Quebec, nil; Saskatchewan, $2.50 a month subject to a means test; Northwest Territories, additional assistance may be authorized if required; Yukon Territory, $10 a month.

3. According to information furnished by the provinces, additional benefits are provided to pensioners as follows:

(a) Medical services. Medical services for pensioners and certain dependents are provided by British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. Ontario provides medical services for pensioners only.

(b) Dental and optical services. Alberta and Saskatchewan provide dental and optical services.

(c) Hospital services. British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan have plans under which pensioners are given free hospital care. In other provinces pensioners receive whatever hospital services are available to persons unable to pay.

(d) Homes for the aged. Ontario and British Columbia offer assistance to municipalities for the purpose of constructing homes for aged persons.

INDIANS—ALBERTA—HOSPITALIZATION AND MEDICAL TREATMENT

Mr. Shaw:

1. What arrangement has been in effect for the hospitalization and treatment of Indians in the Rocky Mountain House district of Alberta?

2. Has the Department of Indian Affairs or any other branch of government or any official thereof been negotiating with medical and hospital authorities at Rocky Mountain House for the hospitalization and treatment of Indians in that district?

3. If so, what has been the result of such negotiations?

4. What provision has been made to provide such services to the Indians after September 30, 1949?

Mr. Martin:

1. There are 125 in the Rocky Mountain House band of the Sunchild Cree Indians (treaty Indians) who live on a reserve thirty miles from Rocky Mountain House. There is also a group of 200 Chippewa Indians (non-treaty) who wander in the foothills. So far as is possible in the light of their highly nomadic life, the same facilities are extended to both groups by the directorate of Indian health services.

[Mr. Martin.]

The medical care of these people has been provided by a doctor of Rocky Mountain House on a fee-for-service basis. The doctor has seen patients in his office and has attended them in Rocky Mountain hospital. It has not been convenient to him to attend on the reserve.

A local dentist has provided dental services on a fee-for-service basis.

2 and 3. The doctor's accounts for professional services have been paid in accordance with the prevailing schedule of fees which is applied uniformly across Canada where professional attention is provided on a fee-for-service basis. However the doctor has not been satisfied with the schedule of fees. In June 1948 the directorate of Indian health services offered to pay him a per annum stipend if this would be more agreeable to the doctor but he did not reply to this offer. Recently he signified his intention to cease services to Indians except as private patients.

The rate paid to the Rocky Mountain hospital is $5 per day for adults and $1.25 for newborn children. This rate was established May 1, 1948, and has not been under discussion since that time.

4. There is every reason to believe that arrangements for hospitalization at Rocky Mountain House are satisfactory. The Indian health service regional superintendent in Alberta is continuing to negotiate with local physicians for the provision of professional services.

COLLECTIVE SECURITY—PACIFIC AREAS

Mr. Church:

1. Has the government given any consideration to the creation of a Pacific pact?

2. If so, what action has been taken?

Mr. Claxton:

1. Yes.

2. The information requested in this part of the question was supplied by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in a statement given by him which appears in Hansard of September 16, 1949, on page 14.

NATIONAL HEALTH—HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION GRANTS—HOSPITAL BEDS

Mr. Argue:

1. For how many hospital beds have grants been authorized under the hospital construction grant in each province?

2. What are the names and the location of hospitals for which grants have been authorized, and the number of beds in each case?

Mr. Martin:

The figures given below include adult beds, both acute and chronic, as well as bassinet bed equivalents. A bassinet bed equivalent represents three bassinets developed in cubicles, which are regarded as one adult bed for the purpose of the grant.

1. Prince Edward Island, 333 beds; Nova Scotia, 1,067⅔ beds; New Brunswick, 127⅓ beds; Quebec, 5,557 beds; Ontario, 3,660⅓ beds; Manitoba, 703⅔ beds; Saskatchewan, 1,121⅔ beds; Alberta, 825⅔ beds; British Columbia, 1,427⅓ beds; Newfoundland, 1 application for the hospital construction grant is now under consideration.

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER DAM AND IRRIGATION PROJECT

Mr. Diefenbaker:

What expenditures, month by month, since the 1st of January, 1949, have been made on preliminary investigation and work on the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project?

Mr. Gardiner: January, 1949: 8,788.50; February, 1949: 20,506.42; March, 1949: 11,855.04; April, 1949: 15,971.01; May, 1949: 27,082.61; June, 1949: 85,432.75; July, 1949: 60,976.58; August, 1949: 71,502.74.

HEALTH SURVEYS

Mr. Coldwell:

1. Has the federal government received any preliminary or final reports from any of the provinces on the health surveys which have been undertaken with federal aid?
2. If so, from which provinces?
3. Will these reports be published in whole or in part, and when?

Mr. Martin:

1. The department has received progress reports and preliminary reports on the survey from all provinces. No final report has been received.

2. See answer to No. 1.

[Mr. Martin.]

3. No decision has yet been reached with the provinces with respect to publication of these reports.

PUBLIC STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS OF DIPLOMATIC SERVICE

Mr. Hansell:

Does the government accept any responsibility for speeches made by responsible members of the diplomatic corps at home and abroad, and is the subject matter of such speeches to be considered as government policy?

Mr. Claxton: The general rule is that the government accepts responsibility for speeches on matters of public policy made by officers of the external affairs service, at home and abroad. This general rule is subject to exception according to the circumstances in which speeches are made. So, for example, when an external affairs officer, in speaking, indicates that he is doing so in his personal capacity, or where he speaks as chairman of an international conference, committee, or other body, he is clearly not representing a government view, as such. Moreover the government may disclaim statements made by external affairs officers inconsistent with government policy.

HEALTH—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

Mr. Coldwell:

1. Is any province in Canada receiving federal assistance which directly or indirectly helps to pay for drugs, medical care, or hospitalization?
2. If so, what provinces are receiving this assistance?

Mr. Martin:

1. Yes.

2. All provinces are receiving and are entitled to receive assistance towards medical care, supply of drugs and hospitalization under the mental health grant, tuberculosis control grant, cancer control grant, venereal disease control grant and crippled children grant.

FIRE PREVENTION—CIGARETTES—USE OF SALTPETRE, ETC.

Mr. Knowles:

1. Have representations been received by the dominion fire commissioner, or by any other official or department of the government, from the association of Canadian fire marshals, requesting legislation or regulations prohibiting the manufacture of cigarettes containing saltpetre or other properties in the cigarette paper or the tobacco that increase the burning properties of the cigarette and thus create a fire hazard?
2. If so, has consideration been given to such a request?
3. What is the result of such consideration?

Mr. Belzile:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.

DEVALUATION OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—INTEREST PAYMENTS IN U.S. FUNDS

Mr. Thatcher:

1. What amount of the Canadian debt is owed to American citizens or the American government?
2. What is the value, if any, of the bonds or loans which carry interest payable in United States funds?
3. What is the probable annual loss to the Canadian treasury of such interest payments, caused by the recent dollar devaluation?

Mr. Belzile:

1. It is estimated by the dominion bureau of statistics that $701 million of government of Canada bonds were owned by residents of the United States at the end of 1946.

2. Government of Canada bond issues payable in New York in U.S. dollars total $398 million. A great proportion of this debt is in bearer form, and as a result the present ownership is unknown. However, the portion of these loans held in Canada and elsewhere is believed to be relatively negligible and, with this exception, the total stated is owed to institutions or residents of the United States.

3. The annual interest charges on bonds payable in United States funds are increased by $1,281,000 as a result of adjusting exchange rates on the basis of a 10½ per cent premium on the U.S. dollar.

WHITE ROCK, B.C., POST OFFICE SITE

Mr. MacInnis:

1. Has the government purchased a site for a post office at White Rock, British Columbia?
2. If so, what (a) is the size of the site; (b) was the purchase price?
3. Who was the registered owner of the property at the time of purchase?
4. Was other property or properties offered to the government?
5. If so, what was the size and price in each case?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes.
2. (a) 60 feet by 69·08 feet; (b) $27,000.
3. James Lee Monahan and Albert Victor Gay.
4. Yes.
5. (a) Lot 5 and ½ Lot 6, Vidal Subdivision, S.E. ¼ section 10, T.W.P. 1, N.W.D. map 2386, irregular size; $6,300.

(b) Corner Victoria and Martin streets, lots 14 and 15, 60 feet by 99·47 feet; no price quoted.

(c) Lots 11 and 12, S.E. ¼ section 10, T.I., map 4270, 100 feet by 117 feet; $12,500.

*CATTLE—COMPENSATION FOR TUBERCULOSIS REACTORS

Mr. Cardiff:

1. Has the government taken any action towards raising the compensation paid to farmers for cattle condemned under the T.B. testing program?
2. If so, what action has been taken?
3. Has compensation been raised?

Mr. Gardiner: The other day I was under the impression that I answered this question and asked that it be dropped until the legislation was brought down, when we could discuss it fully. It is on its way here now, and I am sure it will be fully discussed then.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

NEWFOUNDLAND—STERLING SURPLUS AND POUND DEVALUATION

Mr. Higgins:

1. Has the Newfoundland surplus in sterling held in England been made available to the government of Newfoundland?
2. If so, was the full fund made available, and has devaluation of the pound in any way reduced the amount received by the government of Newfoundland?

Mr. Belzile: That portion of Newfoundland's surplus which was in the form of blocked sterling held for the redemption of Newfoundland 3 per cent guaranteed stock was made available, before devaluation, to the province of Newfoundland at the rate of £1=$4.02.

FISH—PRICE SUPPORT—ORDER IN COUNCIL P.C. 1148

Mr. Bryce:

1. Under order in council P.C. 1148, what quantities and species of fish were bought?

2. Has this fish been sold? If so, at what price and to whom?

Mr. MacNaught:

1. The following species and quantities:

Species	Quantity (lbs.)
Whitefish (dressed)	152,044
Whitefish (round)	2,398
Sauger (round)	469,950
Pike (round)	161,034
Pike (headless)	396,031
Pickerel (round)	759,825
Trout (dressed)	3,671
Trout (headless)	1,115
Tullibee (boxed)	1,341,688
Tullibee (bagged)	89,046
Total	3,376,802

2. Yes. The disposal was as follows:

Disposal	Quantity (lbs.)	Receipts $
(1) Sold for reduction to fish meal	2,328,572	28,889.80
(2) Sold to fur farmers for fox and mink feed	968,687	14,654.00
(3) Sold in Toronto retail markets for human consumption	31,244	3,841.20
(4) Used for filleting and reduction experiments	35,820	—
(5) Used in training federal fisheries inspectors in Winnipeg	9,951	—
(6) Held for re-inspection as to quality	2,528	—
Totals	3,376,802	47,385.00

The above figures are all subject to final audit.

*HOUSING—STEAM SUBURBAN SERVICE IN TORONTO DISTRICT

Mr. Church:

1. What arrangements are being made by the government to secure a steam suburban service from the two national railways to aid the new government housing scheme in the Toronto district?

2. Will the government confer with the two steam railways of Canada accordingly, to aid in this work?

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to deal with this question orally. For more than one reason I think it is ambiguous. So far as I am concerned, it is ambiguous because I do not know whether it pertains to the Department of Transport or the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. But it is clearly ambiguous for another reason. It reads as follows:

What arrangements are being made by the government to secure a steam suburban service from the two national railways to aid the new government housing scheme in the Toronto district?

What does the hon. member mean when he says "aid the new housing scheme"? If it is the ordinary meaning of the word "aid" that is intended, then I do not think there can be an answer. If by "aid" is meant the commuting of passengers from the suburban areas to the city of Toronto, then I would point out that the hon. gentleman has already put that question and has received an answer.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

Mr. Green: Could the question be allowed to stand until the hon. member has a chance to review the minister's statement?

Mr. Chevrier: If my statement is correct that the question is ambiguous, it should be reworded.

Mr. Church: I will read it in Hansard and see what the minister said. I just came in as he finished and was about to sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION—COST OF LIVING BONUS OR OTHER SUPPLEMENT

Mr. Knowles:

1. Have representations been received from persons or organizations representing superannuated civil servants since January 1, of this year, asking for reconsideration of the request for a cost of living bonus or other supplement for superannuated civil servants?

2. Has the government reconsidered this matter at any time this year?

3. Has any such reconsideration to this question been given since June 27, 1949?

4. If so, what is the result of such reconsideration?

Mr. Belzile: The Minister of Finance and other ministers have received a number of representations on this matter this year, and the Minister of Finance has reconsidered the policy on several occasions this year, but he has come to the conclusion that the policy announced in the House of Commons last year and in the earlier session this year should be continued.

BUTTER—GOVERNMENT HOLDINGS

Mr. Catherwood:

What action is contemplated by the government in regard to the disposition of marketing of the 48 million to 50 million pounds of butter that is held in storage at the present time?

Mr. Gardiner: It is the government's intention to sell its holdings of butter to the people of Canada through the trade, during the period of short supply.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPEMENT BANK

Mr. Isnor:

1. What was the total number of applications received by the Industrial Development bank for the years 1945, 1946, 1947 and 1948?

2. By provinces, what was the number of applications (a) received; (b) granted; (c) refused; (d) withdrawn?

3. What number of supervisors are employed, showing their names, addresses and districts served?

4. Are there supervisors in any one of the four maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland?

5. If so, what are their names, addresses and districts served?

6. What was the number of employees and the annual payroll in each of the years 1945, 1946, 1947, 1948?

Mr. Belzile:

1. Fiscal year ended September 30: 1945[1], 485; 1946, 377; 1947, 387; 1948, 391.

[1] 11 months.

2. Details of applications by provinces are not of government record. For Canada as a whole the information is as follows:

Fiscal year ended September 30	(a)	(b)	(c)	(d)
1945[1]	485	97	160	228
1946	377	169	103	105
1947	387	177	97	113

[1] 11 months.

3. J. C. Ingram, Toronto—Ontario between Fort William-Sault Ste. Marie on the west and Ottawa-Kingston on the east.

D. T. Muskett, Winnipeg—Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario as far east as Fort William.

N. C. Tompkins, Vancouver—Alberta and British Columbia.

S. R. Noble, general manager, Montreal—all other parts of Canada.

4. No. Maritime business is handled through the general manager's office.

5. Answered by No. 4.

6. Number of employees at September 30: 1945, 26; 1946, 44; 1947, 77; 1948, 92.

Total of salaries paid in fiscal year ended September 30: 1945*, $67,443.61; 1946, $128,-487.29; 1947, $203,180.12; 1948, $265,440.26 (* 11 months).

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—LOSS OF TIME THROUGH ILLNESS

Mr. Knowles:

1. Have any representations been received from (a) trade union organizations; (b) unemployment insurance advisory committees; (c) any other bodies, requesting that the Unemployment Insurance Act be amended so as to make it possible for a recipient of unemployment insurance benefits to continue to receive such benefits even though he becomes ill after being awarded the same?

2. If so, has consideration been given to such representations?

3. What is the result of such consideration?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

1. (a) Yes.
   (b) No.
   (c) Yes.

2. Yes.

3. The matter is still under consideration, and an actuarial expert is reviewing same.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—CONNECTIONS WITH BORDER PORTS

Mr. Winkler:

1. Has assistance been asked by the provinces or offered by the government to aid in the construction of first class highways connecting the proposed trans-Canada highway with the main United States border ports?

2. If so, what provinces, and to what United States border ports?

Mr. Winters:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

RENT CONTROL

Mr. Knowles:

1. What proportion of residential premises in each province is now subject to rent control?

2. What proportion of residential premises has been decontrolled?

3. How many residential premises have been decontrolled in each province, in each month, since the regulations providing for such decontrol came into effect?

Mr. Belzile: In so far as the wartime prices and trade board is concerned:

At the inception of dominion-wide rental control all real properties, with the exception of lands and premises used solely for farm purposes, were made subject to the regulations. From time to time the regulations were relaxed by exempting from either all or part of the regulations a certain class of real property or a certain class of lease of real property. So hotel accommodation was exempted on April 7, 1947; summer cottages, winter chalets, etc., on February 23, 1948; commercial accommodation on March 8, 1948; buildings completed by new construction after January 1, 1947, on June 19, 1947; and self-contained housing accommodation let to a person who was not the tenant on November 1, 1948, on that date. The various exemptions applied to the property itself or the lease thereof as was appropriate in each case. Since these exemptions all were effected by general amendment of the regulations, and the landlords in order to take advantage of the regulations do not have to communicate with the wartime prices and trade board, and since there never has been and is not yet any complete tabulation of every rental in effect in Canada, it is impossible to determine the number of residential properties which have been affected by these various exemptions.

The wartime prices and trade board, by its order effective on April 14, 1947, permitted landlords who suffered grievous hardship from their inability to recover possession of their own housing accommodation to apply to a commissioner for an exemption permitting them so to recover possession in accordance with the laws of the province in which the accommodation is situated. It is the duty of the commissioner to consider the hardship of the landlord and also that of the tenant, if he were evicted, and either to grant or refuse such application. To the 31st of August, 1949, commissioners have granted such applications in the following numbers:

Alberta	316
Saskatchewan	289
Manitoba	382
Ontario	3,845
Quebec	2,505
New Brunswick	179
Nova Scotia	139

It should be emphasized that such exemptions are not decontrol but merely the granting of permission to the landlord to recover possession for his personal occupancy. So long as the tenant remains in occupancy the maximum rental ceiling is still in effect, and thereafter the premises are not rented but owner-occupied.

Effective November 1, 1948, the wartime prices and trade board permitted landlords who needed housing accommodation for their own personal residence and who had owned it since November 1, 1947, to give to the tenant six months' notice to vacate on forms provided by the board. A copy of such notice must be filed in an office of the board prior to service. To August 31, 1948, such notices have been filed in the following number:

Alberta	199
Saskatchewan	219
Manitoba	245
Ontario	5,210
Quebec	3,443
New Brunswick	133
Nova Scotia	87

Again it is pointed out that such notices to vacate are not indicative of residential properties which have been decontrolled. They simply represent demands for possession filed in the board's office. If they were served on the tenant, and in all probability the large majority were so served, the maximum rental ceiling applied to the residential accommodation until the tenant vacated, and thereafter the accommodation was owner-occupied. In fact in both these cases and those described in the preceding paragraph the board by a special and individual order on each filing prohibits the landlord from renting or selling the accommodation for a lengthy period.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—"EXERCISE EAGLE"

Mr. Pearkes:

1. How many troops, army and R.C.A.F., took part in "Exercise Eagle?"
2. How many aircraft took part, and of what type were they?
3. How many observers and spectators from the services were permitted to watch the exercise?
4. How many civilian spectators were authorized to attend?
5. What was the total cost of the exercise?

Mr. Claxton: While I am giving the answer to this question, it should be understood that it is not to be regarded as a precedent for giving similar information in the future about other training exercises.

1. Army—965 of which 225 were reserve; R.C.A.F.—659 of which 50 were auxiliary.

2. 72—Long range transport, tactical transport, communication, tactical bombers and fighters and trainers.

3. 54.

4. 41 press and radio personnel. No restriction was imposed upon the public, and approximately 500 watched the parachute drop and a further number estimated at 900 watched the action at Dawson Creek.

5. The exercise was part of the regular training of the forces, and additional expenses over and above pay, allowances, etc., incurred in connection with the exercise for overhaul spares for aircraft, travel, transportation, freight and fuel, amounted to $131,000.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Mr. Argue:

1. What nations are participating in the international wheat agreement?
2. What is the total market available for wheat under the agreement, as presently operated?
3. What is Canada's share of the total market?

Mr. McIlraith: 1. Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Ceylon, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Egypt, El Salvador, Greece, India, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Lebanon, Mexico, The Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru, Portugal, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Switzerland, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, Venezuela, Australia, Canada, France and the United States of America. In addition to the foregoing countries which have ratified the agreement, the following countries have until October 31, 1949, to ratify: Brazil, China, Colombia, Cuba, Ecuador, Guatemala, Liberia, Nicaragua, Panama, Philippines and Uruguay.

2. 456,283,389 bushels, subject to adjustment of quantities upward for importing countries or downward for exporting countries to allow for countries which may not eventually ratify.

3. 203,069,635 bushels, or 44.5 per cent.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—KAMLOOPS JUNCTION TO KAMLOOPS STATION

Mr. Fulton:

1. Has the government or the Department of Transport received any advice to the effect that the Canadian National Railways intends to discontinue the movement of its transcontinental trains to and from Kamloops Junction to Kamloops station?

2. If so, what reasons are given for this decision?

3. Will the government or the Minister of Transport intervene to have the railway continue the service to and from Kamloops as formerly?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. Yes, by passenger traffic department, special circular No. E-16/49. This circular was sent to the board of transport commissioners and to the Department of Transport.

2. The Canadian National Railways advise that until the fall change of time train No. 3, one of Canadian National's two westbound transcontinental trains, operated via Kamloops. Withdrawal at the conclusion of the summer service of one of the two steamers plying between Vancouver and Victoria necessitated the schedule of No. 3 being shortened one hour in order to permit this train to make steamer connections. It was not possible to shorten the schedule of No. 3 sufficiently without eliminating the Kamloops Junction to Kamloops station movement.

3. It is not the policy of the government or the Minister of Transport to intervene in matters which relate to the internal operation of the Canadian National Railways, but it is open to any individual or organization to make representations to the board of transport commissioners with respect to changes which may be made from time to time in railway services.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE—DEVALUATION OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—IMPERIAL VETERANS

Mr. Church:

1. In view of the devaluation, will consideration be given by the government to providing imperial veterans residing in Canada some allowances for devaluation of the pound sterling?

2. Will any action be taken?

Mr. Mutch: Canadians who were domiciled in Canada prior to their service with the British forces have their British awards of pension supplemented by Canada to an amount equivalent to that paid to Canadian pensioners under similar circumstances. The recent devaluation of the pound sterling will consequently not affect such pensioners. The only proviso is that such supplementation may only be paid during residence in Canada. Other than the foregoing, no provision exists to pay moneys from public funds to imperial veterans who were non-pre-war residents and have income from some British source on the grounds that their income is affected by the change in rate of exchange.

WHEAT BOARD—COARSE GRAINS—DELIVERIES AND SALES BY PROVINCES

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many bushels of (a) oats; (b) barley; (c) flax have been sold and delivered to the wheat board, by provinces, in the period August 1 and September 15, 1949?

2. How many bushels of each of said grains have been sold by the wheat board during the said period?

Mr. Howe: For obvious reasons it has not been the custom to give particulars of the current transactions of the wheat board. To publish the information would be to prejudice the operations of the board. I ask that this question be dropped.

Mr. Fulton: In view of the fact that the hon. member who asked the question is absent, may we ask that it stand pending his return?

Mr. Howe: No; it is not in the public interest to give the information. I would ask that it be dropped.

Mr. Charlton: A similar question was asked last year.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

HEALTH GRANTS

Mr. Coldwell:

1. How much of each of the health grants was approved for expenditure in each of the provinces prior to April 1, 1949?

2. What percentage of each of the health grants was approved for expenditure in each of the provinces prior to April 1, 1949?

3. How much of each of the health grants was paid to each of the provinces prior to April 1, 1949?

4. What percentage of each of the health grants was paid to each of the provinces prior to April 1, 1949?

5. How much of each of the health grants has been approved for expenditure in each of the provinces from April 1, 1949, to date?

6. What percentage of each of the health grants has been approved for expenditure in each of the provinces from April 1, 1949, to date?

7. How much of each of the health grants has been paid to each of the provinces from April 1, 1949, to date?

8. What percentage of each of the health grants has been paid to each of the provinces from April 1, 1949, to date?

Mr. Martin: Return tabled.

Orders for Returns

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—MANITOBA

Mr. Ross (Souris):

1. How many townships in Manitoba have applied for assistance under PFAA?

2. What locations by township and range?

3. What are the names and addresses of field inspectors under PFAA, now in Manitoba?

RENT CONTROL

Mr. Isnor:

1. Are rental controls in effect at the present time?

2. Do houses owned by (a) individuals; (b) corporations; (c) trust companies; (d) Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation; (e) crown companies come under rental control?

3. Has the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at Toronto, or any other city, increased its rental rates during the past six months?

4. If so, was permission requested and granted?

BEEF CATTLE—EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES —LIVESTOCK OFFICERS

Mr. Isnor:

1. What was the total export shipment to United States of beef cattle for the first eight months of the years 1947, 1948, 1949, through each of the following provinces (a) Quebec; (b) Ontario; (c) Manitoba; (d) Saskatchewan; (e) Alberta; (f) British Columbia?

2. How many livestock officers are located in each of the above provinces?

SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. Knowles:

1. How many retired civil servants are receiving pensions of amounts within each of the following brackets (a) less than $20 per month; (b) $20 to $29.99 per month; (c) $30 to $39.99 per month; (d) $40 to $49.99 per month; (e) $50 to $59.99 per month; (f) $60 to $69.99 per month; (g) $70 to $79.99 per month; (h) $80 to $89.99 per month; (i) $90 to $99.99 per month; (j) $100 per month or over?

2. How many widows of retired civil servants are receiving pensions of amounts within each of the brackets indicated in the above question?

3. How many veterans of world war I are included in the figures given in each bracket in question 1?

4. What is the number of retired federal civil servants and also the number of widows of retired federal civil servants at present residing in each province?

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—INDEBTEDNESS AND DEBT REDUCTIONS

Mr. Fair:

1. How many soldier settlers of great war I are still in debt to the soldier settlement board?

2. What is the total amount of their indebtedness?

3. How many have paid off their loans and acquired clear titles since January 1, 1948?

4. Have any reductions in debt been granted during 1948 and 1949?

5. If so, in how many cases, and what is the total amount of such reductions?

6. What is (a) the smallest; (b) the largest reduction granted?

[Mr. Martin.]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence that has passed between the government of Canada and the governments of the various provinces in connection with construction of, and in particular the location of, the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Winters: Subject to the usual reservation as to obtaining the consent of the provincial governments.

Mr. Speaker: Carried, subject to the reservation made by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply.

Mr. Coldwell:

For a copy of all correspondence and telegrams which have passed between the government of Canada and the government of Saskatchewan from July 1, 1944 to July 30, 1949, in regard to the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Winters: Subject to the reservation that it would be necessary to obtain the permission of the Saskatchewan government.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN PACIFIC EMPLOYEES—STRIKES OF 1918-19—PENSION RIGHTS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the immediate establishment of a royal commission to examine into the whole question of the pension rights of Canadian Pacific employees who were involved in the strikes of 1918 and 1919, the said commission to have power to determine the settlement that should be made of the matters in dispute and to whom and in what manner any pension adjustments should be made, as recommended by Mr. H. S. Johnstone, Industrial Relations Officer of the federal Department of Labour, in his report to the Minister of Labour under date of December 7, 1945.

He said: I am satisfied that this is a motion the purpose of which has the support of hon. members in all parties in this house. In fact I believe it has the support of the majority of hon. members, and I hope they will vote accordingly. Its purpose is to try to find a way to rectify a gross injustice perpetrated thirty years ago. It may seem strange that an injustice outstanding so long should still be the subject of debate in this House of Commons, but hon. members who were here prior to the last election, and those who were here prior to the election of 1945, will be familiar with the story of the employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company whose pension rights were denied to them because of their participation in certain strikes of 1918 and in the Winnipeg general strike of 1919.

I realize that hon. members who have been here as long as I have, or longer, may feel that the story is well known to them and need not be rehearsed; but so as to refresh their memories, and so as to bring the grievous nature of this injustice to the attention of the ninety or one hundred new members, I should like to touch upon some of the highlights.

As some hon. members know, there were in the years 1918 and 1919 a number of sporadic strikes, particularly in western Canada from Fort William through to the Pacific coast. In addition to these strikes, many of which were of short duration—one that I know of in Kenora, Ontario, lasted for only eighteen hours—there was the general strike in Winnipeg in May and June of 1919. Railway employees became involved in these strikes, particularly in the general strike of 1919. Those involved were mainly the shop crafts, the trainmen, express employees, and a few others. I am not going into the story of the strike itself, nor shall I argue its merits one way or another at this late date; but the fact is that when employees of various companies and corporations returned to work, questions arose about their pension rights. In due course employees of other large corporations and bodies in the city of Winnipeg had their pension rights restored. I refer particularly to the employees of the Canadian National Railways, a few provincial government employees, quite a number of telephone employees, and also employees of the city of Winnipeg, including policemen and firemen. All those employees were on plans which at that time were noncontributory. Yet in a very short time the pension rights of the employees of all these other employers to whom I have referred were reinstated. But not so the employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. They were informed that a rule in the pension plan, which had been in effect since 1903, brought about a condition under which a break in service would cut off any prior pension rights. Another rule stipulated that no one starting to work over the age of forty years could become eligible for pension.

The joint effect of these two rules was that Canadian Pacific employees who were over forty years of age in 1919 lost all the pension rights they had earned up to that time, and were denied entry into or the enjoyment of any pension benefits they might otherwise have earned after 1919. I emphasize that there is that group of men who thirty years ago were forty years of age and over who lost their pension rights in their entirety. In addition to that, employees who in 1919 were under forty years of age, while in due course permitted to enter the pension plan which was brought into effect in 1937, and while given certain rights from 1919 to 1937, were denied all rights they had earned prior to 1919.

This means that we now have quite a number of older men in the first category about which I have spoken who are retired employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, some of whom had thirty, forty or fifty years of service—I know of one who had fifty-four years—but no pension whatsoever. In addition we have men retiring now, year by year, and going on pension, but that pension is reduced from what it should be. They receive only such rights as they have earned since 1919. They lose the rights they earned prior to that year.

For reasons which have been detailed here so often, and which are well known particularly to hon. members from railway centres from Fort William to the Pacific coast, the men affected have felt this was a grievous wrong, and one which should be rectified. They made their own efforts over the years, particularly in 1936, 1937 and 1938, when negotiations were under way in connection with the new contributory plan which was put into effect on January 1, 1937.

During the negotiations for that plan the general chairmen, who represented the trade unions to which these men belonged, tried to have the company reinstate the men who had lost their rights because of the so-called break in service in 1919. The company refused. Even after the new pension plan was agreed to, and even after it came into effect on January 1, 1937, the same general chairmen who had negotiated for the men in respect of the new contributory plan continued to negotiate, and appealed on behalf of the men who were affected because of the 1919 situation.

I emphasize that point because it is sometimes alleged that the unions, and the leaders representing the men, accepted this as an accomplished fact when they agreed to the new pension plan. This is not so.

Mr. Mitchell: Would the hon. member give the name of the general chairman?

Mr. Knowles: I have on my desk, and was about to deal with, a copy of a letter sent out on October 18, 1939, over the signature of Thomas Broad, addressed to all the officers and members of the affiliated lodges—and in this connection the affiliated lodges are those of the C.P.R. system federation, No. 125—telling the members of the affiliated lodges what they had been trying to do on their behalf, and expressing regret that thus far Mr. Coleman, on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and the others for whom he spoke, had not seen fit to meet their request.

In the letter sent out by Mr. Broad, in which he quoted from a report placed in his hands by Mr. A. McGovern and Mr. J. A. Bell, who were respectively chairman and secretary of the subcommittee dealing with the question of the reinstatement of pension rights, this statement is made by the general chairmen, who carried on representations on behalf of the men:

> We have kept in close touch with this matter for a very considerable period of time, always encouraged by the hope that sufficient improvement might take place in the financial condition of the company to enable us to realize the firm conviction which we have always held, that, in such improved conditions at least, some relief might be forthcoming.

One of the main arguments used by Mr. Coleman was that to meet the request made would cost $1,250,000 and, their revenues being what they were in the mid-thirties, the request could not be granted. But the same general chairmen reported the firm conviction, following their dealings with the company, that if there came a period of better revenues, the requests of the applicants might be met.

Mr. Mitchell: Did the hon. member read the advice of the late Senator Murdock on behalf of the trainmen?

Mr. Knowles: The late Senator Murdock came to see me and to talk with me about this matter on several occasions. If there was one man in this building who kept encouraging me to keep at this matter, it was the same late Senator Murdock.

Mr. Mitchell: He is not here to speak for himself.

An hon. Member: Who is making the speech?

Mr. MacInnis: Why do you not speak for him?

Mr. Knowles: In connection with the financial position of the company, I hold in my hand annual reports of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the years 1942 to 1948. They show the following as the net incomes of the company in those years:

Year	Net Income
1943	42,982,718
1944	34,699,830
1945	31,614,162
1946	25,134,731

These are the net incomes before they paid dividends, which in some years were of the order of $5 million, some years of the order of $11 million, but always a good balance in terms of millions to add to the profit and loss account. Yet they still protest that they cannot afford the million and a quarter—and it is less now because of the number of men who have passed away—that it would cost to rectify this injustice.

In view of the efforts these men had made through their trade union leaders to obtain redress from the company, and in view of the further fact that the company had refused to meet them through their leaders, the day naturally came when some of them decided it would be well to see if something could be done on their behalf from the floor of this house. Shortly after I was first elected to the House of Commons, therefore, they came to me, as a representative from the city of Winnipeg, and, as the older members in the house will know, I have been discussing this matter from the floor of the house ever since.

May I point out at this moment that my efforts in connection with this whole problem have divided themselves into two parts: On the one hand I have tried to persuade the government to find some way to rectify the injustice perpetrated in 1919, and on the other hand I have tried to get legislation to prevent the recurrence of this kind of injustice.

With respect to the second matter of trying to get legislation to prevent this from happening again, hon. members who were here in the last parliament will know that that has been achieved. It is now the law of the land that—

> No employer or employers' organization, and no person acting on behalf of an employer or employers' organization, shall—

I skip a bit to get down to the meat of the law from which I am quoting:

> —deny to any employee any pension rights or benefits to which he would otherwise be entitled by reason only of his ceasing to work after the commencement of this act as the result of a lockout or while taking part in a concerted stoppage of work due to a labour dispute where such lockout or stoppage of work has been enforced by the employer or called by the recognized representative of such employee, as the case may be, after all steps provided or contemplated by law have been taken through negotiation, collective bargaining, conciliation and arbitration to settle such dispute or by reason only of dismissal contrary to this act.

I am reading from subsection 2 (b) of section 4 of the labour code. That amendment was agreed to by this house on June 17, 1948. Hon. members will remember how often I asked for that protection. It means a great deal, not only to the railroad workers but to all workers covered by the federal labour code, to have it in there. I might say in passing that the effect of this parliament passing that amendment has gone even farther. Ontario has adopted the federal labour code in full, and that clause now appears in the labour code of that province.

As I have said before, one of the things that has been most thrilling to me in my experience in public life is the way in which these older men whose cases are still not rectified have rejoiced in the fact that their loss has not been in vain, that there is now such an act on the statute book which prevents it from ever happening again. I want to impress upon hon. members who have heard me speak time and time again on this subject the fact that there is a difference between the bill I brought in year after year, the principle of which is now on the statute books, and the fact that the men who were deprived of their rights in 1919 still have not had that injustice rectified.

In bringing this matter before parliament during the early years of my sojourn here I tried to get the government to look at it in various ways. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) expressed sympathy for the plight of these men, and he used certain arguments which I shall come to in a moment. The minister stated that the letters I was producing from local lodges across the country expressed just local feeling, and that he could not act unless there was a request from the Canadian heads of the unions involved.

Mr. Mitchell: I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. Knowles: If the minister wants it I shall dig up Hansard and show it to him. What did I do? I communicated with the people interested, and in April, 1945, that objection was met by letters being sent to the prime minister from Mr. Frank Hall, of the Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship clerks; Mr. J. Hampson, of the International Association of Machinists, and Mr. J. J. Hendrick, Canadian vice-president of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. Those three men, along with Mr. Thomas Boyd, of the Brotherhood of Express Employees, a Canadian Congress of Labour railroad union, asked the Prime Minister to establish a royal commission to go into the whole question. Those letters from the trade union leaders whom I have named—all of them the Canadian heads of their unions—were written on April 6, and when no action had followed by April 12 of that year I brought the matter up on the floor of the house and asked the then prime minister if he would give attention to it. As recorded in Hansard of April 12, 1945, the prime minister said that if they had written him making such a request it would certainly receive consideration. A little later in the same exchange that day the then prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, said, as reported on page 818 of Hansard:

> I remember having had an experience somewhat similar of a strike in 1910 or 1911 when I was minister of labour, and we were unable to get redress for another twelve years, but we got it eventually. If any wrong has been done in this case—

That is the case I am now talking about.

> —I would hope that it might be remedied, even if it took forty years.

I suggest that there is the stamp of approval, of the principle at any rate, of the fight that we are carrying on in connection with this matter, by the former prime minister himself. That was April 12, and only a few days later, on April 24, an officer of the Department of Labour, Mr. M. M. Maclean, was directed by the minister to instruct Mr. H. S. Johnstone, an employee of the Department of Labour, to make an investigation into this matter.

The terms of reference of that investigation were specific, and are set out in the report Mr. Johnstone made later to the Minister of Labour. He was asked to determine whether or not a royal commission should be appointed. That was the task given to Mr. Johnstone by Mr. Maclean on April 24, 1945. Mr. Johnstone conducted a thorough investigation and made a report on December 7 of that year, a copy of which I hold in my hand. It is sessional paper 238A, which was tabled in this house on Tuesday, August 20, 1946.

This is a 66-page document. If you read it through you will find that Mr. Johnstone interviewed all the people who were concerned or even related to this question. He interviewed representatives of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Canadian Pacific Steamships, representatives of the former Canadian Pacific Express Company, and of the various unions at both high and local levels. He also saw representatives of the Canadian National Railways in Winnipeg, and of the government of Manitoba, and the city of Winnipeg, in order to get their views of what they had done in the same situation. His report summarizes all those conversations and deals categorically with a number of points that had been in dispute. May I remind hon. members again that the question asked was clear-cut: Should a royal commission be established? This is the concluding paragraph of the report in which Mr. Johnstone answers that question:

> It is the opinion of the undersigned that the employees have established strong claims for consideration. The nature and extent for adjustments, if any, cannot be determined except by a more exhaustive analysis than was possible, or even contemplated, in this preliminary investigation. I would therefore recommend that a royal commission be established to examine into the whole question, to determine what if any consideration should be granted, and if so, then to whom and in what manner pension adjustments should be made.

That is signed by H. S. Johnstone, industrial relations officer of the dominion Department of Labour. I repeat that that is the categorical recommendation from an official of the department following the best and most objective study of this whole problem that has ever been made, and the results of which are contained in this worth-while report.

It took a while to get that report tabled in this house; as I have indicated, it was not tabled until August 20, 1946. When I discovered that Mr. Johnstone's recommendation was so categorical I thought it only reasonable that the government should carry it out. Naturally I began pressing for that action and questioned both the Minister of Labour and the former prime minister on the point. The minister knows that I raised the matter on a number of occasions. Every time I got an answer of some kind.

In the main the minister's answers have been consistent. He has given two reasons for objecting to the carrying out of this recommendation. Incidentally I might say that before we got this report in the house a copy had been sent to the Canadian Pacific, and they produced a memorandum commenting on it, and this memorandum was tabled in the house. We know of course that they objected to the carrying out of this recommendation. But the minister's objections have in the main been two, and one of the best statements of those objections was made in the house on Monday, February 3, 1947. The statement to which I refer can be found in Hansard of that year at pages 35 and 36. It was very early in the session. In the first place the minister said that he had consulted the Department of Justice, and the Department of Justice had advised him that the appointment of a royal commission would serve no useful purpose. On subsequent occasions, when I pressed the matter, the minister fell back again and again on that opinion from the Department of Justice. I will deal with that in a moment.

The other point the minister made was made by him after my good friend the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) came to my support with a very fine statement. In fact I think I should read it. It is to be found on page 36 of Hansard of February 3, 1947, and reads:

> Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): May I ask the Minister of Labour a question supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre? Has the minister no suggestion about finding some sort of justice for those people who were over forty years of age when the Winnipeg strike ended and were denied pensions for that reason? I think the hon. member has that in mind. To say that a royal commission will not be appointed does not help us very much. Has he no suggestion to offer as to getting justice for these people?

That is the whole point of this motion. I ask the house to pass it so that the government will have the opinion of the house that the government should give consideration either to the suggestion I make, the appointment of a royal commission, or to some alternative suggestion that will secure justice for these men. I shall read the answer made by the Minister of Labour to the hon. member for Calgary West at that time:

> Mr. Mitchell: The answer is simple. The money does not belong to the government to begin with. As both my hon. friend and the member for Winnipeg North Centre know, this money is the property of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.
> Mr. Knowles: We don't agree.
> Mr. Mitchell: You don't agree with anything.
> Mr. Knowles: It is easy to see you agree with the C.P.R.
> Mr. Mitchell: It is the property of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and at the time no contribution, I understand, was made by the employees to the insurance fund.

Then there are exchanges between the minister and myself of the kind that he and I often have across the floor of the house. The minister makes the point that he does not feel he should be asked to spend other people's money.

Those are the two main arguments against my proposal for a royal commission. The first is the opinion of the Department of Justice that it would serve no useful purpose, and the second is the minister's contention that we should not spend other people's money. As to the first point, I think it is time that members of the house say what they all feel, that the Department of Justice is not a court of law, and that the rulings that cabinet ministers are able to bring from the Department of Justice in support of the stands they take in the house no longer impress us. There have been far too many of them.

In this instance I put against the advice of the Department of Justice the statement I have already read from the report of Mr. Johnstone who said that even after a six months' inquiry it was not possible to reach a final conclusion, but that the problem called for the more exhaustive inquiry involved in a royal commission. That is what a man says who lived with the problem for six months. The Department of Justice brushes it aside by saying that the appointment of a royal commission would serve no useful purpose.

Mr. Mitchell: After six months he could not make up his own mind.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no! The minister apparently has not read the report. Mr. Johnstone certainly did make up his mind. His mind was very clearly made up after studying both sides, and he was of the opinion that the matter should receive the attention of a royal commission. Frankly, if there is no purpose in setting up a royal commission when a grievous injustice is before the country, then let us not have any more royal commissions. It seems to me that the case is clear for giving consideration to this matter, and it is something that the house should call upon the government to deal with.

The other point the minister makes is that it is C.P.R. money. That is one of the issues in dispute, and Mr. Johnstone does not have any trouble making a statement with regard to that. It is found on page 15 of his report, and reads:

> Another argument has to do with the employee's equity in pensions. The employee organizations assert that during wage negotiations the company always pointed to the pension plan as one of the benefits accruing by reason of their employment with this particular concern. The company officials interviewed stated that they had never heard pensions being discussed in this manner during wage negotiations.

Look at what Mr. Johnstone says:

> The unanimity of the employees on this point makes it difficult to accept the company's statement. It is hard to imagine wage discussions occurring wherein the pension plan was not mentioned in this way. Any established plan of this nature, whether wholly company contributory or not, when maintained for a time becomes one of the established working conditions, and together with the actual wage paid they form the remuneration earned by the employee. The employee argument therefore that by each year of service he is building up deferred earnings in a pension is one which has considerable weight. To be deprived of these past earnings by reason of absence on strike, or absence during a strike, does not seem to be equitable treatment; and all the more so—

I ask the minister to listen to this.

> —and all the more so when the decision is made by the party which will thereby save large sums of money as a result of rigid adherence to this rule.

Mr. Johnstone was satisfied that this money, even though it was a noncontributory plan at that time, was an equity that the men had in the funds of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and that in effect the company was taking away from these employees a million and a quarter dollars, or more, if the company says it is more, that had been put aside for them.

I might point out that C.P.R. men who are on pension today draw a pension made up in part of what they have earned by contributing to the new fund since 1937 and in part out of the consolidated revenue fund, shall I call it, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the years they served from 1919 to 1937. The money was in a different classification from that which is applicable now under the contributory plan, but the principle is the same. In those days the company told the men that this was their money. If you read Mr. Johnstone's report with regard to his interview with the Canadian National Railways, and provincial and municipal governments, you will find the same position taken. They all point out that their plans were noncontributory in those days, but that the result was the same. The money was there for the employees concerned. We are not asking that somebody else's money be given these men. We are simply asking that their own money that was set aside for them be given to them.

Those are the two principal objections that the Minister of Labour has given to the house. I think that the answers to them are unanswerable, and that the house should now pass the motion. In the name of such of these people who are still alive, I plead with the house not to play any tricks with this motion today, not to talk it out, but to take a few hours if necessary to debate both sides, and certainly before eleven o'clock tonight vote on it and ask the government to give consideration to the whole question. As I have already said, if the government has a better plan—

Mr. Carroll: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he think his resolution gives the proposed royal commission power to enforce any award that it might recommend?

Mr. Knowles: As the hon. member knows, there are a number of rules that limit what private members can put on the order paper. If we put anything on the order paper that involves, even indirectly, the possible expenditure of money, you know what happens.

Mr. Carroll: I did not mean that at all. When a court of law makes a decision as to the apportionment of money, the court of law has power to enforce it. Does the hon. member think his resolution sufficiently definite to enable this royal commission, when it has made its report, to enforce any award that it might make?

Mr. Knowles: I should like it to be that way, but I know that if I made it that way, even if it were not challenged on a point of order, hon. members on the other side would then argue that I was going too far.

Mr. Carroll: Oh, no.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, yes. The hon. member has been here before; he will soon learn how it goes in this parliament, too. If you put too much into one of these motions you just do not get anywhere with it. I am prepared to leave some of the details to the government. I am prepared to leave it to them to work out the terms of reference of this royal commission. Further, may I say that I worded the resolution in the terms of Mr.

Johnstone's report. If you read the last few sentences of that report you will find that I am not asking the government to do any of the additional things I might like them to do, but only precisely what Mr. Johnstone recommended to the government concerning the matter which was placed before him.

Before my time runs out I want to refer to at least one other argument which is sometimes advanced in connection with this matter, though I do not recall its having been put forward on the floor of this house. I refer to the suggestion that it might upset the actuarial nature of the C.P.R. pension plan to pay these pensions, and that other employees who came to work in the twenties or thirties might not approve it. As a matter of fact there is a suggestion of selfishness in that argument that I do not find to be present among trade union workers, in particular among railroad workers; but it is an argument sometimes made which should be dealt with. Mr. Johnstone himself deals with it at page 16 of his report, where he says:

> The C.P.R. has claimed that in order to restore pensions it would be necessary to raise the employees' contributions under the new plan beyond the present three per cent—

In other words the C.P.R. claimed that if this had to be done they were not going to take the cost out of their own funds but were going to take it out of the pay cheques of the people now working for them. Of course all you have to do is make that suggestion and perhaps you can scare up some fear about it among those now employed by the company. But I can tell the minister it has not worked out in that way. Young men in the Canadian Pacific Weston shops, who for the most part live in my riding, who have been working for the railway perhaps only a few years, are just as much interested as are the older men in having this grievance rectified. Let me continue quoting from that paragraph:

> —the inference being that the employees on a system-wide basis would not agree to this. The petitioners in this case are asking for restoration of benefits lost under the old plan—

They are asking for the money that was set aside in the years prior to 1919, and which is now in the consolidated revenue fund of the railway company.

> —and it is hardly fair to argue now that the request cannot be granted because it is believed that other persons than the company, namely the present employees, are not prepared to pay for something the C.P.R. failed to provide in the past.

I read that paragraph partly for its own content, but also to indicate that in his report Mr. Johnstone has dealt with all the arguments, and in nine cases out of ten his findings make it clear that the case is on the side of the men and that the company has not a leg to stand on.

There is one place where he does say the company has something to its credit. It is a minor point, but I am going to refer to it. On page 8 of the report he deals with the case of the employees of the Canadian Pacific Express Company, and points out that a few of these, twenty-three to be exact, who were over forty when they returned to work in 1919, did have their rights reinstated from 1919 down to October 18, 1937, the date settlement was made. The men say this is one case in which the pension rights of men over forty were reinstated, and that this does seem like a point from which the C.P.R. ought to go on and give justice to the rest of the men. But the company comes back and says that in the pension plan of the Canadian Pacific Express Company they did not have that "over forty" clause which has been in the plan of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company since 1903. Even so, says Mr. Johnstone, this is an example of substantial justice which was given a few people, and the men generally feel it indicates that a break in service should not interfere with their pension rights.

For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, and the reasons I have been giving down through the years; and because of the fact that this parliament pronounced itself upon this principle by section 4 (2) (b) of the labour code passed on June 17, 1948, I urge that we should not let this matter drop. It is true that a number of these men have died even during the years I have been raising this question on the floor of this house. It is also true that as the years go by the men who retire and lose part of their pension rights lose a relatively smaller portion, because this relates only to what they would have earned prior to 1919. But here is a case of grievous injustice. Originally over ten thousand men were involved in these strikes in 1918-19, but it was not long before the number affected so far as pension rights were concerned dropped to four thousand, then three thousand and two thousand. So far as I can estimate from my study of the problem, I doubt whether more than two thousand are affected today. Of those two thousand probably less than two hundred are affected in full—that is, less than two hundred of these men were forty years of age thirty years ago and are still living, but without pensions because they were over forty years of age when they went back to work in 1919. To those two hundred men this parliament owes redress of this grievance. In addition to the two hundred something less than two thousand, perhaps 1,500, are either now retired on less pension han they should have, or will be retiring luring the next few years with pensions less han they otherwise would enjoy.

I have said already, and I repeat it, this parliament pronounced on this principle on June 17, 1948. We stated that from then on his sort of thing was not going to happen again. We wrote it into the law of the land. I am not trying to stretch a legal point. I know that law came into effect only when the act was proclaimed. It was not retroactive, more is the pity. But we have accepted the principle that absence due to a strike should not interfere with pension rights, and having done so I submit that this parliament should say that that legislation should be retroactive in this instance, at least in principle, so that his grievance may be rectified before all these men are gone. I plead with the house to treat this matter seriously, and, before this day is over, to see that this resolution passes.

Mr. A. F. Macdonald (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest while the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) presented his case in support of this resolution. When I saw this motion on the order paper I believed I could add something to the debate, because, while I am not an employee of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, I am employed by a steam railway in this country. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that when men and women serve in that important industry they are made aware of all the rules governing their employment and the operation of trains and their duties. Knowing a little about labour matters, and having been employed in western Canada at the time of the 1919 strike, though not one of the strikers, I looked up the pension rule of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company which is in question here, and it reads like this:

There is no question about it; it is definitely laid down, and I am sure every employee is aware of the rules governing the pension fund and of the fact that the railway had absolute jurisdiction over that fund. I am sure also that the employees are aware of the rules and regulations which apply when their employment with the railway is terminated because of the fact that they have reached the age of superannuation.

At the time of the 1918-19 strikes the strikers were participating in a sympathy strike and were using their economic arm in a dispute that was no concern of the railway that was employing them. It was definitely a sympathy strike. In going out on such a strike the employees did not abide by the pension rules. If I recollect correctly, the union leaders of that day thirty years ago advised the employees—even begged them—not to go out on strike.

The action of the federal Department of Labour has now been called into question. From my own experience I know that the federal Department of Labour is not a dictatorship, but it gives legislative advice to the government. In this country we have enacted labour laws and laws for the handling of industrial disputes. The Department of Labour has the means of conciliation and the machinery to put to work to safeguard the interests of labour and management.

As to the question of pension rights of the C.P.R. employees who were involved in this strike of thirty years ago, in an attempt to clear up this matter the Department of Labour did go so far as to delegate an industrial relations officer in the person of Mr. H. S. Johnstone to make a separate inquiry and report to the department. This he did. The report made by him has been highly praised by labour. But the resolution now before us proposes the establishment of a royal commission to inquire into the whole question. I am certainly opposed to the resolution. The C.P.R. definitely has no legal responsibility to abide by the findings of a royal commission even if those findings favoured the paying of the pension. There is no obligation to do so on the part of the C.P.R. After thirty years have elapsed, if we were to favour the establishment of a royal commission at this time we could only be accused of giving support to the establishment of a pressure group. I am quite sure that the intent of this resolution is to try to prejudge the findings of a royal commission, if one were established, and to use those findings in order to put pressure on the company to do something they have no legal right to do. There is no legal responsibility on the C.P.R.

Then I think there is something really more terrible in moving this resolution after thirty years have gone by, and that is because of the humanity involved. If we vote to establish a royal commission or to find ways of establishing one, we shall raise the hopes of these people that they have a legal right which I believe they do not possess. I am sure their hopes would be raised and that a royal commission, even if one were appointed, could do nothing about the matter.

I hesitated to rise on this matter, but the labour laws of this country are respected and I believe that at this time we have no right to ask for the establishment of a royal commission to inquire into something that has already been dealt with.

Labour Conditions

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I am certain, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution which is before the house this afternoon is one which will be of prime interest to the many railroad workers in the constituency of Moose Jaw. This afternoon therefore I should like to join with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in what I at least think is a reasonable appeal to the government.

What does this resolution before us this afternoon ask us to do? It calls for the establishment of a royal commission to examine into the whole question of the pension rights of Canadian Pacific employees who were involved in the strikes of 1918 and 1919, the said commission to have power to determine the settlement that should be made of the matters in dispute. The history of the strike is so well known that I shall not dwell on it this afternoon. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) covered it briefly. Hon. members will, however, recall that back in 1919 approximately ten thousand railroad workers went out on strike. The strike was one of the most unfortunate, I suppose, in Canadian labour history. Finally it was broken. It was crushed by the company. But the C.P.R. were not content merely to crush it. Having done that, they decided that they would also take away the pension rights of the employees by calling the strike a "break in service". As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out, employees over forty were cut off from all pension rights and those under forty were cut off from pension rights before 1919. Since that time we have seen representation after representation made by the various railroad unions to the company, all of which have failed.

I think a great deal of credit is due the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for having raised this matter in the house so consistently since 1944. I know that the railroad workers in my own constituency greatly appreciate his efforts. I think it was largely as a result of the plea he made in this house that Mr. H. S. Johnstone, an official of the labour department, was appointed by the minister to investigate this whole question in 1945. I might say that Mr. H. S. Johnstone is well known to me. He used to be the mayor of Moose Jaw, and I am sure he is exceedingly capable; he is an able and honest-minded citizen. I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) used great discretion when he appointed him. Mr. Johnstone spent many months speaking with the various people affected by and interested in this strike. Some of the statements he made in his report are fairly interesting to a layman.

For instance, on page 2 he states that a roya commission which had been set up by Si Robert Borden—

> . . . recommended specifically to the C.P.R. that th action of the officers be not considered a break i service affecting employee rights.

Then on page 14 Mr. Johnstone stated:

> In the state of chaos which existed it is conceiv able that many of the absentees were away becaus they genuinely believed they were in danger if the tried to work; others had good reason to believ they were needed at home; still others might hav presented themselves for work that afternoon, an finding the premises closed could see no good reaso for remaining on hand;

Then on page 15 Mr. Johnstone goes on t say:

> . . . the employers argue that the strike was illega If it were, then the proper place to bring punitiv measures is through the courts. The legality o illegality of a strike is not mentioned in the pensio rules, and the fact that the strike is illegal shoul form no part of the decision to withhold or grar pensions.

> The C.N.R. has passed through the same experi ence as the C.P.R. The C.N.R. has not regarde absence on strike or absence during strike as dis qualifying a worker for pension.

He went on to point out that the employee of the Manitoba government, the employee of the Manitoba telephone system, and th Winnipeg municipal employees' who ha also gone out on sympathy strikes, did nc have their pension rights taken away fro them. Finally, on page 17 of his report M Johnstone made a categorical recommendatio as follows:

> It is the opinion of the undersigned that th employees have established strong claims for cor sideration . . . I would therefore recommend tha a royal commission be established.

The report is a particularly significant on in view of the fact that it was made by a official of the labour department, and mad by a man who I believe was appointed b the minister himself. The report was mad four years ago, but still nothing has bee done about it. I ask the minister and th government: If they did not intend t implement Mr. Johnstone's recommendation why did they waste his time, and the tax payers' money, in having him compile report?

The resolution which is before us toda asks parliament to do exactly what one the minister's officials has recommended—n more and no less.

When representations were made in 19 by the unions, regarding the pensi rights, requests incidentally which had bee made repeatedly, at earlier dates, to M D. C. Coleman, vice-president of the Can dian Pacific Railway, he said:

> We have kept in close touch with this matter ov a considerable period of time, always encourag by the hope that sufficient improvement might take place in the financial position of the company as to enable us to realize the firm conviction which we have always held that in such improved conditions some relief might be forthcoming.

In other words, the then vice-president frankly admitted that there was a moral obligation on the part of the company, if not a legal obligation. At that time Mr. Coleman blamed the financial position of the company for the inability of the Canadian Pacific Railway to take any action in regard to these pensions. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has pointed out, in the last ten years the financial position of the company has greatly improved. It has had very healthy surpluses each year and considerably augmented revenues. We have seen the board of transport commissioners grant freight rate increases totalling I believe about 28 per cent. Surely now there is no excuse for the company, if that was the reason they gave for not giving these pensions. So far as I know, they have made no attempt to live up to the promise which Mr. Coleman made in 1939. Personally I believe that even at this late moment the railroad itself, on its own initiative, should make some attempt to restore these pension rights. Most Canadians would probably agree that there were wrongs on both sides of this dispute. Most Canadians would agree that probably the railroad had certain legitimate grievances. But surely after 29 years, surely after all the suffering that some of these employees have endured, the railroad can at this time afford to be magnanimous, even though belatedly so.

The board of transport commissioners and the government of Canada have been generous with the Canadian Pacific Railway in the last few years. I do not think it would hurt the Canadian Pacific Railway to be equally generous with some of its loyal and faithful employees. If the railway still refuses to act, Mr. Speaker, then this royal commission should be set up. The trade unions have asked for it, and the minister's investigator has asked for it. I do not see why we cannot act. The minister has said that the commission could not force the company to carry out its recommendation; the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) has suggested that it would not be legal. But surely no one in this house is naive enough to suggest that the board of transport commissioners would not have certain bargaining powers with the railway. I suggest that they use these bargaining powers and use them pretty soon. I believe that it is in the interests of every hon. member, regardless of his politics, to have this matter investigated, and I hope that a vote will be taken before eleven o'clock and that the royal commission will be set up.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up a great deal of the time of the house on this resolution because I have spoken quite extensively on it on another occasion, but I do wish to express the view that it seems to me rather strange the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) did not act upon the recommendations of the Johnstone report, when it was he himself who set in motion the machinery for the commission. It is decidedly poor practice to disregard the recommendations of a commission of the kind that Mr. Johnstone was the chairman of, even though they did not quite coincide with the views held by the Department of Labour. In my view there is a greater need than ever before for the government to set up the royal commission asked for in the resolution, and by that means determine once and for all whether there are sufficient grounds to compensate these men, as requested in the resolution.

I was amazed at the remarks made by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald). It is a well-known fact of course that railway officials are on call almost all the time, but that does not interfere in any way with this particular subject. The point is, when a strike is in operation the men cannot go back to work. If you made it a general rule that a man must appear for work when a strike is called—whether it is a legal strike or not is not the point—of what use would a strike be? What earthly effect would a strike have if employees had to report for work? In effect, what the hon. member for Edmonton East suggests is that the power of a strike be taken away from workers entirely. If that were done they would have no effective weapon whatever with which to fight large companies. Almost everyone in his senses would regard such a suggestion as utterly foolish.

As has been suggested, the government itself recognizes the power of a strike, because it is guaranteed in the national labour code, and properly so. If the hon. member for Edmonton East kept in a little closer touch with the Department of Labour he would know that.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. member was a member of the industrial relations committee and I think he will agree with me that there is no recognition of the breach of contract in the labour legislation of this country.

Mr. Johnston: I did not say that.

Mr. Mitchell: But the hon. member ran around the corner.

Mr. Johnston: That is just another illustration of why this resolution should be passed. The minister is assuming that I said something which I did not, and he is assuming something else which is not in the Johnstone report. It is wrong to base a judgment on that kind of assumption, and there should be a royal commission to determine once and for all what the facts are.

The hon. member for Edmonton East thought it was a shame to raise the hopes of these poor individuals. What a lamentable excuse! He would throw out the resolution which asks for a thorough investigation of this matter on the ground that it may raise the hopes of these individuals. I wonder whether it is better to raise their hopes or to let them starve to death. Apparently he would prefer the latter. I am quite convinced that the people of Edmonton East, who elected him, even though they be Liberals, would object to an attitude such as that.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): On a question of privilege, the hon. member is making statements that are quite derogatory.

Mr. Johnston: What is the privilege? It is just a matter of opinion.

Mr. Wylie: He has no privilege.

Mr. Johnston: Most hon. members will agree that in the statement he made the hon. member for Edmonton East was wrong all the way through.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): I did not state—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Macdonald (Edmonton East): I did not say that men could starve.

Mr. Johnston: I did not hear the point of privilege.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): May I be allowed to speak on the point of order.

Mr. Wylie: You can make your speech later on.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Speaking to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Edmonton East—

Mr. Wylie: That does not come under this question.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Anyone may speak on a point of order. I understood the hon. member for Edmonton East to say that, unless it could be proved that the findings of a royal commission could be executed or could be enforced, an inquiry would raise hopes unnecessarily in the minds and hearts of those who were affected by this matter.

Mr. Johnston: How would you know whether the findings and conclusions of a royal commission would raise the hopes of the men until the commission had completed its work? No objection surely could be raised on that ground. They may, and very likely would, rule in favour of the Johnstone report. I am afraid that that is what the government fears, and why it is somewhat reluctant to set up the royal commission to make a thorough investigation.

As I said at the beginning of my observations, it was not my intention to speak at length because I have spoken about this matter on other occasions. I wish to assure the house however that I am in full accord with the sentiments expressed in the resolution. I should like to see the royal commission set up, and proper attention paid to these men.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am going to say only a few words in this debate, because I do not think the case made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) requires support. I do not believe his case could be improved by anything that either I or any member could say in support of it.

I rise merely to draw attention to a question which has been asked in connection with the appointment of a royal commission. This question was asked by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll), and I believe the same question has been put in more positive form by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald). The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond has asked whether the findings of a royal commission, if enforceable, could be legally binding upon the company. Then, if I heard him correctly, the hon. member for Edmonton East gave it as a categorical statement that the findings of a royal commission could not be legal.

Surely when a royal commission is appointed we do not ask whether its decisions or its findings—it does not make decisions; it makes findings—can or cannot be enforced. That is not the purpose of appointing a royal commission. About a year ago the government appointed a royal commission on prices. Was it a prerequisite to the appointment of that royal commission that its findings could be enforced in a court of law? It could make findings against certain companies.

We have appointed hundreds of royal commissions. As a matter of fact, a royal commission is appointed to ascertain facts, following which the government may or may not act upon such facts thus ascertained by the royal commission. That is the whole point of this proposed appointment.

Let me go back to the appointment of Mr. Johnstone, who was appointed to investigate this matter and make recommendations. Evidently his recommendations were not binding. Nevertheless he was appointed and he made a finding to the effect that the case should be further investigated by a royal commission, such body or individual having greater moral authority than he would have.

I am positive that, if the investigator had said he did not think a royal commission should be appointed, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) would bring that forward at once as a reason for not appointing such royal commission. He would base his case solely upon that finding. However, the investigator did not do that; on the contrary, he submitted to the Department of Labour that this was a case of importance sufficient to warrant the appointment of a royal commission to ascertain further facts. I suggest that the Department of Labour, or the government on the advice of the Department of Labour, could not go far astray in accepting that advice.

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should think the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), who spoke last, would probably remember very little of the 1919 strike. You do not need a royal commission, because the point is a simple one.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) has referred to the right to strike. No one is denying anyone the right to strike. There is a fundamental principle in British institutions, namely the sanctity of contract. Let us understand that.

Hon. members will understand that I have some knowledge of the 1919 strike, and had knowledge of it before some hon. members who now sit in the House of Commons resided in Canada. I remember as a young man negotiating an agreement with the Dominion Power and Transmission Company, of Hamilton, one of the vice-presidents of which was the father of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Gibson). I recall the mental condition throughout the country at that time, and the people who went up and down this country, as so often happens, without any sense of responsibility to the people they are supposed to lead.

Frankly—and I suppose I learned this procedure at my mother's knee—I said to my organization of electrical workers: "If you go on strike in sympathy with these people in Winnipeg, I am through, because I have just negotiated and signed a contract with this company."

I do not have to ask Mr. Johnstone because, you will understand, this is the end of the road. I have to make the decision. There is no place beyond this; this is the pivotal point. I have said before in the house that I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is just kidding these people—that is all. Well, perhaps I should not go that far—

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit one question?

Mr. Mitchell: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: In return for the one the minister asked me. Why did the minister appoint Mr. Johnstone to do this job, and why did the minister ask him to report on this matter?

Mr. Mitchell: That is simple. If my hon. friend is ever charged with any responsibility in the life of this nation, and God forbid—

Mr. Knowles: Answer the question.

Mr. Mitchell: I will come to the question. During the war I appointed hundreds of conciliators to look into disputes for me—hundreds of them. And my hon. friend must remember that those were difficult days.

Mr. Knowles: This was just before an election.

Mr. Mitchell: My C.C.F. friends laugh. They laughed in 1939 when they said: Goods but not men; cash on the barrelhead.

In those difficult days I had these problems—and I suggest they were vast problems. I appointed the commissioner, he made his report to me, and I had to make the decision.

I want to say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that I am just as sympathetic toward these people as he is. Let that be clearly understood. It is not a question of sympathy; it is a question of deciding whether you can do anything. May I give a lesson to my hon. friends in this house, whether they are on this side or on the other side, by saying that I am a great believer in the contributory form of pension, whether it be old age, health insurance or anything else. When you pay into something you have a right to say how that money shall be spent. I think the trade unions and the railroad industry of this country followed the right procedure when they established pension plans on a contributory basis, and where committees were set up on which were represented the employers and the employees to decide on matters of policy. My hon.

friend may not agree, but I would rather take the opinion of the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald).

Mr. Knowles: He did not know what he was talking about.

Mr. Mitchell: I know my hon. friend is so clever. This world is full of clever people who have got it into such a mix-up that we do not know which way they are going.

Mr. Knowles: Who is in power in this country?

Mr. Mitchell: I am not casting any reflections upon my hon. friends.

Mr. Fair: You are doing all right.

Mr. Mitchell: I think it is the simple things that govern the life and destiny of a nation, but there are some people in this country and in other countries—I have said this before—who feel that, if they can make a thing so complicated that they cannot understand it themselves, then the other fellow should understand it. I have never taken that view. We hear a lot about the law of supply and demand, choose your own weapons and so on.

Mr. Knowles: Don't forget the canopy of heaven.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend, who is a clergyman, should know something about the canopy of heaven.

Mr. Knowles: I want these people to get some justice before they get there.

Mr. Mitchell: I did not interrupt the hon. member when he was speaking.

Mr. MacInnis: Wait until you see Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles: The minister would not have a speech if we did not interrupt.

Mr. Mitchell: This afternoon the hon. member said that I had said something, but I have not the faintest recollection of it. When two men talk together there is such a thing as confidence between them. I have not the faintest recollection of having said that to my hon. friend. I remember last year he raised the question of my integrity in connection with a file that I had permitted him to read in my office.

Mr. Knowles: On a question of privilege, I accept the minister's challenge and before this day is over I shall bring down Hansard to show that he said what I said he said.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. member said it this afternoon.

Mr. Knowles: The minister is accusing me of saying that he said something when he has no recollection of having said it. I referred to something that was said on the floor of this house and which appeared in Hansard.

Mr. Mitchell: I am sorry, I will take the hon. member's word for it for what it is worth. This problem strikes at the very roots of contractual obligations as we understand them. I have a vivid recollection as a boy, in Hamilton, of the 1919 strike. I could name the actors in that great labour drama. I think the mistake in Winnipeg was that they took the wrong advice. When you make a contract, it is a contract; when you break it, there is no longer a contract. You have to renegotiate just as they had to do in 1926 after the general strike in Great Britain.

I am sincere when I say that if by following the advice of my hon. friend we could give, not justice but a measure of support to these men, I would certainly go along with him. Do not accuse me of supporting big industry or monopoly capitalism, whatever that might mean, and all that sort of thing, when I say that this is not our money, but that it belongs to somebody else. As was stated by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll), if a royal commission or some other person should make a recommendation, this House of Commons has no power to carry it out. As I have said before, it is far better to tell people the blunt truth as you understand it even though it may not be very popular.

I believe quite sincerely that the setting up of a royal commission would be nothing else but window-dressing. It could not do anything for the people concerned. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) said something about the right to strike—I do not know where he read that; so did the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). That is not the point. The point is that there was a breach of contract. This money belongs to somebody else because it was a noncontributory system. While the powers of parliament are great, there is a limit to those powers.

Mr. Knowles: To whom did that money belong?

Mr. Mitchell: It did not belong to my hon. friend.

Mr. Knowles: To whom did it belong?

Mr. Mitchell: That is a matter of opinion. The hon. member has been going around in circles.

Mr. Knowles: Johnstone says that it belonged to the men.

Mr. Mitchell: Who cares about Johnstone?

Mr. MacInnis: The minister did at one time because he appointed him.

Mr. Mitchell: I am reminded of the time when I acted as chairman of a conciliation board in the city of Quebec. I was probably the first trade unionist in the history of the British commonwealth who had been appointed the chairman of a conciliation board and I know whereof I speak.

Mr. MacInnis: That does not prove anything.

Mr. Mitchell: Just a minute. I remember my good-looking friend when he was in the city of Montreal many years ago with his nice black hair and all that sort of thing.

Mr. MacInnis: I still have the hair.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre reminds me of one witness who appeared before that conciliation board. He talked for an hour and a half and when he left the room I said to one of the commissioners, "I wish you would look through the window." He said, "What for, Humphrey?" I said, "I want you to see if the street railway in this town is running around in circles." He said, "Why do you say that?" I said, "That last witness, the superintendent of the street railway, certainly is."

As I said, it is far better to be frank. These men should be told that, notwithstanding the report of any commission or commissioners, this parliament or this government cannot do for them what my hon. friend wants to have done.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, the Canadian Pacific is above the law?

Mr. Mitchell: Above the law? That is just sloppy talk. I believe that you are rendering a disservice to these men by seeking to have such a procedure adopted when, in my judgment, the matter should be handled by the men's organizations rather than by some politician who never negotiated an agreement in his life. I think that the correct approach is for the men's organizations to go to this particular railway company and submit their case to them, as they did for a good many years before I was even born. The discussion on the floor of the House of Commons—I am not talking of the basic law—of the day-to-day negotiation of industrial relations renders no service to the men themselves, renders no service to the employers, and certainly does not render any service to the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): From 1942 to 1945, Mr. Speaker, I had the pleasure of listening to various debates on this question. I am amazed to find a minister of labour taking the position that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has taken this afternoon, particularly a minister who over the years has prided himself on carrying his trade union card and being so closely identified with trade unions, and also in view of the efforts that trade unionists belonging to the railway trades have themselves made.

There are one or two statements made by the minister to which I want to call attention. First of all he charges that those who are pressing this matter today are simply kidding these poor men who suffered an injustice thirty years ago. I submit that, by the same process of reasoning, if the minister is right, then he was also kidding these men when he appointed an officer of his department for the purpose of finding out whether a royal commission was necessary to investigate the matter. I do not see how the minister can escape that conclusion. Of course that officer was appointed just prior to an election, but that is no excuse. I submit that the minister cannot escape the conclusion that, if those who are waging this fight today are kidding these people, the minister also was kidding them, and he must have known he was kidding them.

The minister laid great stress on the fact that this is somebody else's money. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) merely tried to show that the money actually belonged to the employees by reason of their years of service, and was to some extent compensation over those years for that service. There is another point I wish to make. If people are going to talk about C.P.R. money being somebody else's money, I want to place on the record what this parliament and other parliaments have given to the C.P.R. in the past. I quote from the Canada Year Book, 1942, which brings the figures up to December 31, 1940. In terms of acres of land, up until December 31, 1940, according to pages 587 and 588 of the Canada Year Book, the dominion government granted the C.P.R. 26,109,043 acres of land. The provinces of Canada gave to the C.P.R. 10,847,333 acres, or a total of 36,956,376 acres. Incidentally, that is nearly 30 million acres more than was given over the years to what is now the government-owned railway, the Canadian National system.

In addition to that, the government gave cash subsidies to the C.P.R. up to December 31, 1940, of $99,860,984. The provinces gave $14,587,592. Various municipalities gave $4,610,157, making a grand total of $119,058,733, or about $31 million more in cash subsidies than was given to the publicly-owned system. Considering the amount of money that has been given to the C.P.R., it is difficult to understand how the minister can defend his position and defend the C.P.R.

The minister made one other statement, which apparently is a new argument, that contracts had been broken in the old strike, and that the trade union movement had taken the correct measures to try to rectify the situation. In reply I say that the trade union movement and those former employees of the C.P.R. are entitled to some help from parliament. I urge that members of the house support the motion notwithstanding the position taken by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I do not intend to be very long, Mr. Speaker. I should like particularly to answer a few of the points that have been raised by hon. members of the party of the mover of the resolution. Before I do so I think it would be appropriate to review briefly events of some importance which have taken place ever since this subject has been under consideration, either directly or indirectly, by the federal Department of Labour.

The resolution has been inspired by reason of the difficulties which arose out of the Winnipeg strike of 1918 and 1919 in which employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway were involved. A general strike started about the beginning of May, 1919, and lasted for about a month and a half. After it was ended most of the C.P.R. employees were rehired by the company as new employees, and that is the crux of the question.

As a matter of record I may say that not more than a month after the end of the strike the Manitoba government saw fit to set up a royal commission, which of course was within the jurisdiction and responsibility of that government. That royal commission commenced sitting in July, 1919, and held its last sitting on September 10 of that year, after having heard a number of witnesses and conducted independent inquiries into several activities related to the strike. The final report was made to the lieutenant governor in council on November 6, 1919.

The question raised in the resolution now under consideration was allowed to pass, without action being taken on the grievances of those C.P.R. employees in regard to the loss of pension rights, until after January 1, 1937. At that time a new pension plan for C.P.R. employees came into operation, based upon contributions by both labour and management. It was after the new plan had been considered by a joint council of representatives of the company and the employees that the brotherhoods realized the implications of this new plan as against those employees who had taken part in the 1919 strike and who had been rehired after reaching the age of forty.

This matter was dealt with in consultations between the brotherhoods and the C.P.R. for close to two years after the new pension scheme came into force on January 1, 1937. That was the right way to handle this matter, as the minister mentioned in his short address. This is a matter for negotiation between labour and management. In any case, this negotiation procedure went on for practically two years, from 1937 to 1939, but did not bring about the concrete results for which the C.P.R. employees were looking. In 1944, twenty-five years after the end of the strike, during which period of time nothing had been done through the usual channels of collective bargaining except during 1937 and 1938, the matter was brought to the attention of the house. I give credit to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for having raised the question here. I should like all hon. members and the country to realize that the government has been most sympathetic to the case of those my hon. friend had in mind when he raised this question in 1944; and I shall attempt to show that in the course of events which followed the Department of Labour and the minister did their utmost within the bounds of their jurisdiction to impress upon the company that certain wrongs should be redressed.

Mr. Johnston: Was that why they set up the Johnstone commission?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): My hon. friend will note that the setting up of the Johnstone inquiry at least provided ground for further negotiation with the company; and if it had been at all possible to reach a satisfactory conclusion through bargaining, the facts brought out in the Johnstone report certainly would have contributed to that agreement. If that inquiry had not been directed by the minister this question would have been considered closed as of 1945. It was the hope that, by having that inquiry conducted and then sending a copy of the report to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, it would be possible to find some sort of compromise, some sort of agreement; and communications were exchanged between the company and the federal Department of Labour over a period of many months.

Mr. Johnston: What are you going to do with it now, since it did not support the opinion of the government?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): If my hon. friend will allow me to proceed I shall be glad to give my views on what would be the advantage or otherwise of setting up a royal commission.

It was in 1944, I said, that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre brought up the matter while the house was discussing the labour angle of the war appropriation bill. At that time the basic argument he presented was that since other important bodies such as our own government, the provincial government, the city of Winnipeg and the Canadian National Railways had solved a similar problem to the advantage of the employees concerned, there was no reason why the C.P.R. should not fall into line and abide by this precedent, if I may call it that, which had been set by the others concerned. What was the answer of the minister? Let me quote what he had to say on that occasion. As a matter of fact he did not undertake to do anything more than he and his department have been doing since 1944. Here is what he said, as it appears at page 2508 of Hansard for May 1, 1944:

> I shall be very glad to do whatever lies within the power of my department to bring to the attention of the railway concerned the observations made by my hon. friends this afternoon.

Other hon. members had given their views on the matter, including the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the hon. member for Fort William. This reply by the minister clearly indicated that the ground on which the minister might act was the humanitarian ground. Nothing was said in one way or another which would permit the inference to be drawn that the minister committed himself to set up a royal commission, or that he committed himself to force the hand of the Canadian Pacific Railway if any favourable conclusion was reached which might be used in that way.

After that what happened? On May 19, 1944, negotiations were initiated with the company. My hon. friend has seen the file, which I may say is one of the thickest in the industrial relations branch of the department. On that date a communication was addressed to Mr. W. M. Neal, vice-president of the C.P.R.; and thereafter the minister took it upon himself to suggest to the company that a meeting should be arranged to be attended by representatives of the brotherhood of railway and steamship clerks, the brotherhood of express employees, the brotherhood of railway trainmen and another organization known as the Canadian merchant service guild, which had made representations. It was suggested that these people should meet with the responsible railway officials under the auspices of the Minister of Labour, and try to thresh out this whole matter and find some satisfactory basis of agreement.

The meeting took place on February 19, 1945, and the labour bodies I have mentioned were represented at it. It lasted a good length of time but was not fruitful in results. This was the first concrete attempt of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) as conciliator in this important matter. On April 24, 1945, the principle of an inquiry by one of the officers of our industrial relations branch was agreed upon, and instructions were forwarded to Mr. H. S. Johnstone who was at that time stationed in Winnipeg.

Mr. Green: Where is he now?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): He is at the head office here in Ottawa.

Mr. Knowles: After what the minister said about him today, we wondered where he was.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): The instructions were precise and contained no restriction at all. Having regard to the high praise which my hon. friend and his colleagues have accorded Mr. Johnstone and the extensive factual report he made, one will realize that what the minister had in mind in instructing Mr. Johnstone was the obtaining of all the pertinent facts of the situation in order that he might be in a position to decide whether or not any useful and legal action could be taken here. This inquiry went on for a certain length of time. It was only on December 7 of the same year that the report was made to the minister. Shortly after receipt of this report, the first action of the minister was to send a copy of it to the Canadian Pacific Railway. My hon. friend will recall, as will some labour unions, having voiced a certain complaint because of not having received a copy of that report when one had been sent to the company. The answer of the minister was that in the particular circumstances of this case the negotiations had to go on with the company, and that this fact-finding report could serve some purpose with the company. As to the unions and as to my hon. friends, they were fully aware of all the circumstances discussed in the report. The idea behind this inquiry and behind the sending of the copy of the report to the company was in order to provide another ground for discussion and negotiation and possibly hope for a satisfactory solution. As a matter of fact, the report was taken under advisement by the company for several months. During that time communications were exchanged between the company and the department. On May 26, 1946, the company made known its views on the Johnstone report.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit a question with regard to a matter of fact?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Certainly.

Mr. Knowles: Can the parliamentary assistant say how many communications dealing with the substance of the argument were exchanged between the Department of Labour and the company during that period from December, 1945, until May, 1946?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I could not say.

Mr. Knowles: I think there was only one.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): The only thing my recollection helps me to say is that the company and the Department of Labour kept in contact with each other during that interval. Exactly what the underlying purpose of the communications was, except that they were related directly to the report of Mr. Johnstone, is something that I could not say. I have not them here.

Mr. Knowles: Only one exchange during that period was tabled in the house.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I could not answer my hon. friend's question now, but I shall be pleased to give him precise information if he wishes to have it. But the point of fact is that this report, in the opinion of the department, is the best possible ground that could have been supplied, under the circumstances, to resume deliberations and negotiations looking toward a possible settlement of the dispute.

If I may, I should like to quote a word or two from the answer to the Johnstone report received from the C.P.R. company. This letter was tabled. My hon. friend is fully aware of the purport of that report. If, in quoting from this C.P.R. answer, I do not take time to go over the Johnstone report itself, the reason is that basically this is a problem of negotiating with a company that is on extremely solid ground in its attitude until such time as the word "voluntarily" contained in pension rule No. 13 has been cleared by the proper authorities; and by that I mean the courts of justice, not a body such as the House of Commons. In view of the nature of the pension scheme, which was a noncontributory one until that time, the C.P.R. company was absolutely free, in a free country like this, to give an honest interpretation to pension rule No. 13, and more particularly to the word "voluntarily", which provides that any employee who has voluntarily left the employ of the company at a time when his services are required shall be disqualified and barred from any rights deriving from the pension fund.

The company is absolutely on sure ground, I would say, because of that rule. It is with the company that one must conduct his negotiations or his bargaining if he wishes to get any satisfactory result. The answer by Mr. W. Manson, vice-president of personnel of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is dated May 26, 1946. It is relatively brief. I will not quote it in extenso but I wish to point out these particular references in a specific way. The first one reads as follows:

> In the report of Mr. Johnstone, accent has been placed upon the difficulty of determining whether particular employees were or were not strikers and whether they were or were not justified, as a result of intimidation or other causes, in remaining away from work. The company gave the employees concerned every opportunity at that time and in subsequent years to establish that their absence from work was justified and that they did not participate in the strike. In cases where this was established no pension disabilities were suffered. It is difficult to see how a royal commission, investigating this matter after so many years have elapsed, could properly be expected to develop all of the facts in regard to which most, if not all, of the evidence must necessarily be lacking.

> Quite apart from the foregoing, the appointment of a royal commission in the circumstances would imply the assertion of an intention on the part of the government to assume absolute and detailed control of the pension plan of private corporations, and of every detail of their execution. I hesitate to believe that the government accepts this as a normal part of its functions.

In giving these quotations I do not wish to be taken as the spokesman of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is not my intention, and it has not been the intention of the department, to do anything but try to find some way to effect some redress which may seem to be necessary in that particular situation. If I have quoted these sentences from Mr. Manson's report it was to show what the department was up against throughout these negotiations with the company from 1944 down to today.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) replied to the arguments of the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) in a very clever way. He said: If the department's objections to the initiating of proceedings of a royal commission lie exclusively or mainly in the fact that the department does not see how the findings in the report could be enforced or executed in some way, what about the royal commission on prices? Speaking for myself, I say that when the government authorized the setting up of a royal commission on prices it did so on the ground that throughout the war years, and after the war in a lesser way, the government assumed a certain responsibility to try to contribute to correcting a situation which was the source of complaint across the country. That was different. In this particular case we are dealing with property and civil rights. We are dealing with a pension fund which was set up by a company without any participation from the employees. The company was entirely responsible financially for the administration of that fund. There was no joint council formed of employees on the one side and the representatives of management on the other. The company was the absolute owner and ruler of this pension fund.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he not aware of the fact that the authority for railway pension funds is to be found in the Railway Act.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Section 122.

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I have the section here. Section 122 of the Railway Act gives full discretion to the directors of the railway company to set up a pension scheme. My hon. friend found it more appropriate to drop his bill amending the Railway Act, which he introduced two years ago, and submit an amendment to the then draft labour bill which was before parliament, and which was passed as the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. The amendment which my hon. friend sponsored makes it an unfair labour practice to all intents and purposes in all fields of jurisdiction, which come directly under the federal government, to jeopardize the acquired rights to a pension fund of an employee who is affected by a stoppage of work either through a lock-out or through a strike, when these stoppages of work are permissible under the act; that is, when all the negotiation procedures have been complied with. The placing on the statute books of that type of protection for employees is more far-reaching than it would have been had it been done in the form of an amendment to the Railway Act. That is why my hon. friend was better advised to do it in the way in which he finally did it.

There are a few questions to which I should like to direct my attention for a few moments. I may not give a conclusive answer to them, but I cannot help picking out a few of them and giving my views on them.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said that the Department of Justice should not be a court of law. In this particular instance I am amazed that the brotherhoods have waited such a long time, from 1919 to 1937, without challenging in the courts the interpretations which the Canadian Pacific Railway gave to rule 13 of the pension fund. In my opinion, the Johnstone report has brought some facts to light. In his participation in various debates in this house the hon. member has referred to several cases where I think a very good case could have been made before the courts if the absence from work was not a voluntary one on account of special circumstances during that time. If that were true, then I think the employee involved in that particular case would have had a good case before any court of justice to have rule 13 applied to himself in a favourable way. In matters such as this, it is not for the federal parliament to interpret the pension rule.

Some hon. members have said that some men had very good cases for the restoration of their pension rights. I am inclined to agree with that. I am inclined to believe that a good many may not have availed themselves of the opportunity, which the company, through the vice-president, Mr. Manson, mentioned in the report from which I have quoted. In the report it is plain that the company did not refuse to look into the matter of any particular case which was brought to its attention.

Mr. Knowles: How many of these were rectified?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I could not say.

Mr. Knowles: In his report Mr. Johnstone says that the company documented a great many of them but all were rejected.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): I could not say how many were accepted or rejected; but unless my hon. friend challenges the statement of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and says that no opportunity was given, or that no hearing was granted in a particular case, I have to take that statement. Even if it happened that one hundred per cent of the cases were turned down, and on this I have no data, that would be only an additional reason for the employees to go to the courts. If they were not satisfied with the attitude taken by the company, based on the special interpretation given to pension rule No. 13, that course would be open to them.

If I may return the compliment to the hon. member, and ask him a question, I would ask if there has been a single case of this kind presented in some way or another before a competent court of justice in Manitoba or in any other province. I do not know, but I do not think a single case has gone to the courts.

The question has been raised by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) as to the ownership of the pension fund. I believe the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) raised a similar point. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) during his observations referred to the attitude taken by the company, when on occasions they have expressed a feeling of moral obligation, and have indicated that if the financial position of the company warranted it, or improved to a reasonable extent, they might try to bring about a remedy.

Nothing has been said to show conclusively this afternoon that there was legal ownership, by the employees, of the pension fund of the Canadian Pacific Railway as it existed before 1937. There may have been a moral obligation on the part of the company in at least a few exceptional cases, and where there was good faith on the part of the employee. This was the point I mentioned a few moments ago in support of my contention that this would have given rise at least to an opportunity for presentation before a court of justice for the purpose of obtaining an interpretation.

Mr. Knowles: Courts deal with legal obligations, not moral obligations. If I may interrupt, may I say that that is exactly the point, namely that it was a moral claim the men felt they had; and, because they realized they could not establish a legal claim, no case was taken to court.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): It was a moral obligation on the part of the railway, in view of the fact that the interpretation they gave to pension rule 13 did not bind them legally. That was their viewpoint. If on the other hand the employees thought that the interpretation of the company was wrong, they could claim the legal right to their share of the pension fund, and could apply to the courts of justice to have their interpretation of the rule prevail over that of the company.

The hon. member for York South has said that throughout the transactions, since 1944, and more particularly when he decided to send a special investigator in the person of Mr. Johnstone to Winnipeg, the minister was kidding. As I have tried to show during my observations, the Johnstone report has provided a new ground from which to start fresh negotiations with the company. This inquiry has provided a new picture of the situation, and has allowed the department to re-establish its contact with the company and thus to begin negotiations anew. There can be no doubt that this was done in the best of good faith, and for the best of purposes.

I believe I have set out a fair outline of what the stand has been by the Department of Labour throughout the past five years, since this matter has been brought to the fore. The department has been trying to act in the capacity of negotiator between the company and the employees; at the same time it has never admitted any direct responsibility, other than that of its deep interest in and sympathy with the fate and the distress of a certain number of men.

In 1904 when the pension fund was set up by the company—and this is the focal point of the whole situation, from a legal standpoint—it was done of its own free will, and without any interference from any governmental group or union representatives. This was done through the wish of the company to better the welfare of its employees—at least it was so taken at the time. The company remained entirely responsible for it.

It seems to me the employees might have been well advised to decide before 1937 to show a direct interest in the management of the fund. I do not know whether they did or not, but the fact is that they did not have any link whatsoever with the administration of the fund until 1937, when the new plan was set up. The company was free to set up the scheme and to manage it as it chose, under its own rules and formulae. This is the situation which confronted the employees at the time of the 1919 strike.

After thirty years there is nothing the Department of Labour can do beyond its own jurisdictional bounds. The department has done its utmost, and I suggest this once more illustrates its deep interest in matters of concern to labour. Since 1944 we have accumulated a file which challenges in physical content any other file in our department. At least we have done that. The department claims that the only corrective measure which can be obtained would be through the procedure of negotiations. We have exhausted all those procedures.

Now we are faced with the suggestion set out in the resolution that a royal commission be set up. It is true that the recommendation of the Johnstone report is to that effect, and the hon. member has quoted the concluding paragraph in the report which, it seems to me, indicates clearly that the industrial relations officer, Mr. Johnstone, thought there was sufficient information of importance and concern which he had gathered to justify a more complete inquiry. It was his suggestion that a royal commission be set up, and he was speaking of course as an industrial relations officer.

It is the responsibility of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and the government to decide whether a royal commission should be resorted to to settle a problem such as this, which is not within the competence and jurisdiction of this government or parliament. The responsibility of government obliges it to take an attitude one way or another; and the attitude that has been taken is that the setting up of a royal commission would serve no useful purpose whatsoever.

Now that all possible grounds of negotiation with the company have been covered, what would be the use of permitting this inquiry to prolong itself over months, perhaps years? What would be the purpose of spending public money to an unknown extent?—because, in the past, some royal commissions have been quite costly. What would be the purpose in doing all this unless there was some way of carrying out the findings of such a commission to relieve a situation which affects these employees who lost their pension rights with the Canadian Pacific in 1919?

That is the position taken by the government. The Department of Labour wishes labour to know that it has done everything humanly possible to co-operate in this matter and to attempt to arrive at a satisfactory solution. The department cannot go any further without interfering with the jurisdiction of somebody else. If we set up a royal commission and tried to implement its recommendations there is no doubt that in one way or another—my hon. friends know what I am referring to—the matter would come before the courts and it is as clear as crystal that it would be declared ultra vires. We have no right to go beyond what we have done already in an attempt to bring about a satisfactory conclusion.

I conclude by reminding my hon. friend that his interest in this matter since 1944 has brought some results. He has achieved one of his purposes by having placed on the statute books labour legislation which would prevent any such action being taken in the future as a result of a strike or lock-out. He is now asking us to interfere with something that happened thirty years ago, to adopt a procedure which would force the company to take retroactive action back that far. He is asking us to attempt to remedy a situation which is essentially a matter of collective bargaining.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) mentioned this afternoon that he could not go so far as to set up a royal commission because jurisdiction does not lie with the federal government. Therefore, I think the hon. member would be wise not to go further with this matter. His resolution has served his purpose in bringing about a useful discussion and has given the government an opportunity to voice its views on the matter. The hon. member should not insist on this matter going any further. It has become insoluble because action could not be forced on the company.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I intend to be brief in speaking to this particular resolution. I think a good many hon. members believe that the government did recognize certain of the rights of these employees, because it set up an inquiry. If those rights had not been recognized I think all members will agree that this or any other government would not have set up any such inquiry. I am quite sure that all hon. members are anxious that justice be done to these men. However, we must remember that these men are members of one of the strongest and best organized unions in this country. If effective steps are to be taken there is a recognized procedure by which the union can assert the rights of its members. Unless the government is prepared to present its views to the company and urge them to follow a particular course, the present resolution will produce no practical results.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, if I were still representing exactly the same constituency that I represented in two previous parliaments I would not have to get up and say anything today, but at this time I am representing many railroaders. I want to take only a couple of minutes to endorse what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) have said. I want also to assure the house that I am wholeheartedly behind those members in the request they made.

I listened attentively to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cote) when he put forth a wonderful argument against this resolution. I congratulate him on making a good defence of a poor case. I would have no hesitation in hiring him if I thought I was on the losing side.

Mr. Sinclair: What about June 27? Were you on the winning side then?

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member certainly was in Selkirk.

Mr. Bryce: It has been said in argument that the Canadian Pacific has no obligation toward these men. I have been a machinist and for part of my time I worked in railway shops. When you hire with the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian National or any other company which has a pension scheme, that is taken into consideration along with the wages you are to receive. You consider that you are providing for a rainy day, that you are preparing for the time when you get to the end of the road. I think these men were quite justified in expecting that. The money really belonged to them.

The Department of Labour felt some obligation in the matter because they appointed Mr. Johnstone to investigate. Several hon. gentlemen have referred to the results of that inquiry. I did not like the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) accusing the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre of kidding the people. I do not think there is an hon. member of this house who comes down here to kid the people. If we have any such intentions, we should not be here.

The minister may disagree with me or any other member, but I think he should credit us with being sincere. I want you to believe that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is sincere in bringing up this matter. Men in my constituency have come to me to ask that I support this resolution in an effort to get some help for them. Many of these men are older than I am but they worked in the railway shops when I was there. They are now getting only a small pension. If their pension time dated back to 1910 or 1911 they would have enough to live on. Many of them cannot get an old age pension to augment what they are getting now.

I intend to be brief and I shall say no more than that I support this motion wholeheartedly. I hope the government will not turn it down but will do something about it.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Knowles: Just before the question is put—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I will be very brief in closing the debate on what I regard as an extremely important matter. I noted that it was still put forth as an argument a good many times, especially by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), that the money involved is someone else's money. As I tried to indicate by means of an interruption in the minister's speech, I agree that it is someone else's money. In fact I agree with Mr. Johnstone that morally the money belongs to the men.

May I point out that right now the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is having the experience of paying out money that is in the same category. Reference has been made repeatedly to the new contributory pension plan that came into effect on January 1, 1937. A man who retired from the C.P.R. in 1948, and is today on pension, is receiving a pension made up in part of what he has earned out of the contributory fund since January 1, 1937, and in part of his stake in the non-contributory funds prior to January 1, 1937. We are simply asking that the recognition that there is money there in the general funds of the C.P.R. that belonged to certain men be extended to cover these other men.

Another argument put forward forcibly by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cote) was to quote considerably rule 13, from the old rules, and contend that there was a voluntary staying away from work on the part of these men. Of course whether or not it was voluntary is one of the matters in dispute. That is one of the reasons a royal commission is needed. In his report Mr. Johnstone says that was one of the matters that had to be considered by the Canadian National Railways, and they decided that, in view of all the circumstances surrounding the Winnipeg general strike, they could not make a blanket decision that all these men stayed away on a voluntary basis. Mr. Johnstone says that some of these men, for example, reported for work during the day and found that the place had been closed because of difficulties and disturbances earlier in the morning. The position that the hon. member for Verdun-La Salle (Mr. Cote) took is challenged by the report of Mr. Johnstone, which again is a reason why the whole question should be gone into more thoroughly, more objectively, and more judicially, as we feel it can be done by a royal commission.

I listened with interest to the recital which the parliamentary assistant gave of the things the Department of Labour has done, but it seemed to me that at times he was putting a very good front on it. As I recall the months between December, 1945, and May, 1946, that is the time between the date of the Johnstone report and the reply of the C.P.R., all that is shown in the correspondence that has been tabled in the house is that the Minister of Labour shipped the Johnstone report to the C.P.R., and then there were several letters asking the C.P.R. to send their reply because it was being demanded in the house. Finally, in May, the report came back, and the C.P.R. reply with it.

Despite the recital that the hon. member has given this afternoon, I am not satisfied that the government has done what he says, namely, its utmost. He can say that the government has done all the things he has indicated, but until the government is prepared to set up a royal commission to go into these matters the government cannot say that it has done its utmost. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in the name of justice for these citizens of Canada who have suffered this injustice so long, I plead with the house to call upon the government to give the consideration asked for in the resolution. Now that the debate on the matter is over I hope that the house will approve the resolution.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MR. MITCHELL IN DEBATE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. During the debate this afternoon the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and I had an exchange which ended amicably when he accepted my word as to certain statements that I had made. However, I rose during that exchange and indicated that I was prepared to accept his challenge to bring Hansard down before the day was over, and show that what I had quoted him as saying was on the record. The matter had to do with my saying that in 1944 the Minister of Labour was not satisfied with representations that I brought on the floor of this house from local railway lodges, but that if he received a request from the Canadian heads of the unions involved his department would act on such a request. The minister at first denied making the statement. Later he implied that this had been said to me in confidence. Still later he accepted my word. I now wish to document my statement by pointing out that this all appears in Hansard of July 24, 1944. The list of local lodges to which I referred takes about a column of page 5267. Then on page 5269 the minister said:

> The hon. gentleman read a certain number of letters from local organizations.

Then he went on in his usual way to refer to them and ended up by saying:

> But if I were to get a request from the parent organization—and as my hon. friend from Cape Breton South knows probably as well as I do, they always deal with their national organization in matters of this kind—I should be glad to endeavour to arrange a conference if possible between the company and the organizations concerned.

A similar statement was made by the minister a few moments later, as recorded on page 5271 of the same day. I will not take the time of the house to read his repetition of his insistence on any request coming from a parent organization, but I thought it only fair that it should be clear that the statement I attributed to the minister was not something said in confidence but a statement made on the floor of the house.

Social Security

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR FORMULATION OF NATIONAL PROGRAM

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should seek the co-operation of the provinces for the purpose of formulating a program of social security that will be national in scope, adequate in its provisions, and that will cover all citizens of Canada in every circumstance where the individual or the family is, for any reason, deprived of the opportunity of earning a living.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am extremely glad to have the opportunity of moving this resolution and of expressing my views in regard to the subject matter of it. I think this is the fourth session of parliament in which I have had this, or a similar, resolution on the order paper, but because of the urgency of government business at other sessions, which eliminated private members' days, or because my resolution was too far down on the order paper to be reached, this is the first opportunity I have had of moving it in the house.

Perhaps it is well that the resolution should be moved now. We have had an election in which every party represented in this house has had a social security plank in its program, and as far as I have been able to learn through following the reports of speeches of the candidates of the various parties they too advocated a policy of social security improvement. As far as I can remember, most of the members from my own province told their constituents that if they were sent to represent the constituencies in this house they would advocate social security improvement on the floor of the House of Commons.

I have tried, Mr. Speaker, to make the resolution as short and as explicit as words could possibly make it. I do not wish to have any misunderstanding of what I am urging. Briefly the resolution asks this house to endorse a nation-wide social security program.

For convenience in debate the resolution may be divided into four parts. First, it asks the government to seek the co-operation of the provinces for the purpose of formulating a program of social security. In my opinion this is the obvious first step since social service or social security is by our constitution a provincial responsibility. However, it has been demonstrated that it is a responsibility which most of the provinces are not able to discharge.

Second, the resolution proposes that our social security program be nation-wide in scope. That is, as far as the federal government is concerned, the benefits paid and the conditions under which they are paid shall be the same in every province in Canada.

Third, that our social security program be adequate in its provision; that is, that the benefits, in the absence of any other income, shall be such as to assure a minimum but adequate standard of living.

Fourth and last, that the social security benefits should be available to every citizen of Canada who is deprived, by reasons beyond his control, of the opportunity of earning a living.

The points I have outlined are the essential requirements of a social security program. Indeed, I think they are all the essential requirements of a social security program for Canada and I believe that anything less would not be adequate. I could produce many reasons, economic and social, as to why social security measures provided by the state are becoming increasingly essential to larger and larger sections of our people. I do not believe it is necessary for me to take the time to do that. Almost everyone realizes that they arise out of economic and social development, economic and social progress, if you like, over which we have little control. But apart from these reasons there are humanitarian considerations which provide sufficient grounds for this parliament enacting such a program. As far as this house is concerned I should like to believe that the humanitarian considerations would be sufficient in themselves.

May I draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that an additional reason why we are entitled to look to the state for assistance is that when the state feels it is in need it can and does require not only the service of its citizens but their lives as well. I claim therefore that if the state can call upon a citizen in its time of need, the citizen should be able to call upon the state in his hour of need. While I refer to "the state", I do not want the house to conclude that I refer only to the federal government. It will be noted that in the resolution I ask that the federal government seek the co-operation of provincial governments for the purpose of working out a complete system of social security.

I do not propose either that everything should be centralized here in Ottawa. However, in co-operation between the dominion and the provinces, it should be made clear as to what the provinces are prepared to do and what the dominion government is prepared to do in order that among the eleven governments we would have a complete system of social security.

When the federal government of 1945 laid the green book proposals before the provincial governments, an attempt was made along the lines I am now suggesting. Failure at that time does not mean that we should accept failure for all time to come. The proposals made in 1945 by the federal government are as valid today as they were then.

Not only that, but I am convinced that the need for social security is more pervasive among our people today than it was at that time. May I quote briefly from the proposals of the government of Canada, which are generally referred to as the green book proposals. The opening section of the government's proposals, entitled "National Problems and Objectives", outlines what the government in 1945 saw as the national problems, and the means it intended to take to solve those problems.

At page 7 of this book are found these words:

> The government has clear and definite views on how these objectives can be obtained.

The objectives were, in the main, prosperity and security for the people of Canada. It continues:

> These views may be summarized very briefly as, first, to facilitate private enterprise to produce and provide employment;
> Secondly, to promote—

And I would ask hon. members to notice this one carefully—

> —to promote bold action by the state in those fields in which the public interest calls for public enterprise in national development;
> Thirdly, to provide through public investment, productive employment for our human and physical resources when international and other conditions adversely affect employment; and,
> Fourthly, to provide on the basis of small regular payments against large and uncertain individual risks, for such hazards and disabilities as unemployment, sickness and old age.

I am dealing tonight only with the fourth item. I should like to read further from page 8, two short paragraphs which really state my position as well as or better than I could state it myself:

> Because Canada is a federal state these responsibilities are shared by the federal and provincial governments. This division of responsibility should not be permitted to prevent any government, or governments, in co-operation from taking effective action.

What I am asking tonight is not only that the house approve my resolution, but that it approve what was put forward by the government of 1945, and that this government take effective action as quickly as possible. May I read on:

> To devise a working co-operative arrangement to a common end, in harmony with our federal system, is the main purpose of this conference.

That is the conference which was called to discuss these proposals. It continues:

> It is with these considerations in mind, and in search of common ground for agreement, that the government presents its proposals. These proposals assume a broad federal responsibility, in co-operation with provincial governments, for establishing the general conditions and framework for high employment and income policies, and for support of national minimum standards of social services. They also assume that provincial governments should be in a financial position to discharge their responsibilities adequately.

My resolution is quite in harmony with the proposals and, I must presume, with the policies of the government of that time. Because of the size and constitution of this country, decentralization of administration to the provincial level is in my opinion not only desirable but imperative. People intimate with local conditions can make a much better job of dealing with human beings than can those who are remote. It makes a great deal of difference to the person concerned whether he is treated merely as a case with a number or whether he is treated as a human being.

I have been a trade union official or a public representative for almost the whole of the past thirty years. As such it has been my opportunity to come in contact with the boards administering the social security legislation in my own province, such as the old age pensions board and the workmen's compensation board. I am bound to say I have always found that these officials consider, with both sympathy and imagination, the problems coming before them. If they have not done a better job it is, I am satisfied, ninety-nine per cent because the law they have had to administer has not made that possible. I would not be dealing with this question realistically if I did not point out that considerable social security is provided at the present time by the dominion and the provinces. Under federal and provincial jurisdiction we have old age and blind pensions. Wholly under federal control we have unemployment insurance and family allowances—

An hon. Member: Widows' allowances.

Mr. MacInnis: That comes under the provinces. And there is certain assistance in the way of health grants. Under the provinces we have workmen's compensation, mothers' allowances, welfare legislation of various kinds and health and hospital services. However, these social security measures whether under provincial or dominion jurisdiction have developed in a haphazard way. Many of these measures have been put into operation, not so much because of the government's belief in them as because it was thought politically expedient to provide them. I submit that the time has come when we should find out what is required and see what we can do in an orderly and planned way.

There are tremendous gaps in our social security program. For example, there is no provision for sickness or invalidity. A worker who is out of a job because there is no work is entitled to unemployment insurance, but if the same worker is out of a job because he is sick, he is not entitled to anything. Indeed if he is taken sick while drawing unemployment insurance benefits the benefits stop. Surely a person who is unemployed because of sickness is more in need of assistance than one who is just unemployed. A man in such circumstances has the additional expenses associated with illness.

Our old age pensions provide for people who have reached the age of 70 years provided they are practically destitute. But surely the person who has not reached the age of 70 years is just as much entitled to assistance if because of illness or infirmity he is unable to provide for himself? Surely these are gaps which a country such as Canada should be ready to concede ought not to be tolerated?

As a beginning of an adequate social security program I think we should lay it down that need should be the criterion for state assistance and not a particular category or class into which a person might fall. Following that, the assistance given should be such as to provide a minimum standard of health and decency. I do not know of any better words to use, and those are the words generally used by welfare organizations. We should strive to set a minimum standard below which no family income should fall.

May I point out that no country can escape the social consequences of poverty. If we do not provide an adequate family income, whether we like it or not we shall have to make provision for more police, more jails, more courts, more reformatories, more hospitals and more of all those institutions the need for which is created in large measure by poverty and the consequential family breakdown. The general opinion among people experienced in social service administration or those engaged in social welfare work is that the greatest cause of family breakdown is poverty. If we do not eliminate poverty in one way we shall have to take care of it in another. Perhaps I should quote an authority on this point. In 1943, Dr. L. C. Marsh was engaged by the government to prepare a report on social service for Canada. I have that report in my hand and I quote from page 119 as follows:

> Finally, the obvious but vital point must be made that social security payments are not money lost. The social insurances, and even some straightforward disbursements like children's allowances, are investments in morale and health, in greater family stability, and from both material and psychological viewpoints, in human productive efficiency. They demand personal and community responsibilities; but in the eyes of most of the people who are beneficiaries, give a more evident meaning to the ideas of common effort and national solidarity. It has yet to be proved that any democracy which underwrites the social minimum for its citizens is any the weaker or less wealthy for doing so.

I think we can all agree with that. I urge this house to show by its approval of this resolution that it believes that the time has arrived for the elimination of the effects of poverty, if we cannot, at this time, get down to eliminating its causes, by expanding and co-ordinating the social services of this country so that all those people who need assistance will be covered. It is possible that a social security program such as I have suggested will require amendments to our constitution. If so, those amendments should be sought without delay. But, even while we are preparing any amendments that we think necessary, we should see what we can do in co-operation with the provinces, because I am convinced that a great deal can be done without amendment of the constitution. As far as I can remember, from reading the proposals made in 1945, there was no mention of amendments being necessary for what the dominion government proposed at that time.

Other countries less wealthy than Canada are ahead of us in this regard. Perhaps I need only mention the United Kingdom and New Zealand. In the United Kingdom, despite their difficulties, all parties are agreed that their social security program is necessary and must be maintained. Following the United Kingdom election of 1945 the Labour government put a social security program into effect. The Conservative party in its election program, "The Right Road for Britain", has laid it down that the country's social security program will be not only maintained but expanded if that party assumes office after the next election. I merely point out that today people everywhere are convinced of the necessity of providing social security.

There are some people in Canada who oppose any further extension of our social services, but I do not think we should pay much attention to them because they have opposed every extension of social security in the past, and they will do so in the future. Perhaps the most comprehensive report that has ever been made on social security is what is known as the Beveridge report, prepared by Sir William Beveridge in 1942. He laid down three guiding principles for social security. The first principle reads as follows:

> . . . that any proposals for the future, while they should use to the full the experience gathered in the past, should not be restricted by consideration of sectional interests established in the obtaining of that experience. Now, when the war is abolishing landmarks of every kind, is the opportunity for using experience in a clear field. A revolutionary moment in the world's history is a time for revolutions, not for patching.

I suggest to the government that world revolution is not yet complete. It is proceeding in every country, and perhaps faster than anywhere else in the western nations where people have the opportunity of thinking, and thinking aloud. I suggest to the government that what they need now is not to put patches on our present social security but to take bold steps to build a comprehensive program such as I have suggested. The second principle laid down by Sir William Beveridge is:

> . . . that organization of social insurance should be treated as one part only of a comprehensive policy of social progress. Social insurance fully developed may provide income security; it is an attack upon want. But want is one only of five giants on the road of reconstruction and in some ways the easiest to attack. The others are disease, ignorance, squalor and idleness.

I think that if we make a frontal attack on want we will go a long way towards conquering these other giants that Sir William Beveridge mentions. The third principle reads as follows:

> . . . that social security must be achieved by co-operation between the state and the individual. The state should offer security for service and contribution. The state in organizing security should not stifle incentive, opportunity, responsibility—

I have never seen the case for the abolition of the means test put better than that. I have never been able to see the logic of insisting that a person should not be allowed to help himself. I do not want to mention specific cases tonight, but at the moment I have a case, which I am taking up with the war veterans' allowance board, where a veteran has had his allowance cut off because his wife went to work during the war at the age of sixty-five, and the income she produced, which was used for shingling their home, as they told me, was not reported to the war veterans' allowance board. Personally I do not see who could be hurt by allowing these people to add something more to their income. If they made something more than what is allowed under the income tax structure they could be taxed in the same way as other individuals.

Up to this point I have not said anything about how a social security program should be financed. I am dealing with broad principles and not with details. I do not believe that I have any illusions about how measures of this kind are paid for. They are paid for out of the national income. That in turn comes out of national production, and the national production is the product of those who work. When we provide social services of any kind we are providing material things such as food, clothing, shelter and services of one kind or another, which must be produced by those who are working.

Perhaps I could express my own ideas of how such things can be paid for by a simple illustration. It is easier to think in small numbers than in large ones because when a thing gets very large it sometimes becomes complex, and it is difficult for the ordinary person to understand it.

Let us suppose that the population of the country was composed of the three members behind me and myself. It would be a dull world, but this is just a supposition. Suppose it was composed of those four people and we were all working. We would all be producing our own keep, the others anyway, and I suppose they would see that I did. Let us suppose that they decided to pension me off because I had reached an age where my youthfulness was a thing of the past. There would be no place under the sun where my keep could come from except out of their labour.

The same is true in our national affairs; you merely have to multiply that by ten million, or whatever figure you like. The result is the same. The money is merely the measure of the goods and services provided by the rest of the community. For instance, if you keep your mother-in-law you pay for her upkeep yourself; but if she receives an old age pension the community keeps her. That is the difference; you are throwing some of your burden on the community. I say that, because there is an idea abroad that there is some mysterious source from which food, shelter and clothing can be paid for without taking it from those who produce it or have claims of ownership to it. There is no such way.

Mr. Blackmore: There is.

Mr. MacInnis: Then I shall leave my hon. friend to find it.

Mr. Blackmore: Speak from your own knowledge, not from general knowledge.

Mr. MacInnis: As a matter of fact, I am speaking from my own knowledge, the only knowledge that I can count on. General knowledge is of no value at all, because neither my hon. friend nor I have the capacity to understand all of it.

Mr. Blackmore: Your knowledge is very limited.

Mr. MacInnis: I admit that; and my admission of my lack of understanding is proof that I have taken the first step to wisdom.

Mr. Blackmore: We will teach you if you will listen.

Mr. MacInnis: My time has almost expired, Mr. Speaker, but I want the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) to note that as far as was humanly possible I refrained from using political illustrations, or quoting what anyone said to use it against him. I wanted to accomplish something by introducing this resolution, and I approached it in that spirit. If I had just wanted to get my hon. friends on either side of the house riled, as the saying is, I would have spoken in another manner and I believe I have had enough political experience to know how to do that. But I am serious in putting forward this resolution. I hope it will be discussed in the spirit it was proposed. I hope hon. members will not leave the government in doubt as to the need as they see it in their constituencies, so that something may be done this year, not in 1953.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members appreciated the way the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) placed his resolution before us for consideration this evening. I should like to say a few words in support of the main theme of the resolution, which in my understanding is that now is the time for steps to be taken to formulate a program of social security which will be national in its scope. That is the part of the resolution that particularly appeals to me.

I think it very timely that we should consider this topic now, in this first session of the twenty-first parliament, for several reasons. The first reason is the attitude of the Canadian people toward questions of this sort. I believe Canadians generally, and certainly Canadians on the Pacific slope, desire an all-embracing program of social security. They hope the different governments throughout the country will take steps to see that such an all-embracing program is put on the statute books at the earliest possible moment. Then, too, I think the attitude of the Canadian people is that they are willing to pay for such a program. Provided that the payment is spread evenly and fairly across the country, I believe Canadians are willing to pay for such a plan.

I also believe their attitude is one of intense dislike of the means test. There is something very un-Canadian about it. Many elderly people come in to ask me about making application for old age pension. These people who have worked hard for a lifetime, who have brought up families at great sacrifice, and who while they have very little money have great natural dignity and pride, in reality are the type of people who have built this nation. Yet when they are faced with the necessity of disclosing their resources, they hesitate to do so. They are hurt by the thought that they must tell someone what assets they have, and must show that their children are not able to support them. The whole idea of a means test is repugnant to such people, and I repeat that they are the very finest citizens we have in this country.

That attitude should be well known to the government. Hon. members will even find it at page 37 of the proposals of the government of Canada at the dominion-provincial conference of 1945, in what is commonly called the green book. There we find this statement:

> The means test is generally recognized as undesirable after a certain age. It has been noted that about forty per cent of all persons of seventy years of age and over make application, satisfy the means test requirements and receive pensions. There is little doubt that a very considerable number in addition are not able entirely to support themselves, but are dependent upon their family, and refrain from applying for pensions because of the embarrassment occasioned by the means test.

I repeat, I believe the Canadian people are anxious to get rid of this means test. They would prefer to permit our senior citizens to improve their position by working, if able to do so. Not only would that be a help to the elderly people themselves; it would also be a help to the country at large, and I believe it is still generally the feeling of our people that thrift should be encouraged. So my first reason for saying that this resolution is timely is the attitude of the Canadian people.

My second reason is the attitude of the Canadian political parties. I believe every party in Canada is deeply interested in welfare measures. I do not wish to be political tonight, but if I had one criticism of the C.C.F. more than another it would be that at times they speak as though they believe they are the only Canadians in public life who are interested in the welfare of the people. That is not so. The members of all parties are vitally interested in welfare measures. If they are not interested in people they do not get elected, or if they get in once they do not stay elected. We are all deeply concerned with welfare measures. There may be some difference of opinion as to how those measures can be best enacted and put into effect, but I do not believe the hearts of the members of any one party in Canada are a bit bigger than the hearts of the members of other parties. My second reason, therefore, for my stand is the attitude of the Canadian political parties. Every party in this house is pledged up to the hilt to bring in a national social security program. I have here the advertisements of the government party, and also those of our own. The other parties are pledged in the same way.

Now that we are here, let us get busy and do something about carrying out those pledges.

My third reason for saying that this resolution is timely is that there is now a great move on in the United States in the direction of social security plans. I have here the last issue of U.S. News and World Report. In it I find a most interesting article entitled "Bigger and Better Pensions?" which contains this statement:

> In congress, plans are being pushed to make 1950 "social security year."

Our neighbours to the south are taking great interest in this type of plan, just as we are in Canada. In the United States within the last few days we have seen the settlement of the Ford strike on the basis that there will be pensions for the employees of the company. That really is my fourth reason for my stand this evening. I believe that pensions are coming in industry. In some cases the companies may pay the whole pension, as I believe is being done by the Ford company. In other cases they may make a partial contribution. But there is no doubt that this whole question of pensions in industry is one of the important ones to be faced by the public men on this continent at this time.

Even if pensions in industry come into effect, many Canadians will not be covered by such a plan; considerably over half could never possibly be covered by any such plan. Therefore consideration must be given by governments to ways of bringing in a plan that will cover all of the Canadian people. Furthermore, I think difficulty may arise in determining the fields to be covered by government and by industry; there is no clear-cut demarcation of what group will be covered by industry and what group will be covered by government measures. We must try to figure out what division there should be.

The article to which I referred a few moments ago ends with this paragraph:

> Decision, in favour of one system or two systems, is what is forming now.

That is, a decision between pensions in industry and government pensions.

> If liberal, but costly, private pensions paid for by industry are given to millions of workers, then, in the opinion of many officials, there will be little chance of getting employers to help pay for a more liberal government system for all. Result may be high pensions for some workers, relief lines for others.

I read that paragraph to show that this whole question is worthy of a great deal of investigation and thought. Those are four reasons advanced for the consideration of hon. members.

In my own opinion we should have in Canada a contributory pension system under which men and women would contribute as they work, employers would contribute, and the various governments would contribute. Then Canadians would be entitled to draw as of right benefits in adequate amounts when they were needed. I believe that such a plan would make it possible for us to provide pensions at sixty-five years of age, without a means test, or earlier if people are unable to work further; to provide sickness and disability benefits and health insurance; and to give extended unemployment insurance benefits. There would also have to be similar benefits for those Canadians who are unable to make contributions.

That is my idea at the moment of the way in which this problem could best be solved by Canada. I believe that is the Canadian way in which to work out a solution. But certainly at this session some steps should be taken by the government. There is no doubt at all that they should raise the ceiling on old age pensions to conform with the raise in the pension itself which was put through last spring. I do not believe there is a member in this house who would not be in favour of raising that ceiling. That is one statute that should be passed at this particular session. In addition to that, I believe consideration should be given to the broader plans for meeting this problem. I hope that the government, through the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), will agree to the terms of this resolution. Then if the minister will go ahead and take whatever steps are necessary to bring about the required legislation, I think he will find general support from all sides in this chamber.

(Translation):

Mr. Lionel Bertrand (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) on the subject of social security and I am pleased to have this opportunity of taking part in the debate.

It would be, I believe, extremely important for the government to request the co-operation of the provinces in order to work out a nation-wide social security plan. It would probably take some time to apply such a plan, so that it would be better, I think, to go about it by stages, so as to gradually, year by year, bring about a permanent solution of some aspect of the social problem.

I am in favour of a social security plan as elaborate as possible, for it is my considered opinion that communism can never enter homes in which peace, joy and happiness are to be found.

I would however like to point out that I have myself placed on the order paper, under No. 7, a resolution which particularly concerns destitute invalids and cripples.

I first submitted this resolution in 1946; it was discussed and met with the approval of the house but was never adopted. Since then, the resolution has appeared in the order paper at every session but due to certain circumstances or to special legislation, it was never considered. I am confident, however, that this resolution, which I consider very important, will be considered and given the general approval of this house during the present session.

A class of people who are particularly neglected are the infirm and the invalid. If their families are too poor to give them appropriate care or if, because of their infirmities, they are unable to earn their own livelihood, these infirm and invalid become forsaken and outcast. Municipalities are unable to do anything to help them. The provincial statutes do not provide for them. I have found nothing in the federal statutes which might authorize the central power to help them.

Cripples and invalids are excluded from the labour market. They are turned away for reasons having to do with security, output and production. Deprived of employment, or occasionally doing some odd job, can an invalid ensure his own subsistence? If he has a wife and children, his plight becomes tragic and his distress is increased by the humiliation of having to beg and live on public charity.

Cripples and invalids deserve their share of well-being. I suggest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) that he should consider the matter and have a survey made of the number of cripples and invalids without means of support, with a view to recommending an adequate and proper allowance, to be paid jointly by the central government and the provinces. If it so happened that the provinces declined to accept such a nation-wide plan, I believe the dominion government should assume the cost itself.

In a country as wealthy as ours, where life has become quite comfortable, there is no reason for leaving the underprivileged class in destitution and discouragement. Besides, our national security program will never be complete unless it includes special consideration for cripples and invalids.

In connection with social security, I have a suggestion to make to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I believe that the term "old age pension" has become obsolete and inappropriate.

When the act was passed in 1927, it could be considered that reaching the age of 70 marked a giant stride on the road of life. Since that time, the legislation passed by the dominion and provincial governments for the control of contagious diseases and the promotion of public health has considerably increased the duration of human life and at 70, unlike what happened formerly, one can look forward to many years of existence, made lighter by the conveniences with which science has so wonderfully helped domestic life.

I have seen people sign their old age pension applications with some timidity, and I have also seen some persons driven to tears by the thought that such endorsement marked for them a transition which emphasized their old age. "Old age pension" is a hackneyed and undesirable expression. I would suggest "family welfare allowances", which would have a more pleasant ring and would suggest to our older citizens not the thought of impending death but the idea of serene and peaceful retirement.

Would it not be possible for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to ask the provinces for authorization to change the term "old age pension" to that of "family welfare allowance"? This simple change would cast more sunshine on one of the finest social security measures put forward by this country.

(Text):

Mr. E. A. McCusker (Regina City): I should like to say a few words in this debate. I congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) on bringing this resolution before the house and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) on the saner view he takes of it. In moving his resolution I think the hon. member for Vancouver East forgot the cost entailed in implementing the services. Probably I would not speak tonight if I did not come from a province in which we have had considerable experience in socialized medicine and with these different schemes over a long number of years.

Like the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, I think that the socialists and C.C.F. are too inclined to take the credit for any social services or health measures which are being implemented or extended at the present time. I would remind them that back in 1916, and earlier than that, the Liberal government of Saskatchewan introduced many health measures which were of great benefit to the people. We had then a people who were suffering from adversity, crop failures and one thing and another. We had a portion of our people who were unable to meet their obligations and receive the attention that they required. A number of schemes were put into operation. In one of those a municipal doctor was introduced and the municipality gave a basic guarantee of salary to the doctor to enable him to come in and live there while he provided medical services for the community. Municipal hospitals were put into effect. Contributions were made by people at large. Those within the municipality itself who were unable to pay their municipal bill were assisted by those who were in more fortunate circumstances. Municipal health schemes were introduced many years ago by Dr. Seymour, who was then the deputy minister of health in Saskatchewan. The Saskatchewan tuberculosis league was an outstanding example of what a community can do in the treatment of disease. This organization was made up of officers from the rural municipality and officers from the urban communities, citizens at large and members of the government. They set up the committee which handled the tuberculosis hospitals of Saskatchewan. I believe it was then that free hospitalization first came into effect and not in recent years, as our friends from the C.C.F. party would have us believe. However, this was done under the control of a sane nonpolitical body, which sought no kudos for what they were doing. Expenses were controlled and I need not say anything about the work that they have carried on. All hon. members know that in Saskatchewan today we have the lowest incidence of tuberculosis to be found anywhere in the world, and probably the most advanced treatment. I may say that the other day in my city a tuberculosis survey was made of the population. What percentage of the population do you think was covered? Ninety-nine per cent of the people were X-rayed. That shows how conscious they are of this disease. These things have not been brought forward in recent years. It is something that has developed. You cannot give a service such as that to a people and have it accepted overnight. It must be built up gradually.

In 1930 the Saskatchewan Cancer Commission Act was introduced by Dr. Munroe. The work was developed by Dr. Uhrich, now lieutenant governor of Saskatchewan, when he was the health minister of that province. Today we have probably one of the most advanced centres for cancer treatment in the Dominion of Canada. We had there, until a few months ago when he died of a heart attack, Dr. Blair, who was director of our cancer service and who, along with Dr. Richards of Toronto, has contributed more to the care and treatment of cancer than anyone else in this country. It was sane treatment gradually developed.

During my election campaign I expressed myself openly and wholeheartedly in favour of a contributory old age pension without a means test. I believe in the contributory feature of it. In the constituency I have the honour to represent there are a large number of people who have been ordinary labourers. They have worked on the streets —worked here, and worked there. The more frugal among them during the years have been able to purchase their modest homes, develop good gardens around them, and grow some of their winter supplies. However, they have not been able to put aside quite enough to look after their security in old age.

In order to be eligible for old age pension they would have to pass means tests. Some worthless galoot down the street, who had never done a decent day's work all his life, could get an old age pension and be just about as well off as someone else who had worked hard, been a good citizen and saved during his lifetime. Therefore I am in favour of the old age pension without a means test. But it must be a contributory pension. I do not think anything is worthwhile if one does not contribute toward it.

I am in favour of unemployment insurance, and I believe family allowances are a fine thing. I had not intended to speak long this evening, but I did wish to mention briefly the matter of health grants. Here perhaps my C.C.F. friends may give me a little assistance by handling some of my C.C.F. friends in Saskatchewan, so that I may get for the community I represent that to which it is entitled, and which it is prevented from getting today by a C.C.F. government.

As hon. members are aware, the national health program made provision for the sum of $165 million to support provincial health programs over a period of years. These grants covered public health, professional training, technical training, public health research—and it goes on down the line until it comes to hospital construction.

The Regina General hospital built a wing at a cost of $800,000. Construction had been started before the health grant became effective. I believe that date was April of 1948. At any rate, the hospital was partly constructed by that time, so that the city was not entitled to the total amount of the grant. The hospital authorities felt that $225,000 was coming to them from the federal government by way of grant, and an equal sum of $225,000 was coming from the provincial government. It will be recalled that federal health grants were to be matched by the provincial governments, in hospital construction.

When the campaign started last spring the city of Regina had received no grant. The hospital wing was completed, but remained empty because they had not sufficient money to purchase furniture. I made a public statement at that time, and the result was that there was an agreement to match $75,000 of the grant so that the hospital could buy furniture and open the wing. There was a waiting list of 300 people to get into the hospital. The building was there, but the provincial government refused to match the grant so that furniture could be purchased. The hospital had expended its funds. When I hear these great humanitarians talking I want to let them know just what the truth is, and just how human they are. They have matched $75,000 of that grant, but there is still over $100,000 which has not been received. The dominion government has agreed that the city is entitled to $175,000. Thus far the provincial government has matched only $75,000 of this amount. The taxpayers of Regina are forced to find out of taxes another $200,000, to which they are rightfully entitled by way of hospital grants.

So that if my hon. friends to my left who get their inspiration from there, and who seem to send inspiration out to them, can induce them to match this grant, I am sure my constituents in Regina city would be most grateful.

I believe I have said all I wish to say at this time.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. First I should like to congratulate the hon. member who preceded me. I believe his profession permits him to have a thorough knowledge about the subject concerning which he spoke. May I also say a good word for my friend from Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). I did not hear all he said, but, with the exception of one or two particulars, I approve of the resolution.

In particular I should like to associate myself with what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), that no party or individual has any monopoly on the desire to foster legislation of this kind. I agree entirely with the hon. member when he says that no member or party should attempt to claim that he or they alone desire to foster social security.

Like the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker), I committed myself during the election, before the election, and after the election. I believe in a compulsory contributory insurance scheme for all people, without a means test—and I believe that everyone in my riding is of the same opinion.

We have heard a good deal about dominion-provincial relations. Only two provinces balked at it before, and if they do not want to come in, then I believe the other eight provinces should not be deprived of the right to compulsory contributory protection by way of health insurance, or whatever one may wish to call it. I do not like the term "old age pensions", and I think some other name might be substituted.

I intend to support the resolution. It does not go as far as I should like to have it go, but I believe in a general way it embraces things which people in my constituency want. While I am not mentioning the names of the two provinces to which I referred, yet I feel that if they do not wish to come in, certainly the other eight provinces should not be penalized. I commend the hon. member upon his resolution. I do not happen to have a mother-in-law, but I like to tell stories. However, I do not like jokes on mothers-in-law. A person is very fortunate to have one.

If I may speak on behalf of the people in my constituency, I would say we are entirely in favour of what the resolution suggests. We think the government should not delay in bringing legislation down. Eight provinces have expressed a desire, while only two remain outside.

Mr. Karl A. Eyre (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest to hon. members who have spoken thus far concerning this resolution. May I take this opportunity to place myself on record as being in favour of the government's formulating a program of insurance which would be national in scope and sufficient to cover all citizens regardless of their age, or at any age, who, through permanent sickness or injury, become unemployable.

In my opinion this should be on a contributory basis, within the framework of our present system of unemployment insurance. May I at this time be permitted to bring to the attention of the house notices of motions Nos. 7, 12 and 23. Those three resolutions cover most of the reforms which I should like to see put into force.

During the past few months as mayor of Timmins I have witnessed a mine dispensing with the services of a considerable number of its old employees because of sickness, or for other reasons. The majority of these men had been employed by this particular mine for over 25 years and most of them have no income apart from a limited unemployment insurance benefit which will give them a small monthly income for about a year. In every case they are not eligible for old age pensions. In a year or two these men who have been discharged will have to seek financial aid from the municipality or some other source.

I am quite aware that because of the uncertain life of a gold mine there are many factors that would have to be ironed out before a retirement plan could be instituted, and the majority of the gold mines in my constituency have had no retirement plans to date. To the best of my knowledge there is only one which has a plan formulated on paper. No doubt this situation will correct itself in the near future, but these men will not be helped.

I think industry large and small should be compelled to institute a contributory retirement pension plan and, if not, this government should institute a plan to cover all our citizens. Timmins constituency in the Porcupine area takes in approximately 16 operating mines. We have had a very good contributory medical plan covering all mine employees and their families. I think that plan should be studied and continued along with a contributory insurance retirement pension plan.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate until the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) spoke. I am sorry that in his maiden speech he should have attempted to introduce a political angle. In introducing this resolution the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) tried to keep the debate on such a plane that all hon. members could express their opinions without introducing a political angle. As a member from Saskatchewan, I do not think anyone can say that I have tried to derive political advantage from the things which may have been done in that province.

It is true that in Saskatchewan we have not been able to take as great advantage of the dominion government's dollar for dollar offer as we would have been had our government not been carrying on an aggressive hospitalization scheme for some two or three years prior to the dominion scheme being introduced. The fact is that we have the largest number of hospital beds per thousand of population of any province in the dominion.

That province, as well as the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta, has become very health conscious, not just in recent years but over a long period of time. It is true, as the hon. member for Regina City said, that there have been municipal hospital and medical care schemes for a number of years. It is true also that we have had tuberculosis clinics and free hospitalization for tubercular patients for some twenty years. This is made possible by taxes levied by the municipalities and through grants from the provincial government.

The hon. member left the wrong impression as far as cancer treatment is concerned. The hon. member stated that cancer treatment had been started long before the present government started in Saskatchewan, but the fact is that free cancer treatment came into effect after the C.C.F. government was elected and introduced the scheme.

Mr. Boucher: But the law was passed before.

Mr. Wright: It had never been implemented. I do not want to become too political in connection with this thing, and I am going to leave it at that. I ask any hon. member who is interested in what has been accomplished there to get the facts and consider them for himself.

There are two points in connection with this resolution which appeal to me. One is the fact that it is asking for an integrated scheme for the whole of Canada, a minimum standard of social security for everyone in the dominion, instead of a hodgepodge scheme built up by introducing certain social security measures which are under provincial jurisdiction in some places and under dominion jurisdiction in others. In the case of children's allowances, I understand in seven provinces the administration is provincial whereas in two provinces these allowances are administered by the dominion government. Such a mix-up in administration makes it more costly.

It is only by having an integrated scheme arrived at by the provinces and the dominion getting together that we can hope to have social security at a reasonable cost and where everyone will contribute and feel that any benefit derived is a right.

Then with respect to the contributory feature, as the hon. member for Vancouver East has stated, the only way that social security can be paid for is by the work and labour of the people who produce the goods and services. I have heard the hon. members say that we in the C.C.F. expect these things to come from heaven or somewhere else, that their cost is going to come out of the large corporations or the men who have a million dollars; but social security can come from no one but the people who produce the goods and services, the men who sweat to raise food and the men who work in the factories to produce our goods and services. That is the only way that we can provide our older and indigent people with what they need.

There is no argument about our ability to produce. Every year we produce to an extent whereby we can export some $400 million to $500 million more in the way of goods and services than we are prepared to bring back into the country. Surely a nation that can do that can provide necessary social security for its people. It is only a matter of working out the method. Surely in this house we can work out, in co-operation with the provinces, a method to give social security to our people.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I think it may be desirable for me to take part in the debate at this stage and give an indication to the house generally of how the government views this particular resolution. May I say in the first place that I join with hon. members in expressing the conviction that an objective discussion of this matter is in the interests not only of good debate but also of a fuller appreciation of all the complexities involved in a resolution of this character.

I should also like to say that today we hear a good deal of indirect and suggestive criticism of what is called in many quarters the "welfare state". I want to say right here and now that I am not quite sure what precisely is meant by those who use the phrase "welfare state", but I suspect that their criticisms of the welfare programs of this and other countries carry with them the intention of trying to criticize social security programs generally. If by the "welfare state" is meant a government of a country providing for its aged; providing for those who, because of want of economic resources, are denied the best of hospital and medical care; providing children with the opportunity of attending school until the statutory school age limit and providing them with as great an amount of nutrition and general opportunity as possible, if by the "welfare state" is meant that the state must have a continuing interest in the welfare of those groups in the nation who must look to the state for assistance in one way or another, then I am afraid that those who use that term for critical purposes will find that most people in Canada believe in that type of welfare state.

The other day the same observation was made by the President of the United States. Therefore I suggest to those who use this phrase disapprovingly that they take serious account of the implications that are involved in their criticisms. If by "welfare state" they mean that we shall set up a system of statism or of socialism in its broad sense, then of course their criticism may have greater merit; but to suggest that the welfare state, in the sense in which it has been developed in most countries of the world, is in itself a sinister thing is to say something with which I would want to take serious issue at the outset of my remarks.

The resolution of the hon. member will bear repetition. While it does contain in its generality something that most of us can accept, certainly, speaking as a member of the government, I must give it the most careful analysis, and suggest that it may contain implications that were not in the mind of the hon. member who proposed the resolution. The resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should seek the co-operation of the provinces for the purpose of formulating a program of social security that will be national in scope, adequate in its provisions, and that will cover all citizens of Canada in every circumstance where the individual or the family is, for any reason, deprived of the opportunity of earning a living.

On the question of co-operation with the provinces, may I say that not only should this government co-operate with the provinces towards the attainment of the objectives envisaged in the resolution, but this government continues almost daily that very type of co-operation. The co-operation formally began in 1945 when, at a conference in another part of this building, the provinces and the dominion sat down to discuss certain proposals which the dominion government offered to the then nine provinces of Canada. A subsequent conference was held a year later. Those two conferences followed one held in this chamber in January, 1941. Since that time, in spite of the failure to arrive at an understanding or agreement in full conference, there have been bilateral discussions and agreements on tax matters between the dominion government on the one hand and seven provincial governments on the other.

Since that time there have been, as I said a moment ago, continuing discussions with the provinces. Only this morning I had a discussion with a representative of a provincial government with respect to a matter that would be involved in this resolution. I offer the suggestion that our experience in the holding of open conferences perhaps will suggest to our minds that the most effective way by which to achieve the desired objectives is not necessarily to proceed at once with a full conference, but to carry on talks as they are now being carried on in certain fields for purposes of exploration with the provinces. Of course sooner or later, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has already indicated in the letter he has written to all of the provincial premiers, it will be necessary to have a larger conference as a result of the preparatory work that may have taken place.

Therefore I can agree at once with that part of the resolution which says:

> . . . the government should seek the co-operation of the provinces for the purpose of formulating a program of social security that will be national in scope, adequate in its provisions . . .

I think I should at once enter a caveat that what will be "adequate" will be a subject of controversy. As Mr. Marsh says in his report of 1943, I believe it is, what is adequate in terms of social security benefits is a matter that involves a variety of opinions, and I would not be honest with the house if I said anything other than what I have already stated in this chamber, that social security benefits by their very nature are by way of maintenance grants.

As to suggesting a particular figure for old age pensions, for instance, I have never heard a figure suggested that could in the truest sense of the word be said to be an adequate old age pension. Even the highest figure given in this house, or now in existence in any country, might be interpreted, and I think possibly with justification by most, as not being wholly adequate in the fullest sense of the word. What we can hope to do is to try to obtain a system of social security benefits that will be as generous as it is possible to have under all the circumstances.

On a resolution like this, as the minister charged with the responsibility for many of these matters, in my analysis this evening I think the house would expect me not merely to dismiss some phases of this resolution but to show why there are difficulties in accepting it in full measure as it is presented to us. To do so, I think I should show what we have done, the cost involved in what we have done, and what we hope will be other projects to be carried out, indicating in this way the possibility of expansion; for nothing would be more dangerous than to embark suddenly upon a particular social security measure without a full appreciation of all the economic factors involved. To do that would be to prejudice the possibility of ever having a complete social security program. When I brought in the first amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act in my name as minister, and it was suggested that the amount was not large enough, I think hon. members will remember that I agreed. I said it was not as large as the government would like to see it or as I was sure the house generally would like to see it, but that in fixing that particular amount the government had exercised its judgment having in mind other social security measures. So I am sure that when I indicate to the house the cost involved, not only in what we are now doing but in what may perhaps be done in future, I am sure there will be general acceptance of the word of caution I am now expressing.

I have dealt with the fact that we are co-operating. I have indicated that we have certain proposals whose objectives still represent the policy of this government, and that we are proceeding in the light of our experience in what we consider the most effective way to attain those objectives. But I would not want anyone to think from reading this resolution that no substantial steps have been taken already in the development of a social security program in this country. As an authority from the university of Columbia said about two years ago, speaking at Lake Couchiching, Canada's social security program as of that date—and it has expanded very considerably since that time—was a rounded, responsible scheme of social security that would commend itself to any reasonable student in any part of the world. When you examine the monetary returns from family allowances, old age pensions, unemployment insurance benefits and the various financial opportunities given under the veterans' legislation, it will be found that in terms of dollars and cents our record will stand against that of any country in the world with the exception of four individual states in the republic to the south. That is a fact of great note which must be borne in mind in considering whether or not we have, for the time being, a program that can commend itself to reasonable men and women throughout the country who believe in a responsibly-conceived program of social security.

One of the more recent steps, of course, was the national health program announced by the then Prime Minister a little more than a year and a half ago. It should not be forgotten also that in 1947 and 1949 important amendments were made to the Old Age Pensions Act, not only with respect to the aged but also with regard to our blind citizens; and those amendments had the effect of increasing the number of old age pensioners in Canada from some 225,000 to the present figure of something like 280,000, out of the 550,000 aged citizens of this country. At the same time, provision was made through an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act to lower the age of qualification by blind pensioners from forty to twenty-one years.

Those were measures of great substance. In 1946 we spent on old age pensions, on federal account, some $42,800,000. Today, following those amendments, we are spending $90,000,000 on old age pensions. That is only our share. When it is remembered that in addition to their supplementary payments the provinces pay 25 per cent of the basic pension, it will be appreciated that this represents a very substantial series of amendments.

It will be recalled that last year the basic old age pension was increased from $30 to $40. That placed us at the highest level for old age pension returns of any country in the world. At the same time we effected amendments to the Family Allowances Act eliminating the decreasing scale after the fourth child, which represented an additional financial obligation of between six and eight million dollars in the current year. We also provided that the qualifying period of three years should be reduced to one year. That was a substantial series of amendments, which one would want to consider in discussing this resolution. And concurrently with those measures, in addition to the initial steps that had been taken, increased provision was made for veterans through various amendments to the pension and war veterans' allowance legislation. This liberalization of pensions and allowances has supplemented the outstanding treatment and rehabilitation program which was developed by the Department of Veterans Affairs under the leadership of the late Senator Mackenzie, and which is now being carried on by my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg).

Those are recent amendments, Mr. Speaker. I have not dealt with the body of the existing program of social security; but I suggest that one must deal with the body of our program to appreciate this resolution in its perspective and its full purport. In the last two decades we have adopted advanced and mature lines of social progress. When I tell the house that in the coming fiscal year Canada will have allotted more than $800 million for social security measures, on federal account alone, I am sure I am making a statement which in itself will confirm all that I have said thus far to the effect that we have developed our social security program in a very thorough manner. When you consider what other countries are spending on social security and compare it with what Canada is spending, I am sure on serious reflection no one will doubt that we have indeed a program of the greatest proportions, of which we have every reason to be proud.

Tonight we have had some discussion about old age pensions. The introduction of our Old Age Pensions Act in 1927 has resulted in the federal government alone since that time spending $625 million. At the present time some 280,000 Canadians are receiving pension assistance. As a result of the amendments to which I have already referred, as I said a moment ago, we shall this year be spending on current account $90 million alone on old age pensions, not including what the provinces are paying in respect of their 25 per cent or by way of supplementary payments.

As was stated by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the goal of the government is toward a system of contributory old age pensions. But as one who in these past two and a half years has had to give a good deal of thought to this matter, let me say clearly that I have used the word "goal" because I want to be fully honest with the house. We have not now in this parliament the power to enact a compulsory system of old age pensions on a contributory basis. As forecast in the speech from the throne, we are taking steps to acquire the power to amend the constitution of this country by our own agency. When that power has been acquired, discussion will inevitably arise with the provinces as to their attitude with regard to endowing the federal government with the necessary power to enact such a measure if, after the most careful analysis, it is thought that is the best course for Canada and for her aged citizens, and is the most effective way of bringing about what we all hope will even yet be a more perfect system for old age retirement.

Let me at once explain why I speak in this way. Recently in the United States we have seen agreements between management and labour with regard to pension schemes where the element of contribution has been completely removed. What will be the effect of those agreements upon schemes which the state may want to sponsor remains to be seen. Only last week I took advantage of my presence at the United Nations meetings to discuss with the representatives of two countries, including the United States, their experience with regard to a great number of industrial pension schemes existing in those countries. It is amazing to find the number of noncontributory schemes that are in existence. It is much greater, I am sure, than the house at the moment perhaps realizes. What the tendency will be is a matter that we must look at clearly. It may be that a great section of our public, when it ascertains that there are to be these noncontributory schemes, may feel that a noncontributory scheme is the best thing for Canada. At the moment that is not my view. At the moment I believe in a contributory system, one that will put into the hands of the recipients the opportunity of building up a fund for his or her retirement period. But as I say, having made that assertion I must qualify it by pointing out the difficulties, such as the constitutional position for one thing, and, for another, the development of new schemes on a broad scale, much broader than perhaps many anticipated a few years ago. But in spite of all this, my thinking at the moment suggests that, just as with unemployment insurance, so too with old age pensions, we may possibly be approaching the period when we can give active consideration to a scheme on a contributory basis.

But I want the house to appreciate fully that the position I am now taking is one by way of objective, as a goal, rather than a positive statement; because that can only be given after the fullest discussion with the provinces and with others concerned.

Mr. Noseworthy: At the next election.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member wishes to introduce a political note, but I think the house will appreciate that I am trying to deal with this matter in a responsible manner in keeping with the way in which the resolution itself was introduced in this house.

Then there is the matter of unemployment insurance by which 3,350,000 workers now are provided with a reserve of well over half a billion dollars; the veterans' charter; the legislation providing for support for farm and fish prices. All these are important steps in providing social security for those in the nation who require it. In our family allowances measure we have perhaps the most effective single act of social security ever introduced by any country in any part of the world. We were not the first to introduce family allowances, but our level of family allowances is higher than that of any other country. Our system was the first to take on the character of full government participation without contribution from parents or guardians or from industry. We have the benefit of the experience of family allowance schemes in France, Belgium and Switzerland, where such schemes have been in existence for many years. Because we were so desirous of avoiding the use of family allowances as a means of depressing wages, we removed the contribution from industry in order that there could be no excuse or deliberate effort made to use family allowances as an occasion to depress wages.

In considering, as the resolution suggests, that we should formulate a program of social security that will be national in scope, surely this measure of family allowances has a great role to play. Last June—on June 1, to be exact—we made a payment to an individual parent representing the attainment of one billion dollars in family allowance payments since the period of inauguration of that particular measure. When it is remembered that family allowance cheques go out each month now to at least 4,100,000 children, representing 1,800,000 families, spending this year alone for that purpose the sum of $290 million, it will be appreciated that we in this country have embarked on a substantial social security program. Leaving out family allowances and the veterans' charter, and taking particularly unemployment insurance—the power for which came to us as a result of a constitutional amendment consented to by the provinces—and old age pensions, in those two measures we, within the provinces, have enjoyed, on the whole, a great measure of co-operation. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) say tonight that he was not advocating a system of centralized control or administration. Surely anyone who has given this subject much thought will agree at once with that proposition. For any federal state like Canada to try to centralize administration or even to assume full financial responsibility is not realistic and, I submit, not desirable. The moment we take away from the provinces or, in some instances, from the municipality, some responsibility in the matter of social welfare, to that extent I think we shall seriously prejudice the development of a system of social security in Canada. That is why, in so far as we can in health, in old age pensions, and in most of these other measures now in existence or developing, we must seek to have schemes that involve provincial as well as federal interest and federal action.

Another measure that I want to mention tonight as part of this program that we have now and that is developing is our national health program. This is by no means an insignificant measure. It is a measure which, when it was introduced, received, as one would expect, the full approbation of this house, as indeed it received it from all of the provincial governments in Canada but one who expressed themselves on it. That measure is an important one. It represents, as the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) said earlier tonight, the determination of this government, or of this parliament, to expend within a period of five years from the date of the announcement of the program $165 million for the purpose of helping the provinces, where resides the primary constitutional responsibility for matters of health, to enable such provincial governments to accelerate their public health programs through campaigns for tuberculosis control; for crippling conditions in children; campaigns in connection with venereal disease; campaigns to encourage scientific research along medical lines; to encourage professional training; to encourage cancer control; to give impetus to hospital construction programs in this country. All of that is part of a program which serves as a prerequisite for a soundly constructed scheme along responsible lines for medical and hospital care.

If for any reason one wants to depreciate that program, let me refer right now to the words used by the American public health association a year ago when commenting upon Canada's national health program in the United States. I should make this observation. They have developed a system of health grants just like our own. Our grants on a per capita basis are greater than every grant which the federal government in that country provides for the purpose of assisting the state governments in the discharge of their responsibilities in the formation of health policies in the United States. That surely is a matter of great significance. The very fact that in the first year it was not possible for the provinces to utilize the full amount of money made available to them indicates the generosity and the imagination of those who were responsible for this national health program. Who were responsible? The program represents the joint endeavour of both the federal and the provincial governments.

My hon. friend properly asks us to seek further ways of effecting co-operation between the federal and provincial governments. That has been done, and particularly in this instance. Before we embarked on that program we called a conference of the provinces, and the Department of National Health and Welfare met with the responsible officials from the various departments of health of the provinces. We laid before them our ideas and we obtained their reactions. In every step since then we proceeded with the provinces in a co-operative manner, trying to make the scheme more effective as the result of such co-operation. Only this morning to the extent that time allowed I took part in a conference, which is going on tomorrow morning as well, with the mental health directors of the ten provinces of Canada who are sitting down with us in our department working out schemes based upon this program and certain projects that all of us have in mind for the future. That kind of co-operation is prevailing between ourselves and the provinces. I am happy to say that such co-operation is increasing in its intensity and I think in its consequential achievements.

With regard to this plan as a prerequisite, I will simply repeat what I said on another occasion in this house. This program provides the fundamental prerequisite of a nation-wide system of health insurance. The new services being developed, and the hospitals being built with funds now provided by the federal government, are hastening the moment when in every province it will be possible to take further action toward hospital and medical care insurance, for which of course the federal government will provide assistance under satisfactory agreements for dominion-provincial co-operation.

The present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) shortly before the statement that I have quoted, which is mine, said:

> It is up to the people and the government in each province to take the initiative in working out health insurance plans in line with their local conditions and their traditions.

That represents a carefully conceived and thought-out policy. It is based on the proposition on which this resolution itself is based, namely, that these schemes depend not on unilateral action but on co-operative action between the dominion on the one hand and the provincial governments on the other. A year and a quarter ago we had as our objective the building of forty thousand additional hospital beds in Canada. That was a project which some said was too great; it was said to be an impossible assignment or target, but because of the co-operation which we received from the provinces, and because of the financial assistance we made available to them, I am in the happy position of being able to say tonight that within the last year and a half this co-operative enterprise has resulted in the building of fourteen thousand additional hospital beds in Canada.

Now, sir, I should like to deal particularly with what I think may be considered as some weaknesses in the resolution that is now before us. With the proposition that the government should seek the co-operation of the provinces for the purpose of formulating a program of social security that would be national in scope and adequate in its provisions, I say unhesitatingly that that too is the view of the government. Not only is it our intention to continue that method of co-operation, but we have been doing that very thing. While in the last few months we may have resorted to different tactics by which to bring about certain achievements, the fact is that we subscribe fully to the terms of the resolution to the extent that I have read them. But, sir, we have a responsibility, a responsibility not only to ourselves but to the provinces and to others in the country, not to pass a resolution whose general terms are fully accepted by us, but to make sure that we have examined every implication involved in that resolution. I take second place to no one in this house in my desire to see a fully developed scheme of national security even on a more extended line than we now have in this country. But because that is my purpose I have to approach this in the light of my responsibilities as the person and as the member of the government for the time being charged with bringing about the objectives of the resolution. The part I find some difficulty with is this:

> And that will cover all citizens of Canada in every circumstance where the individual or the family is, for any reason, deprived of the opportunity of earning a living.

I do not think that, on careful analysis, we can agree exactly to that. Let me give some objections that come to my mind almost at once. First of all the words "all citizens" are used. We have many citizens of Canada who do not live in Canada. We have citizens who live abroad, some of them permanently abroad, whose domicile is still abroad, and who are enjoying social security benefits under other jurisdictions—or, if they are not enjoying social security benefits, are outside the reach of the government at home.

Is it intended that such individuals should be included? Let no one think for a moment that the persons who are legal citizens of Canada but whose domicile is abroad are few in number. The number is a very significant one, as my colleague the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley), I am sure, could indicate, if the question were directed to him.

Then, another objection I see to these very doubtful terms is that the resolution as a whole takes no account whatsoever of municipal responsibility. The three levels of government in this country are municipal, provincial and federal, and all three have their responsibilities. While in the first instance the responsibility of the municipality was more comprehensive than it is now, the fact is that municipalities still have their responsibilities in respect of these arrangements. Many provinces take the view that we are not encouraging sufficiently the assumption of responsibility by the municipalities in their particular areas.

But they have to be taken into consideration. There are many cases of hardship that can even at this time be best taken care of by municipalities. They are not cases of a type; they are individual special cases. In Great Britain, in New Zealand, in Australia, that local responsibility has not been taken away. In those countries, likewise, every citizen is not covered, in the sense that this resolution envisages, by the social security provisions to be found in those countries.

Then again—and I have to interpret the resolution very strictly, because of its implications—this resolution in its final terms does not take into consideration a citizen or individual who might himself be guilty of an act which would put him out of the wage-earning market, or the income-earning market; and there are a few such individuals. A man could deliberately—and we have had such cases—dismember his two hands, and yet under this resolution he would be entitled to benefits. Are we going to say tonight that that kind of situation should be condoned by a legislative body?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friends laugh. But we are legislators. We are called upon tonight to pass a resolution; and our responsibility and our duty is to make sure that that legislation covers every case which at the moment of deliberation we are able to think of. It is my responsibility as Minister of National Health and Welfare to indicate what I believe to be some of the inadequacies and weaknesses in the resolution as at present drawn.

Another more serious objection is that the mover of the resolution uses the words "that will cover all citizens of Canada." But we have not made citizenship a condition for obtaining social security benefits. A child does not have to be a citizen under the Family Allowances Act in order to be eligible for the family allowance. An old age pensioner does not have to be a citizen of Canada to get an old age pension. A man does not have to be a citizen of Canada to be a beneficiary under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Yet this resolution would go farther, and would restrict not only future legislation but existing legislation.

It calls upon us to pass legislation, with the active co-operation of the provinces, provided it is given to all citizens of Canada. Let me repeat that we give social security benefits in this country in respect of the various acts I have mentioned, not on the basis of nationality, not on the basis of citizenship, but on the mere fact of residence; and this resolution does not take that into consideration.

The final observation I would make in this particular is to indicate, as I said at the outset, that there is no country in the world with a provision of this kind. Take a country where, it may be suggested, social security benefits are most comprehensive—and it has been suggested the United Kingdom is such a country; for the purposes of argument let us accept that suggestion. But in the United Kingdom there is no social security measure which provides social security assistance for all citizens of the United Kingdom in every circumstance where an individual or family is for any reason deprived of the opportunity of earning a living.

I say that to have a resolution couched in those terms—I was going to say "extravagant terms", but I will not say that, because the hon. member who is the author of this resolution is a responsible member of the House of Commons and usually approaches discussions of these matters in a serious manner. I will not use that word; but I am sure upon reflection the hon. member will find that the observations I have made are not without merit.

There is nothing further I can add except to say that, in a general way, so far as requesting the government to seek the co-operation of the provinces is concerned, we will continue to do so. That we are doing. I believe that what we are now doing will, in the course of, I trust, not too many months, be productive of good results.

Beyond that at the present time I cannot go, except to say that the government will make every effort toward expanding its program, in the light of what it believes should have priority, and in the light of what it considers to be its financial limitations—and that is something which we have to keep in mind. In the light of these things the government is not oblivious of the desirability of continuing to seek the co-operation of the provinces in expanding our social security measures.

One would not be thorough in his presentation if he did not again say that the basis of any social security system is the maintenance of peace in the world, that the productive capacity in a country should be maintained at a level whereby these things can be assured and continued.

It is true that Sir Stafford Cripps said the other day in the British House of Commons that there would be no interference with provisions for social security payments in that country. On the other hand, I can say with some authority that there are countries in continental Europe—and for fear of perhaps entering into a field in which I have no authority to make any public observations, I shall not name them—there are countries, represented by distinguished statesmen who have recently visited Canada, where very serious consideration is being given to reducing the social security payments, because of weaknesses in their productive capacity.

We do not want to be in that position; and it is because we do not want to be in that position that this government is doing all it can to make its contribution toward the preservation of peace in the world, doing all it can to extend its foreign markets so that our artisans, industrialists and farmers can sell their products, in return for which there will be guaranteed incomes to enable Canada to carry on in a responsible way these schemes of social security.

In speaking to this resolution I may say in all fairness and indisputably that the government that is now ready to seek the co-operation of the provinces has by its record to date given evidence of its determination to continue in the pursuit of that co-operation.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I are intensely interested in the resolution presently before us. Perhaps one could leave it at that and at the same time leave the impression that we are going to support it. However, having said that, perhaps I should indicate that I personally have no hesitation in indicating my readiness to support the resolution. I was rather interested in the observations of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin).

In the first place, he took considerable time to dig up—perhaps I can use that expression—every conceivable type of condition that might, either now or some time in the future, arise under this particular resolution. If every piece of legislation brought before this house by the government were considered in the same way we would be unwise to pass any of it. During the course of years that I have had the privilege of occupying a seat in this house I have heard, not one but several cabinet ministers, when questioned rather closely with respect to sections of bills, say that it would have to be left to the courts to decide. Yet in connection with this particular resolution the minister went into great detail to indicate some real and many purely imaginary conditions which could be used as an argument for casting the resolution aside.

I believe I heard the minister go so far as to say that one might cut off both his hands in order to qualify under legislation that might be brought forward as the result of passing this resolution. I am not conscious of any piece of dominion government legislation in the field of public welfare, good as much of it is, under which I would cut off even one hand in order to qualify. I am sure that most Canadians feel the same.

I agree with the minister wholeheartedly, and the resolution agrees with him, when he states that the provinces should be consulted with respect to health measures. We have always been much opposed to centralization and we feel that under centralization this type of activity could not conceivably be effective. We feel that decentralization, with administration left in the hands of the provincial governments, would bring forward much more effective results than would otherwise be the case.

We agree with the second portion of the resolution which states that any security scheme should be national in scope. It is well known that many parts of Canada are more favourably blessed from the standpoint of resources than other parts. We realize that those areas which are so blessed could provide a higher standard of health services than many other sections. But it is Canada we are dealing with. It is the health of Canadians we are concerned with. We are most desirous of seeing that any benefits that do accrue shall accrue to the people in those areas which from an economic or national wealth point of view are not as well blessed as other parts of the country.

The minister referred specifically to the latter part of the resolution and indicated that that was why the government could not accept the resolution. I think one of the most objectionable types of cases we encounter in Canada today are those which concern persons who because of physical incapacitation are unable to earn a living. Cases come to the attention of every one of us of persons under 70 years of age who cannot qualify for benefits under the Old Age Pensions Act, who have had to leave the labour market because of physical infirmities, who have nowhere to turn to except the municipal relief offices. Personally I do not think we have succeeded in any respect in the field of social security when persons are obliged because of incapacitation to seek municipal relief.

That is one reason why we have always urged that the Old Age Pensions Act be amended or a separate act enacted to permit these persons to qualify for benefits. I would go so far as to say that the government, in co-operation with the provinces, might consider this type of legislation before extending other types of legislation which we now have on the statute books and which provide benefits to other groups of people. I would be the first to say that, as far as our Old Age Pensions Act is concerned, we have still some distance to go before the payments are sufficient to guarantee a decent living for our people; but on the other hand those people are certainly much better off under the present rate of pension than those who are physically incapacitated and not eligible for anything. I think the minister might concentrate upon the solution of that particular problem as his next objective.

I would be the last one in the world to endeavour to take any credit away from the minister or the government for what has been done in the field of national health. I think that most of that legislation has proved beneficial to many of our Canadian people. But I recall a time when many of us were pressing for that legislation, long before it appeared on the statute books of our country. I can recall when many hon. gentlemen who are now sitting in the house ridiculed us day in and day out for suggesting that such a thing as family allowances was possible. It is significant that since 1945, when family allowances became a reality, we have not heard that type of criticism. We pride ourselves upon the position which we took and the part which we played in persuading the government to adopt that legislation and make those allowances a reality in Canada.

As I say, we are most grateful for the legislation that has been passed to assist the Canadian people in the field of public health. We anticipate more, but we do not feel that this resolution in its present form brings forward all the evil possibilities that the minister indicated during the course of his speech. As I say, we can be assured that with the co-operation of the provinces no minister would bring in a type of legislation that would permit many of the conditions which he referred to as being dangerous under the type of legislation that he envisaged following a resolution of this character. It could be said that the resolution is nothing but objective. It could be considered as an endorsation of much that the government has already done in the field of national health and social security. It could be a directive from the house to the government to proceed further with the introduction of other measures as and when such become possible.

May I say to the minister I feel that in the absence of a certain economic policy—perhaps I can put it that way—which would remove from our society the condition under which certain people find themselves unable to procure essential health services, the government is definitely under a moral obligation to pass the necessary legislation in order to fill the gaps.

I do not desire to occupy more of the time of the house. I agree with much that has been said by previous speakers, but at the same time there is a good deal with which I do not agree. I shall not take the time at the moment, however, to point out on what grounds I disagree. I repeat that we feel there is no danger in the passage of a resolution of this kind, because we are certain that the government is not going to negotiate any agreement with the provinces under which they will clash head on with many of the difficulties which the minister enumerated.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I listened with a great deal of interest to the minister's remarks on this resolution. I was particularly interested in what he had to say regarding the so-called welfare state. I have noticed, as he has, that on the part of newspaper and magazine editors particularly there has been a great deal of criticism of the so-called welfare state. It has been quite evident in their criticisms that those editors were referring to the welfare state in the sense in which the minister interpreted it, and not in the sense of a completely socialistic state. A few days ago I read in a very popular United States magazine an editorial holding up the example of the Ford settlement with its employees as an illustration of capital welfare as opposed to the welfare state, and calling upon industry to institute such schemes of insurance in order to postpone the day when the state would take that action on behalf of its citizens.

I think there is a theory being propagated that is dangerous in a democracy. It is that government, as we have it in Canada, is something far removed from the people. I think it is time that steps were taken by editors generally and by those who influence public opinion, to point out that government in our country, and in all democratic countries, is not something removed from the people, but that government is a part of the people and the people themselves are a part of the government. I think it should be pointed out that in taking such steps to protect the welfare of citizens as are taken under social security measures the people are thereby doing collectively for themselves what a good many citizens could not possibly do individually. I can think of no more intelligent way of co-operating than by co-operation through the government whereby we collectively provide for those emergencies which the individual citizen in numerous cases cannot provide for himself. I can think of no more Christian way of meeting those difficulties than by doing it collectively through our government at the various government levels.

I was rather surprised at and disappointed by the objections which the minister raised to the acceptance by the government of the resolution. I have a very high respect for the intelligence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and it is for that reason that I was amazed at the piffling arguments which he put forth in objection to the resolution. Many of his arguments were such as no high-school class in this country would consider logical, and I suggest that they are an insult to the intelligence of the members of the House of Commons.

The minister quibbles about the use of the word "adequate" in the resolution. He knows full well that, before the resolution takes the form of law, the government, in consultation with the provinces, will be obliged to bring down a definite bill, and that the terms of that measure will be hedged around with regulations to be made by orders in council. He knows very well that the government is quite capable of seeing to it that the word "adequate", when translated into actual legislation, will be reasonable and will not involve the unreasonable difficulties to which he referred.

He asks us to oppose the resolution because it attempts to cover all citizens of Canada and there are some citizens of Canada living outside of the country who should not be covered. Surely his department, and the government he represents, can be depended upon to be sufficiently intelligent in introducing legislation and regulations to see that that particular phrase in the resolution is taken care of. He suggests further that the resolution does not provide for those residents of Canada who are not citizens of Canada, and he tries to imply that, if we accepted the resolution, legislation would be introduced whereby residents of Canada who are not citizens would not be entitled to benefits under it. There again he is simply setting up a straw man. The validity of his objections is illustrated by his statement that it is conceivable that some citizen might cut off his two hands in order to be eligible for compensation under this legislation. I suggest that is pretty far-fetched. I cannot picture the minister going before the industrial workers of his own constituency and putting forth that argument as a reason for not accepting this resolution.

The minister spoke of the cost of the present welfare projects of the government. This resolution does not criticize the government on what it is doing. No one in this house wants to criticize the government on what it is doing. We recognize that the government has been moving in the right direction, but our criticism is that it is moving too slowly. It has become a habit with the Liberal government to withhold much-needed social legislation until just before an election, and then to introduce that legislation on the eve of an election. That happened in the last election, and in the election of 1945. I think the members of this house should be concerned to see that we do not spend the next five years coasting along on the social legislation we have already, waiting until the eve of the next federal election for the government to introduce the sort of legislation every political party advocated on the hustings last June. I do not think there is a constituency in Canada in which a member could get elected if it were generally known that he was opposed to the type of social security visualized in this resolution. I represent a constituency which includes one of the wealthiest municipalities in this country, and I am confident that no man could get elected in South York if it were generally known that he was opposed to the sort of social security legislation that is set out in this resolution. As a matter of fact, there were three candidates in that constituency in the last election, a Liberal, a Conservative and myself, and night after night all three of us were promising that if elected to parliament we would do our best to impress upon the government the need for just this kind of social security.

I am quite confident that if they are approached the provincial governments will co-operate in such legislation. The fact that one or two dominion-provincial conferences were unable to reach agreement is no reason for not making further attempts. The minister outlined the steps being taken by the government at the present time, the method of approaching one province at a time on one specific project. We do not want to wait another fifty years for the kind of social security legislation that was promised by the Liberal party thirty years ago. We want some steps taken at the beginning of this session so that such legislation may become effective within the next five years, during the lifetime of this parliament, rather than ten or fifteen years from now.

Mr. Irvin W. Studer (Maple Creek): The subject matter of the resolution now before the house, Mr. Speaker, is close to the hearts of many of us, and something we can all support if the mover and seconder will word their resolution in such a way as to make it possible for all the people of Canada to receive the benefit of anything this parliament may do in regard to social welfare and security.

For many years the dominion government has been trying to formulate a policy under which it could enact social legislation the benefits of which would be received by the people of every province. I do not believe any government of Canada has made more overtures, or has pleaded more with the provinces to enter into an agreement for the benefit of all the people of this country, than this government has done since 1945. The resolution asks that the government seek the co-operation of the provinces to bring about these beneficial conditions. I think it is about time the provinces should seek to co-operate with the dominion government in bringing about a condition under which all the people of the country will benefit from whatever steps may be taken. Time after time within my recollection there has been difficulty in connection with dominion-provincial agreements. Not only do I want agreement with respect to the health services of the country, about which the minister has spoken this evening; I also want agreement in regard to all the services affecting the people of Canada. To those who have been criticizing this government, I would suggest that they go to the provinces which thus far have refused to co-operate and preach this policy of co-operation, so that their people may obtain the benefits which will result from an agreement between all parts of the country.

It is impossible for a particular province to formulate a policy in regard to social services which will be permanent and of definite benefit to the people for all time. We know that from our experience in Saskatchewan; but let it be understood that the government of that province has been trying to do something, and I suggest that it be given all credit for that. It may be that it has been doing it in the wrong way, but at least the government has been trying to do something. The dominion government is endeavouring by the experience of the various provinces and of other countries, so that when it formulates a policy it will be permanent and of benefit to all the people throughout the land.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I believe that in the last few years the Liberal government has listened more attentively to the criticism offered by the opposition than any other government in history. Strangely enough, however, the government that listened to that criticism and benefited therefrom is here in larger numbers today than ever before, while those who delivered that criticism without stint in the past few years are here in fewer numbers than ever before. So I suggest that the criticism offered by any opposition party will be well received by the government, and I believe the opposition parties will do themselves and the people in general a service by presenting resolutions of a kind which all the people can support.

A short time ago the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) dealt with the question of social services for all Canada. If what he has said is indicative of the feeling in the province with which he is closely associated, it would seem that prospects of co-operation in future are much brighter than they have ever been for some time. There has been some criticism of the suggestion by the minister that there may be some difficulties in the way of putting into effect the provisions of a resolution of this kind. Perhaps it was held up before us that some of the things he has offered as criticism are not well-founded. We learn as we go along—and we who are from Saskatchewan are in close association with some of the things that have happened there in this connection—things that we do not want any dominion government to have in its system of social services and which we want to prevent. This has nothing in particular to do with what was offered by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). Nevertheless, we could perhaps offer as an instance one little thing that happened in Saskatchewan in connection with social services. I should not like to have anyone tell anyone else about this, but they tell us out in Saskatchewan that, in connection with social services, the upkeep of the hospitalization plan is provided by contributions of the people; that is, there is a hospitalization fee in connection with the operation of that social service. They tell us that there is a law on the statute books of Saskatchewan to the effect that if anyone refuses to pay that hospitalization fee, he must either pay a fine or go to jail. I believe that is one of the things we should like to eliminate in this country of ours, in order that we would have nothing in connection with our social services that would lead one to believe that if one was not in a position to pay the required fee, or refused to pay it, a jail penalty would be imposed. We should like to have a social service that would be so comprehensive and be held in such high esteem by all the people of Canada that no one would need to attach a penalty of that kind to the law. With the co-operation of all the members in this house in what they may determine would be for the best interests of Canada, and in order that everyone regardless of where he is within this dominion of ours could obtain the benefits of the plan, we should like to associate ourselves with a resolution that would bring that about. In the meantime there are those people who now are under various social service schemes in connection with industry; and incidentally, perhaps those schemes could be enlarged in industry whereby the individuals who are now obtaining the benefits of what industry offers could go even further to make it possible that those people working in industry could all be sharers in industry and thus eliminate much of the difficulty not only in connection with the upkeep of their social services but also in connection with their whole manner of living as well.

When we compare ourselves with others anywhere in the world, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare has said, we should not be satisfied with having the best that there is anywhere. We are all interested in improving our system, and all would be willing to support a resolution that will make this possible. I would suggest to the opposition that they withdraw their resolution and put one before us that we can support, and as a result of which we will have a happier country in which to live.

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to ask the hon. member a question. Does he know anyone who has been thrown in jail because he would not pay this bill or could not pay it? If it is a case of someone not wanting to pay it but who is able to pay it, that is all right. But I do not think anyone was thrown in jail because he could not pay it.

Mr. Ferrie: Nevertheless it is the law.

Mr. Thatcher: But no one has been thrown in jail if he said he could not pay the bill.

Mr. Studer: I do not think I said that anyone was thrown in jail. I said there was a law that made it possible for one to go to jail if he refused—and I used the word "refused"—to pay the hospitalization fee. Is that not right?

Mr. Thatcher: Yes. But no one who is in need is prosecuted, and no old age pensioner or anyone similarly circumstanced.

Mr. Studer: I should not like to have written into Hansard what I know, but there are some people who have lived in Saskatchewan—

Mr. Cruickshank: Let it be written in. The hon. member who has asked the question does not know.

Mr. Studer: He should.

Mr. Thatcher: I think the hon. member wants to be fair.

Mr. Studer: I want to be fair. I want to make it clear that no one may have gone to jail or may ever go to jail, but it is the law just the same.

Mr. Bryce: You go to jail if you do not pay your taxes.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): I have followed this interesting debate with great care, Mr. Speaker. If it has proved anything, it has proved the correctness of the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) when he pointed out that the members of all parties in this house are sincerely interested in the basic tenet of this resolution, namely the expansion of social security in this country. Certainly no party has been in a position to give more complete and more concrete proof of this intention than has the Liberal party. I should like to compliment the minister on his fine though necessarily brief resume of the present social security system in this country, for which the Liberal party and the present government are almost completely responsible. It was somewhat amusing to hear the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) state that the Liberal government was in the habit of withholding its advances in social security until the time of an election.

Mr. Noseworthy: That is right.

Mr. Dickey: Of course, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal government has been in the happy position of putting in so many of these social security measures that it would be a physical impossibility to have avoided completely the possibility of a criticism of that kind. We are fortunate that we are not in the position of the C.C.F. party.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it is now eleven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall move up the two resolutions in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), the one with regard to the Judges Act and the other with regard to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act. Then the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will move the resolution dealing with the appointment of a chief electoral officer. In committee we will study Bill No. 2, to amend the Supreme Court Act. Later we will take Bill No. 8, to amend the Exchequer Court Act, and then Bill No. 9, to amend the Department of Justice Act. At some stage we will move to go into committee of supply, and will call in five new departments.

Mr. Knowles: Five?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is the only day in the week on which we can move to go into supply, having regard to these private members' days. Last week we could not even do that. I feel that we need a good many departments in if we want to make some progress with the estimates.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, October 4, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

THANKSGIVING DAY ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): In accordance with the undertaking I gave the house yesterday, and with, I assume, unanimous consent, I should like to move, seconded by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner):

That when this house adjourns on Friday, the 7th instant, it stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 11th instant.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARIES, TRAVELLING ALLOWANCES, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend The Judges Act, 1946, to increase the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada and to provide salaries for an increased number of judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario; also to amend the present provision respecting travelling allowances to a judge of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INCREASE IN REFUND PAYABLE IN RESPECT TO PRIOR SERVICE BEYOND MAXIMUM PENSION PERIOD

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act by increasing the amount of refund payable to members of the force in respect to prior service in a provincial police force where they were retained in the force beyond the maximum period of service that may be counted for the purpose of computing a pension.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

APPOINTMENT OF NELSON JULES CASTONGUAY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

Whereas the office of chief electoral officer has become vacant by resignation of Jules Castonguay;

And whereas subsection two of section four of the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, provides that in the event of a vacancy in the office of chief electoral officer the vacancy shall be filled by resolution of the House of Commons;

Be it therefore resolved, that Nelson Jules Castonguay, executive assistant to the chief electoral officer, be and he is hereby appointed chief electoral officer.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in submitting this motion for consideration of the house I wish to say first of all how much we regret the illness which necessitates the resignation of Mr. Jules Castonguay from the office of chief electoral officer. For twenty-two years Mr. Castonguay has held that office, and I believe everyone will admit that during those years he has done a thoroughly good job. Through five general elections he has supervised our electoral machine, and at times this supervision has kept him and his small office staff working almost day and night. Even between elections he and his few associates have been kept busy with plenty of routine planning and revision work.

Mr. Castonguay's work as chief electoral officer has not been without its endless worries, inquiries and sometimes protests. But through it all he has displayed a remarkable impartiality. In my eight years of public service I have yet to hear a word of adverse criticism of Mr. Castonguay's handling of the many electoral problems with which he has been faced. To him we owe many of the laws which govern Canada's voting—laws which have been studied by other countries of the commonwealth, and copied in other countries of the commonwealth and elsewhere.

Canada is indeed fortunate in having been served so faithfully and so long by Mr. Castonguay. He has discharged his duties with distinction, and with credit not only to himself but also to the office which has been his, and to the public service at large. I am sure every member of the house would wish you, Mr. Speaker, in conveying to Mr. Castonguay this tribute of our appreciation of his public service, to extend to him also our best wishes for his speedy return to health so that he may enjoy many years of well-earned rest, freed from the cares of that office.

Chief Electoral Officer

Mr. Jules Castonguay's resignation, coming as it does just prior to the forthcoming by-elections, necessitates the immediate appointment of a successor. Since 1934 Mr. Nelson Jules Castonguay, his son, has been in his father's office, and for the last few years has been his father's righthand man. In 1941 his work was interrupted when he entered the navy. As a wartime naval officer, rising from the rank of probationary sublieutenant to that of lieutenant commander, he served on two destroyers and became captain of a frigate. Shortly after returning to Ottawa and to his father's office he was promoted to his present position of executive assistant to the chief electoral officer. It is my opinion, and one which I am sure many will share, that his promotion would probably have been more rapid had he not been Mr. Jules Castonguay's son.

As executive assistant to his father, Mr. Nelson Castonguay served in an advisory capacity in matters having to do with preparations for Newfoundland's recent provincial election, as well as for the federal election which followed; and I am told he was largely responsible for the setting up of the electoral machinery in that province prior to that provincial election. I am told, too, that it functioned, as we would expect it to function with the good will of our new Canadian fellow citizens in Newfoundland, in an admirable manner.

Just this summer Mr. Nelson Castonguay travelled to Colombia, at the request of the government of that South American republic, to explain our electoral system to officials of their electoral court. As a result of these and other experiences in close association with his father, Nelson Jules Castonguay has become an expert in electoral matters under the kind of system we have in this country. It is my opinion that no one else has in the same degree the experience and knowledge necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of this responsible position.

It is particularly fortunate that we should find these qualifications in one who had such an excellent war record, and, if the house sees fit to adopt this resolution, not only shall we be expressing confidence in a competent public servant, but we shall be honouring the body of veterans of which he is a distinguished member.

Because of the large number of by-elections now in progress, as I have already intimated, the appointment of a successor to Mr. Jules Castonguay is urgent. Accordingly I move the resolution which you, Mr. Speaker, have read to the house.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in regard to Mr. Jules Castonguay, and to express regret, which I am sure everyone will share, at his having found it necessary, because of ill health, to resign. Mr. Jules Castonguay has established a reputation not only for himself, but for our electoral system, in which all of us may share some measure of pride. I know all hon. members will join not only in extending best wishes to him for speedy recovery from his present illness, but also in expressing the hope that he may long be spared to enjoy the many associations he has made in all parts of the House of Commons, and in every section of Canada, by reason of the important responsibilities he assumed.

It does present a unique opportunity when we find that Mr. Castonguay's son, who has been associated with him, should have had the experience of executive assistant to his father in this very important work. I feel sure there will be general approval of the promotion to this office of one who, having acquired this background of experience, has demonstrated that he possesses high qualifications for the extremely responsible public position which carries with it the duty of making the electoral system of this great democracy work to the satisfaction of all our people.

Mr. Nelson Castonguay has shown himself a gallant Canadian in the service of his country in war, and has demonstrated his knowledge of the work in which he is about to engage. I trust that in the years ahead he will continue to uphold the high standards which have been established in the conduct of the business of that office.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation group in the house I wish to concur in what has been said about Mr. Jules Castonguay, who for many years has been our chief electoral officer.

It was my good fortune to know Mr. Jules Castonguay fairly well because of my serving on nearly all the committees of the house on the Dominion Elections Act. I have also known him in connection with the conduct of elections. I am glad to associate this group with what has been said by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, and to add that no one could possibly have been fairer than Mr. Jules Castonguay in all his dealings with the public. I regret that ill health, and perhaps advancing years, have compelled him to relinquish the duties of chief electoral officer, and I wish him many years of good health in which to enjoy his retirement.

Although I have met Mr. Nelson Castonguay in connection with the sittings of committees of the house, I do not know him quite as well. Since he was subordinate to the chief electoral officer, one did not have the same opportunity to judge of his qualities. But training under his illustrious father should be a good beginning for filling the responsible position to which he is to be appointed, and I wish him long life and much success in that office.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Social Credit group I should like to associate myself with the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, and the hon. member for Vancouver East in what they have said in appreciation of the services of Mr. Jules Castonguay. Having been the representative of this group on the privileges and elections committee since 1936, I can truthfully say that we could not have had a better administrator of our election law than Mr. Castonguay. I found him to be very fair and helpful, and on many occasions he invited suggestions for the improvement of our election law.

During the past two years I have become acquainted with Mr. Nelson Castonguay, and I feel that he will give service similar to that which was rendered by his father. On behalf of this group I wish to express the hope that Mr. Jules Castonguay may soon be restored to health and able to enjoy the years to come. I should like also to express the hope that his son will continue to serve Canada as chief electoral officer for a considerable number of years.

Motion agreed to.

COLLECTIVE SECURITY

PACIFIC AREA—RECOGNITION OF COMMUNIST REGIME BY U.S.S.R.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I believe there is considerable concern on the Pacific coast about the present situation in China, particularly having regard to the recognition of the communist regime by the soviet. There are press reports to the effect that conferences are being held between the countries of the commonwealth and the countries which are signatories to the Atlantic treaty. Can the Prime Minister tell us whether Canada is taking part in these conferences? Perhaps he will make a statement with regard to the situation.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I think it would be going beyond the ordinary meaning of words to say that a conference is being held. Discussions are in process among the members of the commonwealth, our associates in the North Atlantic pact, and others who are concerned in the Pacific situation. As soon as any decision has been reached, the Secretary of State for External Affairs will make a statement to the house as to the conclusions arrived at; or, if he is not present at the time, the statement will be made either by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs or by myself.

FRUITS AND VEGETABLES

SUSPENSION OF RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTATIONS —QUESTION AS TO DUMPING AND SEASONAL IMPORTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, or, if he cannot answer it, to the Minister of Agriculture. When the Minister of Finance stated on September 26 that all restrictions would be removed on the import of fresh fruits and vegetables, did that mean that the seasonal or dumping restrictions would also be removed?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): If my hon. friend heard the statement I made, he will recall that I said that only restrictions under the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act were being removed. Of course that would not cover the normal seasonal restrictions which exist under the Customs Act.

Mr. Fraser: On September 26 the minister said that the government had decided to suspend the present import restrictions on all kinds of fresh fruits and vegetables. There was some doubt in the minds of members of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and many others in regard to this, and I thought it should be clarified.

Mr. Abbott: If there is any doubt, I am glad to clear it up.

HOUSING

FRASERVIEW PROJECT, VANCOUVER—HEATING EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Has the minister received any protest from the retail fuel dealers of Vancouver in connection with the policy adopted by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation of equipping most of the houses built in greater Vancouver with oil heating units? If so, is the minister prepared to make a statement in that regard?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The hon. member was good enough to send me notice of his question, and a copy of a telegram from the Greater Vancouver retail fuel dealers' association. The hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) has also spoken to me in this same connection.

The only veterans rental housing project now under construction by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in Vancouver is the project known as Fraserview. Half of the 1,100 houses in this project will have basements. The houses with basements are heated by gravity hot air furnaces burning solid fuels such as wood, coal, sawdust, et cetera. Houses without basements, because of limited storage area, are heated by under-floor heating units burning liquid fuels. It would add to the cost of the house to provide sufficient space in a house without a basement for the installation of a satisfactory solid fuel heating unit and storage of solid fuel. Married quarters being built for the Department of National Defence are equipped with heating units burning liquid fuels. In houses with basements, the heating equipment is of a type which can be converted to burn solid fuels.

ANSWER TO QUESTION BY MR. CHURCH ON MONDAY, OCTOBER 3

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a matter which I should like to bring up in connection with an answer given in the house yesterday to a question standing in my name. I addressed a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) who made a reply as reported on page 440 of Hansard of October 3. The minister made a touchdown assisted by the minister in charge of housing, but he forgot to inform the house that under the Railway Act—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Church: I can bring this up on the motion to go into supply; perhaps that would be better.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

SITE FOR PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION IN CHARLOTTETOWN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. As I have just received the communication to which I shall refer, I was unable to give the minister notice, so he can answer the question tomorrow. A number of land owners, home owners and tenants have written me about their properties and leases in the section of Charlottetown where the new dominion buildings are to be erected. When will the department or the government make a definite statement about these properties, so that these land owners, home owners and tenants can make arrangements for other locations in the future?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): As soon as possible.

CANADA LAND AND IRRIGATION COMPANY

REPORTED PURCHASE BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. D. Wylie (Medicine Hat): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, based upon reports which appear in the Medicine Hat Daily News, and the Brooks Bulletin, which I have just received. My question is—

An hon. Member: Where is that?

Mr. MacInnis: Not in the Fraser valley.

Mr. Speaker: I must ask hon. members to allow the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Wylie: Both papers report that the dominion government has purchased the Canada Land and Irrigation Company. Is the Minister of Agriculture in a position to make a statement?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The present position is that negotiations are being carried on now in the city of Regina in connection with the purchase of the Canada Land and Irrigation Company.

Mr Wylie: Obviously the newspaper reports are either true or false. May I ask the minister what is the truth?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not publish either paper.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—PAYMENT BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT OF SHARE OF RELIEF COSTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour—I have been asked to do so by the city council of Moose Jaw. In view of the increased number of people drawing relief in certain parts of Canada, and the heavy burden thus placed upon municipalities, has the government given consideration to paying a share of relief costs as was done prior to the war?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I could not hear the question, but in any event I would inform the hon. member that if he has a question to ask he should ask it as briefly as possible.

Mr. Cruickshank: Don't make a speech.

Mr. Thatcher: I was not going to make a speech.

Mr. Cruickshank: What are you doing now?

Mr. Thatcher: Then I will put my question. Has the government given consideration to paying a share of relief costs as was done prior to the war?

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): The Department of Labour is watching the unemployment situation very carefully. Through reports from the national employment service and the unemployment insurance returns, a close check is kept on the employment situation in Canada. At the present time there is a very high level of employment. The last figure we have is for June 4, 1949, when there was a total of 5,121,000 in the labour force. On the same date in 1948 the figure was 5,030,000. This is the latest month for which we have comparative figures.

There is not as acute a demand in Canada this fall for some types of workers as there was last year, and there is an increase in the number of unplaced applicants. In September, 1948, the total number was 87,207, whereas on the same date in 1949 the total was 140,892. But the hon. member will agree, I am sure, that with a total working force of over five million the number of unplaced applicants, even at 140,892, is not high in a comparative sense.

Representations have been made by two of the larger cities, one in eastern Canada and one in the west. From an examination of the statements made, I know that the concern is not about the immediate expenditure on relief but about what certain individuals feared was going to happen. It is my opinion that we have very little to fear, and that we shall be able to maintain a high level of employment in Canada.

Mr. Thatcher: Will the minister state whether at the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference the matter of relief costs will be discussed with the provinces?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hardly think that is a question of urgency at the moment.

Mr. Cruickshank: Are there any unemployed members of parliament from Moose Jaw? If not, why not?

SUPREME COURT ACT

VARIOUS AMENDMENTS—ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL

The house resumed, from Tuesday, September 27, consideration in committee of Bill No. 2, to amend the Supreme Court Act—Mr. Garson—Mr. Dion in the chair.

Supreme Court Act

On section 1—Constitution of court.

(Translation):

Mr. LaCroix: Mr. Chairman, I move that clause 1 of the bill be amended by the addition thereto at the end of section 4, substituted for the one that is now repealed, of the following words:

Provided that four of the puisne judges be chosen among the candidates proposed by the lieutenant governor in council, and that one of the four above-mentioned judges be chosen among the candidates proposed by the lieutenant governor in council of the province of Quebec, each province having to propose at least three candidates.

Of course this does not amend section 6, but merely section 4. I consider that under this amendment at least one of the judges provided for by section 6 will be chosen among those proposed by the government of the province of Quebec.

(Text):

The Chairman: As I have no translation of the amendment, I will ask the Deputy Clerk to supply me with one, and I will read it.

Section stands.

On section 2—Appeals from final judgments.

The Chairman: Shall section 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, did you call section 2?

The Chairman: Yes.

Some hon. Members: It is carried.

Mr. Fulton: We did not hear section 2 called.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask a question on subsection 2 of section 1. I understand that this is the one which amends section 6 of the act. The new section provides that three at least of the judges shall be appointed from among the judges of the court of king's bench, or of the superior court, and so on.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is section 1, and it has been allowed to stand. We are dealing with section 2 of the bill.

The Chairman: All of section 1 stands. Shall section 2 carry?

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Judgment to be final.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I think you just said that clause 1 stands and clause 2 is carried. I thought it was the other way round.

The Chairman: Section 1 stands. Section 2 is carried.

Mr. Fleming: I did not understand that was what the Prime Minister said just now.

The Chairman: Order. I gave the floor to the hon. member for Kamloops but he did not take it, so I gave it to the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay.

Mr. Ashbourne: While we are dealing with section 3 of the bill I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Under this section appeals to the privy council are to be abolished. Would this in any way affect the decision of the privy council of March, 1927, relating to the delimitation of the Newfoundland-Labrador boundary?

Mr. Garson: The answer to the hon. member's question is no; but if that reply were left upon the record by itself it might not answer the question as fully as it should be answered. For that reason I think perhaps it is desirable to make a statement upon the rather important point the hon. member has raised.

In the application of the rule of stare decisis it is what lawyers call the ratio decidendi, or the principle of the case, which binds. By the application of the principle of the case to the facts of the case the issue of the case is decided. When the issue has been decided it becomes what lawyers call res judicata, or an adjudicated matter, and as such it is forever binding upon the parties to the case. It cannot subsequently be opened up, even though the principle upon which the res judicata or adjudicated matter was decided may be distinguished or overruled by a subsequent judgment of the same court in another case.

Therefore when the privy council rendered its judgment in the Quebec-Labrador boundary dispute it fixed the boundary, as far as it is possible legally to do so, between Labrador and Quebec, and thereupon that matter became res judicata, so the parties to that controversy are forever bound by the terms of this judgment. But in any case the boundary between Labrador and Quebec has been fixed by the terms of union between the province of Newfoundland and Canada. Not only do the terms of union state that the province of Newfoundland shall comprise the same territory as at the date of union; they go on to expressly adopt the privy council judgment. Moreover, provincial boundaries generally are protected by the British North America Act, 1871, which requires the consent of the legislature of a province before the boundaries of that province may be altered in any way.

I understand the boundary line has not yet been marked out or surveyed, and I believe that was one of the points raised by the hon. member for St. John's East in his remarks the other day. In this respect, however, I would say the Newfoundland boundary does not differ from the boundaries of some other provinces. The process of marking out provincial boundaries in Canada has been continuing ever since the provinces were formed, and conceivably some unsurveyed boundaries still remain, including this one now under discussion. Obviously the legal limits must be established before the actual boundary line can be marked out on the ground; and in the course of marking a boundary line it is conceivable that there may be differences of opinion as between surveyors or engineers as to how the actual line on the ground should be drawn. Should any such disputes arise they can be settled by the courts; and in deciding any particular dispute the courts of course would be bound by the privy council decision and the terms of union. In delivering the judgment of the privy council in this boundary dispute case Lord Cave, in 137 Law Times Reports, 187, at page 200, said:

> . . . the boundary between Canada and Newfoundland in the Labrador peninsula is a line drawn due north from the eastern boundary of the bay or harbour of Ance Sablon as far as the fifty-second degree of north latitude, and from thence westward along that parallel until it reaches the Romaine river, and thence northward along the left or east bank of the river and its headwaters to their source and from thence due north to the crest of the watershed or height of land there, and from thence westward and northward along the crest of the watershed of the rivers flowing into the Atlantic ocean until it reaches Cape Chidley; . . .

Mr. Fulton: The remarks of the minister have been of great interest to the committee and particularly, of course, to the members from the new province of Newfoundland and perhaps also those from Quebec. It would seem rather conspicuous that the minister did not deal at great length with this question of the principle of stare decisis in general terms. The matter was discussed during the debate on second reading, and I do not want to go over the ground covered at that time, but there are certain points which I think should be emphasized, and we feel the matter is so important that it should be incorporated in the bill by way of amendment to this section.

What the minister has just said with regard to res judicata is of course the general principle which is understood by lawyers, though perhaps not so well understood by those who do not belong to the legal profession. The simple principle, which is of great moment to every Canadian, is that the law as settled by previous decisions should be the law which applies and which is binding in future. That is a principle which, during the discussion on second reading, the Prime Minister said is acceptable. The first point I make, then, is that since that is acceptable there should be no objection to having such a principle incorporated in the bill, in order to place the matter beyond question.

I think it important that this should be done because of the statement by the chief justice to which reference was made during the debate on second reading, a statement which certainly gives rise to well-founded misgivings in the minds of those concerned with the preservation of this principle. That statement, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of June 2, certainly would seem to bring into question whether the supreme court would regard itself as bound by the previous decisions of the privy council in so far as they relate to Canada, after it is made the court of final jurisdiction for Canada.

So in the first place I say it is desirable to have that principle recognized. It is important, because of the statement to which I have made reference, that the principle should be incorporated in the bill. Furthermore there is no lack of precedent for such a step. In my own province of British Columbia we have it in our Laws Declaratory Act. Some may object that if the principle is recognized and applied by the courts there is no need to go the length of incorporating it in the statute. My answer in part is what I have already stated, but in addition there is precedent for that being done in the statutes of most of the provinces of Canada.

Mr. Garson: Is not what my hon. friend is referring to in the case of British Columbia, and Manitoba as well, the setting up as of a certain point of time—July 15, 1870, in the case of Manitoba—of a whole body of law to apply to a new province coming into being? Now that, I suggest to him, is a very different thing from putting a provision in the Supreme Court Act directing the supreme court to apply the rule of stare decisis.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think so, Mr. Chairman; it seems to me the provisions are the same. Up until that time the province of Manitoba, to take the case referred to by the minister, had been a part of Canada and had, therefore, presumably been under the laws of Canada. But not only were we creating a new province, we were setting up courts to administer justice within this province. It was then thought important to lay down the theory that the courts would be bound by the law as it existed at a certain date. I submit the parallel is very close. We are not setting up a new court, but we are investing the Supreme Court of Canada with final jurisdiction in all cases arising within Canada. I submit that, by the same line of reasoning as was followed in the earlier cases, we should provide that the court will be bound by the law as it was declared to be in the judgments of the privy council which, until now, has been the final court to which these questions were referred.

I should like to read the provision of the Laws Declaratory Act of the province of British Columbia. It does not say the law of British Columbia, a new province, shall be the law as it existed on a certain date, but it says the new courts which were being set up would be bound by the law.

Subsection 6 of section 2 of the Laws Declaratory Act of the province of British Columbia, found in the Revised Statutes of British Columbia, (1948), volume 2, reads as follows:

> Subject to the aforesaid provisions for giving effect to equitable rights and other matters of equity in manner aforesaid, and to the other express provisions of this Act, the court and every judge thereof shall recognize and give effect to all legal claims and demands and all estates, titles, rights, duties, obligations, and liabilities existing by the common law or by any custom, or created by any statute, in the same manner as the same would have been recognized and given effect to in the court if this Act had not passed.

It will be seen that the court itself was to be bound by the law as it existed at the time this act was passed.

Mr. Garson: That was on the occasion of the setting up of a new province.

Mr. Fulton: The law was declared to be the law as of April 29, 1879. What we are doing here is investing the Supreme Court of Canada with final jurisdiction. It cannot be denied, therefore, that we are altering either the jurisdiction or the competence of that court. In the absence of an express statutory provision to the contrary, it would be open to the court to say, "We are now the court of final jurisdiction for Canada." Perhaps it would not be said directly but indirectly—the chief justice has said it directly—"We feel that the decisions of the privy council are the decisions of a court four thousand miles away. We have a different set of circumstances." There is nothing in the remarks of the chief justice to indicate that he was referring only to decisions in cases that did not arise in Canada. His remarks have equal application to privy council decisions in cases coming from Canada as well.

That remark, which was made in the course of a case before the court, certainly indicated that the court would feel itself free to branch out into entirely fresh law. Since we believe it is so important that the people of Canada should know the state of the law, in the interests of uniformity of decisions in the future as in the past, we feel some provision must be incorporated into the act to the effect that the court is bound by the law as it was stated to be in the previous decisions of the privy council. I want to observe that such a provision in no sense puts a court in a strait-jacket. It certainly has not put our courts in the west in a strait-jacket because there was a provision stating the law would be the same as it was prior to April 1, 1879.

As the minister has said, cases can be and probably will be distinguished. Where the facts are clearly distinguishable, then decisions will vary. I believe it is important to the people of this country and particularly the provinces of this country whose rights, not only as against the dominion, but as against each other have, in the past, depended upon and been settled by the decisions of the privy council, that those provinces should know that the principles which guided the privy council in coming to its decision shall continue to bind what is now to be the court of final jurisdiction in Canada.

This is not a dry legal question. It is a question that affects the welfare and interest of every private citizen as well as of our different governments, provincial and federal. The Prime Minister having accepted the principle, I submit that the wording of the amendment I am now about to move gives no more than formal recognition of that principle and carries it into the wording of this statute. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Fleming, that section 3 of Bill 2 be amended by inserting immediately after line 17 on page 4, the following, to be numbered as subsection 4 of section 54 of the act:

> Subject to any enactment of the parliament of Canada or the legislature of any province in exercise of their respective powers, the Supreme Court of Canada shall be bound by the law as declared in all orders of His Majesty in council hitherto made on the advice of the judicial committee of his privy council and in the reasons assigned therefor by the said judicial committee, in so far as the said law is applicable to Canada.

If I may continue for a few moments, Mr. Chairman, the committee will observe, and I direct the minister's attention to this particularly, there is no attempt being made to impose upon the court or upon this dominion a static set of laws. If at any time it may properly be felt that a law as it was declared to be in a particular decision is restrictive or hampering, it is quite open, as it obviously must be, for this parliament, or the legislature of a province acting within its proper sphere of legislative power, to enact a statute amending the law and bringing it more into line with what is felt to be the need under those circumstances.

In considering the detail of this amendment, the second point to be observed is that it is only the law as declared in those decisions of the privy council made heretofore which have a bearing upon the law as it is applicable in Canada which, by this amendment, we are seeking to declare binding on the Supreme Court of Canada in its future deliberations. I think it will be seen that we have safeguarded here against the possibility that those whose rights, duties and obligations have been settled in the past by the law as declared by the decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council will suddenly find those rights, duties and obligations, whether they be of private citizens or of provincial governments or of the federal parliament, changed overnight. I have sought to safeguard against that and at the same time to take care not to impose upon the court or the parliament of Canada or the legislature of any province a legal strait-jacket by making it perfectly clear that parliament or a legislature can, should it so desire, enact legislation changing the law as it was declared to be in the previous decision.

Mr. Pouliot: What the hon. member for Kamloops has said reminds me of Swift the author of "Gulliver's Travels". Once Gulliver went to Lilliput. He was tired. It was a long journey. He lay down to sleep, and then all the dwarfs came with twine and tied Gulliver to the soil. He could not move. What does my hon. friend think of the independence of the supreme court? Where does he put it? How can we think of a court of any kind that will be tied up with the past? It would be impossible for judges to make their own decisions about matters which will come before them.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask my hon. friend whether he is in accord with the principle of precedents?

Mr. Pouliot: I will tell my hon. friend to be quiet and to listen to what I have to tell him. I listened in silence to what he was saying, and I want to have some clarification of his idea, which I have not received so far. He was very obscure in his language. I understood from what he said that he expressed the view that the supreme court will be tied by all the long line of precedents of the privy council. All the bad judgments of the privy council will be imposed forever on the supreme court. Is he serious? He cannot be serious. A lawyer of his experience and standing talking such nonsense in the House of Commons is something unbelievable. I never thought that my hon. friend, who is well gifted, who is one of the best debaters of his party, the ranks of which were decimated on June 27, but who is nevertheless a legal light—that time the light was out—would use such an argument. It is unfortunate, but I cannot conceive of any court which is the final tribunal of this land being subject to all the precedents of the past, all the bad as well as all the good judgments rendered by the privy council. My hon. friend will admit that the privy council has rendered sometimes good and sometimes bad judgments. Where will be the line of demarcation between good and bad judgments?

Mr. LaCroix: For instance, the Labrador decision.

Mr. Pouliot: How can he put it on the statute books? I leave this matter aside for the time being. I do not discuss the Labrador case at all. I discuss the whole thing as a matter of principle. If it is enunciated and put on the statute books as a matter of principle that the supreme court will be tied up in the future by the precedents of the privy council, I say to the hon. member for Kamloops that it is sheer nonsense.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member does not agree with the barristers' society of Canada.

Mr. Pouliot: I do not agree with the law society of upper Canada or of lower Canada or of the maritimes or with the Canadian Bar Association, and I shall tell the committee why. On one occasion I was with one of my friends from the Quebec bar. At the present time he is a cabinet minister in the Quebec government. He is a criminal lawyer of note. I refer to Mr. Rivard. I was sent by the general council of the Quebec bar to what was called a conference on the uniformity of laws, or something like that, held in Niagara Falls. We met there together, and we met all the somnolent deputy attorneys general of Canada. They were pleasant gentlemen of a certain age who could go to sleep very easily. We had a round-table discussion, and it was precisely a week before the convention of the Canadian Bar Association. The attorney general of British Columbia was there. He was a friend of my hon. friend. I will not mention his name because he is dead now. He was a prominent Tory and a great legal light of British Columbia. There were others there. We discussed several matters that were to be submitted to the provinces. They called it draft legislation, and they submitted it every year. It was a pretext for meeting a week ahead of the Canadian Bar Association's meeting. They were all there. Their expenses were paid by the provinces. It was quite happy and glorious inasmuch as one could be happy and glorious in his sleep. They were redrafting certain laws by changing a comma into a semicolon, and other important things. It was done in great solemnity. It was a tremendous job, and finally one of the legal luminaries from British Columbia, and some others from other provinces, decided that there should be a new section placed in the Criminal Code. My friend, Mr. Rivard, was on that committee. He had his code in his hand and he listened to the argument that it was in the public interest, and that there was great necessity to draft a new section of the Criminal Code. There they were. They worked hard. They were sweating. It was a very hot day. The weather was hot in Niagara Falls. Sometimes there was a word of wisdom and an odd suggestion that would come from the august lips of the deputy attorneys general. They were arguing, they were discussing and they were submitting new reasons for new sections. They were changing a word, adding another word, changing a comma into a semicolon and a semicolon into a comma, or putting a period in the middle of a sentence, and it was very well done. Finally, Mr. Rivard came with his Criminal Code and with the amendments, and he said to the illustrious lawyers: "Is not that article already in the Criminal Code?" That was prior to the meeting of the bar association.

I can tell my hon. friend the reason why the Canadian Bar Association has insisted so much on the maintenance of appeals to the privy council. It is because those who go to the privy council are the heads of the organization. That is the whole story. I do not believe in it. I do not believe in the privy council at all. I have read their judgments pretty carefully, and I am ready to take a chance on the supreme court. I hope that the amendments suggested by my hon. friend will be turned down at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member for Temiscouata has just finished pronouncing the judgment of extinction on one legal light of this house, as he describes him. I am afraid at the same time he cut a very wide swath because he nearly pronounced judgment of extinction on one other very distinguished legal light in this chamber who sits on the other side. I refer to the Prime Minister. If my hon. friend will refer to Hansard for September 23, at page 197, the second column, he will find the Prime Minister has expressed himself as being fully in support of the application to the Supreme Court of Canada of the principle of stare decisis. He made specific reference to that particular branch of the resolution passed by the Canadian Bar Association at its meeting last summer, as follows:

(g) that the rule—

And the Prime Minister is quoting it at this point—

—of stare decisis ought to continue to be applied with respect to past decisions of the court—

That is, the supreme court—

—as well as—

And I ask my hon. friend and other hon. members to note this well—

—with respect to past decisions of the judicial committee.

That is the resolution passed by the Canadian Bar Association. The Prime Minister's comment immediately upon it is—

That is something with which I entirely agree.

We have now the opportunity with respect to this principle of making a choice between the view expressed by the hon. member for Temiscouata and that expressed by the Prime Minister. For my part, I begin with an acceptance of the principle laid down by the Prime Minister which, if I may speak with respect, I conceive to be perfectly sound. That is to say, if we are going to have an orderly system of jurisprudence, if litigants, whether they be provinces or individuals, are to know what the law is, and that the law as declared by the courts is to be binding until overruled by parliament or by a legislature, this principle of stare decisis must have recognition.

The Prime Minister has said that he shares the view expressed by the bar association, that the principle of stare decisis applies to decisions of the privy council up to this date.

I should like to direct my observations for a moment, if I may, to those members of the house who are not lawyers, because there is always a very great danger in discussion of a measure of this kind that many members, especially when they hear a few Latin expressions hurled around, such as stare decisis and ratio decidendi, will say, "Oh well, this is all a fog; what does it all mean?". I should like briefly to deal with the meaning of stare decisis.

When we are talking about the principle of stare decisis we are simply talking about the recognition of precedent—that is to say, past decisions in matters germane to the subject under discussion before the court. For instance, where the privy council at any time past has made a decision, we will say on an appeal from a provincial court—let us say the Supreme Court of Ontario—or it may be from the Supreme Court of Canada, the decision of the privy council on that matter is the law. It is the law until that law is changed by the competent legislature which, in some cases, might be the parliament of Canada and in other cases might be the legislature of a province concerned. Until the competent legislature or parliament intervenes to say that the law shall be otherwise than as declared in the highest court, that law as declared in the highest court is final. The courts must follow that decision. It is precedent; it is binding. That decision must be followed whenever it is applicable.

That is to say, so long as the principle involved in the case is the same principle that is at issue in the case at bar, and so long as the facts in the case at bar bring it within the scope of the decision or, as we say, within the four corners of the decision in that highest court, it is accepted as a precedent.

Mr. Lesage: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he tell me if he contends that this principle of stare decisis applies to the civil law in Quebec?

Mr. Fleming: It is quite obvious that a decision of the privy council on a common law question has no application to civil law in Quebec.

Mr. Lesage: No, on a civil law question.

Mr. Fleming: Because you are under a quite different system of law.

Mr. Lesage: Does the hon. member contend that a decision of the privy council respecting the civil code of Quebec is binding?

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend knows perfectly well that, if a question came before the Supreme Court of Canada respecting the interpretation of the civil law of Quebec, and an appeal were taken from there to the privy council, the decision of the privy council would be binding, yes. The decision of the privy council would be binding.

Mr. Lesage: But what about other cases?

Mr. Fleming: It would be binding in courts which are applying the civil law in the same circumstances.

Mr. Lesage: No.

Mr. Fleming: That is the principle of stare decisis, and that is the law.

Mr. Lesage: It is not the law in Quebec.

Mr. Fleming: I would point out that that is the principle upon which the courts proceed, and that principle has not been challenged—the principle of stare decisis, the principle of the binding effect of a precedent. That is the situation with which we are faced today.

When this bill becomes a statute we are saying, in effect, that the privy council is no longer the court of final appeal. The Supreme Court of Canada, which hitherto has not been the court of final appeal, then becomes such court of final appeal.

The next question is this: Is the Supreme Court of Canada hereafter to be bound by decisions of the privy council—not decisions in the future, because they are not involved here at all; not decisions made from this point forward. Is it to be bound by decisions of the privy council to date, decisions of the privy council which to date are the law of this land?

Nothing is being done to change the law. I dare say—and I am not making a bold guess at this—that if one were to consult the jurists of this country he would find that very few of them would say that even in the face of the adoption of the present bill the principle of stare decisis would not continue to be binding, that the decisions of the privy council to date would not continue to be binding upon the Supreme Court of Canada, even if this enactment comes into effect.

But this parliament cannot leave that subject in the realm of conjecture or uncertainty, because we have no less a pronouncement than that of the Chief Justice of Canada himself on that subject.

Mr. St. Laurent: Would the hon. member allow me to interrupt? I do not think I should permit that to go unchallenged. I have discussed with the chief justice the report appearing in Hansard and the facts are that this had to do with a recent decision in England dealing with a matter of seditious libel. It was being argued that that decision was binding upon the Supreme Court of Canada. His opinion was that it was not, because for many years now the Supreme Court of Canada has been the final court in criminal matters in this country. The question which arose then was merely whether the Supreme Court of Canada was to be bound, since it has become the final court in criminal matters, by decisions made elsewhere, by courts in another country, on similar criminal matters.

What he stated—and he does not admit that the newspaper report as cited at page 286 correctly reported what took place there—was that it was merely a reassertion of the opinion he had expressed four years ago, and which is reported in the Supreme Court Reports for 1945 in re Storgoff where, at page 538, he states:

> In addition to that, the Supreme Court of Canada is now the court of last resort in criminal matters; and although, of course, former decisions of the privy council, or decisions of the House of Lords, in criminal causes or matters, are entitled to the greatest weight, it can no longer be said, as was affirmed by Viscount Dunedin, delivering the judgment of their lordships in Robins v. National Trust Company Limited (4) at page 519, that the House of Lords, being the supreme tribunal to settle English law, the Colonial Court, which is bound by English law, is bound to follow it.

It was merely distinguishing between the effect on a court of last resort of a decision made by another court of last resort and saying that decisions made elsewhere by another court of last resort were entitled to the greatest weight as authorities but had no legally binding effect upon another court of last resort. I think it is only fair to the chief justice that the impression should not go abroad that he is in any way quarreling with the proper application of the doctrine of stare decisis.

Mr. Fleming: I thank the Prime Minister for making the statement he has and giving us the assurance he has in connection with the interpretation placed by certain newspapers upon the views expressed by the chief justice. Those newspaper reports have had a disturbing effect upon the minds of many people including members of this House. One can understand the views of the chief justice in connection with a case such as that explained by the Prime Minister. It is now quite clear and understandable and I again thank the Prime Minister for making the statement at this particular time.

Leaving aside the statement by the chief justice to which we have been referring, and seeing that we seem to be in agreement as to the desirability of the continued recognition of the principle of stare decisis by the Supreme Court of Canada after this bill is in effect with regard to decisions hitherto made by the privy council in so far as they are applicable to Canada, the only question that could remain is whether such an enactment is necessary.

Mr. St. Laurent: Or advisable.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to deal with the first point with respect to the necessity of such a measure. If the Supreme Court of Canada is certain to recognize the decisions of the privy council which have been made up to the time this bill goes into effect, then presumably this amendment would not be necessary. But I am arguing that it is highly desirable that this amendment be inserted in the bill. Hon. members will recall the view taken by the Canadian Bar Association. After all, in matters of law, and this is a technical legal question, the views of the jurists of the country as represented in the Canadian Bar Association—and the association embraces not only practising lawyers but judges who participate freely in the discussions on legal questions—should receive consideration. That association has indicated in a resolution that this is a safeguard that ought to be written into the measure.

Mr. St. Laurent: If the hon. member will read the resolution I think he will find that it does not go that far. The resolution is merely to the effect that the rule of stare decisis ought to continue to be applied with respect to past decisions of the court. There was no expression of opinion as to what should be done to have it continued to be applied; there was merely a statement that it ought to continue to be applied. I think on that point at least the hon. member and I are in full agreement. I think if he reads the resolution he will not find any expression of desire that that be written into the law.

Mr. Fleming: I think the Prime Minister and I are on common ground to this extent. I did not intend to convey the impression that the bar association had said that they wanted an amendment in precise terms. What the bar association did say, and I think it is set out in plain terms, is that if parliament is going to proceed to abolish appeals to the privy council, then it should be done on certain terms, and one of those terms should be that the rule of stare decisis ought to continue to be applied with respect to past decisions of the judicial committee as well as with respect to past decisions of the court.

If we could be assured in advance that the supreme court will recognize the principle of stare decisis with respect to decisions of the privy council, then there would have been no need for the bar association to pass such a resolution. That would have been unnecessary because it would follow in any event. But what the bar association has said is that, if appeals to the privy council are going to be abolished, then—this is the plain meaning of the resolution—there should be assurance of the continuance of the rule of stare decisis.

How can you assure that continuance? I think it would be humiliating to the Supreme Court of Canada if parliament were to ask the court for an assurance of this kind in advance. Therefore, the body that is being called upon to abolish appeals to the privy council, the body to which the citizens of this country as well as the bar association under the clear terms of its resolution look for an assurance of guarantee of recognition by the Supreme Court of Canada of this principle of stare decisis, should provide for that continuance. If we wish to achieve now a guarantee of that continuance of the application of the principle of stare decisis, the only way to do it is by an amendment of this kind.

One who ought to have some knowledge of the intentions of the bar association with respect to this resolution has said something on this subject since the debate on the second reading of this bill commenced. I read from a Canadian Press dispatch from Saint John, dated September 28, reporting an interview with Mr. A. N. Carter, president of the Canadian Bar Association. This reads as follows:

A. N. Carter, president of the Canadian Bar Association said tonight in a statement that proposed federal legislation to make the Supreme Court of Canada the last court of appeal should contain a clause forbidding the court from reversing previous decisions.

"The rule of stare decisis ought to be continued to be applied with respect to past decisions of the court as well as with respect to past decisions of the privy council," the statement said.

The Canadian Bar Association, at its annual convention last month, suggested the bill, now passed second reading in the House of Commons, be delayed.

Though it is the practice for the Supreme Court to abide by the rule of stare decisis, Mr. Carter said, "it is not bound inflexibly to do so."

Such an enactment by parliament would safeguard provincial and minority rights, he said.

I submit that that statement is entitled to great respect. It is an authoritative interpretation by the president of the Canadian Bar Association of the intentions of that association as recorded in a resolution passed at its annual meeting less than two months ago. I want to ask hon. members, whether they be learned in the law or whether they follow other callings in life, to consider what could happen if the principle of stare decisis were not recognized in the future by the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to decisions hitherto made by the privy council. It is a matter of history that in the early days of the Supreme Court of Canada the trend of the decisions of that court in constitutional cases was in favour of the powers of this parliament. I do not say that that was improper, but the view taken by the court at that time had the effect of increasing the powers of parliament and of the dominion government in connection with matters which were in conflict as between the dominion and the provinces. In many instances those early decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada were reversed by the privy council. The emphasis placed by the privy council, as every student of constitutional law and constitutional history knows, was in the other direction.

The privy council decisions in the latter part of the nineteenth century and in the twentieth century were in favour of the enlargement of the powers of the provinces as those powers were debated in the courts. Had there been in those years no privy council to which appeals could be taken from the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada, had the decisions of the Supreme of Canada been the final and binding interpretation of our constitution, we would have had a very different kind of constitution today from that under which we live, as interpreted by the courts including the privy council. We would have had a constitution, as a result of that interpretation, with great emphasis upon the powers of the central government and the powers of this central legislature, this parliament. You would have had a very great diminution in the powers of the provinces, their legislatures and their governments, compared with the powers they enjoy today as the result of these binding interpretations of the constitution.

In approaching the question of stare decisis, I ask hon. members not to regard it as something in the nature of the dry bones of the law. It is far from it. When you deal with the interpretation of the constitution of the country you are dealing with something that is of the absolute essence of our national existence. There are changes that should be made in the constitution of the country, and I shall be happy to discuss them at the proper time.

Mr. Hellyer: Do you think that the judicial committee of the privy council has, from the time of the passing of the British North America Act in its original form, followed the principle which you are now citing?

Mr. Fleming: They have professed to follow it. There are some nice questions that the constitutional lawyers like to discuss as to whether the principle has really been honoured, but nevertheless the privy council has professed to follow its own decisions. It is true that in some of the decisions in later years they have had considerable difficulty in distinguishing some of the earlier ones, but nevertheless there has been a recognition of the principle.

There are changes that ought to be made in the constitution, but the way to make them is not to throw overboard the principle of stare decisis. That would be something that would cut to the whole root of our constitution as we understand it in Canada today. If we are going to tackle that subject I submit we ought to find another way.

The Prime Minister may urge—and I take it in the light of his last remarks it is his view—that it is not necessary to insert an amendment in the bill that the Supreme Court of Canada shall follow the decisions previously made by the privy council. I hope it will until they are changed properly either by parliament or by the legislatures, whichever may have the required competence. This amendment of course does not attempt in any respect to invade the rights of the provinces or the legislatures, but let us be sure of this thing. This matter is too important to the whole national fabric of Canada to be left to any doubtful dispute. Why should we leave it to dispute? We are sitting today as the sovereign parliament of Canada. We are proposing that hereafter there should be no appeals of any kind from the Supreme Court of Canada to the privy council. We are proposing that the Supreme Court of Canada shall be the court of exclusive and final jurisdiction in all causes arising within Canada. It is the simplest thing in the world for a parliament that says that to go forward and do the thing that ought to be done to assure that there will not be any change in the established interpretation of the constitution unless it is carried out in the proper way by parliament and the provinces.

I think the amendment puts it as simply as it can be put, that the decisions of the privy council, which are binding today upon the courts of Canada under the principle of stare decisis, shall continue to be binding after the Supreme Court of Canada becomes the court of final and exclusive jurisdiction, saving always the right of change by parliament in matters within the jurisdiction of parliament, and saving the right of change by the legislatures of the provinces in matters falling within their jurisdiction.

For that reason I submit that the amendment is necessary, that there cannot be any objection to it by any member of the house who shares the view expressed by the Prime Minister as I read it from page 197 of Hansard, and that in doing this we are taking a step that is vitally necessary to safeguard especially the rights of the provinces.

Mr. Garson: First of all, I want to express my thanks and appreciation to the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Eglinton for the illumination which they have shed upon this subject. I think that the former in the language of his amendment has indicated clearly, for reasons that I shall state later, that we would be attempting to do something that is beyond our constitutional powers.

The hon. member for Eglinton has very properly expressed some concern as to the position of the lay members of the house in connection with this rather technical legal discussion. I think it would not be amiss if I were to attempt to review those points upon which the Prime Minister and the two hon. members to whom I have just referred, and myself seem to be in agreement. The first is that a decision of the privy council on a Canadian appeal is a conclusive interpretation or statement of the law. When it is delivered it becomes an integral part of the law of Canada, and it must remain an integral part of the law of Canada until the proper legislature changes it, or until it is reversed by the privy council itself. I am sure the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Eglinton will agree with that proposition.

Mr. Fleming: Entirely.

Mr. Garson: The question is whether we in this house have enough confidence in the Supreme Court of Canada as a court of last resort that we think it competent and willing to apply the privy council decisions as an integral part of the law of Canada. I say that if we have not that degree of confidence in the Supreme Court of Canada then not only should we not make it the court of last resort for Canada, but I think there is a grave question whether we should continue it at all as an institution of the country. If or when we get to the stage in Canada, in a provincial court for that matter, and certainly in our court of last resort, that we as a legislative body have to sit here and as a part of the legislative function of government direct the judicial branch of the government as to how it should exercise its judgment, then we should have reached a very low state of judicial competence, and a very low state of the legal profession in this country.

That is the simple issue. My hon. friends in this, as in previous statements which they have made concerning this bill, indicate that they are afraid that Canadians should attempt to exercise the ultimate judicial functions in our country, and are showing in this amendment another example of that apparently utter lack of confidence which they have in the idea of our abolishing appeals to the privy council and of attempting to decide our own legal cases for ourselves.

Well, sir, we of the government do not share that lack of confidence. We are satisfied that the rule of stare decisis, which as the hon. member for Eglinton has said is part of the settled law of this country, will be properly applied by the Supreme Court of Canada. In that connection I think it would be relevant for me to point out that the rule of stare decisis has long governed the Supreme Court of Canada. If the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Kamloops are in doubt on that point, I would refer them to the judgment of Mr. Justice Duff, as he then was, and Mr. Justice Anglin in the case of Stuart v. Bank of Montreal, 41 Supreme Court Reports at 516, where in the most explicit terms they say they are bound by this rule.

The only interpretation we can place upon this amendment is that it expresses lack of confidence. The amendment reads:

> Subject to any enactment of the parliament of Canada or the legislature of any province in the exercise of their respective powers, the Supreme Court of Canada shall be bound by the law as declared—and so on. If the law as set out in the decisions of the privy council, which we are going to enact that the supreme court should follow, by the express terms of my hon. friend's amendment, is law which it would be necessary for the legislature of a province to enact or amend, then by the express terms of this amendment he is asking us to invade provincial jurisdiction; and, if we were so unwise as to attempt to do that, it would be clearly beyond the powers of this parliament.

Mr. Graydon: Are you not rather mixed up there?

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Garson: No, I am not at all mixed up. My hon. friend's amendment reads:

> Subject to any enactment of the parliament of Canada or the legislature of any province in exercise of their respective powers, the Supreme Court of Canada shall be bound by the law as declared in all orders of his majesty in council hitherto made on the advice of the judicial committee of the privy council—

In other words, he is asking this parliament to direct the Supreme Court of Canada to follow those decisions of the privy council which deal not only with matters coming under the jurisdiction of parliament itself but with matters which come under provincial jurisdiction. We in this house can legislate in connection with the procedure or organization of the supreme court. We have that power under section 101 of the British North America Act. When we undertake to say by way of statutory enactment, however, that decisions of the privy council dealing with matters which come within provincial jurisdiction shall be followed by the court, I think we are clearly invading the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures and doing something beyond our power. In the view of the government this matter of applying the rule of stare decisis is a judicial rather than a legislative function; and when we interfere legislatively with a judicial function we can only make for confusion in a matter which, if left as it stands, is perfectly clear.

I am sure the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Kamloops are in complete agreement that the rule of stare decisis is part of the settled law of Canada; they have said so within the last few minutes. The whole issue is whether we think we can trust this body of men whom we are proposing to clothe with the very great responsibility of being the court of last resort for Canada with the simple, plain and clear task of applying the settled law of this country to the cases that may come before them. If we are not prepared to entrust them with that task we should not consider making them the court of last resort in this country. If we adopted this amendment we would be saying in effect that we have so little confidence in the ability and willingness of the court to do what is its sworn duty that if we did not direct it to do its duty we do not think that it would be done.

My principal objection to this amendment is that in the manner I have indicated it clearly invades the field of provincial jurisdiction. Under section 101 of the British North America Act this parliament is empowered to set up the Supreme Court of Canada and do all those things and enact all those laws and provisions ancillary thereto. When we come to direct that court to follow privy council decisions which deal with provincial matters, however, that direction in its pith and substance is an enactment of substantive law and not an enactment of procedural law, which under section 101 we have authority to pass. In the course of giving a general direction as to the whole body of privy council law it is inconceivable that we would not deal with matters coming under property and civil rights, for example, and such a provision would be a clear invasion of the provincial field of legislation.

Then it would be open to the other objection. When we direct the supreme court to say that a given statute of the dominion is valid because it has been declared valid by the privy council, in my opinion there is grave doubt as to whether we are not attempting to accomplish a statutory interpretation of the British North America Act itself. If we have power to direct the Supreme Court of Canada to consider itself bound by a privy council decision which says that a certain act of parliament is valid, then equally we must have power to direct the supreme court that it shall not follow the privy council decision, and shall hold the act in question invalid. Were we to do so, the effect of our enactment would be to amend the British North America Act itself. It would amount to a constitutional amendment taking the form of a direction to the Supreme Court of Canada to follow or not to follow privy council decisions.

In drafting the bill we have endeavoured to avoid any invasion or prejudice of the provincial field of jurisdiction. Thus, so far as the government and Department of Justice are concerned, there is no intention of recommending to the members of this house that they should risk invading provincial jurisdiction by directing the Supreme Court of Canada as to what decisions of the privy council it must or must not follow or that the supreme court should apply the rule of stare decisis. The government has such confidence in our supreme court and in the citizens and public men of Canada that we are willing to rely on the court to apply, in a proper judicial manner, to the cases which come before it, the rule of stare decisis or any other part of the settled law of Canada. We are willing to rely upon the public men of Canada not to interfere with the judicial functions of the court just as the government, in submitting this bill in its present form to the members, is not interfering with the judicial functions of the supreme court. If this amendment is refused, we will continue not to interfere with the functions of the supreme court. But, if the amendment is accepted, then we will certainly be interfering with the functions of the supreme court. If I mistake not, that is the very thing which my hon. friends said would be one of the worst offences of which the government could be guilty in connection with making the supreme court the court of last resort in this country.

There have been certain implications that, in time of trouble and bitterness or political excitement in this country, it is a fine thing to be able to take constitutional cases to the privy council. The plain implication of that is that it is not advisable, under such circumstances, to go to our own court. I should like to put on the record—

Mr. Fleming: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, we are in the committee of the whole and I take it it is not proper for the minister to reopen the debate that was closed on second reading of the bill. Those who have spoken in this debate in the committee this afternoon have said nothing of the matters to which the minister is now referring. He is setting up a straw man and will proceed to knock him down. There can be no return to or reopening of the debate on second reading; that is closed. My hon. friend the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) and I have scrupulously refrained from saying anything on the principle of the bill. The principle was adopted on second reading. Are we going back and thresh over that old straw? The minister is clearly out of order.

Mr. Garson: My friend is so proud of the stand he took on second reading of the bill, he is not anxious to repeat it.

Mr. Fleming: On a question of privilege, the minister has no right whatever to make any such statement, because this is the first time I have spoken on this bill at any stage.

An hon. Member: He is speaking about the amendment.

Mr. Fleming: The minister is dealing with the principle of the bill and I ask you, Mr. Chairman, to call him to order.

Mr. Garson: Upon any strict interpretation of the rules of the house, I believe it would be in order for me to say what I have said in relation to the amendment which is now offered to the house. The amendment can have no other meaning than that the man who has moved it has not sufficient confidence in the supreme court of this country.

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, the minister has no right to make such a statement. Lack of confidence in the court is not inherent in the amendment nor is it suggested by it. It is a product of a fantastic turn of mind to suggest it could be.

Furthermore, I suggest it is an improper reflection upon the motives of the members of this house and should be withdrawn.

Mr. Garson: I said nothing whatever about my hon. friend, or about his motives. I was speaking about his amendment, and that speaks for itself.

Mr. Fulton: With respect, sir, I would ask for a ruling.

Mr. Garson: May I speak to the point of privilege my hon. friend has raised? I say, sir, that the amendment which is offered says that we must direct the supreme court to apply the rule of stare decisis, which is a part of the settled law of the land. If that does not show a lack of confidence in the supreme court on the part of the member who moved that resolution, then I do not know what would show a lack of confidence.

Such a lack of confidence is not warranted, I suggest, Mr. Chairman. I checked back as to the number of cases on constitutional points which had been decided by the Supreme Court of Canada from about 1918 to the present day. I found that there were 60. Of those cases there were two in which, in spite of this influence which living in Ottawa is said to have upon the members of the supreme court, the court was unable to do other than arrive at an equal division of the judges. Of the remaining 58 cases, in exactly one-half the dominion view of the case was upheld, and in the other 29 cases the provincial view was upheld.

I am not suggesting for a moment that any rule of thumb computation of this sort proves the impartiality of the supreme court decisions on constitutional matters. I do suggest, however, that, upon the surface at any rate, it appears as if the Supreme Court of Canada had not been guilty of any great partiality. Of the 60 decisions rendered in the last 30 years, 29 have upheld the dominion view and 29 upheld the provincial view. It is for these obvious reasons, sir, that, while agreeing with the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), that the rule of stare decisis is a part of the settled law of this country, we are prepared, nevertheless, to leave it to the court itself to exercise its judicial, not legislative, discretion and apply the settled law to the cases which come before it.

Mr. Church: I wish to refer to section 3 of this particular bill. I have not taken up much of the time of the house in connection with it. I did make a short address the other day, but I wish to refer to the differences between what was done before and what is being done now in this committee. I am objecting to the method and manner of carrying this out. This particular proposal goes much further than the private bill for which I moved the six months hoist at an earlier session. It is a much wider bill and, if you ask me, it makes a scrap of paper out of the British North America Act in two ways.

Under the British North America Act British subjects have certain rights and privileges. On the first and second readings of the bill I asked two questions. Did this government propose to make a scrap of paper out of the British North America Act? Is that Liberalism of the twentieth century? Is that the kind of Liberalism that we were promised in Quebec and Ontario during the last election? I say no, it goes much further than that. I am objecting to the method and manner of carrying it out. It can only be done as the hon. member for Temiscouata said the other day. He was objecting to the same thing, the method and manner of bringing it about.

Mr. Cannon: The hon. member is not now speaking on the amendment; he is clearly speaking on the principle of the bill.

Mr. Church: You can make your own speech later. I would like to get some order in the committee, Mr. Chairman. I am not saying anything out of the way. I would like to get some order especially from those behind the curtain. If they want to speak on the bill let them speak out.

We know that this is nothing else but a political bill. It is a political bill first, last and always, and was promised in the late election. The very same promises were made right across Canada. What were those promises?

Mr. Cannon: The hon. member admits that he is speaking on the principle of the bill.

Mr. Church: No, I am not. There are certain rights which we have always had, and we had them long before confederation. We have had them ever since we were a country, and dear knows I have been one of those who appreciate that we have the province of Quebec in this country. I paid tribute to them on many occasions. I paid tribute to them when they had fewer friends in this house than they have now. I say that the manner and method of carrying this out is altogether wrong. It will be noticed that all through the bill it says: "This is new; the amendment will abolish appeals to the privy council." Because the Minister of Justice says so it does not make it so. The provinces have a contract. The other day I quoted from the Statute of Westminster. I quoted from a textbook, Wheare on the Statute of Westminster, which is one of the greatest authorities we have on this particular statute. I said the other day that sections 6 to 13 of the Statute of Westminster did not apply to either New Zealand or Australia. They were wise to contract themselves out of it.

This particular bill is unconstitutional. In the first place, the government has no power to bring it in. It is going to make a scrap of paper out of what? Out of the British North America Act, out of the provinces and out of the right of a subject to petition his king, which he has always had. That was Liberal doctrine. It was Liberal doctrine that a subject had a right, as a matter of grace, to petition his king as to his citizenship and property. Every subject in this country, whether French or English, or wherever he comes from, has the right as a matter of grace to send a petition right up to the king on the throne.

Mr. Pouliot: He may write to the king.

Mr. Church: And he is sure to get the king's reply. Now you are going to take away that right. Is that Liberalism? Is that the Liberalism that we of the older provinces were promised at confederation? It is not a constitutional question. This bill tears up all the case law and the decisions which were reported here at some length by some hon. members of this side and the Minister of Justice. I am surprised at the Minister of Justice bringing in such a bill as this. I say that if this bill goes through I have no doubt it will be declared unconstitutional. It cannot take away the contract which was made in 1844, and long before that in this country. As this textbook on the statute says, the provinces had a contract when they came into confederation. We first got this law by the Constitutional Act of 1791. At that time so much of the law of England was copied in by two provinces of Canada as was applicable and adapted to our circumstances. That was the law. As I said the other day, the king had to have his courts. He could not do it all himself and administer justice. That is how courts of law came into being.

The other day I referred to several fine Liberal ministers of justice. They were absolutely opposed to the method and manner indicated in this bill. There is a difference between this bill and bills which have been introduced in the past. They widened the bill, if you please, to include what? To include something regarding the use of the French language. If there ever was a body that protected minorities it was the privy council. They held a pretty fine balance. I quoted the doctrine of stare decisis when I spoke in 1921 and 1922 on the matter when it was first proposed in this house. I was quoting that doctrine because some of the decisions were given by magistrates. There were 180,000 orders in council passed in this country during the war, only four of which ever got to the supreme court, this famous body to which they want to hand over the law. Only four of them ever got to the privy council. One was in regard to margarine.

This new bill seeks to use this new system of Liberalism. Sir Allen Aylesworth was one of the ablest ministers of justice the country has ever had. I quoted him the other day. He said it could not be done. He is probably one of the greatest lawyers this country ever produced. He was on the Bering sea arbitration. There was also a great lawyer from Quebec. He was solicitor general in the Laurier cabinet at the time, and I got him to kick off the football at Rosedale grounds in a game between Queen's and Osgoode Hall. He became the attorney general of Canada and minister of justice. He became chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada and lieutenant governor of Quebec. What did these men say? They were absolutely opposed to the method proposed in this bill as suggested by the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister. We want something better than that from Liberalism.

As I said the other day, and as I said twenty years ago, we want a British North America Act for the living and not for the dead. We want it brought up to date to meet changing conditions. The two debates which went on yesterday showed a need of some change for the working class of this country. Are we going to make a scrap of paper out of the British North America Act? Although the government desires the passage of this bill, I do not think it will ever get past the courts.

During the election the Prime Minister spoke in our city. He was very popular there. He got a great reception, but he should have told them about the bill of rights which he proposed to have introduced. If he had told the people of Ontario, the west and the maritimes, that he was going to wipe out with one sweep of the hand all the rights and privileges which they enjoyed when they came into confederation, things might have been different. If he had told the people of Toronto that, and also the people of the maritimes, things might have been different. As this textbook says, Ontario and Quebec came in on a contract. It was hard to get them into confederation. Their contract cannot be altered without their consent, or without an address from both houses of parliament to His Majesty. Afterwards, other provinces were joined. Is that twentieth century Liberalism as we have it today?

than in Quebec, thus showing the tremendous popularity of the monarchy at the present time. But what are we going to do? We are proposing to take away the right to petition the king if anything goes wrong with property or civil rights of the subject or citizen. That is going to be wiped out forever by this parliament, where we say, "This is new; we will abolish appeals to the privy council."

But the fact that the Minister of Justice says so, and the Prime Minister says so, does not make it so. As the hon. member for Temiscouata has said, the method and the manner are all wrong. First they have to have a petition from both houses of parliament. Every amendment to the British North America Act has been preceded by a petition. And it is addressed to whom? The petition is to the foot of the throne. That has been done when amendments have been asked to the British North America Act. It will be noticed that at the present time Saskatchewan has some appeals pending in connection with margarine.

I believe this proposal is made to sever relations altogether with the mother country; there is no doubt about it. We have motions on the order paper now to that effect. One wants to change the office of governor general, so that we may have a Canadian in that office. One newspaper in Toronto has gone so far as to announce who he is going to be. Another hon. member has a motion on the order paper to change the flag, there are motions to change the national anthem, to change the name of Dominion day, and to abolish appeals to the privy council.

As I have said, all these matters are only secondary. But there are other primary matters of vast importance which we should be considering. I could read a long list of those matters, which I placed on record the other day. This bill is founded on what? It is founded on an appeal to separatism, to autonomy. Let us not forget that a million men fought in the first war, under their own sovereignty and autonomy. They did not go over to fight for Britain, but they fought by her side—and 130,000 of them fell on the field of battle. What they did changed the whole history of the world.

What was good enough for the men who went overseas in the first war is plenty good enough for me, and it ought to be good enough for all of us who stayed at home because some of us were not able to go. They went over there to fight by Britain's side and, in so doing, they changed the the whole history of the civilized world.

When these are only secondary matters, is this the time or the place to go the distance we are asked to go today, and to wipe out all these appeals? I say no, it is not. And I can tell you this, that it seems to me we are getting farther out of the empire all the time. There are some who seem to want to make all these changes, until we have now reached a point where we have very few links left.

One of those links is that the king is still the king of Canada. He is still the king of Canada, and no one can prevent his being the king of Canada. We have the right to petition him in any matter affecting the rights of the citizens. These are known as matters of grace, and anyone may have that right—not even the privy council can take it away.

This bill deals only with matters which may be dealt with properly by the courts. It is not in any sense a bill which could be considered otherwise. In my view this is a bill of coercion, a bill to coerce some of the provinces, and it is not one which we should pass at this time. It seems to go further than any of the other bills which have come before us. The present measure has been widened out to include the matter of language. There has never been any doubt of the fact that the privy council has always been the protector of minorities—because let us remember that minorities have rights, just the same as majorities. Both groups have always had rights.

We could never have made progress as a country if minorities had not been given rights. They have the right of language and of religion. We will recall how in Louisiana Huey Long, then governor of the state, came along to support the late president of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt, in the south. He wiped out the treaty altogether, and abolished their language and religious rights—something which the privy council never would have done. It has always been the protector of the rights of minorities and of majorities.

I object to the method and the manner in which this is being done. I believe it is a political bill first, last and all the time, particularly at a time when there is a wide division between our people, and when there are more important matters to be considered.

This is not the time to bring up the matter of sovereignty or autonomy. Now is the time when we should be discussing primary matters. In the second world war almost five times as many men went overseas, under the same status we now enjoy. They did the right thing, accordingly.

This textbook I now hold in my hand, Wheare on the Statute of Westminster, sets out the rights of the provinces, and it states that they have no right to change the contract made by the four original provinces, including the maritimes. It also makes reference to what was done in New Zealand and Australia, and makes special reference to sections 6 to 13 of the Statute of Westminster.

That is the statute which caused all this trouble. Had it not been for the Statute of Westminster, which I have always looked upon as one of the most mischievous statutes we have ever known, we would never have had this bill before us. The privy council has given its decision on that statute.

We are widening the breach. We are permitting ourselves to be looked upon as being outside the empire altogether. Why does Canada want to be out of the empire, as we will be if we are going to accept this bill? If the subject is not to be allowed to petition his king, when his property and rights are in danger, what is the use of our talking about it any more? Why do we not get out of the empire altogether, and have a separate country, as some want to do on the banks of the St. Lawrence? We would have a separate flag, and anthem, and all that kind of thing. This textbook says that we have no such right, and that a contract is a contract whether it be made by an individual or by a statute. I hope the bill will not pass. It never should have been brought before the House of Commons. It seeks in a roundabout way to do what never should have been proposed; it refuses to give the right of petition to the king in matters of grace.

Mr. LaCroix: Mr. Chairman, as we are still on section 3, I have an amendment to introduce. I move that section 3 be amended by the addition at the end—

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) moves an amendment while there is already one before us—

Mr. LaCroix: We are dealing with section 3 and—

Mr. Lesage: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must say that we are now dealing with an amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton).

The Chairman: We are now considering an amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops and relating to section 3. The committee will have to dispose of it before another one can be moved.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I believe some answer should be made to some of the statements made by the Minister of Justice in discussing the amendment. The first of these was not so much an attempt to deal with the actual merits of the amendment as it was an attempt to call into question the motives behind the amendment. The minister has said that the amendment could be taken only to mean that those who support it have not confidence that the supreme court can be relied upon to apply the law as it now exists.

I think that argument is answered by reminding the minister again of the declaratory acts of the various provinces. Does the minister contend that the enactment of those statutes was an indication that the provinces had no confidence in their own courts? All that those governments were seeking to do was to say what would be the law which should be applied by those courts, and how they should apply it. They were not laying down rules of procedure but rules of substantive law defining the law as it should be applied and followed by their courts. This amendment merely seeks to do the same thing for the Supreme Court of Canada and for the people of Canada.

There cannot be found anywhere in it any suggestion that those who support it lack confidence in the supreme court or the judges who now form the supreme court or in our ability to find other judges of the highest calibre to sit on that court. I suggest that no judge now on the court or subsequently to be appointed to the court would resent in any way the fact that this parliament of Canada, the law-making body of Canada, has seen fit to discharge its duty to the people of Canada, its duty of saying what shall be the law to be applied by that court. That is all that this amendment does. The minister has in fact strained words out of all their possible meaning in an attempt to find an argument against an amendment which on the face of it is quite unobjectionable.

Then dealing with the actual content of the amendment the minister raised the point that the amendment would be unconstitutional because—here I must confess that I could not follow his argument; I found it just as strained as his other argument—we would be seeking to direct the Supreme Court of Canada to apply certain laws with respect to the provinces and in doing so we would be infringing on provincial jurisdiction. This amendment does nothing of the sort.

This amendment merely recognizes that the provinces have the right to pass legislation changing their statute law with respect to property and civil rights. This amendment merely recognizes that right. I was going to say it merely safeguards it, but it is not necessary to safeguard it. The position is that in the past the privy council heard appeals from individuals in Canada who were citizens of this or that province. Let us say that there was an appeal by a citizen from the province of British Columbia concerning the rights of that citizen as against the rights of another citizen. Those are determined by the laws of the province of British Columbia. However, those decisions of the judicial committee are now the law of this country. The province of British Columbia could change the law within its proper sphere of legislative power. The amendment reads in part:

Subject to any enactment of the parliament of Canada or the legislature of any province in exercise of their respective powers—

That is merely a recognition of the rights of the province to change the law within the province with respect to its citizens. There is no attempt to infringe on provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): If the hon. member is not afraid of the constitution of the court, and if he is not afraid of the court exercising proper jurisdiction and following precedents, what is the necessity for the amendment? What is the hon. member afraid of?

Mr. Fulton: I have not said that I am afraid of anything. I doubt if the hon. member himself will disagree with me when I say that the proper function of a legislative body is to define with as much accuracy as possible what it is trying to do and what are the laws and the rights and the duties which it seeks to create by the statute it may be passing. We are considering a statute here to give the supreme court final jurisdiction. I take it from the words of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice that there is no objection to the principal of stare decisis being followed and applied by that court, but there is a possibility, and we are dealing here with statutes, we are enacting laws—

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Why is there a possibility?

Mr. Fulton: We are enacting laws affecting all the people of Canada and it is conceivable that as a result of this law an entirely new set of decisions will be started. This does not call into question the constitution or the personnel of the court; it is simply a safeguard against that happening. It is only part of our legislative process and in the absence of further fundamental objections I am not in the least bit weakened in my support of this amendment. This is particularly so since the president of the Canadian Bar Association, which, as has been pointed out, embraces in its membership a large number of judges of Canada, has stated since this debate started that in his view, speaking as the president of the association, such an amendment should be written into the bill which is now under discussion.

Mr. Pouliot: I was struck with what my judicious friend has just said, and I wonder if he could tell us if in his capacity as member of parliament he has any judicial capacity, although he may be very judicious. This is very important. Judicial powers and legislative powers are in tight compartments and must not be confused, although they seem to be in the mind of the hon. gentleman.

I ask him again how he got any judicial authority when he was sworn in as a member of parliament, and from whom? He may be a justice of the peace and as such may be able to speak with judicial authority, but the fact that he is a member of parliament does not mean that he is a justice of the peace. I have listened to justices of the peace who were a little less dogmatic than the hon. member for Kamloops, who were quite ponderous in their thinking. My hon. friend may be a justice of the peace, he may be a judge of the commissioner's court, he may have authority to give an oath, but that is not because he is a member of parliament. His only jurisdiction as a member of parliament is legislative jurisdiction. Does the hon. member not agree with me?

Mr. Fulton: I thank my hon. friend for the lecture he has just given me.

Mr. Pouliot: It is not a lecture; I am speaking what I have in my mind.

Mr. Fulton: I quite agree.

Mr. Pouliot: I was not clear enough, unfortunately. I should like to be understood by the hon. member.

Mr. Fulton: If you think it worth it.

Mr. Pouliot: Oh, yes; otherwise I would not rise to speak in answer to him. How can we give what we do not possess? Even the Prime Minister, who has one of the clearest and brightest legal minds in the country—hon. members will agree that is not flattery—has no judicial authority although he discharges one of the most important functions in the house. The Speaker and you, Mr. Chairman, have the right to reprimand members. It is a semi-judicial authority over your colleagues; perhaps it is judicial. How could the hon. member for Kamloops, who has a logical mind, confer upon the Supreme Court of Canada a power that he does not possess as a legislator, as a lawmaker, as a member of the House of Commons?

Mr. Fulton: He is not trying to do that.

Mr. Pouliot: My hon. friend will admit that we cannot do collectively in this manner what we cannot do individually and separately. Now he seems to be more confused than ever. I have tried to come to his rescue.

Mr. Fulton: Because I have been listening to you.

Mr. Pouliot: I am trying to make it clear. I ask my hon. friend what is the section of the House of Commons Act, what is the section of the B.N.A. Act, that confers upon parliament the right to exercise judicial authority and to pass legislation that is equivalent to a direction to the Supreme Court of Canada? That is new jurisprudence. In that regard I am surprised that the president of the Canadian Bar Association has shown such gross ignorance that he has confused both. He suggests that the House of Commons should exercise judicial authority by telling the Supreme Court of Canada what to do. I have spoken perhaps jocularly, but when I make a serious argument and am not understood I have to use metaphorical language.

I have a question to ask the hon. member for Eglinton, who should be named a doctor of laws, honoris causa, by every university on the North American continent, for his lecture this afternoon to the Prime Minister and other members of the house. I had my part in it, and I am very grateful for it. There is nothing like the virtue of humility. I ask him to answer the question that was put to him by the hon. member for Davenport. The hon. member for Eglinton told us not to forget the voluminous jurisprudence of the privy council. What should we do?

Mr. Knowles: Stare decisis.

Mr. Pouliot: It may be black, it may be white; it may be grey, black and white at the same time. Accordingly the hon. member for Davenport, who is one of the new members of the house, used a pin to prick the balloon. I hope that the hon. member for Eglinton will be kind enough to give us further illumination on the contradictory jurisprudence of the privy council.

Mr. Cannon: I should like to say a few words on the amendment. We have had some extraordinary suggestions this afternoon. We have heard the hon. member for Kamloops suggest that the Supreme Court of Canada, after having been reformed by the legislation that is now being introduced, should be bound and gagged for all practical purposes. He has suggested that we should reform the Supreme Court of Canada and then say to it: You shall not be free to make your own decisions; you shall be bound by the previous decisions of the privy council, appeals to which we are abandoning.

We have heard another extraordinary suggestion made by the hon. member for Eglinton. He has suggested that we on the government side intend to throw overboard the doctrine of stare decisis. There is no suggestion that members on this side of the house want to throw overboard the doctrine of stare decisis. On the contrary, as the Prime Minister has said, we think it should continue to be applied; but it should be applied according to the law, and according to the true nature of the doctrine. I will return to that point in a minute.

The third thing, and the most extraordinary one that has happened this afternoon, is that we have been given a lesson in Liberalism by the hon. member for Broadview. I certainly did not expect to receive such a lesson from him because he has never been accused, by any stretch of the imagination, of being a Liberal.

To return to the doctrine of stare decisis, it seems to me that there is a certain misapprehension among members of the house about the true nature and scope of that doctrine. In countries that base their judicial process on the common law, the doctrine of stare decisis is very important because, as we know, the common law is a development of decisions of the courts one after the other that built up the wonderful edifice of the law that we all admire, and which is known as the common law. That law is based upon judgments of the courts and not on statutes, and it is essential that those judgments should be followed by judges applying the same law.

When it comes to statutory law, and in particular the statutory law of the province of Quebec as incorporated in the civil code, we have not the same principle at all. There decisions of the court have not the force of law. They are simply interpretations of the law as it exists in the statutes, and have the value of authority, not the value of a statute.

To revert to the argument of the Minister of Justice, that if such an amendment were passed it would infringe upon the rights and prerogatives of the provinces, let me give this example. Suppose we passed the amendment, and suppose we told the Supreme Court of Canada that they were bound by the doctrine of stare decisis in that they had to follow past decisions of the privy council. In effect we would be telling them that they could not alter anything that had been decided by the privy council even on matters concerning the civil law of the province of Quebec. In effect we would be incorporating in the civil code of Quebec decisions of the privy council which may be erroneous. What shows that they have been erroneous is that in the past they have contradicted themselves. The decisions of the privy council on the interpretation of the civil code of the province of Quebec have been far from uniform. The jurisprudence has varied.

That is a clear example, and it demonstrates the value of the argument of the Minister of Justice when he says that we cannot do this thing because if we did so we would be encroaching upon the rights of the provinces, and that in an indirect manner we would be introducing an amendment into the legislation of the provinces, and particularly into the civil code of my province.

While I am speaking on this amendment I should like to set one other matter right. Reference has been made to the decisions of the Canadian Bar Association at its meeting last month. I happened to be present at that meeting, and I was also present at the meeting of the committee when the resolution was passed. I want to emphasize here that those who drafted and adopted the resolution purposely refrained from expressing any view as to whether or not appeals to the privy council should be abolished. I have heard several hon. members opposite state that the Canadian Bar Association said it was not in favour of abolishing these appeals. The resolution, which is in Hansard where it can be read by anyone, says in express terms that the Canadian Bar Association refrains from expressing any such views.

I just wanted to re-establish that fact. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, this amendment can very easily be the subject of a difference of opinion as to whether or not it is desirable. That is something on which the opinions of hon. members are bound to divide. But whatever reasons there may be for not dealing with this amendment, they are not the reasons that have been put forward by the Minister of Justice. He has resorted to a device which was used at an earlier stage of this debate to create an impression that has no relationship to the arguments that have been put forward in support of this amendment, or to the reasons the mover gave for introducing it. The minister suggested that the only interpretation we could place upon this amendment was that it was an expression of lack of confidence in the Supreme Court of Canada. Not a word in that amendment can be so interpreted in any reasonable reading of it. The amendment may or may not be worded exactly as each legal brain would say best interpreted the desire to preserve the doctrine of stare decisis in regard to those cases that have been decided over the years; but if the words do not appropriately express that idea a better way could well be pointed out. However, I repeat that there is not a word in the amendment which justifies any suggestion of lack of confidence on the part of the mover of the amendment in the Supreme Court of Canada as a court capable of rendering judicial decisions upon such matters as may come before it.

[Mr. Cannon.]

The minister went further and said that to incorporate in the legislation itself an explicit declaration in regard to the principle of stare decisis would also, by inference, be a reflection upon the Supreme Court of Canada and an expression of our lack of confidence in that court. Let me come back to the resolution of the Canadian Bar Association. In doing so I emphasize the fact that as far as I am aware no hon. member has suggested that the opinion of the members of the Canadian Bar Association has any more validity or weight here than the expression of opinion of a group of men who, in spite of what may be said by the hon. member for Temiscouata, are mainly the senior members of a profession qualified to deal with subjects of this kind. As recently as four weeks ago, at the very time the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice were in Banff, they passed the resolution unanimously. In addition to urging that any steps of this kind should not be proceeded with until there had been some opportunity for an examination of their effect upon minority rights, the constitutional position and so on, they made certain other recommendations in regard to the judges of the supreme court which it would appear to be the intention of the government to follow, whether or not that is a result of the resolution. Moreover, in that resolution they declared that the principle and doctrine of stare decisis should be preserved.

The Prime Minister has said that he is in agreement with that idea; but with all respect to the position he occupies and to his great legal standing, his support of that idea does not become an incorporated part of any statute that may be passed by this house. What will subsequently determine the effect of any legislation that may be passed is the wording of the statute itself, not what may have been said by any hon. member of this house, the Prime Minister or anyone else, as to what he thought should be done once the bill became a statute. But it goes further than that. We have something in the nature of an interpretation of what was in the minds of the members of the bar association. Hon. members have heard read a press report of a statement by the president of the Canadian Bar Association, presumably speaking in his official capacity, who said that in his opinion there should be a declaration of the acceptance of the doctrine of stare decisis.

That being so, if it can be suggested that the desire to have adopted an amendment which will place in the act itself a declaration of that principle reflects in some way upon the confidence enjoyed by the Supreme Court of Canada, then most certainly can it be said that by their unanimous vote the members of the Canadian Bar Association were reflecting upon the Supreme Court of Canada. I do not believe for a moment that any hon. member of this house would suggest that this was the thought behind the resolution adopted by the bar association, which contained a recommendation which this amendment seeks to interpret in statutory form.

It is open to debate, of course, whether or not the wording is perfect. Different members may have different views as to whether this is the best expression of the request of the Canadian Bar Association. It is an attempt, however, and I believe a reasonable and well-worded attempt to carry forward into statutory form the desire expressed by the senior members of the Canadian bar.

In view of some suggestions that have been made that any proposal of this nature is a reflection on the Supreme Court of Canada and the ability of this country to produce lawyers of the stature necessary to meet the high standards of the judiciary, let me say most emphatically that no such suggestion has ever been contemplated in anything that has been said by any member of the party I have the honour to lead. I am as confident as any member of this House of Commons that the legal profession, despite the humorous comments that may be forthcoming from time to time about some of the members of that profession either from the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) or from others, has in all the ten provinces established a standard that gives Canadians reason for being proud of that pool of legal talent from which the judges of this country are drawn, whether for the Supreme Court of Canada, the superior courts of the provinces or the county courts and district courts within each of those provinces.

This amendment is an attempt to put into statutory form a statement consistent with the unanimous recommendation of the Canadian Bar Association that the principle of stare decisis be applied: in other words, that the background of decisions of that court, which throughout these long years has passed upon constitutional and other matters, shall still be given their full legal effect. I believe it is important, Mr. Chairman, that all of us recognize the extent to which our constitution is, in fact, a combination of the British North America Act and the legal decisions which have interpreted some of the general terms within that basic constitution of Canada.

Under sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act, there is a division of responsibility and jurisdiction between the national government and the provincial governments. Many of the expressions were in general form and many of those things which, since the date of confederation, have become an essential part of the administrative as well as the legislative powers of both dominion and provincial governments, have been the result of interpretations of that constitution by the privy council. When differences of opinion arose, this tribunal was called upon to decide where the actual responsibility and jurisdiction lay.

There are a few comparatively recent examples of such decisions. At the time the British North America Act became our basic constitution this country was in the early stages of its development. Anyone who might have told our forefathers that we would be listening to the words of people passing between each other without benefit of wires would have been laughed at. Yet, within recent years the privy council was called upon to decide whether, under the wording of the British North America Act, the control of radio rested with the national or the provincial governments. So it was in the case of the control of aviation. The question arose whether that came under the provinces as a result of the reference to property and civil rights, or whether it came under the control of the national government. The privy council made its decision and that decision has, in effect, become part of our constitution.

And so it goes in regard to many of the things that are done both by the government of Canada and by the governments of many of the provinces.

CRIMINAL CODE

PORTRAYAL OF CRIMES BY PICTURES IN MAGAZINES, ETC., TENDING TO INDUCE VIOLENCE

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops) moved the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the criminal code (portrayal of crimes).

He said: In view of the comparatively short time available on this occasion for the discussion of this bill I ask the forbearance of the house if I deal with only some of the highlights of the matter involved in the suggestion I have to make because I understand that several hon. members have something to say on this matter. Therefore I shall keep my remarks to as short a compass as possible in the hope that they may be able to say something and still leave time for expression of opinion on this bill.

This is not the first time the matter has been before the house. It has been before the house in discussions on the estimates of the Department of Justice in 1947 and again in 1948. While I have a bill here which deals with crime comics I should say that one or two remarks have been made indicating a view to this effect: Well, after all, is there much sense in going after the comics in the daily papers and depriving the children of their ordinary reading? May I make it clear, Mr. Speaker, at the very outset that the type of publication I have in mind is not the ordinary comic strip in the paper, but it is what is commonly called the crime comic; in other words the pulp paper magazine which retails for about 10 cents, vast numbers of which can be found on any of our newsstands.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Coming from Toronto.

Mr. Fulton: I believe that a large number of them are printed in Toronto. The hon. member who has just spoken and any other hon. member who may be wondering a little bit whether this matter is worth wasting much time on would be, I think, as I have been, amazed if he were to go down and make a study of the magazine stands in any news shop of this city or in any other city across Canada. If he will actually look through the racks in the shops he will be astonished to find how widespread is the distribution of these magazines. Again I refer to the kind of magazine, forty or fifty pages of which portray nothing but scenes illustrating the commission of crimes of violence with every kind of horror that the mind of man can conceive. May I lay before the house, Mr. Speaker, a description of the type of thing I have in mind. At this stage I do not want to use my own words; I want to use the words of a very respected minister of the government which is in office at the present time, a man of most temperate character, a man little given to exaggerated or violent words. In 1948 I sent the then minister of justice, Mr. Ilsley, now Mr. Justice Ilsley, a copy of the type of magazine which I had in mind. It was entitled "Crime does not Pay." A little later when his estimates were up for discussion in the house the minister referred to the particular magazine that I had sent him and he used these words, to be found on page 4939 of Hansard of June 9, 1948:

> The hon. member for Kamloops sent me a shocking instance of the abuse of freedom of the press. I agree with him that it is just that.

As illustrated by the number of resolutions and letters which I have received from organizations from coast to coast, there is a very widespread feeling that this type of crime comic does immense harm to the youth of this nation. May I read to the house some of the words used by an experienced psychologist in discussing the type of thing with which I am dealing. I hold in my hand a book entitled "The Psychopathology of Comic Books", an extract of the symposium held by the association for the advancement of psychotherapy held in New York city and written by Frederic Wertham. The first paper was read by a Mr. Gerson Legman. I shall read from page 473 of the proceedings of the association. I read these words because they are a perfect description of the type of publication which I have in mind:

> The comic books concentrate on aggressions which are impossible under civilized restraints—with fists, guns, torture, killing, and blood. The internalized censorship of both artist and child makes this attack respectable by directing it against some scapegoat criminal or wild animal, or even against some natural law like gravity, rather than against the parents, teachers, and policemen who are the real sources of the child's frustration and therefore the real objects of his aggression. At the same unconscious level that the child identifies himself with the heroic avenger, he may also identify whoever has been frustrating him with the corpse.

> Violence displaced in this way from its intended object invariably appears in larger and larger doses, more and more often repeated. Twelve years ago, in 1936, there was not one comic book published in the United States. Today, at a conservative estimate, there are five hundred million yearly.

May I pause here to remark that that estimate is already out of date, because the last authoritative estimate in the United States is that 60 million of these publications hit the magazine stands in that country every month, or 720 million a year. I regret that I have not been able to obtain authoritative figures on the numbers which are circulating in Canada; but, as I have said, if any hon. member wants to see for himself the threat which they are he has only to go to any newsstand in any otherwise reputable magazine shop in this or in any other city.

The article continues:

> The secret of this unprecedented success—the greatest, fastest literary success the world has ever seen—is, of course, violence. All comic books without exception are principally, if not wholly devoted to violence.
> The price being only a few cents apiece, and the distribution national, every city child can, and does, read from ten to a dozen of these pamphlets monthly, an unknown number of times, and then trades them for others. If there is only one violent picture per page—and there are usually more—every city child who was six years old in 1938 has by now absorbed an absolute minimum of eighteen thousand pictorial beatings, shootings, stranglings, blood-puddles, and torturings-to-death, from comic books alone. The fortification of this visual violence with similar aural violence over the radio daily, and both together in the movies on Saturday, must also be counted in. The effect—and there are those who think it has been a conscious intention—has been to raise up an entire generation of adolescents who have felt, thousands upon thousands of times, all the sensations and emotions of committing murder, except pulling the trigger. And toy guns—advertised in the back pages of the comics—have supplied that.

There are many other statements which could be given and I hope the house will forgive me if I rely upon the statements of experts in the matter, rather than upon my own observations.

I should like at this stage to refer to a lecture given by Mr. Arthur J. Freund, chairman of the American Bar Association committee on motion pictures, radio broadcasting and comics in relation to the administration of justice. The American Bar Association has had this matter under study for over two years, having been disturbed by the vast number of these publications which are reaching the newsstands every month, their effect in turn being multiplied by the movies, radio and, at present, television.

My appeal is directed exclusively to crime comics, the pulp type of magazine publication which is usually known by that name. The committee to which I have referred has made an extensive study of the matter as it is portrayed in what they describe as the various media. When they use the word "media" they mean crime comics, the radio and motion pictures.

The address delivered by Mr. Freund at the meeting of the special committee of the American Bar Association held in November of 1948 contains this very interesting passage:

> After a consuming and intensive attention to this subject for two years as chairman of this committee on behalf of the American Bar Association; with the great volume of correspondence which has poured upon my desk decrying the evils of crime portrayals by the media, and as the result of many conferences and much correspondence with members of my profession, publicists, psychologists, psychiatrists, educators, social scientists, and other professional and interested lay persons, I am of the personal conviction, to paraphrase the findings of the National Broadcasting Corporation, that the vivid, living portrayal of crime by the media has a profound impact upon the mind of the juvenile, adolescent and impressionable and that grave harm has already resulted thereby to uncounted and, perhaps, uncountable numbers of our society.

Mr. Freund continues by dealing with the representation one hears from time to time that, after all, crime comics are only the up-to-date form of the old stories of violence which are found, it is said, even in the Bible, or in classical fairy tales such as Robin Hood. Then, there are other stories which are not necessarily fairy tales, in which category would come Treasure Island. The point is made that it is ridiculous to suggest that these crime comics, which are only up-to-date versions of these other tales, in fact contribute to juvenile delinquency.

Mr. Freund deals with that suggestion as follows:

> During the past two years I have repeatedly heard representatives of the media say that the crime portrayals in their respective fields are a stimulus required by our changing society and that they are, after all, no worse than the crime episodes told in the Bible, portrayed in fairy stories and in some of the classics which are the foundation of much of our great literature. I cannot accept this thesis. On the contrary, I believe it is one thing for an adolescent to live in a world of fantasy stimulated by stories in the Bible, by fairy tales and by great works of classical literature unrelated to his immediate environment or to the realistic possibilities of his every-day life. But it is my view that it is a wholly different experience for the impressionable mind to be stimulated into a world of apparent reality where criminal and morbid activities in which he can actually participate in his day-to-day living are delineated repetitiously for him with blueprint accuracy.

Those are the words of people who have made an intensive study of the problem. Thus far however it must be admitted that my remarks have been in the realm of theory. I should now like to relate them to the realm of actuality by pointing out to the house a number of cases in this country and in the United States where the commission of crime by juveniles has been directly attributed to crime comics. Before giving the actual illustrations let me remind the house that this type of comic publication is turned out in such a way as to impress most vividly on juvenile minds the subject matters with which they are dealing.

It is well recognized by teachers that the easiest way to impress a lesson upon a juvenile mind is by illustration. That is exactly what these crime comics do. They present in coloured pictures the commission of crimes of violence, showing every possible detail. Secondly, it should be borne in mind that children are natural imitators, and that they frequently copy what they have seen others do without any thought of the moral aspect involved, whether it is right or wrong. They just copy it as a natural sequence, having seen it done before. When they see it repeated in pictures hundreds upon hundreds of times they are more apt to copy it, and to do exactly what they have seen the criminal doing, without any thought as to whether it is right or wrong—until they are suddenly brought to court to face charges of having committed crimes.

Then, these crime comics almost invariably portray the law and the administration of justice and decency as a slow, stumbling and stupid process; whereas the gangster, the man of violence, is portrayed as acting directly, quickly and forcefully. In this way the sympathies of children are directed toward the wrong side.

I now come to the actual evidence of crimes having been committed or contributed to by crime comics. First I would refer to a statement made by Mr. J. V. Bennet, director of the bureau of prisons in Washington, D.C. In the course of one of the studies to which I have referred he states:

> We have in one of our institutions a boy who carried out a kidnapping plot following the precise pattern he had read about in a comic magazine called Crime Does Not Pay.

May I pause to remind the house that it was one issue of that magazine, which I sent to the former minister of justice, which brought from him the comment that this was an example of a shocking abuse of freedom of the press. Mr. Bennet continues:

> Not only did the boy confess that he got the idea from the crime comic but the facts surrounding the execution of the crime bore out his statement. There are a number of cases, notably one in Ohio where two boys attempting a kidnapping shot and killed a citizen, which indicates pretty strongly the influence of comic magazines on the young boys who plotted the crimes.

Then it should be recalled, sir, that this magazine "Crime Does Not Pay" circulates freely in Canada. The second piece of evidence I should like to lay before the house concerns the trial of two boys aged eleven and thirteen for murdering James Watson of Dawson Creek, in Canada, in the fall of 1948. During the trial positive evidence was produced to show that the boys' minds were saturated with what they had read in crime comics. One boy admitted to the judge that he read as many as fifty crime comics a week, while the other admitted having read thirty. After the case was concluded, the presiding judge delivered a most direct and scathing criticism of crime comics, laying the blame for this murder almost directly upon their influence.

Many other cases could be cited. In Montreal a boy aged 12 years beat his mother to death with a bat while she was sleeping and at the trial said he had seen that sort of thing in the comics. In Philadelphia Symon Levin, aged 16 years, killed a 12-year-old boy with a pair of scissors. His room was found to be littered with crime comics. In Los Angeles a 14-year-old boy poisoned a 50-year-old woman. He said he had got the idea from a comic book as well as the recipe for the poison. In the same city a 13-year-old boy was found hanged in a garage with a crime comic illustrating that type of thing at his feet.

These are only examples that I am giving to prove that crime comics have a direct bearing on the commission of crime by juveniles. Apart altogether from the statements of experts who have studied the matter, there is other evidence in the form of resolutions passed by parent-teacher associations and other groups experienced in training young minds from coast to coast of Canada. A campaign has been started by the Kiwanis clubs across the country and each club is asked to pass a resolution dealing mainly with obscene books but by implication with these crime comics as well. The resolution ends with the following words:

> Therefore be it resolved that the Minister of Justice be respectfully requested to fully investigate and to recommend prosecutions of the publishers, distributors and vendors of obscene books, especially of the inexpensive paper bound type, in order that the further corruption of the youth of Canada may be prevented and thus alleviate some of the ever increasing tendencies towards juvenile delinquency.

That is the background of the situation. I think hon. members will agree that the evidence shows that there is a real menace to the youth of our country in the widespread publication and circulation of crime comics. We are then faced with the question: How are we going to deal with it? Various methods have been suggested. One is direct censorship by the government and the other is the setting up of some sort of bureau which would ban certain publications. I say without hesitation that I am against both of those methods. I am unalterably opposed to the idea of government censorship of the press in any form whatsoever in peacetime. There are too many dangers involved in that type of solution.

I have the utmost confidence in proper legal processes which have been worked out in this country over the years; I have the utmost confidence in our courts and jury system, and my suggestion is that the proper approach is along these lines. If it is demonstrated by such evidence as has been given here that a course of action is obviously against the public welfare or public morals, then it should be made an offence by a properly enacted statute. We should define the offence as accurately as we can and then provide the mechanism whereby the person accused of the offence can be brought before our courts. It should be left to our judicial system to determine whether or not the person accused has in fact committed the offence or rather committed the acts which constitute the offence as defined in the statute.

That has been the approach which has been followed here. At the present time there is no satisfactory definition which would make it an offence to print, publish or distribute the type of crime comic which I have been describing. No satisfactory means exists of starting an action against a person who may print, publish or distribute these comics. I would refer again to the words of the former minister of justice when he was discussing this matter. I have referred already to his remarks as reported on page 4939 of Hansard of June 9, 1948. After stating that I had sent him a shocking instance of the abuse of freedom of the press, the former minister went on to say:

> I agree with him, that it is just that. I am afraid, however, it is nevertheless legal; it is not an offence to publish the kind of material which was published and which is being distributed in various parts of Canada.

At the present time there is no means of dealing with that type of publication and means must be found. The means which I have sought, which are in accordance with the principles which I have just laid before the house of defining an offence and then setting up the mechanism whereby the person accused can be tried, are suggested by the present Criminal Code. This bill seeks to amend section 207 of the Criminal Code by adding a further offence, the offence of printing, publishing or distributing crime comics.

Section 207 of the code as it presently exists is within that part of the code dealing with offences against public morals, decency and so on. That section sets out three types of offence. It states:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years imprisonment who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse,

The section then goes on to define the three types of act which if committed will render a person liable to that penalty. The three acts are: first, the making, manufacturing, selling or exposing for sale of obscene literature or pictures; second, exhibiting any disgusting object; and, third, the sale of harmful drugs. There are set out the three categories of offence. My suggestion is that to those three categories there shall be added a fourth category which is to be found in the bill, namely, and I quote from the bill:

> (d) prints, publishes, sells or distributes any magazine, periodical or book which exclusively or substantially comprises matter depicting pictorially the commission of crimes, real or fictitious, thereby tending or likely to induce or influence youthful persons to violate the law or to corrupt the morals of such persons.

Anyone found guilty of committing the offence there set forth would be subject to the penalty imposed by section 207. In placing this bill before this house I am attempting to comply with requests which I have received—I know other hon. members have received similar requests—from civilian organizations that something be done to cope with this increasing menace. Not only have requests of that sort been received from civilian organizations; similar requests have also been received from some of the law enforcement officers of the provincial governments.

When the matter was discussed in 1948 the then minister of justice, Mr. Ilsley, said that a request for some such legislation had been received from the attorney general's department of British Columbia. I understand—and the minister will have more knowledge of this than I—that the attorney general's department of Manitoba would like to see some such legislation. I do not mean exactly the same, but they hope that it will be found possible to introduce legislation providing an effective means for dealing with the problem I have been describing. I know that the attorney general's department of the province of Ontario say that they find that under the law as it presently exists there is nothing they can do to deal with the problem. I believe that they too would like to see some solution found.

In the previous discussions it was stated by the then minister of justice that, although he was well aware of the problem, it had not been found possible to devise any legislation which would provide a satisfactory solution. Here is a suggested solution. I am not saying it is perfect. It is probably far from it, but I want to impress upon the house that the draftsmanship of the bill is not mine. The bill is in the exact form which was drafted by the Department of Justice and was read to the house during the previous discussion by the then minister of justice, Mr. Ilsley, when this whole matter was being discussed during the passage of his estimates.

In discussing the matter on June 14, 1948, the minister said that the problem had been drawn to his attention by the representations which I had made, and which others had made, and that an effort had been made to draft legislation that would form a satisfactory answer. He assured the committee at one stage that he would either introduce such legislation at a later date or, if he did not introduce it, he would give his reasons for not doing so. On June 14, in committee of supply, he stated that the matter had been considered and a draft had been prepared, but he was not ready at that time to introduce the draft as a government bill. He read the draft which had been prepared and considered in the department, and it is found at page 5200 of Hansard of June 14, 1948. Hon. members who may care to turn it up will find it is in exactly the same form as the bill now before the house.

In discussing the matter at that time the minister said that the draft that he read, and which is now incorporated in this bill, had certain weaknesses. First he said it was difficult to define the matter clearly enough to make it possible to take effective action by way of prosecution without at the same time running the possibility of involving some innocent person. I think the answer to that is found in the acceptance of the principle that, under this bill, if a prosecution were to be laid, the person accused of the offence would be brought before the criminal courts on a jury trial, and it would be up to the jury to say whether the publication complained of was in fact of such a nature as to be likely to influence youthful persons to commit crime. It would not be open to the minister, or anybody else with improper motives, to launch an improper prosecution against an innocent person. It would be up to the twelve men of the jury, parents of children or possibly even printers and publishers, who would have the publication complained of before them, to say whether in fact it fell within the definition which would then be incorporated in the Criminal Code of a book or publication tending or likely to influence youthful persons to violate the law.

Then again the minister argued against the proposed legislation at that time that it would be of general application across Canada, and he said there might be provinces which did not want to apply it. There might be a province where they did not want to bring such prosecutions. I think the answer to that is found in the fact that there are certain provinces which have requested legislation to deal with the matter. The proposed legislation leaves it open to the attorney general of the particular province. If in that province it were felt that the matter is a threat to morals, then the attorney general would presumably press prosecutions. If in another province no such feelings were prevalent, then no use would be made of the section. There is nothing in the bill that compels the attorney general to bring a prosecution. It is only if it is felt by the law enforcement officers of the province that something should be done.

I think one can sum up as follows: No harm can result from the bill. It will not bring in any form of censorship or banning of publications, but it will put publishers and news vendors on their guard to see that they do not publish or sell any magazine within the category defined. It will not give any powers of coercion to any board or bureau. No attorney general or law enforcement officer is compelled to act if he does not want to do so. It is left to the provinces if it is an obvious offence. Therefore the bill has no harmful features, but it has, I believe, a great potentiality for good.

Some may say that there has been an exaggeration of the evils of crime comics. I would refer them again to the factual evidence which I have placed before the house. I suggest to anyone who thinks that crime comics really are not harmful that, if he will look into the question, if he will go to the newsstands, if he will pick up one of these things and see what they portray and the examples they lay before the youth of the country, he will not deny that there is a real menace in them. Even if there were only one case of a crime, the commission of which was influenced by crime comics, even if the enactment of the bill only prevented one murder, one crime of violence being committed by a juvenile, I would say that the act, if passed, would have served its purpose, that the bill would have been worth while.

I hope that it will receive general support from the house. As I say, I realize it is not perfect, but it does seek to deal with the situation, and if it merely focuses public attention on it it will have been worth while. If it should be passed, and if it should prevent the commission of one crime by a young person in this country, then it will have been worth a hundredfold any effort the house may devote to it. I bespeak its support.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): First I should like to commend the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) for bringing a question of this kind before the house. He is a young man full of life and energy. I read the funnies, as you might expect. I read Smitty, Orphan Annie, Superman, Blondie, Napoleon and a lot of others. I think the funnies emphasize a sound principle of the teaching profession, that of making an impression through the eyes. Anybody will admit that the more you read about a thing and the more you look at it the more you become like it. I do not forget the period of my boyhood when I did not need much prodding to be bad, and I do not think there is an hon. member of this house who has not passed through such times, when he did not need much to suggest bad thoughts; and as you think, so you are.

Had I known this subject was coming up tonight I would have had some samples of the sort of thing that is printed in Canada and that comes across the border. I am sure no hon. member of this house would want the youth of Canada to practise the suggestions that come from those displays. I am sure everyone will admit that many of these pictures suggest the breaking of the seventh commandment, and the great thrill that is supposed to come to youth as a result. Those of us who are older realize that the Great Teacher has said that if you break one commandment you are guilty of breaking them all. Our educational system is of a very high order; and I speak now of Ontario and Manitoba, with which I am best acquainted. Each of our churches that amounts to anything has an educational system as well. We are teaching our boys and girls to be true men and women, to act courageously in facing the problems of life. But the devil—perhaps I should not call him that, though that is what he is; I will call him his satanic majesty—has plans for our youth. You can almost hear him saying, "Get them young. That is the time to get them". Our Sunday school teachers can work their heads off and still not succeed in combating an agency such as obscene literature. It is a curse. Sometimes a clerical gentleman is held up to ridicule, and you see the effect on our youth. Sometimes a good mother and father are held up to ridicule in these obscene pictures; then it is suggested that they should break the seventh commandment and get a great thrill.

I know the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) as I knew his dad, one of the outstanding citizens of Winnipeg, a contractor who had no trouble getting contracts because he did an honest business. As I think of the background of the minister I am sure that in his own way he will give serious consideration to the bill which has been presented by the young member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). If I may refer again to his satanic majesty, if he finds that not only the churches in Canada, not only our public schools and Sunday schools but also the members of the House of Commons are lined up against him, then he will think the thing over and back out.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of pleasure this evening in rising to support the action of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) in presenting this bill to the house. I believe it is needed as part of our Criminal Code. I do not rise to support the amendment necessarily or particularly because of my profession; I want that understood. I do so because I believe that is the reasonable thing to do, and also partly because before I entered the ministry I had a great ambition to become some day a famous cartoonist, and in the process perhaps become a millionaire. Well, I did become a cartoonist, connected with one of Canada's daily newspapers. I never became a millionaire, however. I created a comic strip which was said by those who read it to have some merit, but I never did make a million dollars, and I think I know why. There were perhaps two reasons in particular. In the first place it was not sexy enough, and in the second place it contained no crimes. Any man who can put enough sex and crime into his drawings or his writing and get away with it can make a million dollars any time he cares to try it.

Because of my interest in cartooning, Mr. Speaker, I have followed these particular publications over the years. I have watched the trend, and I know something of the extent to which publishers have gone in their greed for the almighty dollar. They are not concerned with the future of our citizenry as long as they can fill their unholy coffers. Since there has been some revolt on the part of the people of Canada, however, these publishers have taken some steps, or shall I say have put up some sort of front, in their own defence. Not so long ago the association of comic magazine publishers met in New York and drew up a code of ethics for the publication of crime comics. I am not going to take time to read that code, because I have only ten minutes before the hour expires. The code itself is not bad, but of course the difficulty is that it has no teeth. If the code is broken, what matters it, anyway? I could say something about this section of the Criminal Code which my hon. friend is seeking to amend. That section has teeth if only the authorities would do their duty and use it to prosecute those who publish obscene and undesirable literature. I agree that this section as it now stands does not specifically cover crime comics, but it does cover unwholesome literature.

I have been building up quite a file of this material over the past few years. I have the hardest job in the world keeping my youngsters from reading crime comics. I told them I was against them, and every once in a while they come running to me calling, "Daddy, daddy, here is one you should have for your file", so I have quite a nice little stack of them piled up. Here is a publication called "Crime Does Not Pay", which has been referred to. On the cover is the word "Crime" in large letters. I think, Mr. Speaker, you can read that from where you are sitting, but I will bet a million dollars you cannot read the type underneath which says "does not pay". It is so small it is almost negligible.

The youngsters get this book and read it. I did not read it but I went through it and looked at the pictures. I am going to tell you how I have categorized these pictures. The list is as follows: Those depicting a punch or bludgeoning with a blackjack or something else, 11 times—that is in one issue; burning or torturing, 8 times; you can see blood running twice and guns depicted 14 times. You can see a corpse 4 times; drinking bouts, 5 times. You can see somebody in the electric chair twice; poison is used three times and gassing once. I ask any reasonably minded man, is that the sort of thing our young people should be reading? That is a book entitled,

"Crime Does Not Pay". The publishers circumvent the law by using the words "does not pay". You see, we all know that is only a way of getting around the law. They are interested in the commercial end of it.

In the few minutes at my disposal, Mr. Speaker, might I emphasize once again that, apart from crime comics, if the Minister of Justice, who has the administration of the R.C.M.P. under his department, or if the various cities with their own police forces would take that section of the Criminal Code and enforce it, sending a few of these publishers to jail for a couple of years, I have no doubt but what it would make a difference in the type of publications in this country. Do not say you cannot get any evidence. If the minister wants evidence I will let him have my files.

I show you now a publication entitled "Girls on City Streets". Now, I want hon. members to know that I am building up a file on this subject. I purchased this copy in a coffee shop in a small western town. There was only the one coffee shop and newsstand and this publication was sold there. Things appear in this that I would not dare read in this chamber. I can tell you that no boy or girl would take it into the home for fear dad would take them out to the woodshed and paddle them for reading it. Anything a youngster would be ashamed to take home should never be published.

I have another publication to show you. Apparently the police did not ban this publication or another issue would not have appeared. I want you to remember I am building up a file and I did not obtain this merely to read. Of course, I had to read it, Mr. Speaker, or I would not have the evidence. Here is an article on the life of a prostitute. It might be said the publisher could get around the law by showing that the poor girl paid for her crimes, but that is not the reason some of our young people would buy this book to read. If you would like to read it, Mr. Speaker, I will send it to you. I shall do the same for all hon. members, but please, after the adjournment, do not rush me. This article is concerned with the life of a prostitute. It tells how she got into the racket. It tells something of her experiences on the first night she was in a bawdy house. Do you want me to read it? It tells how she was taught the technique of the game and it goes on to depict a lot of gutter scenes. That is what I bought with my hard-earned money—but only to build up my files.

I am serious about this, Mr. Speaker. Surely that sort of thing cannot go unnoticed by the police. Such a publication would be sold to my boy. Have not we, the men who are responsible for the making of our laws, the right to stand up in this parliament and protest? Have we not the right to ask the government to take some action to put teeth in our legislation? I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, that it has been left for a private member to introduce a bill of this sort. It is well known that home and school associations, parent-teacher associations, have sent in resolutions—one of the largest denominational churches adopted a resolution at a convention a year ago and sent it to the government. The government knows all about that. These resolutions have been coming in to the government by the score. If the government desire to argue, it is well known they can argue all sorts of technical things such as the freedom of the press. I am not even suggesting censorship. What I am suggesting is that the Criminal Code be used to prosecute when offences are committed against it. I am sorry that the time appears to have been exhausted because there are many other things in my files which I should like to present to you. I do urge this house to consider the adoption of this bill.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

RADIO LICENCE FEES

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): Before going into supply, there is a matter I should like to draw to the attention of the government, having in mind a newspaper article that appeared in an Ottawa paper this evening. It was stated that the request for an increase in radio licence fees has been brought to the cabinet level. It may be well, Mr. Speaker, for one to have some idea of the geography of the constituency of Essex West which I represent. This constituency, comprising one of the three constituencies of the county of Essex, is the most southerly part of the Dominion of Canada. As a matter of fact, it is south of the most northerly latitude of northern California. My constituency is surrounded on three sides by the United States.

We have in that constituency, Mr. Speaker, a radio station which carries some C.B.C. programs as well as some programs of the Mutual Broadcasting System. Recently the power of the station was increased to 50,000 kilowatts and I presume it can be heard readily in this locality. Recently the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation made a recommendation to the Canadian cultural commission that radio licence fees be increased to $5 per set or per family, I am not sure which. Since that suggestion was presented to the commission I have received a resolution passed by the Windsor city council on September 20, 1949, which reads as follows:

That a strenuous protest be made to the dominion government against the proposal of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to increase the annual radio licence fees from $2.50 to $5, particularly in view of the general opinion in this area that no fee should be charged for receiving sets; and further that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the local members of the government.

I propose, Mr. Speaker, to address myself solely to one point, namely, the inequality, the unfairness of the imposition of a radio licence fee of any kind. I do this because of an answer given by the appropriate minister to a question which I had on the order paper. As I said, I am not going to discuss the economics of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I am not going to discuss the value of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is doing a fine job probably under difficult circumstances, but I do say that the imposition of a radio licence fee is an unequal and unjust imposition of a charge on the Canadian people who pay it. The bureau of statistics informed me that at the last census there were 2,706,089 households or families in the Dominion of Canada. I give that figure because that is the year in which the census was taken. It is estimated by the said bureau that in 1948 there were 3,235,000 households in Canada. The bureau of statistics gives the number of radios in the various provinces of Canada in 1941. I will give Manitoba first. In Manitoba 79 per cent of the households had a radio. In Saskatchewan 75·7 per cent had radios. The total in Canada was 77·8 per cent. I quoted these two provinces because they were the 1941 figures. But a census was taken in the western provinces in 1946 which shows that in the prairie provinces the number of radios in the households had increased to 91·5 per cent. That figure applies to Brandon and other cities. Flin Flon had 92·5 per cent, and so on. From those figures, Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion that about 90 per cent of the homes in the prairie provinces have radios. We can safely assume that a minimum of 90 per cent of all the homes in Canada have radios. Let us look at the sale of radio licences. In 1940-41 there were 1,454,717 radio licences sold. In 1948 there were 2,057,799 radio licences sold. In 1941, therefore, judging from the figures I have quoted and assuming that there were 75 per cent of the households with radios, of the 2,706,089 households 25 per cent did not have radios. That would mean that there were 676,522 households which did not have radios, leaving 2,029,567 which did have radios. I do not want to bother the house with statistics.

In 1941 two million and some odd thousand did own radios. There were 1,454,000 odd radio licences sold. Therefore there were about 575,000 persons who did not buy radio licences, which is considerably over 25 per cent of those owning radios who did not purchase a radio licence.

Again quoting the 1948 figures of the bureau of statistics, there were 3,235,000 households. Ninety per cent of them owned radios. In other words, 2,911,000 odd owned radios; but there were only 2,057,000 radio licences sold. Therefore there were 854,000 odd who did not purchase radio licences.

Mr. Cruickshank: Shame.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): My hon. friend says "Shame". I hope he is not one of them. That means, Mr. Speaker, that between 25 per cent and thirty-three and one third per cent or one-quarter and one-third of the Canadian people did not purchase radio licences. I cannot see therefore that the imposition by the present method of a radio licence is at all justifiable because of the fact that three-quarters or two-thirds of the people are paying for a licence and the other one-quarter or one-third are not paying anything whatsoever. Therefore, so that the government may have some idea of what is thought by one member of parliament who represents a constituency which is not at the present time serviced by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I would strongly recommend that the government totally abolish the imposition of a radio licence fee and take the funds out of the general fund of the Dominion of Canada so that there may be equality and justice to all such persons resident in this Dominion of Canada.

LOCATION OF TERMINUS OF OIL PIPE LINE

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the subject I wish to place before the house tonight comes, in reality, in the form of a question, namely—whether the terminus of the main oil pipe line from western Canada should be in the United States or at the lakehead in Canada? I bring this matter up in this way and at this time because while the government appears to be partially committed to a terminus in the United States, I believe it is not yet too late to make a change in that policy. This is one of those questions, the decision concerning which may have far-reaching effects on the nation.

For that reason I make no apology for bringing this matter before the house tonight. In doing so I realize the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) will probably have an opinion contrary to my own.

Pipe Line Terminus

Mr. Howe: You state yours, and let me state mine.

Mr. Green: Well now, I started out trying to be on friendly terms with the minister but, as he does so often, he has very quickly flared up, and shown this dictatorial attitude which does not go down well in Canada. I would remind the minister that on other occasions, when he was so sure he was right, he was completely wrong. Two examples are, first, when he said we could not possibly make tanks in this country, and secondly when we proposed to the government that there be merchant ships built in Canada, when shipping was so short during the war, and he said that it was foolish to waste our time in the peacetime occupation of building ships. Shortly after that his ship was torpedoed on the way across the Atlantic, and it was not very long until Canada was right into a big shipbuilding program.

Mr. Howe: This is a pretty intelligent discussion!

Mr. Green: I am just pointing out that the minister has been all wet before.

Mr. Howe: And they send people down all the way from Vancouver to talk like this!

Mr. Green: And I think he is all wet on this question. I hope that a great many members of the house, regardless of the party to which they belong, will agree with me—or at least will give the question the very serious consideration it merits.

I should like to outline the steps which had been taken by the house. As a result of the discoveries of oil in Alberta the government at the spring session brought in a bill called the Pipe Lines Act. It was a bill laying the legislative framework for regulating pipe lines in Canada. Wide powers were given under the act to the board of transport commissioners, included among which was the power to rescind, change, alter or vary any order or decision that they might have made. I point that out because they have already made an order in connection with the routing of this pipe line.

Then there were several private bills brought in incorporating different companies. The government policy was that a company which was to establish a pipe line for oil or for gas must be incorporated by act of parliament. I believe that was a wise provision. One of the companies so incorporated was known as the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company. It is a company controlled, I believe, by Imperial Oil Company Limited. There may be other oil companies interested in it, but I think control is in the hands of Imperial Oil.

The bill incorporating the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company was sent by the house to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. This happened in the last day or two of the session, when there was a great rush and the committee sat for only a few minutes. During that time it considered several bills, so that there was very little opportunity to go carefully into the plans of these different companies.

Some evidence was given before that committee that the Interprovincial Pipe Line Company might be running their pipe line through the United States rather than to the lakehead in Canada. But as I remember it, the statement with regard to the routing of the pipe line was not a definite one.

Subsequently, in June, the company applied to the board of transport commissioners for permission to construct a pipe line from Edmonton to Regina, and permission was given. I am not quarreling with that order, because I think it was proper that they should be given that right. There is however one feature about it which gives me some concern. We understood last spring that these pipe lines were to be common carriers. In other words, they were to carry the oil offered by all companies no matter how large or small. But while the chairman of the board appears to have raised the point during the hearing, the order does not state that this pipe line is to be a common carrier. I do not understand why such provision was not made.

Then about a month ago they applied for permission to construct a pipe line from Regina to Gretna, on the boundary between Manitoba and the United States.

Mr. Carroll: What is the name of that place?

Mr. Green: The place is called Gretna. One finds in looking over the evidence and reading the judgment of the chairman of the board of transport commissioners that it was clearly understood that the pipe line was not to stop at Gretna, but was to go right through to Superior in the state of Wisconsin, Superior being a port on lake Superior.

We find also that the capacity of the pipe line was to be 70,000 barrels daily, of which 35,000 was to be piped through the states in bond, and then shipped down to the Imperial Oil refinery at Sarnia. The other 35,000 barrels apparently was to be refined at Superior, or at some other point in the United States. Finally the company obtained an order from the board of transport commissioners on September 12.

Then they had to get a permit from the Minister of Trade and Commerce before they could build a pipe line. They got that permit on the following day, September 13.

Mr. Cruickshank: Of this year?

Mr. Green: This year, just a few weeks ago. That permit by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was issued under the provisions of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, which is chapter 54 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. Under that act wide power is given to issue licences and also to revoke them. Section 7 contains a provision which I think is significant and which reads:

Any such licence may provide that the quantity of power or fluid—

Oil would come under "fluid".

—to be exported shall be limited to the surplus, after the licensee has supplied for distribution to customers for use in Canada power or fluid to the extent defined by such licence, at prices and in accordance with conditions, rules and regulations prescribed by the governor in council.

Mr. Cruickshank: Has this company the necessary finances available?

Mr. Green: The board found that the company is adequately financed.

Mr. Cruickshank: Have they those finances now?

Mr. Green: Imperial Oil Limited has given an undertaking that it will stand behind the company in the event that the company's own finances are not sufficient.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am against the way this is being done. That is why I ask.

Mr. Green: I think that is a good provision in the act. It shows that the legislators—apparently the act was passed as far back at least as 1907—believed that Canada should be looked after first before power or fluid was exported. That is the essence of my submission tonight, that Canada should be looked after first.

Construction of this pipe line between Edmonton and Regina may have been commenced, but I understand no construction has been started on the line from Regina to Superior and it may not be too late for this question to be given further consideration.

A most significant statement was made last week by officials of Imperial Oil Limited. There had been agitation at the lakehead to have the pipe line go through Canada to which the answer was given that it would cost approximately $10,600,000 more to construct it to the lakehead than to Superior and over $400,000 more each year for operating expenses. It was stated also that there would be some delay in building it to that point; in other words, that the pipe line could not be completed to the Canadian lakehead as quickly as it could be to Superior. My argument tonight is in spite of the admission of all those facts. Imperial Oil officials went to Fort William last week and a press dispatch from there dated September 27 reads as follows:

If government assistance is given Imperial Oil to study the possibility of an easily transversed pipe line route through northwestern Ontario, and, if necessary, to subsidize the project, the company will consider terminating the line here, top officials of the oil company stated today.

The officials who were there were P. H. Hewitson, chairman of the board; G. L. Stewart, president; J. R. White, vice-president; and Dr. O. B. Hopkins, president of the subsidiary company, Interprovincial Pipe Line Company. The press dispatch goes on:

The oil men told a gathering of lakehead civic officials and other local citizens at Fort William today that the purpose of the proposed pipe line from Alberta is not to serve the American markets, but to supply their refinery at Sarnia.

You will remember that the evidence before the board was that half the oil was to be refined in the United States. The report continues:

They said it was decided to terminate the line at Superior, Wisconsin, rather than at the Canadian lakehead, because the American route would cost less and could be built sooner. Since the company had to borrow the money to finance the project, the economic factor had to determine the route. Time was also of utmost importance.

That statement has not been contradicted by the officials since the press dispatch appeared. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce about it on September 28 as reported on page 317 of Hansard. His question reads:

Has the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce been drawn to the reported offer made yesterday to civic officials in Fort William by Imperial Oil Limited to build its pipe line through Canadian territory to Port Arthur if government assistance is forthcoming? Will the government investigate the offer, with a view to reconsidering its former decision?

The Minister of Trade and Commerce gave a peculiar answer which I am going to read to the house:

My hon. friend suggests that the government has made a decision. So far as I know, the government has made no decision. A private project has been placed before it, and the appropriate branches of government acted upon that project as required by law. The government has received no proposal in the matter, and I doubt whether a proposal will be made to the government concerning a private project of this kind.

This is not a private project in the ordinary sense; it is a project of vital importance to every part of Canada and it should be treated as such. My submission is that the main pipe line should be laid in Canadian soil. All this brings to mind what happened when the Canadian Pacific was built across Canada. One of the moving spirits in that project was Mr. James J. Hill, Jim Hill. He was originally one of the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and believed that part of the line should be built through the United States. When he was unable to get his way with the board he left the Canadian Pacific and established the Great Northern which was built across the United States. He ran feeder lines into Canada in as many places as possible in an attempt to get Canadian trade for his main line in the United States. I know there were several branch lines running up into British Columbia to tap the resources of that province.

I suggest that in 1949 we do not want to have anything of that kind happen. I believe most sincerely that the main pipe line should be laid in Canadian soil.

Apparently some of the oil is to be shipped to Sarnia. I believe that it should be shipped from one Canadian port to another. Dock facilities are to be built at Superior, Wisconsin, instead of at the Canadian lakehead. I would remind hon. members from the maritimes of the trouble they have had for decades because Canadian freight was shipped from Portland, Maine, instead of from Halifax and Saint John. No one can justify that. I believe that those two great Atlantic ports have been dealt with most unfairly by Canadian governments, and we do not want a situation of that kind arising in this case. Let us have this oil shipped by Canadian tankers from one Canadian port to another.

I also believe that the oil should be refined and used in Canada to the greatest extent possible. Certainly we should sell any surplus to the United States; but let us use this oil in Canada to the greatest possible extent. The same question will arise in a year or two with regard to the iron ore of Quebec and Labrador. The house is going to be faced with the problem of whether that iron ore is to be made into steel in Canada, or be shipped to Cleveland, Boston or some other centre in the United States, and turned into steel there.

Another reason why I believe there should be a change in the plan is because of what this can do for Canada if the line is kept in our country. Let us take the situation at the lakehead. The trans-Canada highway is to be built very shortly, I hope. There will be tremendous traffic through the lakehead cities on the trans-Canada highway, not only tourist traffic but also trucks. I am looking forward to that time because I am quite sure the trucking will be a check on railway freight rates. That is one way in which western Canada will get freight rates reduced to what they are in Ontario and Quebec. There is certainly going to be a great deal of traffic on the trans-Canada highway through the lakehead cities if the trans-Canada highway is a proper road.

Mr. Howe: Tell me about the lakehead.

Mr. Green: We may be facing a similar situation on the west coast a few years from now. We may have the suggestion made then that it is cheaper to run a pipe line down to Seattle, Spokane or Portland, and we may have oil from the prairies or from the Peace river portion of British Columbia piped into those United States centres for refining. At the moment it is the great lakes area that is involved, but eventually the west coast may be facing a similar problem.

Finally I believe that in the oil development and in the iron ore development we have tremendously important factors in the building of a great nation. They are perhaps the two most important developments that have taken place in Canada in the lifetime of anyone in this chamber tonight. I hope that Canada's oil is not merely to be used as a reserve to be taken down into the United States when it is needed there after their oil fields have become exhausted. There is a real danger of that taking place if the policy is to be formulated by oil companies rather than by the Canadian parliament. It would be a tragedy if that should happen.

I do not believe that the government can evade its responsibility in the matter. I think that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), in his answer to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) on September 28 and also in his answer to an earlier question on September 19, which will be found at page 29 of Hansard, was not facing up to his responsibilities. I am quite sure that, if the government so desires, this plan can be changed and the main pipe line can be laid to the lakehead. I urge upon the private members of the house that they take a stand on this question even though the minister may seem very determined to maintain the present plan. I hope that private members of the house of all parties will go into the question thoroughly, and that they will not be afraid to take a stand on this issue which, in my opinion, is of vital importance to the nation.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have heard many arguments in the house, and none so fallacious as the one to which we have just listened. One would think that this is the first pipe line ever built in Canada to market oil which crosses the Canadian boundary. Most hon. members know that Canadian interests built a pipe line from Montreal to the seaboard within the last ten years. If the argument of my hon. friend is valid it was quite improper to build that line from Montreal to Portland. The line should have been built from Montreal to Saint John, or possibly from Montreal to Halifax. True it would have raised the price of oil in the Montreal area by two or three cents, but what is that? My hon. friend would say that two or three cents a gallon on oil is nothing at all if national pride and the little Canadian viewpoint can be preserved. Anything built to serve Canada must be built through Canada.

I would also remind the hon. member that for a great many years Canada has been served at Sarnia by a pipe line built from the mid-continent field of the United States. I can say that, if that pipe line had not crossed the international boundary to serve Canada, Canada would not have fought very much of a war in the last conflict.

What is the purpose of the pipe line from Alberta? It is to bring Alberta oil to market. My hon. friend says that the markets must be in Canada, and since we believe we have there one of the great oil fields of the world he follows through and says, "All right, if it is necessary to market the oil, pipe it down to Halifax."

Mr. Green: I did not say that.

Mr. Howe: Certainly you said it. You said that the oil must be used in Canada.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Howe: Well, now, sit down and let me make a speech.

Mr. Green: On a question of privilege, I do not mind what the minister says provided he does not put words into my mouth. He said that I said a pipe line to Halifax. I said no such thing. He must stick to what I said if he is going to quote me.

Mr. Howe: Where would this line stop, at the lakehead?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Thatcher: Stop at Port Arthur.

Mr. Green: Stop at the lakehead.

Mr. Howe: I know quite a lot about Port Arthur, and I know the purpose of the speech which has just been made.

Mr. Green: The minister is imputing motives. I made my speech because I believe in what I said. He has no right to say that it had to do with anything else. He has no right to impute motives.

Mr. Speaker: I did not understand the minister to impute any improper motives.

Mr. Fraser: He certainly did, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Howe: If I may resume, the purpose of the pipe line is to bring Alberta oil to market. If it is reasonable to carry that oil to Halifax in order to find a market in Canada, then the market should be confined to Canada. As a matter of fact the only permit issued under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act is one to transport oil from Alberta to the Sarnia refinery. No permit has been issued as yet for the marketing of oil in the United States. However, I think the province of Alberta has a distinct interest in this pipe line. After all, crude oil prices in Alberta will be determined by the refinery prices at the marketing points less the cost of transmission, and the cost of transmission will include the operating expenses and amortization of the cost of the pipe line. My hon. friend said, "Add another $10 million to the cost; add another $400,000 or $600,000 to the operating expenses. Let the province of Alberta pay that."

Mr. Green: I did not say that.

Mr. Howe: Well, who is going to pay it?

Mr. Green: Go ahead and make your speech, but don't misquote me.

Mr. Howe: Certainly the cost of the pipe line must be paid by the oil it transmits; I know of no other source of income for a pipe line. Therefore the board of transport commissioners considered an application to build a pipe line from the oil fields in Alberta to Superior, Wisconsin, to transmit oil to Sarnia. That is a Canadian movement. The ships carrying the oil to Sarnia from Superior must be Canadian ships, under the coasting laws of this country. I think the board of transport commissioners were right when they said it had been proved that this was the economic route from Edmonton to Sarnia. They looked into the financing and found that the American portion was going to be financed in the United States, so there would be no drain of American dollars from the Canadian reserves. They found that the Canadian portion was going to be financed in Canada. They found that there would be a definite saving in the cost of marketing oil by that route, and accordingly they approved the application. The government, through the Department of Trade and Commerce, issued a permit for the transportation of oil through that pipe line from Edmonton to Sarnia.

Those are the true facts of the case, distort them as you like. My hon. friend says this private venture—for it is a private venture—should not have been permitted, that we should have told the owners, "If you want to build this pipe line at all you must spend another $10 million to take it to the lakehead." I cannot see the economics of that situation, what would be the quid pro quo for the extra $10 million. It is true that there would be a pipe line terminating at the lakehead instead of at Superior, but is that worth $10 million? There is no possibility of a refinery at the lakehead, as far as I can see. Refineries are built in centres of distribution, and it is very unlikely that the lakehead would ever be a centre of supply. So my hon. friend would assess the province of Alberta and its oil resources a capital payment of something over $10 million and additional operating costs of at least $400,000 a year in order that his ideas of geography might be followed. I claim that the economics of the situation, the common sense of the situation and every other factor involved indicated that the application of Imperial Oil should be approved.

My hon. friend objects to marketing Canadian oil in the United States. Let me point out to him that it is very fortunate for Canada that the United States have not taken that viewpoint. We have been beggars for oil in the United States. In the tightest situations in that country—and I can tell my hon. friend there have been some tight situations—when oil was rationed from one end of the country to the other, Canada was always given the supplies of petroleum the country needed. In my opinion international commodities such as oil, that move freely from country to country and continent to continent, should not be confined by geography. The sensible way to market international commodities such as petroleum is to move to the markets nearest the source of supply. If this House of Commons should say to Alberta, "We are very sorry, but we need that petroleum in Canada, and you cannot market any in the United States until you serve all Canada," not only would the oil economy of the province of Alberta be wrecked beyond repair, but the good relations that have existed between the United States and Canada with respect to the supply and distribution of petroleum also would be wrecked. Certainly it is in the interests of the users of petroleum to get that commodity from the cheapest source. For eastern Canada and perhaps in the Montreal area that cheapest source is still the Caribbean or the gulf ports of the United States. The best market for Alberta oil is that which could be made available nearest to the source of supply, and part of that market eventually may be in the United States. To market oil in the United States simply means that you convert that oil into American dollars which you use to obtain oil from the cheapest source for other parts of Canada, and that is the sensible way to view the marketing of petroleum.

My hon. friend speaks of iron ore. Iron is in exactly the same position. We have been a deficit country in iron ore, but the fact that we have not had iron ore has not prevented the development of the steel industry of this country. We have in Canada a very efficient steel industry. The iron ore for that industry, as far as central Canada is concerned, has come largely from the Mesabi range in the United States. In part that is being replaced by ore from Canadian sources, from Steep Rock and from the Helen mine in the Algoma district, but a large proportion of our iron ore still comes from Mesabi, while a large percentage of the Canadian ore is sold to the United States. I do not know whether my hon. friend sees anything wrong in that; it is a natural movement. The ore is sent where it brings the best price; if it has the proper qualities it is bought by the steel companies whether it is Canadian or American ore. It moves without trade restriction and as the economy dictates. I cannot follow my hon. friend at all when he says Canadian ore must be used in Canada. It does not make sense. That is the viewpoint of a little Canadian. This a trading country, and any supplies we have in surplus should be traded for supplies in which we have a deficit.

Getting back to the pipe line, I stand on the statement I have made; that the government had no reason whatever to interfere with the project of the Imperial Oil Company for the marketing of Alberta oil. So far as my department is concerned, it issued a permit for the movement from Alberta to Sarnia through the route of the pipe line. I have no apologies to make.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think it should be possible to discuss this subject without getting away from the basic contention of the member who raised it. There are two points of view that have been expressed by the minister that do not go hand in hand. First of all, he made a statement that this pipe line was being carried through to Superior but that no licence had been granted for marketing the oil in the United States. The oil is to be carried to Sarnia. The rest of his argument was directed to the proposition that we should sell our oil in the United States. It is one or the other.

Mr. Howe: Oh, no.

Mr. Drew: The point is this. If the oil is to be carried to Superior for the purpose of selling it in the United States then let us know that now. The statement of the minister lends support to the belief that is developing that the construction of the pipe line to Superior is not for the purpose of carrying oil to eastern Canada but is to supply the Chicago area with oil. The geographical relationship of Superior to that natural market is apparent.

There is every reason why we should have regard for the extremely generous way in which the United States has made its supplies of oil available to us. There is every reason why there should be a high measure of free interchange of understanding and good will between these two nations. Long before there was a pipe line built from the mid-continent field to the refineries at Sarnia, the United States centres had been supplied by pipe line. They made certain of their own supplies, as was their legitimate duty. It is the duty of Canadians to make sure they have pipe lines where they are needed before this new supply of oil is shipped to outside points. There is a vital need for oil in our country. It is one of our deficit resources.

Within the past few years, we have seen one of the most remarkable developments in the whole world. On the basis of the clearest evidence than can be obtained, there is every reason to believe the Alberta field is merely the core of one of the greatest oil fields in the world. Canada has been a beggar for United States oil, as the minister has said. It is a strange thing for a beggar to start giving away the thing he was begging the minute he gets it into his own hands. We are just commencing to reach a position where we can meet this great domestic need of modern industrial nations. Oil is the basis of modern transport. The use of it in our homes and elsewhere has been growing to an extent no Canadian visualized. We now see before us a great source of oil. At such a time our first obligation is to supply our own centres with that vital fluid by means of a pipe line. Let us make every barrel of oil which is surplus above our requirements available to our neighbours.

The right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has stated, and stated very properly, that we should export our surplus, trading it for what is a deficit. We are a long way yet, a very long way, in spite of the prospects before us, from being in a surplus position in regard to oil. This is our first venture of this sort. We have only begun to realize the potentialities of this vast field. This pipe line is the first that is to bring the oil from this great field to the east. The minister may dismiss the statement that was made, that, if necessary, it is worth an extra $10 million to carry that pipe line through to the lakehead. This country has spent a great deal more than $10 million on things less productive of results for the future of Canada. It is true that it might cost an additional $400,000 per year in servicing charges for the extra pump that would be required because of the additional 120 miles that would be covered in going through to the lakehead instead of Superior.

If that argument is sound, then why did we ever build railroads across Canada? In some places, we could have used the United States lines. We built railway lines in Canada because we wanted our own transportation system for the opening up of our own areas. In the building of this pipe line we must look not only to the immediate use of the oil, not only to the immediate consuming power of the lakehead area, but also to the future of that whole area from Sault Ste. Marie through to the Manitoba boundary. This area would naturally be served by a refinery at the lakehead. I mentioned going through to the Manitoba boundary because I understand there will be refineries at different points farther west along this line that would meet the consumer demands of centres of population such as Winnipeg and Regina.

When the minister says there should not be any reason for building a refinery at the lakehead it strikes me as strange, in view of the fact there are many places which must be within the knowledge of the members of this house in which refineries have been built to supply areas that consume a great deal less oil and gasoline than would be consumed in the lakehead area. It is a rapidly developing section of the country. This area is not confined to the lakehead cities alone, but would include the mineral developments to the northeast, to the north, and to the northwest, to say nothing of the tourist demands in that area. All this would create a greater demand for gasoline and oil than the amount consumed in many smaller nations of the world today in which refineries have been built to meet the local demand. If, for the sake of argument, the demand now might seem a little less than would call for the construction of refineries elsewhere, one has only to look at the immense potentialities of that area of Canada, to realize what has happened in the past few years and what is going to happen in the years immediately ahead, and to understand that with this source of gasoline and oil available new industries and new developments would be established.

After all, it seems to me that is one of the first things to which we should be looking as Canadians. We have seen the development that is taking place in Canada from one coast to the other through the employment of our great water resources. We have seen the development that has occurred through the use of our other raw materials. Now, when this new and rapidly expanding source of development is becoming available, then it seems to me that, in every way that is within the power of the representatives of the people of Canada, this oil should first be made available to the people of Canada for the development of Canadian opportunities.

We have a very long way to go before we shall begin to meet our own demands. I understand that we are bringing in from the United States something in the neighbourhood of 350,000 barrels of oil a day. It is going to be a very long time before any of our friends in the United States can reasonably say to us, you are being unfair if you make use of these new sources of oil for your own country to fill the gap which is at the present time such a very heavy drain upon your own Canadian dollars. Yes, it is true that we shall receive Canadian dollars for such oil as may be piped outside of Canada, and in the very statement that the minister made he indicated his own belief that the oil that is going to Superior is going to the United States and not to Sarnia. There would have been no meaning in that statement if he did really believe that the oil was going to Superior, then to be carried by Canadian ships to Sarnia. Certainly, that is where it is going. Look at the map. It is going into the Chicago area unless there is some explanation that has not been put before us. It is the reasonable location for that oil, and the minister makes it quite clear that he thinks we are going to reap American dollars from the export of oil through this pipe line. Let every one of us hope that this vast field will reach such a point that we shall produce more oil than we need in Canada. Let us hope also that, with the pilot plants which are now being built, within the not too distant future a practical system of cracking the oil from the oil sands in Alberta will have been discovered; and when that happens the greatest concentration of oil in the whole world will have been made available. At such time as we have met our own basic requirements and opened such possibilities of development as reasonably accompany this new source of production, let us have interchanging lines. This is only the first line. There will be many others, and the producers of Alberta will certainly want to see a number of lines carrying oil.

Let us remember that this pipe line is not just a pipe line of a subsidiary of the Imperial Oil. It is a common carrier to carry oil for any company that will be supplying oil through that pipe line. In its own particular way it is a common carrier such as the railways might be. If Canada was wise in the past in facing the heavy costs of building railways across the north shore of lake Superior instead of following the easier course south of the border; if we were right in the costly construction of lines through the Rocky mountains instead of simply diverting the lines down to use the United States lines that were already built there at costs far in excess of anything involved in this case: then it seems to me that for the very same reasons and for the very same motives, and for motives that would appeal to our American friends, the strength of whose nation was founded on legitimate self-interest, they would understand perfectly well why we are doing this, and would acclaim our common sense in making sure that as the first step when we put our first oil line in it goes to a Canadian outlet where our ships from a Canadian port can carry that oil to Sarnia or to any place else; and that such oil as is not carried in that way can be refined, if not immediately, at some time in the not distant future, when the expansion in that area will itself be encouraged by the availability of this supply, and when that very expansion will encourage those who are concerned with this into the construction of a refinery at the lakehead, not merely for the lakehead cities but for that whole great area with its agricultural, its mineral, its forest and its enormous resources, in addition to the industrial possibilities related to iron and the other metals which are available in that area, as well as to the industries based upon wood products and the other resources that are there.

There may be reasons on both sides, but let us be quite clear about this. In the latter part of his statement the minister was clear that in his mind there is going to be an export through Superior to the United States. By all means let us co-operate in every way with our friends in the United States; but let us make sure first that we do the same thing in Canada that they did to build the United States, and that in the first stages we make sure that we get the fullest possible development that will result from these new discoveries that challenge the imagination of young Canadians in the years ahead.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): For two main reasons I rise to say a few things about the problems that have been discussed here tonight. First, I want to join with the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) in protesting against any increase in the fees charged by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for radio licences.

Mr. Speaker: May I draw to the attention of hon. members a citation from Beauchesne's parliamentary rules and forms, third edition, which has a direct bearing on the discussion of grievances which are raised when a motion to go into supply is before the house. I refer hon. members to paragraph 345, the latter part of which reads as follows:

> Members may discuss various matters on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair without any amendment being proposed; but once debate is stopped on one matter and another matter intervenes, members cannot again discuss the former.

Mr. Low: Yes. Mr. Speaker, oftentimes it is difficult for you to see hon. members who want to take part in the discussion of a certain topic, and I presume you did not see me try to rise in my place on one or two occasions. However, that is beside the point at the moment. I do want to throw a little light on the subject that is now under discussion, namely, the question of the pipe line which was introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). In this house debates often seem to generate much more heat than light and I am afraid that this is one of the occasions when that has happened.

There is one point that has not been made clear, and I am sure that hon. members would want to know all sides of the question before the debate is closed. I can quite agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that every hon. member should be much concerned about where the pipe line is to go and what the end result is to be.

I believe every member will agree that the first call on the oil being produced in Alberta should be from the Dominion of Canada. I do not think anyone questions that, not even the minister himself. I believe he agrees that under normal circumstances we should have the first call on the oil right here in Canada, provided we can bring it into the market at a competitive price. That is something that enters into this whole problem.

Pipe lines are costly, and to reach markets of any size, from the province of Alberta where oil is being produced, there are great distances to cover in Canada. If it is possible to effect an exchange of oil with the United States under which we agree to supply them with oil from Alberta in areas closer to the source of the supply, they in turn to bring oil across to us in Canada at a lower price, then it seems to me that the people of Canada are gaining by the arrangement.

I should like to mention something which perhaps was overlooked in the debate in the speech from the throne. On September 28 the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas) placed on Hansard a statement that had been made in Alberta by the Hon. N. E. Tanner, minister of lands and mines in the legislature, dealing with this important topic. I believe it is quite clear on this one point we are now discussing, where it states:

> . . . a petroleum exchange agreement may soon be signed with the United States allowing Alberta to export oil to that country. Under the agreement, the United States would buy oil at the lakehead; eastern United States producers in turn would sell oil to eastern Canada. Mr. Tanner said such an agreement would only be possible after the completion of a proposed pipe line from Regina to the great lakes.
> Mr. Tanner said that if such a policy were not agreed to by the United States, Alberta oil could only be shipped to eastern Canada at a greater cost.

That is reasonable and right. Surely we in Alberta, who are very much concerned about the markets for our oil, are going to watch every one of these possibilities, and we are going to try if we possibly can to see to it that priority is given to Canadian needs. But at the same time if we can see to it that oil is placed in the homes of Ontario and Quebec at cheaper prices by piping some of our oil from Alberta into the United States, then I think that is good economy.

I believe this point was not made sufficiently clear, and I inject these remarks into the debate only to try to clarify the point. Let me emphasize that we in Alberta are anxious to see that all the Canadian people, so far as is possible, do benefit from the discovery and the development of the oil industry in our province. We want to see to it however that, if we can assist the United States, which, as the minister has said, has certainly assisted us, then we should do so, while at the same time making every agreement we can to ensure that eastern Canada can benefit also by an exchange agreement.

Motion (Mr. Fournier, Hull) agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Supreme Court Act

SUPREME COURT ACT

VARIOUS AMENDMENTS—ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 2, to amend the Supreme Court Act—Mr. Garson—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: At the adjournment the committee was considering an amendment by the hon. member for Kamloops to section 3.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I have only one or two observations to make, and I make them in reply to the observations uttered this afternoon by the Minister of Justice.

I wish to take up first of all his assertion that those who had any part in supporting this amendment were prompted by a lack of confidence in the Supreme Court of Canada. I reject his assertion in its entirety. I would tell him, if I may, that by introducing red herrings of that kind I do not think he contributes anything constructive to the debate.

I should think he would appreciate that what is involved here is a point so important as to have commanded not only the attention of but also a resolution from the Canadian Bar Association. If the minister is correct in his statement, that those who introduced and supported the amendment now before the committee were prompted in doing so by a lack of confidence in the Supreme Court of Canada, then he must say the same thing about every member of the Canadian Bar Association, from the president down, including judges who in large numbers are members of that body, and who took precisely the same position as that embodied in the amendment before the committee tonight.

If he is consistent in making a pathetic assertion of that kind, it means also that every time a body such as parliament undertakes to change a law, as it has been interpreted by the courts, parliament is expressing a want of confidence in the courts. It is utter nonsense to make an assertion of that kind in the House of Commons—utter nonsense.

It means, too, that legislatures of the provinces are expressing a want of confidence in the courts when they introduce measures which are to be found in every province throughout Canada in the form of declaratory acts. Every time a new court is set up there has to be some definition of the law to be applied, and we know perfectly well that when the superior courts of all the provinces were set up declaratory acts were passed to define the body of law which those provincial courts should apply.

If the minister is right, then every time a provincial legislature enacted a law of that kind it was expressing want of confidence in the courts of the province. To state a proposition in that form is to expose its utter absurdity. All I have to say, in conclusion, concerning that example of empty demagoguery which was offered to the House of Commons this afternoon by the Minister of Justice, is to say that it is utterly absurd.

I want to deal with something that has some substance because I gather from the questions that have been asked by some hon. members that there is some difficulty about it. I refer to how far we may go in assuming that the principle of stare decisis will be acknowledged by the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to past decisions of the privy council unless some such legislation as is proposed by the present amendment is introduced into this bill. The hon. member for Yorkton asked a question this afternoon somewhat to this effect: If the Supreme Court of Canada gave effect to the principle of stare decisis with respect to past decisions of the privy council, what would be the need of this amendment? I point out to the hon. member that if we proceed on that basis we are assuming that the Supreme Court of Canada will apply the principle of stare decisis to past decisions of the privy council. I do not think we are entitled in a matter of such vast importance, not only for the established jurisprudence of this country but for the preservation of the rights of the provinces, to make that assumption.

When we are taking the far-reaching step involved in section 3 of this bill of giving the Supreme Court of Canada final and exclusive jurisdiction in connection with all litigation in Canada, we are not entitled to leave a matter of such importance in the realm of uncertainty. That is why it is incumbent upon this parliament in enacting this measure to see that safeguards which are absolutely vital and which may yet prove to be highly essential are provided.

The minister treated the matter as being rather a simple one in this regard. Having in mind the long course of litigation in the courts of this country and in the privy council on constitutional questions which seemed to many people at one time or another to have presented simple issues, I think any man would be displaying a great deal of temerity to say that any question concerning the respective fields of jurisdiction in this country and the method of determining such disputes can be regarded as a simple one. It certainly never has been in the past.

Finally, as to whether this amendment is necessary: This parliament has frequently enacted legislation when it was thought that the law was established in the same way as the measure before the house is being enacted to settle the law, but parliament at times was not prepared to take any chance as to the interpretation that the courts would put upon a situation. The legislatures of the provinces have done the same thing times without number. We have in mind instances where enactments have been passed, either by this parliament or by the legislatures, out of what we call in the courts an abundance of caution, just to be perfectly sure that nothing is being left to the doubtful outcome of litigation in the courts. Whatever may be the view of the majority in this chamber today, we have no right to assume in a matter of such vast and momentous importance to this country that this principle will be applied by the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to past decisions of the privy council after this measure has been enacted. Let us not leave it in the realm of doubt. We have it in our power to dispel any doubt, to put this matter beyond all possibility of challenge in the courts. Let us do so.

There is one subject that the minister has raised by way of challenge of the point that I have just made. He questions whether it is within the legislative competence of parliament to enact a measure of this kind because he says it is going to create substantive law and the power of parliament with respect to the Supreme Court of Canada does not extend to substantive law. That is an extraordinary proposition for anyone wearing the mantle of the Minister of Justice to offer in this chamber. Parliament is enacting substantive law all the time, law which is bound to come before the Supreme Court of Canada.

My submission is that this amendment does not go beyond the legislative competence of parliament. If there is any field where parliament might say to the Supreme Court of Canada that it shall be bound by the decisions of the privy council hitherto rendered, then certainly parliament within its own field of legislative competence is entitled to say that. If there is anything at all in the argument of the Minister of Justice in that respect it would mean that parliament in connection with those matters concerning which it possesses legislative competence is entitled to say what is said in this amendment to the Supreme Court of Canada. It would mean also that the legislatures of the provinces could say the same thing to the Supreme Court of Canada in connection with questions with regard to those subject matters that are confided by the British North America Act to the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces.

With respect to that point my submission to this house, and I think it is a fair one, is that so far as the legislative competence of this parliament extends, that is to say with regard to all those subject matters that are confided by the constitution of this country to parliament, as distinct from the legislatures of the provinces on the other hand, this measure is clearly within the legislative competence of this parliament.

I ask the house to consider the importance of this subject. If it is within our power to enact this measure, then surely it is within our power to say what the Supreme Court of Canada shall do with respect to applying the principle of stare decisis to that body of law laid down by the privy council.

Do not take my word for it. Apparently there is a difference of opinion among hon. members as to the necessity for it. In a situation of this kind, should we not have regard for the opinion expressed on this subject by the Canadian Bar Association? Should we not have regard for the statement by the president of the Canadian Bar Association which I read in the chamber this afternoon? That statement deals specifically with this very subject and was issued by him after the bill had been given second reading and this question had been raised in the house. There you have a clear expression of feeling by the Canadian Bar Association, which as I have said embraces judges as well as lawyers, that an amendment of this kind is needful and necessary and is within the legislative competence of parliament.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, I should like to associate myself with the Minister of Justice in the opinion that the adoption of this amendment would be an expression of lack of confidence in the supreme court and share the opprobrium that flows from the strong language used by the hon. member for Eglinton. My reason for saying so may appear to him to be demagogic, but I shall submit it as briefly as I can for the consideration of hon. members.

I think he and I agree that the rule of stare decisis would make it the duty of the supreme court to follow the decisions that have hitherto been rendered and have become the law of this country. The judges of the supreme court have pledged their oaths to apply the law. If we are to express doubt that they will do so, we express a lack of confidence in their respect for their oaths. That seems to me to be elementary. If it deserves the strong language the hon. member for Eglinton used a few moments ago, I wish to share the opprobrium with the Minister of Justice.

The second point I should like to make is with respect to this resolution of the Canadian Bar Association. The hon. member has stated and repeated, in spite of the fact that I read the terms of the resolution, that it does mean a request by the Canadian Bar Association to have that kind of amendment written into the bill. If that is so, then why did they pass a resolution—

Mr. Fulton: In the light of the later statement.

Mr. St. Laurent: In the light of the later statement by the president of the Canadian Bar Association? I submit with all respect that no one man, whatever be the position he occupies in the Canadian Bar Association, and I have occupied the office of president of that association—in my day—has the right to enlarge or modify the terms of the resolution adopted by that association. The argument of the hon. member is that because the resolution can have no other effect it must mean that the Canadian Bar Association wished it to be written into the bill. That is the best reason in the world for not putting this kind of amendment in the bill, because it is quite unnecessary, and there might be some honourable judges who, like the hon. member for Eglinton, would say: Parliament cannot have put that provision in there for no purpose whatever; let us find some use to which it can be put. That is what the hon. member does with the resolution of the Canadian Bar Association, and I think that is a most conclusive reason for not writing unnecessary provisions into statutes.

Mr. Pouliot: Listen to that.

Mr. St. Laurent: The third point has to do with the constitutional rights of this parliament to enact, on matters which normally are not within its jurisdiction, what would amount to substantive law. If this parliament has the right to say, otherwise than because it is the existing law, that the court shall do such and so, it would have a similar right to say that the court shall not do such and so; and to lay down a rule that the court would not be bound by the application of the stare decisis principle would be, I submit, something beyond the powers of this parliament.

If we have the right to deal with a subject matter we have the jurisdiction to deal with it as we see fit. If we see fit to say that stare decisis should apply, then it would be within our jurisdiction to say that it shall not apply, and in doing so we would certainly be attempting to enact substantive legislation in fields that might well be outside the jurisdiction of this parliament. I know that is not the position taken by the hon. member. He says that the rule of stare decisis is already a part of the law, and that by putting it in the bill we do not enact anything new. If we do not enact anything new then I submit it has no place in the bill, and that we should not write provisions into the bill, along the lines of the resolution of the Canadian Bar Association, that will have no effect whatsoever but be merely an empty affirmation of something which is quite as valid without it.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I rise with great hesitation because what I am going to say is somewhat in opposition to what has been said by the Prime Minister. I have before me the eloquent speech which he made on the 23rd of September, and in which he was dealing with the question of stare decisis, I think in terms a little less careful than those in which he dealt with it this evening. May I be permitted to read what he said. He quoted the decision of the Canadian Bar Association that the rule of stare decisis ought to continue to be applied with respect to past decisions of the court, as well as with respect to past decisions of the judicial committee. I should now like to quote what the Prime Minister said, which is to be found at page 197 of Hansard of September 23, 1949, and reads as follows:

> That is something with which I entirely agree.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): He went on to elaborate and to say:

> I think it is a part of the system of the administration of justice in British countries that the decisions are regarded as binding upon themselves and upon all courts of lower jurisdiction, until they are modified or set aside by legislative action. I think that forms part of the duties which a lawyer promoted to the bench promises on his oath to carry out.

Then he went on to say, as he said this evening, that he would not reflect upon the men who were appointed to the supreme court bench by suggesting for a moment that they would not carry out the duties of their oath of office. No one here is reflecting upon the ability and the integrity of the judges appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada, but what really incited us to put forward the amendment was the statement, which was quoted in the Ottawa Journal of June 2, of no less a person than the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. St. Laurent: Will the hon. member permit a question? Was he here when I explained that situation this afternoon?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, I was present and I listened very carefully to what the Prime Minister said. I studied as much as I could about the decision because I greatly regretted, when I heard of the case in which the chief justice was reported as having made that extraordinary statement, that I could not find the case. I hunted through the library of parliament and it is not available. There is a report of the Quebec case in the constituency of Beauce, the Independent member for which is present, and I found a picture of the Prime Minister eating ice cream at that place.

Mr. St. Laurent: In the law books? I should like to have the reference to that interesting volume of the law reports.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is not in the law books, but it happened that on the 2nd of June, when this pronouncement was made by the chief justice of the supreme court, the Prime Minister was campaigning in the place where the defendant, who was appealing to the Supreme Court of Canada, had been originally arrested and tried. It was in the course of my investigation that I came across interesting things that were said during the campaign in Quebec, some of which would not bear repetition in the house.

This afternoon, when the Prime Minister was giving an explanation of the statement of the chief justice he said that he had had an interview with the chief justice. Of course nobody can question what the chief justice said because there is no report except a newspaper report. There is no official report at the present time, and I doubt if there is any official report to come. The Prime Minister referred to the case in re Storgoff. I took the trouble to go and look it up. I am sure that the Prime Minister did not have the time to read it because it takes about 75 pages of the Supreme Court Reports. I have not had time to read it all, but I have looked up page 538 where, as the Prime Minister said, the chief justice gave a pronouncement four years previously in similar language to that which he used in the more recent case. Incidentally, I might say the Storgoff case was that of a person who was arrested for appearing nude in public in British Columbia. He was convicted on summary conviction and sentenced to three years' imprisonment. Somebody applied to Judge Coady for habeas corpus, and the prisoner was released from jail. The attorney general appealed against that decision to the Supreme Court of British Columbia and the prisoner was rearrested. Then an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of Canada, and I believe the decision was that he could not be rearrested. That is what it was about.

Before I read the extract from the judgment to which the Prime Minister referred I should like to say for the benefit of those who are not lawyers, and who may be listening to me, that the privy council at the present time is the highest court of appeal in the British commonwealth, and its decisions are binding upon judges of Canada in civil matters but not in criminal matters, because that was removed from its jurisdiction some years ago, as this judgment says. That is the point; they are not binding in criminal matters. Here is what Chief Justice Rinfret said in this case in re Storgoff, in 1945:

> Moreover, the question now before our court may not be discussed from the viewpoint of the English constitutional law. In this country we have to apply the British North America Act and the Criminal Code, two statutes which, of course, do not apply in England and do not call for interpretation and application in the English courts. In addition to that, the Supreme Court of Canada is now the court of last resort in criminal matters; and although, of course, former decisions of the privy council—> —or decisions of the House of Lords, in criminal causes or matters, are entitled to the greatest weight, it can no longer be said, as was affirmed by Viscount Dunedin, delivering the judgment of their lordships in Robins v. National Trust Company Limited at page 519, that the House of Lords, being—

This is what the right hon. gentleman read this afternoon.

> "the supreme tribunal to settle English law . . . the colonial court, which is bound by English law, is bound to follow it."

It can no longer be said that the Supreme Court of Canada is bound to follow a decision of the House of Lords.

Mr. Lesage: It never has been.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If therefore it could be said in 1945 that after the abolition of criminal appeals to the privy council the Supreme Court of Canada was not bound to follow decisions of the House of Lords, it may still be said that it is not bound to follow decisions of the privy council.

Mr. Cannon: If I may ask my hon. friend a question, has he looked up the difference between the House of Lords and the privy council?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, I appreciate the difference between the House of Lords and the privy council; but taking the two things together, the statement by the chief justice which has been quoted and the manner in which this question has been dealt with in the Storgoff case, is it beyond the realm of imagination that in future the judgments of the privy council will be followed less than they have been in the past?

During the course of this debate we have heard remarks from several hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house which would indicate that if they had any say in what should be done by the supreme court, that court should not feel itself bound by any decisions given by the privy council in the past. The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet asked whether the supreme court should be bound by decisions concerning civil law. The implication of his remarks, as I gathered it, was that he did not think it should. Then we had the hon. and humorous gentleman from Temiscouata giving us the illustration of Gulliver being bound by the Lilliputians; and I suppose we were the Lilliputians binding the supreme court.

Mr. Pouliot: Not at all, if the hon. member will excuse me. The Lilliputians were the judgments of the privy council binding the supreme court judges.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I think the hon. gentleman really meant that we were the Lilliputians binding the supreme court to follow the decisions of the privy council. Is it not a fact, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member was ridiculing the idea that the supreme court should be bound by any decisions which had been given by the privy council?

Mr. Pouliot: Surely.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am glad to have the hon. gentleman's admission; and I wonder if that represents the opinion of other hon. members opposite. Even the hon. gentleman who I understand has proposed an amendment has not answered that.

We feel, Mr. Chairman, that it is no reflection upon either the integrity or the ability of the members of the supreme court to have this provision inserted in the act, since the right hon. Prime Minister has said that he entirely agrees with the resolution put forward by the bar association. I know he would not wish to cast any reflection or to even suggest that any reflection might be cast upon those gentlemen who will be required to interpret the laws of this country; but if it was no reflection upon the judges of the courts of British Columbia to have a provision inserted in the laws of that province that they should be bound by the law as it was prior to the date mentioned by the mover of this amendment, then I do not see why the members of the supreme court should feel injured or hurt in any way if a similar provision is inserted in the bill now before the committee.

Before I sit down I should like to say that the prestige of the right hon. gentleman whom I have been criticizing is extremely great. His reputation as a lawyer is well known. He ranks with the foremost in the legal profession throughout Canada. He has held the highest position in the gift of that profession, president of the bar association. Because he held that high position I suggest that it should be he who would give us an example of the respect that should be shown to so great and illustrious a body as the bar association, by adopting their recommendations in this respect.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, this subject is getting pretty threadbare, but in view of the numerous references—not all of them completely accurate—that have been made to the resolution of the Canadian Bar Association, I think it might not be amiss to read the exact text of that resolution, in order that it might speak for itself. I read the relevant parts:

> Be it resolved that the Canadian Bar Association, without expressing any view as to the wisdom or otherwise of the proposed abolition, is of the opinion . . .
> (ii) If, as and when the appeal should be abolished, it is the opinion of this association, as at present advised . . .

Then I go down to the part dealing with this rule of stare decisis:

> (g) that the rule of stare decisis ought to continue to be applied with respect to past decisions of the court, as well as with respect to past decisions of the judicial committee.

There is not a syllable in any part of that resolution which recommends that parliament should pass a law instructing the Supreme Court of Canada to apply the rule of stare decisis.

This is the text with which the right hon. Prime Minister is in agreement, and with which I think we are all in agreement. But using this text as a basis, and not making too accurate reference to it, our hon. friends of the opposition come along and say this is a foundation for asking that an amendment be passed by which this body will instruct the Supreme Court of Canada to apply the rule of stare decisis. In doing this I think they have been making quite improper references to and quite an improper use of the resolution of the bar association.

Before I take my seat, I should like to deal with one other quite fallacious analogy which has been drawn in connection with this matter and to which reference has been made by almost every opposition speaker participating in this debate. It has been suggested by them that because the statutes of Manitoba and British Columbia contain a provision making a whole body of law available for the use of the citizens of that province as of a certain date, the same procedure is being and should be followed in the amendment now before us. In the case of Manitoba, the date set was the date when we entered confederation. At that time, we were a very small community and instead of going through the long and stupid process of gradually building up a body of law of our own, we very intelligently availed ourselves of the whole body of English law as it stood on July 15, 1870.

When a reference is put in a provincial statute or even in a dominion statute to the appropriation of a body of laws for the purpose of some new province which is created, there is no analogy, Mr. Chairman, between that act and what is proposed here. It is not right to say that whenever provinces or the dominion have established a court, a provision is enacted defining the laws that are to be applied. True there are such declaratory provisions in the statutes of British Columbia and in the statutes of Manitoba, but if my hon. friend will prosecute his research in this matter a little further, he will see that they have their counterparts in a statute of the imperial parliament, a constitutional enactment which created that province and provided a body of laws with which it could carry on. The hon. member need not confine himself to British Columbia. The same thing can be seen in the terms of union with Newfoundland, and in the Saskatchewan and Alberta acts. These acts all contain such provisions.

Such a constitutional provision is one which this parliament or the provincial legislature, in themselves, have not the jurisdiction to enact, even though the provisions may be repeated in their own statutes. As I have said, it is true that such provisions can be found in provincial and federal statutes, but it is the British North America Act itself or some amendment of the British North America Act which introduces effectively a body of law into the new province. To say that because that has been done with regard to the various provinces that have entered into confederation is something that justifies the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), and that there is some proper analogy between the two cases, is in my view wholly incorrect.

Mr. Carroll: May I make one observation? A great deal has been said about the resolution that was passed by the bar association at its last annual meeting. I want to say that, so far as section (g) is concerned, in which it says the rule of stare decisis ought to continue to be applied with respect to past decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada, a great deal of effrontery was shown by the committee of that organization in passing this resolution. It may not have been with the intention of throwing any doubt on the integrity of the Supreme Court of Canada, but I say I believe the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada know as much as the bar society of this country about their rights in keeping the theory of stare decisis intact.

To place this amendment on the statute books of this country might, in my opinion, interfere somewhat with the rule itself. There are two ways of getting clear of stare decisis at any time in the laws of any country. One way is by overruling the laws in existence, and that has been done innumerable times not only by the House of Lords but by the privy council of the United Kingdom. Suppose, for example, the principles of law as enunciated by the House of Lords and the privy council many years ago were changed by the very courts who followed this rule of stare decisis. Suppose, for example, that three days or ten days after this act becomes effective, the privy council should overrule some of the judgments it has made with regard to the commonwealth. Would we be in a position to change our minds if this amendment became effective? I think not.

There is another method of changing the rule of stare decisis which has been followed in this country for years. The common law of England was brought over to this country and it was stare decisis; but the legislatures of this country, especially the three original provinces, followed the method of changing the rule of stare decisis by enacting certain pieces of statute law. The rule of stare decisis is not such a sacred thing that the privy council, the House of Lords or our own Supreme Court of Canada can never overrule a decision.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: It is eleven o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: I shall have to have the unanimous consent of the house before I put the question. Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: It is eleven o'clock.

Mr. St. Laurent: If there is any objection from any hon. member, I think the chairman should recognize that it is eleven o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: That would be the rule of stare decisis.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes; that would be the rule and I think it should be followed whenever any hon. member objects to consent being given.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow is private members' day.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, October 5, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

TARIFFS AND TRADE

REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS AT ANNECY, FRANCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief statement on the Annecy tariff negotiations. As hon. members already know, Canada, along with thirty-two other countries took part in those negotiations which were conducted at Annecy, France, between April and August of this year.

The purpose of the conference was to permit a number of additional countries to enter into tariff negotiations with a view to joining the general agreement on tariffs and trade. As a result some 140 two-sided tariff negotiations were successfully concluded. Hon. members know that these negotiations go on between the principal importer and the principal supplier of a given commodity, and the arrangement arrived at between them then is affected by the most-favoured-nation clause in the various tariffs and is of benefit to all the other members of the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

The following ten countries have as a result completed the primary condition of membership in the general agreement: Denmark, the Dominican republic, Finland, Greece, Haiti, Italy, Liberia, Nicaragua, Sweden and Uruguay.

Procedures have been established for the reciprocal entering into force of the tariff concessions provisionally agreed to at Annecy. Under these procedures no concessions need be applied before January 1, 1950. It is expected that all countries concerned will have put their tariff concessions into force by the end of May.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) informed the house on September 16 that the results of the negotiations would probably be made public over this coming week end. The time has now been decided by the countries concerned. The results of the Annecy tariff negotiations will be made public by the United Nations and in the capitals of all countries concerned at an internationally agreed time corresponding to 8.30 p.m., eastern daylight saving time, next Sunday night.

An extensive press release will be issued in Ottawa at that time. Members of the house and of the Senate will be supplied at the earliest possible moment with a copy of the full text of the release, which will run to some twenty pages.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PAYMENTS TO PRODUCERS IN CHURCHILL AREA

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

He said: This bill is the same as Bill No. 17 of last session. The only change made by the bill is to insert the words "or Churchill" in the appropriate place in two sections of the act, as underlined. The effect of the change will be to permit producers in the area accessible to the port of Churchill to take advantage of the cheaper freight rates to Churchill, wherever such cheaper rates apply.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—STEAM AND DIESEL LOCOMOTIVES—COST OF OPERATION

Mr. Isnor:

1. What is the cost per mile to operate Canadian National Railways steam locomotives of the following types (a) 6500; (b) 6000; (c) 7000?
2. What is the itemized cost per mile of each of the above types of locomotive?
3. Are separate records kept of the per-mile costs in the different railway regions?
4. If so, what is the cost per mile of the operation of each of the above-mentioned types of locomotive in each region?
5. How many miles did each of the mentioned types of locomotive travel in 1948?
6. What would have been the cost in 1948 had diesel locomotives been used?

Mr. Chevrier: I understand the hon. member has been given certain information in connection with this question. Perhaps he would consider that sufficient, under the circumstances.

Mr. Isnor: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Mr. Graydon: When this question was put on the order paper it became a matter of public interest. I should like to know what answer the minister gave to the hon. member for Halifax, because this is a public rather than a private matter.

Mr. Chevrier: There are two reasons which militate against the answering of this question. First, Canadian National Railways cannot furnish the information, because their accounting system is that approved by the interstate commerce commission for similar work, and to give the information asked for would not be possible without change of accounting. They are able, however, to give an answer to one part of the question provided that additional information is given by the hon. member.

The other reason is that the Canadian National Railways have taken the position, and the government has upheld them, that these are questions which should normally be asked in the committee on railways and shipping. I pointed this out to the hon. gentleman and told him that if an answer to part 1 of the question would be of any use to him, and he could give the additional information required, it could be given. He said it would, and under the circumstances I asked that the question be dropped.

SUTHERLAND, SASK., FORESTRY FARM

Mr. Knight:

1. How many men are employed at the forestry farm near Sutherland, Saskatchewan?
2. What are the categories of work at which they are employed?
3. Are they employed by the day, weekly, monthly or annually?
4. What are they paid in the various categories?
5. Are these payments in addition to board or do the men board themselves?
6. What is the duration of holidays granted with pay to (a) annual workers; (b) other workers?
7. Is any work carried on on Sunday?
8. Is payment made for such work? If so, at what rate?

Mr. McCubbin:

Unclassified employees

1. 22.

2. Stableman (1); teamster (1); construction foreman (1); labourers (19).

3. 9 employed year-round; 13 employed seasonally.

4. Stableman, 55 cents per hour; teamster, 55 cents per hour. Construction foreman, $1.47 per hour; 19 labourers—18 at 55 cents per hour; 1 at 50 cents per hour.

5. Board themselves.

6. (a) Six days per year. (b) After six months service, one-half day for each completed month of service.

7. 1 stableman; 4 labourers.

8. Yes, at regular rate.

*FEDERAL GRANT FOR MUSEUMS

Mr. Thatcher:

Is there any federal grant available to cities for the establishment or maintenance of museums?

Mr. Sinclair: No.

[Mr. Graydon.]

MONTREAL-NEW YORK AIR SERVICE—COLONIAL AIR LINES

Mr. Thatcher:

1. What agreement has Colonial Air Lines with Canadian authorities to carry on an air service between Montreal and New York?
2. Is there any time limit on such agreement?
3. Is there a cancellation clause in this agreement?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. Colonial Air Lines Inc. has no agreement with the Canadian authorities to carry on an air service between Montreal and New York.

By agreement for civil air transport between Canada and the United States of America, effective February 19, 1945, it was agreed, inter alia, that the air line designated by the government of the United States might operate on the route Montreal-New York. Colonial Air Lines Inc. was subsequently designated to operate this service, and a licence was duly issued on April 6, 1946, by the air transport board in accordance with the provisions of the agreement.

By air transport agreement between Canada and the United States of America effective June 4, 1949, it was agreed, inter alia, that "existing rights and privileges relating to air transport service which may have been granted previously by either of the contracting parties to an air line of another contracting party shall continue in force in accordance with the terms under which such rights and privileges were granted."

2. The licence issued by the air transport board remains in effect until terminated by the termination or amendment of the agreement. There is no other time limit in the licence and no time limit in the air transport agreement.

3. There is a cancellation clause in the air transport agreement.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE—PURCHASE OF UNITED STATES COAL

Mr. Coldwell:

1. By what method does the coal trade in Canada secure United States dollars for the purchase of American coal?
2. Does the foreign exchange control board assist directly or indirectly in the operation of a system of exchange futures by which coal importers can cover their commitments for future deliveries?

Mr. Sinclair:

1. An importer of coal from the United States obtains United States dollars to pay his supplier by applying to his own bank acting as an authorized dealer under the Foreign Exchange Control Act.

2. A coal importer—in the same manner as any other importer—can enter into a contract with his bank for the purchase of United States dollars for future delivery up to ninety days and thereby obtain protection against a change in exchange rates where he has entered into a firm commitment for the purchase from a supplier in the United States of goods imported or to be imported into Canada on terms providing for delivery and payment not later than the maturity of his forward exchange contract. This facility is available only to cover an over-all exchange risk to which an importer would otherwise be exposed.

NATIONAL PARKS—NEW BRUNSWICK—GOLF COURSE

Mr. Brooks:

1. What is the estimated cost of laying out and constructing a golf course in the New Brunswick national park?
2. How much of the course has been completed, and what is the cost to date?

Mr. Maybank:

1. The estimated cost of laying out the golf course is $99,100.

2. Golf course completed. Total cost to August 31, 1949, $90,247.41.

SUSSEX, N.B., POST OFFICE—REPAIRS TO BUILDING

Mr. Brooks:

1. What was the amount of the original contract for repairs to the Sussex post office, Sussex, New Brunswick?
2. Has there been any further cost for extra work?
3. If so, what is the cost to date?
4. Is the work now completed and, if not, how much would it cost to complete?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. $36,600.

2. Yes.

3. Additional work authorized, $11,582.

4. No, work is still in progress. To complete will cost $36,000, the amount of the original contract, plus $11,582 for extra work.

CANADA-WEST INDIES STEAMSHIP SERVICE—CARGOES AND TONNAGE

Mr. Hatfield:

1. Are there any Canadian National steamships plying between Saint John and Halifax and the islands of the British West Indies in connection with the Canada-West Indies treaty?
2. If so, how many ships are in the above service?
3. What are the sailing dates?
4. What does the cargo consist of from Canada to the British West Indies, and what does the return cargo consist of?
5. What is the monthly tonnage on both going and returning cargoes from Canada to the British West Indies, to date, in 1949?

Mr. Chevrier: Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Yes.

2. Five.

3. September 28, October 18, October 19, October 29, November 8, November 20 and November 28.

4. Exports from Canada: Apples, autos and parts, butter, canned goods, cheese, cereals, cement, feed, fish, flour, hay and straw, liquors, lumber, oats, oil meal, provisions, potatoes, rubber goods, shooks and staves, vegetables, meat, livestock, general.

Imports into Canada: Arrowroot, cocoa, coffee, coconuts, citrus fruits and juices, other agricultural products, molasses, tomatoes, other vegetables, liquor, spices, sugar, chicle, general.

NATIONAL PARKS—NEW BRUNSWICK—DEVELOPMENT AND HIGHWAY CONNECTIONS

Mr. Brooks:

1. What is the estimated cost of developing the New Brunswick national park?
2. How much has been spent to date?
3. Will the government assist in the building of a highway from Saint John, New Brunswick, to the national park?

Mr. Maybank:

1. Plans will be made in connection with development as the necessity becomes apparent. Estimates for 1950-51 not yet considered—see answer to No. 2.

2. Expenditure to August 31, 1949, $839,411.60.

3. This is a matter of government policy. No assistance has been given to provinces in recent years toward the costs of improving provincial highways leading to national parks.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

NAVAL SERVICE—ESQUIMALT—COAL CONTRACT

Mr. Pearkes:

1. What quantities of coal, stoker or lump, were involved in the Esquimalt naval contract calling for the supply of coal for the current year for all naval establishments at Esquimalt, British Columbia, including H.M.C. Dockyard, H.M.C.S. Naden, and the service college at Royal Roads and other establishments?

2. Were tenders called? If so, to whom were they awarded?

3. Were these contracts classified as retail or wholesale business?

4. Were they called for on a b.t.u. basis?

5. What was the price paid per ton or million b.t.u.?

Mr. Blanchette: Return tabled.

HIGHWAYS—ONTARIO—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. Nixon:

1. Did the federal government, during the years 1935 to 1940, spend money on, or contribute money for construction of any portions of Ontario provincial highway No. 17 between Sudbury and Sault Ste. Marie, and between Sault Ste. Marie and Montreal river, to the north of Sault Ste. Marie?

2. If so, what amount was contributed?

3. Under what authority was such money paid?

4. Was there an agreement between the province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada with regard to such expenditure?

5. Did the Ontario government, during the years 1934 to 1940, intimate to the federal government that it had designated as the trans-Canada highway, the continuation of the portion of the highway No. 17 between North Bay and Port Arthur, via Sault Ste. Marie?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

UNION OF NEWFOUNDLAND WITH CANADA

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

For a copy of all correspondence, minutes of proceedings and other documents between January 1, 1945 and April 1, 1949, relative to the union of Newfoundland with Canada.

Mr. St. Laurent: From time to time the government has tabled in this house official documents relating to the negotiations leading to the entry of Newfoundland into confederation. The last document tabled on February 7, 1949, was a white paper entitled, "Reports and documents relating to the negotiations for the union of Newfoundland with Canada; conference series, 1948, No. 2, Department of External Affairs". That white paper contained, in addition to the official correspondence and other documents, the terms of union and the statements on questions raised by the Newfoundland delegation as well as summaries of the 1947 and 1948 proceedings. There are no other documents of any significance except those of a class which have always been treated as privileged.

Perhaps under these circumstances the hon. member would secure a copy of this white paper, and if there is anything special that he wants which is not in the white paper he might let us know or make another motion for its production.

Mr. Graydon: If the suggestion which the Prime Minister has just made is concurred in by the hon. member who made the motion, may it be understood that he can put another similar motion on the order paper without prejudice to his rights?

Mr. St. Laurent: Without prejudice to his rights to ask for the production of any specific document. To the best of my knowledge the documents that have not been produced are only such documents as have always been treated as privileged. If there is any special document that the hon. member wishes to ask for, his rights will not be prejudiced by the fact that this motion has been dropped.

Motion dropped.

MINES AND RESOURCES

PROPOSED FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO PROSPECTORS

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of giving assistance to prospectors after they have made a find, by sending a geologist in at the request of the prospector, and, if a favourable report is made, diamond drill the property, and, if property develops, the government take such costs out of the production of the property.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I bring this resolution before the house and the government because I consider the prospector to be the forgotten and neglected man. The prospector has always been a pioneer, one who has served his country by striving to locate and develop our great mineral deposits.

It will be noticed that there are two types of prospector. One is the prospector paid by the mining corporations. This man does not run the same risk as the independent prospector, the man who packs his own kit to go out and endeavour to locate mineral deposits which add to our national wealth. The resolution asks that a geologist be sent in at the request of the prospector.

Some might ask: Who are these prospectors anyway? Sometimes they are university graduates who have specialized in geology and mineralogy. I tramped the country west of Fort William with one of these men. I found he had a good pair of legs, a stomach that could stand anything, a pair of shoulders that could carry a good load, and a mind second to none in Canada. He was a brilliant and well-trained man.

It will be seen that this resolution calls for a combination of private enterprise and government aid. It is in keeping with my own way of thinking, because I believe in Canada we have to have both. Take the story of the prospector. When the season opens he gets the fever and away he goes. When he has made his find, and sent in his samples, and the assay has come back from the government department, he finds that he has not enough money to develop his mine, and it has to remain undeveloped. Perhaps he has to pay taxes on the property for years before it is developed. It is no advantage to him that there are indications of the presence of gold, silver, copper or a combination of minerals. We believe that the government should, by supplying a geologist, come to the aid of the men who carry on this work so faithfully. If the geologist finds something that is worthy of development, then the mine should be drilled by the federal government and the government should take its expenses out of future production.

I do not forget the years of depression at the head of the lakes, which in some small way were responsible for my entering the House of Commons. We could not get men jobs at twenty-five cents an hour for veterans, but we were able to send men to Geraldton, Beardmore, Longlac, and farther west to another mine, where they received good wages. In gratitude for the services rendered to the people at the head of the lakes by the operators of those mines, I sponsor the resolution, and I believe that its adoption would be of great benefit to Canada as a whole. North and west of the Fort William district, in an area perhaps eighty miles long and fifty miles wide, we have all kinds of minerals. Men have prospected there and have found much that is of commercial value, but they cannot develop the mines because they have not the money. They are unwilling to sell out for a trifle to a big mining corporation. They think they should have their share.

I have tried to obtain the use of several drills on easy terms in order to help some of these men, but I have failed even in that. I say to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Gibson), through his parliamentary assistant (Mr. Maybank), that drills should be made available to these men who make finds. If the government has not enough money to supply geologists, then it should be prepared to lend drills to these men to drill their properties and develop them. I am convinced that west of Fort William there is a mining district that will be second to none in Canada.

Prospecting today is not what it used to be. The prospector has many difficulties. He has to be a wise man. He must know how to use his magnifying glass. I remember being fooled by what is called fool's gold; it was a combination of iron and sulphur. You would pick it up and say, "Why, I have found gold!", and then you would get a big head. When it was analysed it was found to be nothing but brass.

Assistance to Prospectors

The prospector has many difficulties that the ordinary individual does not know anything about. I think he should receive some encouragement. Where shall we go to get it? To the provincial government? The government of Ontario is most sympathetic towards our mining interests and prospectors. Where should we go? Certainly to the dominion government. They have the money, and they will get their money back. If not, the geologists will have made a mistake.

I could talk for an hour on this question, but I want to allow other members an opportunity to say something. The resolution will be seconded by the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Gourd).

(Translation):

Mr. David Gourd (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to second the resolution moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), to the effect that the government should consider the advisability of giving assistance to prospectors, after they have made an actual find, by sending in a geologist, and if the latter considers that the find is important, of diamond drilling the property, recouping the costs out of its production. It should not be overlooked, Mr. Speaker, that prospectors are generally men with little money, since most of them devote their time and energy to the search for minerals.

I am glad to tender my congratulations to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Gibson) who has kindly agreed to look over the mining districts. He is now visiting Rouyn, Noranda, Malartic and Val d'Or, and he may go as far as Normetal, in my constituency, in order to ascertain on the spot the importance of the companies and find out the number of people they employ. He will note that the farmers and settlers of my constituency of Chapleau and of the neighbouring constituencies of Villeneuve and Pontiac sell their products on the market provided by these companies and their employees.

With the dollar devaluation, which has increased by $3.50 an ounce the price of gold, and provided the former subsidy is maintained, I am sure that a considerable development will occur in northwestern Quebec. This would justify the extension of the railway line from Barraute to Kiask falls and toward Bachelor lake and Chibougamau, where there is a quite extensive mineralized area, and important companies are in operation. Moreover, it should not be forgotten that gold mining concerns the whole country, as it allows us to obtain much-needed United States dollars.

Assistance to Prospectors

(Text):

Mr. G. S. White (Hastings-Peterborough): I wish to speak briefly on the motion, and to deal particularly with the search for uranium ore. I do not know the exact number of producing uranium mines there are in the world today, but I doubt whether it exceeds four. Neither do I know the tonnage produced, but it is relatively small.

Canada has one such producing mine at Eldorado. While from the information available we believe there is a large deposit of this ore at Eldorado, the expense of operation is very high owing to the fact that all transportation must be either by plane, or, during the summer months, by water. Wages are high, but only in proportion to the cost of living at Eldorado. There is a constant turnover in labour because of the climate and the location of the mine a short distance from the Arctic circle.

As I have said, at the present time Canada has one producing uranium mine. Nevertheless there is every reason to believe that Canada has rich potentials in the Pre-Cambrian shield, which is the most important host rock for pitchblende. With a determined effort and proper incentive, Canada should become a leader in uranium production. Uranium is and will be found to be a scarce mineral. Our security as a nation, and the security of the western countries, depends on Canada and the western countries obtaining a far greater supply of this mineral than is produced at present.

The recent announcement in this house in reference to the atomic bomb explosion in Russia has made us more conscious of the source of atomic energy that lies buried in Canada. In May of this year the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) addressed the graduating class of engineers at McGill university, and I quote from a news report of his address:

> A Canadian cabinet minister Friday night spelled out a field of development in the future that is "almost beyond imagination."
> That field, Trade Minister Howe told engineering graduates of McGill university, is in atomic energy over which "military implications" have thrown a "temporary cloud of secrecy."
> While "the international situation may delay progress temporarily, the day will surely come," he said "when the peaceful use and application of this new and fantastically large source of energy from atoms will certainly open up a new and potentially great field of engineering, technology, industry and opportunity."
> Canada is in the "front line of this the most exciting scientific venture of all times," Mr. Howe said in an address prepared for delivery.

I think all hon. members will agree with that statement; but I would ask the minister if he is satisfied that at the present time the government is doing all that can be done to assist in the discovery of uranium ore. At page 11 of the third annual report of the atomic energy control board for 1948-49 I find these two paragraphs under the heading "Prospecting and mining":

> The establishment by the government of a guaranteed minimum price of $2.75 per pound of contained uranium oxide (U_3O_8) in acceptable ores or concentrates was announced in March, 1948 . . .
> The Department of Mines and Resources offered to make, without charge, radioactivity tests on samples sent in by prospectors and, where the results of these tests warranted, to make further chemical and other tests and thorium determinations. The response taxed the facilities of the department to the utmost, more than 3,000 samples having been dealt with since April, 1948.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that the price set by the government is $2.75 per pound for contained uranium oxide in acceptable ore concentrates. I would point out that the price paid by the government of the United States is $3.50 per pound; and with the recent devaluation of the Canadian dollar our government will receive $3.85 for each pound sold to the United States government, for which the government of Canada will pay only $2.75.

In the second paragraph I read it is stated that the facilities of the Department of Mines and Resources were taxed to the utmost to conduct these tests. I would suggest to the Minister of Mines and Resources that the facilities of his department are totally inadequate to help uranium producers. I believe the department needs many more expert mineralogists and much more technical equipment to handle the ever-increasing volume of work sent in from the uranium fields. There are often long delays; I know of some cases in which months have elapsed before producers have received a full and final analysis of their samples.

I suggest also to the minister that his department is not sufficiently active in promoting field work in connection with the search for uranium ore. I believe it would be of great benefit to prospectors and miners if officials of his department could make examinations of new properties and report thereon. A recent press dispatch announced that the government of the United States will pay a prize of $10,000 for new discoveries of uranium ore. No prize of any kind has been offered by the Canadian government for new finds, nor has this government provided capital to bring new uranium mines into production. While I firmly believe in the system of free enterprise, in view of the fact that our very destiny may hang on the discovery and development of uranium ore, and in view of the time element involved, I believe the government should provide the necessary funds.

If something of this kind is not done, large United States mining companies may take over and control our uranium mines. Under the present regulations, all uranium ore produced in this country must be sold to and controlled by the Canadian government, but the picture might become very different if our uranium mines should be owned and controlled by United States interests. In such case any government here certainly would be under great pressure from the United States owners. Let us suppose that the du Pont interests obtained control of important Canadian uranium mines. Does any hon. member honestly believe that under present conditions, with our whole economy, our defence plans, in fact every phase of our national life, bound up with United States policy, any Canadian government would not be subjected to the most extreme pressure from United States owners of such mines?

The county of Hastings, which forms part of the riding I have the honour to represent, has shown every promise of becoming a large uranium ore producer. I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce is aware of the assay results of the samples of uranium ore from that county. If those properties prove out as the samples would indicate, Hastings county will be in the forefront of uranium ore production. The deposits which have been located so far are close to railway and hydro facilities, and also to provincial highways. In every respect the cost of production would be much less than the cost at Eldorado.

I would point out to hon. members that a deposit of uranium ore is very different from a deposit of iron, gold, silver, copper or any other mineral. The initial problems are of great technical complexity. In my opinion to locate a deposit of uranium ore is from ten to twenty times more difficult than to locate a deposit of gold. I hardly need to emphasize the great need for laboratories, technical staff and financial assistance in the search for and production of this strategic mineral, nor do I need to point out that the country with the most uranium will be in a position of unparalleled strength.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I offer the following suggestions to the government in connection with their policy concerning uranium production in Canada:

1. That the government pay $5 per pound for uranium oxide.

2. That the government construct and operate a large laboratory to assist miners and producers.

3. That the government provide a field corps of geologists and mineralogists to visit and advise on all mines and prospects.

4. That the government offer a prize at least equal to the $10,000 offered by the United States government to every individual who discovers a deposit that develops into a commercial mine.

5. That, where necessary, the government provide capital to bring mines into early production.

6. That the committee on atomic energy, promised by the Minister of Trade and Commerce a few days ago, be set up as soon as possible.

Mr. J. A. Simmons (Yukon-Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favour of this resolution, and take great pleasure in supporting it. As hon. members probably are aware, mining is the principal industry in the constituency I have the honour to represent, and I suggest that this resolution be enlarged to cover financial assistance to qualified prospectors, to encourage them to go into the hills and seek new prospects.

It is well to remember that in the Yukon and Northwest Territories large sums of money must be spent on aircraft or other means of transportation in order to get into the field in the first place. It is not like many other places in Canada where the field to be prospected often lies near a railway or other means of transportation. In the north the season is short. Grubstakes are costly and transportation is expensive. What would we have in our great northland today if it were not for our prospectors? We owe a great debt of gratitude to those courageous and adventurous men who risk their lives and suffer many hardships in order to find new mineral wealth which adds so much to the prosperity of Canada.

It is a costly undertaking for the individual prospector. Unless some financial assistance is provided, I am afraid that the numbers in this field of endeavour will gradually diminish. I should like to see some plan worked out under which a bona fide prospector in the north would receive a clear grant of at least $500 per season. This would be a subsidy to the prospector, and not repayable.

Mr. J. G. L. Langlois (Gaspe): I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, to add a few words in support of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). Some years ago a rumour was brought to my attention, to the effect that the federal government was planning an appropriation of funds to encourage the discovery and development of new oil fields in Canada. The proposal appeared to be a timely one, and must have been connected with the fact that the possibility of developing new oil fields in Canada was beginning to impress the government. This growing conviction was not without foundation. Paleogeographical maps or the historical geography of Canada would show that Canada's producing potentialities have been overlooked for too long a period.

Assistance to Prospectors

Whilst the potentialities of the west and northwest are being particularly stressed as a result of new discoveries in the Leduc area, the opportunities for development in other areas of Canada have been the subject of favourable comment by reputed geologists. In the past few years prospectors in my riding forwarded to me numerous requests for government financial assistance in diamond drilling. I believe hon. members of the house will be interested in learning some facts which were brought to my attention by one company in particular at that time. A company did some drilling in 1939 in the peninsula of Gaspe, but failed to obtain production. The official report of the department of mines of the province of Quebec for the year 1940 merely stated that horizons, which in other areas were generally characterized as petroliferous, had not been reached, and that the well stopped short of two possible producing horizons some one or two thousand feet below the depth obtained by this well. It must be admitted that this was a most inconclusive test.

Two more wells were started in 1942 and 1943, and a third one is now being drilled by two independent companies with whom the Imperial Oil Company of Canada is now associated. The first company to which I referred was formed in 1944, after obtaining a special licence from the department of mines of the province of Quebec covering 85,000 acres. This area had been summarily surveyed by the department of mines of that province. It showed promise of a geological formation favourable to the accumulation of oil in commercial quantities. Further exploratory work was done, after which the company was formed and drilling started. The area was given favourable recommendation in a report issued by the government in 1937.

In a report for another company in 1944, Dr. G. O. Sanderson, of Calgary, looked with extreme favour on the Gaspe peninsula. Russell V. Johnston, another consulting geologist of Calgary, was more specific in his opinion of the area under licence to this company. Messrs. Bates and Cornell, consulting geologists and petroleum engineers of Lafayette, Louisiana, the company's consulting geologists, are also deeply impressed by the possibilities of the Gaspe. They even went so far as to write an article, published in The Oil Weekly, in which it was stated that sooner or later Gaspe will be a producing oil field. It was this conviction that led the officers and chairman of this company to risk capital. Owing to the distance from sources of supply and inadequate communications from the town of Gaspe to the drilling site, the cost of exploration and drilling is far greater than would ordinarily be expected. The resources of an independent company such as this one are not to be compared with those of the major oil companies. Yet, it is well known that in the United States the greater number of new discoveries are made by independent companies. It is also well recognized in that country that the major oil companies lend their support to the independents and to the wildcatters because of their success in bringing in new fields at costs far below those usually incurred by the larger companies. The venture of this company in Gaspe has been particularly difficult because of the inadequate communications and the distance from sources of supply. Weather conditions have also been a factor. They have to battle snow from October until May. In addition to that, the general disrepute into which Gaspe fell in 1902 as the result of an adverse report in connection with drilling operations undertaken prior to that time made it extremely difficult to raise capital. The conclusions reached at that time were hasty, and in the light of later geological information there was no reason to look upon the Gaspe as an uninteresting possibility.

In a report issued by the department of natural resources at Ottawa in 1915 it was plainly stated there was no question that the operations carried out prior to 1902 has been badly managed. Yet the report published in 1902 created an incalculable amount of damage which it is almost impossible to overcome today. The discovery of an oil field in Gaspe would have tremendous economic repercussions in this country, particularly in eastern Canada. Practically all of our crude oil is imported from Venezuela, or from the gulf states, involving heavy transportation costs and the disbursement of greatly needed United States dollars. Crude oil from Gaspe not only would save United States dollars but would result in lower consumer costs and an adequate supply of oil and gasoline in the face of a critical shortage, which will not disappear for many months, possibly for several years.

In that same period I took this matter up with the former minister of mines and resources, and asked him if it was possible for his department to give assistance to these independent prospectors in my area. The minister informed me then that his department would not go any further than the encouragement already given to the development of new oil fields by the reduction or elimination of import duties on drilling machinery, and tax concessions. He assured me, however, that his department was ready to co-operate with any prospectors in my area and to lend any assistance which was authorized at the time by the government.

I am therefore pleased to give my hearty support to the resolution so ably introduced in this house this afternoon by the hon. member for Fort William, because in fact it supports the request I previously made to the former minister of mines and resources. For the sake of the future welfare of our mining activities in Canada I hope this house will give careful attention to this worth-while resolution.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I want to take a minute to congratulate you on your election as Speaker of this house. I feel sure that every representative here will get fair treatment and that your decisions will be based on equity and justice. I know that you will uphold the traditional dignity of your office in a manner comparable to that in which it has been upheld in any previous parliament since confederation.

The resolution before us is a timely one and well put. I think the government should take a hand in helping the prospectors and new or smaller mines; they should extend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act to new mines especially. In my own riding of Victoria, the eastern section of the county of Haliburton is one great area of mining property. Outcroppings of different kinds of minerals are to be found there, but greatest in extent is uranium. We all know that the government have been frantically seeking new finds of uranium. They spent many dollars in the far north country. In the eastern section of Haliburton county we have a mining area, with a railroad running through it, with hydroelectric power lines and a paved highway straight through it. Considerable prospecting and mining has been done in a small way. The Geiger counters register excitedly over great areas extending over thousands of acres. A few shafts have been sunk to a depth of four or five hundred feet, and some drifting has been done. Some diamond drilling has also been done, but not enough. The samples received from that area have all been of good quality, showing a high percentage of uranium.

If hon. members will cast their minds back to what they read in the press a couple of years ago, they may remember having read a notice to the effect that cores from some of the diamond drills had been stolen. I am not prepared to say where those cores went. However, the New York atomic energy commission gave a favourable report on the findings there. I understand that the dominion government some time ago sent up to that area a geologist, and probably also an engineer. The people up there used dynamite, tools and equipment to the extent of $800. Up until late last spring they had not received any report on the findings, after spending $800 under government supervision. That sort of thing is neither help nor co-operation.

In seeking uranium I think the government should make an effort in that part of the country to which I have referred, because there is no doubt in the minds of many geologists and engineers that the goods are there. But, as is known by hon. members, atomic energy and uranium are controlled by the government. I am satisfied that we can bring in United States capital to finance operations in that part of the country if the government will give us a free hand to do so. We need not only their help but their co-operation.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to this house, that a great deal can be done to assist in this matter. I am certainly in favour of the resolution.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): I should like to add a word of commendation of this resolution. As the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) has said, the prospector is almost the forgotten man. There is a way in which we can assist him without paying a direct subsidy, although, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River (Mr. Simmons), a $500 cash donation to him for a year would be good. It would also be good to provide him with drills, implements and equipment for carrying on the search for minerals. But I suggest to the government that there is a still better way of assisting prospectors—that is by extending the roads and trails into these new mineral areas, and by extending railway services to areas which give great promise of production.

A former member for Cariboo, Hon. J. Gray Turgeon, was a progressive man who has done a good deal to assist the prospector. Before the last war he was in some measure responsible for securing a grant for certain roads north of Prince George and out in the direction of Fort St. James. These roads were used by the prospectors, also by settlers going into that part of the country, and by operators of saw mills as well. But the great pay-off for the construction of the Turgeon highway up beyond Fort St. James was the development of the greatest mercury mine that was ever found on this continent—at Pinchi lake, and there was another at Takla lake—from which came great production during the war period. The discovery of that mine, and its operation, made it possible for the allies to have their own supply of that precious and critical war metal, and made us wholly independent of Franco in Spain, and of the Italians, who at that time had a monopoly of the production of mercury on the continent of Europe. If we extend the roads here and there, particularly in that great northwestern country, we shall do something to assist not only the prospectors but the settlement of those communities generally.

I have another example from the Peace river country, and it has to do with the coal mines at Hudson Hope, which now lie roughly 125 miles from the end of steel. Prospectors went in there in the early days and developed this coal. It has been said that the coal in this area is next in value as fuel to the anthracite coal from the Lackawanna valley of Pennsylvania. It is no exaggeration to say that there are mountains of it lying at Hudson Hope; and for confirmation of anything I say in this regard I would refer hon. members to the records of the geological survey branch at Ottawa.

A friend of mine, Mr. Neil Gething, has been in there for more than forty years. This man was trained at Ann Arbor, Michigan, as a geologist, and is a university man. He went in there far ahead of civilization and discovered these vast quantities of semi-anthracite coal. He has been in there for more than forty years, and is much poorer than he was when he went in. Yet at eighty-five years of age he is still an inspiration to the younger men of the Peace river country and other areas in that part of Canada. He has under his control vast quantities of this magnificent coal, and it requires only an extension from Hines Creek, Alberta, of the Northern Alberta Railways, to make that coal available not only to that part of British Columbia but also to central Canada, including the people of Ontario.

If we wish to make our dollar ring true on the counters of the world, and not have it at a discount, let us develop these great latent resources, and let us take sensible measures such as that advanced by the hon. member for Fort William. Let us support the prospector and thus build up this great mining industry in Canada.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have an immense amount of sympathy for the resolution offered by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). One thing, however, I do regret this afternoon, and that is that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is not in his seat; because if there is one think that has killed prospecting and has done more than anything else to hold back the mining industry in Canada it is the regulations and taxation schedules, and the taxing structure put upon mining. It is a burden placed not only upon the successful mining operations, but upon operations which in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred are not successful, and from which nothing results but a loss of speculative capital—and that is the most valuable kind of capital we have in Canada today.

It costs at the present time—and this is an empirical figure—between $2 million and $5 million to bring in a mine, that is, to produce the underground workings, to build the mill, to open up the levels and the stopes. All this takes an average of approximately five years. That is a lot of money; it takes a long time, and it is big business. The old days when the prospector went into the bush with a grubstake to develop a property are to a great extent over. Today engineering equipment, such as diamond drills and all the geophysical apparatus of mining and prospecting, makes mining and prospecting a very large and expensive business. It is unfortunate but true that more than anything else taxation has put a crimp on prospecting.

The prospector exists by risk or speculative capital. In this day and age, unless provision is made to recompense risk capital for the one bet out of a hundred that pays off, we shall not induce that risk capital to come into the extremely hazardous and speculative business of mining.

What has happened—and I regret this as much as anybody else—is that to a greater and greater extent the larger companies, with their large reserves, are holding blocks of territory which they hope to develop later, while in the meantime they are developing other properties. If there were a sufficient amount of risk capital available, those properties now lying idle in great numbers as moose pasture would have a chance for development.

That is my first point, Mr. Speaker. I feel it is part of the birthright of every Canadian to have a hand in the development of the country. We should be encouraged to invest capital in the development of our great mineral resources. But the government must recognize a simple fact, and that is if one risks capital in the development of a mine, and loses it, that is his loss; but if his venture turns out to be successful he should at least get his risk capital back before he is taxed on any profits which may flow from that venture.

In general terms that is the basic necessity for the encouragement of mining in this country. Let me mention one fact just to show how badly prospecting in this country has been hit. The old camp at Kirkland Lake had been solidly staked for many miles around in all directions, and it was suggested that in order to have the record straight the holders of the claims should restake them and make a new record so that if the camp developed and if the ore structure was found to extend past the area now considered to be the limits of the camp the claims held would not be the subject of dispute or discussion. It was found that there were no prospectors available to do the job. This camp got its start around 1912 or 1913; it was really only developed during the first war, about twenty-five or thirty years ago, and now there just are no prospectors available to do the necessary job of restaking the old claims. This is an indication of the serious situation that exists with regard to prospecting.

Whether we like it or not, gold has been the magnet which has drawn the prospector into the field. Gold has always been the incentive for the development and opening up of new areas in eastern and western Canada—in the great Cariboo country, in the Mackenzie, Yukon, Yellowknife and other areas. I would remind the house that the Eldorado company, now our major source of uranium, was originally a gold mining company. When Gilbert La Bine discovered the pitchblende it was partly an accident. Gold's value as a colonizer and developer of new country cannot be overestimated.

Because of the way in which gold is treated at the present time by international government finance and monetary control the incentive to look for it has been seriously diminished. Until gold again becomes the magnet to draw prospectors into the bush we will face continuous difficulty in the development of the prospecting industry.

I should like to refer briefly to our Department of Mines and Resources. In this department in Ottawa we have some of the best mineralogists, engineers, geophysicists and geologists to be found anywhere in the world. The personnel of the ore dressing and other laboratories are as fine as will be found in any other capital. But in this department are such things as immigration. Immigration really is a full-time job, because it is one of the most important problems facing Canada today. In my opinion it is wholly wrong to place immigration in the Department of Mines and Resources and thus divide the duties of the minister between immigration and mining. Both matters require a great deal of attention, and the minister cannot give undivided attention to either. The qualifications for both these jobs are entirely different.

Indian affairs are also in the Department of Mines and Resources. By no stretch of the imagination can Indian affairs be considered as having to do with mining and the development of natural resources. Hon. members who were here last year will remember the committee on Indian affairs and the extensive work it did. I am sure they will admit that no one department should have both mines and Indian affairs under its jurisdiction. Indian affairs is a completely different subject which has nothing to do with mining.

Museums and national parks are also under this department. Possibly our national parks could be considered as being related to mining, since they are in the realm of national development. I earnestly ask the government to take Indian affairs and immigration out of the Department of Mines and Resources, and in asking this I have the support of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy.

I understand that the Department of Mines and Resources occupy parts of no less than twenty-seven buildings in Ottawa. When a file has to be drawn, a boy is sent on a bicycle to the central registry. A department that must depend for its modus operandi on twenty-seven boys on bicycles can hardly be the efficient organization that the Department of Mines and Resources should be and can be and must be. I suggest that one of the first things the government should do in this national capital beautification plan is to erect a building to house the Department of Mines and Resources. In that building should be the most modern ore dressing and ore testing laboratories, and laboratories for the working out of milling practices for different types of ore. There is such a variety of ores in Canada that milling practices virtually differ for each mine even in the same camp. Geophysical prospecting methods should be worked out, as well as refining and smelting processes and the other intricate matters that have to do with the mining industry. Furthermore, extensive research should be undertaken.

I suggest that in this building provision should be made to house representatives of the different provincial departments of mines. While the natural resources belong to the provinces, the dominion has great responsibility in connection therewith. The closest possible liaison should be maintained between the dominion and provincial departments of mines, and this liaison should be continuous and on the technical level.

I looked at the Ottawa plan, but was unable to find that any new building is being proposed for the Department of Mines and Resources. In my opinion the centralization of the department of mines under one roof, making it solely a department of mines—not a sort of wastebasket into which all sorts of other difficult problems can be thrown—and giving it the most modern equipment possible, is one of the first things that any central planning board for Ottawa or for the national capital plan should consider. We must revive our mining industry, and we should become the second largest gold producer, a great iron mining country and the world's greatest producer of base and light metals. The hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Langlois) spoke quite recently. I may tell him there are very extensive possibilities with regard to copper in that peninsula.

This country, Mr. Speaker, as far as mining development is concerned, has not been scratched. It takes courage, it takes capital, it takes willingness, and it takes the ingenuity of the people. If we can go ahead with that we shall have no worry about our overall economy.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to support the resolution so well proposed by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). I do so because I feel it has real merit. Hon. members may not know it, but mining in Newfoundland is the third in value of our primary industries. We do not live on cod or on trees alone. We have a very considerable mining industry as well. It is for that reason that I am anxious that the resolution should be considered by the house, the selfish reason that it may be of great value to your newest province. The area of Newfoundland, and it is rather difficult to realize, is more than two and a half times as great as the area of the three former maritime provinces put together. That area has not been in any way fully prospected. Yet there are traces of all known minerals showing all over the island, and I include of course Labrador.

I was interested to hear hon. members refer this afternoon to uranium. It was only today that I picked up a Newfoundland paper and read an article about uranium. With your permission I should like to refer to it. It is to be found in the St. John's Evening Telegram of September 24. The article is headed:

Forestry engineer may set off mining boom.

The article reads:

An undergraduate forestry engineer who is also an amateur geologist read a pamphlet on ores and as a result the biggest mining bonanza in history might hit Newfoundland. The information in the pamphlet relating to ores said that since the discovery of uranium all ores should be examined for radio activity property.

J. A. Bragg, St. John's man, who was born in Greenspond—in Newfoundland.

—thirty-seven years ago, and has lived in Grand Falls—

also in Newfoundland.

—prior to taking up residence in the city—

meaning St. John's.

—might be the man responsible for the new mining rush. Mr. Bragg spent most of his vacation time from the university of New Brunswick making surveys for local paper companies. In his spare time he made a hobby of collecting minerals of all types.

For some time past Mr. Bragg has outgrown his hobby and the minerals were laid aside in the attic along with other junk which invariably finds a resting place in the 'hobby graveyard."

However, after picking up a pamphlet on minerals and reading that since the discovery of uranium all such material should be examined for radioactive properties, Mr. Bragg decided to resurrect his hobby pieces and have them examined by a geologist. He did. And the results as examined by the government geologists showed that one of the collections was rich in the exclusive radioactive property, even greater than the standard sample supplied by the federal bureau of mines, Ottawa.

The bug at present in further prospecting of the area is a matter for the provincial parliament. Uranium is not classified as a mineral under Newfoundland mining laws. This means that a licence cannot be had until such time as a special act is passed.

As a result no claims can be staked. And for that reason Mr. Bragg is keeping the territory a secret until he is vested with the proper protection and security.

In the meantime a company is being formed and will be known as the Uranium Exploration Limited, and will have head offices in St. John's. Should Mr. Bragg's "find" be the forerunner of a sizable amount of uranium it will mean a terrific boost to the economy of Newfoundland. At the present time this mineral is the most sought after in the world and its value is inestimable.

We might very well say, if that newspaper account is correct, that the so-called private prospector is the person who brought it into being, but of course he could only bring it into being with the aid and assistance of a geologist, and that is what the hon. member's resolution speaks of in this case.

I hope I will not be trespassing on the time of the house if I give a brief résumé—very brief, I may say—of mining in Newfoundland, because I feel that as much as you can know about our newest province is good for all hon. members. The largest red hematite mine not only in the empire but in the world is situated at Wabana in Newfoundland. That mine, in the time since it was established in 1895, has contributed some 50 million tons of iron ore which has been smelted in various parts of the world, and in a very great measure at Sydney, in the province of Nova Scotia. The mine is actually owned by the Dominion Iron and Steel Company of Sydney, who also own the limestone quarry at Aguathuna.

All over the island of Newfoundland and in Labrador there are indications of iron, and with the increasing prominence of iron, even though it is still the cheapest metal in the world, it may be that in the future the province of Newfoundland, as delimited by the terms of union—and I am not going back to stare decisis either—can make a very great contribution to the future economy of Canada as a whole. In Labrador some 20,000 miles of that area have been set aside for exploration by the Labrador Mining and Development Company. The territory of Labrador comprises 119,000 square miles altogether, and of that, as I say, 20,000 square miles have been set aside for a period of ten years. An agreement was made in 1938 and was renewed in 1944 for a period which I believe expires in 1953.

Prospects in that particular area have indicated a wonderful body of ore. I made reference to it in the house before, and I do not think there is any question about the fact that in the future Labrador iron will indeed be a valuable asset to the Dominion of Canada as a whole. I believe I also referred at that time, and it will not do any harm to refer to it again, to the great waterfall of Grand falls which adjoins that property. It is higher than Niagara falls. I do not say that the amount of water going over it is as great as that going over Niagara falls, but there is the possibility of a tremendous hydro-electric development there. There is no reason why that water power could not be used for the smelting of Labrador iron ore, and indeed the iron ore of northern Quebec. At the present time, I believe, the company is controlled by the Hollinger mining interests of Canada, but I understand that a number of United States concerns have bought heavily into that company.

We also have fluorspar at St. Lawrence. This is the mineral that is used as a flux for the melting of iron and also, I believe, of bauxite. Interestingly enough, it is also used in the making of freon, the refrigerant used in your electric refrigerator. I do not know how many refrigerators in Ottawa are using material coming from St. Lawrence in Newfoundland, but I would not be surprised if there were quite a few.

I am going into these matters because a number of these prospects which have developed into mines were discovered originally by the lone prospector who went ahead, without the benefit of outside financing, and who usually was rewarded only with the honour of making the discovery, obtaining little of real value afterward as a result. The ore at Buchans was discovered by a prospector using very advanced apparatus, something developed along the lines of radar. Hans Lundberg was the original discoverer of the lead, zinc and copper at Buchans. The mine was opened in 1928 and has been in continuous operation ever since. A very large new body of ore was discovered there only recently.

Speaking of the new method of prospecting, I understand they are even working from aeroplanes now. I believe they have some type of apparatus rigged in the nose of the plane which passes waves into the ground, no doubt on the radar principle, enabling them to determine what minerals and in what amounts are in the ground at that point. I do not imagine the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) contemplated that type of prospecting in preparing this resolution; it is a little too advanced for the ordinary prospector.

Then at Little Bay we also have a mine that has been out of operation for a number of years, but which in days gone by caused Newfoundland to be rated sixth among the copper-producing countries of the world. We do not produce copper to any great extent now, but at one time we were a considerable producer. We have lead at La Manche, near the peninsula of Avalon. That mine was operated originally by the people responsible for the laying of the first transatlantic cable; I believe the name was Mackay. The mine has not been in operation for some years past. It was investigated again very recently with the idea of reopening it, but I do not know the present position. We also have a considerable quantity of coal. Unfortunately for our province the reports indicate that it would not be economically feasible to work that coal, since the seams are supposed to be fractured to such an extent as to make it impracticable.

I have not given this matter the attention some other hon. members have devoted to it, but the main point to which I should like to direct attention is the fact that we have this vast unexplored territory in Newfoundland. With the indication of minerals all over the area it may be that, if a resolution such as the one now under discussion were carried into effect, the mineral resources of Newfoundland might make a great contribution to the economy of Canada as a whole. I am not a mining man, though like all Newfoundlanders I have a great interest in the subject. However, I do feel that one sure way of developing the mining resources of my province, and indeed of the whole country, would be for this house to endorse the resolution proposed this afternoon by the hon. member for Fort William.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that if the hon. gentleman speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. McIvor: I thank those who have given us the benefit of their judgment and experience while speaking in support of this resolution. The object of the resolution has now been served; we have placed before the government the needs of the prospector in connection with the development of our natural resources. I now ask leave to withdraw the resolution, feeling sure the government will have plenty of opportunity to put into effect what has been suggested in it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the consent of the house the hon. member may have leave to withdraw the resolution.

Motion withdrawn.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

PROPOSED USE OF FIRE-RESISTING PAINT ON PASSENGER SHIPS

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, early consideration should be given to including in the Canada Shipping Act, a clause making it law that in future every passenger ship, which would come under this act, be painted only with fire-resisting paint on all interior and deck work.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I did not expect this resolution to come on today, but I feel that it can be supported by every hon. member of this house. Few people know anything at all about fire-resisting paint. Few people know that it even exists or can be made; but if such paint is used on a ship certainly there is less danger of fire. I have seen a number of fires on pleasure boats of all kinds, and in each case the fire has spread because the paint has heated and, as the fire has run on the paint, it has become what might be called a flash fire.

I have seen fires of that sort start in one corner of a building. If a door is open and causes a draught the fire will cut a swath perhaps a yard wide right across the building and then spread from there. If a fire-resistant paint is used even a blow torch can be directed on it, though not for any length of time. The paint will sizzle and perhaps burn, but it will not flash or explode as ordinary paint does when it becomes heated. If you look at pictures of ships that have burned, you will see that the paint has even burned off the ironwork. Look at the pictures of the Noronic and you will see that the fire has cleaned the paint off the metal work.

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, though the hon. member has introduced a resolution which is unquestionably of importance, I believe I should point out to you that the matter of the fire aboard the Noronic is now the subject of an inquiry by a justice of the supreme court. While the member may discuss the resolution in so far as it affects fire-resistant paint, I do not think he should discuss questions touching the investigation being conducted by that judge.

[Mr. McIvor.]

Mr. Fraser: I quite agree with the minister, Mr. Speaker, and I shall adopt his suggestion. There are three known formulas for making fire-resistant paints that I know of. I have not those formulas before me, but the one that has been known the longest is the one in which borax is used along with linseed oil as in ordinary paint. If this resolution were given effect and the Department of Transport were to compel ships, especially passenger-carrying ships, to use an approved fire-resistant paint, there certainly would not be the danger of passengers being trapped in their cabins. The painting would not cost any more.

Some people have the idea that a fire-resistant paint must be a water paint, but that is not true. If the right formulas are used, the fire-resistant paint can have a glossy finish, the sort that is necessary on a passenger ship where it is subject to hard wear and tear. Most of these ships are used only in the summer and are, therefore, painted once a year. Ships that are in daily use are painted from time to time throughout the year. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) should insist that fire-resistant paints the formulas of which can be supplied by the national research council should be used on every passenger ship carrying Canadians. The lives of our people must be saved. We dare not have fires on our ships.

When I commenced my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I said I did not think this resolution would be reached today. I rose to speak today, however, because I believe time cannot be wasted in our attempt to save lives.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): This resolution affords me an opportunity, which I have been seeking for some time, to bring to the attention of the house a matter which is germane to its subject matter. Before I introduce that particular subject I wish to say that I concur in the remarks of the hon. member who moved this resolution. Last summer I travelled on a ship and, while I do not want to name the ship or the company owning it, I could not help observe the large quantities of paint that were on the metal work. I suspect, although of course I do not know, that the paint was not fire-resistant. I would suggest that, besides using fire-resistant paint, something could be done to avoid amassing coat upon coat of paint. If the old coats of paint were properly removed before a new one was applied, it would I believe reduce the fire hazard to that extent. I recall that this ship had recently been painted and it was not quite dry. One could take a knife and scrape off large quantities of paint, some chunks as thick as your thumb. If the paint were not fire-resistant, I would imagine this would create quite a hazard.

In recent months the country has been shocked by various fire disasters, which have not been confined to ships. Small prairie towns which have not the proper fire equipment often suffer heavy fire losses, sometimes accompanied by loss of life. I have noticed in the eastern provinces, I am thinking of one province in particular, that various types of educational institutions in which the children are boarders are particularly susceptible to fire. In the history of this country there has been tragedy after tragedy in which innocent children have been locked up—I think that is the best word to use—with a resultant loss of life.

In the matter of fire equipment, I should like to make a suggestion. From an inquiry I made this summer, I learned that fire equipment is very expensive. I have discovered that a large part of the capital cost of such equipment is made up of tariff charges. Many of the small municipalities to which I have referred cannot afford the equipment needed to ensure the safety of the citizens and their property. If these tariffs were lowered, there would be a consequent lowering of the price of such equipment. Last year I put a question on the order paper and, like my hon. friend, I did not realize this resolution would come up today, so I have not the statistics furnished me as a result of that question. I did discover, however, that the rate on fire equipment is fairly high. There is a large amount of fire equipment imported into this country.

I cannot see, sir, how this country or any section of this country or any people would wish to profit by keeping out fire equipment which is essential to the preservation of life. I say that, in view of the terror which is engendered by that particular death and the suffering which accompanies it. I do not think this government should put anything in the way of municipalities having the proper fire equipment necessary for the preservation of life and property.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): As I stated a moment ago when I rose on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this resolution is unquestionably one of importance in view of the disaster which occurred recently. I think everyone will be in sympathy with the object of the hon. member who has introduced it. First of all, however, perhaps I should read the resolution:

That, in the opinion of this house, early consideration should be given to including in the Canada Shipping Act, a clause making it law that in future every passenger ship, which would come under this act, be painted only with fire-resisting paints on all interior and deck work.

In the first place, if this were to be made an obligation on the part of owners of passenger vessels in Canada, it would not be done in this manner; it would not be done by inclusion of a clause in the Canada Shipping Act. It could, however, be done by amendment of the steamship inspection regulations. I do not think the house would want at this stage, in view of this recent tragedy, to amend the steamship inspection regulations without knowing what the recommendations of the board of inquiry will be.

There is considerable difference of opinion on the subject of fire-resisting paints. There are those who maintain that dry wood coated with fire-resisting paint will stop progress of a fire. There are also those who maintain that there is not a great deal of difference. Following this disaster I had in my office the director of chemicals and explosives during the war years. At that time he made a statement to the effect that certain ships during the war were treated wih fire-resisting paints but that the moment they were shelled the paint took fire. Whether or not the paint retarded the progress of the fire is another matter, and one which we did not discuss. I think there is a difference of opinion as to whether or not science has today been able to discover a fire-resisting paint which would be one hundred per cent effective. I am informed that in the United States at the moment there is being made what is known as "flame seal". It has been tested and approved by recognized firms in the United States. I do not know the extent of its resistance to fire. I know that the authorities in the national research council have been asked to test samples of it.

We in Canada have no regulations under the Canada Shipping Act, or in the steamship inspection regulations, requiring the placing of fire-resisting paint on passenger vessels. Neither have the United States any such regulations. The United States coastguard service, which is responsible for steamship inspection, or what is equivalent to steamship inspection in that country, has, I believe, given consideration to a regulation which would impose an obligation upon owners to paint their vessels with fire-resisting paint, but it has never decided to make it mandatory or obligatory on the part of the owner of the vessel.

While I agree and sympathize with the motive of the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser)—we are all of the view that we should do everything possible to prevent such an occurrence again—I feel that it would be a mistake to do this piecemeal. I feel that we should await the report of the investigating commission. I have no right to anticipate what that report might be, nor have I any intention of trying to do so. I think all of us in this house are at a great disadvantage in dealing with a matter of this kind until we have the facts fully before us.

A court of inquiry has been appointed, headed by one of the justices of the Supreme Court of Canada. He is assisted by two assessors and legal counsel. Under the circumstances, if I may so suggest to the house, perhaps the hon. member has achieved what he had in mind in placing this resolution on the order paper, namely, bringing it to the attention of the government. If that is what he has in mind, he certainly has accomplished his purpose. I have no doubt that we were all greatly taken aback by this catastrophe. It would strike me that the better way in which to handle this matter is to await the report of the commission of inquiry. If my hon. friend feels as I do about the matter, perhaps he will not insist that we proceed with the subject matter of the resolution.

Mr. Fraser: I agree with the minister that we should let this matter drop until after the inquiry is over and the report is made. I want to thank him for his remarks. No matter what the report is, I hope his department will consider changing the steamship inspection regulations. After his department and the national research council have studied the "flame seal" that the minister has mentioned, and also the other formulas, I hope the department will put in those regulations a clause making its use compulsory. The minister mentioned that during the war—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must point out that he is now exercising his right to reply, and that in doing so he is closing the debate.

Mr. Fraser: That is all right.

Mr. Knowles: You close the debate.

Mr. Fraser: I can drop the resolution. The minister said that during the war fire-resisting paints had been used on some of the ships, and that those in charge did not know whether they had helped. That is quite understandable, because when the men were getting off the ships, under war conditions, they could not tell just what was taking place. From what I have heard from navy men, my understanding is that what was used during the war was the borax formula and that the borax formula is not as fire-resisting as the other known formulas. That is why I feel the minister should go into this matter a little bit more thoroughly and have the formulas tested in the laboratory here and checked up.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) mentioned children being locked up in institutions. I think that is certainly another place were fire-resisting paint should be used. I might say to the hon. member that in the only institution in Peterborough where children are ever locked up—and that is in case a child is picked up on the street for some crime and put in charge of the Children's Aid Society—a policeman is always on guard at the door to see that they get out. That is one thing we have insisted on there. I brought this to the minister's attention, and he promised to look into it. I thank him for that, and I would ask if I might be permitted to drop this resolution now, because it has served its purpose.

Resolution withdrawn.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR FORMULATION OF NATIONAL PROGRAM

The house resumed, from Monday, October 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacInnis:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should seek the co-operation of the provinces for the purpose of formulating a program of social security that will be national in scope, adequate in its provisions, and that will cover all citizens of Canada in every circumstance where the individual or the family is, for any reason, deprived of the opportunity of earning a living.

Mr. Knowles: Question.

Mr. E. A. McCusker (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) stated, as reported at page 475 of Hansard:

> The hon. member left the wrong impression as far as cancer treatment is concerned. The hon. member stated that cancer treatment had been started long before the present government started in Saskatchewan, but the fact is that free cancer treatment came into effect after the C.C.F. government was elected and introduced the scheme.

I submit I left no wrong impression, for in my statement I did not mention treatment. I further submit that the hon. member has been unfair to me in so stating, and that by the statement I have just quoted he in turn has given the wrong impression to the house.

In order to set the record straight, and for that purpose alone, may I point out that the Cancer Commission Act of Saskatchewan was passed even earlier than I had stated. It was passed in 1930, when Dr. F. D. Munroe was minister of health in the coalition government of that day. It was a comprehensive measure covering all phases of diagnosis and treatment. It provided for the acquisition of radium, and its control by the commission.

In 1940 this act was placed in the revised statutes, without change. In April 1944 Dr.

Uhrich, the then minister of health in the Liberal government, caused the act to be amended so as to permit of free diagnosis and treatment of all patients.

This act was implemented on May 1, 1944, and free treatment was inaugurated then. Under the C.C.F. government which has been in power recently the act has been amended twice, once in 1946 when it changed the constitution of the commission and its times of meeting, and again in 1949 when the only amendment was a change in the meaning of the word "patient".

I have made these observations only for the purpose of correcting the record.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) not going to continue the debate? The debate was adjourned the other night, and if he is not prepared to go on and to avail himself of his right to speak, perhaps other members would like to speak.

Mr. Dickey: I was speaking in the debate the other night, when the house adjourned and I would ask that the matter stand over. I did not expect it to go on this afternoon, and I am not prepared to speak at this time. I ask that it stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Is it the pleasure of the house to have the matter stand?

Mr. Knowles: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Stand.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

453. Departmental administration, $836,737.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, no one expected that the estimates would come up this afternoon. There is always an extended discussion on the item for departmental administration, and therefore I suggest that it be allowed to stand so that we may go on with one of the detailed items.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I would have no objection to that at all.

454. Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada—administration, maintenance and operation, $610,880.

Mr. Fraser: Has the minister ever given consideration to the fact that there have been a great many deaths at grade crossings? I believe it was one of the Social Credit members who suggested some time ago that freight cars should have yellow stripes painted down their sides so that automobiles approaching railway crossings would be able to see the freight cars parked across the highway. If this were put into effect I would suggest that the new type of fluorescent paint which shows up at night be used. I think that if a strip of that sort was run along the side of freight cars the cost would be quite small and it would be most helpful in saving a great number of lives.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no doubt that the suggestion made by my hon. friend is one which should be given consideration. The board of transport commissioners has a special division which looks after safety regulations and I shall be glad to direct their attention to this suggestion.

Mr. Fulton: Have any additions been made to the board because of the increased work which will be necessary in connection with the pipe lines?

Mr. Chevrier: Additional clerical and other staff have been appointed, but there has been no increase in the membership of the board and it is not intended to increase it.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask a question with regard to two grade crossings on the highway between Winnipeg and Transcona. I realize the minister has a lot on his mind but he may recall that I raised this matter before, both on the floor of the house and by correspondence. At the eastern end of Winnipeg in what is known as Elmwood there are two bad grade crossings, one at the main line of the Canadian Pacific and the other at a branch line, both being on the highway which runs from Winnipeg to Transcona.

While I may not be as familiar with its details as the minister is, I do have a general idea of the formula that governs applications for the elimination of grade crossings. I understand that the municipality or municipalities concerned make application to the board of transport commissioners. If the board thinks that the grade crossing should be removed, either by means of an underpass or in some other way, it so decides and assesses the cost among the municipalities concerned and the railroad. I believe that is substantially correct.

In this case the residents of Elmwood, a community at the eastern end of Winnipeg, are greatly concerned over the existence of these grade crossings. They have taken up the matter with the Winnipeg city council and the council of the town of Transcona.

I think the minister will understand what I mean when I say that, while they met with sympathy from the officials of these two bodies, it was a different thing when it came to making an application that might involve the expenditure of money on their part.

I was wondering whether the minister could say anything about these two cases. They are really only one case because the two crossings are not far apart. Is there any other way—other than by applying to the board of transport commissioners—in which grade crossings like these can be eliminated? Is there any possibility that this might be considered a federal project to reduce unemployment when necessary? Any comment by the minister on the subject will be noted with interest by the people of Elmwood.

I stress the fact that this highway runs from Winnipeg to Transcona, a distance of three or four miles. There is considerable traffic back and forth on this highway, all of which has to cross the main line and branch line of the Canadian Pacific. Both crossings are in a residential area. When I spoke about this matter before, this area was not in the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre, but there was a little redistribution bill a year or two ago which brought it in and I am just as much interested in the matter now as I was then, if not more so.

Mr. Chevrier: The only remarks I could make in connection with the subject matter would be from the standpoint of this department. There is provision in the section of the Railway Act relating to the grade crossing fund to cover cases such as those my hon. friend has referred to. I mean that there is machinery for bringing such a case to the attention of the board. It is then up to the board to decide whether or not the project should be proceeded with.

Before arriving at a decision the board hears evidence, either in Winnipeg or in Ottawa. I assume in a case like this the board would set a date for a hearing. If the board came to the conclusion that it was a project which should be proceeded with they could order that up to 40 per cent of the cost but not exceeding $100,000 should come out of the grade crossing fund and assess the balance, either equally between the municipalities and the railway concerned or proportionately between those different bodies. I am not familiar with the particular case, but I imagine that my estimates will be on some days before they are finished and I shall be glad to get a statement. From what my hon. friend has said I gather that this matter has already been brought to the attention of the board.

Mr. Knowles: I am not sure that it has, particularly if it is necessary that action be taken at the request of the municipalities concerned. What I really want to know is whether there is any other way by which it could be brought to the attention of the board?

Mr. Chevrier: In so far as this department is concerned, there is no other way. It would have to be by way of application, but that application need not be formal. The hon. member referred to the possibility of a provision by way of unemployment assistance, but there is nothing of that sort in my department. I know there was a provision for that prior to the war, but that is a matter concerning departments other than mine.

Mr. Knowles: I appreciate the minister's offer to look into the matter and tell us at a later date if he has any information. This is the Talbot avenue crossing over the Canadian Pacific in Elmwood. As I remember, when the former minister of reconstruction and supply, now the Minister of Trade and Commerce, tabled a white paper in the house in April, 1945, there was some suggestion that the removal of grade crossings would be one project for which the government might get blueprints ready in order to have them on hand for use at a future date. Will the minister look around, both in his own department and anywhere else where they might be found, to see if there are any such plans available for the removal of these two grade crossings?

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply did table a document to that effect and the board of transport commissioners were given instructions at one stage to look into projects that would be considered of a priority nature if it should be decided to proceed with such works in the post-war period. The board has done that and has already approved of certain projects across Canada. I cannot give them from memory, but some of them have been proceeded with. Whether or not this particular project is in that list I am not able to say, but I could tell the hon. member at a later date.

Mr. Knowles: If the minister will do so at a later date we can pass the item.

Mr. Graydon: I desire to branch into another field of the minister's jurisdiction, one that is also covered by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. I want to bring to the attention of the house a matter which goes a little beyond the legal aspects of the question which I desire to discuss. I wish to refer to the public aspects of the whole question because of changed conditions in the areas surrounding metropolitan centres such as Toronto and other large cities of Canada, and I believe that those changed conditions should have a bearing upon the policy adopted by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada and the railway companies involved.

I refer to the matter of commutation passenger rates. I know that the question of commutation passenger rates has been a vexed one in many localities. For a number of years in the early part of the century when applications were made for commutation passenger fares they were granted, but in recent times, whether it is because of the policy of the railway companies, the policy of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, or the policy of the government generally, there has been a definite stoppage so far as any extension of commutation passenger rates is concerned.

At the moment I am not able to tell the minister when the last commutation application was granted, but I do know that it seems almost impossible now to have the commutation area extended. I want to bring one fact to the minister's attention. In the town of Brampton where I live, and which I represent as the member for Peel, we are some 21·3 railway miles from the union station in Toronto. We are unable to get commutation passenger rates. Applications were refused in 1909, in 1910 or 1911, and again in 1920.

I am not in any way attempting to indicate that there is any discrimination between the towns of Oakville and Brampton because I think Oakville is entitled to commutation passenger rates. I think it was a very proper thing that Oakville should have been given them originally, and that it should continue to enjoy them. As far as Oakville is concerned, it is farther away from the Toronto union station than the town of Brampton. I think that has been pointed out on previous occasions but nevertheless, for reasons with which I have never been able to find myself in agreement, Brampton has been denied commutation passenger rates.

Since the previous decisions were made, conditions have changed. I could not agree with the decisions that were made at various times in the past, but now their whole basis ought to be reviewed. No longer is the city of Toronto in the same situation as in 1909, 1910 or 1920, because all areas within a radius of normal commutation rates are at least partially identified with the general metropolitan orbit of which the city is the hub. That condition does not apply only to the city of Toronto. It applies to the city of Montreal and other cities as well. I have no doubt that there are many members from the city of Montreal and its suburbs who are seeking the same kind of redress that we are for the situation in which we find ourselves, close to the city of Toronto.

We think the whole question ought to be reviewed. We think that the matter of housing and the extension of the urban population into outlying areas ought to be taken into consideration. The merger of police protection and similar services are being considered for some places adjoining Toronto. Movements are now on foot whereby in a sense we are identified with a great metropolitan area. Because of that the cause which was fought so nobly and so well, but in such a futile way, in earlier days, now becomes a cause that ought to be reviewed, and the town of Brampton should be granted commutation passenger rates.

As the minister knows, there was a definite policy which governed the question of how, when and where commutation rates could be granted. I think the whole policy should now be subject to review, because when the previous decisions were made by the board conditions were so very different from what they are now as to almost create a new case on a new set of circumstances. I am not speaking at the moment for Whitby, Oshawa, and the other places in between those points and the city of Toronto. On the west side of Toronto, however, along the lakeshore route there are commutation passenger rates for all stations between Toronto and Oakville, a distance of 21·4 miles. When you proceed in a more westerly direction from Toronto towards Guelph you find that the commutation rates stop at Weston on the Canadian National, which is only 8·6 miles from the Toronto union station.

That leaves out of consideration a place like Malton which in 1920 was just a village near Toronto. Malton has now become one of the great airports of the continent. It is the home of the A. V. Roe Company, the proud manufacturers of the great jet plane which was demonstrated so successfully yesterday. It has become one of the major manufacturing points in central and western Ontario. It has become a centre of considerable population, but nevertheless because of decisions made in 1920, nearly thirty years ago, and prior to that time, the people of Malton are deprived of commutation passenger fares. Many of the workers at Malton live in the city of Toronto and are using other means of transportation, and in other instances people living at Malton are working in Toronto.

I wish therefore to bring to the minister's attention a situation which I believe calls for a definite remedy. Year by year there has been an increase in passenger traffic as far as Brampton and Malton are concerned. We think that now, beyond any shadow of doubt, we meet the requirements which in previous years the board, the government, and the railways felt that we were not able to meet. So I would like the minister to take into consideration the possibility of lifting the ban, as it were, on the granting of commutation passenger rates from places as close to metropolitan centres as the town of Brampton is to the city of Toronto. In doing that, perhaps he would also turn to a return for which I asked and which will be found in Votes and Proceedings No. 87 of July 24, 1946, on the subject of commutation rates. This will give the minister some idea of the points from which rates are now applicable outside the Toronto area, together with the mileage:

Cedarhurst	61·9
Danforth	5·3
Downsview	8·0
Dixie Road	10·2
Lakeview	11·1
Lefroy	51·8
Long Branch	8·8
Lorne Park	15·0
Maple Beach	59·9
Mimico	6·8
Oakville	21·4
Oriole	11·2
Parkdale	2·4
Port Bolster	57·9
Port Credit	12·8
Port Union	16·3
Riverdale	2·2
St. Clair Avenue	5·2
Scarboro	8·9
Sunnyside	3·5
Weston	8·6
West Toronto	5·0

The same thing applies on the Canadian Pacific railway:

Don	2·0
West Toronto	4·5
Weston	8·3
Lambton	6·4
Islington	8·7
Summerville	10·9
Dixie	12·6
Cooksville	14·2
Erindale	17·3

That leaves out the important and growing community of Streetsville, which is even closer to the union station than the town of Brampton. This will indicate to the minister just where commutation fares are applicable in the Toronto area, and also how necessary it is to have that commutation passenger rate structure broadened at this time, having in mind the changed circumstances, due to housing and other factors, which have brought about conditions that must be taken into consideration in the immediate future.

I intend to bring up this matter again, perhaps at greater length, when the legislation concerning housing is under consideration, because these matters are definitely linked together. But since several government departments are co-operating in matters of this kind I thought I should at least bring the point to the notice of the minister, under whose jurisdiction the board of transport commissioners operates, so that we might have a preliminary canter with respect to this question. I want to serve notice upon the minister that we are out to get commutation rates for these points I have mentioned; but I hope he will not feel that in making this statement I am doing more than simply emphasizing what I think is a most important point, that owing to changed circumstances this action has become almost a must as far as the outlying districts are concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: I am glad to hear my hon. friend say that he is out to get commutation rates, and that this matter is a must. For his own sake I hope he gets those rates; but I think he will understand when I say that there is a procedure by means of which commutation rates may be obtained. The hon. member commenced his remarks by saying there was a serious situation in his community which called for a remedy. I am not familiar with the circumstances except as I have heard my hon. friend outline them, but in what he has said he has brought forcibly to the attention of parliament a situation which should be given careful consideration.

There is machinery which can be used to try to bring about the remedy my hon. friend refers to, but that machinery is not within the Department of Transport nor is it within the government itself. The Railway Act clearly sets forth that a body has been set up for the purpose of establishing rates. I refer to the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. As long as I have been in the department the government certainly has not indicated by direction to that board that they should do thus and so. They are considered to be a court of record, and it is they who decide, on application by the railway association of Canada or any other body, whether or not such rates should apply. If the facts are as suggested by my hon. friend, and I have no doubt they are, does he not think the proper procedure would be to acquaint the board with the situation in the area surrounding the city of Toronto? If it is a fact that the decisions complained of were based on facts twenty or thirty years old, then I am sure the board of transport commissioners would be prepared to give consideration to new circumstances and a new set of facts and, if there is need, alter the decision in the manner required.

I shall be glad, if I can, to facilitate the application to the board on behalf of the people in whom my hon. friend is interested, but I want to assure him at once that the government does not fix rates and has no intention of doing so. I think it would be a serious mistake if the government were to intervene in rate-fixing problems. That has been considered a matter for the board, and I am sure if my hon. friend and the municipalities bring these matters to the attention of the board, either by a formal application or by a simple letter, they will receive attention.

Mr. Graydon: I thank the minister for his very co-operative reply. The machinery involved, to which he referred, of course is well understood. I am only anxious to have him pour some lubricant on the machinery, and that was my purpose in raising the question this afternoon. We are taking the necessary steps as far as that machinery is concerned, but we need a little oil to make it run more smoothly.

Mr. Higgins: I would like to direct the minister's attention to the question of the railway in Newfoundland. As he knows, that railway now is being operated by the Canadian National Railways. Paragraph (xiv) of the statements on questions raised by the Newfoundland delegation reads:

> After the date of union, the Canadian National Railways will be entrusted with the responsibility of operating the Newfoundland railway and coastal steamship services, and it will be their responsibility to see that services are furnished commensurate with the traffic offering.

In my opinion the services being furnished are not commensurate with the traffic offered. Would the minister make a statement as to whether it is the intention of the government to introduce a standard broad-gauge railway?

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would raise that question when we are on the proper item. We are now dealing with item 454 concerning the board of transport commissioners. They have no jurisdiction over the particular matter to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. Higgins: May I take it we shall have a statement of that kind?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; there will be ample opportunity for discussing the matter which has been raised.

Mr. Higgins: When will that be?

Mr. Chevrier: I will inform the hon. member at the proper time.

Mr. Church: I wish to ask the minister a question on item 454. I call his attention to one fact, that the board of transport commissioners has a duty to the public to perform. Since there are some new members present, perhaps I should inform them that the board, under section 275 of the old act, of its own volition, is required to investigate certain matters. An able man from the maritimes, the Hon. Mr. Justice Archibald, has recently been appointed chairman of that board. I point this out to the minister because he is a young man whom I have always appreciated.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you.

Mr. Church: Never mind, that is irrelevant.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to tell the hon. gentleman that I have much respect for him as well.

Mr. Church: I want to point out that this board of transport commissioners has certain duties to perform for the public. I am asking about a steam suburban service for the Toronto district. This board is required, of its own volition, to investigate that problem for the city of Toronto. I believe it is the only large city on the North American continent that has not a steam suburban service and the only one that qualifies for it. I do not blame the present minister because it goes farther back than that.

Those members who have recently entered this house from the Toronto district know that because of the lack of that service there is not a piece of cheap land in that city. During the last session the former member for Davenport referred to the fact that, at one time, during the first war, land was sold for $6 per foot on St. Clair avenue. There were 28 war widows on Boone avenue in one block after the first world war. I happened to be the member for that district for three parliaments. Some time later, it was discerned that the lack of a suburban service in the Toronto district was deplorable. As I was pointing out yesterday, I hope the time is not too far distant when something will be done about it.

Speaking of the board of railway commissioners, what are their functions? They have a large staff of engineers and are required to ascertain whether Montreal is the only city entitled to this service. I contend there is a clause in the act which calls for equality of treatment and equality of rates and tolls imposed by that board as between two districts. If one section of the country receives a service, that service, tolls, rates and equipment must be given to other parts of the country. The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Rooney) knows a great deal about our city and about this matter. At the present time, there is no cheap land in the city. The days of $6 per foot have passed. The city of Toronto is the only city in Canada that can qualify for a similar service on the same basis as Montreal.

I remember when my friend, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), was requesting commutation tickets for Brampton and Oakville. The hon. member for Peel knows, too, that there is no cheap land in the city. I am just pointing out that the act specifically says it is the function and duty of the board of transport commissioners, of its own volition, to look into this question and find out whether or not Toronto can qualify for steam suburban service on the same basis as Montreal. I am glad to see Montreal has that service. The only regret is that the board of transport commissioners should be required to carry out the law, and where similar facts exist, similar service should be granted.

Mr. Graydon: Following up what the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has said, may I ask the minister if there is a difference between the surburban service of Montreal and that which is given to the Toronto area?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, there is.

Mr. Graydon: What is the distinction? I have just been relying on what the member has said, but I should like to know what the distinction is between the two cities.

Mr. Chevrier: There is such a service between the city of Montreal and the outlying districts and I understand there is not in Toronto.

Mr. Graydon: That is a steam suburban service?

Mr. Chevrier: On that point, there is a suburban service. Dealing with the point raised by my hon. friend, I have to make the same answer as I made to a question a short time ago; that is a matter for the board to decide upon an application to them. The question is: Is that what the hon. gentleman wants, a steam suburban service for the city of Toronto? If it is, I shall be the most astonished man in the world, because the railways have been trying in the last few years to get away from steam locomotives. The hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) has on the order paper a bill the purpose of which is to eliminate smoke. He wants the railways to install certain equipment in roundhouses in the city of Toronto to eliminate smoke. We have that request from one gentleman and a request for a steam suburban service from another gentleman.

Mr. Graydon: I want cheap rates.

Mr. Chevrier: If it is cheap rates, that is clearly a matter for the board. If it is a steam suburban service, I think, before one could answer yes to that, more careful consideration would have to be given. I know the railways are modernizing their equipment and eliminating steam locomotives.

Mr. Hodgson: They are getting diesels?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, diesels. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company announced a policy some time ago to the effect that no more steam locomotives would be purchased. They are directing their attention exclusively towards diesels. I believe I am safe in saying that is substantially the policy of the Canadian National Railways.

Coming back to the question of rates, if that is the question that is being brought to the attention of the house, I must say it is a matter for the board to decide upon application to it.

Mr. Green: As the committee knows, the board of transport commissioners recently handed down a decision on the application of the railways for an increase of twenty per cent and also on a rehearing of the former application. The general result of the decision was an increase in rates of 29 per cent. In giving judgment, the board stated that was only a temporary increase, and that they would give further consideration to the application of the railways for a 20 per cent increase after the two inquiries which are being undertaken have been completed.

As we all know, there is a royal commission on transportation which has been sitting for some months. In addition, the board of transport commissioners was ordered to make a general inquiry into the whole freight rate structure, and particularly into the question of discrimination. Can the minister tell us when those two inquiries are to be completed? It would appear that the board's inquiry has not yet got under way. The result is that it will probably be some time before they make a finding. This is particularly important to the western provinces and to the eastern provinces because, with the recent increase in rates, the discrimination was made just that much worse than it had been before. Apparently there can be no remedy for the discrimination until these two reports are in.

Mr. Chevrier: It is of course rather difficult to tell the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra the exact time at which these two investigations will be completed. The royal commission has had sittings in western Canada, has gone down to Newfoundland and is now on its way back; in fact, it is back. When it will move to the other provinces, if it so decides, I am not in a position to say. I hardly think they will have completed the hearings before the month of December, and it will be some time after that before they are able to compile the tremendous amount of evidence before them and bring down their conclusions. Whether it would be a year from now or not, I am not in a position to say. If I had had the opportunity of consulting with the chairman, I might be able to give the hon. member some idea with regard to the time; but it will certainly not be in the immediate future.

Dealing with order in council P.C. 1487, on the general equalization of freight rates—

Mr. Green: The minister is now dealing with the inquiry to be undertaken by the board of transport commissioners as distinguished from that undertaken by the royal commission?

Mr. Chevrier: I am dealing with P.C. 1487 which authorized the board of transport commissioners to set up an inquiry to deal with the general matter of the equalization of freight rates. That has been under way now for almost a year, and at the moment the board is going into the study of the waybill, which is an important factor in arriving at the matter of discrimination. It will be some months still—in fact, I think it will go into next year—before they are able to conclude their findings on the waybill study. As to when they will bring in their report, I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend any definite date, except to say that it will not be soon.

Mr. Green: Will public hearings be held by the board of transport commissioners in carrying out this general inquiry, or is that merely a study being undertaken by them?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it is a study being undertaken by the board.

Mr. Green: Last spring we understood that the board would be holding public hearings having to do with this question of discrimination. Surely, on an important matter like that, they are not going to make their findings without giving the provinces an opportunity to make representations.

Mr. Chevrier: That is a matter which the chairman, in conjunction with the other members of the board, will have to decide. I do not know what he intends to do. He is the court and he is the one who must decide whether hearings will be held across the country or not. I cannot speak for him at this time without consultation with him. The waybill subject matter is one of study; it is not one which would call for a public hearing. The matter of the mountain differential was one which did, and hearings were held. I think that is a matter for the discretion of the chairman.

Mr. Green: As I understood it, the provinces were asking for an opportunity to make representations on this whole question of discrimination. The board of transport commissioners has wide power under the order in council. When that order in council was passed, was it not the intention of the government that the board should hold public hearings?

Mr. Chevrier: The board has already held one public hearing. Having decided to remove the mountain differential in the British Columbia area, they then thought the next procedure was to make a study of the waybill. Having done that, what they intend to do afterwards is something I am not able to say. As to the intention of the government, I have made statements from time to time, and the order in council is there. I do not think I should elaborate further.

Mr. Green: Perhaps the minister could tell the committee at a later date what plan the board have in mind.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. I shall be glad to consult with the chairman of the board and at a later date to make a statement as to his intention.

Mr. Green: This is an exceedingly important matter.

Mr. Chevrier: Unquestionably it is an exceedingly important matter.

Mr. Green: I would ask that the minister allow the item to stand.

Mr. Chevrier: Surely we can discuss this matter on the general item.

Mr. Green: No—

Mr. Chevrier: Just a minute. If it is the intention of the committee to let every item such as this stand, we shall never get on. At my hon. friend's request we have let item 453 stand, so that we could discuss general matters. I tell my friend now that he will have an opportunity to deal with this matter under item 453. I should think that would be sufficient.

Mr. Green: I have run into difficulties before over some plan of this kind. It is now six o'clock. This information for which I have asked the minister is most important, and I would suggest that the item be allowed to stand.

Item stands.

The Chairman: It being six o'clock, shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow is private members' day.

Mr. Graydon: In view of our experience today, I should like to ask the minister this question. If tomorrow we find that private members' notices of motions stand in such numbers and as frequently as they did this afternoon, what will the government business be following disposal of them?

Mr. Knowles: Public bills and orders come first.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We have some bills under study in committee which we could take up, or we could revert to estimates of the Department of Agriculture or of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Graydon: Would the business of tomorrow include the bill to amend the Supreme Court Act?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Probably; and the bill to amend the Exchequer Court Act and the one to amend the Department of Justice Act.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, October 6, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA ACT

SUBSTITUTION OF "CANADA" FOR "DOMINION OF CANADA", ETC.

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 14, to amend an act respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Arsenault: Mr. Speaker, this is an amendment to subsection 1 of section 5 of the act respecting the Revised Statutes of Canada which was adopted during the session of 1947-48. The amendment provides for the addition of the following words:

—and whenever in the said statutes or acts, or amendments thereto, the expression "Dominion of Canada" is used, there shall be substituted therefor the expression "Canada", and whenever the word "Dominion" is used, there shall be substituted therefor the word "Canada" or "Canadian or "federal", respectively, or such other adequate word as the context requires.

The reason for this amendment is obvious. It is to be found in the fact that since Canada has ceased to be a dominion and has become a sovereign state, the word "dominion" as applied to Canada has lost its meaning, and—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has given his reason for moving for leave to introduce the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SASKATOON TERMINAL ELEVATOR

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What is the capacity of the government terminal elevator in Saskatoon?
2. How much wheat was in storage in said elevator in each month commencing August 1, 1948 and ending July 31, 1949?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. 5,500,000 bushels.

2. Quantity of wheat in store at the end of each month: August, 1948, 6,808 bus.; September, 1948, 3,575 bus.; October, 1948, 5,516 bus.; November, 1948, 2,321 bus.; December, 1948, 580 bus.; January, 1949, 3,046 bus.; February, 1949, 3,046 bus.; March, 1949, 3,046 bus.; April, 1949, 3,046 bus.; May, 1949, 3,046 bus.; June, 1949, 185 bus.; July, 1949, 185 bus.

EMPLOYMENT—DOMINION AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Mr. Hatfield:

1. What is the total working population of Canada?
2. Of the total working population of Canada, how many are employed by the dominion government and how many by the provincial governments (a) permanent; (b) temporary?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle):

1. As at June 4, 1949, total employment in Canada was 5,018,000 out of a total labour force of 5,121,000.

2. As at March 31, 1949, there were (a) 37,909 permanents and (b) 86,015 temporaries employed by the dominion government.

There is no information available in the Department of Labour in regard to the number employed by the provincial governments.

STERLING-DOLLAR DEVALUATION—TEXTILE AND WOOLLEN INDUSTRIES

Mr. LaCroix:

1. Are the textile and woollen industries already losing the domestic markets to British competitors, owing to the recent sterling-dollar devaluation?
2. Have there been any layoffs and wage reductions among the workers in the textile and woollen industries in consequence of this devaluation?
3. What steps are being taken by the government to safeguard such employees?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. There is no evidence to show that the Canadian textile industry is losing its domestic markets to British competitors owing to the sterling-dollar devaluation.

2. No layoffs or wage reductions have been reported to this department which could be attributed to the recent sterling devaluation.

3. Answered by Nos. 1 and 2.

FOREST FIRES

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf):

1. How many acres of forest have been destroyed by fire, in Canada, in each of the years, 1940 to 1948, inclusive?
2. What was the value, in Canadian dollars, of timber so destroyed, in each of the above mentioned years?

Mr. Maybank:

Statistics on Forest Fires in Canada, 1940–1948

Year	Forested area burned acres	Non-forested area burned acres	Total area burned acres	Estimated stumpage value of merchantable timber burned	Estimated value of young growth burned	Total estimated value of timber burned
1940	1,448,174	1,242,961	2,691,135	1,355,322	1,102,385	2,457,707

NOTES

Above figures do not include the Yukon and Northwest Territory, for which complete statistics are not available during this period.

Much of the merchantable timber burned, and included in the estimated stumpage values above, may have been salvaged in accessible areas.

Losses on cut-over lands are included with young growth above.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that complacency never won a battle, is the government in a position to indicate whether a house committee on atomic power will be set up, and if so, when?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Under the rules of the house a special committee was appointed to report on the composition of the standing committees. I hope that its report will be ready tomorrow. There has been some delay, because suggestions must be obtained from the different groups in the house as to the personnel of the committee. It was felt that we should set up the standing committees before introducing any motions for special committees.

AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, as you are well aware, the international plowing match, the largest annual competition in the world, is being held next week, October 11 to 14, at Burford, Ontario, in the county of Brant. Although you, sir, now represent that portion of Brant county which I had the honour to serve prior to the last election, as the member for the adjoining riding of Brant-Wentworth I should like to take this opportunity to extend to all hon. members of the house a most hearty invitation to attend this outstanding event in Canadian agriculture. It is indeed a unique occasion, and I consider it a great privilege to be able to speak on your behalf, sir, on this occasion.

I can assure hon. members that the welcome mat will be out in the city of Brantford, the county of Brant, and most particularly the riding of Brant-Wentworth.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

SITE FOR PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION IN CHARLOTTETOWN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Last Tuesday the hon. member for Queens, P.E.I., (Mr. McLure) asked a question concerning the site of the proposed new building in Charlottetown. His question was, in part:

When will the department or the government make a definite statement about these properties, so that these land owners, home owners and tenants can make arrangements for other locations in the future?

I see I made quite a short answer. I said: "As soon as possible." I think in fairness to the hon. member I should give him the following details.

Notice of expropriation was filed against properties contained in the city block bounded by Richmond street, Pownall street, Sidney street and Queen street in Charlottetown in March of this year, these properties comprising the site selected for the new public building.

Valuations have been obtained on these properties, compiled by Mr. P. S. Bradley and Mr. Gilbert Gaudet of Charlottetown, and the owners communicated with in regard to negotiations for settlements for the properties. No settlements have yet been made, because the asking prices are much in excess of our valuations. The department is now arranging for a third valuation, and upon receipt of this valuation the owners will be communicated with again.

The chief architect has stated that vacant possession of the properties will be required for April 1, 1950, and it is the intention to have notices to vacate by that date forwarded to the former owners at once. In the meantime, negotiations towards settlements for the acquisition of these properties will be continued.

POSTAL SERVICE

RURAL MAIL COURIERS—INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General, and to suggest to him that he should give consideration to a question raised by me last year. I refer to the setting up of a special committee of the house to deal with the problems affecting the rural mail couriers of Canada. He is a new postmaster general. I should like to see him break new ground.

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): I shall be pleased to consider the proposal.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT

POLLUTION—CONTROL OF INDUSTRIAL PLANTS AND OIL REFINERIES

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 6, to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the amendment concerns two principles. The first is the protection of the riparian rights of persons dwelling on or using the banks of navigable streams or lakes. The second is the democratic principle of the greatest good for the greatest number. The terms of the present act as to pollution definitely give the minister limited authority. The limitation of the present statute is that it proscribes and prohibits the pollution of navigable waters by the depositing of any sawdust, edgings, slabs, bark or rubbish of any description whatsoever into any river, stream or other water, any part of which is navigable or which flows into any navigable water. That provision is to be found in the present Navigable Waters Protection Act, section 19, chapter 140 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. It definitely establishes the right of the federal parliament to deal with matters concerning navigable waters, and waters running into navigable waters.

The amendment that I propose for the consideration of the house today is merely an enlargement of the description of the methods of pollution of navigable waters. The bill is in almost identical words with the original act, and includes such substances as oil, sawdust, chemicals or other industrial pollution. The amendment to section 19 reads:

No owner, lessee, or person operating any industrial plant, oil refinery, chemical works, sawmill or other plant or works, or any other person, shall discharge or throw or allow to be discharged or thrown any noxious waste product, oil, sawdust, chemical or other matter or thing into a river, stream or other water any part of which is navigable or which flows into any navigable water, which has the effect of polluting the water into which it enters or is liable to pollute such waters.

In the same phraseology as the original act, it merely enlarges the description of the methods of pollution. In my opinion it does not alter, substantially or otherwise, the powers and the jurisdiction of the federal parliament; nor is it in any way ultra vires of the rights of the federal parliament because of the overriding rights of any provincial parliament.

In this connection a case has recently been decided in the Supreme Court of Canada which has a definite bearing on the amendment I am introducing in the house today. I am going to quote certain salient paragraphs of the judgments rendered by the Supreme Court of Ontario, in both trial and appellate divisions, and by the Supreme Court of Canada, which judgment was rendered only the day before yesterday. The case is known as McKie v. the K.V.P. Company Limited. Briefly, the company was sued by the owners of riparian rights on the Spanish river, who sought damages as a result of the pollution of the waters of that river. The first judgment had this to say:

> The proprietor of riparian lands has a right incident to the land, independent of ownership of the solum of the stream or river, to the flow of water through or by his land in its natural state, and if the stream is polluted or otherwise interfered with so as to affect this right, by an upper riparian proprietor (who has not yet acquired a prescriptive right so to interfere), the lower proprietor may maintain an action for an injunction without proving damage, which is presumed from the interference with the right. It is immaterial, in such an action, that the defendant carries on a business which is important to the community, and carries it on in a proper manner, nor are the economic necessities of the defendant relevant to be considered.

The second paragraph of the judgment reads:

> Where smells arise from a river, caused by the effluent entering the water from a mill, and are so offensive as to be an actual and substantial interference with the comfort and enjoyment of properties on the river, measured by ordinary and reasonable standards, and consequently what has been an attractive resort for tourists becomes much less desirable, the owners of the properties are entitled to relief on the footing of nuisance, as well as to relief based on the interference with their riparian rights.

In this case the learned judge awarded damages and also granted an injunction; and it is with the injunction in particular I wish to deal at the present time. The learned judge had this to say:

> On all the evidence I find as a fact that the waters of the Spanish river below the defendant's plant have been polluted by the defendant in such a manner as to change their character and substantially affect the use to which the plaintiffs were entitled to put them and to interfere with the enjoyment of the plaintiffs as occupiers of riparian lands.

In his judgment the judge also went back to the common law:

> The origin of the common law applicable to this subject goes back to and beyond the Roman law.

The judgment goes on to state clearly the rights of riparian ownership, but I need not add to the quotations I have already given. It awarded certain sums of money to the plaintiffs, and also—and this is the important point—granted an injunction prohibiting the company from continuing the practice of dumping this effluent into the Spanish river. The injunction is in these terms:

> An injunction will go restraining the defendant from depositing foreign substances or matter in the Spanish river which alter the character or quality of the water flowing over the lands of the plaintiff . . .

The important point in that judgment is that the learned judge based his decision upon the alteration of the quality of the water. That judgment was taken to the appellate division of the Supreme Court of Ontario, where the appeal was dismissed and the judgment sustained. In dismissing the appeal the chief justice had this to say:

> It is no defence to the person who pollutes to show that the waters were already polluted by other persons. Nor is it a defence that the pollution is the result of business operations carried on in a proper manner and that the business is important to the community.

This judgment was rendered by Chief Justice Robertson, with Justices Laidlaw and Aylesworth concurring. The judgment sustains the damages awarded in the first action and also continues the injunction in these words:

> This court doth order and adjudge that the defendant be, and it is hereby, restrained from depositing foreign substances or matter in the Spanish river which alter the character or quality of the water washing the lands owned or occupied by the plaintiff . . .
> This court doth order and adjudge that the defendant be, and it is hereby, restrained from discharging or permitting to be discharged from the defendant's works mentioned in the pleadings, into the waters of the Spanish river, any substance or matter that, to the injury of the plaintiff, affects the quality or character of the waters of the said river where the plaintiff's lands border upon it, or that causes the said waters to become less pure than otherwise they would be.

These judgments contain voluminous references both to the common law and to decisions of the privy council, and are in the strongest possible legal terms.

After that judgment was rendered the Ontario act was altered, and an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of Canada, in which the decision was rendered only the day before yesterday.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? In what manner has the Ontario act been amended?

Mr. Adamson: I will give the minister that information. It was amended to prevent an injunction being imposed against an industrial plant. There were qualifications to that amendment, but that was the substance of it.

To continue with the supreme court judgment, Mr. Justice Kerwin says:

> The sole point argued before us was as to the injunction.

The learned justices say that the injunction shall stand, despite the amendment to the Ontario statute. It was because of the alteration to the Ontario act that counsel for the company appealed and said the injunction should not stand. The supreme court decided, however, that because the case had come to trial before the Ontario statute was amended, the original judgment with regard to the injunction should stand.

I quote from the supreme court judgment:

> The amended act came into force on the day it received the royal assent, April 1, 1949, and while the judgment of the court of appeal was given

November 22, 1948, it is contended that the appeal to this court is "pending" within the meaning of the enactment.

May I clear up a point by quoting from the judgment?

. . . and since a provincial legislature may not extend the jurisdiction of this court as conferred by parliament, such a provision as the one here in question would not, even if it purported so to do, enable this court to give a judgment that was impossible in law at the time of the decision of the court of appeal.

The reason for the appeal, briefly, was that this company felt seriously aggrieved by the injunction. An alteration in the law was sought which would permit a company causing pollution or distress to riparian owners to pay those riparian owners for the distress so caused. The company could, at the same time, continue the practice which caused those damages. In other words, companies operating on a river could continue to pollute the stream as long as they continued to pay damages to the people inconvenienced by that pollution. Not being a lawyer, Mr. Speaker, I am unable to say whether or not that is a good principle of law. I do know it is not a good principle of ethics, and it is not a good principle from the humanitarian point of view.

The supreme court said:

The rights of riparian owners have always been zealously guarded by the courts.

The learned judges quoted from a privy council decision by Lord Sumner which reads as follows:

The grant of an injunction is the proper remedy for a violation of right, according to a current of authority, which is of many years' standing and is practically unbroken.

There is one more decision of the privy council to which reference is made in this judgment. It is a decision by Viscount Finlay, Lord Birkenhead, and Lord Dunedin. It says in part:

. . . the courts have on more than one occasion expressed their determination to prevent any abuse of the act by legalizing the commission of torts by any defendant who was able and willing to pay damages.

There are quotations from several other cases, all to the same effect. The basic rule is that the injunction shall stand.

So far as I am able to ascertain, Mr. Speaker, that is the legal position in this case. The Ontario act has been amended; so it would seem to me that the sole protector of riparian rights on navigable waters, and waters running into navigable streams, is the federal parliament. The wording of section 19 of the act is to that effect; therefore I believe I am borne out in my contentions.

We come now, sir, to the question of possible damage to industry through this bill which I have introduced. I am informed that most of the states in the northern United States have enacted similar legislation to that which I am requesting with regard to the pollution of streams. The question of the rights of industry versus the rights of the people is one that should receive careful study. Obviously it would be harmful if an act were passed by this parliament enforcing such restrictions against the pulp and paper industry and others who are not discharging an effluent which damages any riparian owners. It would be wrong, by such an act, so to prescribe their actions and their operations that it would become difficult or impossible for them to continue. I believe that the terms of my amendment are sufficiently flexible to give the power to the minister and the board of transport commissioners to decide each case on its merits. It is left to the good judgment of the court to decide whether or not damage was done.

There again we come to the question of the greatest good for the greatest number. Obviously that is not a legal point, but certainly it is an ethical point; and it is one of the fundamental points of democracy. Obviously it would be wrong to put into any statute something which would cause unemployment or restrict the development of the pulp and paper industry. But, sir, in this case, where there was abundant evidence of pollution that made this river completely and absolutely unusable, the courts have decided that there should be an injunction directing that such pollution should cease.

I want to speak briefly about one other industry which I know something about, and which also has a problem in connection with effluent disposal. I refer to the mining industry. Tailings or slimes containing cyanide—the waste rock or the waste mill products—must be disposed of in some way The practice has been to dump these tailings into a lake, and in some cases damage has no doubt been done to the lakes so treated. But although several mines have dumped tailings into Red lake—and I have a letter to this effect on my desk at the moment—the fishing and bathing in that lake have not been seriously interfered with because of pollution. Therefore that type of industrial pollution, while not to be recommended, is nevertheless not in the same class as that with which the learned justices of the supreme court dealt in the case of K.V.P. v. McKie. I am quite sure that the mining industry can in the future build its mills so that the tailings and the slimes can in most cases be deposited on land and not dumped into the waters of surrounding lakes. In many cases slimes can perform the useful service of providing a firebreak around the property so that mines built in the bush can provide themselves with a ring of fire protection around the camp. As a matter of fact that is what is being done at the present time in Kirkland Lake. We must also take into consideration the fact that all these industrial processes are constantly improving and developing. I am informed that it is the modern practice of kraft mills such as K.V.P. to store their fibre effluent which causes damage, and to burn this effluent after a period of leaching or drying. I am told that in some kraft mills in the United States this product actually provides heat and power for the mills for several days a month. In the case that I have referred to it was stated that some four or five tons of these fibres were discharged every day into the Spanish river, and the evidence given was to the effect that this material could be dried and burned. I am not competent to pass judgment on that matter, but the information was given to me by an engineer whose opinion I esteem.

So much for the law; so much for the possibility of proscribing and restraining industrial development because of this bill. Now we come to the real reason why I have introduced this measure to this house.

During the summer of this year, because of pollution, by oil slick and other noxious substances, of the water along the shore of lake Ontario for several miles in the vicinity of Toronto, the use of all the beaches in my riding—and I understand of the beaches elsewhere also—was prohibited by orders of the medical officers of health in the respective municipalities. The use of Sunnyside beach, Long Branch beach, the beaches at the east end of Toronto, at New Toronto, and in Mimico—all teeming with bathers and swimmers from the industrial centres immediately behind them—was completely prohibited during that period by the medical officers of health, because of the pollution, generally considered to be caused by oil, which had taken place. Pictures were published showing, at Sunnyside beach—probably the most densely populated beach in all of Canada—bathers attempting to go into the water and coming out with their feet dripping with oil sludge and pollution.

Here again the principle of the greatest good for the greatest number should apply. A population of a million people were prevented, during one of the longest hot spells we have ever experienced—for a period not of days but weeks—from using their beaches and their lakes because of industrial pollution. This is a situation which, in my opinion, the parliament of Canada should not tolerate—and parliament is the competent authority to deal with it. Attempts were made to trace the source of this pollution. One of the suspected sources refused to admit anyone to its premises to ascertain the cause, or the suspected cause of the lake pollution, and under the present law apparently no remedial action was possible.

So much for the pollution with regard to human rights; besides that, Mr. Speaker, a great number of wildfowl were killed by the oil lying on the water, and the conservation authorities were much distressed about it. In addition, numerous small craft were seriously incommoded by the oil slime which fouled their bottoms. The smell of the oil, or whatever it was, caused putrefaction of marine growth, and in itself was offensive until the entire lake shore became a malodorous place, the conditions being similar to those on the Spanish river. This, again, is a condition which in this day and age, in this day of better living, should not be tolerated by a modern state.

But there is one more thing. The oil slick was considered to be a serious fire hazard. Fortunately it did not catch fire, but I understand that the fire authorities in Toronto took what they considered to be necessary precautions, and were greatly concerned lest it should catch fire; statements to that effect were made throughout the press of Toronto and the surrounding districts. Therefore on that ground I believe that this industrial pollution should be stopped.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that this is an instance in which a million people have suffered owing to the pollution of that part of lake Ontario.

We come now to the suggested remedies. The amendment I have introduced gives the minister power to inspect any installation or industry, oil refinery, chemical plant or other works situated on or near a navigable water or a stream entering into that navigable water. This merely means that the minister may, as happened this summer, if the residents of the district are suspicious that a certain industrial plant is polluting the water, send an inspector into that plant to see that the plant is operated in such a way as not to cause pollution of the water. It is reasonable to suggest that this be done. If the plant in question is not polluting the water, nothing is done. If the plant in question is polluting the water, the minister may put in inspectors, or may require the burning or other disposal of the waste product which is being discharged into the lake; or he may take other measures which he and his inspectors, who will be technically trained men, deem to be necessary and proper. If the industry considers that it is not being fairly treated, the appeal, as in all cases, will be to the board of transport commissioners. I feel that that is a necessary qualification in this act. Apparently at the present time, under the Ontario statutes, you can dump anything into lake Ontario and there is nobody to say you nay. If anybody sues you for damage under riparian rights, he can collect small damages, but you cannot prevent the industry in question from continuing to pollute the lake. This is indefensible. I suggest that the amendment I have introduced does not injure any industry which is not polluting the water; nor does it injure any industry that has a proper method of waste disposal.

I come now to the next part of the bill, which concerns sewage disposal. It may surprise hon. members to know that a great number of the larger cities of Canada do in fact discharge raw and untreated sewage right into the rivers or lakes. I understand that the capital city of Ottawa is one of the greatest offenders in this regard. I am also informed that the city of Montreal has no sewage disposal plant. The house will remember the violence of the expressions used some years ago with regard to sewage disposal in Chicago, and that the United States authorities required Chicago to install sewage disposal plants at considerable cost. The city of Chicago did in fact install sewage disposal plants. It seems to me that this whole question of sewage disposal requires a great deal more consideration than it has been given up to the present time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member has already exceeded his time.

Mr. Adamson: I thought that on introducing a bill I could continue beyond the forty minutes.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: The proper disposal of sewage is a matter requiring the attention of all levels of government, because in many ways it is expensive to install a sewage disposal plant. However, modern sewage disposal plants have been found to be good investments, and modern practice has shown that they can be made to pay their way.

During the summer the concentration of colon bacillus increases as the year goes on, generally reaching the maximum late in August or early in September. It is significant that the curve of the incidence of poliomyelitis almost follows the curve of the increase in concentration of colon bacillus. This is not to say that the colon bacillus is responsible for poliomyelitis, but there is at least circumstantial evidence that this killing disease has an affinity for colon bacillus.

Sewage oxidizes with the turbulence of a river, and tends to dilute and become less dangerous, provided that the concentration in the first instance is not too great. However, if it is too great that does not occur, and the sewage continues to be a menace for many miles down the river. The Ottawa river is a case in point; the sewage discharged by the city of Ottawa causes much discomfort and is a menace to health for a considerable stretch along the river below the city. So much for sewage disposal.

In this bill the penalties are increased above those in the original bill. There has been a decrease in the value of money, and I felt that the penalties for breaches should be increased.

Water is one of Canada's most sacred trusts. The North American continent has three-quarters of the fresh water of the world. A citizen from any other continent coming to North America is impressed by the abundance of fresh water, particularly when he comes to Canada. It is an inheritance which we must guard.

No other country is dependent upon water to the extent that Canada is. No other country develops so much power from water, and no other country uses it to the extent that we do for navigation. In no other country is it put to so much use as a tourist attraction. It seems to me it is the fundamental duty of this parliament and of the whole Canadian people to preserve, maintain and conserve the rivers and lakes of the country as a sacred trust. This is the overriding reason for the introduction of this measure.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to some of the features of this bill. I am sorry I did not have an opportunity to confer with the hon. gentleman. I did not know this bill was coming up until five minutes to three, although he sent a note to my office at 1.40 p.m. I have conferred with the law clerk about the bill. I admit that the bill has a laudable object. I should like to quote a letter which I wrote to the mayor of Toronto, Hiram E. McCallum, in connection with this matter, as follows:

> I forward to you eight copies of Bill No. 6, introduced by Mr. Rodney Adamson, M.P., in the House of Commons, which is up for first reading in the house tonight, Sept. 27.

A letter was also sent to Dr. Ollivier, Law Clerk of the House of Commons, before the bill was up for second reading. The letter reads in part:

> You will note by the bill, as I see it, that if such a bill passes it will prevent the city from using Coatsworth Cut and pouring the liquids from the main drainage works into lake Ontario accordingly.

You may remember that the Don river used to flow into Toronto bay. Then the city spent $30 million on harbour improvements, including the viaduct which now runs across the front of the city. I want to commend the hon. gentleman for introducing this bill, but I should like to call his attention to one feature of it. As I have said, I wrote to Dr. Ollivier, Law Clerk of the House of Commons, who is learned in this subject and has written a textbook. The letter continues:

You might also note that the Globe and Mail in an editorial last Friday approved of the Adamson bill, as did an editorial in the Toronto Telegram of Monday, October 3, although the bill will prevent the city of Toronto from pouring any liquids into lake Ontario. The city spent $50 million on a duplicate intake pipe.

The people of the riding of the hon. member who is proposing this amendment are using that water. It is pure water, and when you turn on the tap it is cold. It is filtered and chlorinated. As much water as would fill this chamber would need only a small quantity of chlorine, about the size of an ink stand.

The city spent $50 million on a duplicate intake pipe off Scarborough beach, and the plans were passed by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). Before the city of Toronto started this $50 million project at Scarborough they applied, under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, to the Minister of Public Works, who must sanction the plans and specifications. After proper notice the various authorities came down here and the minister issued the necessary permit to proceed with the plant.

I want to call your attention to the size of Toronto harbour today, because there are some new members in the house. Under the new definition, Toronto harbour starts at the centre of the Humber river, the dividing line between the city of Toronto and the township, and runs straight south of the Humber river out into lake Ontario for a distance of three miles, thence east about a mile and a half off Toronto island to a point off Woodbine avenue. Woodbine avenue is as far as the harbour improvement runs on the east. Thence it runs inland. That is the new definition of the harbour, and the harbour authorities have the power to prevent pollution in that territory. A lot of money was spent, and the plans were passed by the Minister of Public Works.

The letter to the mayor of Toronto continues as follows:

. . . and formerly we only had one intake pipe off Gibraltar point, Toronto island—

Near the Sick Children's hospital.

—which had not been inspected for thirty-five years. It blew up in 1910 and 1911, and the city was compelled to drink water from lake Ontario, through a tunnel from the lake off Toronto island, thence north to Long pond to the shore tunnel at Mugg's landing, Toronto island, and thence across Toronto bay to the pumping station at the foot of John street.

This civic water is pure water, filtered by the slow sand filtration method at the filtration plant on Toronto island and under chlorination of a small amount. The water is always cold, and we have had hardly any diphtheria or typhoid fever since.

The city built a duplicate intake system costing about $50 million at Victoria park, and has been giving city water to large sections of the county of York to the east, north and west of the city limits proper. These outside places are also being allowed to use Toronto's greatly overtaxed sewage disposal main drainage works in front of the Woodbine race track, where the liquids only are poured after the diversion of the Don river through Coatsworth Cut into lake Ontario accordingly.

I have not had the opportunity yet of conferring with Mr. Adamson about his bill. It also deals with the Don river. As I was born near the banks of the river Don, I know something about that river. There has always been sewage poured into the Don, in my opinion.

Dr. Ollivier, Law Clerk of the House of Commons, gave his opinion on the bill. In my letter to the mayor of the city of Toronto I said:

In my opinion the bill is so worded as to prevent the city from pouring any liquids into lake Ontario in the future, although the city had its plans passed under the Navigable Waters Protection Act by the Minister of Public Works before going ahead with the Scarborough plant. These outside places are also using Toronto's greatly overtaxed sewage disposal works from your main drainage works in front of the Woodbine race track. I shall be glad to give you any further information you wish on the subject.

Dr. Ollivier's opinion is as follows:

If you will so authorize me, I would bring your letter to the attention of Mr. Adamson, with whom I have co-operated in the preparation of his bill.

You will notice that I was careful to provide that not only should noxious products not be discharged in navigable waters but also in all streams or waters which flow into any navigable water.

It is true, as you state, that the Toronto harbour commission has the right to pass bylaws and rules and regulations preventing pollution of waters within their boundary—

That is the new boundary which I explained a few minutes ago.

—and therefore it would not be a bad idea to make it clear that the prescription applies to them as well as to any municipality, although I imagine that the words "any other person shall . . . allow to be discharged . . ." would cover the case.

As to the city of Toronto, they would by the bill be prevented from pouring their liquids at Coatsworth Cut, etc.

It is the opinion of the law clerk, and I gave him the same opinion some time ago, that the city of Toronto would be prevented from doing so by the bill. They would be prevented from pouring liquids into Coatsworth Cut, and using the main drainage works accordingly.

I am sorry to have to take this stand, because I believe that the hon. member had a laudable objective in mind in bringing his proposal before the house. As you know, Toronto harbour is now fenced off. I remember when the people of Toronto used to be able to bathe at the beaches at Parkdale and all over Toronto island, and at the eastern beaches. That was before the harbour improvement began, but the harbour improvement fenced it off, and there was only one bathing place. They constructed a bath house at Sunnyside which cost $400,000. I did not believe in it myself, and I voted against it when the matter was before the harbour board. I was then mayor, and we were told if we did not proceed with the plan they would stop the work at Ottawa. They spent $400,000 on a bath house at Sunnyside, but the water of the lake is always too cold for the bathers. The result was that the city had to build a very large open air swimming pool at Sunnyside to the east of the bath house. The water of this pool is chlorinated and filtered and is always at a temperature of not less than sixty-five degrees.

When members of the House of Commons visited Toronto last April they saw it, but it was not opened until May. I wish they could have seen it in the summertime, but we hope to have them come to see us again. We hope that some members will be coming up to attend the winter fair.

I do not know that there is anything more I can say about the bill. I do not wish to detain the house longer, but I want to point out that the city of Toronto has been most just and generous to these outlying municipalities. They not only give them water, but they also allow them to use the main drainage works. Otherwise some of those municipalities, which are not very well off, would have had to build their own water plants, and they would be getting their water in the same way as they do in other cities where diphtheria and typhoid are more prevalent.

In 1910 the old intake at Toronto island broke up. I was on the board of control in 1910. They tried for two years to raise the original intake pipe off Gibraltar point, which is near the Sick Children's hospital. Then I got Mr. Robert Weddell, senior, of Trenton, who built the western entrance to Toronto harbour, and Captain John Manley. They went out there at seven o'clock in the morning. They said that the principle that had been followed in trying to raise the broken intake pipe off Toronto island by pontoons was all wrong. I was opposed to that myself, and the powerful Toronto Telegram came to our support. Mr. Weddell and Captain Manley went out with two scows, and a diver went down. One scow was placed on each side of the broken intake pipe; the diver put cables at both ends of that pipe and after about five hours work it was hauled up to a scow and afterwards brought to the foot of John street. It was repaired in about ten days and replaced in the original position off Toronto island.

That shows what can be done by an efficient public works department. Public leaders may be here today and gone tomorrow, and the key to good municipal government is to have good heads of departments. During the seven years I was in office in Toronto, with the exception of one or two departments, I doubt if I discussed matters in their own offices with the heads of the various departments of that city. They had full authority in regard to policy and full authority to appoint their staffs. I never interfered.

I commend the hon. gentleman Mr. Adamson on the good work he has done, because he has been a most valuable member of this house; but I would ask that he allow this bill to stand until he has conferred with officials of the city of Toronto. I do not want to prevent anyone from speaking on the bill today; far from it. I would ask the hon. gentleman, however, to consider the Toronto angle. Throughout his riding they are using that drinking water. It is pure and cold, chlorinated and filtered. They also use the sewage disposal works; otherwise they would have to provide their own water supply and sewage works, at great expense. The city of Toronto has been most just and generous, and I believe many other cities could adopt the method followed by that great city. It is a great city, though we have no ministers representing it in the cabinet. Now, however, we have some young Liberal members of parliament on the government side coming from Toronto, and I hope they will study this bill and help look after the interests of that city.

While I commend the young member for his good intentions and good works, I would remind him as well as hon. gentlemen opposite that you can never answer a newspaper; it always has the last word. I believe the newspapers had a worthy object in view in endeavouring to give the people of Toronto some of the bathing beaches they had in the old days, but I regret to say that the way they have attempted to attain their objective does not meet the needs of the case.

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston City): I believe the hon. member who introduced this bill put forth a sincere effort, and perhaps had a real grievance, but I should like to refer very briefly to one or two points in connection with it. This bill proposes to repeal section 19 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. If we read that section closely we will see that it deals with the physical aspects of navigation, with the turning of propellers, the obstruction to ships, and so on. If we read the proposed section 19 (1), however, it all boils down to the pollution of the water. I suggest that the amendment takes away the real meaning of the original section 19, dealing with the physical aspects of navigation; and we all realize that the act then would be incomplete, because a ship could still travel in polluted waters. That is the first comment I have to offer, and I suggest that the present section 19 should remain as it is.

No one likes a drink of pure water better than I do, but I think we must look at this from the standpoint of the greatest good to the greatest number. I live in Kingston, which is an old, historic city. Some of the newer places may consider us a little old-fashioned, because our sewage is still poured into lake Ontario where it enters the St. Lawrence river. Occasionally we have complaints as far as the water is concerned; but if this bill were adopted I suggest it would work a great hardship on the ratepayers of Kingston and other municipalities similarly situated, which dispose of their sewage in that way. I am sure the number of ratepayers who would be adversely affected would be much greater than the number of people who would benefit, because the adoption of this bill would require the immediate installation of sewage disposal plants.

In his amendment the hon. member has suggested some remedies. I do not believe they would be sufficient to give proper guidance to those who might be administering this legislation. Furthermore I believe this is a matter which should be left to the province, since it concerns property and civil rights. I suggest that it has been brought up in the wrong house. Section 2 of the proposed bill reads:

> The said act is further amended by adding immediately after section twenty-six the following section:
> "26A. (1) The minister may, if he has reason to believe that an industrial plant is likely to discharge noxious substances into navigable waters, or into any river, stream or other water which flows into any navigable water, appoint inspectors, empowered to reside at the plant and report any violation of the provisions of the act. The cost of maintaining such inspectors shall be chargeable against and a debt owing the crown by the owner, lessee or operator of the plant."

I think that is definitely a matter of property and civil rights, and I suggest this parliament is not empowered to pass any measure of that kind. So while I agree with the principle put forward by the hon. member, I suggest that at the present time this bill is premature as far as the older municipalities are concerned, such as Kingston, Belleville, Napanee and so on. I believe it is a proper matter to be considered by the province in which the situation arises, and not by the federal authorities.

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, the constituency I have the honour to represent is very much interested in the bill which has been introduced in this house by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson). My constituency consists of the city of Windsor and the contiguous township of Sandwich West. It is situated at the junction of lake St. Clair and the Detroit river, which incidentally is the busiest inland waterway in the world. South of that, there is lake Erie. You can see, therefore, that the pollution of waters is a matter of great importance to us; and many worthy local organizations have been studying this problem for some time.

At this time, I should like to pay tribute to the valuable work of the international joint commission. The facts that it has uncovered and the recommendations it has made from time to time for the correction of the pollution of fresh waters have proven very valuable to my constituents. I should like to be associated with that a tribute to one who sat in this chamber, the Hon. James Glen. He also served as Minister of Mines and Resources and is now chairman of the international joint commission. The constituency of Essex West appreciates the work he has done.

Many public and semi-public bodies have taken a great deal of interest in assisting the different governmental organizations in uncovering the facts. One of these organizations is the Essex County Sportsmen's Association. I have before me two telegrams, one from Mr. L. Albrough, the president, and the other from the secretary-treasurer, Mr. S. E. Chauvin, in which they have asked me to support the bill on behalf of the 1,800 members of that particular branch of the sportsmen's association. It is their feeling that this is a step in the right direction. The members of the association are deeply interested in this work and have, therefore, asked me to support the bill.

For reasons which I shall give later, I do not think that this is the proper time to support such a measure. I do, however, believe the principle of the bill is a laudable one which should be supported by all hon. members. For the reasons that have been given by the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Henderson), and which I imagine will be given by the Minister of Transport in due course, I do not believe this is the proper place to introduce such a measure.

In my constituency we are deeply concerned about the pollution of navigable fresh waters. The Essex County Sportsmen's Association has done a great deal, as I have said, to uncover the facts concerning this matter. As a matter of fact, this summer that organization took me on a tour of the Detroit river, showing me a place where a particular corporation is now pumping refuse from the United States and dumping it on an island in that river. It is the claim of the experts who accompanied us on this trip that the refuse being dumped on this island has caused the foliage, weeds, and things of that nature in the area to dry up and disappear. This, of course, has caused the disappearance of the fish and wildlife from that area. I am drawing this to the attention of the government because permission was given recently for the installation of additional pipe lines to carry this refuse from the United States. The chemicals from the refuse which has accumulated in piles on the island are flowing into the stream.

The city of Windsor has, I understand, made plans for the treating of the sewage from the city and adjacent towns. There are other sources of pollution. A rather serious case was brought to our attention recently in which one of the public utilities was allowing oil to enter what is known as the river Canard. This oil became ignited and killed thousands of dollars' worth of fish, muskrat and other game. I do not propose to deal with the legal aspects of the matter, because that will be ably handled at a later time. Many people, and particularly those who have riparian rights, have suffered considerable damage because of the pollution of these waters, not only in the streams I have mentioned but in many others as well. We must consider, however, the place from which relief should be sought, and my opinion is that this measure should have been introduced in the legislature of the province of Ontario.

The introduction of this bill has value in that it will provide publicity for this particular question, the pollution of fresh water, not only in my constituency but throughout the whole of Canada. It will provide a subject of conversation and will arouse the Canadian people generally to the great harm being done innocently by industries in the pollution of these streams. Large commercial corporations will also learn of the loss they are suffering in permitting this refuse to go into these rivers. Some of this refuse has a high commercial value. Without giving too many illustrations, I may say that I have been told by experts of several cases in the Detroit river and lake St. Clair area in which, after investigation, the industries in question were told how to eliminate the pollution of the water and, at the same time, derive considerable commercial value from the refuse that had been dumped in the river.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this bill has had some value in the publicity which will be given the subject. For the reasons I have stated I cannot support the bill, but I can commend the principle of it to the Canadian people.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale): I am fortunate enough, Mr. Speaker, to represent the riding of Parkdale in Toronto. I say "fortunate" advisedly since I am the first Liberal to represent that riding since confederation.

I have listened with great interest and with great respect to the argument for and the clear explanation of the bill placed before the house by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson). My riding of Parkdale fronts on lake Ontario, and at the south of it is Sunnyside beach. As has been stated by the hon. member for York West, that beach was covered with oil for most of the summer. I could hardly help being in complete sympathy with the motivation behind the first section of this bill. While my sympathy is there, however, what little reason I possess tells me that we are in the wrong jurisdiction. I would suggest with respect, and I have not made a constitutional study of this bill, that the dominion, under section 91 of the British North America Act, has jurisdiction over navigation and shipping; and that, accordingly, unless we are dealing with the matter of navigation and shipping, we are dealing with something which is not within the legislative powers of this parliament.

In the bill presented here, it would appear to be a fairly clear case of trying to prevent pollution. It is possible that pollution might affect navigation and shipping. I can conceive of pollution being so heavy and so burdensome that it would cover the bottom of a river or canal to the point that navigation might be difficult or impossible. But until such a thing happens or is in danger of happening—and again I offer this opinion with the greatest respect to the hon. members of this house—I personally feel that the matter would not come under navigation and shipping. Possibly also, if the liquid became so thick that it hindered navigation to the point that it lessened the normal speed of vessels, it might be considered under navigation and shipping. While I not only sympathize with the motives behind this bill, and only wish it were possible for us to pass a bill of this kind, in so far as section 1 of it is concerned, I nevertheless submit with respect that this parliament has no jurisdiction.

As to section 2 of the bill—and at this stage I am not proposing to go into the particulars of the sections; I am dealing with the bill generally—I would welcome it with the greatest of delight. It would give the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) the power to send inspectors into the industries throughout Canada for the purpose of preventing pollution, and the industries in question would pay the salaries of those inspectors. That is a delightful dream that we politicians have had for many years. I can just conceive of the minister sending thousands and thousands of Liberal devotees into the industries of Canada, and having those industries pay for those inspectors. This is something that all politicians have dreamed of but have never dared to hope for.

I must confess that I am surprised to see subsection 2 of section 2 in the bill, coming as it does from the hon. member for York West, a member of the Progressive Conservative party. Hon. members will observe that the governor in council is authorized to prescribe for the violation of this section such penalties as he may deem necessary. The hon. gentleman is proposing that we pass an order in council.

In the learned and delicate manner in which this matter was handled by the hon. member for York West, he has taken a simple matter of pollution and worked it up so that it has reached the lofty pinnacle of human rights. That is no mean accomplishment. In view of the heights to which this pollution has risen, I would humbly suggest to the hon. member for York West that he withdraw this bill and make it a section of that bill which has been so often recommended to this house by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker).

I should like to support this bill with regard to section 1. I think it would be a delightful thing if we had jurisdiction to deal with this matter. I am anxious to clear up this situation in the interests not only of my own constituency but of contiguous ridings. One cannot help sympathizing with the motive behind this bill. This matter of pollution is a nuisance, having been for generations injurious to health and in many other ways as well. Steps should be taken to remedy the situation. I cannot think of anything that is more necessary throughout the provinces of this country. As I suggested earlier, I do not feel that it is a matter for the parliament of Canada to deal with, but that opinion is again offered humbly and with respect.

I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, if we could not have the views of the Minister of Transport on this matter. He doubtless has a clear conception of the constitutionality of the bill before the house. It would be a distinct pleasure to me to have his views if he sees fit to offer them at this time.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I have listened with interest, Mr. Speaker, to this debate which has been participated in by members on both sides of the house. I think there will be general agreement with the intention of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) and the purpose he had in mind when he introduced this bill. It is a laudable thing for the hon. member to seek to protect the waters of lake Ontario and those of other lakes and streams against pollution by oil and other chemical products. No one who has the interests of his constituents at heart wants to see the beaches—whether they be on lake Ontario or on any of our other lakes and streams—polluted to the extent to which the hon. gentleman has made reference. But, however laudable is the intention of the hon. member for York West, there can be no doubt that there would not be the slightest use of attempting to find a remedy in a place which has no jurisdiction, to begin with, and never could have it in any sense of the word.

I said that I listened with interest to the debate which has taken place. I do not think I need to speak at great length because several of the members who have spoken have challenged the validity of this proposed act, even a member on the same side of the house as the hon. member for York West. I refer to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), who is a lawyer and who I think immediately realized—as did the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Henderson) and the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter)—the futility of attempting, by the method suggested, to deal with a serious situation such as that complained about. I think my friend the hon. member for York West presented an excellent argument—and as I listened to him he piled up argument after argument—for provincial intervention, but certainly not for dominion intervention. He started off by saying that the amendment contained two principles. One was the protection of riparian rights. Surely the federal government has no jurisdiction with reference to riparian rights. It is a question of property and civil rights, which falls under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

The hon. member cited the case of McKie v. K.V.P., 1941, 1 D.L.R. at page 39, which is clear evidence against him that this is a matter for provincial, and not federal, jurisdiction. Then he went on to say that the real reason for introducing the bill was to do away with pollution of waters. Pollution is a matter which concerns health and therefore falls under the jurisdiction of the province.

I do not want to repeat what the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter), the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Henderson) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) said, but let me summarize in one word if I may the legal argument, dealing with only one factual argument afterwards.

The hon. member seeks to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act. That act is divided into three parts. The first part deals with works which are built in navigable waters and is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works. The second part concerns the protection, the obstruction, the interference and the impeding of navigation and is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport. The third part has to do with the installation of ferry cable crossings, swing bridges and the like, and is also under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport. The part with which we are concerned at the moment is part II, clearly that which concerns the protection of navigation. The whole intent of part II of the Navigable Waters Protection Act is to protect navigation. The words say so. The whole intent of my hon. friend's bill is to do away with pollution. His bill clearly says so, or at least section 19 (1) does. I will not read it all because it is somewhat lengthy, but the governing words of section 19 (1) are these:

> . . . which has the effect of polluting the water into which it enters or is liable to pollute such waters.

In one word the act deals with the protection of navigation, and in another word the bill deals with the pollution of waters. The latter is a matter of health and therefore is one falling under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Subsection (2) is clearly ultra vires. It says:

> No municipality with a population greater than three thousand shall discharge or permit the discharge by its officers, servants, or employees of raw sewage into navigable water or into any other water which flows into navigable water.

Section 92, paragraph 8, of the British North America Act states:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—
> Municipal institutions in the province.

My hon. friend would want this parliament to legislate with reference to municipal institutions in the province. He provides in his bill for direction to the municipalities. Clearly that section is equally ultra vires. The same may be said of section 26A (1)—and I am repeating here the argument of the hon. member for Parkdale and the hon. member for Kingston City, when I maintain that section 26A (1) of the bill is straight interference with property and civil rights. What right would the Minister of Transport have to direct or instruct the owners of provincial plants? What right would he have to place officers in those institutions, the direction over which lies with the provinces? It would be straight interference with property and civil rights. I think the same can be said of subsection 2 of section 26A (1), which would constitute another interference with municipal institutions.

The explanatory note of the bill indicates what the hon. gentleman had in mind. It states:

> The purpose of this act is to control industrial plants and oil refineries situated on navigable waters, . . .

I submit with deference that this house has no jurisdiction to control industrial plants and oil refineries simply because they are situated on navigable water. We have certain jurisdiction over navigable waters by virtue of part II of the act. For instance, section 19 is intended to keep channels free of logs, sawdust, edgings, slabs and other things which may impede navigation; but in no sense can oil be said to impede navigation, certainly not in the sense that this bill contemplates. Then the explanatory note goes on to say:

> . . . so that their operation does not result in the pollution of the surrounding water area and shore line.

The word "pollution" and the words, "shore line" clearly indicate to me that these are matters concerning property and civil rights and therefore come under provincial jurisdiction. The last sentence of the explanatory note reads:

> These three new sections merely enlarge the scope of the original act . . .

This is not a true statement of fact. The three new sections do not merely enlarge the scope of the act; they change entirely the intention of the act. The act is for the protection of navigation; the bill deals with protection against pollution; therefore it is not an enlargement of the scope, it is a change in the nature of the act. The explanatory note goes on to say:

> . . . which dealt solely with the pollution of navigable waters by sawmills.

The act does not deal with the pollution of navigable waters; it is concerned with navigation and the protection of navigation.

I do not think I need elaborate on the legal points any further. The hon. member will agree that the house is sympathetic toward him, and appreciates the feelings of the people who have suffered because of the pollution. But clearly this is not the forum where the remedy should be found.

The matter is one which has been of particular interest to me because in the city of Cornwall, whence I come, a similar situation has arisen from time to time, and the position taken there was the same as that now taken.

It might interest the house to know that in 1946 the international joint commission was asked to consider the problem of pollution of waters in so far as they were international, and they were asked by the Department of Transport to undertake a survey of such waters in order to determine the factors responsible for pollution and to recommend appropriate steps to the respective governments of Canada and the United States, because it was felt at that time by myself and the officers of the department that this was far too important a question not to be given the best possible attention. For that reason the international joint commission, which was asked to take it under advisement, appointed an advisory board of eight technicians, four from Canada—two from the Department of National Health and Welfare and two from the provincial department of health of Ontario—and four from the United States.

The first part of this advisory board's report, covering the waters between lake Superior and lake Erie, will be presented to the international joint commission on October 12, 1949. The second section of their report, covering the waters between lake Erie and lake Ontario, is in the course of preparation and will not be available when the findings of the field staff are fully analysed. This survey, I need hardly say, concerns the pollution of international boundary waters from all causes and not from oil alone. Its terms of reference do not cover the bodies of water between lake Ontario and the end of the international section of the St. Lawrence river near Cornwall.

If it meets with the approval of the house I am perfectly willing to ask the international joint commission to add to its survey the additional international waters extending from the head of lake Ontario to the international boundary at Cornwall.

I think it will meet the wishes of all hon. members, in part at least, if a practical suggestion is made in regard to an attempt to assist those who have suffered by the pollution of waters. But to endeavour to do it by an act of this parliament or by this bill would be, I believe, a serious mistake, even if it could be done, which it cannot. Such legislation would be challenged immediately and I have no doubt would be declared ultra vires.

Therefore I have to inform the house that, for the reasons given, the government cannot accept this bill. I would hope that what I have said will meet the feeling of the house and that perhaps the hon. gentleman will be willing to withdraw his bill.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, before this debate closes I should like to say a few words. First, I wish to congratulate the hon. member upon having introduced this bill, bringing this important matter to the attention of the house and thereby to the attention of the country. This matter of pollution has been overlooked too long in many places in Canada up to the present time.

While I support the principle of the bill I quite agree with the legalistic argument of the minister as far as the jurisdiction of this house to pass this legislation is concerned. I do not think we can deal with this situation adequately until there is a national policy on pollution of rivers as a result of co-operation between the federal and provincial governments. Therefore I do not think it is sufficient for the minister just to give a legalistic argument in reply to the hon. member who has introduced this bill.

I would point out to the minister that the present act deals with the pollution of navigable waters by saw mills, but even those provisions are not enforced. I should like the minister to tell the house at some time the procedure that is followed for the enforcement of those provisions in the act.

Mr. Chevrier: The procedure is to bring into operation sections 27 to 30 of the act which provide penalties for anyone who obstructs navigation contrary to the sections of part I of the act. Any person may proceed under those sections.

Mr. Herridge: This question of navigable waters is a most interesting one because we get so many constitutional definitions. I have had navigable waters explained to me as being under the jurisdiction of the federal government in so far as they are being used for navigation, and as being under the jurisdiction of the provinces when they are being used for the development of power. So far I have not had any clear explanation of the jurisdiction that applies so far as pollution is concerned.

I might say that I was in the provincial legislature of British Columbia some years ago and at that time I brought up the question of the pollution of navigable waters. I was then told that it was a federal matter. We certainly are not going to get anywhere with this matter by simply giving legal explanations for inaction. The only hope we can have of solving this question is through co-operation with the provinces. This is a most important matter in many parts of this country. When considering a problem I always like to find out what others have done and in this connection I have read some United States literature. That country being older and more densely populated, the question has become more intense and serious. From what I read, the different states have had considerable difficulty in connection with the pollution of navigable and other waters. I should like to read to the house details of the policy that has been developed by Pennsylvania as the result of years of study and experience. Here is the policy now in effect in the state of Pennsylvania:

> Under this, the streams of the country, upon the basis of their use in transporting sewage and industrial wastes, may be classified into three groups, as has been done by the sanitary water board of Pennsylvania:
> Class A: Relatively clean and pure streams. Streams in their natural state probably subject to chance contamination by human beings but unpolluted or uncontaminated from any artificial source, hence generally fit for domestic water supply after chlorination, will support fish life and may be safely used for recreational purposes.

I recognize that in dealing with this question there has to be a compromise between theory and practice. I am giving the house these classifications because from what I have read I think they represent a proper compromise between theory and practice. I continue:

> Class B: Streams in which pollution shall be controlled. Streams more or less polluted, where the extent of regulation, control, or elimination of pollution will be determined by a consideration of (a) The present and probable future use and condition of the stream; (b) The practicability of remedial measures for abatement of pollution; and (c) The general interests of the public through the protection of the public health, the health of animals, fish and aquatic life, and the use of the stream for recreational purposes.
> Class C: Polluted streams. Streams now so polluted that they cannot be used as sources of public water supplies, will not support fish life and are not used for recreational purposes and also from the standpoint of the public interests and practicability it is not now necessary, economical, or advisable to attempt to restore them to a clean condition.
> All artificial pollution of Class A streams is prohibited. Any sewage or industrial wastes on the watershed are to be treated to such a degree that the effluent shall be practically free from suspended matter, nonputrescent and disinfected. Recreational use shall not be sanctioned within prejudicial influence of waterworks' intakes.
> The degree of treatment of sewage and industrial wastes discharged into Class B streams is to be determined for each particular stream or portion thereof after consideration of the general interests of the public and the economics of the particular case.
> Sewage and industrial wastes may be discharged into Class C streams provided that they do not create a public nuisance or menace to health.

I have read that outline of classification as far as pollution of streams is concerned because I think it is the basis for a sound approach to the whole situation in Canada. I hope that, now the member has brought the matter to the attention of the house, something will be done about it. It is obviously a matter of great interest to quite a number of members, and I hope that the minister will explore the question beyond the legal aspect in order that it may be taken up with the provinces to see if something cannot be done, by co-operation between the provinces and the federal government, to develop a national policy regarding the pollution of navigable and other waters.

Mr. Adamson: I understand that if I speak now I close the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): In closing the debate, may I say that I am grateful for the legal opinions offered by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). I do not disagree with him, but the original act simply refers to sawdust, edgings, slabs, bark or rubbish of any description whatsoever being discharged into any river or stream. Perhaps bark or slabs may be considered a menace to navigation, but certainly sawdust and rubbish cannot be considered any more a menace to navigation than oil slicks which, as has been pointed out, foul the bottoms of ships, create a considerable fire hazard, upset the internal operations of condensers for cooling water, thus making it impossible to obtain drinking water from the lakes, and in other ways interfere with the operation of ships.

I submit that the bill is intra vires because of the way section 19 now reads. However, I will not press that, because I am grateful to the minister for having suggested that the international joint commission will undertake a study of the matter of pollution. The Canadian members of the international joint commission were appointed by this house. At the present time they are studying and reporting on the subject of pollution although it is considered to be ultra vires of this house. I merely mention that as an example of the tortuous reasonings and difficulties that we get into on the constitutional question of whether a bill such as mine is ultra vires of the jurisdiction of the house.

Sewage disposal was mentioned by several members who seem to object to some treatment of raw sewage before it is discharged into the waters of the country. Let me say to them that eventually the discharging of raw sewage will be prohibited. Eventually an enlightened public opinion will see to it that raw sewage is treated. My suggestion was that a start should be made at once because the longer it goes on, and the larger the cities grow, the more difficult the solution of the problem will be.

I had hoped that the bill might be sent to the railway committee where experts on the matter of pollution, people who know the problem, and interested industrialists could get together and give evidence from which a suitable bill might have been evolved and presented to the house. That is not the wish of the government, however, so that cannot happen. I think it is a pity because, despite the question of jurisdiction, despite the legal arguments, the members of this house are sent here to protect the interests of their constituents. I feel that the pollution of navigable waters not only creates a hazard to navigation for the reasons I have given, but also is a considerable menace to the people who live beside these navigable waters.

Motion (Mr. Adamson) negatived on division.

MEAT PACKING INDUSTRY

WORKS AND UNDERTAKINGS DECLARED TO BE FOR THE GENERAL ADVANTAGE OF CANADA

The house resumed from Friday, September 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North) for the second reading of Bill No. 5, to declare the meat packing industry works for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Before we proceed to vote on this measure to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act I want to say a few words. I believe that the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Winnipeg North is of great importance not only to the meat packing industry but to Canada as a whole. I believe it can be regarded as a bill which is in line with words used in the British North America Act, "for the peace, order and good government of Canada." Its object of course is to take into consideration that part of the meat packing industry that carries on operations in two or more provinces, subject of course to paragraph (c) of section 53 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, and therefore to give parliament the right to intervene in disputes of nation-wide importance. Section 92 of the British North America Act sets out the powers conferred upon the provinces at confederation. In my reading of the English language and the act, not placing a strictly legalistic interpretation upon the words, it seems to me it was clearly intended that provincial legislatures should have jurisdiction over all matters of provincial interest. Paragraph 10 states this very clearly, when it excepts:

> Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:

Then, as hon. members will remember, it enumerates undertakings which clearly cut across provincial boundaries and are indeed of national consequence. For example, it states:

> Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province.

Then subparagraph (c) adds this:

> Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

At the time of confederation there was no meat packing industry as we understand it today. Under conditions then existing the community was served by many small butcher shops. The butcher slaughtered the cattle and served the community with the meat. He was in close relationship with the agricultural producer, the farmer, whom he usually knew and from whom he bought his cattle; and he knew the members of the community who would buy at his shop. That was the situation some eighty years ago. In this country today, however, as in the United States and some other countries, that primitive butchering industry has given way to a nation-wide packing industry. In our own country we not only find that industry nation-wide; in the main we find it in the hands of three great companies. There are smaller packing concerns, of course, but the dominant companies in that field are Canada Packers, Swift Canadian and Burns Limited. Those three companies employ thousands of people from one end of this country to the other. They purchase their livestock not directly from the farmers but largely through commission agents in a few large centres. In the same way their products are sold all across the country through various agencies. So the industry is entirely different from that which was known at the time of confederation.

From my reading of the debates and of what transpired at that time, I believe the fathers of confederation saw that there might be an evolution in this country and that, in the process of such evolution, undertakings, as they put it, which at that time were of local significance serving only a community or a province, might be extended to become something much greater and much wider. So they put in section 92 the words to which I have referred, which I believe have a bearing on this discussion. No longer is the farmer dependent upon an understanding with the local butcher for the marketing of his animals. He ships them great distances. In my own province they are shipped to Moose Jaw, Saskatoon and Regina; and often the farmer ships them beyond the boundaries of his own province, to Winnipeg, east to Toronto, and so on. So anything which interferes with the operation of that industry, not only in individual localities but from one end of the country to the other, seriously embarrasses the farmer. We discovered that in 1947, when a dispute between these companies and their employees held up the marketing of stock which was ready for the market, and caused not only serious inconvenience to the agricultural community but serious loss to agricultural producers. In the same way and at the same time the consumers who were dependent upon this nation-wide industry were also greatly embarrassed by the shortage of meat which occurred during the strike. As for the men engaged in the industry, organized in a nation-wide union rather than in provincial units of a union, they were denied the wages upon which they depended for their livelihood, and the whole matter was such that it caused serious difficulty all across the country.

During the war years and subsequently, in 1945 and 1946, when similar disputes occurred, they could be negotiated and a settlement assisted under federal jurisdiction, but in 1947 there was no such federal authority. The strike was prolonged, and the packing house workers were compelled to negotiate in the various provinces. As a result the farmer lost, the worker lost, and the community suffered grave inconvenience. So I say this industry is no longer a matter of purely local interest. It is of nation-wide concern; and I believe this parliament should do as it did in the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company some time ago—declare this an industry of national importance and therefore coming under the legislation to which I have just referred.

As I said a few moments ago, this is a matter of nation-wide concern; and if I can read the English language it seems clear that it would certainly fall under subparagraph (c) of subsection 10 of section 92, which declares:

> Such works as, although wholly situate within the province—

Then I omit the words I read previously:

> —declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

With our experience in 1945 and 1946, when the Department of Labour, acting under legislation passed by this parliament and powers granted by this parliament, had the right to assist in the negotiation and settlement of such disputes, so today in peacetime, if the same situation arises, because of the same national considerations dealing with a nation-wide industry, we believe the same good offices should be exercised by the federal authority.

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to prolong the debate. I merely rose to say that in our opinion and in the opinion of the employees organized in the packing house industry, in the interests of the agricultural community and the consumers of Canada generally who are, of course, vitally affected when a dispute arises in an industry of this nation-wide significance, we should adopt the amendment suggested in Bill No. 5. This would enable our Department of Labour to assist in negotiations which may be necessary from time to time between the employees and the owners of the meat packing industry, which we contend is of nation-wide concern and of nation-wide importance, and thus should be subject to nation-wide jurisdiction.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, before a vote is taken on this bill, I should like to say a word or two. It is not my intention to speak for long or to hold up the bill at all. It does seem to me that the bill is suggesting a change which would affect the provinces materially. So far as I am aware, none of the provinces have complained or asked for co-operation from the federal government in the management of its labour relations with the packing industry.

It is my view that this legislation does come within the purview of the provinces. Until such time as the provinces have made a request for dominion government assistance or co-operation in having this industry brought under the national labour code, I cannot see where benefits would flow from our interference with the relationship as it exists today. I believe the matter should remain as it is until the provinces make such a request. I am a little suspicious, Mr. Speaker, of centralizing any power of this character. I can see a great danger to labour and to the country generally in it. There is too much centralization at Ottawa now. For the reasons I have given, although I am not going further into them now, I shall have to vote against the bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise to speak for a few moments because of the argument advanced by the member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). It is an argument that has been advanced by others who have taken part in this debate, namely, that there has been no formal request from the provinces for this particular change. It seems to me that argument is another example of waiting until after the horse is stolen before locking the barn door. The fact of the matter is that, during the last serious dispute in the packing house industry, a number of provinces did request federal government assistance in conciliation. One of the difficulties at that time was that the provinces were not unanimous in asking the federal government to take over the matter, and this prevented effective action at the proper time. If we are going to use wisdom in the matter, surely that experience would lead us to make preparations for future disputes of this kind. It does seem to me that the arguments that have been put forward as to the nation-wide character of this industry and the argument advanced by my leader as to the interest in this matter on the part of consumers, workers in the packing house industry and our farmers who produce the livestock, make an affirmative vote by members of this house the part of wisdom.

At this time, I should like to deal with an argument advanced the other night by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll). The last time this bill was before the house the discussion hinged largely on the constitutional point. The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond even went so far as to contend there was a difference in value between section 92, 10 (a) and section 92, 10 (c) of the British North America Act. He argued that the federal parliament did not have as much power under section 92, 10 (c) as under section 92, 10 (a). As I have often had to remark, I am not a lawyer, but it does seem to me to be clear, even from such law as I have learned sitting in this house, that if this parliament has a power assigned to it by the British North America Act it has all the powers that flow therefrom. If this government is assigned the powers set out in section 92, 10 (c), which have been quoted a number of times, we have the powers that flow from it.

Parliament has used that power a number of times. Grain elevators have been declared works for the general advantage of Canada. A similar declaration was made with regard to the Beauharnois Light, Heat and Power Company. Two or three years ago a bill was passed in connection with the Quebec, North Shore and Labrador railway in which a clause was inserted making it a work for the general advantage of Canada. Reference has already been made during the course of this debate to the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company whose property is astride the Manitoba-Saskatchewan boundary; its works were declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. In all of these cases the federal parliament has exercised its power as provided by the constitution. When members rise in this debate, as they have, and contend that this would be opening the door, they fail to remember that the door is already open. The suggestions of my leader have been carried out and there has been a recognition of the fact that times have changed since 1867. Some of the things the fathers of confederation did not know would come into existence are here today, and we have in some respects tried to keep up with the times.

Since this matter was up the last time, I was interested in discovering a reference to possible uses to be made of section 92, 10 (c) of the British North America Act, which is found in volume 2 of the report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, generally known as the Rowell-Sirois report, at page 201. This section deals generally with the problem of railway and highway competition and the commissioners indicate the kind of use that might be made of section 92, 10 (c). I want to quote this paragraph:

> The situation may, however, not be permanent since main motor highways might possibly be brought under dominion jurisdiction under section 92, subsection 10, of the British North America Act, which provided that local works and undertakings wholly situate within a province may be declared by parliament to be for the general advantage of Canada or of two or more provinces. By the exercise of the declaratory power, parliament attained jurisdiction over many railways wholly situated within a province, and over grain elevators. While the term "works" awaits definite judicial definition, there would seem to be no reason why it would not cover highways of the type indicated. Thus, Hon. Mr. Meighen, while the proposed transport act was being considered by the senate standing committee, February 10, 1937, said: "It would not be unreasonable to declare that the trans-Canada highway was a work for the general advantage of Canada."

I quote that to indicate that it is recognized that the door is open wherever it is desirable or necessary to bring under federal jurisdiction undertakings that are of nation-wide importance.

I should like to mention another point in that connection, and that is that in the labour code itself the language in section 92, 10 (c) of the British North America Act is quoted. Then, we go one step further in the labour code, which is chapter 54 of the statutes of 1948, by this enactment in section 54:

> Part I of this act shall apply in respect of any corporation established to perform any function or duty on behalf of the government of Canada and in respect of employees of such corporation, except any such corporation, and the employees thereof, that the governor in council excludes from the provisions of part I.

I do not know what action has been taken under that section with regard to the Polymer Corporation at Sarnia, where we make synthetic rubber. But unless the governor in council has excepted it from the provisions of this act, it is a crown corporation and as such comes under the provisions of the national labour code.

Some hon. members have said that this bill would bring a number of small local plants under the provisions of the national labour code. Not so, because the bill proposed by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) applies only in the case where a meat-packing firm operates in two or more provinces.

It has been a bit of a spectacle to some of us sitting in this chamber to hear these constant emotional appeals to the concept of provincial rights. This is a bill to protect the rights of Canadians in all the provinces; surely that is more important than the autonomous rights of the provinces as separate units. To some of us these sectional appeals hardly seem to square with the stirring speeches we have heard during the course of this very session urging us to recognize our status as Canadians and to establish the greatness of our Canadian nationhood. Here is a chance to protect the rights of the people in the provinces, in particular the rights that are guaranteed to them by the national labour code brought in by this government, if only we will take this step and bring this nation-wide industry under federal jurisdiction with regard to labour matters.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR FORMULATION OF NATIONAL PROGRAM

The house resumed from Monday, October 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacInnis:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should seek the co-operation of the provinces for the purpose of formulating a program of social security that will be national in scope, adequate in its provisions, and that will cover all citizens of Canada in every circumstance where the individual or the family is, for any reason, deprived of the opportunity of earning a living.

Mr. Speaker: Before hon. members proceed with this resolution I would ask them to consider whether its carriage would require the expenditure of money, and if it would require the expenditure of money whether it is in order at this time. Some time during the evening I shall make a ruling on the resolution and I should be glad now to hear any representations in that regard.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the motion is now the property of the house, but if a decision is to be made this evening I should think that it had better be made now. If there is to be further discussion I should like to have the opportunity to reply.

Mr. Speaker: I am prepared to make my ruling now but I thought it only fair to give hon. members an opportunity to express their views. However, if no hon. members desire to express their views I am prepared to give my ruling.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, would it not be better to allow hon. members to give the matter a little thought before you give your decision? I would suggest that one or two hon. members be permitted to speak and then your ruling could be given.

Mr. Speaker: With respect to this resolution I must inform the house that after due reflection I have reached the conclusion that the proposed resolution is in the nature of an order which the government could not ignore and which could not be carried out without the expenditure of public moneys. Citation 437 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, 1943, and Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, fourth edition, page 407, both read in part as follows:

No principle is better understood than the constitutional obligation that rests upon the executive government, of alone initiating measures imposing charges upon the public exchequer.

It is customary for members to introduce resolutions that do not directly involve the expenditure of public money and have no operative effect but simply express an abstract opinion on a matter which may necessitate a future grant. I would refer to Canadian Journals, volume 58, page 100. However, in citation 453, page 171, of Beauchesne's third edition, it is clearly stated that:

The tendency has been in the Canadian House of Commons, for the past 25 years, to rule out all motions purporting to give the government a direc order to do a thing which cannot be done withou an expenditure of money.

In my opinion, the resolution which has been proposed does not simply express an abstract opinion. It seems clear that, if it carried, the government would be bound to comply with its terms and that therefore it is in the nature of a direct order and that the order could not be carried out without an expenditure of public moneys. This expenditure would be greater or less, depending on the manner in which the co-operation of the provinces was sought, but it is evident that some expenditure would be involved and that the expenditure might be considerable. Some modern instances of the tendency to rule out all motions of this character may be found in the Journals of the House of Commons, 1936, at page 52; and 1948, at page 225.

I have gone into this matter quite fully because the resolution was put on the order paper by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). The hon. member has been in the house a long time. I know that he has given a great deal of attention to the rules, and I always give careful consideration to any representations he makes respecting order and procedure in the house. It is only fair that I should go into the matter fully. For the reasons which I have stated I rule that the resolution is out of order.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to challenge your ruling nor shall I even discuss it. As a matter of fact, I am of the opinion that your point is well taken. I used the word "should", not in the sense of giving instructions to the government but in the sense in which it is sometimes used, that it would be desirable if such a thing were done. The word "should" is used in that sense quite often. I accept your ruling and if conditions are not changed before the next session, I shall propose this resolution in a more acceptable form.

CRIMINAL CODE

PORTRAYAL OF CRIMES BY PICTURES IN MAGAZINES, ETC., TENDING TO INDUCE VIOLENCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, October 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fulton for the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the Criminal Code (portrayal of crimes).

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): In the absence of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) may I suggest to the hon. member that he permit this bill to stand. The Minister of Justice is most interested i the subject matter of the bill and the government would not like to see the debate concluded in his absence.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate fully the fact that the Minister of Justice is unavoidably absent and quite naturally I would not wish to see a conclusion forced on this matter in his absence, perhaps in the form of a vote. However, this is the fourth Thursday in the session and in accordance with the rules Thursdays will no longer be private members' days and it may well be that this will be the last occasion, or one of the last, for discussion on this bill. I understand that there are other hon. members who would like to express their opinions on the bill and I wonder if the minister and the government would be agreeable to permitting the debate to continue with the assurance that no vote nor any other conclusion will be forced in the absence of the minister.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When the speakers are through somebody could adjourn the debate to another day.

Mr. Fulton: That is the understanding.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I take part in this debate because I feel that there are one or two points that have not been brought out, despite the fact that so far excellent reasons have been put forth by previous speakers for checking these crime comics to some extent and for passing Bill No. 10 to amend the Criminal Code. Some months ago I received a letter from the home and school council of Peterborough under date of March 19, 1949, which reads in part:

> The following is a report of the findings of a committee appointed by the Peterborough home and school council, to determine whether there are objectionable comic books on sale in Peterborough and if so, what might be done to inhibit their distribution.
> The committee visited several retail stores where comic books were sold and found a large variety on the stands of which about half were deemed harmful, in greater or less degree. According to the salesman, the retail proprietors do not order any specific comics. About once a week the distributor collects the slow moving copies for which he subsequently obtains credit and leaves a new supply.
> The committee then visited the two local distributing agencies and were courteously received by the managers. It was found that at least ten of the Detroit police department's list of objectionable comics were being distributed in Peterborough along with other crime comics.

There is more to the letter, but I will not read it all. It was sent to me by the corresponding secretary of the home and school council of the city of Peterborough. Here is a list, compiled by the detective bureau of the Detroit police department, of crime comics that are banned in that city. It is dated May 11, 1948. The introduction to the list reads:

> The following named comic books are, in the opinion of the censor bureau and the Wayne county prosecuting attorney, found to be totally objectionable in accordance with the laws and statutes of the state of Michigan . . .

Then they refer to the different sections of their statutes. Here is the list of the comics, of which, as I said before, ten are included in those sold in the city of Peterborough. The list reads:

> All True Comics; Blue Beetle; Boy Comics; Crime Comics; Crime Detective Comics; Crime Exposed Comics; Crime Fighter Comics; Crime Punishment Comics; Dynamic Comics; Exposed Crime Comics; Famous Crime Comics; Fight Comics; Gangster Comics; Headline Comics; Is this Tomorrow; International Crime Patrol; Jo-Jo Comics; Jumbo Comics; Justice Comics; Killers Comics; Lawbreakers Comics; Law Crime Comics; Murder Inc. Comics; Penalty Comics; Phantom Lady Comics; Prize Comics; Public Enemies; Real Clue Comics; Super Mystery Comics; True Crime Comics; Underworld Comics; Wanted Comics; Wings Comics; War Against Crime Comics, and Zoot Comics.

I have here further facts and figures as to these comics, and I believe this information was also compiled by the home and school council. The pamphlet is headed:

> Undesirable Newsstand Publications, Facts and Figures

It reads:

> 1. There are approximately 90 comic books, Canadian edition, on the market at this time (November, 1948).
> 2. These comics can be classified in various ways. The following has been found useful for all practical purposes:
> (1) crime; (2) general; (3) western; (4) phantasy; (5) animal.
> 3. Since the austerity tariff ban was imposed in November, 1947, the Canadian editions of the American comics have steadily increased. The printing only is done in Canada.
> 4. One-third of all magazines on the newsstands are comics.
> 5. Approximately sixty million copies of comics per month are published; each issue nets around $25,000 in advertising sales alone.
> 6. In Canada the sale of obscene books, literature, pictures, photographs or models, is controlled by section 207 of the Criminal Code. Convictions under this section have been difficult, if not impossible, to obtain, indicating that clarification or amendment of the section is required.

That is what the bill is seeking. The pamphlet continues:

> 7. Local action in British Columbia was attempted in 1940. Four magazines considered violating section 207 were presented to the attorney general with the request that they be banned. Advice from this department was that it would be impossible to secure a ban on these magazines in British Columbia since the act indicated the publishers would be the only offenders and they were in eastern Canada.
> 8. Local action has been enforced against the sale of crime comics in more than fifty cities in the United States.

There is more to the pamphlet, but I will not read it all. There is another point that

I do not think has been brought out yet, and I believe that it is an important one. The circular I have just read mentions the fact that most of these comics are printed and published in Canada, but they are concocted and drawn in the United States and other countries. Mats or plates are then shipped into Canada to be printed. I understand that there is no duty on those plates or mats entering Canada. There is absolutely no sales tax on the newsprint or paper on which these crime comics are printed.

Mr. Graydon: Our weekly newspapers have to pay it.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, and every daily newspaper in Canada has to pay the eight per cent sales tax.

Mr. Graydon: And some weeklies.

Mr. Fraser: There is only one weekly in Canada that does not pay the sales tax; that is the Toronto Star Weekly.

Mr. Howe: Quoting George McCullagh.

Mr. Fraser: No, I am not quoting George McCullagh because I made the statement from the platform over a week before George McCullagh made his broadcast.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): He is quoting you.

Mr. Fraser: Whether I am quoting him or he is quoting me, my facts and figures are right.

Mr. Mitchell: But you would not disagree with George.

Mr. Graydon: There are a lot of smaller weeklies, too.

Mr. Fraser: The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) cannot disagree with me because he knows what I say is right.

Mr. Mitchell: I did not say that. I said you do not disagree with George, the king maker.

Mr. Fraser: I am very glad that the Minister of Trade and Commerce interrupted me because it brought the fact much more vividly to the attention of the house than I could have done. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce will look up the legislation governing the Department of National Revenue and the customs department, he will see that not even a sales tax is paid on the ink they use to print these comics. That may also apply to the Toronto Star Weekly.

I feel that in all fairness to our children every member of the house should support the amendment. We all like comics. I like comics, but I like comics that are clean, and I do not like the trash you get in these dime crime comic books. I have seen them and I have read them. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) the other night gave many illustrations of these comics and crime books that would absolutely disgust anyone. I know it would disgust everyone in the house and it would disgust the average man and woman right across Canada. I say, give our children the funnies but give them clean ones.

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): I do not intend to take a great deal of the time of the house this evening in dealing with Bill No. 10. There are some observations which I should like to make on the principle of the bill, with which I agree, and on the bill itself. The other evening the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) told us that he was not speaking on behalf of his profession. I do not propose to speak on behalf of the honourable profession of which I am a member, but I have been asked to speak on the bill by the Kiwanis club of St. Catharines which passed a resolution a short time ago recommending to the government that some action should be taken as to these pamphlets described as crime comics.

To my mind they have no humorous features, and are the very antithesis of what they are supposed to be. I think we can start with the premise that crime comics are detrimental to youth and have a bad influence upon the moral standards of our young people. They depict groups of people, gangs of young boys, engaging in sadistic and criminal actions, and in my view that is a bad thing. In the province from which I come there has been a tendency for young hoodlums to band together and assault our citizens. Probably that is an outgrowth of this very suggestion to young minds. The best known of these groups is called the beanery gang; and I suggest that perhaps the influence of poor literature of this kind indulged in earlier years, has had a good deal to do with this tendency.

Our young people seem to have a great desire to read these publications, which certainly are not funny. A few years ago we had the serial type of story, with young men and women engaged in sports and entertaining pastimes. For example Chums and The Boys Own Annual. That sort of book does not seem to appeal to the young people these days. I am told they buy these comics and then form voluntary circulating libraries passing them from one to another. So no matter what supervision there may be in the home, it is difficult to stop such a practice. Certainly these comics add nothing to the cultural or educational advancement of our youth. To me it indicates something wrong in our educational system when these so called crime comics have such an appeal to our children. Some members of this house have suggested to me that this may not be the proper way to deal with this matter, that it may be a question of home training. As I have said, however, owing to the secretive manner in which these comics are circulated it is very difficult for parents to do anything to prevent their children coming into possession of these magazines. I have a friend who carries on business as a druggist in the city from which I come. He told me that he conducted his own censorship. He found that many of the comics which came to his place of business were not fit to be circulated among young people. But I do not think we can depend upon individual censorship, because many people are more concerned with the profit derived from the sale of these magazines than with any sense of moral responsibility.

I am sure a step of this kind will not lack public support. As I have said, the Kiwanis club have taken up the matter in an international way; parent-teacher organizations have passed resolutions dealing with it, as have home and school associations and various governing church bodies. So I believe the matter deserves our attention. Here I would give credit to the newspapers of Canada for the high standard they have maintained in their censorship. I believe the funnies we read in the newspapers are of a very high order. Little criticism can be directed at those comics, and perhaps that is why the word "newspaper" is not mentioned in the bill.

For a moment I should like to refer to the bill itself, though I do not wish to be unduly critical of the draftsmanship. The bill refers to the printing, publishing, sale and distribution of any magazine, periodical or book. The word "magazine" indicates to me a publication containing sketches, stories and essays. Surely crime comics do not come within that definition. A "periodical" conveys to my mind a publication appearing at fixed intervals of more than one day, and I feel that crime comics do not come within the scope of that definition. The word "book" conveys to my mind a printed volume bound between two covers, and I do not think that would include crime comics either. I may be construing this bill rather strictly, but in view of the fact that if it is adopted it will be interpreted strictly in some other place, I believe we should scrutinize it carefully here. I am wondering whether these crime comics, as we understand them, are really covered by the expressions used in the bill. It may be that this is not so. I understand the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) did not draft the bill himself, but I would suggest that perhaps the words "or any other publication" after the word "book" might be included to cover any printed work offered for sale or distribution. I believe that would amply cover any situation that might arise.

Mr. Fraser: Does the hon. gentleman know that the government classes them as magazines? Otherwise they would not be exempt from the eight per cent sales tax on newsprint.

Mr. Cavers: I was not aware of that fact. I agree heartily with the principle of this bill, but it occurs to me that as it is drawn it might not fully cover the situation. I am sure all hon. members of this house, many of whom are heads of families, are in sympathy with the aims of this bill and believe that some action should be taken.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, like most of the members of the house, I suppose, I have received a number of letters and resolutions from organizations in my province urging that I support some measure, though not necessarily this one, to restrict the circulation of crime comics or whatever we choose to call the sort of literature under discussion. I am supporting the principle of the bill, although I am doubtful of its efficacy as it is now drafted. It leaves much to chance or to the option of those who are charged with the enforcement of the law. It may be honoured, as some sections of the Criminal Code are honoured, or it may be flouted as the sections dealing with lotteries and various forms of gambling are being flouted today. In my city of Vancouver bingo games are unlawful. I went into a store in this city this morning and saw a girl sitting at a desk openly selling bingo tickets. Surely, our criminal law should be applicable to the whole of Canada.

Mr. Graydon: She knows a good customer when she sees him.

Mr. Lennard: It is for charity.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member says it is for charity. It seems to me it is stretching the idea of charity rather far when buying a ticket on a game of chance is considered a contribution to charity. No one buys a ticket on a lottery, a game of chance or competition unless he expects to get more back than he pays for the ticket; that does not seem to me to be charity. Charity is what you give even to your own inconvenience, when it hurts it is not giving with the expectation of getting back more than you gave. I have heard all these arguments before. We are told that lotteries for worthy objects are all right. If the object is worthy, it should not have to depend on a lottery. If it is not worthy, it should not be supported at all.

Mr. Lennard: What has that to do with this bill?

Mr. MacInnis: It has everything to do with this bill because the bill suggests an amendment to the Criminal Code. I am suggesting that if one section of the Criminal Code is not enforced, perhaps this amended section will not be enforced either.

There is another point in connection with this matter that I want to mention. Before I deal with that, however, may I say that it is a rather saddening experience to pass a newsstand today and see the amount of trash offered for sale and the very small amount of literature that is worth while. I do not believe we can overcome the effects of crime comics merely by negative action. If the lives of our young people are to be improved, it will have to be by positive action. Something constructive for them to do will have to be found; something that will take up their time so that they will not have time for crime comics and other harmful diversions. When most of the members of this house were growing up there was not much time for comic papers. I suppose a good many of us grew up on the farm, where there was always work to do. If it did not do anything else, at least it kept us out of mischief. On that same basis, I suggest that, if we are going to improve the lives of our children and youth of today, we must put something in their lives to fill the emptiness that is the lot of so many.

It is evident that the member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard) does not agree with that. It is his belief that crime can be suppressed by courts and laws.

Mr. Lennard: I said, "How are you going to do that with all these gift shops?"

Mr. MacInnis: If history has proven anything at all, it has proven that crime cannot be stopped in that way.

I have only one more remark to make before I sit down. I shall listen attentively to the constructive suggestions that will be made by the voluble member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard). I think perhaps we can say too much about the harmfulness of crime comics. Perhaps we may be just advertising them. The other night when the member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) and the member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) were talking, I felt that clergymen should not talk about these things because they build such an alluring halo around them that it makes people think that resisting temptation is not worth while. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) on the excellent job he made when presenting this bill. So far as its principle is concerned, I shall support it.

(Translation):

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I take the liberty of adding my voice, as a French-speaking member, to those who have taken part in this debate. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) on the ideas he put forth in introducing this bill.

I agree that it might be better if parliament and the various legislatures united their efforts in order to encourage moral education in our families. We should have a purpose, a comprehensive program to prevent the lowering, at such an alarming rate, of the moral standards of our people, and especially of our youth, as we have witnessed during the past few years, more particularly since the war.

I come from the province of Quebec and while I was a member of the legislature of that province, it passed an act prohibiting children under sixteen years of age from going to the movies. I also remember that during the debate some members strongly opposed the measure. I still have clippings from newspapers published in other provinces, making fun of the province of Quebec, stating it was backward in passing such legislation.

Mr. Speaker, if children under sixteen were not allowed to go to the movies, it would become easier, all over the country, to preserve what is left of moral standards among the people and more particularly, among our youth.

I believe that fair and honest legislation based on principles of morality would improve family education and help parents do their duty more efficiently. It would also give them the necessary courage and strength of mind to forbid their children from going to the movies. In this way, they would not put wrong ideas in the heads of young people when they are at a critical stage of their development.

I appreciate that, once again, we may be called backward, but in the province of Quebec we have resolutely kept this legislation in operation. I think we were right in so doing since, by this bold step, the moral standards of our youth in the province of Quebec have been maintained at a high level.

Reading newspapers from other provinces, I notice that juvenile delinquency is lower in the province of Quebec. I do not wish to disparage other provinces, but I have visited many of them and attended a moving picture show where twelve-year old children were driven almost to a frenzy on seeing and hearing a film which had to do with underworld characters and gangsters. If we continue to let children improve upon what they see on the screen and what they read in crime comics, written in a gibberish language which they do not understand perfectly, there will certainly be a lowering of the moral standard among young people. If nothing is done to help parents in the discharge of their duties, we shall have only ourselves to blame for not having done our duty in this Canadian parliament.

The hon. member for Kamloops deserves commendation for the ideas he has voiced in this house. We should launch a well-organized campaign to remove the cause of juvenile delinquency and take away from our young people those things which they should not have in their early years.

(Text):

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): May I, Mr. Speaker, perhaps add a little bit of practical experience to this debate, inasmuch as I have just left a school board in British Columbia and am now an active member of the parent-teacher association. I do not think it is the attitude of the parent-teacher association to condemn every child who reads crime comics and every mother and father of such a child; because it is my experience that a child only reflects the ability of that mother and father to take care of their home. I do not believe that crime magazines will ever hurt the child whose mother and father take an intelligent view of these comics, because if the mother and father handle the situation properly, as I handle it in my home, I do not think any child will come to any harm through them. They are not a good thing, and we know that fact. But that is not the idea.

Through no fault of their own, perhaps, there are some kiddies who have come into the juvenile courts; and I have been able to sit in those courts with the permission of certain law enforcement officers. I have found that because the mothers and fathers did not take the proper interest in these children these so-called crime comics have affected the lives of these young people. In every case where crime comics have been mentioned in the juvenile court, I find that it has usually been the case that the mother and father did not take enough interest in their children to stop them from using these books.

The other day I went into one of the stores in Ottawa to see just how bad the situation was here. In the store 46 different kinds of this trash were offered for sale. This is the offal of the magazine trade. No one should have to buy it. No one should be able to buy it. But I find that, unless some of these magazine stands buy these books, they cannot buy the national magazines that they need to keep going. Within the last two or three days I have been told that it is also true —and it is true in British Columbia—that, unless the magazine dealers here handle these magazines to the extent of a certain percentage per month, they cannot buy the magazines from which they make their money to pay their fuel and rent bills. These are not the so-called "crime does not pay" magazines; I find they include Crime and Punishment, and Crime of Women. In this are depicted women of ill repute standing in rather suggestive attitudes. That is a fine model for our young people to look at! There are Women Outlaws and True Mystery. This latter is the most filthy book that I have ever seen on a magazine stand.

An hon. Member: What is in it?

Mr. Goode: The hon. member can read it after I am through with it. But for young ladies and young gentlemen to read this type of magazine is pitiful in a civilized country. I believe the principle of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) is good. I believe its intent is good. I do not know that this bill can be sustained in law. I would have to take advice from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) on that point. But if there is anything I can do to suggest to the Minister of Justice that some type of bill be put through so that the law can be made conclusive and so that our provincial attorneys general can be successful in getting convictions in these cases, then I will say for myself and for every mother and father in this country: Thank God.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): There is just one other angle of this matter, Mr. Speaker, that I should like to touch on briefly. I think the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) has just made an excellent point for the support of the bill when he said, from having had experience in juvenile courts, that a great deal of the juvenile delinquency that he saw was caused by lack of discipline or family life or security in the home. Then the crime comic got in and did its work. Although he may not have intended it as such, I think that is a point that reinforces the argument of my friend the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton).

For a time I had the privilege of being a member of the citizens committee in Toronto with regard to what is known as the beanery gang. I do not think the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Cavers) is quite correct in saying that the beanery gang was not a gang from a certain district in the city of Toronto. In this particular I want to give a great deal of credit to the Rev. Gordon Domm of Bathurst street United church for taking these young people off the streets of the district, opening the basement of his church to them, and doing a great deal of rehabilitation work. I do not think that sufficient appreciation has ever been shown of the work that he and his committee have done. There is one remarkable aspect of this matter of juvenile delinquency and the extraordinary variety of anti-social behaviour that is going on today. It is a wild and extraordinarily imaginative type, caused in part by these crime magazines but also in part by the daily press. When some strange and violent incidents of anti-social behaviour took place in Toronto, it was found that the daily press of Toronto played them up—I do not intend to mention the incidents, but they have occurred from week to week—with the names, the description, the location and all the rest of it. That practice made heroes of these young delinquents who committed these peculiar manifestations of anti-social behaviour. I would rather call them that than crimes, although they are crimes.

When this was publicized—and it was particularly so in groups and gangs—people would say, "Oh, well, look what they did over there. They have done this particular thing." That gave the incentive for another group to go and do some other even worse act in another part of the city. This cannot be anything but a plea to the daily press, when these anti-social incidents occur, when these peculiar acts of sadism and violence that are all too common today in Canada occur, not to play up the participants as heroes. I know that they have tremendous news value. I know that the newspapers depend on the sale of their papers, and the circulation depends on news value and news interest in the papers; but I do plead with the daily press and the weekly press that when these extraordinary things occur they do not give them publicity, because it merely sets the pattern for others to try to emulate.

I know that it is asking a lot of the press. It is something that they can only do voluntarily. I am speaking as a member of the committee on the beanery gang, and I know that when the press stopped playing up the delinquent actions in Toronto the concentration of members gradually decreased. It is a matter of example, and if the daily press will display restraint in emphasizing the bad examples I am sure that a great deal of good can be done.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I think that almost everything that can be said has been said on this subject, but there is one thing that we perhaps should have, namely, statistics about comic strips as to what extent they are read, and to what extent their distribution is big business, because the fact that it is big business is one of the problems we find facing us. Such figures as I shall use are taken from a brief presented to the Saskatchewan library advisory council in 1946 by one Mrs. J. R. Bothwell, provincial librarian at Regina, Sask. The problem of controlling the circulation of undesirable literature forms the subject matter of a paragraph, the beginning of which I shall read:

> Before discussing suggestions for controlling the circulation of undesirable magazines, it is well to obtain some idea of the number of readers patronizing them. Unfortunately figures are not available to show the circulation of comics "pulps," or other classes of undesirable periodicals either in Saskatchewan or Canada.

The next paragraph which is of interest is this. It is taken from the Wilson Library Bulletin of October, 1946, and is entitled "Magazine Best Sellers."

> The analysis showed comic books as a group topped all other types of magazines with a paid monthly circulation of 29,661,000.

Mr. Fulton: Is that in Canada?

Mr. Knight: These are figures for the United States. I explained that the figures were not available in Canada. These are corresponding figures for the United States. Perhaps I neglected to mention that. I continue:

> It is estimated that each copy has three to five readers, so that the monthly readership of the American comic magazines would be in the neighbourhood of 100,000,000.
> Fortune magazine has estimated that the comic book industry has an annual turnover of $18 million.
> The question of which age, sex and income groups are most addicted to the various forms of undesirable literature is a difficult one to answer. A recent survey by the Market Research Company in the United States indicated that the following proportions of each age group read comics regularly.

Age Group	Male Per Cent	Female Per Cent	Copies Read
6-11 years	95	91	(12-13 a month)
12-17 years	87	81	(12-13 a month)
18-30 years	41	28	(7 - 8 a month)
31 years and on	16	12	(6 a month)

It will be noticed as the age increases the number grows less. I am not going to comment on this myself. I have a large file on censorship, and it is one of my favourite topics and one on which I could speak at great length. I do not think the question of censorship really enters into this debate. This particular bill does not call for censorship as such. As I understand it, it asks that the circulation of a certain type of book be made illegal, and then it will be left to someone to originate court action. If that court action were taken and punishment were handed out to the people who sell these magazines, it is presumed that it would be a deterrent to people of a like class. I understand that that is the purpose of the bill. Personally I have not made up my mind whether I am in favour of it or not. It is a tremendously difficult problem. Whether you are thinking of censorship or not, you are making the judge and jury into censors. The question is whether the judge and jury of twelve honest men and true are competent to carry out the censorship. I do not know. If they cannot do any better than the department of customs and excise I do not think we had better start, because, as I said on a previous occasion, I have no confidence in that particular body to carry out censorship. If we are to have censorship then it will have to be an efficient censorship. It would be a more efficient censorship system if it were done by people who had the necessary background, education, experience and training, and we would have much more confidence in their competence to perform such censorship. This brief contains the opinion of one who has made some study of this matter. I refer to Mr. Sandwell of Toronto Saturday Night. Like myself, he is opposed to censorship generally, but listen to what he has to say. Mr. Sandwell expresses himself as "strongly opposed to censorship except for the juvenile who is incapable of performing the act of judgment necessary to choose between good and evil ideas." I mentioned this the other day in a short speech I made on a kindred subject. We are dealing with two classes of people, people whose characters are formed, and people who are vulnerable, in that they are exposed to outside environment, without having much judgment in choosing what part of that environment they wish to make their own. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), who is in favour of the positive approach to this problem. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) has argued that if the home were right, if the proper guidance were given, these bad effects would be overcome. I would go perhaps even further and say that the child of a certain age should have some experience in these things, but under proper guidance. But there again the parents, like the judge and jury to whom I referred, would have to have some competence in the matter.

I am afraid that many parents in this country adopt the wrong attitude toward these comics. I have found as a matter of experience that many of them simply dismiss the whole question of literature for children of 7 to 14 years of age by assuming that, because they have the comics, they do not need anything more.

I repeat that in this country and on this North American continent there is a tremendous dearth of literature for young people. In this connection we owe a debt, but of the wrong sort, to our United States friends. Our imitation of them is a part of the inferiority complex which Canada has developed. The result is that we have not gone into the field of literature for youth or indeed into any field of literature with outstanding success. It is certainly true that there is nothing in this country for the young people to read as compared with what is available to young people in other countries, particularly in Great Britain. In that country there is a great choice of reading matter for young people as well as for adults.

I suggest that instead of censorship or court action we institute a counter-attack by substituting things that are good for things that are evil. There should be a cultivation of taste for good literature while people are still young. Let us give our young people better literature, but if they have to read any of these salacious books let them be read under the guidance of their parents or people who can give proper advice in the matter. In this connection I should like to read again from this brief:

> A more direct but possibly more workable approach to the problem than outright censorship is the counter-attack. Many educators and librarians believe that an aggressive program to make alternative literature available to the reading public is a solution to the problem. They suggest that the undesirable literature be analysed to discover what elements in it appeal to people and that efforts be made to supply these elements in a more wholesome form.

I think that is common sense. While I am on the question of children's books I should like to say a word about the expense connected with obtaining these books. One reason why comic books are tolerated by many parents is the fact that they are so cheap. The comic strips appear in the daily or weekly newspapers and those particular pages are thrown to the children, somewhat as a bone is thrown to a dog. Children's books are quite expensive, as is anything that can claim the name of good literature. If children's books could be brought out in paper-bound editions I believe they would be more attractive and more would be read.

As a degree of confirmation of what the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond said, I should like to read the final comment in this brief. I consider this brief to be a valuable piece of work and I recommend it to the consideration of hon. members. I congratulate the person who prepared the brief upon its worth. This final paragraph reads:

> Immunization against undesirable literature:
> A final proposal for protecting children against the evil influence present in much of the literature available today is an immunization program. Most psychologists think it bad to prohibit children the reading of certain books since forbidden fruit always is more attractive. But they believe that if children are provided with a normal home, sufficient outlets for their energy and a full and well-rounded life of work and play, they will not suffer harm from whatever undesirable literature they come in contact with, nor will they spend an excessive amount of time on it. While this is probably sound psychology, it depends on a long-term program of parent education and the development of adequate educational and recreational opportunities for all.

It then goes on to say something about the British Columbia legislative committee which investigated this matter some time ago, and I read:

> This was the chief solution proposed by the British Columbia legislative committee which investigated the question last session and recommended that the provincial government "lend every possible encouragement to the establishment and development of community centres, and the greater use of school buildings for recreational, physical education, and other leisure-time purposes under the leadership of trained personnel."

I have no apology for offering this brief for the consideration of the house, because I think it contains many things which are fundamental to this particular discussion. As far as my own decision in the matter is concerned, I repeat what I said at the beginning, that I am not prepared to make a decision at the moment. This is one of those things about which so much can be said on both sides that one has difficulty in arriving at a decision.

This comic book and comic strip business originated in the United States. I remember the first comic strip I saw as a little boy of twelve years. I do not know whether hon. members of my age will remember it. It certainly appealed to me because I had never seen anything like it before. I refer to the time when, while on a trip to the United States, I saw the Buster Brown comic strip. May I say that the Buster Browns have become rather hardened young criminals since those days.

As I say, this is an American institution. We call these things comics; but, as has been pointed out tonight, that is a misnomer because there is nothing comic about them I do not think the children would be interested in these things if they were not almost forced to read them because of a lack of other literature.

I think they really appeal more to the adolescent, moronic type of mind, that type of mind that would get some satisfaction or perhaps some bolstering up of an inferiority complex from them, and as we know, the inferiority complex is one of the greatest factors in the make-up of criminals. The fact that we copy these things is an illustration of something I said the other day. In the matter of literature we seem to be copiers rather than originators. The sooner we change that attitude the better it will be not only for the adults but for our children

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would not like this occasion to pass without expressing my congratulations to the hon. member for Kamloops upon having brought in this bill and just speaking briefly on behalf of the Social Credit group with reference to the principle. Let me assure the members of the house, and particularly the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), that we feel he has done a service to the country by introducing this bill. Whether or not the provisions of the bill can be adequately enforced is something on which I am not an expert, but the problem that is envisioned by the sponsor of the bill is not a new one. Society has been beset for many years by the problem of salacious literature. In my younger days the appeal was mainly confined to grown-ups, but the emphasis now seems to have shifted to the younger people. I suppose that is because they have a lot more money to spend than I had when I was a boy.

I am not entirely unacquainted with this problem, which is now becoming much more intensified. I speak now as one who has had experience with it as minister of education of one of our provinces where we tried to take the problem seriously and to do something about it. I speak also as a parent who has tried to raise seven children and to keep them free from the influence of the type of periodical mentioned in the bill. I speak also as a member of a home and school association. I think that no matter how good our homes may be, no matter what kind of positive approach we take, we must remember that it is usually only for a comparatively small fraction of the day that our children are at home. Although we may be very careful to select and help our children select the kind of literature they bring into the home, we cannot very well control the kind of periodical round which little knots of children will gather on the street outside the home.

I feel that every effort must be made in a positive way to substitute the kind of literature and periodicals that will be uplifting, educational and beneficial to our youth. I do not think there is such a dearth of that kind of periodical as has been represented tonight. As a parent I have been concerned about helping my children to get the proper kind of literature and periodicals, and to this day I have not found it impossible to keep them pretty well supplied with good reading material.

Let me refer you to some just offhand. For girls it is possible today to purchase a book that comes out once or twice a month called "Calling All Girls". It is a very high type of publication and one that fills a great need. There is a companion to it entitled "Calling All Boys" that I can recommend for anybody's boys. They get pleasure out of reading those things. They find that they fill their needs to a certain degree. Then there are so many of the splendid old books that we all read as young people, and that are still just as vital to the boys and girls of this day as they were in our time. I wonder if we are not neglecting to supply them in our home libraries or to help our boys and girls to know where they can lay their hands on them when they want them. I know for certain that in the schools every effort is made to supply splendid libraries of such books for the boys and girls in the various grades.

Therefore I cannot believe that there is a dearth of good material for boys and girls to read. That was the conclusion that I reached when I was studying this particular problem as minister of education in the Alberta government. On the other hand, tons of these comic books appear on the newsstands dressed in the brightest colours and with the most appealing covers. Of course, that overbalances whatever influence there may be in the home and the school along the positive line of approach.

One of the main difficulties today is that practically any place that sells ice cream cones or all-day suckers will sell this trash to try to make a living. Any time a child goes in to buy an ice cream cone or an all-day sucker he is faced with the alternative of these very compelling pictures and colours, and very often a lot of good salesmanship in displaying them.

Mr. Fulton: A lot of propaganda.

Mr. Low: A lot of propaganda, as the hon. member for Kamloops suggests. The best teaching in the world in the home, the wisest guidance in the home, cannot always protect youngsters when they are subjected to such alluring things every time they go to a store. With all deference, I suggest to the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) that, while the positive approach is excellent and we must use it, at the same time we must protect our boys and girls from the sight of these things as much as we possibly can. That is why I say we are much in favour of the principle of the bill. We appeal to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the government to take speedy and effective action to see to it that this sort of temptation and evil is placed as far as possible beyond the reach of our children.

I think that as parents and public men we can assist a great deal by watchfulness and alertness in seeing that whenever these things do appear we are ready to take action on our own and to discourage the publication and sale of such literature.

An hon. Member: Trash.

Mr. Low: Trash; that is a good name for it. I do not want to dignify it by calling it literature. It seems to me that there is one other point that ought to be stressed further. I was pleased to hear the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) appeal to the newspapers about the whole problem. I think there is a responsibility on the part of the newspapers of the country not to overplay the gruesome and morbid details of crimes that are committed in reality. Our boys and girls cannot help reading the newspapers that come into our homes. Surely we ought not to feel that our journals and our newspapers are not fit for our boys and girls to read. I think we ought to encourage our boys and girls to read the papers, but any time a journalist writes up one of these crimes committed in society I think he should not play up the lewd and sensational in order to appeal to the morbid curiosity of readers. That in itself has a deteriorating effect on the mind of the child, and a child is quite likely to be tempted to try some of the things he hears about such as skinning victims alive from their necks up or down.

I saw a portrayal of that kind of thing in one of our daily newspapers. They are only trying to play up sensationalism. I add my voice to that of the hon. member for York West in appealing to the newspapers to try to play down that kind of thing as much as possible in order that our boys and girls will have something clean and decent to read in our daily and weekly newspapers.

I have come to the conclusion that we must attack this evil on all fronts. There is the positive approach, which the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) has mentioned, and with which I agree. But it is not enough, just as it is not enough to try to educate our people against the evils of over-indulgence in liquor. We have to do something by way of legal control in order to keep as many as possible of our younger people away from it at least until they have reached the age of self-control and restraint. So I say it must be a double-barrelled approach; and for that reason I am congratulating the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) on his courage and responsible citizenship in bringing forward this bill, which we as a group intend to support.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): It was not my intention this evening, Mr. Speaker, to add my voice to what seems to be the unanimous opinion of the house, but during the last few minutes of the debate a different note seems to have entered the discussion, a suggestion that our present system does not provide sufficient entertainment for our children and that this is probably why they carry on the reading of these crime comics in a quiet way, while not under the supervision of their parents.

That is an opinion with which I disagree wholeheartedly, and I am going to try to prove that such is not the case. I shall take as an example one child whom I know intimately; I refer to my daughter, who is ten years of age, and who has a number of companions of the same age. In the town in which I live I think it would be safe to say that from the beginning ninety to ninety-five per cent of the youngsters have had all the toys they could possibly play with, going from three-wheel tricycles until they reach high school and ride bicycles. They have had at their disposal swimming pools in the summer time and skating rinks in the winter; they have gone skiing and have had every other conceivable type of pastime. If they should be given any more entertainment you would have to take them by the hand and force them to play.

However, I have found it necessary to maintain a certain degree of censorship on the comic books that come into our home by the trading method. A child buys a book for ten cents; in a month he may buy twenty books, and all are circulated. The majority of them are entertaining and easy to read, but we have encountered some that certainly should not be seen by children of that age. The minds of these children are naturally wholesome, but if that type of material is continually shown them they are bound to read it some time or other, even if they have the strictest supervision in their homes. It is very unlikely that they would commit any of these crimes, but certainly it is good neither for their souls nor for their bodies to have this sort of stuff presented to them. Whatever our supervision may be, if a trap is set on the lawn our children are very likely to fall into it. I believe the people who are setting these traps should be either put behind bars or given some other severe penalty.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I rise to support this bill, Mr. Speaker, and to congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) on introducing it. I sincerely hope it does not meet the fate of the other private members' bills that have been introduced so far this session. Not being a lawyer, I do not know whether some bright legal light on the government side will find that this bill interferes with property and civil rights, or with other provincial rights. It may even be found that the federal government will have to spend some money to enforce this legislation when it becomes law, and it may be ruled out of order on that ground. Seriously, however, I hope it will receive the careful consideration of every hon. member of the house, that it will be considered on its merits, and that the government, if it is not prepared to accept the bill, at least will not do anything to bring about its defeat.

As has been stated already, I recognize that legislation in itself is no substitute for education, for good libraries or good literature. It is no substitute for healthful recreation or for good home training. I agree with everything that has been said with regard to the positive approach to this question. I think much more can and should be done by way of a positive approach; but the fact is that in a great many homes it is just about impossible for a child to get the sort of training some hon. members have mentioned, to which no doubt children are entitled. We have to accept conditions as they are. We do not have good libraries everywhere. There is a dearth of good reading material for boys and girls of the adolescent age.

I think we should bear in mind that every church organization, every educational institution, every cultural organization and as a matter of fact every organization interested in building good citizens is concerned with this problem; and I am quite sure this legislation will have the support of all those groups. While we may accept the fact that legislation is not a substitute for all those other things I have mentioned, while we may accept the fact that legislation without enforcement is useless or worse than useless, still I see no good reason why we should deplore the possibility of obtaining enforcement of this legislation. I am quite sure public opinion against crime comics in this country is sufficient to warrant the application and enforcement of such legislation as we have before us this evening.

I believe the question we must keep in mind is this. Why should we permit a few publishers or distributors of this kind of literature to go on day in and day out, undoing and undermining the very thing the churches, educational institutions and cultural organizations of this country are trying to build? Why is it necessary for us to permit these papers to be sold just for the sake of the profit there is in this business? Surely we can, by legislation, lend our support to those who are fighting this battle. We can do that by accepting this bill.

On motion of Mr. Tustin the debate was adjourned.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PAYMENTS TO PRODUCERS IN CHURCHILL AREA

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort) moved the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in introducing this bill there are two things I want to say at the outset. First, I hope that it does not give rise to a debate on the merits or demerits of the port of Churchill so far as the physical capacities of that port are concerned. That is not my purpose in introducing the bill. There are many difficulties in marketing grain through the port of Churchill other than any physical handicaps that may exist at that port. I have introduced this bill for the purpose of removing what I, at least, believe to be an injustice existing in the financial arrangements for marketing wheat through that port.

When the port of Churchill was first talked about many years ago, the grain growers of western Canada were asking through their organizations for a railroad and a port at that point. The dominion government allotted certain lands in western Canada for the purpose of building that railroad. I believe some 14 million acres of land was sold for approximately $42 million. According to the minister of transport who spoke in this house on March 31, 1945 the Hudson Bay railway itself cost $32,500,000; the terminal works at Churchill $13 million; the terminal works at Nelson, which were afterwards abandoned, $6 million: a total of fifty-one and one-half million. This money was western money set aside out of the sale of western land for the development of the port of Churchill. Naturally, the farmers in western Canada thought they would derive certain benefits from that port when it came into operation.

The producers of wheat in western Canada have received very little benefit from the port. Any benefit there may have been from shipping wheat through Churchill has largely gone to the consumer rather than to the producer. I have before me a summary of the cost of shipping grain through the port of Churchill as compared with the various other routes. This table was compiled by the Hudson Bay Route Association, and I believe it is correct. For the great lakes route: first via lake and rail, it costs 58·037 cents per bushel; via all water to transfer points, 56·671 cents per bushel; via lake and rail to Halifax and Saint John, 59·605 cents per bushel. To ship wheat through Vancouver to England it costs 59·65 cents; through Churchill the cost is only 45·95 cents per bushel, leaving a favourable balance so far as Churchill is concerned of anywhere from ten to fourteen cents a bushel.

Up to date the wheat growers of western Canada have received no benefit from that lower rate. I will admit that this bill will not give that to us, but it will go part of the way. It is only a step. Whether or not the bill is accepted by the government depends perhaps on the government's intention with regard to the port of Churchill. I put on the order paper a question which was answered on September 29. The purpose of the question was to try to find out what the government's intention might be with regard to the port of Churchill and the marketing of wheat through that port under the world wheat agreement. Until now, we have shipped wheat through the port of Churchill under the British wheat agreement and sold it at the same price as we received at Fort William or Port Arthur. I asked the following question:

> Has the wheat board established a price for wheat at Churchill under the world wheat agreement?

The answer was:

> No, but question was raised and matter is receiving attention.

I do not know whether it has received that attention and the government has arrived at any decision. Perhaps the minister will give us some information on that when he speaks on this bill. Until some consideration is given with respect to the price at Churchill as compared with Port Arthur and Fort William, the people in western Canada who allocated some 14 million acres of land and spent approximately $42 million for the building of that railway will not derive any benefit from it.

This bill has been introduced for the purpose of eliminating what I believe to be an injustice. In 1940 when the Wheat Board Act was amended the word "Vancouver" was added wherever the words "Port Arthur and Fort William" appeared. Before that amendment, the people living in the western part of Saskatchewan and the province of Alberta were paid for their wheat on the basis of the Port Arthur-Fort William price less the freight from the point of delivery. After that amendment to the wheat board act those people whose freight rate to Vancouver was less than the freight rate to Port Arthur or Fort William were paid for their wheat on the basis of the Vancouver freight rate.

During the war, the wheat board took delivery of that wheat and, although little wheat was shipped through the port of Vancouver and most of it was taken to Port Arthur and Fort William, the difference between the freight rate to Vancouver and the freight rate to Port Arthur-Fort William was paid out of the general funds of the board. It was an equalization measure and, so far as the remainder of the growers were concerned, the freight rate was equalized. The people who live in northern Saskatchewan and northern Manitoba find the freight rate to the port of Churchill is lower than the rate to Port Arthur-Fort William. It is my belief that those people should receive the benefit of that lower rate structure, and that is the reason for the introduction of this bill.

There is not as great a differential in the freight rate to Churchill as there is in the freight rate to Vancouver. As a matter of fact, if we take Hudson Bay junction as being the point at which wheat from northern Saskatchewan will go either to Port Arthur or Churchill, we find the freight rate from Hudson Bay junction to Port Arthur is 21 cents per hundred. The freight rate to Churchill is 18 cents per hundred. This leaves a difference of 3 cents that those people would receive in the form of an increased price for wheat because of that lower rate to Churchill. If the freight rate were equalized, however, on the basis of miles, the differential would be greater.

The mileage from Hudson Bay junction to Churchill is 598·6 miles and to Fort William and Port Arthur it is 816·5 miles. Worked out on an equalized mileage rate this would mean that the freight rate from Hudson Bay junction to Port Arthur or Fort William should be 15·6 cents per hundred rather than the 18 cents. Again, if the railroad construction program which should be carried out in northern Saskatchewan were completed, and if those roads which were started towards the port of Churchill or towards The Pas in Manitoba to connect up with the Hudson Bay railway were completed—that is, from Nipawin north, from Carrot River and Arborfield north to The Pas—that would reduce the mileage again so that there would be a reasonable advantage in the freight rate to Churchill as compared with the freight rate to Port Arthur and Fort William. We in that part of Saskatchewan feel that, if the people in western Saskatchewan and Alberta are to receive the benefit of the lower freight rate to Vancouver, we should be entitled to the lower freight rate to Churchill.

The minister may say that that 3 cents that is there at the present time does not amount to anything, and that the diversion charge that is made by the grain company eats up the advantage that there is in the freight rate. That argument is right at the present time. Personally I think it is time that we did something about these diversion charges. For instance, I see no reason why companies handling the farmers' grain, especially where they are shipping it to a point where they have no terminal elevators of their own, should charge 1½ cents a bushel for diverting that grain to that particular point. That is what happens at the present time. Whatever justice there may be in the elevator companies making this diversion charge where the wheat is going to Port Arthur and Fort William where they have a terminal of their own, in which this wheat could be placed, when the wheat is placed in a terminal elevator other than their own and a diversion charge of 1½ cents a bushel is made, I certainly cannot see any justice in that. As a matter of fact, I do not think they should make that charge at all. I do not think it is justified. At the present time that diversion charge is there.

But even though that diversion charge is there, if this bill were to pass it would mean —as it has been interpreted to me, at least— that the favourable freight rate would be paid on all grain grown in that area even though it did not go to Churchill, and that we would get paid for our wheat on the basis of the more favourable freight rate to Churchill even though that grain went to Port Arthur or Fort William. That is what is happening in western Saskatchewan, and that is what is happening in Alberta where they are paid on the basis of the Vancouver freight rate structure there.

There is just one point which I hope the minister will clear up, and it is this. If it is the government's intention to make a different price on wheat out of Churchill in respect of the world wheat agreement, this bill might mean that the advantage which might be gained through that price could not be passed back to the farmers living in the favourable freight rate area adjacent to the port of Churchill. I do not want the bill to have that effect. That is not the intention of the bill. The intention of the bill is simply to provide that those people in the freight areas favourable to Churchill should have the same privileges as are enjoyed by those people in western Saskatchewan and Alberta with respect to the port of Vancouver.

It has been said that the port of Churchill can never handle a great deal of grain. To date I do not think there has been any year in which the port has handled much over 5 million bushels; in fact, it has only been for two or three years that 5 million bushels have been handled. But it is possible for the port to handle a great deal more, and I believe it will do so. Even the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has stated that. I just want to quote from Hansard of the second session of 1945, volume 1, page 1109, where the minister is reported as having stated:

> In spite of the short season I think it may be possible to reach the objective of those who developed the route, which was a movement of 20,000,000 bushels of grain in the season. That does not sound much when compared with the movement through Port Arthur and Fort William or through Vancouver, but 20,000,000 bushels is a considerable movement for any port. Few ports on the continent have larger movements than that. Therefore I am not suggesting that the outlook for Churchill is hopeless; far from it. I feel that in post-war years the port will develop as far as its physical limitations will permit, and I can assure the house that the government will make every effort to see that that development is pressed actively and vigorously.

I submit that the passing of this bill would be one method of developing that port. It would mean that people living adjacent to the port would get the same advantage out of it. That is what they spent their money for. That is what the route was developed for, namely, to give some advantage to the people living in the west and more particularly, I believe, to those people in northern Manitoba and northern Saskatchewan who live adjacent to the port.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps I should say a few words on this bill at the outset so that the debate may be kept within closer bounds than would otherwise be the case. I will say at once that no one is more anxious than I am to see the port of Churchill, and particularly the grain elevator in Churchill, succeed. I have a personal interest aside from the fact that I was minister of transport for a considerable period. Prior to that, when I was a private citizen living a happy life as a consulting engineer, I was responsible for the design and construction of the grain elevator at Churchill. I spent a good many weeks there in connection with that work. I have always had a great interest in the port. I am happy that the last two years have both been, I think, record years for the movement of wheat through Churchill.

I am afraid that making Churchill the basing point for wheat under the present Canadian Wheat Board Act would curtail the movement rather than otherwise, for reasons that I will give in a moment or two. I think that the wheat board have handled the movement of wheat to Churchill with great skill. It is not an easy movement to control. Only certain grades can be handled by the port. They are grades that will make up into full cargoes; for unlike the situation at other ports in Canada, it is not possible to ship parcels of grain through the port of Churchill.

My hon. friend says that to make Churchill the basing point would give advantages to farmers within the area. I should like to remind him that, unless the advantages are actually earned, the advantages to the farmers within that area are paid for by farmers in other areas.

Mr. Wright: Is that not what happens in Alberta?

Mr. Howe: No. I think the Alberta situation carries itself.

Mr. Wright: It did not during the war.

Mr. Howe: Well, perhaps at times. But I would point out that the port of Vancouver is open for twelve months of the year. No excessive carrying charges are involved in shipping by that route. It is not a matter of selection, because all grain is marketable at Vancouver. The same thing is true of the Fort William route. Of course on the Fort William route in winter the haul is longer than in summer. The summer movements end at Montreal; whereas shipment in the winter months must be through Saint John or Halifax. But here again that route is open for shipment twelve months in the year, and any grade of grain is marketable on the eastern route.

As my hon. friend knows, Churchill is open for shipment about two and a half months in the year. For example, if today grain were shipped from, we will say, Hudson Bay junction to Churchill, it is true that the rate would be three to three and a half cents lower than the same shipment to Fort William; but that grain would necessarily remain in the elevator until September 1950. It would involve about eleven months of carrying charges which would involve an expense of fifteen cents or sixteen cents at least, perhaps a little more than that, on $1.75 wheat. Under the present system that expense would be carried by other farmers. Obviously next September the grain would have charges against it greatly in excess of the price it would return when loaded on a ship.

In actual practice grain is not shipped into Churchill in October and November. Shipments to Churchill begin in about May or June, and the elevator is filled to capacity when the shipping season actually opens. However, it is filled with grain that has accumulated a carrying charge of perhaps only two months, at the maximum two or three months, instead of eleven months as would happen if the grain were moved into the elevator at this time. As I say, sufficient of the old crop is assembled to fill the elevator. Certain other old crop is held back to take care of the interval until the new crop begins to move, and then sufficient new crop is diverted into the elevator to take care of any boats that may be en route to that port. At the end of the season the elevator is empty. All the grain has been shipped, and the elevator remains empty until the following spring. As my hon. friend will appreciate, it is a closely regulated movement. It involves the minimum of storage and carrying charges and interest on the wheat. It is the kind of movement that is best for the grain growers of all Canada who pay all bills for the movement of wheat.

There is another difficulty about making Churchill a basing point. We will assume that the movement is a real movement. I think we must assume that. My hon. friend would not want a movement that was not possible and that is—

Mr. Wright: The minister admits that it is possible?

Mr. Howe: I mean economically possible. Another thing is that this is a short wheat crop. It is selling very readily. The crop is pretty well sold at this time, and it is sold for delivery within the current crop year. My hon. friend will appreciate that the Canada-United Kingdom wheat agreement ends at the end of this year, as does the five-year pool on wheat. Naturally it is greatly in the interests of Canada to deliver that wheat within the current crop year so that it may be delivered under the wheat agreement. I do not know what the price of wheat will be for the crop year 1950-51, and I am sure that my hon. friend does not know either. But if I were guessing I would guess that it might be a lower price than the price under the present contract. Well, if that wheat is in Churchill it cannot be delivered against the wheat contract, and therefore all the farmers in Canada would have to suffer a loss that would accrue through a price differential as between the next crop year and this crop year. There is a further difficulty that the wheat delivered during this year and shipped to Churchill is part of the wheat that must be accounted for under the contract. If that wheat were in Churchill the settlement under the five-year pool would have to be delayed until that wheat was actually marketed.

Those are the practical difficulties. There is another practical difficulty. Again I say I assume that my hon. friend would not want a fictitious value put on wheat. He would want it based on actual possibilities. There are some 40 million bushels of wheat that are tributary to the port of Churchill. As far as price differentials are concerned, we all know that only a fraction of that 40 million bushels can possibly be shipped through Churchill. My hon. friend says the fraction may be 50 per cent. Actually under present day conditions it is not more than 12½ per cent. Therefore 40 million bushels of wheat would benefit; whereas the actual movement that should properly benefit is the wheat which can actually move through the port which is only about 12½ per cent of the wheat tributary to the port.

If the government were paying the bills one might say: "That is all right; justice demands that these payments shall be made. The government is a very indefinite person. He cannot complain very much. It is all the people of Canada." But it is not the government that is paying the bills; it is the producers of the prairie provinces. I would think that the grower who is not tributary to the port of Churchill would ask: Why should I be charged in order that those who theoretically can ship from Churchill shall all benefit through their proximity to that port?

Those are the objections. I think that they are very real objections. I believe that the best results for the port of Churchill can be obtained by allowing the wheat board, which I think everyone in this house will admit is doing a first rate job in looking after the interests of all the wheat growers of Canada, to handle grain to the port of Churchill in the interests of Canada, and in the interest of the grain growers of western Canada as a whole.

If there were no pool and if we had an open marketing system as we had years ago there would be no objection to allowing anyone to ship to the port of Churchill who wished to do so, provided the grain were sold as it used to be when it was loaded on a boat. If under those conditions a grower within the area wished to ship to Churchill in November, we will say, he would do so, but he would do so knowing that his grain must pay carrying charges, must pay storage and must pay interest until roughly the 1st of September of the year following. If they knew that, I am sure the people in that area would not ship. But if the proposal of my hon. friend were accepted, if Churchill were a basing point, the economics of the situation to the person in that area would disappear entirely. He would say: What do I care about the carrying charges or how much they are? I get

$1.75 when my grain goes into the elevator at Churchill, and I am going to ship it in November and let somebody else worry about when it comes out of the elevator. That would be a fictitious situation, a situation that would not follow the laws of economics, and a situation which I am sure my hon. friend would not care to foster.

Just to sum up. The differences between Churchill and Vancouver and Churchill and Port Arthur are, first, that only two or three grades of wheat are merchantable at Churchill. If my hon. friend put feed wheat into Churchill it would be there until someone railed it back to Le Pas and down to Port Arthur. In other words, it is a limited market. Second, it differs from the other ports in that it is open only about two and a half months in the year instead of twelve months. Third, it depends on contracts made by the buyers of the wheat with one merchant shipping line. I believe that line is the only one that does business into Churchill.

All grain there is at the risk of these contracts being made. Under present-day conditions wheat is not shipped until contracts have been made which specify grade, quantities and tonnage. My hon. friend will say that everyone should have confidence that those contracts can be made, but there is that element of uncertainty which is not present in the method of handling grain through the other ports.

While my hon. friend is seeking to remedy what he feels is an injustice to the grain growers within a particular radius of Churchill through not having Churchill as a basing point, his remedy would inflict a greater injustice upon the grain growers outside that radius who would have to pay the bills to enable the farmers to collect higher prices through the basing point being at Churchill.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at any great length on this bill, because I understand there is a resolution on the order paper in connection with which we may have an opportunity to speak. What I have to say is more in the form of a question to be addressed to the minister. Is it not true that his statement is predicated upon the port only using 12½ per cent of the wheat that is available in the area which is tributary to the port?

Mr. Howe: No, I would just as soon use 50 per cent.

Mr. Knight: I know the port is being used to only 12½ per cent of that 40 million bushels, but would not the situation be different if the port was using 15 million or 20 million bushels?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Knight: I have a copy of a letter from the manager of the port in which he says that the facilities there would permit them to ship 25 million bushels out of the port so long as those facilities were not interfered with by too much in the way of imports. While we are working now under definite agreements, I submit that the minister's argument will not be as valid when those agreements run out. It has not always been as easy to sell wheat as it is today or as it was during the war years and the years just subsequent.

Is it not quite true that it is likely wheat will have to be stored at some point? It seems to me that it would not matter very much from an expense point of view where it is stored. I know that the wheat board gave instructions that October 6 should be the final date for shipments to Churchill, and I would not think there would be any large amount of wheat stored at that port this winter. The day will come when wheat will have to be stored.

I do not see any sense in taking delivery of all grain in the east any more than I could see any sense in the wheat board taking delivery of nearly all Saskatchewan flaxseed last year at Fort William. The result was that those people in Saskatchewan who wanted to crush flax could not get a kernel of grain lately. They would have had to haul it back to the prairie provinces.

I suggest that if wheat is going to be stored in preparation for shipment some of it might be stored in the government elevator at Saskatoon. As far as I am concerned that elevator is just a white elephant, because it stands year after year with the bins empty. Grain has often been stored on the farm, and I think that is a good policy, but more use should be made of the government storage elevators in various parts of the country.

I was disappointed, and I know the people in my constituency were disappointed, when the vegetable oil mill had to close down two or three weeks sooner than it ordinarily would because no flaxseed was stored at Saskatoon. I make a plea to the minister that if wheat has to be stored it should be stored at Churchill, and in the government elevator at Saskatoon which has a 5½ million bushel capacity. I am going to keep on advocating the use of the port of Churchill. I should like the route to be tried at least once to full capacity. Give that port a chance to show what it can do.

Mr. A. J. Bater (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) say that he had a special interest in Churchill. Many of us in northern Saskatchewan have a special interest in that port. After listening to the minister a few minutes ago we realize that there are many ramifications in connection with the shipment of wheat through Churchill.

Early this fall we were much concerned over what we heard and read about the boats coming into Churchill having no grain to take out on their return trips. After hearing the minister speak tonight I am beginning to see the reason why there was no grain at the terminal at Saskatoon. We are also very much interested in that elevator, and I am particularly because my farm is not far from it.

The marketing of grain is of much concern to us all and the minister has said that it must be got out quickly on demand. Possibly that has much to do with there being no grain in the terminal at Saskatoon. I am hoping that in the future, when the marketing of our grain is in a more stable position than at the present time, greater use will be made of this port. I do not intend to say much more about the shipping of our grain, but I should like to read a letter which I received since coming down here which refers to Churchill. This letter has nothing to do with wheat, but I think its contents are significant. It is addressed to myself and reads:

> It is my intention to bring some pedigreed cattle over from Great Britain next summer. Would prefer to ship into the country via the port of Churchill on account of that port being about 1,200 miles closer to our point than Halifax, thereby saving a long rail haul and consequently larger cost for freight, et cetera. At present there are no quarantine facilities at Churchill nor stockyards either (these were removed during the war) and it would be necessary to have quarantine facilities arranged by the Department of Agriculture, health of animals branch. Dr. Childs of Ottawa, I believe, is the chief veterinarian in charge of this.

He goes on to say:

> I have discussed this matter with the secretary of the On to the Bay Association who is in correspondence with Messrs. Dalgleish, the shipping firm of Newcastle, who, for the past several years, have been sending ships to Churchill for wheat, with a view to ascertaining rates, etc., for transportation.

That letter is signed by P. J. Ibbotson, of Radisson, Sask. He happens to be a breeder of purebred Shorthorn cattle in my constituency, and also a grain grower. Such a letter does bring it to our attention that possibly greater use should be made of the port of Churchill, not only for the shipping of grain from Canada, but also for the shipping of livestock and goods from Great Britain to different parts of Canada.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): There seems to be a long drawn out argument as to the port of Churchill, but there is one bright spot in that argument in that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) stated tonight that he is in favour of that port. I think if more of our men in positions of power were in favour of Churchill rather than Montreal and other ports we would have a much greater advantage than we have been able to reap in the past. Many of the arguments of the minister have been based on present crop conditions, a short crop, and the fact that our contract with Great Britain expires at the end of July, 1950.

The people of northern Saskatchewan and others fairly close to the port of Churchill should be able to take advantage of it, and are entitled to some benefits on account of its existence. If it is not feasible to put the necessary changes into effect this year then action should be taken as soon as possible so that the people adjacent to that port can reap those benefits. I believe I had something to do with having the port of Vancouver amendment made in the Canadian Wheat Board Act. In my opinion, while we were entitled to have that change made, others are also entitled to have the port of Churchill used as a basic port.

Therefore, while the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as I said before, has based most of his arguments on the short crop this year and the fact that our contract with Great Britain expires next year, I feel that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will have to get busy and see that we get more rain so that we can grow larger crops and use the port of Churchill as a storage port if for no other purpose. While he is doing that, the Minister of Trade and Commerce can see to it that we have a contract that will bring us beneficial results for the delivery of the wheat that we can produce provided we get the necessary rain.

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): I want to speak very briefly on this bill. The matter of how we sell our wheat interests the people of my constituency so that I do not hesitate to put in a word on the marketing of grain. Some hon. members have said that northern Saskatchewan would benefit greatly by the use of the Churchill route. I think that we can all agree on that; but, as has been stated by the minister, under our wheat agreement with Great Britain we have to market that grain this year.

As far as my constituency is concerned, I am not in favour of the bill in its present form because we in western Canada will have to pay the storage on that grain. I understand that under the world wheat agreement the price of wheat will go down a little each year. If the wheat has to be stored and we have to pay for the storage and also take a chance on the price going down, then I am not in favour of the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Order. If the hon. member for Melfort speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I must say that I think the answers of the minister are rather weak. His whole case is predicated on the fact that the bill does not provide for the handling of the 40 million bushels of wheat that might be grown in the favourable freight rate area adjacent to Churchill. I think that argument may be wrong. With very little expansion the facilities at the port could be made to handle 40 million bushels of wheat. On the average, I do not think there are 40 million bushels of wheat produced in that area of the grades that can be marketed through Churchill. I think probably 25 million or 30 million would be closer to the amount that could be marketed from that area via the port of Churchill. Therefore I do not think his argument is sound.

His other argument is that if the freight rates were paid on the basis of all we produce in that area the growers in the area would not be interested in whether their wheat went to the port of Churchill because they would get the advantage even if it went to Port Arthur or Fort William. I should like to point out as to that argument that at the present time the wheat board—and I am not criticizing them because I think they have done a good job in many respects—have not put forth every effort to use the port of Churchill because it did not matter to the wheat board whether or not the wheat went there. They paid for it on the basis of the Fort William-Port Arthur price. If they had been paying for it on the basis of the Churchill price they would have been more interested in seeing that as much of that wheat as possible was delivered through the port of Churchill, either under the British contract or otherwise.

As for the minister's argument that wheat going to Churchill would remain in storage there until it had accumulated considerable storage charges against it, I should like to point out that in my memory there has not been a crop year in western Canada when there was not a carryover of wheat of anywhere from 40 million to as high as 400 or 500 million bushels. Therefore the two and a half million bushels of wheat that might be carried over at the port of Churchill would be a very small portion at any time of the total carryover of wheat in Canada. Carrying charges must be paid on that wheat whether it is at Churchill, Saskatoon, Fort William or Montreal. Carrying charges are accumulating just the same. I do not think the argument is sound that it is going to cost the wheat growers of the west a lot of money for carrying charges at the port of Churchill. As for its costing the wheat growers of western Canada more money because of the favourable freight rate to Churchill being paid to the growers in the Churchill area, that depends entirely on whether we make full use of the port. I think that we can make full use of the port to the extent of the wheat that is grown in that area of the grades that can be marketed through Churchill.

The minister did not answer my inquiry as to what the possible price might be at Churchill under the world wheat contract. Possibly he cannot do so at the present time, but if a favourable price is obtained for wheat at the port of Churchill under the world contract, a price in excess of the price at Port Arthur or Fort William, then I think it is doubly necessary that the people adjacent to that port should get some advantage from that price.

Mr. Howe: I would agree.

Mr. Wright: Under those circumstances I think the bill should have the consideration of the government.

Mr. Howe: Now that we have discussed this matter, perhaps the hon. member will not press the bill to a vote and will withdraw it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Is the hon. member withdrawing the bill?

Mr. Wright: No; put it to a vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion lost.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion (Mr. Wright) negatived on division.

SOCIAL SECURITY

ALLOWANCES TO PERSONS SUFFERING INJURY, ACCIDENT OR CONGENITAL INFIRMITY

Mr. Lionel Bertrand (Terrebonne) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should during the present session take into consideration the advisability of including in their social security program a system of allowances to every person, without any sufficient income or means of support, who, by reason of an injury, accident, congenital infirmity or incurable disease, is at a disadvantage in seeking or obtaining employment, or incapable of providing for his subsistence, and whose age prevents him from benefiting by the social security legislation now in force.

He said: This motion was discussed in 1946 but was not adopted. It barely needs comment. My remarks will be very brief, because I should like to know the opinion of the house on this question. In 1946 no less than 15 hon. members, representing all parties in the house, supported the motion.

The then Minister of National Health and Welfare also was sympathetic to it, and I have no doubt the present minister will be sympathetic as well. Numerous welfare associations supported such legislation at that time, and today they strongly urge its adoption.

In the domain of social security, Canada has made an effort which deserves mention. Family allowances are now enabling large families with low incomes to face the heavy charges imposed upon them by a higher cost of living. Indigent mothers, blind and aged people are receiving from various governments grants which alleviate their sufferings and permit them to improve their lives. Allowances and pensions give veterans an opportunity to rebuild their lives on a better basis and assure them of a living if, physically speaking, they have left parts of themselves in the conflict. The labourer temporarily out of work may realize unemployment insurance benefits.

Family allowances stop at the age of sixteen; old age pensions start at seventy. In my opinion the age limit for this latter pension should be lowered to sixty-five as soon as possible. The difference of fifty-four years between the ages of sixteen and seventy represents more than the average human life. In my opinion a certain section of the people within those age limits has been left unprovided for; that is, the invalids and cripples. This group includes the victims of infantile paralysis, those who have suffered accidents of all kinds but who do not come under the benefits of any provincial accident insurance, persons suffering from congenital deformities, and other sick people we cannot cure.

If these people or their families are wealthy they can obtain all the necessary treatments in peaceful surroundings, thus alleviating the burden of their misfortunes. If they are poor they have to rely upon public charity. No municipal bylaw will provide help for them; no provincial allowance, as far as I know, can give them any grant; and I could not discover any federal statute under which they might get assistance of any kind. No one will employ an invalid; he is not accepted on the labour market. In this age of mechanization the machine, which does not stop, supersedes the human who, in order to follow it, must have strong arms, strong legs and powerful eyesight. Invalids and crippled persons are set aside for reasons of security and production. In the meantime the cripples and invalids, out of work or occasionally employed at casual jobs, cannot earn their living. If they have wives and children their fate is simply tragic. Then they must resort to public charity or welfare associations, or even beg from door to door. In addition to their physical misfortune they must undergo the brutal obligation of living desperate days with no hope of improvement. From week to week, under the heavy existence they have to bear, they become discouraged, if not filled with despair. Misfortune will poison them, but misery will kill them.

Crippled persons and invalids deserve their place in the sun. They have a right to happiness just the same as anyone else. So would it not be right for the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) to study this problem and make a statement concerning these indigent persons, and then recommend a suitable system of allowances to be paid by the federal government or subsidized by both the federal and provincial authorities? The social security program cannot be complete if indigent invalids and crippled persons are left to their unfortunate fate.

Everyone endorses a program of social security for children, for the family, for indigent mothers, for the aged and blind, and for veterans and disabled soldiers. I am sure everyone will also endorse a movement to extend to crippled people and invalids the total sympathy of the nation, if special legislation to that effect is presented. Their existence on a lounge chair is restricted by the horizon of their window. They live in darkness, without light or company, in a state of perpetual restlessness with respect to the future, constant dejection, sleepless nights and continuous disappointment. A person who has never suffered cannot understand the darkness cast upon the life of a hapless person afflicted with infirmity, want and often poverty. Let us assure them that even though they may be ignored locally the nation as a whole is not indifferent to their fate and will not reject them from our national life. Spreading joy means spreading peace. To abolish social misery means strengthening the security of the nation.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, everyone approves the social security granted to children, families, indigent mothers, old men and women, blind persons, veterans and disabled servicemen. Everyone will also express approval if we extend to cripples and invalids the full sympathy of the nation, under the form of legislation specially meant for them. Their outlook is limited to what they can see through the window from their lounge-chair; it is restricted to a house whose threshold definitely shuts out the horizon; it is concentrated in the shadows, because they dread sunlight and the crowds; it centres around a succession of worries about the future, of endless discouragement, of sleepless nights and of accumulated despair. Those who have never suffered cannot realize how gloomy is the solitary life of the hapless people who have to contend with physical disability, want and too often distress. Let us cast some ray of hope in their direction, by helping them to live. Let us give them the assurance that, while they may be unknown and unnoticed locally, the nation as a whole is not unmindful of their plight and does not consider them as outcasts. By giving joy we ensure peace; and by abolishing social distress we strengthen the security of the nation.

(Text):

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the resolution now before the house commends itself to the sympathy and attention of all members. I am sure they appreciate the humanitarian views of the sponsor of this resolution who is bringing the matter before us for the fourth time. I have no doubt his views are shared by all members of this house. The welfare of the masses is the concern of all right-thinking citizens since no state can progress in harmony nor can a democratic society develop unless the vast majority of the people can live without fear and anxiety. The need of man is to live in security and freedom; not only political freedom which we in this country are fortunate enough to enjoy—often without realizing our good fortune—but freedom from want and freedom from fear of what tomorrow may have in store for us.

It was for this reason that years ago, under Liberal guidance, this country embarked on a program of social security. It has developed gradually, step by step, bringing joy to so many families, bread and better clothing to so many children throughout the country by means of the family allowances. That perfection has not yet been attained, I would be the first to admit, but I should not like my friends opposite to overlook the propriety of giving justice where justice is due. I am, of course, referring to the administration that has given Canada a system of social security of which we might well be proud even though, as I said before, it is not perfect.

If I may be permitted to quote a few words I said in this house in 1946, which are to be found at page 738 of Hansard:

> Social security is not a cure-all for man's troubles, nor is it intended to prevent man from working for his living. It would not be right to bring into being any social system which would have as its outcome any diminution, if I may so describe it, of individual effort, or any crushing of initiative. On the other hand, it is impossible to do away with risks and responsibilities, and it would not be right to have a society based on paternalism. What must be created is equality of opportunity for all. Heredity, talent, initiative and work will soon make sure that equality of attainment will not be achieved.

In principle, sir, all men are born equal; yet from the moment of their conception they are unequal. Some are born of healthy parents and some are born invalids, diseased and sick. Some men are born of parents who have great intelligence, while others are born of less intelligent parents; some are born wealthy and others are born in poverty. The moment a man is born, inequality is born. A system of social security is needed to correct somewhat that situation which nature and life bring about in society. It is also a false principle that equal work brings equal results. We know too well that that is false.

The measure now before us proposes a pension for invalids. It has been argued by many economists and sociologists that such a measure should be adopted at the same time as health insurance. I should like, at this point, to put on the record what I said on this question of health insurance, which is found at page 740 of Hansard of 1946:

> Sickness is the most constant and frequent risk for the low income population and for wage earners in general. It is a risk which may entail the loss of health and earning capacity, the loss of livelihood, the loss of ability to pay for medical assistance.
> What is needed is to place at the disposal of the people the facilities of modern medicine for the preservation of the health and detection of disease. As stated in the proposals to the provinces, under our present system, for those who cannot afford to pay, the cost of ill health falls at the very moment when earning capacity is cut off. Those unable to pay are left to the charity of benefactors. It is evident that a scheme of health insurance such as is proposed by the dominion to the provinces is necessary, and it is to be hoped that an agreement in this regard will be reached. Any such scheme should include an extension of assistance to the blind, assistance to needy mothers, and maternity grants.

And of course pensions for invalids. One of the most important aspects of social security is that which has to do with financial aid for interruptions or stoppage of income, or inability to earn sufficient income due to invalidity. The main headings under which such interruptions in work might be classified are unemployment, illness, age, disability and invalidity. Invalidity would fall into two different categories, temporary or permanent. There is also the question of industrial disability. The people who would suffer under this classification would be protected, of course, by the workmen's compensation acts that have been passed by the provinces. There are several classes of people who are not industrial invalids but who have been invalids from birth or who have never fallen into the category of people who were insured under the unemployment insurance scheme or who could not qualify under the workmen's compensation acts. Up until now nothing has been done for those people.

Many economists and some sociologists would not give a social security measure such as this top priority. According to the various books on the subject that I have read, the subject was generally classified under the following heads: first unemployment, then health insurance; disability or invalidity; old age; premature death and funeral costs in such cases; family allowances; sickness insurance; maternity grants and widows' pensions.

One must consider that the question can be treated in two different ways and it has been handled differently by the various countries in the world. This is true of most of the social security measures. You can approach the problem through the contributory insurance systems or through state grants or pensions. We must admit, Mr. Speaker, that one of the groups which have been neglected in the organization of our social security set-up is that of the invalids. I mean especially those whom I mentioned a moment ago who are not mentally unfit, because those are hospitalized by the province, or those who, shall I say, do not become disabled through industrial occupations, but those who may in the early years of their life develop infirmities or who may be born with infirmities or incapacities of one sort or another. Those people have never come under any provision of the provincial or federal law. They are a group of people who have been sadly neglected, and I think it is high time that we did something for them.

In the province of Quebec there is a roundabout way of helping some of these cases, and that is through the Needy Mothers' Assistance Act. If a man is a permanent invalid or is one whose invalidity is expected to last for quite a long time, the mother can apply for the needy mothers' assistance and at times she is given consideration. But there is a clause in that law which specifies that unless the mother has children under sixteen years of age she cannot qualify. The burden is still left on the family if the husband has become invalided and if he was a farmer or lumberman and did not fall under one of the provincial workmen's compensation acts. Anyway, that is a makeshift arrangement. It is not a direct approach to the problem. What is needed is a pension for invalids similar to the old age pension. The matter has been handled in that way in some countries, although in others it has been made part of the contributory insurance system. First of all, Mr. Speaker, I think the important point is a definition of what is called invalidity. That is something that is considered important by all the economists who have treated on the matter, and it is something that has also been considered in different ways in different countries, and in different ways even in one country like the United States. The broadest definition, if I may say so, is the following. Under United States life insurance, purchasable by persons who served in the military or naval services of the United States during the war, total permanent disability is any impairment of mind or body which continuously renders it impossible for the disabled person to follow any substantially gainful occupation, and which is founded upon conditions which render it reasonably certain that the total disability will continue throughout the life of the disabled person.

Some people will say—and it has been so argued in certain countries—that this was not even broad enough because it could not cover the people who because of their occupations, did not come under the workmen's compensation acts and who become invalids not in a permanent way but oftentimes for more than one or two years. You have people who have some sort of lung ailments who can be hospitalized for a certain number of years or who may become better soon after. They cannot conscientiously be classified as permanent invalids. This might not apply to many people because the definition specifies "that the total disability will continue throughout the life of the disabled person".

This question of definition in all of the different laws that have been passed in the countries of the world has been an exceedingly contentious point, and the economists fear that it may lead to serious abuses unless the invalidity pensions are brought in in connection with a health insurance scheme whereby the physicians who look after the administration of the health insurance act can at the same time serve to determine the more or less permanent invalidity of a person who applies for that pension.

There is another approach to it and it has been tried by the Australians. But before coming to that, I think we might have a look at how the question has been treated, and for how long, in many countries of the world. In Germany I think the benefits date from 1911. But there they have never been entirely state benefits. The German wage earners and salaried employees' insurance schemes have included benefits for old age, invalidity and survivorship since 1911. The age for old age pensions was reduced to sixty-five in 1916. The two schemes work concurrently. The question of definition there also remained open for a considerable time and was never satisfactorily settled—that is, to the satisfaction of the interested parties —because it covered only the wage earners and it did not go as far as the Australian scheme. On insurance in Germany I wish to quote from a book entitled "Medical Benefit in Germany and Denmark" by I. G. Gibbon, page 2, as follows:

> Insurance is compulsory both against sickness and against invalidity and old age. Roughly, it may be said that insurance against invalidity and old age has been compulsory for all manual workers, and, if the income does not exceed £100 a year, for some other classes of workers . . .

They still keep some qualifications, which of course must be taken into account in every such scheme, such as the income of the person, whether it is personal income or income from inherited sources. But yet it was wider than the laws of many other countries. To continue with the quotation:

> . . . Compulsory insurance against sickness, under the old law, extended to very much the same groups.

In Germany, there were schemes in connection with compulsory invalidity and old age insurance. They were insurance schemes; they were not pensions such as we have here in this country for old people and such as exist in Australia, for both the aged and the invalids given outright by the state. It may be as some of my hon. friends of the C.C.F. group have stated—and strangely enough I found that in many countries it was the Conservatives who were of that opinion—that the contributory system is more advisable. I have heard many of my friends over to the left advocating that system. In Germany it was compulsory; and for compulsory invalidity and old age insurance the workman and his employer contributed in equal shares, and the state provided only the administration. That is what is done with regard to workmen's compensation in many of the provinces. In this case also the contributions are proportionate to the wages. Most of the schemes are insurance schemes. They are not pensions as the proposer of this motion and I would like to see them.

In New Zealand, which is quite often quoted by our friends opposite as the state where they have a perfect social security system, the new benefits of the social security system came into effect in 1939. Old age, invalidity and minors' benefits existed prior to that date but these laws were consolidated and the scheme was on an insurance basis. There the social security system is financed by contributions from every citizen together with contributions from the state derived from general taxation. There you have the three sources. You have the workmen, the employer and the state contributing to the scheme. In New Zealand every person of the age of 16 years and over is required to register under the act, and, unless exempt, to pay a registration fee of five shillings a year in the case of females and a like fee in the case of males 16 to 20 years of age. Males over the age of twenty are required to pay £1 a year. In addition to the registration fee there is payable also to the fund a social security contribution of one shilling in the pound, 5 per cent, on all salaries, wages and other income. I wonder if that would please many of the people who are advocating the invalidity pension. As far as I am concerned, I much prefer the Australian system, which I have reserved for the end.

In going through the Beveridge report I was very much surprised to find so little said about the class of persons who may be called invalids, but who do not fall under any legally protected category at the moment. Paragraph 352 says:

> Where infirmity starting before working age prevents the person from entering a gainful occupation and therefore from qualifying for disability benefit, provision will be made for national assistance in case of need.

In the Marsh report I did not find any definite or satisfying scheme about disabled persons who do not become disabled as a result of industrial occupations. We know much about disability that causes loss of earnings, but that particular class of people mentioned by my hon. friend and in whom I am interested at the moment is not mentioned to any great extent in the Marsh report at all. The question has aroused interest in the United States on the part of sociologists. I quote from a book published in the United States called "Insecurity a Challenge to America", by Epstein:

> Although there is hardly any information in the United States as to the extent of invalidity, the problem of the crippled, disabled and chronically ill has always been with us. Since our machine development is very great, the risk of injuries from automobiles and other mechanical appliances is exceptionally high in this country. Outside of the workmen's compensation laws providing for those disabled in the course of their work, nothing has been done in this country to alleviate the distress caused by disability, except in the case of blindness. The inadequacy of voluntary insurance protection against invalidity is also evident.

He goes on to say:

> Today, twenty-five nations provide protection against this economic risk. Because of its permanent character, invalidity insurance is generally combined with old age insurance. This is done in twenty-one countries.

In Australia old age and invalidity pensions are provided by the state without any contributions. Epstein goes on to say that no other British dominion has made any provision for invalidity. He forgot New Zealand, which had made a provision long before this book was published. He goes on to say:

> In Australia the entire cost of invalidity pensions is borne by the government.

It is covered through noncontributory pensions and limits allowances to those who have no relatives able to support them. That was before the last changes were made in Australia in 1946 when the scheme was broadened.

I hold in my hand the sixth report of the director general of social services of Australia. They found this system workable, and they found that it was possible to carry it on without putting undue strain on the treasury. In Australia at the moment there are 290,000 people who receive the old age pension on a noncontributory basis and there are 68,277 people who get invalidity pensions, and 5,251 more people are in receipt of special pension in order to pay their board in asylums. These figures are not such as to show us that it is impossible to do it in Canada, because the cost in Australia is £29,000,000. I shall elaborate further on this—

On motion of Mr. Picard the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall take up estimates, commencing with Veterans Affairs and later on Labour or Public Works, I do not know which.

Mr. Green: All day?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): All day, except during the hour reserved for private bills.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, October 7, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

MILITARY AIRCRAFT

CANCELLATION OF UNITED STATES ORDER FOR PURCHASE IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a copy of which was sent to his office this morning. Has the minister's attention been called to a press announcement this morning to the effect that an obscure piece of United States legislation has been invoked by the United States air force to cancel a million dollar order for military aircraft which were to have been built in Toronto? Has the minister any comment to make?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not seen the newspaper in question, but I am aware of the situation. I am a little surprised that the hon. member should refer to the Buy-American Act as an obscure piece of legislation. It is a piece of legislation about which we know a great deal. All I can say is that representations are being made in so far as the act applies to military purchases.

STANSTEAD COUNTY

CONGRATULATIONS TO RESIDENTS WHO HAVE REACHED OR PASSED THEIR 100TH BIRTHDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Roberge (Stanstead): I should like to rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, to point out to hon. members that longevity still prevails in Canada, especially in the county of Stanstead, which I have the honour to represent. This very day Mrs. Alma Gardyne is celebrating her hundredth birthday anniversary, and on your behalf, Mr. Speaker, and on behalf of all hon. members, I extend to her best wishes for happiness and good health. She is now vacationing at Eagle Point. In the little town of Beebe, Quebec, Mrs. Gardyne has a cousin, Mrs. Emma Moir, who is 105 years old and still in good health. I suggest that hon. members who would like to live to a good old age should move to Stanstead county. To both these ladies we send our very best wishes and say ad multos annos.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

526. Departmental administration, $2,157,024.

Mr. Pearkes: Would the minister care to make a statement?

Mr. Gregg: I had rather intended to reserve any general statement with respect to the work of the department until a little later in the estimates, if that would meet the wish of the committee. If hon. members desire to discuss matters of a general nature before touching upon particular matters, I suggest that it might be done under the item which has just been called.

Mr. Pearkes: I should like to discuss a few matters of general interest concerning veterans affairs and the administration of this department.

Successive governments during the last thirty years have been advised in the administration of veterans affairs by special and select committees that have been set up in order that the veterans legislation might be worked out to the best advantage not only of the country as a whole but also of the ex-servicemen and women. There was very little to go upon when the first veterans affairs committee was established in 1916, but almost every year since then the committee has been gaining experience and we believe has been of more and more assistance to the different governments. In the final report of the committee which sat a year ago it was suggested that there should be a standing committee on veterans affairs, and the same recommendation had been made by organized bodies of veterans. I feel I can say that these committees have been of great help to the various governments; and I would quote the words of a former minister of veterans affairs, the late Senator Ian Mackenzie, who in his foreword to the volume known as the veterans charter, makes this comment:

> In my parliamentary career of more than quarter of a century, I have never seen a committee work harder and with more effect than the 1946 House of Commons committee on veterans affairs. To its members—veterans all—must go the broad measure of credit for shaping the final legislative form of the most ambitious program of rehabilitation ever undertaken, in this or any other country.

Those are words of high praise. It was my great privilege to serve on that committee; and while I am not capable of embroidering the words here used by the late minister, I would say that I do consider it a privilege to have served on that committee, which was composed of members from all sides of this house who forgot their party affiliations and made a firm and determined effort to draw up legislation which would be of benefit to Canada and her ex-servicemen.

Not only do I believe that such committees have been of assistance to the government; they were also of great assistance to the organized bodies of veterans throughout the land. Representatives of those organizations were permitted to appear before the committee and give evidence in the presence of the officials of the department, placing before the committee the problems confronting them and recommending the steps they felt should be taken in order to improve the conditions of veterans as a whole or of some particular group. One might almost say that the committee provided a safety-valve for the veterans organizations. Those groups of men across Canada knew they could appear before that committee and, to use a common expression, let off steam. The committee would then consider the recommendations that had been made, and make its own recommendations to the government. Naturally the government would not always adopt those recommendations, but we had the feeling that they were receiving the earnest consideration of the government.

In the final paragraph of the foreword by the late Senator Mackenzie these words are used:

> Not for ten, perhaps twenty, years will it be known how much ex-servicemen and women have been able to contribute to a Canada at peace as a result of these re-establishment measures. When that accounting is made, I know the program laid down in the Veterans Charter . . . will appear in true perspective as a social investment of unmatched success.

These words indicate, I suggest, that the work of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the work of future governments in behalf of the veterans will not have been completed for many years to come, and I should like to feel that full advantage will be taken of that social investment to which the late Senator Mackenzie referred.

The problems of our veterans are still unfinished business. That is so because the national economy of the country is continually changing, and those changes affect the veterans of this land. In addition, advances are being made in medical science, and every bit of new information gained by the medical service is of definite value to the thousands of veterans still suffering from disabilities following the first and second world wars. Changes in provincial legislation also affect veterans legislation. In some provinces there are hospital insurance schemes which have a distinct bearing upon veterans legislation. Then there is the advancing age of the veterans to be considered. Year by year more old warriors go to their well-earned rest. As the remaining veterans advance in years they find it more difficult to support their families and to maintain life generally. It was therefore with considerable regret that during the last session we noticed that no committee on veterans affairs was set up and, so far as one hears, it is not the intention of the government during this session to assemble such a committee.

I feel that the government is depriving the veterans of this country of an opportunity of presenting their problems to the members of this house. I believe, too, that the government is depriving itself of the advantages which would result from such a committee, in the preparation of legislation and the administration of the Department of Veterans Affairs. Such a committee would aid in the preparation of estimates, and perhaps enable the minister to make a more equitable distribution of the available funds.

There are particular reasons, I believe, why a veterans affairs committee should be set up now. Within the past year a new province has been brought into the household of Canada. The veterans of Newfoundland have gained immeasurably by having the provisions of Canadian veterans legislation applied to them. Many of these Newfoundland veterans served under conditions which were slightly different from those under which Canadian veterans served. Some of them served in forces other than the forces of Newfoundland or Canada. Many minor adjustments have to be made to our veterans legislation to enable the veterans of Newfoundland to reap the full benefits of the legislation developed in Canada over the years.

Then there is the question of the Veterans Land Act. It is obvious from the speech from the throne that a bill is to be introduced during this session containing certain amendments to this act. Those amendments may be intended to regularize certain practices which are now carried on, but no opportunity is being given for a committee of veterans to examine that bill before it is introduced in this house. As one moves across this country and meets with veterans organizations, one gathers that definite amendments are required to the small-holdings sections in the Veterans Land Act. I am not sure that those regulations have worked out to the benefit of the veteran in a number of cases. It has been said that new housing regulations are to be adopted. The necessity of providing homes for the people of Canada has made it necessary for the government to introduce a bill in the name of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters). To what extent will the veteran benefit from that legislation?

It is the feeling of many people that the amount of land a veteran is required to take up under the Veterans Land Act, namely, some three acres, is too much. It does not meet the requirements of the veteran who has a permanent job and has taken a small holding in order to augment his income. No man can make a living off three acres of land, nor can he maintain that amount of land in good shape after completing a day's work in a factory or office. It is not surprising, therefore, to see a large portion of these small holdings covered with noxious weeds, such as the Canadian thistle. I believe steps should be taken to ascertain whether it would not be an advantage to the veteran to have that requirement reduced. Such an investigation might well have been carried out before a veterans affairs committee.

There is still uncertainty, or shall I say disapproval, amongst certain classes in connection with the war veterans allowance. There seems to be a general demand in this country that the war veterans allowance be brought more in line with the old age pension scheme. The means test as applied to war veterans allowance, if it cannot be removed, should at least be made more elastic. Since these war veterans are growing older, there is a feeling that the War Veterans Allowance Act should be extended to meet certain other classes of veterans. There are Canadians who served in the United Kingdom during world war I and who did not get an opportunity of serving in an actual theatre of war. As we all know, during world war II the United Kingdom was declared a theatre of war, but the provisions of that act do not apply to veterans of the Canadian expeditionary force, who, through no fault of their own, were retained in the United Kingdom.

There are many other veterans who did not serve with the Canadian forces but did serve with other commonwealth forces, and who have for many years been residents of Canada. They have raised their families to become good Canadians, just as the veterans themselves have now become good Canadians. There is a general feeling among organized bodies of veterans that the provisions of this War Veterans Allowance Act should be extended to their comrades who served in commonwealth forces other than the Canadian forces. The plight of some of these men who draw disability pensions from the British ministry of pensions is serious. The British pension scheme is not nearly as generous as the Canadian scheme. A one hundred per cent pensioner, or a widow drawing a pension from the British ministry of pensions, receives somewhere in the neighbourhood of $7 a week. It is hard for those men or women to maintain themselves in Canada on the standard that we should like to see our Canadian veterans maintain. I know that the British government considers that it has fulfilled its obligation when it pays these ex-servicemen in sterling. I realize that there is no legal obligation upon the Canadian government to pay veterans who served in other forces than the Canadian forces if they did not have Canadian domicile at the time they enlisted. But in view of long residence in Canada, and in view of the fact that they fought alongside our Canadian troops, it would be a generous action—one which I think this government could well afford, and one which would be applauded by the veterans organizations from one end of Canada to the other—if the government could see its way clear to extend the provisions of this act to include veterans who have lived in Canada for a long time and who served with other forces.

There are also problems in connection with the civil service preference. Recently certain regulations have been passed with regard to the training allowances under the Veterans Rehabilitation Act. These are amendments which were made by order in council dated as recently as September 28 of this year. There has been no opportunity for any committee on veterans affairs to consider any of these matters, and numerous others which from time to time arise and which affect the veterans of this land.

For these reasons, and for others which will arise, I believe that we are warranted in asking the government if they will meet the recommendations of the last committee on veterans affairs, of the Canadian Legion and of other organized bodies of veterans, by establishing a standing committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) has said some things that needed to be said in this committee. I do not think there is any more important matter that could come before this committee than that of reconstituting that veterans affairs committee. We have standing committees of the house on industrial relations, on fisheries, on railways and on many other matters, but a veterans affairs committee deals with human problems, and they are problems that are changing from day to day.

I had the privilege of serving on a veterans affairs committee for approximately eight years. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Nanaimo, the veterans affairs committee did an excellent job for the government. The committee consisted of veterans of both wars. When the committee met, they did not discuss the business of the committee from a partisan standpoint. Everyone was interested in doing the best job he could for the veterans of both wars, with particular emphasis on the veterans of the last war. I found the members of that committee to be non-political and impartial. I am reasonably sure that most of the legislation that was enacted by the government was largely influenced by that committee, and the government received the credit for putting it through. That is all right. We are not particular who gets the credit, as long as we get something done. Ever since the committee was discontinued, an urgent demand has been made from all sides of this house for its reconstitution. I think it should be set up again at this session, and that it should be made a standing committee. I believe such a committee would be a great advantage to the government.

I am not being critical of the administration, because I realize that the Minister of Veterans Affairs is an old soldier. I know him well; I know that he is sympathetic. But I also know that he is just a human being and cannot be expected to keep his fingers on all the ramifications of the department. Neither can his deputy nor the members of the pension commission be expected to do that. What I shall be saying for the next few minutes is not by way of criticism of the administration, but is more in the way of thought-provoking comment. One reason why I think the veterans affairs committee should be set up again is that it would be a brake on regulations which are written around the basic legislation and which at times in effect completely change the meaning behind the act when it was passed. I am just going to give a few examples.

The hon. member for Nanaimo mentioned the small-holdings section of the Veterans Land Act. I remember what happened in the veterans affairs committee when that Veterans Land Act was under discussion. For weeks and weeks we sat in committee, and we hammered out what I thought was fairly good legislation. It was passed unanimously by the committee. Then it came before the house and was passed unanimously. Everybody thought we had done an excellent job. Certainly a great deal of work was done on it.

In my opinion the best section of the act was the small-holdings section. What happened with regard to that? Under the act that was passed by the veterans affairs committee and in the house an ex-serviceman could make application under the small-holdings section, and if he could secure a half acre of land in any part of Canada he qualified for the benefits of that section and could establish a home for himself. But a few weeks after the house adjourned, the act was changed by order in council and the land requirements of the small-holdings section were stepped up to three acres.

If hon. members will make an examination of the land that is available in Canada, they will find that it is impossible to obtain that kind of land in or around any town or city, or any community of over 1,500 in population. If it is there, you cannot buy it; it is too expensive. But in most cases it is not there at all. The order in council changed completely what the veterans affairs committee had in mind and what this house adopted. As a result, thousands of service personnel across this country lost the opportunity of securing a home. While housing is perhaps one of the main problems in Canada today, I do not think any section of our population is affected to a greater extent than are the service personnel. You meet thousands of them across the country. I object strenuously—and I think every hon. member should—to any board, commission or cabinet, without reference to the House of Commons, changing a statute that was passed by parliament. If the veterans affairs committee were sitting continuously during the session and handling the affairs of service personnel, which are changing from time to time, it would be a brake on that kind of thing.

Let me give another example. I hold in my hand a letter which indicates that regulations passed by somebody take the pension completely away from a serviceman while he is in hospital. It does a lot of other things as well; it does the kind of thing a committee would prevent. The minister has this letter on his desk, and I know he will do what he can to correct this injustice. I shall read a few extracts from this letter. It is an official letter from the Department of Veterans Affairs, Camp Hill hospital, Halifax, and is dated September 3, 1949. The man concerned was receiving a disability pension of $94 a month. He is an old gentleman, a veteran of the first war. The letter reads as follows:

This is to inform you that form 529, recently completed by you in connection with the amendment to class No. 6 regulations which became effective

August 1 of this year, has now been reviewed by our Ottawa office, and we have been instructed to advise that your monthly pension will be allocated as from August 1, as follows:

Total pension received	$94.00
Set aside 10 per cent (until credit of $250 is built up)	9.40
	$84.60
Less comforts and clothing	13.00
To be applied towards maintenance	$71.60

Therefore his pension is completely gone, and he is a pauper; he has nothing. But this is not the worst feature of it. The letter goes on to say:

In addition to the foregoing, in accordance with the terms of the amendment referred to, it will be necessary for you to hand over to the department for safekeeping the funds contained in your savings bank account in the Bank of Nova Scotia, New Waterford, which you state are slightly over $550.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Has he taken up with the minister the subject matter of that letter?

Mr. Gillis: Yes.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Has he obtained a statement of the facts of the case?

Mr. Gillis: Just a minute. I have taken this letter up with the minister. The minister has had it in his hands since September 21. This is October 7. He is checking it. As I said at the beginning, I am confident that the minister—and I have known him for a long time—so far as he is able to do so, will correct any injustice to service personnel; but this regulation cannot be changed by the minister himself. Probably it has to be changed by the treasury board. Nobody knows who comprise the treasury board. They say what is to be spent and what is not to be spent, and these regulations come from that board. That is why I said I was not being critical of the administration. I have done a lot of business with them over the years. I have confidence in their honesty and ability, but I am doubtful of the people who are writing regulations that change basic legislation passed by this house.

I will await the minister's answer to this. I am raising this question deliberately, in order to get those who are behind the scenes, and who have usurped the powers of the House of Commons by changing legislation passed here, to think about it. That kind of thing was all right during the war, in an emergency, when you had to do things fast, but an emergency does not exist today. Veterans problems are definitely fixed now. We have accepted them, and we have them on our hands. The members of this group are prepared to sit on a committee of this house to do what we can to help the administration pass legislation which is fair and adequate, and in keeping with the service rendered by the service personnel of this country.

There is also the matter of the difference between the War Veterans Allowance Act as applied to personnel of the second world war and the War Veterans Allowance Act as applied to the personnel of the first world war. This matter was mentioned by the hon. member for Nanaimo. I am not going to repeat his argument. In the second world war England was a theatre of war. I am now thinking in terms of the widow section of the War Veterans Allowance Act. A widow of a veteran of the second world war who saw service only in England can qualify for a pension under a provision of the War Veterans Allowance Act, but a widow of a veteran of the first world war who saw service only in England cannot so qualify. This should be corrected. The widow of a veteran of the first world war has reached the age where she no longer has earning power. She is in the age group of from fifty-five to sixty-five. You have to be old to get the old age pension; she is too young for that. She has no earning power. The members of her family have grown up and have their own responsibilities and obligations. There are thousands of them across the country. They have no income, and they will come to you and tell you that they have no home. We should amend that section of the act, because if one widow is entitled to it on the basis of service in England, then we should have amended the act properly when it was amended and included the veterans of both wars. It is a great injustice to see an old lady in these circumstances. Because her husband unfortunately did not get over to France in the first world war, she is discriminated against, but the pension is being paid to a widow thirty-five or forty years younger who still has earning power if she wants to use it. If anything, the situation should be reversed, but definitely the discrimination should be removed; widows of both wars should be treated equally. This is another matter the veterans affairs committee should study thoroughly.

I should like to refer to another subject. It has been unfinished business for a long time. I have taken it up on many occasions in the house and in the veterans affairs committee. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will recall it. I refer to divorce as applied to the soldier. I have taken cases up with the commission. I have talked it over with the chairman of the commission. I have discussed it in the house with the Minister of Justice. This is the way it works.

During the first world war the wife of a soldier went to the United States and divorced him while he was overseas. He came back to Canada. Not being a lawyer, he went out and found himself a wife. He applied to the proper person for a marriage licence, went before a clergyman and was married. He was in receipt of a disability pension. He applied to the commission for the dependent's pension for his wife. He was informed that he was not legally married; that the United States divorce did not apply in Canada, therefore his wife could not receive her portion of the pension. I raised this question in the house in 1940. At that time the minister of justice told me that in order to do anything about the matter it would be necessary to change the Canadian divorce laws. I do not think it is necessary to change the Canadian divorce laws, but if it is necessary, they should be changed. At the time I asked the minister of justice this question: If the man was not divorced, why was he not arrested and charged with bigamy? Why was he issued a legal document and permitted to go through a church marriage? That should be corrected. It was not corrected. The war was on, and in the aftermath of the war there were many other problems. But the question was referred to the veterans affairs committee for special study, and a report was to be made with respect to it.

I have run into two or three other similar cases. For instance, a Canadian boy married an English girl in Canada. She goes back to the old country and gets a divorce. He is stuck here in Canada and cannot do anything about remarriage. I am not suggesting a remedy. I do suggest, however, that the committee on veterans affairs should be reconstituted. The section of that committee which was giving special study to these matters included some good lawyers. They should be put to work again, and a report of some kind should be made to the house.

I have in mind another problem. A boy joined the air force early in the war, went through all the training, and qualified as a pilot. He was posted to one of the civilian flying schools as an instructor-pilot. My information is that he did not ask for that posting, he was sent there. While on a joy-ride one night he fell off a hay wagon and his skull was fractured. He is home, and in bad condition. He was refused a pension on the ground that he was employed by a civilian section of the service, and was told that he should make application elsewhere for compensation. Surely this is an obligation of the government. By virtue of the fact that he enlisted, took the training and qualified in the regular service, I suggest that there is an obligation resting on the government, and that he is entitled to compensation. In the services one goes where he is sent and asks no questions.

This boy is suffering from a fractured skull. The matter was taken up with the commission, and an adverse ruling was given. Perhaps these are small irritations, but they could be removed. None of them is very difficult; they just require the application of common sense. But we cannot get down to details and work out legislation unless we have men sitting in and giving the matter special attention. If the fisheries committee want to change a label on a salmon can, they meet, work on a bill, perhaps for hours, and approve it. I cannot understand why the government should be averse to reconstituting the committee. I worked with the minister more than twenty years ago in connection with veterans problems. He knows the problems, and I would like to continue to help him by bringing these small irritations to his attention so that he may proceed to remove them and those who were promised everything when the war was on and were hailed as heroes may get a square deal. The amount of money involved would be small.

I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members who may serve on the committee—and I say that because I am reasonably sure it will be set up; there are enough veterans in the house to see that it is set up—the fact that one reason for our having so many veterans problems in all parts of the country is that we have no proper social security measures. A large number of the problems which are dumped into the Department of Veterans Affairs really belong to some other organization, and have to be financed in some other way. But until we have a proper over-all social security set-up in this country, which will provide industrial pensions on a contributory basis, and adequate old age pensions, we shall have to take other action. The problems of first world war widows are not war problems. These widows should be given enough to enable them to live in comfort without having to present themselves as special problems connected with veterans affairs.

Until we have proper social legislation we shall have to continue to pass these matters over to the only department of government which has within its control legislation to ease the burden of these people in their old age. I plead once again with the minister that he set up a committee as soon as he can, so that we may get to work.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with the two hon. members who have preceded me in urging that the committee on veterans affairs be made a standing committee. Under rapidly changing conditions it becomes important that we have a review from year to year of the various acts affecting veterans, to find out whether or not they are adequate to deal with the problems involved. We might also make a careful check on the administration of those acts.

Whether or not the government would care to make the veterans committee a standing committee of the house, I urge that a committee be set up at this session, because there is a good deal of unfinished business which should be dealt with as soon as possible.

I should like to make a brief review of some of the recommendations of former committees on veterans affairs.

The chairman of the committee which sat last will recall that when the pensions bill was reported to the house I congratulated him upon the manner in which the affairs of that committee had been conducted. Throughout its sittings a splendid spirit was shown. I complimented him on the fact that at no time during the deliberations of the committee was any attempt made to plug a vote by bringing to the committee Liberal members who had not taken an active part in its proceedings, merely for the purpose of defeating in a vote those members who had attended regularly and listened to all the evidence. While that condition was not so evident in 1946, I believe it is only fair to say that it is what happened in 1948. Indeed at times I believe the results were somewhat embarrassing to the government.

The final report of the committee which sat in 1948 was a good one, although it did not always go as far as some of us would have liked it to go. We were hoping the government would give sympathetic and careful consideration to that report—and I do not for a moment doubt that the government believed that they did that very thing. Unfortunately, however, they were not willing, apparently, to adopt many of the recommendations the committee had made.

I should like to deal briefly with some of those recommendations. Going back to the committee which sat in 1946, we find that it made certain recommendations concerning the corps of Canadian firefighters, the Canadian Red Cross Society, and ferry command. May I read from the report in this connection:

That the government consider the advisability of introducing a bill providing that:

1. The supervisors of the auxiliary service and fire fighters of the corps of Canadian fire fighters dispatched overseas, and members of the Canadian Red Cross Society and St. John Ambulance brigade who served in an actual theatre of war, be accorded all benefits, pensions, rehabilitation rights and income tax exemptions as members of the armed forces.

As former members of the special committee will recall, the government refused to implement this recommendation. When the committee was set up in 1948 we listened to briefs submitted by these three organizations, and became convinced of the soundness of the stand we had taken in 1946. Therefore we again brought down recommendations urging similar action. Again the government did not see fit to take action.

I believe the committee was insistent that the Canadian firefighters should be treated in the same way as members of the armed services, because at the time of their enlistment they were assured by the then deputy minister of defence, General LaFleche, that they would be considered a fourth arm of the services and receive the same treatment. In 1946, therefore, we voted to give them the same benefits as members of the armed services, and we voted the same way in 1948.

As to the Canadian Red Cross girls, I think there has been a good deal of misunderstanding about the type of service they performed and the pay they received. In order to clarify this point I should like to read briefly from the final report of the veterans affairs committee of 1948. The part dealing with these girls reads as follows:

The young women who left Canada under the auspices of these two organizations—

I am referring to former members of the Canadian Red Cross Society and the St. John Ambulance brigade.

—served with the armed forces in Great Britain, on the continent of Europe and in other theatres of actual war. They acted as nursing assistants, ambulance drivers, etc., were attached to military units under the discipline of the officers commanding, and shared hardship and danger with the members of the forces without sharing their privileges or receiving sufficient remuneration to meet the minimum costs of maintenance; they were all volunteers and many were overseas long before the women's corps of the armed forces were organized in Canada. Your committee recommends:

That overseas welfare workers, as defined in paragraph (a) of section 53 of the Civilian War Pensions Act, be granted

(a) if pensionable, eligibility for vocational training as provided for veterans, or equivalent educational training; and

(b) a gratuity of fifteen dollars for every thirty days of service in an actual theatre of war.

The veterans affairs committee gave the matter careful consideration and arrived at that decision after hearing all the evidence. But apparently the government has not seen fit to implement this recommendation.

Then there is the ferry command. The 1948 report of the veterans affairs committee recommended that they should be given the following benefits: (a) vocational and educational training as for veterans; (b) benefits under the Veterans Land Act, 1942; (c) a gratuity on the same basis as awarded to the armed forces; (d) re-establishment credits as for veterans; (e) eligibility for insurance under the Veterans Insurance Act.

So far as I know the government has not taken any action to implement these recommendations. The matters they deal with should be reviewed by the veterans affairs committee. It may be argued: Why do this, when the veterans affairs committee has already, on two different occasions, made recommendations covering these people, and the government has failed to act? Nevertheless it is very important that the veterans who were on the veterans affairs committee, if they are still satisfied that action should be taken, should do all in their power to impress upon the government the fact that we have not fulfilled our obligation to these people. As to the firefighters, the definite promise made to them by the deputy minister upon their enlistment should be upheld.

I want to say a few words about the old soldier settlers. As the older members of the house know, the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) has always taken much interest in this matter. I am an old soldier settler myself, but I am not referring to myself because I do not owe the government any money. I think we all realize that the soldier settler had a pretty tough proposition under the old Soldier Settlement Act. The act did not go nearly as far as the Veterans Land Act, and even under the Veterans Land Act many of our young veterans are having plenty of difficulty in meeting their obligations.

In 1948 the veterans affairs committee recommended that the old soldier settlers be given a clear title. Apparently the government have decided not to take action on that recommendation, but I frankly admit that they have at least gone part of the way in helping to relieve what is a tragic situation so far as the old soldier settlers are concerned. Supplementary estimates were brought down in 1948, I believe, in the amount of $150,000, to reduce their indebtedness, and I see that in the present estimates there is another item of $150,000 for this purpose.

I am aware of a number of the new agreements that have been offered the soldier settlers. Many of them provide for a considerable reduction in the debt, but in order to take advantage of that reduction they must meet their payments as they come due. They are told that if they do not meet their payments the agreement will no longer be effective. In view of the crop failures in various parts of western Canada this year, I hope that when these veterans fail to meet their payments under the new agreements, as some of them are bound to do, the agreements will be extended so that the soldier settlers may still receive the benefit of the reduction. In other words, I hope that the department will extend the time during which payments can be made. I do not doubt for a moment that this will be done, but I have received several letters, some of which I have already taken up with the department. I am quite satisfied with the attitude of the department, but on the other hand they point out that in order that the soldier settler may get the benefits of the new agreement, these payments must be made.

There are one or two other questions I should like to deal with. Two hon. members who spoke previously referred to the War Veterans Allowance Act. I have always looked upon the War Veterans Allowance Act as one of the most important pieces of legislation administered by the Department of Veterans Affairs. Many veterans who are one hundred per cent incapacitated depend upon the War Veterans Allowance Act because they are not able to receive a pension owing to some technicality in the Pension Act. Many of those men are having a pretty tough time. I well remember that when the War Veterans Allowance Act was first introduced it was stated that the age at which a war veteran could obtain an old age pension would be reduced by ten years. In other words, we took the stand that war veterans were prematurely aged by ten years, and that they should obtain the old age pension at the age of sixty instead of seventy.

Various changes made in the act since that time have broadened it considerably; nevertheless the war veterans allowance provides a smaller amount of assistance than the old age pension. I believe a married veteran may receive only $70, whereas under the Old Age Pensions Act he would get $80, and supplementary payments by the provinces would make it more than that. Under the War Veterans Allowance Act the maximum is $70 a month, apart from the assistance fund; but there are comparatively few veterans who can obtain help under that special fund which was created last fall or early this spring. I believe all veterans organizations have urged that the amount of the war veterans allowance should be increased to $50 a month for a single man, and that a married war veteran should receive at least $85, and some have urged $100.

In addition, as a previous speaker pointed out, the veterans have urged that England be made a theatre of war for world war I. They have also urged that action be taken to make imperial veterans, who were not domiciled in Canada prior to world war I but who have resided in Canada for twenty years or more, eligible to participate in the benefits of the War Veterans Allowance Act.

With respect to the Pension Act, one provision has received probably more consideration than any other in the various veterans committees; that is the question of disability of pre-enlistment origin. Committee after committee has tried to deal with that situation in such a way that veterans who were graded as A-1 upon enlistment may be able to get pensions for any deterioration which has taken place. An amendment was suggested in 1946 striking out the words "wilfully concealed", but at that time the government was not prepared to accept it. A similar amendment was suggested again in 1948, when I am glad to say it was accepted by the government. I understand that as a result a revision of all pension cases has been carried out to ascertain whether any veterans may benefit as a result of those words having been taken out of the act. I hope that at some later date the minister will tell us just how many cases have been reviewed and how many veterans have benefited as a result of that change. Judging from some cases that have come to my attention I am afraid we still have not solved that difficulty. There still seem to be many veterans who should be entitled to pension but who are denied it on the ground that their disability is of pre-enlistment origin.

Then there is the question of benefit of the doubt, which has also received a great deal of consideration in the various veterans committees. In 1946 we suggested a very minor amendment to section 62. In 1948 we were still convinced that the situation was unsatisfactory, and suggested another amendment. I would remind hon. members that in its report the McCann commission stated that not in all cases were veterans getting the full benefit of the doubt under that section. It was hoped that as a result of the amendment suggested in 1948, and following the discussion that took place, there would be a broader interpretation of that provision. Mind you, in making these remarks I am not criticizing the pension commission, because I realize that they are bound by the act. If we are not satisfied with what can be done under the act the only remedy is to amend the act to permit the pension commission to deal with these matters in a broader way. Personally I am still satisfied that we have not amended in a proper manner the provisions with respect to the benefit of the doubt and disability of pre-enlistment origin, and I believe further changes will have to be made before these cases can be dealt with satisfactorily.

That is all I intend to say at this time, but I hope the minister will be able to assure us that this committee will be set up this session, and moreover that it will be a standing committee of this house.

Mr. Fulton: I too would like to support the suggestion advanced by the three speakers who preceded me, that the veterans affairs committee should be set up this year and that it should be made a standing committee of the house. I think perhaps you will agree, Mr. Chairman, that at any rate for purposes of argument sufficient reasons have now been advanced to make it unnecessary to go into the matter again in detail. I suggest sufficient reasons have been advanced for the purposes of argument, but in my view sufficient reasons have been advanced to justify the setting up of the committee, and I hope sufficient reasons have been advanced to ensure that the government will in fact accept the suggestion and proceed along these lines.

I would point out just one fact that is very relevant to this discussion. There are some thirteen standing and select committees of the house which are set up from year to year. These are not all included in the little book you have in your hand, Mr. Chairman, but I took the trouble to go into the lobby and check in order to see how many of these select committees are appointed each year. Of the thirteen, some half dozen meet only once or twice a session. Some have not met for years. So it could be said with a great deal of justification that these half dozen committees, if they could not be dispensed with, at least could be consolidated into one committee. It is extraordinary that in this house we should have half a dozen committees serving virtually no purpose, or whose work could be done by one committee, while we do not have a committee on veterans affairs as a standing or select committee of the house. A great deal more could be said on this score, but I do think our whole committee system needs overhauling, and that a number of committees should be consolidated into two or three new permanent committees, to keep pace with the changing conditions throughout the country. Perhaps this is not the time to develop that argument at length, though the suggestion that there should be a veterans affairs committee certainly comes within the compass of that whole subject. I believe the need for a revision of our committee system reinforces the present demand that we should have, if not a permanent standing committee, then a yearly select committee on veterans affairs.

There is only one detail in connection with the administration of the department that I should like to mention in support of the general request for a veterans affairs committee. It is one of the things that could be and should be discussed in that committee, in order to protect the commission from the pin pricks and minor difficulties that occur in the administration of the various acts, to ensure that the good will of the veterans will be preserved, and to assist the department in administering the acts as in fact we know they would like to administer them, in order that the best interest of the veterans may always be served.

This question was discussed in a previous committee. It concerns those disabled pensioners who are unable to have children of their own and who wish to adopt children in order that they may have the joys of family life which are otherwise denied to them. It is extraordinary to find that while a married pensioner is perfectly free to adopt a child, as far as the authorities are concerned, he is denied any additional allowance on behalf of that adopted child, while people who are fortunate enough to be able to have children of their own are quite properly granted an additional allowance in respect of those children. The reasoning behind that rule is quite incomprehensible to me because its only effect, whether or not this is the deliberate intention, is to deny to people unable to have children of their own the joys of married life surrounded by children. It is an additional penalty imposed upon those who are already unfortunate, which I think is quite unjustified and unjustifiable.

I could not understand the reasoning given in the committee in support of that regulation. I am still unable to understand it. Since that time I have come across another case, that of a married pensioner who wishes to adopt a child and is going to do so. He is not in good circumstances, but he is a man of the finest order with the best type of home, where children will be given the very best care and will grow up to be useful citizens. That man is already under the misfortune of not being able to have children of his own, and now is discriminated against further by that regulation under the Pension Act. Now, that is only one question which should, I think, be further discussed in the veterans affairs committee. I would ask the minister, however, whether or not we have a committee, if he will approach this question sympathetically, as I am sure he would every question. I am certain that if he will approach it in that attitude, he will see his way clear to surmounting the technical obstacles in the way of removing this regulation.

If it is found necessary to limit it to six children, that would be some gain. I believe the reason was given for the present regulation but it seems to me quite ridiculous, if I may use that term. It was said that this might develop into a racket and that veterans would adopt children just for the purpose of getting the allowance. Can you imagine anything more ridiculous? There might be a half dozen cases in which people might turn it into a racket, but I doubt it. Are we to penalize the legitimate case merely because there may be some hypothetical case of a man adopting fifteen children just to benefit from the increased allowance? There are social service agencies in every part of this country who make it their business to see that only suitable persons adopt children. That being the case, the possibility of adoption becoming a racket is so unlikely it is hardly worthy of our attention. I believe it is an argument that cannot be given any weight in considering this matter.

I ask the minister again, whether or not he sets up a committee, if he will take that matter into consideration and see if the regulation cannot be changed, even though it will involve the necessity of submitting amending legislation to this house. If he would submit such legislation I believe it would go through this house without a dissenting vote.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I did not intend to say anything on this item but, as a government member, a veteran, and a past president of our branch of the Legion, I do not want the house to be left with the impression that everything the Department of Veterans Affairs has done has been wrong. As we all know, we had grousers in the army. Sometimes the best grousers were the best fighters. In this house, of course, we have an opposition and the duty of that opposition is to criticize.

From the picture painted today people might believe that the Canadian veteran has not been well treated. I have not heard any complimentary remarks so far in this debate. I have heard certain criticisms. The member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) has mentioned the imperial veterans. The plight of these men has been under consideration by the Legion for many years. It has also been considered by many successive governments. I do not know how far the principle is to be carried in connection with imperial veterans. Those veterans were employees of the United Kingdom. They were not soldiers of Canada at the time they came to Canada. These men realized they would receive their pension from the British government. How far does the member for Nanaimo intend to carry that principle? Will he extend it to the veterans of other allied nations who have come to Canada? Are we to add to the pension of a French veteran because France does not pay him a large enough pension? Is the Canadian taxpayer to pay him? Is that principle to apply to the veteran of the United States who comes to Canada and wants a larger pension?

Mr. Lennard: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a correction. A pension was never asked for the British imperial veteran.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): You are asking for the difference between the imperial veterans pension and the Canadian pension.

Mr. Green: No; war veteran's allowance.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): You are also asking for the war veteran's allowance.

Mr. Lennard: I say there was never a request for pensions.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): At convention after convention in the past, an increased pension was requested and it was to be paid on the basis of the Canadian pension. I have heard that matter argued in Saskatchewan, and I venture to say I have been a member of the Legion longer than the hon. member who just spoke.

Mr. Lennard: I was a charter member.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): So was I.

Mr. Mutch: That makes you even.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): That is all right, and I venture to say I was in France before the hon. member.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps my hon. friend would permit us to ask him where he stands on this matter?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): You have not allowed me to finish my speech. I am asking you how far you are going to carry this principle?

Mr. Fulton: You tell us.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): You will be told when we get down to the estimates. You will also be told whether or not a committee will be set up. I believe the veterans will realize that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) will do the fair thing. I do not know what his reason is for not setting up the veterans committee as yet. As I understand it, this is a short session of the house. The business of this house is fairly plain, and that is to put through the budget. However, there will be a longer session commencing next January. I do not know what will be done as I have not talked it over with the minister.

The veterans of this house, I believe, have enough faith in the minister to have regard for his views. If he decides it is necessary to set up this committee, it will be set up. It will be for the minister to decide that. In connection with this grousing, may I say that we have a branch of the Canadian Legion at Yorkton which has a membership of over three hundred veterans. During the last series of meetings, I did not hear a complaint about anything. My partner is head of the grievance committee and I serve as chairman of the pension committee. Any matter we found it necessary to take up with Ottawa has been promptly and fairly dealt with. So far as I know there is not any case in that branch that has not been properly handled.

In addition, and I think this should be made known to the public by the veterans of this country to prevent a wrong impression being gained from what has been said here today, the veterans of Canada have been better treated than the veterans of any country in the world. It is all right for some to sit and grouse, but that is not the veterans' job. I believe ours is a more responsible job than that, and we should do something practical. These cases should be taken up with the minister, who has been very favourably disposed towards veterans, and some attempt be made to get action for the veterans.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) mentioned the matter of divorce. I do not know whether the member is advocating that, because our wives go down to the United States and obtain a divorce, we should be free to have a common-law wife who should be eligible for pension and allowances. If that is the intention, some of us will get rid of our wives very quickly.

Some hon. Members: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Surely, that is not his intention. Many complaints have been heard about housing. It is easy to stir up the veterans of this country who have, perhaps, some grievance. I believe it is the duty of some of the older veterans to exert a steadying influence so that something concrete can be done for them. I have attended meeting after meeting of veterans in different parts of my province and I have heard some complaints about the type of house the veteran is getting. Such complaints may make a popular vote-catching appeal for a certain type of politician.

I had the opportunity of visiting the Scottish branch of the Canadian Legion in Los Angeles. I viewed the housing built by the United States for the veterans at a cost of $12,000. These houses are mere shells. They do not contain proper basements, have no insulation and no heating unit. They could not compare with the houses built for our veterans. The houses built for the Canadian veterans are built to cope with Canadian weather conditions. Why is it that the veterans at the head of these organizations do not inform the boys about these things? All you do is sit around and add fuel to their troubles. My job at Yorkton is to get more houses built and I should like to get more houses of the same type.

I do not know what you fellows did when you came back from the war and got married, but I know the type of house I secured. I had to pay for it myself. It had outside plumbing and outside everything else. But in those days we did not grouse. We happened to belong to the first division. We came back and did a job. The government did not give us much. They gave us $300 and told us we were through. Let us get a little bit more of that spirit in the country.

I am quite willing to support any reasonable request to the minister for a committee. In addition, if the minister does not appoint a committee, in order to do something constructive I am ready to join with every veteran in this house in holding meetings ourselves and bringing before the minister, and consolidating, for the sake of the veterans, something that will be of some use for them. That is a way in which I think we can do more good than by just sitting here and mentioning this case and that, and saying to the administration: you did not do so-and-so under this regulation; you changed this or that regulation. Let us be constructive. I am ready to meet with the committee of veterans at any time in this house and try to work out any of their problems, either on Saturdays or at any other time.

I think it is generally agreed that under the veterans charter, and under the policies of the government for the last eight years, the veterans of this country have been fairly dealt with. There are improvements that can be made; there is no question of that. There always are, no matter what department of the government you are dealing with. Even Rome was not built in a day. Generally speaking, however, I think the Minister of Veterans Affairs is to be complimented on the conduct of the affairs of his department since he took office; and I feel that he will give us a good deal for the veterans generally.

Mr. Herridge: In rising to make a few brief remarks on this item, Mr. Chairman, I feel that it is first of all my duty to express my appreciation and the oft-expressed appreciation of my veteran constituents of the work of this department. That includes everyone from the minister to the humblest employee. I also include the parliamentary assistant who, I must say, has been most helpful in, shall I say, those unnoticed little assistances from day to day. By and large, I think the Department of Veterans Affairs has set an example for other departments of government to follow. In my opinion, the veterans affairs department has the best understanding of public and individual human relations of any department of government today.

I want to support the plea made by members who have preceded me for the establishment of a standing committee or a special committee on veterans affairs. Before proceeding further with my remarks in that connection, I want to assure the previous speaker that the veterans affairs committee, of which I have had the honour to be a member for three sessions, has not played party politics. Regardless of whether the members were Conservative, Liberal, C.C.F. or Social Credit, I think I can properly say that they did not try to stir up grievances. Their whole approach was in an effort to remedy grievances in a constructive and proper manner. In view of the experience with the present legislation, in view of changing circumstances, and in view of the great importance of this department which is even this year spending approximately $217 million, I think we are justified in urging upon the minister and upon the government the re-establishment of this special or standing committee on veterans affairs.

The work of the veterans affairs committee in 1945, 1946 and 1948 was not only of value in assisting the government; in my opinion it was of even greater value than that. I do not think there ever was any committee of this house that was more able to, shall I say, focus public attention on important legislation and to bring to a greater percentage of the public an understanding of the legislation being dealt with by it from day to day.

There are several particular reasons why I think this committee should be established, Mr. Chairman. Some have been mentioned by previous speakers; therefore I am not going into details. I want to mention, however, what are in my opinion several particular reasons for the necessity for the establishment of this committee. Under the present circumstances, I think the committee should be established to deal with amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act. I think we should now give consideration to the representations of the Canadian Legion with regard to the amounts to be paid to single and married men. This is a matter of considerable concern to the veterans across the country. Just today I received a brief from the united veterans co-ordinating committee of British Columbia which represents all veterans organizations of British Columbia. This brief sets out in full the position of these organizations in British Columbia, and describes fully the present injustice suffered by a section of the veterans of this country. I do not think that anyone can reasonably argue that those under war veterans allowances are being treated fairly, having regard to the present scale of old age pensions in this country; and let me say here that I am glad to see those people getting the amounts they now receive, particularly those in British Columbia.

Before proceeding further, I should like to digress for a moment. I think we must be fair, Mr. Chairman. If we advocate these increases in allowances, and these necessary adjustments and increases in pensions, we must be fair enough to this government to advocate publicly a rate of taxation that will cover those increased allowances and pensions.

As to a review of Canadian pension legislation, the hon. member for Acadia dealt with two points with which I am sure we are all concerned. The general legislation is excellent, and I think it is functioning satisfactorily, except with regard to the two points raised by the hon. member for Acadia. They had to do with the clause dealing with disabilities of pre-enlistment origin, which subject I still think is far from being satisfactorily settled, and also with regard to the clause dealing with the benefit of the doubt. In making these remarks, I am casting no reflection upon the personnel of the Canadian pension commission because I think they are doing an excellent job at the present time, administering the present law and regulations.

While I am speaking about pensions, I want to make one other reference. I want to suggest to the minister that while it may mean the expenditure of a few apparently unnecessary dollars, I think it is good policy for the commission to sit as often as possible in some of the smaller places; I believe it is good policy for the commission to show the Pension Commission flag in such places. By having hearings in smaller places, an increasing number of people come to understand the operations of the Canadian pension commission and its functions.

I wish to make a few brief remarks with regard to the Veterans Land Act which, on the whole, I think is functioning well. One matter that was brought to the attention of the committee by the hon. member for Cape Breton South particularly affects hundreds of veterans in my constituency. I refer to the increase in the area required for a small holding, from half an acre to a maximum of three acres unless valued at $500 or more. That change has caused a great deal of hardship in my constituency. I believe the small holdings section of the Veterans Land Act is the best home-building legislation we have in Canada. This increase in acreage is making it impossible for hundreds and thousands of men in this country to build their own homes; in many cases they would do so if the area were reduced to half an acre again. I know that this increase in acreage affects directly some 250 veterans who reside around the cities of Trail, Rossland and Nelson in my constituency. In that area it is impossible to get the amount of land required under the present regulations. I urge the minister and the government to give consideration to reducing the acreage required to half an acre as it was formerly.

There is one other suggestion I should like to make, particularly in view of the fact that the majority of the men wishing to settle on larger farms have now become located, and I think other British Columbia members will support me in this suggestion. We can do more to promote the settlement of veterans on provincial lands under section 35. It is one of the best sections of the act, because when a man acquires a piece of provincial land, either for a small holding or for farming purposes, he receives his credit or grant of $2,320; and has no debt to repay. Particularly in pioneer districts, if he is the right type, he is well on the road to making some headway towards re-establishment. I have discussed this matter with the minister of lands of British Columbia, with the deputy minister, with the superintendent of lands and with other officials. They are very sympathetic toward the question of assisting this government and the veterans affairs department in the settlement of veterans on provincial lands. We have a lot of land, particularly in the southeastern part of British Columbia where I come from. It is in forest reserves, and rightly so. Large areas were placed in forest reserves to protect the timber and for the growth of timber, en bloc in many cases. However, in those areas we have some land suitable for farming purposes and we have some land along the lakeshores suitable for small holdings. I am speaking now of the Arrow, Slocan, Trout and Kootenay lakes. They are beautiful lakes. I believe this government should do everything it can to see that as many of our own boys as possible who have grown up in the district, and who are working in the district, have an opportunity to acquire provincial land either for farming purposes or for small holdings and home sites along the Arrow, Kootenay and other lakes in Canada. These are marvellous sites which these young chaps should have the first opportunity to acquire. I know that the provincial government is willing to assist in every way possible. I urge the minister and his officials to give every consideration, to intensifying the settlement of veterans on provincial land in the province of British Columbia for farming and small holding purposes.

In addition to that, there is a group of veterans who are not qualified to obtain loans or grants under the Veterans Land Act. These are war veterans who served in the first world war or veterans who have come from Great Britain since the conclusion of the war. These veterans are not entitled to receive loans or grants under the act. I suggest to the minister that the machinery of the department could be used to assist these men in getting priority in the acquisition of provincial land. Our own boys should get the first opportunity. Hundreds of other people are seeking these locations in order to settle on farms, and are also seeking provincial land for home sites. These men are not entitled to consideration under the act but I do suggest to the minister that his department and his officials should assist these men by taking up with the government of British Columbia the question of their receiving priority when they want to purchase the land as individuals.

I also think that the committee should be re-established to reconsider the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act. I find that while the department is ready to give the qualification certificates—and they are not difficult to obtain provided the veteran has the service—yet the veterans are getting very poor service from the banks in some cases. I have met several bank managers who know next to nothing about the act and its operation. Boys go into the bank and say that they are qualified under the act to receive a loan or consideration for a loan. In some cases the bank officials have no idea of the procedure and in other cases, in my opinion, they are not very sympathetic. I have examined several cases closely and I find that the procedure that is carried out is not giving the edge to the veteran with regard to the loans to which he is entitled in view of the government guarantee behind the act.

The committee should be re-established to give some consideration to the claims of the merchant seamen. Some aspects of that question have not been definitely, finally and justly settled. The firefighters' claims should be reconsidered, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Acadia. Then there is the question of other matters which do not come definitely under the veterans charter legislation. I refer to the sale of wartime houses to veterans. All across this country there are veterans who are living as tenants in wartime houses, and who are anxious to purchase these houses in order to acquire permanent homes for themselves. This committee could be of some assistance in bringing that matter to the attention of the government. It could deal with the problems that confront the administration in pursuing a policy for the sale of wartime houses to veterans.

I am not giving all my reasons why I think the committee should be re-established, because I am trying to be as brief as possible. I shall now touch on the question of unemployment which we shall have regardless of our veterans charter, the War Veterans Allowance Act, the old age pension and other social legislation. We have an increasing number of veterans at the age of 55 and upwards who find it difficult to obtain employment. The re-establishment of the committee would be well justified on that one item of business alone, namely, the consideration in detail of this very difficult problem which we must face, that is, the possibilities for employment for the veteran who is now finding it difficult to find employment owing to his age. These are all the remarks I wish to make at this time. I do hope the minister will give them his serious consideration.

Mr. Lennard: I rise to emphasize one or two points that I think would be of benefit to this committee. I concur in what hon. members have said this afternoon in regard to the necessity of our having a standing committee on veterans affairs. What is being done in this committee this afternoon could be done in a veterans affairs committee and it would not take up the time of the house. We have had the committee on several occasions, and when the items dealt with in that committee came to the house it took only the matter of an hour or so to dispose of them. These matters could be dealt with by a standing committee on veterans affairs. They could be threshed out there and it would be more satisfactory.

One or two matters were mentioned by other hon. members, and I should like to refer to them. The hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Nanaimo mentioned small holdings under the Veterans Land Act. I have always thought that raising the small holding from half an acre to three acres was stupid. It has been always understood that the small holding was intended for a man who was occupied in an urban centre. It gave him some land on which he could have his own garden in addition to his home. From my personal experience I know that a quarter of an acre is all the land that a man can keep clear of weeds. I have done it for years and sometimes I have not made a good job of it. A kitchen garden of a quarter of an acre is all that a man can care for unless he has a full-time market garden, and then he would require five or ten acres. Therefore I think the small holding should be reduced to half an acre, and that would be satisfactory to the veterans.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer. Class 5 (a) of the veterans charter reads as follows:

> A former member of the forces who is in receipt of payment of pension, or who served in a theatre of actual war and was awarded pension, or who has not been awarded pension but gave meritorious service in a theatre of actual war . . .

If he is unable to look after any hospital bills on account of his financial standing, certain forms are completed, and if the man qualifies he is entitled to treatment. I am led to believe that until August 1 of this year these cases could be admitted in an emergency to civilian hospitals, if they were real emergencies, and later when they were able to travel they were transferred to Sunnybrook. I understand that on August 1 these regulations were changed. The patients could no longer be admitted to civilian hospitals except in a very great emergency and then they had to be transferred to Sunnybrook as soon as the acute stage had subsided. Previously the department provided transportation, either by train or, if necessary, by ambulance. I am informed that this has been done away with. In other words, a man has to provide transportation himself. One can readily see that a man may be taken ill in the vicinity of Sunnybrook, probably in Niagara Falls or in St. Catharines, and have an ambulance take him to Sunnybrook. That would cost in the neighbourhood of $50. Many could not afford that. I know of one instance where a man was hospitalized in a civilian hospital, and his physician thought he would not live. I understand however that his health is now improved to a point where he could be moved to Sunnybrook. The wife of this man was approached and she said they simply could not afford to have an ambulance. Under those circumstances the man would be denied the treatment he should have at that hospital.

I do not expect the minister to answer at this time. I have been in touch with the department, however, and I am assured he will give the matter every consideration. This is a hardship to which some have been subjected, and I feel they should not have been.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this item because, if at this session there is to be no committee on veterans affairs, there may not be another opportunity to have a general review of the problems facing Canadian veterans.

In that connection my first suggestion would be to commend to the minister the recommendation made by practically every hon. member who has spoken thus far this afternoon, namely that there should be a committee of the house. The parliament elected in 1935 had a committee on veterans affairs in only one session. If I remember correctly—and the parliamentary assistant will correct me if I am wrong—in the parliament which was elected in 1940 we had again only one committee to consider veterans affairs generally. But in the last parliament committees sat in 1945, 1946 and 1948. No committee sat last spring, but one could not quarrel with that because of the shortness of the session. I would point out however that there was a committee in the fall session of 1945.

The minister and his parliamentary assistant, and all hon. members who have served on any of these committees, know that by their work the committees have been able to accomplish a great deal for the veterans of Canada. The spirit in those committees has been excellent. I do not believe there is another committee in the House of Commons with the same esprit de corps as that of a committee on veterans affairs. The members of those committees have been veterans, and have acquired a pretty thorough knowledge of veterans' problems. By and large, in so far as has been humanly possible, those committees have functioned without political bias.

The present position is that there are over a million young Canadians who have served in the forces of this nation, and they have thousands of dependents. Those are the figures for the last war only; in addition there are several hundred thousand who have survived from the first war. It is clear, then, that a large proportion of our population are vitally interested in veterans' problems, and no other committee could have more important work.

The hon. member for Yorkton has said that Canada's veterans legislation is better than that of any other country in the world, and that statement has been made on numerous occasions. The fact is that only two nations in the world have been in a position to afford first-class veterans legislation, and those two nations have been the United States and Canada. In some ways the legislation in the United States is better than ours, while in other respects the Canadian legislation excels. Therefore it is not accurate to say that Canada's veterans legislation is the best in the world. We are all glad it is as good as it is, but we would all like to see it better.

All parties in the house have done their full share to place this legislation on the statute books. I would point out to the members that veterans' problems will be coming up continually; they will never be settled so long as there are any veterans living. I believe that now is the time to set up a standing committee of the house on veterans affairs.

There are two or three matters which I should like to bring to the attention of the members, the first of which has to do with the manner in which veterans who have passed away are buried. A great deal of care is being taken to see that veterans have decent burials. I realize that through the Last Post fund the department is doing its best to achieve that end. Only yesterday however I received word about a veteran who had served in my own 54th Kootenay battalion; this veteran was a pensioner who died of a heart attack two or three weeks ago in Vancouver; his death occurred on Saturday, and he was buried at nine o'clock on Monday morning with only a padre, one mourner and no pallbearers in attendance.

I believe the Department of Veterans Affairs might arrange to have one of their officials at Shaughnessy hospital get information in every case respecting the death of a veteran. Such information could be passed on to the battalion association involved. If there were no association in the city in question, the information could be passed on to a branch of the Legion. I am sure no veterans organization in Canada would want to have a fellow veteran buried in that manner.

Shaughnessy hospital is well organized, and the spirit shown by the staff is excellent. I have been much impressed by the good will created in the minds of the patients there. I am sure some arrangement could be made whereby, when a veteran dies in one of the larger cities, the information could be sent at once to officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs in that city, as a result of which arrangements could be made for a proper burial. Had my own battalion association known of that death, I am sure members would have been only too happy to attend and give their comrade a decent burial.

Mr. Mutch: Did he die in hospital?

Mr. Green: No, he dropped dead from a heart attack. There is just that small gap in the administration which might very easily be filled by the department.

I believe further that the time has come when provision should be made to give educational benefits to the children of those members of the forces who lost their lives. Some of those children are now reaching the age where they might attend university or take special vocational training. I am convinced they will not have the same opportunity in life they would have had if their fathers had returned. We have discussed this matter in veterans affairs committees on different occasions. The veterans organizations across the country are in favour of some such step being taken. I do not believe there is anybody in the house who would not approve of grants of that kind being made. I hope the department will give consideration to setting up some system whereby that kind of grant can be made available to the children of the men who did not come back.

I should like also to say a word or two about war veterans allowance. As the minister knows, the war veterans allowance was set up to provide for the front line soldier who was burnt out because he had been under fire. He could not establish that his disability was directly attributable to his service, and therefore he could not qualify for a pension, but it was felt that because of his service he was entitled to aid from the state. He was given the war veterans allowance, which is commonly referred to as the burnt-out pension. There was a certain honour and dignity about having that allowance. The veteran who got it felt that he was not getting relief. He felt he was getting something for his service. It was really remuneration for services rendered. All of us would like to keep it on that basis. Therefore I believe it is a great mistake for the department only to provide for additional benefits, over and above the statutory war veterans allowance, on the basis of the man showing that he has not any assets and that he cannot get along. In other words, it is being administered as a type of relief.

Let me give the minister an example. An old friend of mine was unable to get by. He was living in the interior of British Columbia. I made application on his behalf for an increase in the allowance. He had no other income and I thought he would be given either the full $10 a month or whatever amount it was decided should be paid. An investigator went up to look into his case. The chief difficulty of this applicant was that he was unable to afford clothing. The grant given to him was not a money grant; he was given so much to buy clothes. The war veterans allowance is being administered as a relief measure in the same way that relief was administered to small pensioners during the depression days. In my opinion it takes away from the recipient of war veterans allowance the feeling that he is getting something as a right, and because he had been a front-line soldier. He is put in the same category as if he had gone to the city and asked for relief. I do not think it is sound.

May I urge upon the minister that an amendment be introduced to increase the war veterans allowance from $40.41 to $50 for a single man, and at least to $85 for a married man. A married recipient may receive only $70.83 now. I believe that is the maximum amount per month. He was getting $60 before and it was raised to a maximum of $70.83, just as the amount for a single man has been raised $10. I think that a married man should be allowed more than $70.83. The Legion has suggested $85. The present payment is not on a satisfactory basis.

Another unsatisfactory feature is that the increase is based on a yearly parliamentary grant. It is not written into the statute. A grant may be brought down and voted this year, and next year a grant may not be brought down. The increase should be written into the statute. In British Columbia the old age pensioners are now getting more than most of the war veterans allowance recipients. The veterans are being put in an inferior position. I have here a clipping from a publication issued by the department, the name of which I forget.

Mr. Gregg: "Veterans Affairs".

Mr. Green: The issue I have is dated July 1, 1949, and I point out to the minister that in it he is quoted as having said at Fort William:

> I made it quite clear at the Saskatoon convention that I felt that the government must keep some general relationship between war veterans allowance and old age pensions. I still maintain that stand.

Those are the minister's own words.

Mr. Gregg: I know that the hon. member wants to be fair. I do not know whether or not the rest of my remarks were quoted there, but whether or not they are I did go on to say that there were certain factors affecting war veterans allowance which did not apply to old age pensions in any province, namely, the payment of the allowance ten years earlier, the fact that it carried with it medical care and attention, and also the fact that a man could have his wife drawing the wife's allowance at age twenty-five, if he was married in time. Those are real factors on the credit side.

Mr. Green: Of course the difference in age is to compensate the veteran for his service.

Mr. Gregg: Burnt out.

Mr. Green: In reality it is the veteran's old age pension. As to hospitalization, old age pensioners in British Columbia receive hospitalization free of charge. They get just as much hospitalization as a veteran. That may not be true in all provinces but it is so in British Columbia. I suggest that the veteran should at least be on the same basis as the old age pensioner, and in the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta he is in an inferior position at the present time.

Mr. Gillis: And Saskatchewan.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Cape Breton South says that is also true of Saskatchewan. I was not trying to overlook Saskatchewan.

Mr. Mutch: We will take that qualification on division.

Mr. Green: So much for the amount of the war veterans allowance. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Yorkton speak as he did today about the question of paying war veterans allowance to imperial veterans. The Legion has requested that for many years, and the merits of the request are good. These men came to Canada shortly after the first great war. They gave up their rights to social security in Great Britain which were greater than they could get in Canada. They threw in their lot with us. In the recent war many of them served with our veterans guard. Their sons served with our sons. Nevertheless even the men who served in the veterans guard cannot qualify for the war veterans allowance unless they went out of Canada, and very few were able to do that.

I think it is generally admitted that they are Canadians and should be treated as such. No one has been asking that they be paid pensions. We are asking that they have the right to the war veterans allowance. Some of them served at Mons in 1914, and today their position is tragic. We have many of these men in British Columbia. If they become destitute they have to go on city relief. Before the election they were all told that a survey was being made of the whole question of the war veterans allowance for imperials, and I think we should be told at this session whether or not they will get that allowance.

Then finally I want to say a word about the Canadians who served in the merchant navy. To the man in the street, and indeed to everyone in this house, they were the fourth arm of the service; they lost a larger proportion of their numbers than any of the other three fighting services. During the war they were treated as one of the fighting services. I have before me the speech from the throne delivered on September 6, 1945. Of course we know this speech is drawn up by the Prime Minister, or at all events by the government; and it contains these words:

> Our country will ever remember with pride the heroic exploits of Canada's fighting men and merchant seamen.

I have in my files a dozen quotations from various ministers of the crown to the effect that the merchant seamen were the fourth arm of the service, and they should have been treated as belonging to the fighting services.

I believe the Minister of Veterans Affairs is of that opinion, together with his department. I do not blame the Department of Veterans Affairs for not having given these men the proper treatment, but I do blame the Department of Transport. Throughout the whole affair that department has adopted a heartless, merciless attitude toward these men who served in Canada's merchant navy, and I hope that during this session that situation will be remedied.

Many of these men have lost their health. I have in my hand a letter from a young lad who served in the Canadian merchant navy for five years, four of them during the war. Even now I think he is only twenty-two or twenty-three years old. He is lying in the provincial tuberculosis hospital at Jericho Beach, Vancouver, very ill with tuberculosis. He developed malaria and pneumonia in 1945 on a trip from the west coast of Africa to Philadelphia, where he was taken off the ship and placed in hospital. When he had recovered sufficiently to travel, he was sent back to Vancouver. There he was examined by the doctor of the manning pool, who insisted that he have an X-ray. That was done; and it now develops that when the X-ray was sent back it was accompanied by a report to the effect that he should have six months' rest. Instead of that, through some carelessness on the part of the medical men in Vancouver, that lad was sent back to sea. A little later it was found that he had a very serious case of tuberculosis, which dated back to his first illness. There is no justification for the government refusing to accept responsibility for this man. The last paragraph of the letter he wrote me reads:

> You cannot deny that the merchant navy did its share during the war. Why then the discrimination? In the same ward with me are two ex-service men who during the course of the war never left the province of British Columbia, yet are drawing a one hundred per cent pension, while I am being paid for my service at the rate of $3 a month. Does this seem fair to you?

Even that $3 per month is paid by the province. There is no justice here. The law should be amended to provide that these men are entitled to pension. In addition, they can get no educational benefits; they are not permitted to go to university. Until this spring they could only get vocational training if they intended to go back to sea; and Canada's merchant navy has been so reduced that there have been practically no openings for young men who want to follow the sea as a career. Yet they were unable to obtain training for anything else. Last December I believe an order in council was passed providing that they could obtain vocational training if they applied by the end of June and if they were under thirty years of age. That was a recommendation of the last veterans affairs committee, which in my view was an improper recommendation, I do not think the committee gave its usual thorough consideration to this question. To back up my statement may I tell the minister that I believe less than one-tenth of the men who have applied for that vocational training since the order in council passed last December have been able to qualify. The figures given to me in August showed that only 47 out of 518 applicants had been accepted for vocational training. I believe too that they cannot qualify unless they served on Canadian ships, although in some cases they were sent by the Canadian manning pools to serve on allied ships. Here again there is no justification for the treatment being meted out to these merchant navy lads.

Further they get no hospitalization unless they are pensioners, and very few have been able to qualify for pensions. They do not get the civil service preference. They are not entitled to business and professional loans. They cannot take up land or a small holding under the Veterans Land Act unless they are pensioners; and they are not permitted to get a house even in these subdivisions being built up by the government for veterans. They are not classed as veterans for that purpose.

I can only bring this matter to the attention of the house, but I suggest that this treatment being given the men of the merchant navy is sufficient reason for setting up a committee of this house. That question can only be gone into thoroughly in such a committee; and I do hope the minister will see to it not only that these different things are dealt with but also that a committee is set up at the present session.

Mr. Jones: The points I have to make this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, have been very well covered by the hon. members who have spoken already, including the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for Nanaimo, the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for Kootenay West. However, there are certain matters one can always find to bring to the attention of the department that have been overlooked by others. For that reason, I should like to advocate the setting up of a committee on veterans affairs and adding to the scope of that committee matters dealing with the merchant navy. In common with the last speaker, I am firmly convinced that the merchant navy has been shabbily treated and some attention should be given to it by a committee.

The main subject in my brief speech is the British veteran who resides in this country. I realize that the problem of this veteran has not been dealt with to the satisfaction of the Canadian Legion. It is the feeling of the government that the British veteran is a newcomer to this country, even though he may have resided here twenty or thirty years. He is not regarded as a Canadian entitled to qualify for these benefits. Many of these veterans who served during the first war are now anywhere from fifty to seventy years of age and, naturally, pensionable cases. Most of them have to rely on the pension for their livelihood. I can assure hon. members of this house that the British pension when translated into Canadian funds was never sufficient to give a high standard of living, but now that devaluation has taken place that pension is totally inadequate. Many of these veterans have had to go on relief. I consider it undignified to pay a veteran who gave his services to his country some form of relief in addition to his pension. I cannot understand why the government, instead of giving him relief and a pension, cannot, by combining the two payments in one pension cheque, remove the indignity of forcing him to accept relief.

Formerly the imperial veterans cashed their pension cheques at a preferred rate. I cannot see why that procedure cannot be followed today. It may cost Canada a little money, but not a great deal, and that extra money would be spent in Canada anyway. At the same time, I should like to advocate the abolition of the means test. This subject has been well covered, but I do assure the minister it is a sore point with the veterans right across this country. Many of them have requested that I bring it to the attention of the house. I would say such a test is a violation of the trust we placed in those veterans. When they went overseas we promised them the very best and upon their return they find these pinpricks to annoy them.

These are a few of the reasons why this committee on veterans affairs should be set up. Many excellent suggestions have been made this afternoon and the logical and concise way of dealing with them would be through a committee which could recommend action on them. I realize there are possibly only two or three hundred veterans affected, but I should like to mention the student veterans in the United States. These veterans have also suffered from the devaluation of the Canadian dollar. A student receives approximately $60 per month which, after the ten per cent devaluation, nets him about $54. With the high cost of living in the United States, it is impossible for the veteran student to make ends meet.

Many of these students return to their home during the summer and earn a little money to assist them during the university term. It is generally conceded that the cost of living in the United States is much higher than in Canada. I would suggest to the minister that the veterans who are attending university in the United States be paid in United States currency or that the department make up the loss through devaluation. I say that, because the veterans who entered those universities were given the blessing of the department. I am satisfied that the government did the proper thing in giving these boys such an excellent opportunity. I know some students receive assistance from their parents, but some care should be taken to provide for those whose parents are not in a position to assist them. No student should be forced, because of financial need, to give up a course before he has completed it.

Two or three years ago the university of British Columbia had over four hundred medical students. When those students sought to continue their courses in Canada the veterans affairs committee did its utmost to place them, but found it impossible to place all of them. If I remember correctly, less than ten per cent were placed in Canada. Some went to China, some to South Africa and many to the United States. It is presumed that most of those students had high qualifications and will complete their course. Those boys having received the blessing of the Department of Veterans Affairs, I would plead with that department to see that they are given the opportunity of completing their course. It would not cost a great deal, since there are only two hundred involved.

One other matter I should like to mention concerns admittance to hospital. I am wondering whether the procedure could be simplified through the cutting of red tape. The veterans from the interior of British Columbia, for instance, who have reason to go to a hospital, have to go to Shaughnessy, and I was wondering whether arrangements could not be made to examine them locally. This would obviate the necessity of making the long, arduous journey to Vancouver merely for an examination. I would suggest to the department that this type of examination could very well be carried out at a local point near the veterans' homes.

In closing, I would urge the department to seriously reconsider its decision regarding the setting up of a veterans affairs committee and the giving of that committee the subject of merchant navy veterans for consideration as well.

Mr. Knowles: Before the minister speaks, Mr. Chairman, may I say a few words on one point. I shall not take the time to repeat the representations that have been made by other members because my support of a number of the points they have been urging is already on record. I felt it might not be amiss, however, for at least one non-veteran to participate in this discussion so that it would be clear that the rest of us are with the veterans in their concern for the best possible deal for their comrades.

I could illustrate the one point I have in mind by telling of an experience of mine a few months ago. I was asked by some friends to visit an old couple living on the third floor of a house in Winnipeg. It was not in my constituency, nor was it in the constituency of my hon. friend, the parliamentary assistant to the minister (Mr. Mutch); so that narrows it down quite a bit. Both these old people were in their seventies. The person who requested me to make the visit said it was felt the old couple should be receiving the old age pension. However, they had a great deal of pride and did not want to apply for the pension. In addition to that, the couple owned a few government bonds and they were under the impression they would have to sign them over to the government. For that reason they did not want to apply for the old age pension.

I came into the picture, as I say, because my friends thought possibly I would be able to persuade them that the old age pension arrangements were not quite as bad as they thought. I made the visit and made it known to the couple that my interest was simply that of trying to help them. During the first half hour that I spent with them I was met with an icy stare and refusal to apply for old age pensions. I was not going to give up as surrounding conditions made it obvious those people should have the pension. In due course, the old gentleman started talking about things in the past. He brought out a picture of himself taken many years ago in which he was wearing a uniform. That immediately brought to my mind the possibility that he would be able to qualify for war veterans allowance. I made that suggestion to him and you would have been amazed if you could have seen the different reaction I got from this old gentleman. He had not even known that there was something which, by virtue of his services as a veteran, he might be entitled to. That was a different story. His face brightened up and his whole conversation became much more free than it had been while I was trying to persuade him to apply for the old age pension. He began to discuss some details. That day he did not tell me, although he did later on, how much money he had in bonds. But at any rate, he was willing for me to turn his name in to the D.V.A. people down in the Commercial building in Winnipeg and for them to come to see him in order to ascertain if something could be done. As I say, if I had known at the time how much money he had, I would have known that this suggestion was not going to work. But I had to wait to find it out. When the D.V.A. people came from the Commercial building to see him and looked into his case, they found that he had too much in the way of liquid assets; and he was told that he would have to wait until he had dissipated—perhaps they did not use that word—or spent his liquid assets and they had got down to the point of about $1,700 or $1,800 before he could qualify for the war veterans allowance. This old gentleman made this known to me in a letter. I was disappointed, but I went to see him again. It so happened, to bring the story to a speedy conclusion, that making that application at least did the trick. They got into the frame of mind in which they were prepared to try and get something of what was coming to them, and I was then able to persuade them to put in their application for the old age pension. I pointed out to them that the old age pension authorities—and some of us think they are mean enough—would treat their liquid assets in a different manner. The old age pension authorities do not say: You must wait until your liquid assets are reduced to a certain amount. They say: We will give you a pension now, reduced by the computed value of the liquid assets that you have. It was only a matter of a few months until this old couple, who had been living on an amount so small that I do not know how they got by, received an old age pension making up the difference between the computed value of their liquid assets and the ceiling of $90 per month.

Mr. Mutch: That is, the computed annuity value.

Mr. Knowles: That is right; the difference between the computed annuity value of the amount they had in Canadian government bonds and the $90 ceiling. The amount of old age pension which this old couple were able to get was in excess of the total of what they had been living on for I do not know how long. That particular story came out quite nicely. But the reason I am telling it and the point I am trying to impress on the minister is that—and it is in line with arguments that have been made here before—in many respects the burnt-out pension is inferior to the old age pension. That is one point as to which it seems to me a change ought to be made. I go the whole way with the suggestions that have been made by other members. But it is soon discovered around here, and the hon. member for Yorkton will discover it too, that you must get these things by pressing for them step by step. Surely that is one step that could be taken, namely, that a change could be made in the means test provision with respect to the burnt-out pension so that the liquid assets that a veteran holds will be treated in the same way as they are treated in the case of the old age pension. I hope that change at least might be made.

Mr. MacInnis: As all the members of the committee seem to be laying their grievances on the doorstep of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and as a great many of them have to do with the war veterans allowance, I might as well put mine on the minister's doorstep also. The case that I wish to bring to his attention seems to be a particularly hard one. It is that of an old couple. The wife of the pensioner is now sixty-eight years of age. Her husband was in receipt of the war veterans allowance for I do not know how long back. In 1942 or 1943, when there was a great demand for workers, she took a position in a laundry as a seamstress. Evidently they did not report her earnings to the war veterans allowance board until the authorities found it out some three, four or five years afterwards. In any case, when they did find it out, because of the earnings of the wife there had been an overpayment to this man from the war veterans allowance board of something over $2,600. The board then notified them that they would discontinue his war veterans allowance until the amount would be paid. He was also getting a small disability pension, and they were wanting him to sign that over as well.

Not being a veteran, I admit that I do not know as much about the regulations and the legislation on the matter as do some of the other members on all sides of the house who can speak from experience. But I did know that they could not touch his disability benefit and I told him not to sign it over. I think that was about a year ago. Shortly before I came down here for this session, this man's wife got in touch with me again, saying that they were at their wits' end. The disability pension was $31.25. She had stopped working in the laundry, and that has been their total income for several months, or perhaps a year or more. She appealed to the municipality for assistance and received it for a couple of months. She had to tell her story and they got in touch with the D.V.A. in Vancouver, with the result that the municipal assistance stopped as well. I wrote to the chairman of the war veterans allowance board under date of July 23, and I am just going to quote a brief paragraph from the letter I received in reply. He referred to the man's file and said:

> On perusing same I find that a large overpayment has accumulated over a period of years due to concealment of income and wilful misrepresentations on his part.
> The matter of recovery of this debt due to the crown was placed in the hands of the Department of Justice a few months ago, and until the matter is cleared up from this angle the board can take no further action towards the reinstatement of the allowance.

If I have figured it out right, the date when they stopped the allowance was February, 1947. If this man had committed a crime, surely they should have taken criminal action against him long ago; because I imagine it is a matter for criminal action, unless it is one for an action for small debt. I do not know just which it is. I am not at all condoning the concealment of the income that was made, although I think that when a woman at the age of sixty-two or sixty-three goes out to earn a little money, she is entitled to it. As a matter of fact, she told me how it was spent. It was spent in paying accumulated grocery debts, in shingling the roof of what she said was the shack in which they were living, in getting dental work done and various other things.

I suggested to the war veterans allowance board that since it was impossible for these people to live on $31.25 a month they should certainly give them a war veterans allowance in order to enable them to live, because it is quite apparent that they will not get any municipal assistance. This is a deplorable situation, and from what I have heard today it is quite apparent that it is not the only one. I suggest that these people be treated more humanely and that at least their economic situation at the moment be taken into consideration. If this man is taken to court, if the Department of Justice gives that advice, if he is sent to jail, and if he has no other way to pay—they cannot fine him because he cannot pay—he will be looked after in jail and perhaps his wife can get along better on his disability pension. I assume that that would be paid in any case. Surely that is not a civilized way to deal with these cases. I would plead with the Minister of Veterans Affairs to see that he try to deal with these cases more in the line of civilized human behaviour.

Mr. Blackmore: What measures, if any, is the department taking to make up to imperial war veterans the losses which they are sustaining in their income from Britain because of the reduction in the value of the pound? I have a representation on that matter. It is a serious matter.

Mr. Gregg: May I ask the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) to bring to my attention the case which he has cited?

Mr. MacInnis: I shall do that.

Mr. Gregg: In reply to the question which has just been asked, may I say that my department is taking no steps with regard to that matter except this. Quite naturally, since the British ministry of pensions have a very active office in Ottawa, I have spoken to the head of that office regarding that matter, and he has spoken to me about it. I know very well that he has, as I have, received representations from pensioners from the United Kingdom in all parts of Canada. He has told me, and he said that I was at liberty to use it, that he has brought these representations to the attention of the ministry in London. Beyond that we have done nothing in the matter.

Mr. Blackmore: Does not the minister think that something ought to be done for these people? We know the position that Britain is in. It looks to me as if we are to have in a small way something like that which the hon. member for Vancouver East has pointed out. We shall have people actually suffering in Canada because of events over which they have not even the slightest control.

Mr. Gregg: I fully realize the difficulty. There is of course the very distinct priority of responsibility in these matters. One of the speakers this afternoon pointed out the difficulty that Canadian students were experiencing in the United States owing to the adjustment of exchange rates as between Canada and the United States. But there again that is not the whole problem with regard to our own veterans. Approximately there are two hundred such students, but side by side with them there are about 7,000 Canadian disability pensioners of both wars resident in the United States. The same situation applies to them as applies to the smaller number of students. One could go on and quote many direct and indirect effects of this adjustment of currency but I do not feel that we have any greater responsibility in making adjustment with those from the United Kingdom who are pensioners in Canada than the United States has in making an adjustment for our pensioners who are resident in the United States. I wish it were otherwise. That is all I can say on it at the present time.

I am sure that hon. gentlemen who have spoken this afternoon would not expect me to attempt to cover all the points raised. I bespeak a chance for either my parliamentary assistant or myself to go into full details which we shall try to do before the estimates are passed. We shall try to deal with all the questions brought up.

With the exception of two or three speakers, all who have spoken this afternoon have made strong representations on behalf of either a standing committee or a special committee on veterans affairs. I should like to say a word about that. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra pointed out, between 1943 and 1946, before I came into the house, the house had to consider some 21 pieces of new legislation for the benefit of new veterans from 1939 to 1945. It is only natural that there should be a great deal of intensified work done on that legislation in drafting it, in calling witnesses from all parts of Canada from many organizations, and in working it out. Frankly, as I look at it, and I never had any part in it, I say it must have been a tremendous task. But as I see it, and as I read the records, it appears to me that it was dealing almost entirely with new legislation.

In 1948 the government brought forward some amendments to two of these bills which had become law, namely, the Pension Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act. As well there were some other acts for minor amendments. A special committee was set up for the purpose of considering that legislation. That committee sat and, from my observation, it is worthy of all the good words that have been said about it this afternoon. It did an excellent job, and as one hon. member so well put it this afternoon, as far as was humanly possible, it was free of partisan politics. They presented their report. I cannot agree with one speaker who said today that not many of these recommendations had been accepted, because most of them were; nevertheless the factors entering into the report had to do mainly with the legislation that had been brought before it. It is true that it did discuss such matters as a further increase in war veterans allowances, the merchant marine and many others, but what I am coming to is this. We should clarify our thoughts as to whether a parliamentary committee, whether a special committee or some other, should be called upon to check on other matters in addition to legislation or amendments to come before the house. I am not going to express an opinion on that at this particular time. All that I am going to say is that there are a number of committees suggested to the government now. There is a resolution on the order paper suggesting the setting up of a committee on social security, housing and health and welfare. It is proposed that there should be a committee on national defence, on atomic control and on many other questions.

I know that the matter of committees in general, as it was put by the hon. member for Kamloops, should receive careful study, so as to get the greatest value from these committees. I think I can assure this committee that the government will give that study. I do not propose at this particular time, to recommend to my colleagues that a committee be set up at this fall session. Beyond that I am not prepared to go, with regard to committees.

May I, though, between now and six o'clock, touch at random upon one or two points which have been brought out. Two hon. members who spoke referred to the old soldier settlement board, and the remaining amounts owing to the board by veterans who have held lands these many years. I know well the arguments made in later years on behalf of those settlers—and strong arguments they are, there can be no question.

I believe however, as I indicated at the final meeting of the committee a year ago, that it boils down to this. Members who knew some of those settlers will remember that there were many of them who conscientiously made their payments of principal and interest just as regularly as it was possible for them to do. If they did not do it, it was because they could not do it. Most of them, long before this year of 1949, have fulfilled their contracts and obtained title by grinding through, paying their debts and getting their work done. I believe it is also true to say that there are a number who, through those years, perhaps could have made their annual payments, but did not do so. Representatives of the board allowed those to run on, and at the present time they are shown as outstanding accounts.

Putting it on that simple basis, I am wondering whether or not if last year or the year before we had said, or this year we were to say, "We will cut off all the rest and call it a day" it would be the fair thing to do. It sounds like an excellent thing to do, but would we not be bonusing—I was going to say something else—would we not be bonusing delay in paying one's bills when one can pay them? Perhaps, too, it might be a negative influence, by example, to those new veterans who are coming in under the Veterans Land Act.

I happen to know—and I shall take full responsibility for it, because I am speaking about my own constituency—of an old veteran who under the soldier settlement board came within the second category I mentioned a moment ago. Across the fence, on the next farm, there came a veteran of the second world war who married, settled down and started in there. I know for a fact that, across the fence, the old timer said, whispering behind his hand, "Take it easy, my boy; at the other end you will be forgiven, the same as I am."

The amount placed in the estimates a year ago, and which is repeated this year, is in my opinion accomplishing the same thing more slowly but in a much better way. The hon. member for Battle River asked some questions which were made an order for return. I tabled the return today. His questions, and the answers to them, were as follows:

He asked first how many soldier settlers of great war I are still in debt to the soldier settlement board? His question was taken to mean September 30, the last date for which we have records, and the answer was that 1,950 are still in debt to the director of soldier settlement.

In his second question he asked the total amount of their indebtedness, and the answer showed an amount of $2,231,881.22.

The third question asked how many had paid off their loans and acquired clear titles since January 1, 1948. The reply was that there were 1,039.

The fourth question asked whether any reductions in debt had been granted during 1948 and 1949, and the reply was that there had been.

The fifth question asked, "If so, in how many cases, and what is the total amount of such reductions?" The answer was that there were 496 cases, to an amount of $182,515.83.

The last question asked as to (a) the smallest and (b) the largest reduction granted. The reply showed that the smallest was $18.25 and the largest $1,998.13.

From these answers it is apparent that even in a year and a bit we have been able to eliminate or to end the debt for a total of 496 old settlers. I hope that this year and perhaps next year the main task may be completed, and that the indebtedness of those who should be forgiven will be wiped off in that time.

Progress reported.

Mr. Gregg: At eight o'clock we will carry on with public bills and orders for the first hour.

Mr. Green: Will we proceed with veterans affairs estimates at nine o'clock?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

Criminal Code

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

PORTRAYAL OF CRIMES BY PICTURES IN MAGAZINES, ETC., TENDING TO INDUCE VIOLENCE

The house resumed from Thursday, October 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fulton for the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the Criminal Code (portrayal of crimes).

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the bill this evening. I am glad that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is able to be here because I am sure he is much interested in the measure, and in the final analysis we shall have to look to him for help in having the bill put through the house.

I should like to point out that on the second reading of the bill we are only dealing with the principle, which is in effect that there should be an amendment to the Criminal Code making it a crime to print, publish, sell or distribute magazines commonly known as crime comics. So far in the debate every member who has spoken has been in favour of that principle. I was particularly struck by the speeches made by new members of the house. Several of them made their maiden speeches on this measure, and I thought that each of such speeches was excellent. It seemed to me that we were witnessing the house at its very best. It made one proud to be a member of the twenty-first parliament.

I believe the opinions expressed by the speakers who have taken part in the debate reflect the views of the Canadian people at large. No doubt most members have had representations from parent-teacher associations which, of course, are vitally interested in problems of this kind. There have also been representations from the national council of women and from the various Kiwanis clubs, which do such wonderful service work in all parts of the nation. In addition I have had representations from the university women's club of Vancouver who are very anxious that something should be done about the situation. Perhaps more important than all others, however, have been the representations from parents.

While the debate was in progress last night I received a letter from a mother in Vancouver who, by the way, is the daughter of a distinguished Canadian authoress, and I thought that she put the situation very clearly. She had heard over the radio of the debate which took place last Tuesday evening, and she sat down and wrote a letter. It reads in part:

> I know you are as anxious as any conscientious parent to see our Canadian children rescued from the evil effects of these criminal immoral magazines. I believe a big house-cleaning of our magazine and paper-back 25-cent books is overdue. We busy ourselves building youth centres, working in church to show our young people the guide posts to clean living, and all the time this stream of filthy books is allowed to come into our country.

In Canada we place as high a value on education as is done in any other country in the world. I believe that the same thing can be said about Scotland, and possibly other countries as well. Certainly every decent Canadian parent has as his or her first concern giving the children a start in life by seeing that they get a good education. I think that is typically Canadian. Parliament recognized the importance of children by enacting the family allowances legislation a few years ago. We place great value on pure food. We have many laws to make certain that nobody is given impure food. We show great determination in stamping out the drug traffic. I remember a few years ago the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), who was then minister of pensions and health, making a strong speech in the house on the dangers of marijuana, the use of which at that time was becoming quite prevalent in parts of Canada. We take drastic steps in other fields, and yet we do nothing about this character poison. That is a good description for the crime comics.

We are all in favour of the principle of the bill, and I hope it will be passed. Once the bill is on the statute books it will be a strong deterrent and a warning to publishers all over Canada, and to the people who import these books from the United States, that they will be in trouble if they do not stop this traffic.

There is some suggestion that the bill may not be worded in exactly the right way. Actually the bill in its present form was not drawn by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). It is in a form suggested by the Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley when he was minister of justice. We could not have a finer authority on the wording of the bill. If it is not exactly right now it can be amended in committee. The point is that we are debating the principle of the bill, and I hope that the house will give it second reading.

Further, I hope there will be no delay. I am worried about that because of what happened to the bill amending the Criminal Code introduced by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) the other night. He had some good amendments although, mind you, I agree with the step taken by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) when he said he would have the bill turned over to the commission revising the Criminal Code.

That was the proper step to take with that particular bill, but I am afraid that the Minister of Justice will come into the house, as soon as he is well again, and say that he is going to refer the present bill to the commission revising the Criminal Code. If that is done it will mean that the bill may not become law for a year. There will be no provision made at this session, and possibly not at the next session. A delay means not only an outpouring of more of this poison, but probably a speeding up of the process. The publishers of these magazines have a good thing. They are making money, and if they see they are going to have another six months or another year they are very apt to get out more of these comics and try to increase the circulation in order to cash in before it is too late.

Therefore I urge all members of the house, and particularly the Prime Minister, to realize the importance of prompt action on this particular measure. I suggest that we show the publishers of this junk that the House of Commons means business.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to join other hon. members in complimenting the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) on his initiative in bringing forward a bill of this kind. It seems to me that the most interesting subjects are brought up by private members, who also seem to win the approval of hon. members representing all parties in the house. It is interesting to find a discussion taking place on such a high moral plane as this one, and in this materialistic age it is consoling to find people so concerned about matters affecting the morals of our young people.

We are all in agreement as to the danger to the character of the youth of the land when their minds are poisoned by large doses of this evil kind of literature. Everyone feels that something should be done about it, but it is the hon. member for Kamloops who has brought forward this bill. Nevertheless I am wondering if he is going to accomplish what he has in mind by the amendment he proposes, and in support of that idea may I draw upon my experience as a judge in Newfoundland, as one who was especially interested in the problems of juvenile delinquency. For many years I took a special interest in that subject; and I am aware, as many hon. members have stated, that such books do have a certain effect upon the minds of young people. I think perhaps some are inclined to exaggerate that effect, and I doubt if they have as much effect as people think. However, they do have an effect upon young persons of weak minds or who, through bad associations, are prone to fall victims to the temptations which come to them through reading literature of that sort.

Two things, the movies and the comics, sometimes have a strong effect upon the minds of individuals; and I can recall several cases that came to my attention which in their way were really tragic. One was the case of a boy of good parentage who was before me on six charges of breaking and entering. He was only sixteen years of age. He told me that he had read about this in the comic books and that was how he came to go in for that sort of thing. I am glad to say that, later, when he became more mature, he turned out to be a good citizen. Another great tragedy occurred as the result of a boy seeing a hanging in a movie. He went home and experimented with a rope, and as a result killed himself. So there is no doubt that there are evil effects from both the movies and literature like these comics.

When one goes into a bookstore nowadays where magazines are displayed in great profusion, it seems to me they fall into three classes. There are the newspapers, which I suppose are the least harmful of all the literature displayed today. There are the magazines, which are in two classes: the kind dealing with economic and political subjects, and the kind dealing with true stories, true confessions, and that sort of thing. Then we have the comics. The children are interested only in the comics; but when an adult goes to a newsstand and sees the sort of picture magazines that are on display, he is ashamed to pick one up. I always consider it a reliable criterion of the sort of book that should not be permitted if it is the kind you are ashamed to let anyone, even a stranger, see you read.

We have been in confederation since April 1. One of the effects or results of confederation—I do not think it was intended by the Liberal party—has been to open the door to the sort of literature we are denouncing tonight. When we were more or less independent we had customs prohibitions which prevented these magazines from coming in, and the police and customs officials working together managed to keep out a great many of them. During the past summer, however, the country was flooded with magazines published in Toronto which were delivered through the post gratis. One day the assistant chief of police came to me in my office and said, "I don't know what I am going to do about these magazines. Everybody is complaining about them." I said, "I know what I am going to do; I am going to call the secretary for posts." I immediately called him and said, "Is it not an offence in Canada for this sort of literature to be sent through the mails?" He replied that it was. I told him what was happening, and he said he would take immediate steps to have it stopped.

As I read the section proposed by the hon. member, I understand that an offender is to be tried by a judge and jury. If that is not so, perhaps the hon. member will correct me.

Mr. Fulton: By indictment.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It seems to me that procedure is too elaborate, and that this offence should be dealt with on summary conviction, or by ordinary summary trial. It also seems to me that if these magazines are imported from the United States the customs and postal authorities should be able to stop them, when they come within the category of books which are injurious to morals. If on the other hand they are published in this country the amendment to the act should give the police power to go in and take possession, by means of a warrant, of course, and the distributor should be dealt with by summary trial. If there is to be a trial by jury it is so long before the case is heard, and then when it comes up, with clever lawyers and that sort of thing, technicalities are likely to prevent the realization of what we have in mind, which is a procedure that will be summary and quick.

I do not intend to continue my comments at any great length, but there is one thing I should like to add. In Newfoundland we tried the interesting experiment of having a great public library system, furnished without cost by the government. For years we have had a libraries board which has been broadcasting programs about books and reading all over the country. We have twenty-seven or twenty-eight regional libraries all over Newfoundland, each with books especially chosen for children. I think my hon. friends opposite who come from Newfoundland will bear with me when I say that this comic book evil rarely reached the outports of Newfoundland but is confined to the city of St. John's and two or three of the larger places such as Corner Brook, Grand Falls and Bell Island. It does not reach into the smaller settlements, thank God. Instead of the comic books, therefore, we have the other books which are carefully chosen by the special selection committee of the libraries board. We have attacked the problem in that way; and in our public library in St. John's, where we have a large selection of good children's books of all kinds, those books are used extensively and it has been a great success. I believe the existence of the public library system has helped a great deal in mitigating the evil to which reference has been made here.

As hon. members have suggested, I believe the practical approach to the problem consists in placing good literature before the boys and girls and stressing it continuously in radio programs and articles in the press. This will probably do as much as, if not more than, legislation of the sort suggested in this bill. At the same time, however, when an obvious evil exists I believe it is the duty of parliament to put it down by some statutory enactment.

On motion of Mr. Cardiff, the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

526. Departmental administration, $2,157,024.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, if the committee agrees, we might proceed item by item and as we come to the proper items I shall attempt to cover those points raised in the debate this afternoon.

Before doing so, however, and to complete what I was saying before the recess about the question raised by the member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) regarding the steps taken to adjust old debts and clear titles, may I say that matter will receive the careful consideration of the deputy minister and the director of the soldier settlement board.

Item agreed to.

527. District administration, $2,945,528.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask the minister about the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act. The annual report concerning this act for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1949, shows that there have been loans totalling $7,517,879.85; of that amount nearly half or $3,372,754.87 has been repaid. I believe this is a splendid record. The report also shows that only 34 claims have been defaulted, amounting to $36,686.05. Those figures reflect great credit on the veterans.

There is nothing in the report, however, to show the number of applications for loans which were turned down. Could the minister supply that information?

Mr. Gregg: The total number of applications not approved for the purchase of a business amounts to fourteen; for the purchase of an interest in a partnership, five; for the purchase of tools and equipment, three; for repairing tools and equipment, etc., one; for the construction and repair of buildings, five; for the purchase of a motorized unit, seven. This makes a total of thirty-five in all categories which were not approved.

Mr. Green: Has there been any demand for loans by veterans who wish to buy into a private company? As the law reads now a veteran can only buy into a partnership.

Mr. Gregg: None have come to my attention. All applications so far could be covered by the purchase into a partnership.

Item agreed to.

528. Veterans welfare services (formerly rehabilitation services), $3,686,711.

Mr. Pearkes: There are one or two questions I should like to ask about this item. First, I believe an order in council was passed a few days ago amending the rehabilitation act so that personnel in hospitals would receive training allowances or something of that nature. Could the minister explain what those changes mean? I believe the order in council was dated September 28, 1949.

The second point is concerned with the transfer from university training to vocational training and vice versa. I believe there was a deadline set when applications for transfer from one type of training to the other had to be made. I think it was within six months of the termination of the course. Some people did not receive any notice about that deadline. The only notices which were sent out appeared in the newspapers and, quite obviously, many veterans would miss them. People who were travelling or who lived in isolated parts of the country would not see such a notice. Would the minister consider extending that deadline in cases where a recommendation was made, perhaps by the president of the university or the principal of the vocational training course concerned, so that the men who had given up hope of being able to transfer from vocational training to university might still be able to take advantage of that amendment. They would then be able to continue a course which, perhaps, they had given up because they saw no opportunity of following the line of rehabilitation they particularly desired.

I have in mind men who were taking a course in carpentry who felt they would like to go farther and take a course in architecture at a university. When we are dealing with this item, would the minister answer the questions which were directed to him before the recess regarding the rehabilitation of the men who served in the merchant navy?

Mr. Gregg: On the first point, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I have not a copy of that order in council before me. I shall bring it with me at some later date when these estimates are being considered. On the question of the changeover of training, and the arrangements that were made to make that more flexible, I can say now that if a given veteran, through circumstances beyond his control, did not get the information with regard to that change in time to get in under the dateline, then the matter will certainly be taken into consideration to see that he does not suffer on that account. I doubt whether there is anything I can add tonight with respect to the matter that was discussed before the parliamentary committee and at the last session with regard to the merchant marine. As was pointed out this afternoon, the committee at that time recommended that the younger men who served in the merchant marine should be given the opportunity for vocational training in addition to training in their own business at sea. It was pointed out that at our seaports on each coast some of these young men were not working but were hanging around and being subjected to subversive influences; and it was suggested that it would be a good thing if they could be allowed to take vocational training in the same way as those who had served in the armed forces.

This matter was considered by the government, and the Department of Transport arranged that this be done, going through my department; the training was carried on in conjunction with the vocational training centres of the province in the same way as it was carried on with the veterans. More recently representations have been made, to the same effect as those that were made this afternoon, that the age of thirty was considered too young. Many of these men had already gone beyond that age and still were not permanently employed. On behalf of the Minister of Transport I think I can state that the matter will be carefully considered in view of what was said this afternoon.

Mr. Lennard: There is one matter that I should again like to bring to the attention of the minister, namely, the plight of one group of the auxiliary services that I feel have had a shabby deal. I refer to the Red Cross girls. As the minister well knows, they did not get even a clothing allowance when they came back to Canada. As a result of the small amount of remuneration received, and on which they had to live while overseas, when they came out of the service they had nothing. I wish the minister would give serious consideration to this matter.

Mr. Wright: I should like to ask the minister to give the committee a short explanation of the position of a Newfoundland veteran now coming under the veterans legislation with respect to vocational training. Will his rights for vocational training have lapsed before the act came into force in Newfoundland or will he have some retroactive rights to training?

Mr. Gregg: As all hon. members know, including those from Newfoundland, veterans in Newfoundland are in all respects now in receipt of the benefits under the veterans charter in the same manner as though Newfoundland had been a part of Canada at the time of demobilization. I think that is a fair statement. To refer to vocational training and university training, I may say that in all parts of Canada at the present time the main body of veterans have had their training. As to university training, Newfoundland had a plan of their own. They also had a plan for vocational training. It was somewhat different from ours, but it was a good plan. Some of these veterans were in receipt of training when union took place. My department took them over and carried them on under our rights until they finished their particular training, whether it was vocational or university training.

Mr. Applewhaite: Before this item is passed, I think utterance should be given to a word of commendation of a certain type of public servant. We are free, and properly so, to criticize where criticism is due; and I think we should give praise where praise is due. I refer to the type commonly known in the small towns as the D.V.A. representative. I believe that later on he was attached to the Department of Labour but he originally came to towns the size of mine as a D.V.A. representative. I should like to say to the minister that in those places with which I am familiar these men have done a job which it is impossible to extol too highly. The veterans of all services—even veterans who politically have no use for this government, and many who have not much use for the economic system under which we live—are all loud in their praise of the D.V.A. local representative who had assisted in matters such as employment, the Veterans Land Act, loans and so on. I think that some of us—and I am glad to do so—should publicly express our appreciation of the work these men have done on behalf of all veterans.

Mr. Gregg: It gives me great pleasure to direct those welcome remarks to my colleague the Minister of Labour, inasmuch as this official who has just been spoken of is in reality an employee of the offices of the national employment service across Canada. It is true that some of them did happen to serve previously in the Department of Veterans Affairs. To what has been said I should like to add that, in every centre of Canada where there is an office of the Department of Veterans Affairs and also an office of the national employment service, I believe the closest liaison and co-operation have been carried out in order to obtain employment for our veterans.

Mr. Quelch: Can the minister give the number of persons on the staff and the number of patients at the health and occupational centre at Billings Bridge?

Mr. Gregg: That was the subject of an order for return, Mr. Chairman. Was the hon. member's question with reference to all of them or just with reference to the one?

Mr. Quelch: Just the one.

Mr. Gregg: In the Rideau health and occupational centre there are 118 patients at the present time.

Mr. Quelch: What is the number of persons on the staff?

Mr. Mutch: That information was tabled in an order for return the other day. I will try to find it.

Mr. Gregg: I will get that information for the hon. member in a few minutes.

Mr. Green: The minister stated that further consideration will be given to a change in the provision under which a merchant seaman gets vocational training. Can he explain to the committee just how the authority is divided on that question between the Department of Transport and the Department of Veterans Affairs? I have just recently had the case of a merchant seaman brought to my attention. Of course he is unable to get university training. Nevertheless, he has gone to university and requires only one more year to get the degree of bachelor of commerce. In the meantime he has applied for vocational training in the way of articling to a chartered accountant. After graduating from university he proposes to take up chartered accountancy. He could get that vocational training from the Department of Transport, but they say that if he is to get it he must start in right away with his articles. Obviously it is foolish for him not to finish his course at the university. The Department of Transport refuses to give him a year's extension on the vocational training. I do not think that is right. The Department of Veterans Affairs is obviously quite willing to let him have that extension. The minister's own department obviously believes that this lad should be allowed to finish his course at university and then get the vocational training but the Department of Transport officials are making an arbitrary ruling that they will not give him that vocational training unless he leaves university to commence his articles. There is a division of authority which is unfortunate. I suggest that the Department of Veterans Affairs be given full authority to deal with these applications. I can see that the establishing of his service in the merchant navy would be done through the Department of Transport but once he had established that service, why not let the Department of Veterans Affairs take over from then on? The way it is now these lads are not getting a fair deal.

Further, does the minister not think that the merchant navy men should now be allowed to get educational training as well as vocational training? In the meantime many of them have paid their own way through perhaps two or three years but they are still in university. It is a shame that they have not had that educational help.

Mr. Gregg: I will answer the last question first by saying that a parliamentary committee composed of many minds did not recommend the university training and it has not been put into effect. To answer the other question, in their service with the merchant marine these men were under the Department of Transport. If the occasion should arise and the merchant navy were ever increased again, I presume the same situation would exist. It is also true that the Department of Transport have all the records available regarding these men; we have not.

Mr. Green: Regarding their service?

Mr. Gregg: Regarding their service in the merchant navy. Consequently it seemed sound, and I think it is, to have their applications made to the Department of Transport. If by chance they came to my department or to the district offices they were routed through the Department of Transport to decide upon their eligibility under the terms that had been laid down. After that had been decided upon and they were accepted for training they were sent on to the Department of Veterans Affairs to carry on their vocational training in the regular vocational training courses throughout the districts. As to responsibility during that stage, we have looked upon it as a joint one. If my hon. friend feels that injustices have been done in individual cases I know that my colleague, the Minister of Transport, would be glad to discuss it with him, as I would be.

Mr. Green: I would rather discuss it with you.

Mr. Mutch: May I answer the question asked a moment ago with respect to the Rideau hospital? The staff is 103; the potential patient capacity is 175. At the time the return was made a week ago there were 118 patients in the hospital.

Item agreed to.

529. Treatment services, $34,478,808.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to ask the minister two or three questions in connection with the scale of fees charged to veterans who are not eligible for free hospitalization in the departmental hospitals. Hon. members will recall that a considerable amount of discussion took place on this last spring or the year before, and a number of cases were brought up that have frequently been charged up to $9 a day for care in one of the departmental hospitals. What is the average of fees now being charged? Has there been any change during the last year? If not, is any change contemplated? As the minister knows, so far as hospital accommodation is concerned, in many places it is very difficult. If those fees were charged at any time with the idea in mind of not competing with private hospitals, it certainly does not apply to many places at the present time. Frequently the only hospital that a veteran is able to get into is a veterans hospital. No beds are vacant in the ordinary hospitals in the places in which the veterans happen to live. Whatever charge is made, if it is necessary to make a charge to the veteran who can afford it I quite agree with it; but the veteran who is not able to afford it is in a different position. In any event, if he has to be charged, the charge ought to be made as low as possible to cover whatever extra cost is necessary to hospitalize that veteran in a bed which perhaps otherwise would not be occupied.

Mr. Gregg: Fees are sometimes referred to as merely the matter of bed and board within the hospital. Then there is the larger service of the bed and board within the hospital, medical service, X-rays and so forth which come under an all-inclusive rate, including everything within the hospital. That averages $9.75.

Mr. Pearkes: Does that all-inclusive rate include surgical operations?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, everything.

Mr. Harkness: Has there been any change in the rate in the last year? Is that the same rate that has been in effect more or less since the beginning?

Mr. Gregg: The average has increased by 75 cents. It has increased from $9 to $9.75 in the last year.

Mr. Harkness: Can the minister tell us what the basis of that is? Why is it necessary to charge $9.75, which I think he will realize is beyond the means of a large number of veterans? Their incomes just do not warrant a cost of $9.75 a day for hospitalization.

Mr. Gregg: I assure the hon. member that a profit is not being made. It is considered to be not greater than the cost, and I am informed that a number of civilian hospitals charge more than that rate.

Mr. Harkness: I can quite believe that a number of civilian hospitals may charge more. The point I am getting at is this. The hospital is there in operation, and if this bed were not being occupied by the veteran who is not entitled to free hospital treatment, in practically all cases it would not be occupied at all, because these people get in only if the veterans who are entitled to hospitalization have not filled the hospital. The rate, I take it, is based on the total cost of running the hospital. Whether it includes depreciation on the capital invested I do not know, but I would take it that that is so. If that is so, I would suggest that it is not necessary; that the hospitalization of these veterans, particularly those of limited means, could be done on a very much smaller fee than would be charged in the ordinary hospital.

Mr. Gregg: I can assure the hon. member that there is no amount tucked in that $9.75 to cover capital investment. The other point which I probably should make clear is that we are not able to have a non-veteran who is not eligible for treatment come in as a patient. Those who are charged that amount are veterans sent to our hospitals by such organizations as provincial or municipal governments, or organizations such as the Canadian paraplegic association, and others who pay the amount on behalf of the veteran patient.

Mr. Harkness: How much revenue has the department secured from that source during the past year?

Mr. Gregg: I have not the information here, but I shall get it.

Mr. Fraser: It does not seem fair that the Department of Veterans Affairs should charge that amount for a veteran going into hospital, in view of the fact that the Indian affairs branch pays only $3 or $3.50 a day for an Indian in hospital. There is something wrong somewhere, definitely. I know of veterans who have had to go to hospital and who, instead of going to veterans hospitals and paying $9 a day, have found it cheaper to go to local hospitals.

Mr. Mutch: Does the hon. member know of an instance where a veteran has, out of his own money, paid $9.75 per day?

Mr. Fraser: Yes; I have had cases where they have gone to local hospitals instead of paying that amount.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Mutch: But does the hon. member know of any case where a veteran has paid out that amount?

Mr. Fraser: The parliamentary assistant told us that they paid it.

Mr. Mutch: No, we did not. We said that there is a charge there, but that in almost every instance where $9.75 has been collected it has been collected on behalf of a veteran who was there as a charge against a third party. These are veterans who are hospitalized at the request of municipalities or other organizations, or perhaps as a result of an accident where the claim lies against a third party.

I believe that upon examination the hon. member would find that there are exceedingly few cases where the veteran himself has ever paid that charge. I would be interested to know of any cases where a veteran has actually been there over a period of time, and paid that much.

Mr. Fraser: From what came out during the last session, and the preceding one, and from the fact that the minister said they were charging $9 or $9.50 a day, I know that is so.

Mr. Mutch: There is a liability of that; I believe that would be a better way to express it.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, but every veteran feels that is what he would have to pay if he went into hospital. He does everything possible to avoid the hospital on account of that charge.

Mr. Mutch: Believe me, he does everything possible to get in.

Mr. Fraser: No, to keep away from it. While I am on my feet I would ask whether the department has tried out, for blind veterans, the electric eye which has been used by the service departments in the United States. These weigh about four pounds and project a beam of light in front of the veteran. When the light beam is broken by an object in the user's path a warning is given by the vibration it produces. I understand this has worked out very well, and I was wondering if this department had done anything about it?

Mr. Gregg: I understand the department has been in touch with the situation through Colonel Baker of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, and that the matter is being studied.

Mr. Pearkes: I believe I could supply the parliamentary assistant with the names of individuals who have been in the veterans hospital at Victoria. I cannot say for certain, but I believe they paid the money themselves. Certainly they were billed for it. Then, before they were cured, they moved from the veterans hospital to the Royal Jubilee hospital at Victoria.

Mr. Mutch: The stated liability is there. But there is a latitude with respect to collection which has not, in my experience, worked any real hardship on anyone who could not pay it. I asked the question, not with the suggestion that there is no liability; there is. I have indicated however that the administration is such that it does not, in my opinion, work any hardship.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to comment on what was said a short time ago by the parliamentary assistant. I brought it out because I had three complaints within the last two months from individuals who thought they were being charged more than they should have been in the veterans hospital—certainly far more than they had anticipated having to pay.

Mr. Mutch: It could happen that either the hon. member who has just spoken or myself, both veterans, might as a result of an emergency be admitted. I believe he would agree, as would other hon. members in the committee, that under the circumstances either of us would be able to pay for that accommodation. Under those conditions it would probably be collected in full. But my point is that there is no insistence against a veteran who needs treatment and is ill-equipped to pay it, just because the liability does exist.

Mr. Goode: The statement has been made that veterans would prefer to go to hospitals other than veterans hospitals. That is not the fact. Along with many other hon. members of the house, I am a member of the Canadian Legion. We believe the department is doing its best to provide for the veterans. I do not believe in my experience with the Legion in the Vancouver area that there has ever been a case where a veteran has definitely decided to go to some hospital other than Shaughnessy. I do know of some boys in Shaughnessy who have not been able to pay for their hospital accommodation for some time. One of the boys I visited the day before I came east is dying of tuberculosis. His hospital rate is $9.75 a day, but he will never be expected to pay it. And the hon. member who asks that question very well knows it.

No one is fairer to the veterans than is this department, whether it be in hospitalization or in any other particular. I resent the implication that the department would ask the veteran in hospital to pay the $9.75, if he were unable to pay it.

Mr. MacInnis: While we are discussing item 528—

The Deputy Chairman: We are discussing item 529.

Mr. MacInnis: I was about to ask a question with respect to item 528. I understood the minister to say that it was the intention to extend the time for applications for vocational training under P.C. 5983, and also to extend the age limit.

Mr. Gregg: That was in connection with merchant seamen. I said I would be glad to discuss the matter of age limit with my colleague the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Lennard: Could the minister shed some light on the subject of ambulance service which I brought up this afternoon? I mentioned that matter so that the minister and his deputies might have an hour or so to dig up the information.

Mr. Gregg: When the hon. member was speaking this afternoon I was tempted to interrupt him to tell him that the matter to which he directed his remarks was immediately under the consideration of the deputy minister and his officials.

Mr. Green: Is there any possibility of men of the merchant navy getting hospitalization? At the present time they are not entitled to any hospitalization whatsoever unless they happen to be pensioners, and there are very few pensioners among them because the pension provisions are too strict. It is not possible to give these men hospitalization? Surely they can at least get that. It does not come under the Department of Transport. This question can be settled by the Department of Veterans Affairs. I urge the minister to make some provision to allow these men to get hospitalization. It is very unfair that they cannot get into the veterans hospitals.

Mr. Gregg: Of course, under existing legislation the answer to that is no. It is in reality a part of a larger question. As the hon. member knows, there was not only this group of non-veterans, technically speaking, but also a number of others who were considered by the parliamentary committee, and the principle has not been acknowledged that they are entitled to the benefits, including hospitalization, that were provided under the veterans charter for those who served in the armed forces.

Mr. Green: Is it not a fact that no amendment of any legislation would be required to give them hospitalization? Hospitalization is provided by order in council. No amendment to any statute is required.

Mr. Gregg: If nothing more, it would mean an amendment by way of definition of the word "veteran".

Mr. Green: There is a similar situation with regard to the widows of men who were drawing the war veterans allowance. They come under the War Veterans Allowance Act and yet they are not entitled to hospitalization. I believe they are the only group coming under the War Veterans Allowance Act who cannot get hospitalization. In my opinion that is also an injustice. The hospitals are equipped to take care of the young women who served in the three forces during the second world war. Surely some arrangement could be made so that the widows of the front line troops of the first war could be given treatment. Is the minister not going to make a statement?

Mr. Gregg: I doubt whether I could make any useful statement. I think the widows to whom the hon. member referred are widows of former recipients of war veterans allowance.

Mr. Green: That is right.

Mr. Gregg: If that were done, an equally important and much larger group would be pensioners' widows who perhaps may not have inherited the pension upon the death of their husbands.

Mr. Green: They are probably entitled to war veterans allowance under the present act.

Mr. Mutch: Not unless they had service themselves.

Mr. Gregg: I do not feel that at the present time our hospitals would be able to undertake that task without extensive enlargement.

Mr. Cardiff: Does a veteran drawing a disability pension continue to draw that pension while hospitalized?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: The minister was going to get me the figure of the amount of revenue that had been taken in by the department through the fees I referred to. Has he got that now?

Mr. Gregg: I will attempt to get that exactly. All I could give tonight would be an estimate which would include the recoverables such as the Department of National Defence, the R.C.M.P., and so on, but if the hon. member will permit me to do so I shall get that figure and bring it in at the first opportunity.

Item agreed to.

533. War veterans allowance board—administration, $237,204.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Green: The minister did not make any reply to the suggestions which were made this afternoon concerning war veterans allowance. Will he make a reply now?

Mr. Gregg: I think the main discussion this afternoon was about the adequacy of the war veterans allowance as it exists at the present time following the increase which was made last year. The other point which was discussed was the question whether ex-members of the forces who served with the United Kingdom, with the British commonwealth of nations, or our allies, and who have lived in Canada for a period of time, should be eligible under the act. Dealing with the first point, as hon. members know, only a year ago the amount of the allowance was increased from $30 to $40 per month for single men and from $60 to $70 per month for married men. That was put into effect last spring but was retroactive to the first of October of the year before. I should like to mention, in case it is overlooked, that when we come to the amount under war veterans allowance and pensions it will be necessary for hon. members to note that in last year's estimates it covers the whole of last year plus the preceding six months, which makes it a little larger than it otherwise would be. During the summer it appeared to us that there were veterans, particularly in the cities and towns, who were undergoing hardship because they had no other means of support and were not employable. Welfare workers within our department made a test for our own information in a number of centres across Canada to find out just what the situation was. We were very happy to see that conditions were not as bad as we sometimes feared they might be, but on the other hand we did find that hardship was being experienced particularly in the cities. That was the reason why I put forward a request last spring that there be inserted in the estimates an item for half a million dollars in order that we could continue and complete the survey quietly and steadily, and while so doing do something to overcome the hardship which our survey showed did exist.

We did find that some of the old veterans, who had become eligible for war veterans allowance and were getting a cheque every month, did not read the newspapers very much, or the periodicals of the veterans associations. As a result we found that when something happened to their teeth and they had to get them out they went to the dentist and paid him for pulling them; or if they had to go to a doctor for some medicine, they took their few dollars from the war veterans allowance and paid for it. In other words they did not know they were entitled to medical assistance under the War Veterans Allowance Act.

That situation, of course, was easily corrected. There are many other ways in which by advice and consultation conditions may be improved without too much difficulty. Later on I shall be able to give the exact figures; but in setting up this fund we desired that it should have a degree of flexibility which would enable our welfare people in the district to work in direct co-operation with the welfare people of the community in order to meet without too much delay any cases of hardship which might arise. On the whole in spite of some of the criticism we heard this afternoon I think that this is being done. We have kept in close touch with the situation here in Ottawa. A committee headed by my deputy minister has managed that fund from Ottawa, but a great deal of discretion has been left to those in the field to deal with local situations without delay when the need has been established. It was also necessary to have a good deal of flexibility geographically, because all veterans across the country are not making application for assistance from this fund in the same degree. In my own end of the country the applications are comparatively few. In British Columbia the number of applications and approvals is very high. That is due to the fact that many of our old veterans have gone west because of the climate, and have settled down in that well known paradise of Vancouver island. There they are, and there they foregather.

I do take exception to the suggestion advanced this afternoon that a severe additional means test is being applied in connection with the war veterans allowance. I have spoken to a good many of these men, and in my experience they have no objection whatever to going to the official in our district office, who knows all about them anyway because he has all the information in the files, and saying to that official, "Here are some additional circumstances that have got us into trouble. Can we get some additional help?" It is just as simple as that. It is not a means test piled upon another means test. D.V.A. people who conducted this voluntary survey, taking a few here and a few there, did not go out as inspectors or as a gestapo to find out whether these people were hiding something under the mattress. They went out to sit down with the recipients of this allowance, to discuss their problems and find out what could be done to help. That is the spirit in which this additional amount called the war veterans allowance assistance fund has been and is being administered. By the end of the fiscal year I am sure we will be able to tell whether this amount will be sufficient or whether further steps should be taken. I would like to carry on until the end of the year in order to ascertain these facts.

Mr. Fair: Very recently another matter was brought to my attention to which I think the minister might give a little attention. I understand that a person receiving the war veterans allowance is held down to an income of $1,100 a year, including that allowance. If he is in receipt of casual earnings, however, I do not believe that figure applies. If a man has a steady job, though it may not be worth very much, he has a ceiling placed upon his earnings. I have particular reference to the case of a man who is seventy-two years old this month. The druggist in his town needed some help for about four hours a day, and this man undertook to fill the position, for which he is paid $7.50 per week or approximately $30 a month. Apparently he was earning that money for some little time before the war veterans allowance board found out about it, and now they have reduced his allowance until a certain amount has been repaid.

I believe something should be done about a case like that, where a man of this age had enough ambition to go out and make a few extra dollars. He told me that he and his wife could not live in comfort on the allowance he was receiving, so he was trying to get a little extra money. I do not think it should make any difference whether it is a steady job or casual earnings. Perhaps in this case that $7.50 a week might be classed as casual earnings.

Mr. Gregg: I should like a chance to study the case mentioned by my hon. friend, but from what he has said I take it that this man is permanently employed, with so much money coming in regularly every week. Consequently that would be looked upon by the board as a salary or wage. I think hon. members know that we have interpreted the expression "casual earnings" in very broad fashion, but I do not think we could interpret it broadly enough to include the case mentioned by my hon. friend, if I understood him correctly.

Mr. Fair: Then I wonder if it would not be better for that man to give up his steady job and work every other week, or something like that. Would that make a difference?

Mr. Gregg: I can hardly answer that question. The amount earned is above that permitted by the act, and whether or not it would pay him to make a change would be, of course, up to him. I imagine he is rather proud of the fact that he is able to earn that much money under his own power. I shall be glad to look into the case fully with my hon. friend.

Mr. Fair: Then I wonder if the minister would suggest that he apply for the amount which was made available last year, of up to $15 a month, provided he stops work. Many other people throughout the country have done that. He would then get away from this steady salary, and make application for that extra amount provided last year.

Mr. Gregg: I shall be glad to discuss the case with my hon. friend.

Mr. Green: Do I understand from the minister's statement that in every case this additional allowance is in the nature of a grant of one kind or another rather than a definite increase in the amount of the war veterans allowance received each month?

Mr. Gregg: It is an amount utilized in an attempt to overcome special hardship which may be immediate or of some duration. It may be a spot amount of $50. It may be an amount to be advanced over a period of two months or six months or twelve months. It is flexible enough to enable those administering it to use discretion, and I feel that it is in the nature of an auxiliary to the regular war veterans allowance, and is accomplishing quite a good deal in proportion to the amount of money expended.

Mr. Green: Then would the veteran have to apply each year?

Mr. Gregg: The veteran would be in close touch with those administering it. In some cases it might not be necessary to do so, but I would imagine in most cases it would be necessary for our administrator in the district to know about the case from time to time.

Mr. Green: That brings up the objectionable feature, Mr. Chairman, that this is only a temporary measure. In most cases, it is not even for a year. Next year if a veteran is to get the same benefit he will have to re-apply. I believe some more permanent arrangement will have to be made. If the minister is only trying this out for the remainder of the present fiscal year, there is not much objection to it. However, if this is the manner in which assistance is to be given year in and year out, then certainly some better means of doing it will have to be found. If a veteran receiving assistance only gets it temporarily, and has to apply each year, he may receive one amount this year and a different amount next year.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): He might not need it next year.

[Mr. Gregg.]

Mr. Green: If that is a permanent policy, I do not think it is sound. Something better than that will have to be worked out, and I feel sure the minister will agree with me in that contention.

Mr. Gregg: I am sure I did not indicate that that was anything approaching a permanent policy. The regular recipient of war veterans allowance under the act is not, by any means, necessarily permanent in the same way a pensioner might be permanent. Under our present act, the case must be reviewed from time to time and changes made based upon the conditions under which the veteran is living. This year I believe we are really more closely in touch with those in receipt of aid than we are with the regular recipients. As I pointed out before, I think it is revealing a number of things, and by the end of the first fiscal year we shall have acquired more information on that subject than we have had heretofore.

Mr. Green: The situation with regard to old age pensions is not being met at all by this temporary provision. In British Columbia the old age pensioner is receiving $50 per month, and that increase is not temporary. The burnt-out pension is supposed to be the equivalent of the old age pension, as the minister stated in his speech I quoted this afternoon. In British Columbia and some of the other provinces the situation will develop where the old age pensioner will receive more than a war veterans allowance recipient. I do suggest to the minister that the war veterans allowance will have to be made equal to the old age pension. The idea of having a temporary increase is not going to meet the situation at all, particularly in view of the fact that the old age pensioner now receives more than the war veterans allowance recipient.

Mr. Gregg: I still come back to the point that the old age pensioner and his wife have to be seventy years of age before they can receive a pension.

Mr. Green: It is a rather weak excuse.

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to make a few remarks on the question discussed by the member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). In talking to recipients of war veterans allowance, I find they have mainly three grievances. The first, of course, is that the allowance is too small. Second, before special assistance is given an investigation is made, and that is deeply resented. This is the matter referred to by the member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) and by other members on a number of occasions, namely, the means test.

I would suggest to the minister, and through him to the government, that if the means test is to be continued we should pay the allowance until the income reached the amount exempted under the Income Tax Act, $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married persons. The recipients of the allowance would be permitted to earn as much as they could, and if they exceeded these exemptions they could be taxed in the ordinary way, including the amount received from the war veterans allowance. I believe it would be the least costly way of handling it. There must be an enormous expenditure of time and money in making these investigations. Investigations are irritating, there is no doubt about it. I am informed by individuals in receipt of the war veterans allowance that these investigations are conducted by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Some means will have to be found of getting rid of these petty annoyances.

In British Columbia we are faced with the fact that the old age pension proper plus the supplementary amount paid by the government now totals approximately $50 per month. When both recipients are over the age of seventy, it is considerably more than married persons receive under the War Veterans Allowance Act. I do not think the fact that an applicant is seventy years of age should make any difference. It takes as much money to keep a couple who are sixty as it does to keep a couple who are seventy.

Mr. Lennard: They would eat more.

Mr. MacInnis: I would imagine they would because the younger couple would be more active and expect more of life than those who had reached a more advanced age. I would suggest to the minister that he take these matters under consideration and see if there is some way we can eliminate these petty annoyances to people who are in a difficult position in many cases, through no fault of their own.

Mr. Cardiff: Could the minister tell me in what circumstances a veteran who is drawing a disability pension must find himself before he would be entitled to receive assistance from the army benevolent fund?

Mr. Gregg: The terms of reference for the army benevolent fund were worked out by a parliamentary committee. As a result of that, an independent board was created which worked out its own regulations and technique. It is responsible to parliament in a general way through the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I would not be able to answer a hypothetical question with regard to a pensioner, but I am quite sure he could receive funds from the army benevolent fund if the situation warranted it.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the minister, after giving the matter some thought, give the house a justification for the present means test against the veterans who are drawing the war veterans allowance? I should like to know by what process of reasoning that sum of money was arrived at by the men who originally fixed it at the present amount. I have never been able to see any sense in it at all. What can be the object of the Department of Veterans Affairs in wanting to keep the veterans on a subsistence level, in constant and appalling need? I fail to see any sensible objective. I can understand why the Department of Veterans Affairs would want to keep the veterans allowance down as low as possible in order to avoid expense, and that seems to be their primary objective. But why they should object to people who receive the war veterans allowance going out and making more where they can do so, I never could see, especially when the sum is as meagre as that which now constitutes the means test for veterans receiving the war veterans allowance in Canada. After the minister has had time to think this matter over, I should like to have him justify before the committee and before the country the amount of the means test at the present time.

Mr. Gregg: Even though it may not be what the hon. member for Lethbridge wants, I suppose the correct answer is that we are administering an act, and in that act appears this item called the means test. We try to administer it fairly and in accordance with what we think is the will of the people who passed the act; and they were the members of this house representing the people of Canada. I do not intend to go behind that and try to enter into the minds of those who inserted the means test into the act when it was placed upon the statute books.

Mr. Blackmore: I can understand that, Mr. Chairman. But I should like to know whether this means test was forced on the Department of Veterans Affairs; and if so, I should like to know who it was that forced it on them. The means test is said to have been passed by this house, but it was introduced by a government and passed by this house because it was introduced by a government. I am positive that no members of this house ever told the government that they wanted to have that means test so meagre as it is at the present time. If there is any way of finding out who it was that first conceived setting that means test down at as low a level as it now is, I should like to find out who it was and why he did it.

Mr. Gregg: The means test was not forced upon the Department of Veterans Affairs any more than it was forced upon the Department of National Health and Welfare with regard to the old age pension. It is part of the legislation which was considered and passed by parliament. That was one of the sections within that legislation, just as it is one of the sections within the old age pension legislation. I do not think there is anything more that I can say on that subject tonight.

Mr. Blackmore: As I see it, the point is this. It was considered by parliament because somebody designed the thing and brought it down to parliament. What I should like to know is who that fellow was who designed it, and why he designed it in the way he did. That is the thing.

Mr. Gregg: I do not want to continue this discussion, but the first designing was done away back in 1929 and 1930. In the spring of 1930 the first bill covering war veterans allowances was brought in. This item was in that original act. The act has been amended a number of times since then, but this item remains in it. I know that it has been discussed, but it remains in it because apparently the majority of the members of this parliament felt that it should be in it.

Mr. Blackmore: Would it not be more accurate to say that that is the way the majority of the members of the treasury board felt? I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the time is long overdue when a complete revision is brought about in this parliament. I suggest that the minister take this matter up in the cabinet and tell them that that is what the people all over this country think.

Mr. Knowles: I do not want to detract from this all-out attack on the means test as a whole. But since the minister is to look out and see if he can find this fellow who first invented it, may I ask a susidiary question. The minister will recall that this afternoon I was discussing the way in which the war veterans allowance means test with respect to liquid assets is meaner in its application than is the case with the old age pension people. I should like to know whether the provision which says that a veteran must reduce his liquid assets to a certain amount before he can qualify for burnt-out pension is in the act or is in the regulations under the act.

Mr. Gregg: The point brought up by my hon. friend is not a part of the act. It is a ruling by the board administering or interpreting the act.

Mr. Knowles: Now we have something about which something could be done. When the minister can say that the point we are kicking about, such as the whole means test, is in the act he can say that, as long as the majority think as the majority does in this parliament, nothing can be done. But here is something that is done not by virtue of the act itself but by virtue of an administrative ruling or regulation made under the act. I am sure that the majority of members of this house, if they had a chance to express themselves, would say that the way of administering the means test in connection with the burnt-out pension should be no more strict in any respect than it is with regard to the old age pension. I am not going to ask the minister to make any promise or commitment here and now, but I hope he will look into the matter. I am sure I made clear this afternoon the difference between the old age pension means test and the burnt-out pension means test with regard to liquid assets. As to the old age pension, a partial pension is granted bringing the recipient up to the ceiling that is allowed by the pension means test. But as to the burnt-out pension, the veteran with liquid assets—and he does not need to have much—is told he cannot qualify until he reduces those assets to a stated amount. In other words, the veteran is asked to spend it or dissipate it or he is asked to live a little bit beyond what he feels he should because of his assets, in the hope that he will get the allowance later on.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute. I notice that the minister nods his head. I want to get on the record the fact that the minister nodded his head.

Mr. Lennard: Which way?

Mr. Knowles: Up and down.

Mr. Gregg: I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. Knowles: May I remind the minister that there have been visiting in Ottawa this week women representing the non-pensioned veterans' widows association. I have no doubt they have seen him if they found it possible to get an audience. He knows some of the requests they have been making from time to time. One is that they should be granted treatment provisions, hospitalization and so on. He also knows about their particular plea that England be treated as a theatre of war with respect to world war I. Have they been able to make any dent upon him during the course of this week in connection with those matters?

Mr. Gregg: I have had the pleasure on two occasions this week of meeting with the ladies referred to. I should like to state also that these ladies told me that they had seen rumours in the press that the government had taken steps, or was about to take steps, on this much discussed matter affecting veterans who had served in the United Kingdom forces or in British commonwealth forces, which of course would in turn affect the widows of those veterans. I regret very much if such rumours went out because the facts of the matter are these, as has been pointed out. I did indicate to veterans organizations that I would study the matter. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra referred to that. I can assure him that that promise has been kept. There are matters relating to it which I discussed with the ladies and which the hon. member for Yorkton referred to in passing this afternoon. The greater number of those from the commonwealth who served in a theatre of war, and who have been in the country for twenty years, came from Scotland, England, Ireland, north and south—and there, if you say in your definition "from the commonwealth", what are you going to do about the south of Ireland? That is only a minor problem. It is not an insuperable one. I have a record of some who have served in battle in the forces of Australia and New Zealand, but they are not anything like—

Mr. Green: How many?

Mr. Gregg: I do not know how many, but I know there are a few. Then, if we are to study the problem of these people as we have been doing, shall we make a clean job of it and include all those who served on our side between 1914 and 1918? When you go on from there you have the United States, France, Belgium, Japan, Italy, Russia and quite a number of other countries. I have the list upstairs, which indicates that at least I have been giving it some study. The figures that have been estimated so far indicate that there might be in the vicinity of 2,000 British commonwealth people in the country who might be eligible in this connection. That is only a very rough guess.

Mr. Green: Two thousand?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, from the British commonwealth, who might be eligible; not those who are in the country. There is a larger number than that in the country. Other steps are under way to try at least to find out some similar estimate as to those of allied and associated countries who may be in this country. All that I will say tonight in response to the question is that the matter is being studied by my department and by the government.

Mr. Green: Is there any chance of legislation being brought down this session?

Mr. Gregg: I do not expect that it will be completed in time to bring in any legislation at this session.

Mr. Knowles: I take it that the question of the widows of Canadian veterans who saw service only in England in world war I is included in this whole study.

Mr. Gregg: No, it is not, because I do not think anybody has ever made more clear the principle underlying the war veterans allowance than did the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra this afternoon. The whole principle of this bill today, as it was in 1930, is that it is designed for those who had service in battle and because of that service in battle may have become pre-aged, burnt out, and consequently were entitled to a ten-year differential as compared with an old age civilian Canadian who had served his country not in uniform. If that principle were done away with, I think it would be almost as reasonable to say that Canada was a theatre of war in both world war I and world war II as to say that England was a theatre of war in world war I.

Mr. Pearkes: In view of the minister's promise to look into the question of liquid assets I bring one aspect of it to his attention. A certain amount of liquid assets is allowed and at the same time a man is permitted to own a property or a house up to the value of $4,000.

Mr. Mutch: Assessed value?

Mr. Pearkes: From time to time cases have been brought to my attention where the wife of a man dies and he is left a house which is perhaps larger than he is able to look after because he is a widower. In any event, he has to readjust his custom of life. He sells the house. That increases his assets by approximately $4,000. He may be waiting until he can find a smaller house, until he gets married again, or until he can make certain adjustments, but he loses his war veterans allowance. I do not suppose he loses it immediately but very shortly afterwards, until such time as the money which has accrued from the sale of his property has been reduced to the amount of liquid assets which he is permitted to hold. Therefore he has no chance of ever again having a house of his own. In the years to come, should he get married again, he has no opportunity of buying a house. If the minister intends to look into the question of the amount of liquid assets, might that point be taken into consideration? A widower has been left with increased assets owing to the sale of his house. He should be able to retain these—I am not going to say indefinitely—for a reasonable length of time until he can get his living arrangements adjusted, buy a new property or get established in some other way.

Mr. Gregg: We shall be glad to look into that.

Mr. Quelch: There is no doubt that veterans across Canada do resent, and I think quite bitterly, the fact that civilians can get a higher rate of pension under the Old Age Pensions Act than the veteran can under the War Veterans Allowance Act. The minister has pointed out to us that the veterans can get the war veterans allowance at 60, a lower age than would qualify a civilian for old age pension; but he himself has reminded us of the fact that that was done in the first instance because the veteran was pre-aged by ten years. That being the case, it is not fair to refer to the fact that veterans can get war veterans allowance at a lower age.

Following along the line of the minister's discussion, would he suggest that when a war veteran and his wife receiving the benefit of the War Veterans Allowance Act reach the age of 70 he would be better off to drop the war veterans allowance and seek a pension under the Old Age Pensions Act? I am sure the minister himself would admit that it would not be a happy situation were our veterans recommended to drop their help under soldier legislation and seek it under civilian legislation merely because they can get a higher pension. Yet that is the situation that exists today, and many veterans have come to me and pointed out that they could get a higher rate of pension under civilian legislation than they could under soldier legislation. They have asked me whether I thought they should drop the war veterans allowance and seek assistance under the Old Age Pensions Act. I have urged them not to do so. I told them that I was satisfied that this matter would be rectified. In the name of common justice it has to be rectified. Surely we are not going to place veterans in the position of getting a lower pension than a civilian pension. Can the minister tell us the number of applications for assistance under this fund and the number who were given assistance?

Mr. Gregg: I have not before me the number of applications for assistance. But in response to the other comment, I believe I did say that, by and large, an attempt was being made to have some relationship between the war veterans allowance and the old age pension in conjunction with the provinces. Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba—we will leave out Saskatchewan, because I am not sure—there is not a veteran in any of these provinces who, when he reaches the age of seventy, will want to switch over to old age pension. I think that is a fair average. If the other two or three provinces have a slight edge after the age of seventy, then it must be kept in mind that the others have not.

Mr. Green: This is the item having to do with the war veterans allowance board. The minister has not given an answer to the question asked this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver East respecting the husband and wife, where the wife had been working during some of the war years. The hon. member said that the war veterans allowance had been cut right off, and that the department was trying to collect even the man's small pension.

If that is so, then surely something should be done about it. There was probably no intention of misrepresentation at all in that instance. I do not believe it is fair to cut war veterans allowance off completely. I can quite understand why there would be some collection, or why something should be taken from the war veterans allowance. But these people have to live. They certainly cannot get city relief, and they cannot work.

I am surprised that the war veterans allowance board would take away the complete allowance. In cases I have had, where there have been overpayments, they have deducted $5 or $10 a month, or some such figure, leaving something on which the people could live. But in the case mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member the whole allowance was taken away.

Mr. Gregg: I thought it would be impossible in committee to assess all the factors affecting an individual case, without having the record before us. I told the hon. member for Vancouver East that I would be glad to discuss the matter fully with him, and look into it.

Mr. Green: Is it the practice of the board in such cases to cut off war veterans allowance completely?

Mr. Gregg: There has not come to my attention any case similar to the one mentioned this afternoon.

Mr. MacInnis: I am quite satisfied that that is what has been done in this instance. I am sure there is not the slightest doubt about it at all.

Item agreed to.

534. Veterans' insurance, $80,705.

Mr. Harkness: Would the minister tell us how successful the veterans insurance scheme has been? I notice there is a decrease of $17,624 from last year. Has the amount of insurance in force dropped? In other words, are there a number of people who have entered the scheme and ceased to pay premiums, so that the amount in force is smaller than it was before? I notice on looking at the details at page 308 that there are only two permanent employees in the department with total salaries of $4,470, whereas the salaries of temporary employees come to $66,015. What is the reason for that? Are there only two permanent employees because it is anticipated that the veterans insurance scheme will peter out? What is the story behind it?

Mr. Gregg: As to the decrease of $17,624 from last year, this item covers administration and, as the hon. member will realize, in the first few years after demobilization there was a rush for applications. That rush is now tapering off, and consequently some saving has been made. It does not indicate at all, however, that the scheme is unsuccessful.

Something similar could be said with respect to permanent and temporary employees. I regret exceedingly to report what appears in the main estimates, namely the small proportion of permanent employees in my department. The deputy minister assures me there are some we have had before us that are going through now.

This department of course, in the long range of history, is considered a temporary department. If we have no more wars, then some day it will be merged with something else. Even so, however, the number of permanent employees is no reflection upon the permanency of the project. If the hon. member is interested, I could give him some figures. There are 23,025 policies in force under the plan, representing a capital of $65,851,985 insurance.

Mr. Wright: There is a very restricted list of people who may be named as beneficiaries under soldiers' insurance. Would the minister give the committee that list?

Mr. Gregg: The list of beneficiaries includes the wife, or mother, or father, or children, or blood relations. That seems to be fairly wide.

Mr. Wright: A number of cases have been brought to my attention where soldiers have wished to leave the residue of their insurance to people other than those in the restricted list, and for very good reasons. In some cases the relatives were quite able to take care of themselves, and were not in this country. There might be some who are not direct blood relations to whom a person might wish to leave his estate or his insurance.

The information given me by the department is that under the law at the present time a soldier cannot leave insurance to his estate; he must leave it to some direct relative, if such a relative is living. The only way that can be overcome is through an order in council passed by the cabinet. It seems to me there should be some easier way of doing it than by having to pass a special order in council concerning each individual case. Are those beneficiaries named in the act, or is it a regulation? If it is a regulation, it can be changed. If they are actually named under the act, then perhaps the act should be amended, because in some cases it is causing a lot of trouble.

Mr. Gregg: The beneficiaries are named under the act. I think there is a certain amount of reason for the limitation, because the taxpayers pay the administration costs for this insurance. It was never intended that veterans insurance should compete with private insurance in any way. It was intended for men and women who might not, because of their service, be able to pass the medical examinations necessary to obtain ordinary insurance. It was in order to assist them to get insurance to take care of their dependents after they died. There was no intention whatever of having other Canadians pay the administration cost and provide the means whereby these veterans could build up an estate to be put to some impersonal use after their death.

Mr. Wright: The minister says that this insurance is costing the taxpayers money. Can he give us figures to prove that veterans insurance is being paid for out of taxpayers' money? Have the premiums that have been paid up to date not been pretty well sufficient to meet the cost of the insurance plan? Has he any figures that will indicate to the committee what it is costing the taxpayers?

Mr. Gregg: I cannot tell you what it has cost since the beginning, but it is costing this year a total of $98,329, and we estimate that it will be $80,000 next year. It has been much more than that in past years. It has been worked out actuarially so that, with the administration costs being taken care of by the taxpayers, the capital amount of the insurance will take care of payments to beneficiaries in cases of death; but it is completely non-profit as far as that is concerned.

Mr. Harkness: The minister said there were 23,025 policies in effect at the present time. What was the number a year ago? What I am trying to get at is whether the number of policies has increased during the past year or whether quite a number of men took out these policies and then forfeited them.

Mr. Gregg: The figure I gave was for August this year. The number in force as of August last year was 20,522 policies, and the total value was $58,627,691.

Mr. Harkness: The experience is that the number of policies and the amount are going up.

Mr. Gregg: Yes, steadily going up.

Mr. Harkness: That is satisfactory.

Mr. Gregg: While I am on my feet, perhaps I can answer a question that was asked about the assistance fund of the War Veterans Allowance Act. The total amount expended to date is $44,773.14, and the amount committed is $140,000.

Mr. Green: In addition?

Mr. Gregg: No, including.

Mr. Fair: Have any of these veterans' policies lapsed up to the present time? If so, how many?

Mr. Gregg: Up to August 31, 1949, 616 policies had lapsed, of a total value of $2,199,000.

Mr. Fair: Is that because the veterans were not able to continue paying the premiums or did they lose interest in the insurance?

Mr. Gregg: It is very difficult to say.

Item agreed to.

Payments to or for veterans and dependents—

535. Pensions for disability and death, including pensions granted under the authority of the civilian government employees (war) compensation order P.C. 45/8848 of 22nd November, 1944, which shall be subject to the Pension Act, $100,664,000.

Mr. Thomas: In respect to disability pensions I should like to ask the minister how many veterans have had their pensions reduced since January 1, 1949, and how many have been reduced by 25 per cent or more.

Mr. Gregg: I have not those figures. I will ask the chairman of the pension commission to get them for me for next week. In the case of world war I, as the hon. member knows, those in force for three years or more are not reduced.

Mr. Green: When the special committee on veterans affairs sat in 1946 the chairman of the pension commission tabled a statement showing among other things the number of disability decisions which had been rendered by the Canadian pension commission in respect to the second world war. According to that statement, unfavourable decisions—in other words, entitlement was not granted—amounted to 7,810 in the case of men who had served overseas; entitlement was refused on the ground that the condition was of pre-enlistment origin and not aggravated on service. The figure for those who served only in Canada was 54,207. In other words, at that time there was a total of over 61,000 applications that had been refused although the men were disabled. Those applications were refused on the ground that they were suffering from pre-enlistment conditions, not aggravated on service.

Subsequently I obtained the figures for the period up to the 30th of June, 1947. At that time the figure was 13,321 for men who had actually gone overseas and, mind you, they had been discharged as disabled but were ruled out on application for pension on the ground that they had pre-enlistment conditions. The figure for men who served in Canada only was 72,340 as of June 30, 1947. Can the minister give us the figures for the period from the 30th of June, 1947, to the 30th of June, 1949? If he has any difficulty in tracing this matter he will find the discussion in 1947 Hansard at page 5777.

Mr. Gregg: The chairman of the pension commission tells me he will be glad to furnish that information for next week.

Mr. Thomas: When a pensioner has been re-boarded is there any court of appeal or tribunal to which he can appeal if he feels he has been aggrieved by the finding of the board?

Mr. Gregg: Briefly, the answer is yes; he can ask for an appeal.

Mr. Quelch: That is subject to new evidence being produced.

Mr. Gregg: Subject to any new evidence being brought in.

Mr. Quelch: I am not sure whether the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra asked this question, because I could not quite hear him. Can the minister say how many cases were reviewed as a result of the amendment that was made striking out the words "wilfully concealed", and how many pensions were increased as a result of that review?

Mr. Gregg: Every case has been reviewed or is under review; and we shall be glad to provide the figures requested.

Mr. Thomas: With respect to the matter I mentioned in my last question, I should like to ask the minister whether that appeal is handled by the same board that considered the case in the first place.

Mr. Gregg: Since this matter has been brought up in other cases, rather than just give a snap reply to that question I should like to give a more complete statement, after consultation with the chairman of the board, on the procedure followed in reviewing cases. I shall do that before the estimates are finished.

Mr. Knight: I have often wondered to what extent the report of the doctor who examines a young man at the time of enlistment is taken into account when it later becomes a question of determining whether or not that man is entitled to a pension. I am thinking of case after case which have come to my notice in which a man, upon applying for a pension due to disability, has been told that he is suffering from a pre-enlistment complaint. But this pre-enlistment complaint, if that is the correct term, is only discovered after the man has put in his service and applies for a pension. Apparently the report of the examining doctor which certified the man to be in A-1 condition does not count for much. For instance, the doctor reports that the man is capable of taking his place in air crew, which I take it means that he is in A-1 condition. After service of perhaps six months or a year, either in Canada or abroad, he is stricken with a heart condition, and it is suddenly discovered that he had a pre-enlistment condition, rheumatic fever or something of the kind, which produced that heart weakness.

It must be awkward for the department to discover that the army doctor passed as fit a man who, within a year or two, turned out to be not fit. The fact is, however, that he was certified as fit, was taken into the army or air force and put through those severe physical tests which young men have to undergo nowadays in their training. There are so many of these cases in which, after a year or two, men are found to be suffering from pre-enlistment ailments. That must be an awkward situation to handle. Apparently the report of the doctor who made the first examination is not given a great deal of weight, while on the other hand the report of the doctor who discovered the pre-enlistment disability seems to carry great weight with the department.

Perhaps the minister would comment on that situation. I hope I have not been bitter about it; I do not mean to be, but these boys can be pretty bitter. I have in mind the case of a young man who enlisted in the air force and was pronounced A-1. He joined the air crew, and a little later the very thing I have been mentioning happened to him; a year or so later he was found to have a heart condition. He was granted one-fifth total disability pension. If I were a lawyer I would argue that the mere fact that D.V.A. granted him anything at all was proof that the department thought he was entitled to something, and that his application was sound in that his ailment had been at least aggravated by his service. This boy is absolutely unable to do anything. When he shakes your hand his hand is soft and warm, and he has difficulty in walking for even a few steps. He appealed to the pension board and was granted another one-fifth, which again would indicate that the department recognized that he had some claim. He now receives a two-fifths disability pension, but the lad is absolutely unable to work. The doctors say they discovered that he had an attack of rheumatic fever early in life, and no doubt his heart condition resulted from that. I do not dispute that; I am not a doctor. However, this is one of those unfortunate cases where the department may be right, but what are you going to do with this boy? That is the point. You cannot blame these fellows for getting bitter. They joined up in all good faith. They were rated A-1, and went to work.

I should like the minister to comment on that situation, because there must be hundreds of similar cases. To repeat my main point, here is a doctor who certifies a man as A-1, or whatever the term may be, and he is sent to fight. Then some time later the department comes along and says the first doctor was wrong, that the man had a pre-enlistment ailment. They say doctors differ and patients die. In this case the boy is not dead yet, but I should like to know which doctor was right.

Mr. Gregg: My hon. friend has opened up a topic which has run through the discussion of veterans affairs for many years. My first thought was that the best I could do would be to send him extracts from the proceedings of the last parliamentary committee, where the matter was discussed at great length, to show that one more attempt was made to do something about this matter. I know the pension board is attempting to interpret this legislation to the very best of its judgment. As my hon. friend said, the board has a tremendously difficult problem, but it is trying to administer the act fairly. When there is a pre-enlistment condition which in the opinion of the board has worsened owing to war service, pension is awarded to the extent of the service aggravation. I do not want to go into the question of what the doctors were doing when they examined the men on enlistment. As my hon. friend knows very well, many men went into the service who the doctors and everyone else knew were not one hundred per cent perfect specimens, whatever the documents may have shown.

Mr. Harkness: I was rather struck by this item because it shows an estimated reduction for this year of $8,810,000, and I did not expect to see a reduction of that amount, particularly in this item. Turning to the details on page 308 we find a reduction of over 25 per cent in the pensions paid to veterans of the northwest rebellion of 1885. This is to be expected, because these are all old men and naturally they are dying off rapidly. Then there is a reduction of some $4 million in connection with world war I, which is also to be expected. But when we come to world war II we also find a reduction of over $4 million. When we were considering the matter of pensions in the veterans affairs committee many very interesting figures were given to us purporting to show that the cost of veterans services, particularly pensions, as far as world war II veterans were concerned, would increase for some years to come. As I remember it, a constant increase was expected in the number of pensioners for world war II. Apparently for this particular year a considerable reduction is estimated. Would the minister comment on that and explain why that reduction is taking place? Has the department now come to the conclusion that the other proposition was wrong and the cost of pensions for world war II will not be increasing, as I believe actually happened in so far as world war I was concerned?

Mr. Gregg: It is increasing steadily. I referred to it but not under this item. The fact is that the war veterans allowance increase that was made last year was retroactive to the first of October 1947. Pensions were increased 25 per cent. Consequently, this means there is a 12½ per cent increase in last year's amounts contained in that item. Last year's amount is bloated by 12½ per cent because the increase went back to the first of October, 1947. By taking that off last year's, we see it as a lesser amount than we have in the estimates for this year.

Mr. Harkness: If I understood the minister correctly, the increase in pension which was retroactive is responsible for more than $4 million of this $58 million shown in 1948-49.

Mr. Gregg: Oh, yes.

Mr. Harkness: That is the situation then.

Mr. Gregg: Yes, one could work it out, although I have not the figure here. I believe between seven and eight million dollars would be chargeable to the year before; but since it was voted last year, it is shown in these estimates in that column.

Mr. Harkness: Then, I take it this information we received in the veterans affairs committee, that the cost of pensions for world war II would continue to increase for several years, is correct. I should like to ask the minister what the general rate of that increase is expected to be percentagewise?

Mr. Gregg: Perhaps if I gave the hon. member the number of pensions in force for the last five years, it would give a better indication than an estimate as to what might happen in the future. Going back to 1944-45, the number of pensions in force for world war II was 26,924; 1945-46, 53,293; 1946-47, 88,233; 1947-48, 103,963; 1948-49, 108,531.

Mr. Harkness: I would be inclined to think that only the last year or two would give any indication of the rate of increase, since the earlier years given were those immediately following the war when there would not be a large number of people making application for pensions. May I ask how long it is estimated the amounts required for pensions for world war I will continue to increase?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, the amount for world war I is decreasing slightly now and will continue to decrease at a slightly increasing rate from year to year, one would expect, owing to mortality.

Mr. Harkness: What about world war II?

Mr. Gregg: World war II pensions will continue to increase for the next few years at any rate.

Mr. Harkness: Is there any estimate as to how long that will continue?

Mr. Gregg: Nothing but a guess.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, on the pension item I have a case which I think should be investigated by the department. It concerns the widow of an air force man who was sent by the air force to fly with one of those private companies—in this case Dominion Skyways. He was sent over to do a job with this company which was carrying on training. In the course of that work he was killed. Apparently the pilots who were doing this particular work were covered by an insurance policy which would return the same amount to the widow as she would have received if her husband had been killed in the air force.

When the husband lost his life, the widow was asked to make an application in accordance with the rules and regulations under which the ordinary veteran's widow would get a pension. This woman received the Cross of Sacrifice and her case was treated in exactly the same way as if the husband had been shot down overseas. Everything was all right until the pension increase was granted a year or two ago. This widow now finds that she does not get any increase whereas the widow of an airman who was killed overseas does receive that increase.

I do not suppose there would be more than a handful of these cases, but I do suggest some provision should be made to give those widows the increase. It might have to be done by order in council in each case. I do not know how that situation could be met, but certainly there is an unfairness which should be rectified.

Mr. Gregg: In addition to the one case mentioned, Mr. Chairman, there are several others. Discussions are now under way between my department and the Department of National Defence with a view to seeing what can be done.

Mr. Green: One other question. In my remarks this afternoon I referred to the case of the merchant navy lad who is suffering from tuberculosis. The disease was incurred during his service and it might have been cured had the manning pool doctor not sent him back to work instead of following the recommendation of the doctor who took the X-ray to give him six months' rest. Is there not some way in which a case of that type could be covered by our legislation? If not, the legislation is certainly defective.

Mr. Gregg: I cannot answer that offhand, but I shall look into it.

Item agreed to.

Payments to or for veterans and dependents—
536. War veterans allowances, $19,825,000.

Mr. Thomas: On item 536, I should like to ask the minister whether or not a person without any additional income, and who falls within the requirements of the act, could make application for assistance from this special fund in a case of hardship arising from unusual circumstances? For example, if a man's home burned down, could he make application for assistance?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, Mr. Chairman. It was hoped the fund would be useful to cover situations such as that.

Mr. Quelch: Was the minister going to give us the number of applications for assistance under this item and the number of applications granted?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I gave the total amount a short time ago. I have not the figures here tonight for the number of applications, but I shall get them.

Item agreed to.

Payments to or for veterans and dependents—
538. Unemployment assistance, $75,000.

Mr. Green: Is that the old provision under which relief was given to small pensioners?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. Green: In other words, this is really much the same thing as the previous item which is made up of $500,000 for war veterans allowance recipients.

Mr. Gregg: Pensioners of world war I. This item has a much longer history than has the other item.

Mr. Green: Is the amount in item 538 not applicable to veterans of world war II?

Mr. Gregg: No.

Item agreed to.

Payments to or for veterans and dependents—
539. Hospital and other allowances, $4,310,000.

Mr. Shaw: It is quite conceivable that the matter to which I should like to refer does not come under this item; but it is also quite conceivable that it might not come under any particular item. If I am out of order, possibly I could be told where I could more properly deal with the matter I have in mind. While on a western tour last spring the Prime Minister, according to press reports, visited the ex-servicemen who were in Colonel Belcher hospital. In the course of his visit among the men he met one from my constituency, a veteran of world war I who has been hospitalized now for a period of from two to three years. This veteran spends his spare time making articles such as purses out of leather. He asked the Prime Minister if he thought it fair that he should have to pay the sales tax on these commodities, most of which are given away. According to the press report, the Prime Minister said that certainly his request for relief from the payment of that tax seemed reasonable, and that he would make representations to the Minister of Finance. There must be a great many cases of that character in the various military hospitals across Canada. The fact that these men are able to do that type of work naturally assists them materially. I would say that it assisted them mentally in as great a way as any. It is quite possible that the minister cannot say whether or not the Prime Minister made the representations to the Minister of Finance; but may I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs if he will make such representations, because then I shall be in a much better position to ask the Minister of Finance when we are dealing with matters relating to the Department of Finance.

Mr. Gregg: Without having any knowledge of the incident referred to, I can say that the matter mentioned by the hon. member for Red Deer has come to our attention in other connections. I can assure him that, as in the past, every effort will be made to do this if it is possible. It is not perhaps as great a hardship as appears on the surface, because a great deal of assistance is given to the patients in hospitals in this work which is done partly for the improvement of their disability and in some cases for their amusement and entertainment, in conjunction with the work of the Red Cross; and I think a patient is rarely charged an amount that he cannot easily bear. But I can assure my hon. friend that we will continue to look into the matter.

Mr. Shaw: I would quite agree that probably there is not much money involved, but there is a principle involved. I think it would be a fine gesture on the part of the government if they could make this slight concession to these men. It is not so much a matter of the number of dollars involved as it is a matter of a vital principle.

Mr. Knowles: Before we left the first item, the minister said that he preferred to deal with a number of the points that had been raised in the discussion on the first item, in relation to the specific items. One set of matters that was raised by hon. members over here had to do with the firefighters, the Red Cross nursing sisters and the auxiliary services generally. I have been looking down the list in order to try to see on what item we might ask the minister to deal with these people. The trouble is that they are not in under any item. Is this item not as good a one as any for the minister to comment on the appeals that have been made on behalf of members of the auxiliary services?

Mr. Gregg: The items referred to would of course require legislation. In conformity with other departments, my department is not initiating legislation this session, except for purely administrative amendments to the Veterans Land Act to enable the experience gained in administering that act to bring about improvements in its flexibility and value to the veteran. But I do not propose to bring in at this session legislation covering the points referred to.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask whether that answer refers to one particular group, not excluding the importance of the others. Does that answer cover the case of the firefighters in all respects? One of the reasons I mention that group in particular is that, in the recommendations made by the veterans affairs committee at the end of their sittings in 1948, there were certain clear-cut recommendations with respect to the firefighters. I remember distinctly that one of the former members of the house, Mr. Eric McKay, the then member for Weyburn, gave notice of a motion to ask the house to approve that report. Word got around that such a motion might stand in the way of what its mover wanted, that there were some things in the report that the government could not accept, and that if that motion were pressed the government would be obliged to ask that it be voted down, and then we would lose everything in it. In the same way word got around to the effect that, if that motion were not pressed, maybe some things like the recommendation with respect to the firefighters would be implemented. I am not asking the minister to comment too much on what happened back in 1948, but I should like to know whether there is any further implementation of the committee's recommendation with respect to the firefighters and perchance other groups that could be carried out without this legislation that the minister says he is not going to introduce.

Mr. Gregg: No. In my opinion, it could be carried out without legislation.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous payments—

542. Last Post fund, $125,000.

Mr. Hansell: I should like to ask several questions on this item. I can ask them all at once or one at a time, whichever the minister prefers.

Mr. Gregg: One at a time.

Mr. Hansell: My first question is this. How much is allowed per funeral? Is there a set price allowed or does it fluctuate according to the circumstances of the individual?

Mr. Gregg: For the funeral $75 is allowed, plus the actual cost of the grave and the marker.

Mr. Hansell: That is irrespective of the distance that might have to be travelled?

Mr. Gregg: Yes. That is the maximum allowed.

Mr. Hansell: A smaller amount might be allowed, though; is that not so?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, if the maximum were not needed.

Mr. Hansell: In other words, there is a sort of means test. I do not like to use the term "means test" now, although I think we should use it until it becomes so nauseating that it will be taken out of that legislation. But for want of a better term, is there some sort of examination made of the circumstances and the amount given accordingly?

Mr. Gregg: I am sorry; I did not get the last question.

Mr. Hansell: For instance, is it paid out only to indigents or in cases of need?

Mr. Gregg: Yes.

Mr. Hansell: Is this a yearly appropriation which, if there is any balance left over, is carried over to another year? I notice the terminology used is, "Last Post fund". Is there a fund, and does it build up or fluctuate so that at the end of a year, if moneys are not spent, they revert to the treasury? If they do not revert to the treasury how much is in the fund now?

Mr. Gregg: The unexpended portion reverts to the treasury each year so that the moneys for each year are revoted.

In a word, I should like to refer the committee to the excellent work done by private citizens across Canada who function without pay, without even their expenses being paid, as committees on behalf of the Last Post fund. I cannot speak too highly of them. There is a great deal more in looking after this matter in various sections of our country than appears on the surface. The committee which has functioned and is continuing to function under Mr. Norman Holland, which is national in scope with provincial and district subcommittees, is doing an excellent job. While this amount may appear small for each individual funeral, nevertheless there are activities and services given to the deceased veteran which do not appear in the dollar signs in these estimates.

Mr. Hansell: I would join with the minister in these remarks and I would not criticize at all. In fact, I want to compliment the department on the work they are doing because occasionally, you know, I do have to bury people—and I should like to bury a lot more than I do, that is, politically.

I have found that there is a considerable appreciation among many people of the work done under this fund. I should like to ask one other question. It does not come under this item but I cannot help that, Mr. Chairman, because it does not come under any other item. In that I am like my friend the hon. member for Red Deer. There is a movement on foot, and I think all hon. members have received letters requesting that something should be done to assist the next of kin to visit the graves of their loved ones in war-stricken areas. I asked a question the other day in that respect, and I have forgotten who the appropriate minister was who answered it. The answer was that the government was not doing anything. I can quite understand that they cannot do anything at the moment. The answer also said that the Canadian Legion were thinking of some pilgrimage over to Europe for that purpose. Of course that does not fulfil the desires of many mothers, shall we say, who would like the opportunity of visiting the graves of their sons, because mostly they just cannot afford to go there. I understand that this movement is gaining some momentum in the United States. I do not want any definite answer from the minister because I know that nothing is being done. We shall leave the question over. I suggest that the minister take that angle into consideration if it is at all possible. Perhaps there will be some development as time goes on.

Mr. Gregg: Approximately twenty-five years after the first great war there was a strong desire to revisit battlefields and the graves in Europe. Prior to 1936 the Canadian Legion, in co-operation with all the other veterans organizations, organized what became known as the Vimy pilgrimage. It was conducted entirely by the veterans organizations, and those who went on the pilgrimage themselves, by advanced planning, by working out the scheme with the so-called pilgrims, could pay their fees in advance into a central fund. Some six thousand went across the Atlantic in five ships and unveiled the Vimy memorial and visited the graves in France. That was a great undertaking. It was an undertaking that gave the greatest satisfaction to those who organized it and to those who took part in it. As I say, it was conducted entirely as an undertaking of the veterans organizations themselves and those who took part in it. Recently there have been indications of something of a similar interest. I have had a good many letters, as all hon. members have. The last world war was different. Instead of our casualties being concentrated in one general area they are all over the world. There are many of course without any known graves. I do not feel, at this particular time at any rate, that it is the role of my department to initiate any activities in that regard, particularly since the matter has again been discussed by the veterans organizations, and the president of one of them not so long ago made an announcement that they were attempting a study, as I answered the hon. member the other day, of piecemeal pilgrimages here and there, not on a wholesale scale as before, but in smaller bodies. I am quite sure that inquiries referred to the Legion would receive their attention, and in due course they might be able to do something about it.

As far as the United States is concerned, it has not yet passed any legislation on the matter. As a matter of fact the greater number of their dead have been or are to be moved, as I understand it, back for reburial in the United States.

I should like to refer to a matter which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra brought up this afternoon and which quite properly comes under this item. We shall make some arrangements so that in the event of the funeral of a veteran under the Last Post fund, if he dies in hospital, the information will be made available. If it can be done in other deaths we shall attempt to let his old associates or his friends know about it.

Mr. Green: Thank you very much.

Item agreed to.

543. Grant to Canadian legion, $9,000.

Mr. Beyerstein: Can the minister tell me how this grant is given out? Is it a single grant to the federal command, or is it distributed to the smaller branches?

Mr. Gregg: Back about 1930 the department of that day, working in close co-operation on matters of service with the Canadian Legion, recognized that the service bureaux of that organization—the bureau here at dominion headquarters, and other service bureaux with paid secretariat throughout the provinces—were in reality, in the opinion of the department, doing useful work in connection with assembling information and evidence on pensions, and accepting a number of difficult tasks. It was arranged therefore at that time that the department would pay for assistance in maintaining such bureaux an amount of $10,000 in the beginning—and during the depression it went down to $9,000, with the understanding that the Canadian Legion would spend an equal amount for the service bureaux' work. Following it through in recent years they have spent more than three times as much as this amount each year in that work.

Item agreed to.

544. Special grant to the Canadian legion toward the cost of the annual convention of the British Empire Service League to be held in Canada in September, 1949, $10,000.

Mr. Gregg: Even though this item may pass automatically, I should like to say a word about it. Last spring it was indicated to the Prime Minister and myself that this year there was to be held in Ottawa the biennial conference of the British Empire Service League. It had been held only once before in Canada, and in the intervening years, up to the last war, had been held in London, Australia, and so on. As it was held at other capitals within the British commonwealth it had become the custom of governments of those countries to act to some degree as host to the delegates coming from all parts of the empire and commonwealth.

[Mr. Gregg.]

This year, coming to Ottawa, most of them from soft-currency countries, it was considered that this amount should be placed in the estimates to assist in travelling expenses within Canada, and in entertainment here. I am sure those hon. members who saw them lined up in the balcony, representing some twenty-three different countries of the commonwealth, must have felt that it was a rather important occasion, and perhaps worthy of this expenditure.

Item agreed to.

545. Soldier Settlement and Veterans Land Act—to provide for the cost of administration of Veterans Land Act; soldier settlement and British family settlement, $4,447,443.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I think we have done rather well today. There are many answers which I am sure the minister is anxious to give with respect to the Veterans Land Act. I wonder if we might call it eleven o'clock.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Green: What will be the business for Tuesday?

Mr. Gregg: On Tuesday, which is a government day, we will consider the following bills: Bill No. 2, in committee of the whole, to amend the Supreme Court Act; Bill No. 8, in committee of the whole, to amend the Exchequer Court Act; second reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Department of Justice Act. At some stage we will move to go into committee of supply, and call three new departments. If the three bills are disposed of we will take up the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Green: Is this for all next week?

Mr. Gregg: For Tuesday. It is understood that from eight to nine o'clock the house will consider public and private bills.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order, until Tuesday, October 11.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

526. Departmental administration, $2,157,024.

527. District administration, $2,945,528.

528. Veterans' welfare services (formerly rehabilitation services), $3,686,711.

529. Treatment services, $34,478,808.

530. Prosthetic services, $932,850.

Canadian pension commission—

531. Administration expenses, $2,162,225.

532. Veterans bureau, $392,139.

533. War veterans' allowance board—administration, $237,204.

534. Veterans' insurance, $80,705.

Payments to or for veterans and dependents—

535. Pensions for disability and death, including pensions granted under the authority of the civilian government employees (war) compensation order P.C. 45/8848 of 22nd November, 1944, which shall be subject to the Pension Act, $100,664,000.

536. War veterans' allowances, $19,825,000.

537. To authorize under regulations to be approved by the governor general in council the establishment of an assistance fund (war veterans allowance) from which shall be paid supplementary assistance in cases of acute financial distress as may be found to exist from time to time among recipients of benefits under the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, $500,000.

538. Unemployment assistance, $75,000.

539. Hospital and other allowances, $4,310,000.

540. Gallantry awards—world war II, $18,000.

Miscellaneous payments—

541. Employers liability compensation, $125,000.

542. Last Post fund, $125,000.

543. Grant to Canadian Legion, $9,000.

544. Special grant to the Canadian Legion towards the cost of the annual convention of the British Empire Service League to be held in Canada in September, 1949, $10,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, October 11, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

RETIREMENT OF PRESIDENT AND CHAIRMAN OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS—APPOINTMENT OF MR. DONALD GORDON

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have an announcement to make concerning the office of chairman of the board of directors and that of president of the Canadian National Railways. Mr. R. C. Vaughan, who has been president since 1941, and chairman of the board of the Canadian National since 1942, reached the normal retiring age in December, 1948, but, at the request of the board of directors and with the approval of the government, consented to remain in office until such time as a successor was appointed. It is with deep regret that I announce to the house the retirement of Mr. Vaughan from the post of chairman of the board and president of the Canadian National Railways, to take effect as of January 1, 1950.

There is no need for me at this time to remind the house of the most loyal services performed by Mr. Vaughan, not only to the Canadian National Railways, with which he was closely associated since its inception, but also to the whole of Canada. In the summer of 1939 the government appointed him chairman of the defence purchasing board in Ottawa. All Canadians will recall the numerous problems that had to be solved at that time in order to prepare industry for the war effort, and the defence purchasing board was the first agency on which this responsibility was placed.

In appreciation of his distinguished services, not only with the government, but for his guidance of the largest transportation system in Canada during the war years, Mr. Vaughan, in 1946, was made a Companion of the Most Distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George.

Mr. Vaughan, when he retires at the end of this year, will terminate a career entirely devoted to transportation. He will have completed fifty-one years of service, having been successively with the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Northern Railway, and the Canadian National Railways. His first official appointment was in 1910 as assistant to the vice-president and general manager of the Canadian Northern Railway. He became vice-president in charge of purchases and stores and steamships of the Canadian National in 1920. He was appointed president in 1941, and chairman of the board in 1942, at a time when the Canadian National Railways, along with the other railways in Canada, were called upon to transport men and materials in quantities unheard of before in the history of our railway transportation system. This house will agree with me when I say that our national system, under the guidance of Mr. Vaughan, contributed in no small measure to the great achievement made by Canada during the war. My colleagues in the cabinet and the members of this house will, I am sure, join with me in extending to Mr. Vaughan our very best wishes for happiness and peace of mind for many years to come.

By virtue of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1936, the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways have appointed Mr. Donald Gordon to replace Mr. Vaughan as president of the railway company, and the governor in council has today approved their selection and has also appointed Mr. Gordon chairman of the board of directors, both positions effective January 1, 1950.

I would like to take this opportunity to say the government is most gratified that Mr. Donald Gordon has accepted the invitation of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways and of the government, to assume the heavy responsibilities of these positions. Mr. Gordon is, of course, well known to most of the members of this house. His wartime services as chairman of the wartime prices and trade board made his name a household word throughout Canada, and gave him as well an international reputation. He was a key figure in the mobilization of Canada's economic resources in war, and played a leading administrative role in the subsequent orderly transition to a peacetime economy. In these great tasks, and also in his position of deputy governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Gordon has had a wide experience and an intimate knowledge of Canada's financial and economic affairs, domestic and international, in addition to which he has been in close working contact with the day to day problems of industry, labour and agriculture. His qualities of leadership, his gift for organization, and his ability to inspire loyalty and affection among his working colleagues, are well known to this house; and I am glad that his outstanding talents are to remain at the service of the public of Canada in the position of high responsibility he is shortly to assume.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

TARIFFS AND TRADE—ANNECY NEGOTIATIONS—TABLING OF ANNOUNCEMENT

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies of the announcement dealing with the Annecy agreement, in English and in French.

DIPLOMATIC INSTRUMENTS

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): On behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) I should like to table twenty-two documents, which are diplomatic instruments published in the treaty series 1948-49. Perhaps the list might appear in Votes and Proceedings, unless hon. members wish me to read it now.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—ENFORCEMENT REGULATIONS

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 60, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (enforcement).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Gillis: This bill is the same, word for word, as Bill No. 20 which I introduced in the last parliament. It has for its purpose the changing of sections 43, 44, 45 and 46 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. As the act now reads, when employers and employees bring a dispute before the board, the only power it has is to sit and listen. If the dispute between the two parties cannot be resolved, the board is powerless to do anything except let the parties go back to fighting it out on the streets. This happened, for instance, in the Canadian seamen's union strike.

By this proposed change, if two parties came before the board with a dispute the board would have the authority to determine which party had committed an infraction of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. The board would be empowered to declare one or the other of the parties guilty and then turn the matter over to the magistrate's court. Whatever penalty this act empowered the magistrate's court to impose would be imposed by that court. This amendment would give the board some legal authority, and create respect for it in the minds of those who would be taking disputes before it.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (for Mr. Knowles) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 61, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (revocable check-off).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, this bill adds a new subsection 3 to section 6 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. The effect is to provide for the voluntary revocable check-off of union dues.

The wording of this subsection is precisely the same as the wording of the subsection that was approved by the industrial relations committee of this house in 1948.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FISH INSPECTION ACT

FISH AND FISH CONTAINERS—MARINE PLANTS —EXPORT AND IMPORT REGULATIONS

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure for the purpose of regulating the inspection of fish and fish containers and of marine plants for export and import, and to provide for the appointment of inspectors and other officers and employees required for the proper administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

TARIFFS AND TRADE

ANNECY NEGOTIATIONS—RATIFICATION BY PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the tariff changes involved in the Annecy agreement, which were announced today, will require action on the part of parliament?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): That is correct, yes.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): As in the case of the Geneva tariff changes, provisional agreement will be made, but they will ultimately require the approval of parliament.

ANNECY NEGOTIATIONS—IMPERIAL PREFERENCE —"CANADA A REPUBLIC"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): On the front page of the Globe and Mail for Monday, October 10, the following headline appears:

Pact commits Canada to sixty-one tariff reductions. Concessions on seventy items under Annecy agreement; thirty-three countries in trade group.

This paper also contains a report of an address made by the High Commissioner to the United Kingdom on the same subject. Mr. Wilgress welcomes this step. I should like to ask the government whether he represents government policy on this question. What is the effect of that policy on empire preference—which should be first, last and always in our minds—and on trade within the empire?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I shall look at the hon. member's question in Hansard and endeavour to give him an answer tomorrow.

Mr. Church: The empire should come first. It has not very many friends.

I should like to ask the government a second question. I call attention to an editorial in a New York paper, and I want to know if this is government policy. An article was published yesterday in the Toronto Globe and Mail and also in the Citizen here. The heading is "Canada is a Republic." Your paper here quotes the New York World Telegram as saying editorially that the dominion has become one of the world's great powers, and describing it as a republic. I would ask if that is government policy.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Government policy is related to the facts as they exist, but only when and after they have been brought into existence.

Mr. Church: The editorial forgets that Canada is still part of the British empire and always will be.

NOVA SCOTIA APPLES

REFERENCE TO GIFT BY MEMBER FOR ANNAPOLIS-KINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): One of the maritime members was kind enough to make us a present of some apples. I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture or his officials what they are.

Mr. A. A. Elderkin (Annapolis-Kings): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) made a reference to something he held in his hand but which he was careful to hide behind his back; and either because of the location of my seat in this chamber or because his voice was so choked as a result of eating those dry British Columbia apples, I was unable to hear what he said. The samples of apples I had here were of a size and variety many people think should not be sold in Canada, but I wanted to demonstrate that these apples did have very desirable eating qualities. In due course I propose to distribute some which will be as large as and very much better than the British Columbia apples about which we hear so much. I also have in cold storage a quantity of another variety and size not well known in Canada but greatly preferred by the British people before the war.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think perhaps the hon. member has stated his question of privilege sufficiently.

Mr. Graydon: Come up to Peel and get some real apples.

[Mr. Claxton.]

CATTLE

COMPENSATION FOR TUBERCULOSIS REACTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. D. Coyle (Elgin): Will the Minister of Agriculture clarify the situation with respect to compensation for t.b. reacting cattle? This question is being asked in the light of requests from farm organizations.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The position is that the bill providing for a further amount for cattle that are slaughtered on account of t.b. was passed by council this morning, to be sent on to this house for consideration. When it is here, it will be fully discussed.

SUPREME COURT ACT

VARIOUS AMENDMENTS—ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL

The house resumed, from Tuesday, October 4, consideration in committee of Bill No. 2, to amend the Supreme Court Act—Mr. Garson—Mr. Dion in the chair.

The Chairman: At its last sitting the committee was considering clause 3, to which Mr. Fulton had moved the following amendment:

Subject to any enactment of the parliament of Canada or the legislature of any province in exercise of their respective powers, the Supreme Court of Canada shall be bound by the law as declared in all orders of His Majesty in council hitherto made on the advice of the judicial committee of his privy council and in the reasons assigned therefor by the said judicial committee, in so far as the said law is applicable to Canada.

Mr. Fulton: There are just one or two further observations I wish to make in connection with this amendment. They arise out of remarks which have been made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice.

I believe it would be useful if the attention of the committee and of the country were directed to the fact that, in their apparent haste to press this bill through to its conclusion early in this session, the government, through the two hon. gentlemen to whom I have referred, have taken an extraordinary position with respect to the recommendations made by the Canadian Bar Association. We have seen the deliberations and recommendations of that responsible body treated with scant respect. I am not inclined to question the fact that the government had recently been returned with a substantial majority.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: That statement apparently meets with the approval of some hon. gentlemen in the house. But, as has been pointed out, that majority is not going to vanish overnight. It is going to last presumably for five years or at least for four years. None of the gentlemen I see in the house shows any sign of illness. Therefore I think the request that the matter be treated with due deliberation is one which is logical and reasonable. That was the initial request made by the bar association. The second request was for a guarantee—I do not think it is going too far to call it that—of the principle of stare decisis, and that is the matter which we are debating in this amendment. But even that request of the bar association has been treated with little respect by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice, and one other government spokesman to whom I shall refer. The Prime Minister went so far as to say that the comments of the president of the Canadian Bar Association were not within that gentleman's right or province to make. I will read the remarks of the Prime Minister as reported at page 530 of Hansard of October 4. When the right hon. gentleman's attention was drawn to the fact that although the resolution passed by the bar association did not call for the incorporation in the bill of any provision which would in words preserve the principle of stare decisis, the president of the bar association had specifically said that the resolution, in the light of the discussions which had taken place, did intend that such a provision should be incorporated in the measure, the right hon. gentleman used these words with respect to the statement of the president of the bar association:

> I submit with all respect that no one man, whatever be the position he occupies in the Canadian Bar Association, and I have occupied the office of president of that association—in my day—has the right to enlarge or modify the terms of the resolution adopted by that association.

Mr. Pouliot: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to hear the hon. member for Temiscouata say "hear, hear," because we now know where he stands. I must confess I found it rather difficult to follow his remarks in this connection on an earlier occasion.

Here we have the responsible head of the Canadian Bar Association, who was present when the resolution was passed, making the statement to which I have referred. Who, may I ask, is entitled to comment on the meaning of that resolution if it is not the president of the association? Are we to take it that this subject is so sacred, and the wishes of the government majority so overpowering, that no one in this committee or in the country has the right to comment on this matter? That is the effect of the position taken by the Prime Minister. He questions the propriety of the president of the bar association saying what was intended by that resolution. I draw to your attention, Mr. Chairman, the fact that the president of the bar association has left no doubt as to what he takes to be the meaning of the resolution. After the discussion in the house had begun, he made a statement in Saint John, New Brunswick, as to the meaning to be attached to the resolution. He was reported in the press of September 28 as follows:

> Though it is the practice for the supreme court to abide by the rule of stare decisis, Mr. Carter said, it is not bound inflexibly to do so. Such an enactment by parliament would safeguard provincial and minority rights, he said.

The enactment to which the president of the bar association had reference was one along the lines of the amendment which we are discussing here today. I believe it is incumbent upon this committee to consider and attach the greatest weight to the words of the responsible president of the Canadian Bar Association in discussing the meaning of the resolution which that association passed.

In the bill now before the house, Mr. Chairman, there could not be anything much less than there is now. What we have before us in the clause under discussion is a simple enactment that the Supreme Court of Canada shall have final and exclusive ultimate jurisdiction in respect to all cases arising in Canada. There could not be a much simpler declaration than that appeals to the privy council are abolished. It is not embroidered; it is without qualification. Therefore the resolution of the bar association must have had some meaning. If you take the simple proposition that appeals to privy council are to be abolished, that is what we have before us, and the bar association passed a resolution with respect to that proposition. I submit, sir, that they must have hoped that that resolution would be given some practical significance in the measure which is being considered. The only way in which that can be done is by some modification of the provisions of this bill. Having regard to this fact, taken in conjunction with the statement of the responsible president of the association that he thinks it desirable or essential that some such provision be incorporated in the legislation, I submit that this committee should give it the most serious consideration, and I suggest it is less than proper to say that the president of the association had no right to use these words or to enlarge in any way upon the meaning of the resolution.

As I have said, we have had that suggestion from the Prime Minister; we have had criticism of the Canadian Bar Association, ranging from the one expressed by the right hon. gentleman all the way down to the one expressed by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond on October 4, as reported at page 533 of Hansard, where, dealing with the resolution of the bar association, he is reported as having said:

I want to say that, so far as section (g) is concerned,—

And he was referring to section (g) of the resolution.

—in which it says the rule of stare decisis ought to continue to be applied with respect to past decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada, a great deal of effrontery was shown by the committee of that organization in passing this resolution.

Here again we have the suggestion to which I have referred, namely, that this matter is somehow so sacrosanct, and the desires of the government majority in this house are so sacred, that the responsible body of the bar association, amongst whose members are numbered a great many judges, is "showing effrontery" when it even dares to deal with the subject matter of this resolution. It is a most extraordinary suggestion. If there were nothing else, that very attitude would be sufficient justification to make us pause and ask ourselves whether there is not something behind all this which it would be well for us to look into.

In fact I think there is a great deal behind it. One can gather what is behind it when one remembers the attempt which has been made again by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice to suggest that anyone who supports this proposed amendment must lack confidence in the Supreme Court of Canada. By this means, an attempt is made to whip up prejudiced feelings in support of the government's position and against the suggestion that the amendment be viewed on its merit. With respect, that is one of the most illogical positions I have ever seen the right hon. gentleman take. It is most illogical for him to attempt to distort the plain meaning of the words of this amendment out of their context and to read into them an expression of want of confidence in the Supreme Court of Canada. For him to say that those who would vote in favour of this amendment thereby indicate their lack of confidence is as illogical as it would be for me to say that those who are opposed to the amendment oppose it in fact because they do not want to see the Supreme Court of Canada bound by the rule of stare decisis.

When one observes the vehemence of the attempt to arouse prejudice which is displayed by the government, one wonders whether in fact that is not the motive behind their opposition to this amendment. I know we have the greatest verbal tributes paid to the principle of stare decisis, and we have the utmost assurance, in words, that the Supreme Court of Canada will of course always follow that principle. But when it comes to the simple fact, Mr. Chairman, of a request to incorporate that provision in the statute, we find hon. gentlemen opposite saying "Oh, no; we cannot go that far, because it would be an expression of want of confidence in the Supreme Court of Canada." You know, Mr. Chairman, as well as every other lawyer in this committee and a good many laymen as well, that courts in interpreting statutes interpret only the words in the statutes; they even look at what the Prime Minister may have said with regard to the intention of the government when the legislation was enacted.

Mr. Pouliot: That is a wrong judgment of the privy council.

Mr. Homuth: It is not.

Mr. Pouliot: That Hansard could not be quoted before the court.

Mr. Homuth: No, it cannot be.

Mr. Pouliot: It was decided by the privy council, and it is a bad judgment.

Mr. Fulton: We all know what the hon. gentleman who has just spoken thinks about the privy council, and I do not think the interjection need be dealt with. But the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do, and as well as the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice know, that the established rule of law is that, in interpreting statutes, the courts look only to the words of the statute.

Mr. Pouliot: That is one of the silly judgments of the privy council.

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. member wishes to use those words, he is by that very use condemning all the courts in Canada and putting them all in the same category.

Mr. Pouliot: Because they follow the jurisprudence of the privy council, that silly court.

Mr. Fulton: I know it is beyond me to deal with the wit and wisdom of the hon. member for Temiscouata; therefore I shall confine myself to the fact that every court in Canada follows that rule; and, quite apart from the principle of stare decisis or anything else, it is the rule of law which is followed by the courts in interpreting statutes.

As a responsible legislative body if we want to make perfectly clear the laws we wish the Supreme Court of Canada to follow in exercising what is to be their new and enlarged jurisdiction as the ultimate and final court of appeal, I submit we have no alternative but to make it clear what we mean by voting for the amendment which is now before the committee.

Mr. Pouliot: Would the hon. member be kind enough to tell the committee what is the link between the privy council and the Supreme Court of Canada as it is now?

Mr. Fulton: I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by that term. Perhaps he would be good enough to enlarge upon it.

Mr. Pouliot: It is the woolsack. It is a bag of cotton covered with cloth, and it is put in front of the Speaker's chair in the Senate at the time of the opening and prorogation of parliament. The judges sit on it, like urchins. Some of them face His Excellency the Governor General, while the others turn their backs on him. But they sit on the woolsack because it was done in England in the middle ages. The privy council sit on the woolsack—indeed we should have a woolsack here in the House of Commons, and we should sit on it, so that the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Kamloops might sit at opposite ends, each with his back to the other.

Mr. Fulton: Not so long as this government is in power.

Mr Pouliot: No, because those who sit on the woolsack are not supposed to take part in the deliberations; therefore while sitting on the woolsack they would not keep their minds in such a state of effervescence as to deliver unforgettable orations.

I am glad my hon. friends are smiling; it shows they have a greater sense of humour than I expected them to have. I want them to ask the Clerk of the Senate to take them to the attic of the Senate so that they may brush away all the cobwebs and look at that bag of wool before it is all eaten by the moths. They might sit on it, just to see what it is like to be lord chancellor.

The woolsack has such importance in the history of the British parliament that the position of lord chancellor is sometimes described as the woolsack. Occasionally they refer to the lord chancellor in terms of the bag of cotton on which he sits. I find, sir, that it is a tremendous joke; and the first thing to do, as soon as this bill respecting the supreme court as a final tribunal is passed, is to dispense with the woolsack and to let the moths eat it completely. If my hon. friends want to see it they will have to rush to the attic of the Senate.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Chairman, I have been a member of the Canadian Bar Association for many years, and as such it was my privilege and pleasure this year to attend the meeting at Banff. Banff is a delightful spot, and despite the seriousness of the profession there seemed to be a certain lightheartedness and frivolity in connection with what took place. On the golf course, while teeing off during session hours, I noticed a number of learned gentlemen teeing off ahead of me, some of whom were members of His Majesty's bench. Therefore I suggest it is fair to say that the frivolity at the convention was not confined to the minor satellites of the profession, such as myself, but applied generally.

I believe all who attended the Banff convention enjoyed it to the full. There must have been considerable entertainment on the Friday evening, because I recall that when I went to the convention room on Saturday morning at ten o'clock, upon which occasion the resolution referred to, and which is being used as an argument to bolster the amendment, was passed, I was astonished to observe the vacuum in the room. When I went into the large ballroom at the Banff Springs hotel that morning I am sure there were about two dozen lawyers in attendance. As time went on and this resolution came up for consideration, there may have been as many as three dozen there. The interest shown in the resolution was singularly exciting.

The resolution came up, and whether it was because of lethargy or not, there seemed to be no murmur of disapproval or of approval, and it was passed. I suggest that this resolution is being used in support of the amendment without any explanation of the circumstances which prevailed. Conventions are attended by people who want to enjoy themselves,. While I am not challenging the seriousness or the wisdom of the committee which passed the resolution or prepared it for submission to the general meeting, I suggest that approval of the resolution was given by a very small number of members of the Canadian Bar Association in attendance at that annual meeting.

I do not know whether the hon. member for Kamloops was present on that occasion, but I am convinced that if he had been, he would be only too happy to confirm what I have said.

Mr. Homuth: No, no.

An hon. Member: Were you there?

Mr. Homuth: I am everywhere.

Mr. Hunter: I do not remember the hon. member for Kamloops being present on the Saturday morning when this resolution was passed, but if he was there I am sure he will not recall any lively debate, either in approval or in disapproval of the resolution. However, if the hon. member was there, he must have been in the same somnolent state as the rest of those of us who were present.

Mr. Fulton: That is a great compliment.

Mr. Hunter: Despite what the hon. member has just said, the resolutions were passed in a routine fashion, and the interest shown was not very great. It was assumed that committees had gone into these matters with care —and I am not suggesting that in the present instance the committee did not exercise the same care. But I do emphasize the fact that the number of people present on that occasion did not in my humble opinion constitute a representative gathering of the Canadian Bar Association.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, while the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat are not the least bit pertinent to the subject matter under consideration, they do call for some reply.

I am frank to admit that I was not at the meeting of the Canadian Bar Association. Unlike the hon. member, however, I believe I am frank when I say that had I been there and a resolution of this importance had been presented to me, I would have treated it with the seriousness it deserves. Certainly I cannot accept the hon. member as spokesman for the majority of those who attended the convention of the Canadian Bar Association. I have more respect for my profession than to accept what he has said as the true state of affairs at the meeting.

One does not wish to go too far in these matters, but I suggest it is safe to say that if the hon. member regards the deliberations of the highest council of his profession with the levity with which apparently he does regard them, then he should not be accepted in the House of Commons or in the country as a spokesman for that profession.

Mr. Carroll: Before the hon. member for Kamloops takes his seat, would he kindly read the further remarks in my address from which he quoted? If my memory serves me aright, I said distinctly that I did not think the Canadian Bar Association could be accused of casting any reflections on the Supreme Court of Canada or any other tribunal. Would the hon. member kindly read that?

Mr. Fulton: I shall be glad to do so. I certainly did not intend to do any injustice to the hon. gentleman. I felt, and I still feel, that the words of his which I read were apposite. If the hon. member thinks that it will help to clear the record, I shall read his further remarks. The words I was reading were:

> I want to say that, so far as section (g) is concerned,—

That is section (g) of the resolution of the bar association:

> —in which it says the rule of stare decisis ought to continue to be applied with respect to past decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada, a great deal of effrontery was shown by the committee of that organization in passing this resolution.

Those are the words which I read. Then the hon. member went on to say:

> It may not have been with the intention of throwing any doubt on the integrity of the Supreme Court of Canada, but I say I believe the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada know as much as the bar society of this country about their rights in keeping the theory of stare decisis intact.

However, I was making the point that the hon. member had cast a certain amount of reflection on the resolution passed by the Candian Bar Association, and I think the hon. member will agree with me that the words I read were the relevant words in that connection.

Mr. Church: I should like to say a few words on section 3. The marginal note to this section reads:

> This is new. The amendment will abolish appeals to the privy council.

If this court is to be the final court, then we are back to where we were a few years ago.

The Chairman: I ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the amendment under consideration.

Mr. Church: I am not discussing the principle of the bill.

The Chairman: The hon. member will have to confine his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Church: I happened to be out of the house and I did not hear the text of the amendment, but I understand that it refers to the application of the principle of stare decisis. That is a principle of law; it is not an act of parliament. The amendment seeks to have this principle read into the section. A very large body of public opinion in this country favours this amendment, and believes it would save this country a great deal of trouble in the future. The principle of stare decisis would apply to the decisions which have been given so far by the privy council.

I remember raising this question when I first entered the house in connection with two cases before the privy council. It is difficult to deal with this problem without having it sent to a committee. We on this side of the house have adopted a consistent policy in this regard. This is something which should be decided by the high court of parliament under the British constitution which we have had in this country since 1791, or as much as was applicable to our circumstances. This whole question is still before us.

This doctrine of law should be applied in the manner indicated by the amendment. I am not discussing the principle of the bill, because, as I see it, the principle of the bill is written into the amendment. So far as I can see, there is very little legal principle in the bill. I am not speaking personally because I have a great deal of respect and admiration for the Prime Minister and the way in which he has conducted the business of the house. No one has a higher opinion than I have of the Prime Minister.

As I say, this doctrine should be written into the statute. I can find little principle in the bill—legal, political or otherwise. It must be realized that for many years the judicial committee of the privy council has been enforcing doctrines of law, especially where they are founded on contract.

I remember two decisions of the privy council in connection with which I played a humble part. We should hold fast to the principles of our faith and be strong when we consider this amendment. What is more sacred than a contract? A contract between individuals can be enforced, and a nation is only a collection of individuals. There should be some method of enforcement as between nations.

We of the opposition have taken a consistent stand on this bill. We should stand firm on the principle that the state exists for the individual and not the individual for the state. This particular proposal interferes with the liberty of the subject; it encroaches on his rights and privileges. It should be scrutinized first by a legal committee. Both the bill and the amendment should be sent to a committee and I wish the minister would give his consent to that. Then we would not have to thresh out these legal problems in the house.

I believe I represent a large body of public opinion in the country. All I have said this afternoon has been based on the law of contracts; and what is the contract here? It was made at the time of confederation. If you want to treat the whole contract set forth in the British North America Act as a scrap of paper, and rewrite it, then write it for the living and not for the dead. If we are to have a new bill, let us have a proper legal measure which will have some regard for the law and the decisions of the privy council, which are binding under the doctrine of stare decisis.

This bill and these amendments should go to a committee, because in my view the decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council have protected not only minorities but majorities as well. They have been defenders of the faith, as it were, since the setting up of the contract under the act in the first place. To upset the whole thing now would be a grave mistake. A large body of opinion, including three former ministers of justice and attorneys general, has been opposed from the beginning to any change of this kind.

In my opinion there is very little to this bill, and as far as I can see it is not founded upon fact, nor does it include the protection for which I have asked. I do not know why these things are brought up at the present time. What is the rush to put through this legislation? There seems to be a great hurry to pass it, though we have nine or ten other matters awaiting our consideration. I can see no reason at all for not letting this bill stand for a few months, so that it may be properly considered and digested by the judges, the bar associations, and many other bodies. This is separatism in its worst form. It would lead to the disruption of the whole British empire.

Mr. Coldwell: This discussion has been largely confined to members of the legal profession in the house. I do not profess to be learned in the law, but it seems to me that in dealing with these legal matters we are rather losing sight of important aspects of this problem. I believe it is right and proper to give due consideration and some weight to the opinions of such an organization as the Canadian Bar Association, just as we give consideration—though, I may add, usually not as much—to the views expressed by such organizations as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture or the national labour bodies. But having given consideration to those opinions, this house must come to a final decision as to what shall be done.

I have listened to the discussion on this question of stare decisis, and to me it seems that to accept it unreservedly would place this country and its judiciary in something of a strait-jacket. In my reading of the British North America Act and the discussions preceding the adoption of that act in 1867, the fathers of confederation thought of it in the way that was described by Lord Sankey in 1929—which, I may add, is quoted in an excellent speech, which I think hon. members should read, by the late Hon. C. H. Cahan before the Canadian Club of Toronto on September 15, 1937. I do not know of a clearer exposition of the problem before us than can be found in the speech made on that occasion by one who had been secretary of state in the Bennett administration. The expression Mr. Cahan quoted then, which incidentally is also quoted by MacGregor Dawson in his book "Constitutional Issues in Canada, 1900-1931", was this:

> The British North America Act planted in Canada a living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits.

Then Mr. Cahan added this comment:

> But that dictum has been arbitrarily repudiated by more recent decisions of the judicial committee, which have confined our constitution in a strait-jacket of their own making, and thus precluded the possibility of our Canadian constitution being developed in the future by judicial decisions, in accord with the clearly expressed intentions of the Canadian statesmen who framed the first British North America Act.

It seems to me that is a cogent paragraph, and the opinion expressed therein should be considered by this house in dealing with the proposed amendment. In very much the same connection, in the volume by MacGregor Dawson, to which I referred a moment ago, there is a quotation from an article by George F. Henderson in the Canadian Bar Review for November, 1929, at pages 617-619, in these words:

> Under ordinary circumstances, a criticism of a judgment of the judicial committee of the privy council is inadvisable, but a recent decision of that tribunal, in Edwards et al v. the Attorney General of Canada et al, has attracted so much attention and has led to so much press criticism of the Supreme Court of Canada that proper respect for the administration of justice in Canada demands examination and comment.

Then he adds these words:

> Probably the first thought that will occur to one who makes a careful study of the two judgments is that while the supreme court, like the House of Lords, is a court of law, subject to all the restrictions which that fact implies—

Then these are the words to which I wish to direct attention:

> —the privy council is a committee advising the sovereign, not bound to follow precedent nor to determine matters presented upon grounds of law alone, but entitled, if not obliged, to advise on grounds of public policy, and to take into account matters of political expediency. Indeed, the privy council does not consider itself bound by its own previous decisions; nor do English courts regard judgments of the privy council as authoritative.

If that is so, it seems to me that any attempt to fasten upon Canada the past judgments of the privy council would defeat the very objective the fathers of confederation had in view at the outset—the planting of a living tree capable of growth and development in the future. In spite of the learned discussion we have had from hon. members on this side of the house, and having due regard to the opinions of the bar association, I do not think we should tie the hands of our judiciary by adopting the kind of amendment that has been moved by my hon. friends of the Conservative party. I speak only as a layman, but as a layman I believe that sometimes the law has been made to bind the hands of progress, and interpretations have been given which have interfered with the progress and welfare not only of our own country but of many other countries as well. I certainly think the house should vote against this amendment and leave the hands of our own court free, confident that previous decisions involving the rights of our people will be given due consideration.

If we look over the judgments of the privy council—and this is why I cannot understand the attitude of people in some parts of Canada—we find that it has not been a protector of the rights of either majorities or minorities. This can be verified by a reading of certain decisions of the privy council. I am not going into them in detail, but I should like to draw attention to them, as quoted in MacGregor Dawson's volume from an article by Professor F. R. Scott dealing with the judiciary, beginning at page 347. As a layman I cannot see the sense of this house agreeing with some of the members of the legal profession who have spoken and who would tie the hands of the judiciary in the manner suggested by the amendment.

Mr. Fleming: I believe this matter has been sufficiently discussed, and I should not be saying a word now if it were not for the remarks just made by the member for Rosetown-Biggar. Because those remarks have not very much weight, I shall be brief.

In the first place, this amendment has nothing to do with the question of abolishing appeals to the privy council. The principle of the bill was adopted by the house on second reading. The amendment has relevancy only on the basis that the house has decided to abolish appeals to the privy council.

My friend talks about trying to put the Supreme Court of Canada in a strait-jacket, as though that were to be the effect of the amendment. After hearing the hon. member's remarks, all I have to say is that if his view reflects the lay mind of this house, as he seems to suggest, then the matter is not clearly understood. It is apparent from what the hon. member has said that he does not understand the issue.

The member for Rosetown-Biggar seems to believe that the attitude of those who are opposing the amendment is that they are leaving the Supreme Court of Canada free, not bound by past decisions of the privy council. Certainly that is not the view of the Prime Minister, nor is it the view of the Minister of Justice. The argument advanced by them was that the doctrine of stare decisis is binding on the Supreme Court of Canada. This would mean that all those past decisions of the privy council are binding on the Supreme Court of Canada, whether or not such an amendment is adopted. Let us not have any empty talk, Mr. Chairman, about the effect of defeating an amendment such as this being to remove the shackles from the Supreme Court of Canada. When it comes to an opinion on that point, as between the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice on the one hand, and the member for Rosetown-Biggar on the other, I prefer the view of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice. In the plainest of terms they said that in their opinion the principle of stare decisis applies and will bind the Supreme Court of Canada in the future with respect to past decisions of the privy council. If that is putting the Supreme Court of Canada in a strait-jacket, then certainly it is the view of the government that the strait-jacket should remain.

Mr. Coldwell: Why write this into a statute, then?

Mr. Fleming: Because I do not think it is as clear as the Prime Minister and Minister of Justice contend. We do not wish to leave a matter of this vast importance to doubtful disputation after the event. This amendment is intended to settle the question. If we are to take this important step, Mr. Chairman, I think all hon. members ought to be quite clear about the argument. The argument advanced by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is that, in principle, the Supreme Court of Canada ought to be free to disregard past decisions of the privy council in relevant matters. I ask every member of this house who adopts the view of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar to go to his constituency and say it is his opinion that the Supreme Court of Canada should be free to disregard the decisions of the privy council in those important constitutional cases in which the privy council has made decisions of the most far-reaching importance to all Canada. If hon. members feel they do not want the principle of stare decisis applied, let them go the whole way and say that in future the decisions of the privy council upon which rest the fundamental rights of the provinces should not bind the Supreme Court of Canada. That would leave the supreme court free to rewrite those decisions, and in that way recast the constitution.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, thinking about what has been said, I would say that a layman is surely not the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): It is not my intention to cover ground that has already been covered in this debate. The matter has been well argued in the house, particularly by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice and those favouring the amendment. The amendment simply means that those who have moved it feel that the Supreme Court of Canada is likely to depart from the decisions of the privy council; that is a summary of it. It is conceded by those who support the resolution that in the past the Supreme Court of Canada has followed the decisions of the privy council. I asked the hon. member for Kamloops what he was afraid of, but so far he has not told me.

Since the Supreme Court of Canada has followed the decisions of the privy council, where is the necessity for this amendment? My hon. friends say there are two reasons for it. They seem to be afraid that the supreme court might not follow that practice in the future, although it has in the past. At the head of this government there is a responsible lawyer, a man in whom the bar of this country has absolute faith. After this bill is passed and the Supreme Court of Canada is strengthened, you will see that the court will follow the past decisions of the privy council and will earn the confidence of all.

Those who are supporting the amendment say that if we do not pass it we shall not be following what the Canadian Bar Association adopted at its convention. As the Prime Minister has pointed out, the Canadian bar did not say that the requirements to follow the principle of stare decisis should be made a part of the law. I believe the remarks of the member for Kamloops with regard to the member for Parkdale were very unfair. The member for Parkdale was at the convention, but the member for Kamloops was not. I cannot understand why he should question what the member for Parkdale said about the convention. The Prime Minister and many other members of this house have been members of the bar for many years. I am a past president of the bar society of Saskatchewan. Most of us have been attending these conventions for a long time. I have complete confidence in what the member for Parkdale has said with respect to what happened at that convention.

I believe the subject has been discussed more fully in this house that it was at the Canadian bar convention. Having been one of the benchers of our law society, I believe it to be the duty of hon. members who are lawyers to act as members of this house and not as carrier pigeons for the Canadian Bar Association or any other association. We sit in this house as representatives of a constituency. I sometimes think the dignitaries in the Canadian bar and other associations might do well to run as members of parliament. It would be an education for some of those gentlemen who have sat in positions of safety for the last few years and attended bar conventions. They are the people who tell the legislators what their duty is.

I do not see any real object behind this amendment, Mr. Chairman. If all hon. members supporting the amendment were as frank as the member for Parkdale, they might say: We do not believe in this amendment at all; we still believe in appeals to the privy council, even if it costs Canadians more money and demonstrates that Canadians cannot run their own courts. But instead of saying that, they introduce an amendment which, in effect, does nothing more than say that the proposer does not trust the Supreme Court of Canada. I am opposing the amendment.

The Chairman: Those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Chairman: Those opposed to the amendment will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Chairman: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Fulton: On division.

Amendment (Mr. Fulton) negatived.

Section 3 agreed to.

The Chairman: We now come back to section 1, which had been allowed to stand. To section 1 we have an amendment by Mr. LaCroix, who moves that clause 1 be amended by adding at the end of section 4 the following words:

Provided that four of the puisne judges be chosen among the candidates proposed by the lieutenant governor in council, and that one of the four abovementioned judges be chosen among the candidates proposed by the lieutenant governor in council of the province of Quebec, each province having to propose at least three candidates.

Mr. Church: I wish to offer opposition to this first section. For a population of eleven million you are now going to establish a large court which will cost the country a considerable sum of money, having regard to the various officers we are going to have in that court. According to section 1 we are to have the same number of judges in our supreme court as has the United States, with a population of 127 million to 130 million. For what purpose? Who is asking for this proposal? The bar association has not asked for it. The provinces have not asked for it.

As I pointed out on another occasion with regard to this section 1, you are proposing to establish a system. In my opinion, we have no power by statute law to force this system on the country, without any consultation with the bar association or with the attorneys general of the provinces. Who is asking for this proposal? There are to be nine judges appointed; $25,000 a year is to be paid one of them and $20,000 is to be paid the others. I can tell the committee that this proposal has not the confidence of the country at large. I should like to find out from the present minister who are the people that are asking for this amendment. What provinces are asking to enlarge this court and to pay the judges $20,000 a year? They should start at the other end and pay increased salaries to the judges who are out on circuit all over the country trying murder cases, cases concerning property and civil rights, and so on.

This particular section is one that will take away—what? It will take away from the court of last resort appeals of grace. They say they have the power; but merely because they say so does not make it so. Four former ministers of justice were opposed to this change. They are four of the most eminent lawyers the country ever produced. One was Sir Allen Aylesworth, who was a former minister of justice. He is probably the ablest lawyer the country has produced. As I said the other day, I remember going into the court of appeal in Ontario where he had the whole docket to himself on appeals. He acted for the government in the Bering Sea arbitration. Many members of the house graduated from the Osgoode Hall law school, including the leader of the opposition, who is an able lawyer. My good friend to my right, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, was at the law school there, and many others such as Sir Edward Beatty of the C.P.R. and Sir Thomas White. The present deputy minister of justice, and he is an extremely able one, and others were graduates of this particular school. While I have great respect for my friend the leader of the C.C.F., and for the other leaders in the house including the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, there are certain definite concrete principles which I support. I cannot be blamed for that. I have always had the courage to stand up in the House of Commons for certain principles, ever since I entered it. If I have to forsake those principles, I shall have to consider whether I ought to belong to the House of Commons any longer.

I wish to say a word to the younger members of the party to which I belong and to those on the government benches today. There are many young men of great ability in the legal profession on the government benches today and in the House of Commons, and they come here at considerable personal sacrifice. Let me ask them this question. Who has asked for this legislation? How can you justify these salaries of $20,000 and $25,000 to judges who never go out of the city of Ottawa, who can live here, who can get away for several months a year, and who have only three or four terms a year? There is difficulty in getting before them. During the second war 160,000 orders in council were passed and only four of them ever reached the Supreme Court of Canada on appeal. How many people got as far as Ottawa? Nobody could afford it. They could not afford to come away down here to Ottawa.

If the court is to be the kind proposed by this section 1, it should be an itinerant court travelling over the country. Who is asking for it? I do not think the people believe in it. I think we should start paying increased salaries to some of the judges who earn their money by going out on circuit trying these cases to which I referred, at great personal sacrifice, having to live at country hotels and all that kind of thing, whereas these other judges can live here in the city of Ottawa.

As I say, we seem to think of Washington, not only politically, economically, financially and in military considerations, but we seem now to want to copy the United States in this matter. In everything we do here the first people we consider are the people of the United States. Now it is the judiciary. There is a difference between the court constituted by section 1 and the court in the United States. The court in the United States does not represent provinces or localities. Why should one province have four representatives? Why should we have that provision, if we are anxious to copy that system, as we are by section 1 of the bill? In the United States they do not have that principle at all. It is the principle that I am objecting to. I see little principle in the bill. If there were any principle in it, it would be another matter. But there is no principle in the bill except political considerations first, last and all the time. I can tell hon. members that there is a large body of lawyers who do not approve the principle that this court, if it is to be the Supreme Court of Canada, should represent localities. In the United States the best lawyers are chosen. One or two of them belong to New York state. I think New York state probably would get only one under this system. The best men at the bar are chosen there. The best men at the bar are plenty good enough for the Supreme Court of the United States.

The bar association did not believe in this proposal. The people back home in the constituencies do not believe in it. I fail to see any of the provinces asking for it. It is a huge waste of money. It is a waste of public funds which we and this government have no right to expend in this way; the government has no mandate from the people back home in the constituencies to go about it in this way. We can find other uses for our money than squandering it in this way. There is little principle in this bill except a political principle. That seems to be the sole consideration here.

(Translation):

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I hasten to express my opposition to the amendment, for it is inconsistent and offers no solution whatever to the problem now under consideration.

In fact the bill is nothing more than another measure of centralization on the part of the government.

In discussing the principle of the bill hon. members on the government side sought to avoid the issue by limiting their remarks to the abolition of appeals to the privy council, knowing full well that everyone is in favour of such a measure. In my opinion the practice of appealing to the privy council should have been abolished a long time ago.

The point on which we, of the opposition, disagree with the government is in maintaining that this bill should never be adopted in this house without first consulting the provinces.

The house is called upon to establish a final court to settle disputes which may arise between the central power and the provinces.

We find it inconsistent that only one of the parties to a pact should be called, or rather that it should arrogate to itself the right to determine alone what tribunal will decide on its disputes with the other party.

At the time of confederation, my province, and for that matter the other provinces as well, rejected the principle of a legislative union and agreed to become part of a federal state in which her rights and prerogatives would be protected.

The reason why the representatives of lower Canada, which is now the province of Quebec, consented to join the other provinces in forming the confederation was that they sincerely believed that, in the constitutional act implementing that pact, the language, religion, rights and traditions of the French minority in this country would be guaranteed and unequivocally recognized for the future.

That is why we opposition members now demand for the provinces a safeguard similar to that which the fathers of confederation had guaranteed to them.

But each day some fresh government pressure endangers the very spirit of the confederation pact.

This bill which, upon the whole, is an amendment to the constitution, and which is related to the other unilateral amendments promised in the speech from the throne, is a breach of the rights of provinces, if the latter are not consulted.

I am pleased to see that at least one Liberal member has felt remorse and, by means of an amendment, now endeavours to give the provinces an apparent advantage. But he does not understand what we claim for the provinces. It is not charity, but simply an acknowledgment of their rights.

On behalf of the provinces we cannot agree to the proposed amendment. It would be encroaching on their autonomy. It is up to the provinces to decide their fate for themselves, and the federal parliament must not force its will upon them.

As a citizen of the province of Quebec and as a French Canadian, it is my duty to vote against the amendment as presented.

(Text):

Amendment (Mr. LaCroix) negatived.

Mr. Green: Before clause 1 carries I should like to ask the minister this question. Has he given consideration to leaving the court at seven for the time being until we know just how much business there is to be handled and whether or not it is wise to increase the number to nine? It does seem to me that increasing it to nine in this way may bring up a good deal of trouble. There is the provision that three of the judges must come from Quebec. I imagine that Ontario will demand that at least three of the judges must come from that province, and that leaves three others. The four western provinces combined have practically the same population as Quebec, but a little smaller than Ontario. These provinces have different types of problems. Certainly British Columbia has problems quite different from those of the three prairie provinces. At the present time Alberta has problems arising which are quite a bit different from the problems of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. The three western provinces have a claim to three judges on the supreme court if Ontario and Quebec are to have three. That would leave none at all for the three maritime provinces and for Newfoundland. In the case of Newfoundland there will be many new legal problems to be solved. I think that Newfoundland should have a judge on this supreme court and certainly Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island should have at least one and possibly two. If consideration is to be given to having a set number of judges from any one part of the country it hardly seems fair to me that eight provinces in the dominion should have only three judges on this court while the two great central provinces have three apiece.

As the government knows, there is a great deal of feeling abroad in the country that Ontario and Quebec outweigh the other provinces. There is a great deal of resentment against the fact that the two great provinces have more power in the nation than the more distant ones. That is quite a serious difficulty. Has the minister given consideration to leaving the court at seven for the time being until we find some way to work out this question of the proper allocation? Under the law as it stands now Quebec is entitled to two judges and in practice I believe Ontario has also two judges. The west has two and the maritimes have one. Further consideration should be given to this particular proposal.

Mr. Garson: In reply to my hon. friend I might say that before drafting clause 1 of the bill in the form in which it now appears serious consideration was given to all of the factors to which my hon. friend has referred in the remarks he has just made.

So far as the reference in the clause to there being three appointees from Quebec is concerned, the necessity for that arises, as my hon. friend knows, from the fact that in that province they have a system of civil law which is altogether different in character from the common law that we inherited from England, and which prevails in the other provinces. While the clause says that the third judge shall be appointed from Quebec, the real purpose of making that appointment is to get upon the supreme court, when it becomes the court of last resort for Canadian lawsuits, three lawyers trained in the civil code rather than in the common law. It is that consideration, more than any geographical consideration of appointing a judge to represent this province or that one, that weighed in our deciding upon that particular subsection.

I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will agree that the arguments which he advanced with regard to the difficulties of securing representation upon the membership of the supreme court from each of the provinces of Canada would be somewhat—

Mr. Green: I did not say that.

Mr. Garson: No; but to secure geographical representation in the terms which the hon. member was stating would be obviously somewhat more difficult with seven members on the supreme court than it would be with nine. However, I am not for one moment suggesting that that consideration was a dominant factor in our thoughts in arriving at the idea that we should increase the membership from seven to nine members. We knew that when we created the supreme court as the court of last resort for Canada we would have to have appointed to the membership of that court enough civilians or judges trained in the civil law so that, in the event of there coming from Quebec a case involving any matters other than criminal law, it would be decided without a stalemate, having one civilian judge on one side and one civilian judge on the other. That necessitated the appointment of three judges trained in the civil law on that court of last resort.

Then we thought—and I admit that in this we had to engage in some measure of surmise—that having regard to the volume of business which heretofore had come to the court, and having regard to the best estimate we could form as to what might come to it as the court of last resort in Canada, the actual amount of business to be transacted would necessitate an increase in the membership of the court.

In that connection my deputy consulted with the members of the court, and section 1 of the bill represents the best judgment of the department. This was recommended to the government and has been accepted, and we now recommend it to the House of Commons. Having regard to all the circumstances which apply, we believe it is wise that we increase the membership of the court to nine members, and that we should not delay or experiment with seven. It is our view that this increase should be made as soon as convenient after the passing of the bill.

Mr. Green: When these two new judges are appointed does it mean that one will be from Quebec and one from Ontario?

Mr. Garson: No, it means that we will have on the court three civilians, lawyers or jurists trained in the civil law. We will have six members of the court trained in the common law. It follows therefrom that of the two new appointees one of necessity will be a member of the Quebec bar, and the other one, while he could be from Ontario, need not necessarily come from that province.

Mr. Green: Is it the intention that there shall be two panels, that is that the chief justice will sit with four judges at one time and four another time; or are they going to continue to sit as they have in the past?

Mr. Garson: Although this is a matter of the internal operation of the court, which will be arranged by the chief justice, I understand it is the view that one of the purposes of increasing the number to nine is to permit panels to sit in that way. This will enable the whole nine judges to handle a much larger number of cases, if necessity should arise. In other words, all nine of them will not of necessity sit on every case, by any means. The number we have arrived at is the number which, with the best judgment we have been able to exercise, having regard to all the factors, is the proper number to have on the court.

Mr. Green: The quorum will be five?

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Green: The minister might get around the difficulty by having ten instead of nine judges.

Mr. Garson: If the hon. member thinks we should make it ten, then I hope he will not object if we make it nine.

Mr. Church: If this is to be a national federal court, why should we have the principle of representing localities? In Great Britain that principle is not followed; with their 47,000,000 people they do not have provinces. Why should not this court be a federal court, and not represent localities?

Mr. Garson: I would not want anything I have said today to leave the impression that we regard it as a federal court representing localities. The intention is that we shall endeavour to get men of the very best legal ability in Canada to sit on this court, having regard to the fact that when it becomes a court of last resort for this country it will be exercising a type of jurisdiction considerably different from and much more onerous than that which it has exercised heretofore, when it was merely a court through which appeals went on their way to the court of last resort, the judicial committee of the privy council.

This being so, I believe there is a good deal of merit in the suggestion of the hon. member that it should be a federal court, and that the chief object should be to secure the very best talent available. Of course, if we can achieve that object and at the same time give representation to as many parts of Canada as possible, I am sure the hon. member would agree with me that the second objective is a desirable one so long as it can be attained without sacrificing the first.

So far as representation of Quebec is concerned, as I have already indicated, it is not in any sense a geographical representation, but rather one necessitated by the fact that, unlike other countries, we have in one of our larger and more thickly populated provinces a civil code, which is a system of law quite distinct from the common law. In making the Supreme Court of Canada the court of last resort we have to make adequate provision to hear appeals from all parts of Canada, including Quebec.

Mr. Church: The Supreme Court of the United States sitting at Washington does not represent localities, nor does the judicial committee of the privy council in London. They have no provinces over there. I fail to see why this provision is copied into the bill. It does not carry out the national federal principle.

Mr. Fleming: I do not wish to confine the discussion of this matter, because it is a matter of interest to all of us. However, I must point out that the section before the committee does not deal with the number of judges, or the additional appointments. The only provision in section 1 deals with the amendment to section 9, which relates to tenure.

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. Fleming: I thought the committee had gone back to section 1.

Mr. Garson: Yes, section 1 of the bill.

Mr. Fleming: I understood the discussion on that section was reopened.

The Chairman: That is right.

Mr. Fleming: And section 1 in the copy of the bill I have deals only with the amendment of section 9 of the act. Has there been a reprint?

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member has not the right bill.

Mr. Fleming: Obviously there are two printings of the bill, because I have another one before me now. Section 1 in the copy I have before me does not deal with section 4 of the act.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member does not happen to have the bill dealing with the Exchequer Court Act?

Mr. Fleming: No. Another and different copy that has been handed to me has to do with the amendment to section 4.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: There is one point concerning which I should like to be clear. I think the Minister of Justice has given the proper explanation why in a court of nine because of the difference in the civil law there should be three judges from the province of Quebec. However, there is another point about which I should like some explanation and that is why the words "at least" after the word "three" are inserted? The section is to read:

> Three at least of the judges shall be appointed from among the judges of the Court of King's Bench, or of the Superior Court, or the barristers or advocates of the province of Quebec.

Why the words "at least"? The insertion of the words "at least" leaves it open to the appointment of four, five, or more from the province of Quebec. I remember the Prime Minister saying he thought that, rather than rely on statutory provisions and so on, the good will and good faith of the people across Canada was the best guarantee of justice for all. I am entirely of that opinion.

But I think the placing of the words "at least" in this section may give rise to controversy. I think it was ill advised to put them there. They do not do anything at all, but they do leave the way open for argument that four, five, six, seven, eight or the whole court may be appointed from one province. Perhaps the Minister of Justice will explain that.

If this court is enlarged it should be representative of all Canada. It is true that there should be judges who understand the civil law of the province of Quebec, but beyond that it should be a court which represents all Canada. I think it would be wrong to infer that, because there are to be three appointed from the province of Quebec to deal with cases coming under their civil law, there must be three appointed from Ontario or three appointed from the maritimes or three appointed from western Canada or from any other section of the country. What I think the government should do in appointing judges to the supreme court is to choose those in the legal profession who are best qualified regardless of their geographical location in the country.

Mr. Garson: I am glad to hear the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar confirm what was said by the hon. member for Broadview, that it is desirable that in appointing members to this court first regard should be had to their capacity to discharge their judicial duties. If we can have geographical representation consistent with that policy of appointment, so much the better, but we should lay the greatest emphasis upon the capacity of the court.

I think the answer to my hon. friend's question would be in line with that concept. I am sure he will agree that in order to make a proper disposition of the cases from Quebec we cannot have less than three representatives from that province.

Mr. Coldwell: I agree with that.

Mr. Garson: If we said three, period, or three without adding the words "at least", that would indicate a geographical representation in a sense. In that way we could not, where the ability of a particular man was an issue, add to that number. There is in the history of the supreme court one example of that sort of thing. At one time when the "two" limitation was in force it was desired to appoint to the supreme court a man who, I think all hon. members will agree, would have been a great ornament to that court. He was a man who on one occasion was selected as sole arbitrator to settle a dispute between two South American countries. It was left to him solely to decide whether the dispute should be settled and on what terms.

This man had world renown as a lawyer both in common and in civil law. I refer to the late Eugene Lafleur. On that occasion when we might have had one of the finest legal minds that ever existed in Canada on the court, the government would have been unable to appoint him. It is true that Mr. Lafleur refused because he felt that he was getting on in years and could not stand the heavy duties involved in the highest type of judicial work.

I do not want the impression to be left from what I have said that it is a settled policy, that the government will invoke this power to appoint more than three judges from Quebec. It simply means that if some time later an extraordinary case such as that of Mr. Lafleur should arise, when there is a man the best qualified in Canada to fill a vacant appointment, he could be appointed if he should happen to live in Quebec.

Mr. Church: Where do we go from here if we pass this section? Where does Canada go if we pass section 1?

Mr. St. Laurent: It stays here.

Mr. Church: What is the next step? As I see it, we will be out of the empire altogether.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I think the question asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has not been properly answered by the Minister of Justice. If a fourth judge is wanted, he may still be appointed. If the words "at least" were left out, then it would read "three shall be appointed"; but another or others could still be appointed if good men were available and three had been appointed already.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to refer to the point made earlier by the hon. member for Broadview. Because I come from the far west this suggestion seems to be most attractive. As I understood it, the hon. member suggested that if an increase in number was made it might be possible for this court to go on circuit. I am sure that this question must have arisen in the past and it must have been in the minds of the minister and his officials when this bill was being drafted. Could the minister tell us the considerations involved and whether it would be possible? It certainly would be most advantageous.

Mr. Garson: The matter to which the hon. member refers is one which commends itself to anyone who has reflected upon this general subject. However, having regard to the fact that this will be a court of last resort for Canada, as time goes on the volume of business directed to it will be such that it was felt that the court could not go on circuit and properly dispose of the cases coming before it without holding up judgments.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Fulton: Since in our previous consideration of this bill we have more or less jumped from section to section, would the minister give us a brief résumé of the ways in which the original jurisdiction of the court has been enlarged? In addition to being made the court of final jurisdiction, in one of the sections, in very complicated language which requires cross reference to the old act, I understand there are certain enlargements of the original jurisdiction. Would the minister say just what is the effect of that enlargement?

Mr. Garson: If hon. members will look at clause 2 on page 1 of the bill, following that to the bottom of the page and over to page 2 and to the bottom of that page, they will see there enacted new sections 36 to 40 inclusive, all of which are in clarification of the existing law, without any significant change in substance. Then going over to page 3 they will see a new section 41; and if they will look at the explanatory note opposite page 3 they will find a statement which I believe is quite exhaustive and which will enable my hon. friend to grasp the nature of this increase in jurisdiction authorized by new section 41. Section 41 is new, and in a sense is consequential in that it is an attempt—and I think a successful attempt—to provide in the Supreme Court of Canada the counterpart of that appeal jurisdiction which was exercised by the privy council upon special leave in respect of certain classes of cases that formerly went before it. So this new section 41 provides a considerable increase in the jurisdiction of the supreme court, as a court of last resort, to hear, upon leave, the type of cases referred to in the new section 41.

Mr. Fulton: As I understand it, there is no enlargement of the jurisdiction of the court to hear appeals, with respect to the financial amount involved? As I recall it there is a limit of $2,000, and that stands?

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: But does this enlargement to which the minister refers make it possible in some cases to bring appeals which were not possible before, where the amount in dispute is less than that?

Mr. Garson: Yes. When the privy council was the court of last resort for Canadian appeals, there was a class—or classes—of appeals which could not be taken to the Supreme Court of Canada but which could be taken to the privy council. If we were to abolish appeals to the privy council without making provision for those classes of appeals formerly taken there, those appellants would be without a remedy by way of appeal. So the new section 41 provides in such cases an appeal upon leave to the Supreme Court of Canada, to replace that appeal they formerly had to the privy council, by leave.

Mr. Church: What section are we on, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Fleming: With reference to the proclamation—

Mr. Church: I want a vote on section 1.

Mr. Fleming: In a matter of this kind I think the minister will appreciate the desirability of giving adequate notice as to the date of coming into effect, particularly having in mind the provisions of section 7. Would the minister indicate what the government has in mind in that respect?

Mr. Garson: I am sure the hon. member for Eglinton will appreciate that in making this great jurisdictional change in the supreme court we intend to exercise extreme care with respect to the two additional appointments. There is that consideration and also the matter of consulting with the chief justice and the members of the court as to when they feel they can adequately carry on their new jurisdiction. Those questions will have to be settled before we can consider proclaiming the act after it is passed. I do not think my hon. friend will have any cause for complaint about inadequate notice when the proclamation is issued.

Mr. Church: We are on the title, and the title is a misnomer, as no one knows better than this government. The proposed title of the bill is "An act to amend the Supreme Court Act," but no one knows better than the government that this is not a federal court in any sense at all. By this legislation the government is seeking to abolish statutory appeals, as well as appeals by grace, which has always been the inalienable right of every British subject.

If we adopt this bill, I ask the government: where do you propose to go from here? That is a simple question for them to answer. When we adopt the title of this bill the whole bill automatically goes through this house and receives the approval of parliament. Where does the government propose to go from here? Does it propose to stay in or get out of the British empire? That is exactly the question, especially when you consider the various other steps that have been proposed. This is nothing but a political bill first, last and all the time; and I can tell you that it is going to lead to untold litigation, in view of the fact that we have reserved the right of appeals that have been undertaken up to the present time. This is weakening the ties to which I referred the other day, together with all these other motions with respect to the governor general, the flag, the anthem and so on. Why don't we get out of the empire, if we are going to pass a bill like this?

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Some hon. Members: Next sitting.

Mr. Garson moved third reading of the bill.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I want to discuss this bill on third reading. The principle of the bill and what it proposes to do are entirely different. Here we are going to abolish statutory appeals from the provinces, and I want to have a fair discussion of this bill, not under rules that are three hundred years old. This legislation affects every citizen of this country. We have to go away back to follow the history of it. Confederation was brought about by a contract between the provinces which formed the dominion, as no one knows better than the government. The other day I referred to the Statute of Westminster, on which the bill is founded, and the textbook in which it is stated that we have not the right to do what we are proposing today.

I want to make only a few remarks on the motion for third reading. I do not wish to object to it any further. I have almost exhausted my time. I think we should obey the Speaker and follow the rules of the house. I have never infringed upon the rules of the house and I do not propose to do so now. I point out to the government that there is a large body of informed public opinion in this country that is opposed to this bill. The four ministers of justice to whom I referred the other day as well as former chief justices of the Supreme Court of Canada were opposed to this policy. The Supreme Court Act was passed in 1875.

We are now violating all those pacts which the provinces had and to which reference was made in the textbook by Wheare on the Statute of Westminster. This proposal would upset all that.

Mr. Howard Ferguson, when he was premier of Ontario, and the late Lord Bennett, when he was the leader of the House of Commons, opposed this policy. What is the reason for rushing this bill now? Certain statements were made during the election and while I wish to speak with respect of everyone in this house, I can tell you that in my opinion this is nothing but a political bill, first, last and always. Accordingly, it is put on the order paper ahead of many other motions. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, I should like to know what the question before the house is at the moment?

An hon. Member: Third reading.

Mr. MacInnis: There was objection to third reading and if there is an objection, third reading cannot be given. If I may speak on that point, sir, standing order 73 reads as follows:

> Every bill shall receive three several readings on different days, previously to being passed. On urgent or extraordinary occasions, a bill may be read twice or thrice, or advanced two or more stages in one day.

I do not believe there are urgent or extraordinary reasons why this bill should receive two readings today.

Mr. Fleming: It has only had one reading today.

Mr. MacInnis: Even at that, there is standing order 77, which reads in part as follows:

> But when a bill is reported without amendment, it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the house.

The procedure in this house has been that, when a bill comes from committee, third reading is not given to it on that day.

Mr Church: In fair play, there should not be third reading today.

Mr. Fulton: I entirely agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). I think it should be pointed out that the bill was in committee on the order paper for today. Third reading of this bill was not on the order paper, and consequently I think it would require unanimous consent of the house to give it third reading.

Mr. St. Laurent: This is a rather important point of procedure. If there is any reason for delaying third reading, I certainly do not want to insist upon it. The government would be glad to consider any such reason. I think it would be rather interesting to have a ruling on the meaning of these standing orders 73 and 77. I had always understood that, when a bill received second reading and went into committee on the same day, and was reported out of committee on that day, it could not be read a third time without unanimous consent.

The rules provide that there shall be three readings on separate days. When second reading has been given, however, and there has been a protracted debate in committee which has been carried beyond the day second reading took place, and the committee then reports the bill, I had understood that under order 77 the bill could be read the day it was reported. I believe that is a rather important question of procedure. I am sure no hon. member would want to give a forced interpretation to those rules. If my statement of the rules is correct, it would be well for us to know that is the correct interpretation. If it is not, I think it would be well to have a ruling from the Speaker so that we might not infringe the rule in future.

Mr. Fulton: Might I call your attention, sir, to citation 810 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms.

> If the bill is reported without amendment, the Speaker puts the question: "When shall the bill be read a third time?" The house, at this stage, may decide by a majority vote either that the third reading will take place immediately or at some future day. If, to the Speaker's question, the answer comes "Now," he will at once put the third reading and the motion "that the bill do now pass and title be as on the order paper . . ."

When the Speaker put the question, admittedly some hon. members said "Now" and some hon. members said "Next sitting of the house". I submit that a clear, unmistakable answer "now" has not come. In this citation it is recognized that third reading on this day is so extraordinary a measure as to call for a majority vote of the house. This suggests to me that unanimous consent would be required if this procedure were adopted.

Mr. St. Laurent: The citation does not say "unanimous consent" it says "majority vote".

Mr. Hansell: I do not have a copy of Beauchesne's rules and forms in my desk. I would suggest that before the war, we never gave third reading to a bill on the same day on which it received second reading or went to a committee. War broke out and a period of urgency came upon us. By courtesy and consent—we did not expect to create a precedent by it—the government has been accommodated and bills have been read a third time on the same day.

I am inclined to think that now we have gone back to our peacetime regime we should be careful not to rush these bills too much. In my opinion, the reason for delaying third reading is to give members an opportunity to assemble material and have a last fling in that debate. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, you should rule in favour of third reading at an appropriate future sitting of the house.

Mr. Garson: I should like to refer you, Mr. Speaker, to standing order 77 and to citation 810, in order to dispel the idea that what is now being proposed is something extraordinary or an invasion of the members' privileges. Standing order 77 reads as follows:

All amendments made in committee are reported by the chairman to the house, which shall receive the same forthwith. After report the bill is open to debate and amendment, before it is ordered for a third reading. But when a bill is reported without amendment,—

As it is in this case.

—it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the house.

Citation 810, referred to by the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), reads as follows:

If the bill is reported without amendment, the Speaker puts the question: "When shall the bill be read a third time?" The house, at this stage, may decide by a majority vote either that the third reading will take place immediately or at some day. If, to the Speaker's question, the answer comes "Now," he will at once put the third reading and the motion "that the bill do now pass and title be as on the order paper, (or that the title be . . . (putting the change if any)).

It is submitted that in view of that standing order, 77, and the rule, 810, there is no question but that the procedure we are following is the proper one.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, I have something to say regarding this bill. I have been deeply interested all the way through the debate, but I find myself utterly in a fog to see the reason for this breathless haste.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: I suggest that the members who have been calling for that now withdraw their remarks.

Mr. Speaker: The only question before the house is one of order, and all hon. members must address themselves to that question.

I have heard what hon. members have said, and I am prepared to give my ruling. This bill received second reading one day last week. It was then sent to the committee of the whole house for consideration by it. The committee completed its work this afternoon and has now reported the bill without amendment. When the bill was reported to the house, I asked the house although it was not necessary for me to do so—see Beauchesne's second edition, reference 810: "When shall the report be received?" The answer was "Now." I then asked the house, "When shall this bill be read a third time?" I received the answer "Now."

Standing order 73, which has been quoted by hon. members, reads as follows:

Every bill shall receive three several readings on different days, previously to being passed.

This bill had received two separate readings previously to today. The rule goes on to read as follows:

On urgent or extraordinary occasions, a bill may be read twice or thrice, or advanced two or more stages in one day.

With that rule must be read standing order 77, which is as follows:

All amendments made in committee are reported by the chairman to the house, which shall receive the same forthwith. After report the bill is open to debate and amendment, before it is ordered for a third reading. But when a bill is reported without amendment, it is forthwith ordered to be read a third time at such time as may be appointed by the house.

I would refer hon. members to the words "forthwith" and the references in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second edition, which have been mentioned in debate by a number of members and also to the latter part of reference 705, Beauchesne's third edition. I shall not read these references but when they are considered along with standing orders 73 and 77, I think it is clear that it is in order for a bill to be read a third time on the same day that it is reported from the committee, provided that it has been reported without amendment.

I therefore rule that it is in order for this bill to be read a third time now.

Mr. Church: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I wish to appeal from your decision.

Mr. Speaker: I have given my decision. Speakers' decisions, after they have been made, are not subject to debate.

Mr. Fulton: I admit that I am a little bit at a loss, Mr. Speaker, with respect to procedure. Might I raise a subsequent point of order. I refer to citation 810 and I would ask Your Honour to call for a vote, which is provided for in that citation. That is the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I asked, "When shall this bill be read a third time?" The answer came back, "Now". I am carying out the instructions from the house in ordering the bill to be read a third time now—see reference 705, Beauchesne's third edition. The hon. member for Broadview has the floor.

Mr. Church: I wish to appeal from your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will say "Yea".

Mr. Green: What motion?

An hon. Member: The ruling.

Mr. Speaker: I have given my ruling. The question now before the house is that this bill be now read a third time. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Before you go on with this stage of the bill, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the government that perhaps the common sense way of handling this situation is this. Let us not argue too much over technicalities as to the rules. You have already made your decision and your ruling, Mr. Speaker. But having in mind the discussion that has taken place, I think perhaps it would meet the convenience and the wishes of the house in general if the government could see its way clear to leave third reading over for another sitting of the house. Nothing much can happen in the meantime. At the same time I think that would meet the wishes of the country, the house, and perhaps the government as well.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): I should like to associate myself with the remarks made by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). It does not look good for a government which has the enormous majority behind it which this government has to be putting on pressure as we have seen it put on today.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: I merely point out that fact. To the members of the house who are so eager, I may say that it will not do them any good when it is fully understood in the country.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): In view of the attitude taken by the hon. member who has just spoken, I do not think that we can consent to the adjournment of third reading. If the acting leader of the opposition will give any reasons why it would be preferable to postpone the third reading to another day, we shall be glad to consider them. But I do not think the reason advanced by the gentleman who last sat down would be one that would commend itself to this side of the house.

Mr. Speaker: From a note that has been handed to me, I understand that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) desires to appeal my ruling. All those in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling will say "Yea".

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed?

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the "yeas" have it. I declare the ruling sustained. The question now before the house is the motion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), seconded by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier, Hull), that this bill be now read a third time. The hon. member for Broadview was speaking to that motion.

Mr. Graydon: I just wanted to reply to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. I do not think he was on firm ground when he used as his main reason for not complying with my request the attitude of another member of the house. I do not think that is a good foundation for his argument.

In view of the fact that there is a substantial body of public opinion in Canada that feels that there should not be any ruthless haste in connection with a measure of this kind, although I do not think the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has that in his mind, I think the government ought to allow this matter to stand over. It seems to me that there is a substantial reason why an opposition would want third reading of a measure such as this to be allowed to stand over for a day or two. The principle is again involved. It was involved in second reading and it is involved again now. Naturally consideration must be given by an opposition to the attitude to be taken on the principle on third reading of a bill which is so important to our nation's affairs as is this one. I think that is sufficient reason for the Prime Minister to accede to the request I made in perfect good faith, not on any special, narrow ground but rather for the purpose of seeing if we cannot meet the wishes of the house. This session the house has not been in the habit of dividing unnecessarily on small things; I think it would be a small thing for the government to press this matter at this time, and I do not think the Prime Minister will want to do so.

Mr. St. Laurent: It is not a matter of wishing to refuse the request made, but this has been the matter before the house on practically all occasions when government business has been considered. We have now reached the point where the bill has been carefully considered and has been reported out of committee. Both the minister and I have engagements for Thursday. Tomorrow is not a government day. If we had the unanimous consent of the house to deal with it tomorrow we might be prepared to consider it, but we have made engagements for Thursday and we should like to have the bill sent over to the other place.

Mr. Green: Have they not adjourned until Tuesday of next week?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, but we shall not be here on Thursday. I cannot be here on Friday. This is a bill in which both the minister and I have taken a considerable interest because we look upon it as an important piece of legislation. It seemed that the postponement was for the purpose of restating what has been stated many times, that we should not have this kind of legislation. If that is the only purpose I do not think we should be asked to change our plans unless there is some serious ground for doing so. Tomorrow may be the last private members' day, and I would not care to ask to take it from them. In these circumstances I think we have heard everything that could be said on either side, and we would not be any further advanced by postponing it another day.

Mr. Church: It would be far better if the government consented to adjourn the debate until tomorrow at three o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Church: If not I shall continue my remarks.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the hon. member for Broadview that that question has been decided.

Mr. Church: I should like to make a few remarks. Under the rules of the house I am within my rights to speak until six o'clock, but I do not wish to take advantage of the government.

Mr. St. Laurent: We shall listen with much pleasure to the hon. member if he chooses to speak until six o'clock.

Mr. Church: All right, then. I sent my papers to the office. Under the rules of the house I am within my rights in saying something on this bill for twenty-five minutes in order to give hon. members a chance to come back. I cannot understand the necessity for this bill in view of the matters which I enumerated the other day as being primary. There are certain other matters which I referred to the other day which are secondary. The matters to which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) referred the other day are secondary. They are interwoven with different matters that have been placed on the order paper and were discussed during the election. What mandate have I, representing a constituency, to agree to this legislation? It was not discussed during the election. I never heard of its being discussed in the Toronto district. The Prime Minister visited our city. He got a very great reception, and I was very pleased to see it. In no part of the country did he get a better reception. That was owing to the fact that he had been a great lawyer, a great family man and a great citizen, and had done a great deal for the people of this country as a private citizen long before he came to this house.

I now wish to say one or two things about certain matters that have come up in the debate. I never could understand the rush regarding this bill when one considers the other urgent matters which are before us. This matter is only secondary. I named the secondary matters the other day. I do not wish to name them again or to refer to any textbook. The intention seems to be to rush this particular proposal quickly through the house. That is the whole idea behind it. Why the necessity for that action? We might be a little more sportsmanlike in this house, and let the people who are not here return to deal with it. We might postpone it for at least twenty-four hours to give them a chance to come here.

With regard to the bill itself may I say, as I said the other day, I can find very little legal principle in it. The principle of the bill seems to be coercion. It is very largely a coercion bill because it is not founded on the pact made at confederation. You are going to change the whole legal system of this country in the twinkling of an eye without consulting anybody. For that reason I proposed that for bills of this description we should have a legal committee to which they could be referred. Nobody ever heard of this bill back in the constituencies. Today I received two letters from two high court judges out on circuit. They wanted to know whether I could send them a copy of the bill and of the debate that had taken place so far. I did so this morning. They are out on circuit and they are trying important cases in various parts of the country. I have no way of letting them know without communicating with them.

Then there is the Canadian Bar Association. They had a meeting out in Calgary. They asked to have this legislation postponed. I cannot see the necessity for all the rush in connection with this bill. I cannot see the necessity for it apart from the basic fact that there are a lot of other proposals on the order paper. Under the rule of anticipation I cannot refer to them now and I do not intend to, but they are only secondary as well. We have grave questions facing us. We may be invaded. We do not know who is to come here in the next few days if we are to believe the reports which we get from Washington and from Britain about the present danger in the Pacific, our back door. We do not know whether we are to be here very long.

I wish to call hon. members' attention to some important matters which should be dealt with at the present time. The matter to which we are now giving attention and such matters as the governor general, the flag, the anthem and the hallelujah chorus, are all secondary matters. We have had a hallelujah chorus on this bill. All these things could very well wait over. We have had nothing but hallelujah in here ever since the session opened. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice have been singing the hallelujah chorus. If they went out and hired a concert hall they could make their fortunes as musicians.

In the first place I fail to see the urgency of this bill. What is the need for all the rush? The bar association expressed themselves at Calgary. I hold their resolution in my hand. Members of the bar of all Canada took part in that meeting. Nobody is a better lawyer than my friend the Speaker of the House of Commons. He has been a leading lawyer and soldier, and a good citizen, and all hon. members have been unanimous in expressing their pleasure at his being here.

The resolution adopted at the convention of the Canadian Bar Association dealing with the abolition of appeals to the privy council states:

Whereas the government of Canada has announced its intention to introduce legislation at the next session of the parliament of Canada, providing for the abolition of appeals to the privy council and making the Supreme Court of Canada our final court of appeal in all matters.

Be it resolved—

And here is the resolution:

—that the Canadian Bar Association, without expressing any view as to the wisdom or otherwise of the proposed abolition, is of the opinion:

(i) That any bill for the abolition of the privy council appeal should contain the necessary provisions as to the organization and jurisdiction of the supreme court and the system by which its judges will be appointed.

That sufficient time be given before the statute is enacted to permit the public—

"The public"?—they have never had one minute's consideration. I have never heard this discussed in the Toronto district by a single person, in the municipal, provincial or federal sphere. I doubt if there is a member from the Toronto district who has discussed this bill with his constituents. Yet we are asked to accept it today, holus-bolus, without knowing what it is all about. The resolution states:

That sufficient time be given before the statute is enacted to permit the public to give consideration, both as to the question whether the abolition of the appeal to the privy council should take place and to the constitution and powers of the court that may replace it and also to the effect which the abolition may have upon provincial and minority rights.

That is correct. And then it continues:

(ii) If, as and when the appeal should be abolished, it is the opinion of this association as at present advised:

(a) that the supreme court should consist of nine judges;

(b) that a quorum of the court should be five judges;

(c) that it should sit always with an odd number of judges present;

They are going to be an odd lot, if we adopt this bill. And we will be an odd lot of members of the House of Commons if we swallow it holus-bolus. It continues:

(d) that there should be no change in the present practice of the court, under which each member is free to give reasons for his judgment;

That may be all right. With many people, "I agree" is a popular phrase. "We agree" would be an unpopular phrase if we, in the high court of parliament, were to sit here and do nothing about this bill. To swallow it is just a loss of time. We are supposed to be the highest court in the land, but very often this is the forgotten branch of the legislature. Then the resolution continues:

(e) that the court should continue to sit at Ottawa only;

I do not agree with that paragraph. The judicial committee of the privy council sits in London only because that is the centre of the empire. As a matter of actual fact, it could hardly be classified as a court, because they do not wear gowns, and they meet in an ordinary room. I know there are many people who would not agree to the proposed court sitting always in Ottawa. We realize of course that the judicial committee sits in London because that is the central point between east and west, and stands as one of the reasons why the court is not itinerant. It could well come to Ottawa, or go to Australia, New Zealand or South Africa if it so chose. The resolution continues:

(f) that the salaries of the judges of the court should be substantially increased so as to make such salaries commensurate with the responsibilities of the office, with an appropriate additional amount to the chief justice;

I see no reason why we should spend as much money on eleven million people as is spent at Washington for one hundred and thirty million people. I have criticized that practice before, and have pointed out that too often we follow the United States.

I do believe however that the salaries of some of the judges in the trial courts throughout the province might very well be increased, particularly when they are doing circuit work. A man cannot afford to have a house, but most of them are keeping their homes. I believe there was a rule at one time—and

Mr. Speaker may know more about this than I do—whereby judges of the court of appeal had to be residents of Toronto. I understand one of the great judges who came from the native city of Mr. Speaker proposed remaining in his own home town. It is very difficult to get housing accommodation in Toronto now; and that which is available costs about three times what it is worth.

I believe that the judges at Osgoode Hall have to have their homes in Toronto, and that it has been difficult for some of the new judges to get accommodation—even at three times the price. For five or six months of the year the trial judges are out on circuit throughout the province. They cannot be home with their wives and families for weeks on end. We have twelve judges in the trial division, and some of them are very tired of the accommodation they are able to get in hotels, and all that kind of thing. We should make provision for them accordingly.

Then, the next paragraph states:

(g) that the rule of stare decisis ought to continue to be applied with respect to past decisions of the court, as well as with respect to past decisions of the judicial committee.

This is a rule of doctrine. An opinion was expressed not long ago by a prominent lawyer in Toronto, who quoted an Oxford professor who used these words:

No nation conscious of its own greatness and realizing of what national greatness consists can afford to do without the highly cultured citizen who is a vital power in civic and state affairs or the trained scholar whose function it is to keep up the quality and standard of culture.

And this lawyer goes on to say:

If the judicial committee of the privy council is no longer to be one of our courts of appeal the doctrine of stare decisis should be retained and its judgments remain precedents for all time.

That is what this Oxford professor has to say, and I believe there is much to be said for that principle. So far as possible, as a high court of parliament we should base our decisions on that doctrine. Let me say this about the bill which is now before us for third reading. I have before me a textbook. Hon. members are aware that the recent decision of the privy council is based on the Statute of Westminster. That is where this bill had its beginning; it started with the Statute of Westminster. This book is entitled "The Statute of Westminster and Dominion Status". For 99 pages it deals with the dominion status in 1926. In that section it deals with Ontario and Quebec, the two original provinces, and reference is made to the maritimes and the status of the dominion generally. It then goes on to refer to the Irish Free State, New Zealand, Australia and other parts of the British empire. It calls attention to the fact that the process of appeals to the privy council was based upon a contract.

When Mr. Ferguson was premier of Ontario he objected to the suggestion that appeals to the privy council be abolished and he directed attention to the debates on this matter which had taken place since confederation. He said that there was no doubt that a contract had been made by the two original provinces and the same principle had been applied to the maritimes where objections had been raised during the war to the legal status. He went on to say that the procedure of amending the constitution should be accepted by the province of Ontario.

Ontario was against abolishing appeals to the privy council and they prepared a brief which was placed before the cabinet here in Ottawa. That brief was addressed to a very learned attorney general who was minister of justice. I referred to three or four of them the other day. The Prime Minister was about to leave to attend an imperial conference and this brief was presented in connection with abolishing appeals to the privy council. Mr. Howard Ferguson prepared this brief while he was premier of Ontario. That brief states:

—that no restatement of the procedure for amending the constitution of Canada can be accepted by the province of Ontario that does not fully and frankly acknowledge the right of all the provinces to be consulted and to become parties to the decision arrived at. Quebec and all the other provinces proved to be in agreement with these views. In consequence it was necessary for the Canadian delegation at the imperial conference of 1930 to ask that, in effect, the whole question of the repeal of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, in its application to Canada, should be left in suspense until the views of the provinces on the matter could be obtained.

Mr. Ferguson was quite correct and the reference to the Dominion of Canada and to the provinces of Canada was therefore deleted from the proposed clause, as it appeared in the schedule drawn up by the conference with a specific reference to Australia and New Zealand only. It was stated that a section dealing exclusively with the Canadian position would be inserted after the representations of the provinces had received consideration. At the same time the conference deemed it advisable to place on record that the sections of the statute relating to the Colonial Laws Validity Act should be so drafted as not to extend to Canada unless the statute was enacted in response to such requests as are appropriate to an amendment of the British North America Act. It was also deemed desirable to place on record the view that the sections should not subsequently be extended to Canada except by an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom enacted in response to such requests as are appropriate to an amendment of the British North America Act.

The conference of federal and provincial governments was held in Canada in April 1931, to consider this whole question of appeals to the privy council and of consulting the provinces thereon. The late Lord Bennett was then Prime Minister of the dominion. All the provinces were present at that conference which was held here in Ottawa, including the great provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

As it is six o'clock I should like to move the adjournment of the debate until tomorrow at three o'clock.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think the debate needs to be adjourned, as it is six o'clock and the house is taking recess. At eight o'clock the house will consider public and private bills, but as soon as they are disposed of the house will continue with its regular business and the hon. gentleman may resume his speech.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

CONTROL OF SMOKE AND SOOT FROM ROUNDHOUSES

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 7, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is similar to one I introduced last session but which, owing to the dissolution of the 20th parliament it did not come up for second reading. This bill differs in one respect, in that it merely requires the permanent installations of the railway companies to comply with local smoke abatement by-laws. I have amended the bill in this regard following some conversations I had with railway officials when the bill was in a rather more specific form. From time to time both railway companies have said to me that to impose upon them some specific apparatus or some specific smoke abatement regulations would be unfair when industries, ships and other smoke producers are permitted to pollute the air without abatement. Therefore this bill would add paragraph (1) to section 287 of the Railway Act, as follows:

(1) requiring all roundhouses and other permanent installations to comply with any municipal by-law of any urban municipality regulating the emission of smoke or soot into the atmosphere but such orders and regulations shall not apply to locomotives in motion;

So in this amendment we merely seek to abate the nuisance of smoke produced by railway roundhouses. The problem to be solved is this. Coal-burning locomotives have to be serviced regularly. This servicing requires that steam pressure be maintained in the boilers; and when major repairs are to be made and the fire is drawn, consequently the fire has to be relit. These operations result in inefficient combustion of the fuel, which in turn produces smoke, soot or smog. I want to point out that the production of smoke now is a sign of inefficiency. In the old days we would say that smoking chimneys were the sign of a hardworking, industrial community. Today a smoking chimney is a sign of waste. But owing to the requirements in connection with fueling and servicing locomotives this problem does arise and, with the exception of some cases where special apparatus has been installed, these roundhouses do emit smoke or smog into the atmosphere, which unquestionably is a serious discomfort to those living in the vicinity.

Now we come to the responsibility of the various authorities concerned. It would be unfair to ask a railway company to make a roundhouse comply with certain regulations, unless in order to protect the residents the municipality had enacted an enforceable anti-smoke bylaw. So in order to prevent discrimination against the railway companies I have drawn the bill so that it merely asks roundhouses to comply with the regulations which have been worked out for smoke abatement and which apply to all other industries in the district.

The specific instance with which I wish to deal is the roundhouse in my own constituency, the main roundhouse of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in what are known as the Lambton yards, where nearly all the locomotives are serviced for that company in the Toronto area. There are other roundhouses in downtown Toronto, but the one in the Lambton yards is located in an area containing other industries, all of which have installed smoke abatement equipment, so they are not a real menace to the residents of that community. The only menace is this railway roundhouse. It may interest hon. members to learn that the precipitation in tons of soot per acre per year is said to be greater there than in any other city in Canada or the United States, with two exceptions. As a matter of fact a great part of central York township is more intensely sullied by smoke than any other area on this continent. It is infinitely worse than the city of Pittsburgh where a great deal of this remedial machinery has been installed. So we come to the inevitable conclusion that it is not necessary for a roundhouse to emit smoke in such great quantities, as is the case in the Lambton yards.

There are several roundhouses in this metropolitan area. One roundhouse in the city of Toronto has installed what is known as a steam-generating plant. The locomotives enter this roundhouse and are serviced by means of this permanent steam-generating plant which has a smoke abatement apparatus installed on it. This roundhouse is not a menace to the residents situated near it. When I introduced this bill, it was suggested that the cost of installing such a system would not be worth while. That is merely an opinion, Mr. Speaker. I have not received adequate data to support that statement, nor have I received adequate data to support the suggestion that this steam plant would cost approximately $200,000.

We come to the next point, and that is that the railway companies are converting to diesel locomotives, certainly for switching purposes. In Toronto, I believe the switching locomotives are now almost completely dieselized. This is an improvement but, at the same time, the main line locomotives still burn coal. It is these main line locomotives which cause most of the smoke and soot in the area of which I complain.

Leaving my own constituency and turning to Ottawa, I might say that the other day I noticed a report in the press concerning the enforcement of the Ottawa municipal smoke bylaw. It was stated prosecutions would be launched unless the users of coal-burning equipment complied with the regulations. Unless some amendment such as this is written into the Railway Act, that would mean that other users of coal in Ottawa would be proscribed by the municipal regulations but the roundhouse in Ottawa west would be permitted to emit as much smoke as it desired.

At this point I should like to mention the regulations concerning the emission of smoke by roundhouses. Those regulations require that roundhouses may emit smoke of no greater density than Ringleman's density chart No. 3 for a period of ten minutes per hour. Reading Ringleman's density chart, Mr. Speaker, is something akin to a Philadelphia lawyer deciding what is hard and what is soft. It is a card with a hole in it through which one looks, and around the edges of which are varying degrees of black. I doubt very much whether any two people, or a court of law for that matter, could agree upon what was density 3, density 2 or density 4. Density 5 is almost completely opaque.

I believe that these regulations were written about 1908. In my opinion, they are obsolete. Modern technological progress in smoke abatement requires that something new and better be worked out to protect residents near roundhouses.

It has been suggested that municipal enforcement officers should judge the smoke emitted by the roundhouses in the same manner as they judge the smoke emitted from an industrial plant. Any appeal would be to the board of transport commissioners, as in all other cases under the Railway Act. I had hoped, and I still hope, that the subject matter of this bill might be sent to the railway committee. A good deal of technical information, Mr. Speaker, must be brought forward before a solution to this problem can be found. It would only be fair to allow the railway committee to hear testimony from both sides concerning this matter. I also realize there are always some people who will complain no matter what progress is made.

Let me say this, Mr. Speaker. In the area of which I speak not only is it impossible to put out washing at any time on any day of the week, but even in the hottest weather windows must be kept closed because of the constant seepage of soot under doors and windows, and through crevices. It makes living an intolerable burden to many of the people in that district. Furthermore, even a considerable distance from this roundhouse, if one digs down into the soil one finds a layer of soot and coal dust sometimes more than an inch thick. The houses are black and the whole life of the community is blighted by this smoke.

I am appealing to the house and to the government, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of these people. I am appealing to have this problem brought before a tribunal where those who oppose any improvement, as well as those who actually suffer from the present situation, can be heard.

This is something that affects the lives of many thousands of people in the city of Toronto and the county of York. It is a question to which there is a solution; it is a difficulty which can be and is being solved by the installation of steam-generating equipment and by other less costly means. It is a problem which can be solved if there is the willingness to solve it. On the one side of the equation there is the cost of putting in this smoke-abating equipment; on the other side of the equation is the life, health and comfort of thousands of individuals. I believe that I speak and plead the case for all those who have to put up with this everlasting smoke and soot which emanates from the roundhouse that I particularly complain of.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I represent a district which is probably suffering more from smoke and soot than any other residential district in Canada. I refer to the lower section of ward 1, south of Queen street, in which lies the right of way of the C.N.R. over the Don river. It is a soldiers' district that I represent. There are a large number of homes there. During the heat wave the temperatures reached 95, 97 and 98 degrees Fahrenheit at night. Some of the soldiers are living in hovels not fit to live in. Because of the smoke, soot, oil and other things that escape from these engines the mothers must shut the windows at night.

In the first place, we have none of these diesel engines, as far as I can see, and I have looked out the window many times at the place where I live. They are shunting backwards and forwards through this district, assembling cars of all descriptions, making up trains and all that kind of thing. These soldiers' children suffer at night, during the heat. I remember that I received complaints from physicians in the district. They were complaining about the children getting throat trouble, asthma, and bronchitis, and that their lungs, when examined, are found to be filled with this material that escapes from these engines. Not only that, but boats on the route to St. Catharines, and others that put out from the east end of Toronto bay emit the same thing, with the result that the mothers are complaining to me. I am sorry that I have not the letters with me, so that I might read one or two of them.

I do not wish to speak for more than four or five minutes because I think that the hon. member who introduced the bill has covered the points well and deserves a great deal of credit for bringing the bill forward.

Hon. members will notice what the Railway Act provides. They will notice the amendments which have been made. They started long before I was in the house. The Railway Act is chapter 170 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927. Amendments were made in 1928, 1929, 1930, 1932-33, 1938, 1946, 1947 and 1947-48. That is the general Railway Act. The board is now known as the board of transport commissioners; it used to be known as the board of railway commissioners. I may say that I have had some correspondence with the present board about this particular matter and about these soldiers' families, as well as with the housing authorities and others. Some of these families are living in the basement, below the ground, in hovels not fit for habitation. I have complained to the health department and to the city hall about it, but we can get no relief. What is to become of these children?

I have seen these children dragged off the street at night so that they might be put to bed, and when they go to bed they must endure these conditions; and the mothers are suffering intolerable conditions. The viaduct also passes through this district, and it is not a fit place of habitation for children. I am sorry that nothing is done for them. I am tired of making these complaints. I have made them right along ever since I have been a member representing the constituency of Broadview in the city of Toronto. I have complained before about this evil which exists.

Three physicians wrote me letters in which they complained about the throat trouble which they have encountered. These poor children have no place to play except in the street. Some of them have been knocked down by hit-and-run drivers. I know of a street—I think it is called Morse street; it is below Queen street—where the pavements were moved and so forth, and where little children have been knocked down and killed; but the authorities could not find who did it.

One section of the Railway Act is to the effect that the board of transport commissioners, as they are now called, must of their own volition look into these matters. I ask hon. members to mark those words "of their own volition." They have engineers and officials, and many other people. I noticed in the House of Commons the other day we had an increase in the estimates for the board of transport commissioners. As I said the other day, we have a most able chairman now in Mr. Justice Archibald, but he has been too busy with the freight rate increases to give consideration to these matters. I hope that the government and particularly the minister responsible for housing and the health department will be able to do something in the matter. Nothing affects health more than this condition. As a result of this nuisance we have some tubercular children. I speak from what I know to be true.

I wish the hon. gentleman who introduced this bill every success. I know his district out there in York West. I know they are without a steam suburban service, and I know how they are suffering. I have seen some of the trains they have. I believe the hon. gentleman deserves a great deal of credit for bringing this bill forward.

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds): Anyone who has come into Toronto from lake Ontario will I think agree that the smoke menace in that city is a serious one. From lake Ontario you can see the smoke of Toronto long before you can make out the shore line. But I believe there is a far worse menace with regard to smoke than railway roundhouses. The town in which I live, Brockville, is a large terminal of the Canadian National Railways and as such naturally we have servicing of locomotives. There is naturally a certain amount of smoke that comes from the roundhouses and from the repair shops where those locomotives are being serviced. If one is on the river and looks towards the shore, one can see smoke coming up, but it is largely dissipated in the air. There are also in the town factories which emit a certain amount of smoke, although there is a town bylaw which keeps that condition fairly well under control. But we have a smoke menace far worse than the roundhouse; it is the uncontrolled smoke of lake steamers.

Anyone who lives along the waterways of the great lakes system will know what I mean. The smoke from one steamer is greater in volume than the smoke coming out of all the locomotives that are being serviced and from all the factories in Brockville. I say that without fear of contradiction, and anyone who has seen that will know that I know whereof I speak. It is a serious menace. It is detrimental to the housewife who has to put out her washing. Her whole morning's wash can be spoiled by one ship going by. The smoke seeps into the houses. The type of fuel these steamers burn must be the very lowest type of bituminous fuel. It infiltrates into everything, particularly when traffic is very heavy, as it was yesterday on the St. Lawrence. The whole atmosphere is permeated. It lies all along the shore line. You cannot see very far. I believe the modern terminology for it is smog, smudgy fog. I feel that steps must be taken by the railway committee to see that some solution is arrived at to stop this serious polluting of our atmosphere. We have pollution of water and we have pollution of atmosphere. I am firmly of the opinion that, of the two, pollution of the atmosphere is worse, because you can always filter and chlorinate the water; but the poor human beings are compelled to stand there and breathe the atmosphere. Doctors have told me that there are many serious detrimental gases and acids that we absorb through breathing this contaminated air.

The time has definitely arrived when something concrete must be brought before the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada to enforce not only a cleaning up of smoke emanating from roundhouses but more particularly from the lake steamers which apparently do not wish to co-operate with the public in abolishing the smoke nuisance.

Mr. A. J. P. Cameron (High Park): I should like to add to the observations of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson), the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford). I have a considerable personal knowledge of the situation with which the hon. member for York West dealt so adequately. I have lived in the part of Toronto known as West Toronto for many years. Only very recently, in fact not until after June 27, did anyone think it was worth while asking my opinion as to what should be done to alleviate the smoke nuisance, but I have a personal knowledge of it. As a matter of fact it is public knowledge in West York and in the High Park riding that the St. Clair-Runnymede section has for many years suffered from this particular condition. I believe the Canadian Pacific Railway roundhouse was built in 1912. When the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) starts to take my speech apart I hope he will forgive me if I have made any misstatements of fact because it was only on Sunday afternoon that I got the information which I now intend to give to the house.

In 1912 a roundhouse was built at the corner of St. Clair avenue and Runnymede road. It has 33 smokestacks disseminating smoke in the neighbourhood, and it operates with an impartial hand. Smoke falls on the Liberals, Conservatives and C.C.F. impartially and alike. It is very bad. In that particular section as far back as 1912, sir, I well recall that no houses were built in that area because of the smoke hazard. That is quite evident from the way the neighbourhood developed. Up until after the first great war no one built much in the area. It was known as the Scarlet Plains. As boys we went there to play cops and robbers. Our mothers asked us to hurry home because after dark it was not considered safe. There was very little habitation there. South of the tracks that same condition persisted. No one bothered to build a house there. Anyone who owned property there just simply let it stand. If you will search the registry office in Toronto you will find that most of the titles there are tax deed titles. No one wanted it. The reason was the smoke which was disseminated over this entire area. It never affected me because fortunately I lived in a part of west Toronto which was far distant from the railroad. Occasionally when we would have a northeast wind I would hear my mother complaining about the fact that she had to take her washing in. There is a situation here which should be brought to the attention of this house.

After the first war there was a considerable development, and criticism of what the railroads were doing began to become vocal. After and during the second world war a great many houses were built. This is serviced land. I would assume that there are many thousands of people now living in that area, who have good homes, and who are suffering from this menace. That the situation can be corrected is evident from the information which has been given to me. I understand that in the city of Toronto there are two other roundhouses: one known as the John street roundhouse and the other known as the Spadina avenue roundhouse. The John street roundhouse is operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway. There the engines are oil fired. Steam pressure is available so that the engines do not have to stay in the roundhouse until they are completely ready for service. They can go out under their own pressure to the water tank and then go about their business. In that way smoke is disseminated and does not become a hazard in only one localized area.

At the Spadina avenue roundhouse they have overcome the difficulty to an extent in this way. They have built one central smokestack and whenever an engine is being serviced the smoke from that particular engine is funnelled by fans into this one central smokestack and carried high up in the air and is given a chance to dissipate itself. I am informed that the Canadian Pacific Railway claim that they are doing everything within their power to alleviate the situation. They refer to the fact that they have diesel engines in Toronto and they are dieselizing their system. As I understand it, there are 19 diesel engines in Toronto, 10 of which operate out of the Lambton roundhouse. There are 80 coal-burning engines which are serviced from the Lambton roundhouse. These engines are disseminating their smoke over the entire area. If, Mr. Speaker, you had the time, the opportunity and the inclination to visit that district you would see, as the hon. member for York West has pointed out so strikingly, smoke-blackened houses. They have built up an entire new area there, and I wish to support most strongly the demand which the hon. member for York West has made to have the situation alleviated. Whether it should be done by the particular method which he has suggested in his bill or whether it should be done by amendment to the Railway Act I do not know. I have not gone into that particularly, but I do suggest to the Minister of Transport that he give this his earnest consideration. There is a real problem to be solved. The city of Toronto, the township of York and the ratepayers associations of St. Clair avenue and Maybank have organized themselves over the years, and have acquired a great deal of information which the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) has given the house tonight.

These people are greatly concerned about the depreciation in value of their properties. If the prices of real estate do decrease, then those people are going to feel the effect of that process more than the people who live in areas more fortunately situated from the standpoint of smoke nuisance.

This is one of the best areas in the township of York. The smoke nuisance not only affects the residents of York West, but has dissipated itself over into the constituency of High Park—and we want no more of it. I would ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to give this matter his earnest consideration, and if possible to see that something is done. I would ask, too, that the bill be referred to the railway committee, at which time it could be studied, where representations could be made, evidence heard from both sides, and justice done.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up much time in what I have to say, in the hope that this bill may be dealt with this evening. I should like to add my few words to the excellent contributions made by hon. members on both sides of the house concerning smoke nuisance. I should imagine that this has become more of a problem in those places where population has become more concentrated, and where the urban characteristics of a community have become dominant.

In the southern section as well as some other sections of the county of Peel, which I have the honour to represent, there is a growing menace from smoke. For that reason I should like to associate myself with what has been said by hon. members this evening, and I would seek from the minister some means of redress. He must be in great difficulty from time to time, because if he is not receiving complaints about whistling, he is receiving them about smoke.

We are most anxious to have something done concerning this nuisance, and I hope the minister will have some solution to offer. I trust that he may give us some assurance that the government will support the action proposed by the hon. member for York West. So that we may not be accused of talking the bill out, I shall say nothing further at this time.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson), who has introduced this bill, will pardon me if I do not follow him in his argumentation of the case. I do feel however I should commend him upon bringing forward this bill for a second time, and also those who have contributed to the discussion.

There can be no doubt that the emission of smoke from roundhouses is a matter of considerable anxiety to the railways and also to the board of transport commissioners. It is a great nuisance, I am sure, to those people who, as the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) has pointed out, live in concentrated centres. There is no doubt, too, that it is not always easy to find a remedy for a situation, be it as intolerable as the hon. member has described it, or as it has been described by several hon. members who have spoken.

I doubt whether the solution proposed by the hon. member is the right one. However, before dealing with that I believe the house should know something about what has been done and what is now being done by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada and by the railways to do away with some of the difficulties which arise through smoke emission from roundhouses, and also because of the nuisance in general.

For at least a year the board of transport commissioners has been giving this problem careful and serious attention. In the first place they saw to it that full-time inspectors were appointed. These inspectors were charged with the responsibility of studying the smoke nuisance, interviewing employees, giving instructions, and suggesting how they might improve the situation in roundhouses and in handling locomotives generating steam. The reports of these employees come to the board from time to time; they are examined, and by reason of them some improvements are made by the railways.

The second step taken by the board of transport commissioners was to see to it that the railway companies installed special equipment on steam switching locomotives for the purpose of abating smoke. A recent check by the board discloses that all steam yard engines working in the Toronto territory have now been equipped with what are known as over-fire jets for the purpose of eliminating complaints in connection with smoke from locomotives.

Then, in the last few years the railways have been doing a tremendous job by way of diesel operations. I shall deal with the city of Toronto in a moment, but I think I should outline the situation generally. There are several kinds of diesel locomotives. First there is the diesel which operates the freight train which moves from one end of the country to the other. Then, there is the diesel locomotive which pulls the passenger train; and there is the diesel in which I should think at the moment the house is particularly interested, namely the one which does the switching. The more diesels the railways can purchase and employ on switching operations, the more can the nuisance from smoke and soot be abated.

Ten years ago there was practically no utilization of diesel engines. Five years ago the position was a little better. As I said a moment ago, in the last few years the railways have been doing an excellent job in the way of purchase of diesels. For instance, the number of diesel road locomotives at present in use in Canada totals 36. Six of these are operated by the Canadian National Railways, and 30 by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The number of diesel switching locomotives at present in use in Canada stands at 172, and as I said a moment ago that is the class or kind in which the house is more interested at the moment.

Mr. Graydon: That is for both railways?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, for both. Seventy-three of those are operated by the Canadian National Railways and 99 by the Canadian Pacific. The number of electric locomotives at present in use in Canada stands at 28, of which number 18 are operated by the Canadian National and 10 by the Canadian Pacific. There are at present 35 diesel switching locomotives being used in Toronto, 16 of which are operated by the Canadian National and 19 by the Canadian Pacific. Since I am dealing with Toronto let me show the complete picture. In 1944 the Canadian National had no diesel switching locomotives in use in Toronto; the situation was unchanged in 1945. However they had 4 in 1946, 8 in 1947 and 10 in 1948. Up to September 30 of this year they have 16. I believe it will be recognized that the situation in Toronto is improving considerably.

The figures for the Canadian Pacific Railway indicate that in 1944 they had only 5 such locomotives, while in 1945 they had 10; 1946, 15; 1947, 18; 1948, 19; and the same number up to this date in 1949. So that there are 35 diesel switching locomotives now in operation in Toronto, 16 of which are Canadian National and 19 Canadian Pacific.

With the permission of the house I should like to place this complete table on Hansard, as it includes not only the number of diesel switching locomotives in Toronto but also similar information for Montreal.

Mr. Fraser: Are there any here in Ottawa?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, but I am not able to say how many.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave of the house to place the table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: Then, the table is as follows:

Re number of diesel switching locomotives in use in Toronto and Montreal—years 1944 to 1949—Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways.

Number of diesel switching locomotives in use in Toronto:

In use year ending	1944	1945	1946	1947	1948	1949 at Sept. 30
Canadian National Railways	0	0	4	8	10	16
Canadian Pacific Railway	5	10	15	18	19	19
Totals	5	10	19	26	29	35

Number of diesel switching locomotives in use in Montreal:

In use year ending	1944	1945	1946	1947	1948	1949 at Sept. 30
Canadian National Railways	7	8	7	9	13	18
Canadian Pacific Railway	4	9	13	16	16	21
Totals	11	17	20	25	29	39

Continuing with the statement I was making a moment ago, the number of diesel switching locomotives presently on order but not delivered is 11, all of them being on order by the Canadian National Railways. The number of diesel road locomotives presently on order by the Canadian Pacific but not delivered is 61. As I stated the other night on my estimates, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have announced as their policy that from now on they will purchase no more steam locomotives, that all their locomotives will be diesel. The Canadian National Railways have indicated that they intend to follow the same policy.

I think most of us recently had the good fortune to see the "Train of Tomorrow," when we learned something of the operation of diesel locomotives. We know that General Motors Corporation intend to establish a new diesel plant at London, Ontario. I think the house will agree that that in itself is significant and indicative of the intention of the railroads to use diesel locomotives in the future.

Before going any further I cannot resist telling the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) that I think he should try to agree with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). The hon. member for Broadview has been agitating for a suburban steam locomotive service for the city of Toronto, and has been for many years. At present I believe he has questions on the order paper in connection with that very thing. Now the hon. member for York West says that such equipment should no longer be used and to my great surprise the hon. member for Broadview got up this evening to support him. I cannot resist making that comment and I hope my hon. friend will understand that it is not made with the least ill will. I want to say just one word about the bill, which requires that the board of transport commissioners shall make orders and regulations:

(1) requiring all roundhouses and other permanent installations to comply with any municipal by-law of any urban municipality regulating the emission of smoke or soot into the atmosphere but such orders and regulations shall not apply to locomotives in motion;

I am informed that in order to install devices to completely eliminate smoke in the roundhouses of the larger centres only would cost a minimum of $24,000,000, and that is for the Canadian Pacific alone. I am informed also that to install these in other centres which would require them from time to time would cost about $42,000,000. Assuming the same cost for the Canadian National Railways, it would mean a total of $84,000,000. A diesel switcher costs $110,000, per unit, while a diesel road locomotive costs about $250,000 per unit. How many diesel switchers do hon. members think would be purchased if installations such as these had to be placed on the roundhouses, even in Toronto alone?

I wanted to deal with the legality of this bill. I do not think it is ultra vires, although I do feel it comes rather close to the line. However, I submit that it is bad legislation because it would tell the board of transport commissioners, who have jurisdiction in matters of this kind, that they must comply with the bylaws of municipalities. Supposing a municipality passed a bylaw providing that roundhouses should not emit smoke from five a.m. until eleven a.m. or possibly noon, the time during which railroads are busiest. There would be nothing in this bill to stop a municipality from acting in such a manner. If they did it would interfere with the efficient operation of the railroad and accordingly would not be a good thing for them.

While this legislation might not be ultra vires, I submit that it certainly is not good legislation. It is the type of legislation known as legislation by adoption. In other words, we would be setting up a board to do certain things and then putting a clamp on it by saying that it must not do other things unless a municipal corporation says thus and so.

Under these circumstances I appeal to the house not to approve of this bill and not to send it to the railway committee. I ask this because of the last reason I have given and more particularly because of the great progress that has been made by the railroads in purchasing and operating more and more diesel locomotives, on both switching and line operations. For these reasons I must state that the government is not prepared to accept this bill.

Motion (Mr. Adamson) negatived on division.

SUPREME COURT ACT

VARIOUS AMENDMENTS—ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the third reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I wish to continue for a few moments the remarks I was making when the house rose at six o'clock. In conclusion I should like to point out certain features about this legislation. The bill now before us for third reading is one of those matters which should be looked into further. I remember what the supporters of the bill have said, but in my opinion the proposals should be looked into further. I had my hand on some details a moment ago but I cannot find them.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) wants to rush this bill through for some reason best known to himself. The proposals which I refer to are set out in the bill. As I have said before, Canada is not going to be talked out of the British empire. If she was going to be talked out of the British empire, she would have been talked out long ago. She will have to be fought out of the British empire.

I think we all remember what happened back in the thirties. Those were dark days for Canada, but the mother country came to our rescue with preferential treatment which brought about increased trade. If we adopt this proposal we are going to lose all that. We all know that Mr. Fielding once advised the adoption of preferences, and the six cent preference on wheat was adopted. There is no doubt that the Liberal party rounded it out and made a success of it. It all started away back in 1897 after Sir Wilfrid Laurier was prime minister. He gave the six cents per bushel on wheat. It took a long time to accomplish results and it was not until the thirties when there was a world depression that the prime minister of Great Britain and other prime ministers met here in Ottawa and adopted what were known as the Ottawa agreements. The man who was leader of the house then is now dead.

If you ask me, I think we are going a long way in this proposed bill. Why is it necessary to get it through tonight? Many government members are absent, together with members of other parties. Who is causing all this upset; who is responsible for this jumpy style of doing business in the House of Commons, when we have the bar association, the provinces, the attorneys general and others asking that the matter be given further consideration? We need men in this house like the late Clarke Wallace, Dalton McCarthy, and the late John Ross Robertson and others who were here years ago, who would forget all about the party system and think only of the country first, last and all the time. We need men of that stamp in this House of Commons today.

As I was saying before six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, we must go back a long way to get the history of this thing; but there will always be an England and there will always be an empire. This legislation is largely founded on the separatist doctrine, because that doctrine holds that the supreme court should be the ultimate court in Canada. In its issue of Monday, September 26, an important newspaper in Toronto had this to say:

> Canada cannot at present amend her own constitution or settle her own law cases in her own courts. "Badges of colonialism," exclaims the Minister of Justice. Mr. Garson is right; and right, too, in saying that these badges should be "stripped off."

Then they go on to name someone who they think should be governor general. Half a dozen names have been suggested for that post. One is the chief justice of Canada; another is a former prime minister; another is Malcolm MacDonald. If you look at the proposed bill you will see that it is in two sections, one dealing with what might be called statutory appeals and the other with appeals of grace. Where are we going now under 20th century Liberalism if we are going to take away from a private citizen the right to petition the king? We must not forget that notwithstanding this legislation he is still the king of Canada, as he is the king of New Zealand and the king of Australia. He cannot divide himself in two; he is still and always will be the king of Canada.

We have had the Magna Carta, the Bill of Rights, the Petition of Rights, and all the rest of those things. Every British subject, whether he lives in England, in Quebec, in Ontario, in the west, in New Zealand or Australia, has had the right to appeal to the foot of the throne with regard to his citizenship and also with regard to his property and civil rights and his liberty as a subject. Several distinguished men have occupied the position of minister of justice in this country. I have referred to Sir Allen Aylesworth, who was a brilliant lawyer; Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, who was minister of justice, attorney general and solicitor general, lieutenant governor of Quebec and chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada; Sir Lomer Gouin, and others. We have also had many outstanding men as attorneys general of the provinces.

In dealing with what has brought about separatism I referred to a brilliant textbook on the Statute of Westminster, and how it affected New Zealand, Australia, South Africa and the other dominions and crown colonies.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to inform the hon. member that he has exhausted his time.

Mr. Church: I could finish what I have to say in only three or four minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has now exceeded his time, and he may not continue except with the consent of the house.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, as a Canadian, as a Liberal, and as one who takes second place to no one in my loyalty to the British commonwealth, I strongly protest against the unjustifiable and unfounded claims being made that legislation of this type is in some way selling out Canada's interest in the commonwealth of nations. I would ask this house whether Canada, when it adopted its own Royal Canadian Navy, abandoned the British empire; whether Canada, when it adopted its own Royal Canadian Air Force, was abandoning the British empire; whether Canada, when it gradually learned to stand on its own feet, was abandoning the British empire. Or did we assist in maintaining the British empire and the British commonwealth of nations? I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if it is not a fact that because this country had learned to stand on its own feet and make its own decisions it has been able, during the recent war and since, by means of the Atlantic pact, to make a contribution not only to the British commonwealth but to the world at large of which Canada has no occasion to be ashamed. And I suggest that it is high time somebody expressed that view in this house.

With respect to this bill may I, as a new member who perhaps should not be raising his voice on this occasion at all, suggest that Canada had ample opportunity last June, and took advantage of that opportunity, to decide on the principle. I suggest also that this house has had ample opportunity during the past month, and particularly on the motion for second reading, to decide on the principle of the bill. I suggest that the house and the country have decided, that the bill has been considered clause by clause, and that both the house and the country would like us to finish this practically completed business and get on with the other business of parliament.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Church: I had a motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Church: I wanted to move the six months hoist, if I could find a seconder, or to recommit the bill to committee of the whole with instructions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion for third reading is carried.

Mr. Church: Surely you are going to put my motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Church: I said I had a motion which I handed in before six o'clock, if I could find a seconder, to give the bill the six months hoist or to recommit it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion has been declared adopted.

Mr. Church: You may railroad it through, but I can tell you that there will be an appeal. I rise to a point of order. When the Speaker was in the chair I handed him a motion, before you took the chair at six o'clock. I only want fair play; I do not want to break any rules; I respect the Chair. I wish to call to your attention the fact that I handed in a motion regarding this particular bill. I handed it to the Speaker and I handed it to you, sir, when you were chairman of the committee. I believe you saw it. I wish to object to this procedure because it is not fair. If we had men in the house now like N. Clarke Wallace, Dalton McCarthy and John Ross Robertson, they would have strongly opposed such a bill as this. I was not given time to read my motion to recommit the bill to the committee of the whole. I was to have a seconder, but had no opportunity to read the motion. I know the rules of this house as well as any man.

I am asking that the bill be sent back to the committee. You have ruled that out of order, and I wish to appeal from your ruling.

Mr. Fauteux: It is against the rules of the house to debate a question which has been settled. This bill has been passed by the house and it is against the rules to debate the matter now.

Mr. Church: We have a different Speaker now. On a point of order, I ask for the Speaker to preside. I think I am entitled to that. The bill has not been passed in accordance with the rules of the house. If all the members on our side of the house had been present today, there would have been a division on the principle of the bill. Is this bill going to be passed, signed, sealed and delivered? Under the rules of the house, I do not see how it could be because there has been no compliance with the rules. I wanted a recorded division. I am an old member of this house and I have not been treated in this manner before.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The rules have been followed and the bill has passed. The debate, therefore, is finished.

Motion (Mr. Garson) agreed to on division, and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. DONALD GORDON AS PRESIDENT OF CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) made an announcement of considerable importance. Briefly, I should like to make an observation or two about that announcement. In so far as that announcement contained news of the retirement of Mr. Vaughan from the presidency and chairmanship of the board of the Canadian National Railways, I think all members of the house would heartily join with the minister in the well-merited tribute he paid to that gentleman. However, the minister proceeded to announce the appointment of Mr. Donald Gordon to succeed Mr. Vaughan in the two offices of president and chairman of the board.

At the outset, I should like to make it quite clear that in these brief remarks I am speaking for myself, and I do not claim to speak for anyone else. Moreover, I do not wish anyone to construe anything I may say about the appointment as a personal reflection in any sense upon Mr. Donald Gordon. What I have to say concerns the principle at stake in the appointment. So far as Mr. Gordon is concerned, I respect him as a man of great ability, a man of vigour. I say, Mr. Speaker, that in the appointment which has been announced the government has done violence to an important principle, the principle that hard work and faithful service should be recognized within an organization by promotion.

These two positions are positions of great importance. I do not suppose there are half a dozen positions in the whole of this country that are more important than the positions which have been filled in the way indicated by the government today. As I said, the principle which in my submission has been violated is the principle that the office should be filled by promotion and that faithful service should be rewarded by promotion.

It ought to have been possible to fill these high offices by promotion within the executive organization of the Canadian National Railways. Was that impossible, Mr. Speaker? I say this: If it was found to be impossible then it is a reflection upon the administration of that great institution. In a great organization of that kind, those charged with executive responsibility should be seized at all times with the responsibility of bringing on men capable of assuming greater executive responsibility. If, in the view of the government, such a man was not available within that organization then I say he should have been. If such a man was not available, then there has been some failure. Personally, I am disposed to believe that there were men of proven executive ability within the Canadian National Railways who are capable of meeting the demands of these two high offices.

I recall to you, sir, that when Mr. Hungerford was appointed president of the Canadian National Railways, that appointment was hailed by the government because it represented the appointment of a man who had worked his way up within the system. Similarly, when Mr. Vaughan was appointed president, the same thing was said, and rightly said. Here was the evidence for all to see. The reward of the highest rung on the ladder within the Canadian National Railways organization was available to those who were prepared to work and give faithful and devoted service.

Mr. Pouliot: What about Sir Henry Thornton?

Mr. Fleming: What do we find here? We find an appointment has been made which, in my view, is going to be very damaging to the morale of the organization. It simply means that those who have been carrying the responsibility in the organization are being told by the actions of this government that the top rung of the ladder is closed. It is not open to them. It will not be open for some time, in view of the fact that Mr. Gordon is, I believe, still in his forties. This means that those who have reached executive rank in that organization and those who, in the ordinary course, might expect to reach executive rank within the next few years, find that there has been a limit placed on the steps in the ladder that may be attained by promotion within the system.

It is the boast of the railways in the United States, and it is based upon ample evidence, that within the railway system there is a career open to merit. You will find that boast made throughout the railways of the United States, time after time, as one man comes to the presidency or a position of leading executive importance. In one railway after another, you will find that the man has started on the lowest rung of the ladder in the railway system, whether as a section hand or train crew or any other position and has worked his way up until he has been rewarded with the highest executive position in the gift of the company—a career open to merit. And why should it not be so in Canada?

By the action of this government, those who had hoped there would be a career open to merit within the Canadian National Railways system, a career open right to the top, are now told that the career ends before the top rung of the ladder can be reached. That is one aspect of the principle, sir, involved in this appointment today. It is that principle to which violence has been done by the government.

The second aspect is that Mr. Gordon, with all his ability—and again I am stressing that I am not making any personal issue of this—is completely without experience in railroading. So far as I know, Mr. Gordon may not even have sought the office. I should like to tell the house, though, that a knowledge of railroading is not something that one can pick up in a month or two. I expect some hon. members of this house have had some experience in railroading. Over the past twenty years I have had considerable experience of a legal nature with railways, and I have had enough contact with them to know that the railway business is an exceedingly complicated one; it has many ramifications. The complexity of the business extends to its organization, its operations and to the manifold problems that railways face. A man without any experience at all in railroading has now been made chief executive officer of the Canadian National Railways.

The third aspect of the principle involved in this appointment is the question of how far the government is warranted in interfering with normal management and operation of a government-owned railway system. In my submission the Canadian National Railways system will function best if the government does not interfere with its management. If we are to have interference by government in the management of the railway, then the attempt of the Canadian National Railways to carry on efficiently will be bedevilled at every turn. I wish to pay this tribute to Mr. Vaughan. Throughout his tenure of office as president and chairman of the board, Mr. Vaughan sought to maintain that principle and to operate the system without interference of a political nature.

It is quite true that the statute under which this appointment has been made contemplates that the government should have a voice in the appointment. Section 10, subsection 1, of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1936, which is chapter 25 of the statutes of that year, provides as follows:

> The directors shall appoint, subject to the approval of the governor in council, a president of the national company who may be the chairman of the board of directors, or a person, other than one of the directors. The president, as such, shall hold office during the pleasure of the directors and, notwithstanding anything in this act, shall be paid by the national company such sum, salary or remuneration as the governor in council may approve.

It is clear that what the statute contemplates is that power of appointment should rest in the hands of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway Company, with a veto in the hands of the governor in council. It does not contemplate that the appointment of the president and chairman of the board should initiate with the government. With regard to the principle that I have submitted to the house as a desirable one to maintain, namely, that there should not be government interference in the operation of this railway system, I say to the house that great damage has been done today by the government. If this parliament really approves the principle of rewarding faithful service with promotion, then certainly we representing the people of Canada will wish to be an ideal employer as far as that may be possible. Representing the people of Canada as we do, we want to be the kind of employer who will be an example to other employers. In this government's action today, is there a worthy example to other employing organizations? I submit not. I submit that this is the kind of action that discourages people, when they see that the top jobs are not to be won by faithful service within the organization, when they see that these jobs go to people brought in from the outside by a government.

In my humble opinion there is far too much of this sort of thing throughout the government service generally, and it is going to be no help to the Canadian National Railways to see this sort of thing carried to the extent to which, in my submission, it is carried in the announcement made today, taking the plums and denying them to those who have worked faithfully within the service and who were legitimately entitled to feel that those plums were within their reach if they qualified within the fair rules of work. It is not simply a question of the effect on those who hold executive rank today; it is a question of the effect on the morale of every one right down to those on the lowest rung of the ladder in the whole Canadian National Railways system, when they see that this career is no longer one open to merit all the way through but is open to merit only until they advance so far, and that the plums at the top are not to be won by faithful service.

Whatever may be said about the merits of Mr. Donald Gordon as a capable man—and again I emphasize the fact that I am making no reflection on him personally; I am not making a personal issue of this with regard to Mr. Gordon; I would have the same thing to say with regard to any appointment the government might have made today of anybody who had not been drawn from within the Canadian National Railways service—I think there is at stake here a vital principle that this house ought to vindicate, and that this principle has been shamefully violated in the government's decision that has been reported.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): In answer to what has been said by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), I want to say that I noticed something that surprised me greatly. He has protested against the appointment of Mr. Donald Gordon as president and chairman of the Canadian National Railways; but in the whole of his speech there is only one man for whom he had praise, and it was precisely that same Mr. Donald Gordon. He protested against the appointment but he praised the man. I do not intend to discuss whether he was right or not; I am not in a position to pass judgment. I shall wait to see what happens. Then I will express my opinion about Mr. Gordon.

I deeply regret that my friend the hon. member for Eglinton, who is so well informed about everything that is being done in this country and about everything that is published in the press, has overlooked the fact that last week one Ottawa paper mentioned the possibility of the appointment of Mr. Donald Gordon. It was then that he, with his foresight, should have warned the government against such a step; he should have asked the government on the orders of the day: Is it true that Mr. Gordon is to be appointed to such an important post? If he had found that to be so, he would have roared like all the guns of the navy.

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pouliot: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: Will the hon. member indicate how that necessary warning might have been given on the orders of the day?

Mr. Pouliot: Oh, the hon. member could have asked the government a question as he often does.

Mr. Fleming: But not warn them.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Pouliot: Oh, no; first a question, before the warning, because it is important to be well informed before warning anyone. The hon. member could have asked the government, Is it true that Mr. Gordon will be appointed?

An hon. Member: And be told that it is a matter of government policy.

Mr. Pouliot: He might have been told: Yes, no, perhaps; or, it is none of your business. Whatever might have been the answer, he could have risen in protest.

An hon. Member: And been out of order.

Mr. Pouliot: He could rise on any occasion and serve the house with his warning and introduce all the roaring of the guns.

There is something else that struck me as surprising, and it is this. When my hon. friend was speaking, he was deaf to my interjection. He mentioned some of the past presidents of the Canadian National Railways. Mr. Hungerford was with the Canadian Northern. Mr. Vaughan was with the railway a long time. But the biggest of them all was Sir Henry Thornton. He was not brought up with the Canadian National Railways. He was born in the United States but had served on the English railways during the war and made quite a success of his job at the time.

Mr. Fleming: He was a railway man with a lot of experience.

Mr. Mitchell: Who chopped off his head?

Mr. Pouliot: If it is necessary to be a railway man to have experience in the matter, how can my hon. friend, a Toronto lawyer, speak about it with experience?

Mr. Fleming: I shall be glad to tell you sometime.

Mr. Pouliot: I know my hon. friend can lecture anyone.

Mr. Fulton: Not half as well as you can.

Mr. Pouliot: And always successfully, and it is a delight to listen to him. If Sir Henry Thornton had been a dwarf he would not have been forgotten, but he was physically the biggest man of his day. Mentally he was quite good, too. The hon. member had no reason to forget him, and if Sir Henry Thornton, who was not from the Canadian National Railways, was so popular amongst the employees that he is the only past president of any railway who has a tablet to commemorate him in all the important railway stations, it is a good example to cite.

One argument used by my hon. friend was that the appointment of Mr. Donald Gordon would be unpopular with the men because he did not belong to them. That was his argument. On that point he did not mention the fact that Mr. Gordon was not a railway man. He mentioned the fact that he did not belong to the Canadian National personnel. Neither did Sir Henry Thornton. Therefore I hope that when my hon. friend makes another pronunciamento he will not speak so much ex cathedra and will be broad enough to admit that there is possibly another point of view and that perhaps the point of view of the other fellow may not be so bad after all.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I wish to refer to the appointment for three or four minutes. There is no doubt about it that Mr. Donald Gordon did a great deal of useful work during the war and for a month or two afterwards in connection with the finance department. It was a Conservative government that established the Canadian National Railways as a national system many years ago, during 1919, 1920 and 1921. It proved to be a useful organization. There were two Vaughan brothers. The Vaughan family is an old family. In fact years ago when I was a very young alderman I sat with the father of Mr. Vaughan in the city council. One of the brothers went to the Canadian National Railways and performed a very useful public service. During the war he was overworked because of war work and many other activities. He dealt with many other economic conditions besides the railways and he rendered valuable service to the people of this country as president of the Canadian National Railways. His brother was one of the past presidents and head of Eaton's. It is well to remember that the principle of promotion might have been considered by the government, because I believe in the principle of promotion if you have a man with executive ability to take the place.

In the dark days of 1917 a royal commission was appointed to make a survey of the railway systems of this country. In this appointment one of the cardinal principles in the report of that commission is being violated. The Drayton commission consisted of Sir Henry Drayton, who was chairman of the board of railway commissioners at the time, Mr. A. H. Smith, who was president of the New York Central, and Mr. Acworth, a great British engineer, who during the war was head of a great system in England. He was a great railway man. It was said by the leaders of the government, the opposition, and others that Mr. Acworth was one of the greatest railway men of the great railways of the world. They were appointed to survey the railway system of this country, not only the C.N.R. but the other railways as well. They reported to the government. What was their report? Their report said that there should be no appointment until it was agreed to by the railway commission.

In connection with this appointment, I think we might have tried to obtain a great British engineer. We tried three or four Americans before. They were all good presidents and did good work no doubt, but when we did not have a promotion in the ranks I believe we should have tried a great British engineer. We should have brought one out here. We should have tried an engineer who knew something about the war and war conditions in connection with the British railways. During the war over there they linked up all the various branches, which we have not got, and they performed useful service. I am sorry that the government did not consider that feature of it. That is all I have to say. No doubt Donald Gordon has been appointed by the financial powers. I wish him every success. I believe we would have been far better off if we had acted the way I proposed and got a British engineer. We should have tried one of that description to head this great national asset.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—

296. General administration, $1,506,165.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF RECONSTRUCTION AND SUPPLY

381. Departmental administration—formerly under demobilization and reconversion, $98,180.

Item stands.

SECRETARY OF STATE

401. Departmental administration, $150,820.

Item stands.

Mr. Graydon: How many departments are left to be originally entered?

Mr. Gardiner: I am not absolutely certain. I have not been here every evening but I think eight are in.

Mr. Green: Ten.

Mr. Graydon: This will be thirteen out of the total number?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Casselman: How many are there altogether, sixteen or eighteen?

Mr. Gardiner: There are five more.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

23. Marketing service—marketing service administration, $150,090.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What page is that on?

Mr. Gardiner: This is the item we discussed for the greater part of two hours the last time these estimates were before the committee. I think it is about time it was carried.

Mr. Graydon: That does not indicate a thing.

Mr. Gardiner: It might not; I was not discussing it all the time.

Item agreed to.

24. Marketing service—agricultural economics, $390,120.

Mr. Argue: I notice that the department of agriculture in the United States issues statistics showing the share received by the farmer from the consumer's dollar. Their figures show that the farmer's share of the dollar paid by the consumer has dropped from 55 cents in 1948 to 48 cents thus far in 1949. I believe there is a widespread feeling that the high cost of food to the consumer has been caused chiefly through high prices on farm products paid to the farmer.

I should think similar statistics would not be difficult to compile in Canada, and I wonder if the minister would consider having the economics division of his department compile statistics from time to time showing the farmer's share of the consumer dollar.

Item agreed to.

25. Marketing service—dairy products, $594,077.

Mr. Catherwood: The hon. member for Leeds mentioned the surplus supply of canned milk in that county. Could the Minister of Agriculture tell us what are the prospects for the marketing of evaporated milk, powdered milk and condensed milk?

Mr. Gardiner: That subject was discussed at considerable length the other evening, the question as to whether or not it is possible to market the butter—and I understand it is that to which the hon. member is referring.

Mr. Catherwood: I am referring to evaporated milk.

Mr. Gardiner: There are many different kinds of canned milk. I find that the stock of condensed milk at the beginning of 1948 stood at 2,654,000 pounds. The production during that year was 39,741,000 pounds. The exports amounted to 21,219,000 pounds and the domestic consumption was 17,587,000 pounds. The carryover at the end of the year amounted to 3,592,000 pounds.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

That brings us down to the beginning of this year. Naturally we have not the figures yet for the end of the year, but we have figures down to the end of June. The total quantity of concentrated milk products manufactured in June was approximately 49,750,000 pounds, a decrease of 7 million pounds as compared with last year. Concentrated whole milk products declined to the extent of almost 7 million pounds, while milk by-products registered an increase of about 750,000 pounds. Evaporated milk, one of the most important of the whole milk products group, showed a decline of 4,500,000 pounds; and the production of skim milk powder, the leading skim milk product, declined 750,000 pounds.

The importance of those figures is that the production of all these milk products is on the decline. It may be argued by some that that is not a good thing. There are others however who would argue that, in the long-time interest of the dairy industry, it is not a bad thing to have the production of canned milk somewhat slowed down. The long-time planning and policy in connection with Canadian dairy farming has been that the surplus milk should go into the production of cheese. This has been due to a number of factors with which most members of the committee are familiar, and I do not feel I need discuss them this evening.

There are certain sections of Canada where it is most important, if they are to be able to carry on dairying effectively, that a very considerable quantity of milk be turned into cheese. There was a time, just at the end of the war, when it paid better to put milk in cans; and because it paid better to put milk in cans by far the greater part of the surplus over and above the whole-milk consumption and butter consumption went into cans. There was some difficulty in marketing the full amount of that production.

The result has been that the farmers have been delivering the milk to cheese factories rather than to canning factories in much greater quantities, and we are on the way back to producing greater quantities of cheese. I said in the discussion the other evening that, whereas we had entered into a contract with Great Britain at the beginning of this year to sell her 50 million pounds of cheese, no one who was preparing the statistics at that time thought we would be able to produce that amount, basing his estimates on the record of the last few years. But because of what I have just mentioned, namely the difficulty of marketing canned milk at the same price as that at which it had been marketed a year ago, the farmers turned over to cheese, with the result that at the end of the season we had 10 million pounds more than we had contracted to sell to Great Britain.

I wish we had had a proper estimate at the beginning of the season, because I am satisfied that last December we could have sold that 10 million pounds of cheese to Britain. Had we known we were going to have 75 million pounds of cheese, we could have sold it. But since everyone who was compiling statistics and who was associated with the dairy industry in this country believed we could not produce more than 50 million pounds—indeed believed that we could not produce that much—we finally, in order to assist Britain in the matter of dealing with dollars in advance, said to her, "We will cut the contract down to 50 million pounds, because we think that is a little more than we are going to have".

This change in the balance between cheese and canned milk has put us back on the road we were trying to follow before, and which we found very difficult to follow, namely the process of producing cheese for the British market, which has always been available to us throughout the years, and which we believe will be available to us in the years ahead. And so now, when we are discussing a contract with Great Britain for the coming year, we are insisting upon raising rather than lowering the figures. I have an idea that we will get rid of the surplus of canned milk of one kind or another—and there are three or four different types of it. One would have to go over the figures for all of them to get the exact position.

I am of the opinion that we will be able to get rid of that canned milk to fairly good advantage, but indications are that we will not be able to get a return sufficiently high to induce people to stay away from the production of cheese. As I said a few minutes ago, I am not at all sure that that would be a bad thing for the dairy industry over a long period. It might be a good thing to encourage rather than discourage the transfer of more and more surplus milk into cheese.

Mr. Fulford: During that transition period there would be 2,250 milk patrons in the county of Leeds who would not know which way to turn. The evaporated milk companies are still operating to the point where it is not economical for them to go ahead. They are building up every possible bit of storage and unless they are able to sell their stocks I do not know what is going to happen to the milk patrons. Through the years the number of cheese factories have diminished until, good as the factories are, they are simply not able to look after the supply of milk available. I ask the minister to give serious consideration to getting rid of these surplus stocks that seem to be piling up beyond all reason.

Item agreed to.

26. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, and grants, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $1,201,923.

Mr. Argue: I understand that these subsidies are paid for storage plants at the processing and wholesaling levels rather than at the consumer or retail end. According to the details of the amounts to be paid out, it would appear that some areas will receive quite large subsidies while other areas will receive practically nothing. I notice that Quebec is to receive around $115,000; Ontario a little over $250,000; British Columbia some $400,000 while the total for the three prairie provinces will be a little less than $52,000. I am not complaining about the amounts to be received by any particular province, but I do want to point out that there is what I think is a real need for subsidies to locker plants in small towns, in particular on the prairies.

Many towns have inadequate train service during the winter months and it is impossible for the local merchants to bring in quantities of fresh fruits and vegetables. If an incentive were provided I am sure that a number of quick-freeze locker plants would be erected in the small localities. This would greatly improve the health of the people in the area and would provide a market throughout the year for perishable fruits and vegetables. I understand that there is some difficulty in finding a market for our fish. The farmers on the prairies would be glad to consume more Canadian fish if they could buy that wholesome product during the winter and place it in locker plants to be consumed during the summer. I submit that the minister and his officials should give serious consideration to extending this subsidy of thirty per cent to cover locker plants.

Mr. Gardiner: I think the Cold Storage Act dates back to 1907, which was long before we had the freezer plants that have been spoken of. The act provides that where a cold storage plant is made available to the public, whether it is under the control of an individual, of an operator or of a company, if it makes application before construction is started the government may agree to pay thirty per cent of the cost, half during the first year and the remainder being spread over the next three years.

I cannot recall an occasion when an application from Saskatchewan or Alberta has been refused. I think I am correct for the fifteen years that I have been here, and I doubt very much if any applications were refused prior to that time. If similar amounts are not being paid to Saskatchewan and Alberta and Manitoba as are being paid to other provinces in Canada, I think that is due to the fact that there are not as many in those particular provinces who have found it advisable to put in cold storage plants.

I think the real explanation has been given by the hon. member when he says that this type of storage is mainly to take care of products moving into market to be held in cold storage for a certain time. Usually these cold storages are located close to the larger centres where the consumption is going to take place. There is considerable storage in Winnipeg, Vancouver and many of the eastern cities.

The small freezer or locker plant has developed during recent years, particularly since the war. An amendment to this legislation was passed, I think two years ago, to deal with the point raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia. If an individual was putting up a locker plant for the purpose of making a profit for himself, we were not so much concerned. But if a group of people got together to form a co-operative with the idea of putting up a plant of this kind, consideration would be given to providing assistance. In areas throughout the west or east, where groups of farmers or consumers get together in a village or town in order to create facilities of this kind, assistance can be given under this act. I think that is as far as we have gone to meet the situation outlined by the hon. member.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister for the information, but I can tell him that I do not think these facts are known throughout the country yet. I wonder if he could tell me tonight, or perhaps at a later date, how many applications the department has received for assistance to locker plants in the three prairie provinces during the last year or two.

Mr. Gardiner: There have been a number, but I have not the exact information. I can give it later.

Mr. Argue: Do I understand there have been a number of applications but they have not been passed upon as yet?

Mr. Gardiner: Some are being paid.

Mr. Argue: Well, Saskatchewan is to get $6,454 in 1949-50 for the Prince Albert Central Storage Limited. That does not look like a locker plant, and according to the estimates no other plants are to be given assistance. So I would like to know if the applications have been turned down or if decisions have not yet been made.

Mr. Gardiner: Applications have been received since the act was amended. If those applications came in two years ago, or immediately after the amendment of the act, half the amount would be paid that year and a proportion in the succeeding years. It would not be a considerable sum of money in connection with that type of plant. As my hon. friend knows, there is no comparison between the amount of money invested in a locker plant in a village or town in Saskatchewan and the amount invested in a large cold storage plant, which sometimes runs into tens or hundreds of thousands of dollars. In comparison these are very small plants, and it would take a number of them to account for even the $50,000 mentioned.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister could name one locker plant in Saskatchewan that has ever received money under this grant. Personally I doubt very much whether anything has been paid to any locker plant there, but I should like to know.

Mr. Gardiner: The present position as far as Saskatchewan is concerned is that we are still paying only on the Prince Albert plant. In other words the grants to the other cold storage plants there, of whatever type they may be, have been fully paid. I repeat that at the moment I cannot recall any considerable number of plants in Saskatchewan asking for this grant during the time I have been here. In other words, not as many plants of this type are being established in Saskatchewan as are found in some other provinces, the principal reason being that our cities have been pretty well supplied with cold storage facilities in previous years and are still being served by those facilities. I have in my office now an application from a gentleman who wants to put up a cold storage plant in Regina, and another from the same gentleman who wants to put up a plant in Saskatoon.

Mr. Argue: A locker plant?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, a very large plant; not one of the type my hon. friend has been discussing, but an up-to-date plant that would take care of the same type of products on a much larger scale. That has not yet reached the stage where we have been able to pass upon the application. It has been discussed with us orally and we have had some letters with regard to it, but it is not in a form in which it can be finally considered by the government. I could name two or three or more who have applied to me for cold storage assistance. I have turned those applications over to the proper authorities in the department, but each individual concerned has not complied with the requirement that it be made a co-operative, a plant that really belongs to the people making use of it. That is a matter for the judgment of the person putting up the plant. I presume they figure they can do better running it the other way, and instead of pressing for the grant I suppose they have gone ahead themselves.

Mr. Argue: Then has the minister received any applications from co-operative associations for subsidies for the construction of locker plants on that basis? If he has not, I can tell him that he will get one or more in a very short time.

Mr. Gardiner: I cannot say at the moment; but if I can get any co-operative to send in an application I assure you it will receive consideration.

Mr. Argue: I think I can have one application in within a short time, and probably two or three more soon after that.

Mr. Fair: Am I correct in assuming that this assistance would not be given to individuals building these plants for their own profit?

Mr. Gardiner: No, we do not make the grant where the plant is put in by a butcher, let us say, for his own use in connection with his own business.

Mr. McLure: Was there not an application from some people in Prince Edward Island, and particularly from Queens county, for cold storage subsidies or benefits? I brought up this matter over a year ago, in connection with a small butter and cheese factory known as the New Glasgow Dairying Company. I hope you have given that application consideration, and that the subsidy will be paid this year. While I am on my feet I might also ask whether there are cold storage plants in which butter can be kept for more than six months and still be fit for human consumption and, if so, where they are located.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand there was one application from Prince Edward Island, as far as our records show, but that application was received after the building was under construction. Our act definitely states that unless the application is made before construction is commenced, the grant is not permitted. It would not be fair either to this committee or to the public to say that payments have not been made in cases where the applications have been made after construction was started, but any case of that kind has been brought here to the floor of the house as a special vote. If you go back over our estimates you will find there have been one, two or half a dozen of these grants which have been brought in individually. It has been explained when the vote was put through why it was being done in that way. In other words the house itself legislates in connection with these individual cases after all the facts have been presented. I daresay that procedure would not be followed in connection with a plant that was deliberately proceeded with, the idea being that they did not need any assistance and therefore should not be required to live up to the regulations governing that assistance; and no doubt a large number of plants in Canada have had no assistance at all. They probably never applied for it. In some cases, application has been made years after the cold storage plant has been put up and it has been refused. The reason for refusing this particular one was, in the first place, that application was not made until after the building was under construction. My information is that the building was inspected and was found to lack a proper foundation. It was not considered, therefore, a proper structure upon which the government should make an advance.

Now, as to the question about the storage of butter for longer than six months, I am not a specialist on this question, but I am informed that any of the cold storage plants storing butter in Canada under government inspection will keep butter for longer than six months.

Mr. McLure: How much longer?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know; that has never been tried out.

Item agreed to.

27. Fruit, vegetables and maple products, and honey, including grant of $5,000 to Canadian horticultural council, $928,660.

Mr. Elderkin: Mr. Chairman, as a new member it is with a great deal of diffidence that I take the liberty of making a few remarks during the discussion of these estimates. As a farmer representing Annapolis-Kings, which is essentially a rural constituency, I feel that I would be remiss in my duty not only to my constituents but also to this house, if I did not attempt to explain some things which are of vital importance to Annapolis-Kings. I hope they may be of considerable interest to all hon. members.

First, I should like to say how much the people of Annapolis-Kings appreciate the friendly and helpful attitude of the government to our problems. In particular, I should like to commend the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for their helpfulness during the past troublesome years. We particularly appreciate their splendid efforts in effecting a sale of Canadian apples to the United Kingdom this year.

Hon. members are probably aware that the Nova Scotia apple industry has been a war casualty since 1939. The financial support being given by the dominion and provincial governments to the marketing of Nova Scotia apples with a view to saving the industry will, I believe, be approved by the Canadian people generally. People will realize that the chief outlet for our apples in the United Kingdom has been lost through no fault of our own. When trees were set out in Nova Scotia which would produce the varieties most popular in Britain, there was every reason to believe that our crops would continue to be saleable in a stable and profitable market. With the loss of the British purchasing power, we now face the probability of being years without that profitable market.

In the meantime, attempts have been made to revamp our industry. Although we still talk in terms of barrels, there are four large modern cold storage plants in which standard boxes and crates are packed. There are also six smaller cold storage warehouses, and most of the common storage warehouses are now equipped to pack in containers other than barrels. Old trees and trees of unprofitable varieties are being removed. Much grafting into better varieties has been done, but there is still much to do. Each grower must now determine what he and his farm are best adapted to produce so that other products will be available to make up for the loss in fruit.

Last year's crop was a great disappointment. Starting with continuous wet weather in the spring and culminating in three severe frosts in October, while much of the abnormally small crop was still on the trees, the resultant returns to the growers were small. Thanks to the efforts of the Canadian government, this year a deal has been finalized whereby the British government will spend $1,500,000 for the purchase of Canadian apples. This is being matched by a like amount from the Canadian government. This is the type of assistance that many of the better growers have been hoping for, but unfortunately the prices being offered are too low to meet the high cost of production. Growers are naturally hopeful that they may be able to secure additional assistance to meet this year's expenses, and hope that such agreements may be finalized in the very near future.

To enlarge slightly on my statement—I shall try to be brief even at the risk of not making myself entirely clear—the sale price to Britain is based on 80 per cent of the price paid by the United Kingdom for Canadian apples in 1946. As there is a large crop of apples in the world today and we would all like to keep down the cost of living, this looked about right. Actually the price is not nearly enough to pay the cost of production. A large volume of apples not designated in the agreement with Britain, and which are not readily saleable on the domestic market, will also have to be taken into consideration. These will probably have to be sold to processors. The returns from these apples would vary from 60 cents for apples for vinegar to $2 per barrel for canning apples. With the exception of juice apples, warehouse expenses would be 25 to 50 cents per barrel, depending on the type of grading required for any particular processing job.

In 1948 the expenditure for spray material and fertilizer had increased two and one-half times over that of 1940. This year, there was again a marked increase in the cost of spray material and, to a lesser extent, in fertilizer. If the unit price of apples to Britain this year had been based on 100 per cent of our 1946 sales, we could probably have met the increased cost of production, but without any profit. This year's crop is not large, but it is much larger than last year's and the quality of the fruit is superior to any crop for the past several years. Having no wish to weary hon. members, I have not tried to be statistical, but merely to give a general outline in order that there might be a better appreciation of our problems.

Mr. Follwell: Mr. Chairman, from what the hon. member has just said, I understand a deal has been made between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom for $3 million worth of apples. No doubt the minister negotiated this agreement. It is my understanding also that those apples are to be purchased in eastern Canada and western Canada. The minister knows that the constituency from which I come embraces the counties of Northumberland and Prince Edward, and is very good apple country. Would the minister be kind enough to explain to me, to my constituents and neighbours why the apples are not purchased in Ontario but from the other sections of the country? I am sure he has a good explanation. Would he care to answer that?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, the general position is that we have been trying to take care of the apple producers since 1939. I believe a fair job has been done and the producers will acknowledge that. In the first place, back in 1939, we started an attempt to arrange for the sale of the apple crop in Canada. In doing so, we found that the apple growers of Ontario and Quebec had exported very few apples. Most of their apples were sold in the central part of Canada.

In the first year, it was arranged that that market was not to be interfered with, except under permit. Then there was an attempt to deal with the surplus apples of Nova Scotia. Later on, the department was asked to deal with some of those of British Columbia as well, and we undertook to do that. As a result of entering into that arrangement at the beginning of the war, we have found it necessary to continue similar arrangements from that time until now. It was found as we went along that it was not necessary to have definite restrictions put upon the sale of apples out of the central provinces because all of the apples of the central provinces found a fairly ready market in the centres of those provinces; and it was found that in most years a considerable quantity of apples could be allowed to move from the maritime provinces to, say, Montreal and from British Columbia into cities right across eastern Canada. That was because of facts that I do not think it is necessary to discuss tonight any further than to recite them. But the general position was that each of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec was entitled pretty much to its own market as long as it could supply it, and when it could not supply it these apples came in from other parts of Canada. The prairie provinces were left entirely to British Columbia.

Nova Scotia, which produces most of the apples in the maritimes, found it extremely difficult to find a market anywhere except to the extent that they were allowed to get into the central part of Canada, or in case we could arrange a market for their apples in the United States or, as we did for a few years during the war, arrange a market for the greater part of their product in Great Britain. We were able to do that during most of the years of the war, but when we got down to the end of the war we found it even more difficult than during the war itself to obtain a market in Great Britain. On a previous occasion I recited the reasons for that fact, and it probably would only excite some political discussion if I were to recite them again tonight, so I shall save it for another occasion.

Nevertheless, we did get into the position last year where we took over 200,000 barrels of Nova Scotia apples. At one time we thought it might be a good thing to give the apples away. Some exception was taken to that course, so we put some of the apples in cans and dehydrated some of them. Finally we sold all of those apples that we could sell. Then when we found that we could not sell any more, we advertised right across Canada, in all the charitable organizations of the country and in hospitals, the fact that we had these apples and were prepared to provide them free of cost other than, I think, the freight to have them shipped to those institutions. We finally disposed of the apples in that way at a cost to the government. I just recite these facts in order to show that the central part of Canada has not been left entirely out of the picture. We have kept the surplus apples off the market until such time as they have had an opportunity to supply any market that there is. We have not even given apples away until it was found that the position had been fairly well taken care of in so far as the purchases of apples were concerned. We now come down to this year.

Britain did not want any apples. I was over there in January and told them about the hundreds of thousands of trees that had been pulled out because they could not buy the apples. I must say that that statement obtained more circulation in the press of Great Britain than anything else I had ever said in that country. They thought it was a rather difficult position to see Canadians in, after what they had done during the war, where they were compelled to pull out hundreds of thousands of trees simply because the British could not take the apples. The Minister of Trade and Commerce went over there a little later and was able to prevail upon them to put $1,500,000 into buying, as they thought in the beginning, Nova Scotia apples. I do not think they had in mind any other apples at the time they were talking first, largely because of the story that had been circulated with regard to pulling out trees and doing all these things to try to suit our position to the new developments. They agreed to that, conditional upon our putting $1,500,000 into the purchase of apples too.

The people of Nova Scotia are still asking us to do for their apple crop this year something similar to what we have done in other years. We suggested to them that we thought, before discussing that question, that they ought to take part of the offer the British had made. The British offered to take $1,500,000 worth of those apples at 80 per cent of the 1946 price. They said they thought the price had been too high last year, that it had been too high the year before, and that the price which was being asked this year was too high; but they said they were prepared to take $1,500,000 worth at 80 per cent of the 1946 price. As will be recalled, that was the year when Britain took a considerable part of the apple crop of the maritimes and of British Columbia.

We discussed the matter with the apple producers of Nova Scotia and suggested that we thought that it would not be a bad thing, from the point of view either of the present or of future possibilities of marketing apples in Great Britain, if they would accept the offer at 80 per cent of the 1946 price. They went home with that intention. Now I understand that, when they examined into the varieties that they had, it is true to say that they have not been prepared up to now to undertake to supply this season the total quantity of apples that the British are prepared to take from them. They are reserving the right to decide later on a certain proportion of the amount that is required. British Columbia has agreed to take up its proportion of the apples, and to ship at the prices that have been indicated. I understand that in the area that is spoken of, down around Northumberland, they feel that they would like to fill part of this contract. I am given to understand that if they are prepared to take the price that is offered by the British for the apples, namely 80 per cent of the 1946 price, there probably will not be much difficulty in their selling part of those apples. Up to now it has not been indicated to us that Nova Scotia is prepared to provide them all. I think there must be some limitation upon the time during which they will be required to provide them; and if they are not prepared to provide the remainder of the quantity at the price which is indicated, and if there are others elsewhere in Canada who are prepared to put the apples up at those prices, I think the government would be in duty bound to accept their offer to do so and to see to it that the apples are sent forward. That is the present position in relation to the matter.

I wish to say without any hesitation that we are desirous of getting out of the apple business just as fast as we can. We have said to the people of Nova Scotia: If you can sell your apples at a price which is sufficiently good to make it unnecessary for you to accept this British offer, then we are not so sure that you are having any great difficulty in marketing your apples. When I look at the figures which indicate that we are eating in Canada now more apples than we marketed altogether inside and outside of Canada in the last year before the war, I am beginning to think that there may be something in their contention that they can sell their apples to better advantage in Canada than they can by sending them to Britain under the offer that Britain has made. And I would be a little afraid that, if that is true of Nova Scotia, it will be true of Ontario as well, and perhaps more so, and we may find it a little difficult to get apples at those prices.

Mr. Herridge: The minister has clearly explained the situation with regard to apples being purchased by Britain and the apples being paid for by the Canadian government and going to England. He will remember that for some years the British government refused to accept gift apples unless consigned direct to the ministry of food. A few days ago I saw some report in the press of a change in that situation whereby they would accept from the producer organization or grower organization apples consigned direct to the consumer in Great Britain. Can the minister explain to the house what the situation is at the present time?

Mr. Gardiner: This latter matter of boxes going from others to the government is just individual to individual. If any hon. member desires to send a box of apples over to a friend in Britain he would be permitted to do so, but that is not a matter—

Mr. Herridge: The British have agreed to that.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes; but it is not a matter of providing apples to the trade direct if they are a gift, and the $1,500,000 worth of Canadian apples to all intents and purposes is a gift.

Mr. Fulton: Did I understand the minister to say that the Canadian government has in fact provided $1,500,000 and the British government $1,500,000, making $3 million in all?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, but the British government have agreed to take their $1,500,000 first, and as they are being delivered they are paying for them. From there on the Canadian government will be paying for whatever apples are purchased, and they have agreed to purchase all the $1,500,000, provided the apples are offered at the price.

Mr. Quelch: Is the price paid by the Canadian government based upon the 1946 price?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, the same price.

Mr. Cruickshank: From all parts of Canada?

Mr. Gardiner: The present arrangement is from the maritimes and Nova Scotia largely and from British Columbia. Definite amounts are set, but, as I indicated a few moments ago, the Nova Scotians are not sure that they want to provide all the quantity that has been allotted to them, in which case we have said to other parts of Canada: if you want to supply them at the price, that will be possible.

Mr. Graydon: I should like to touch on another aspect of the fruit and vegetable matter. It has nothing to do with the point which has just been discussed. As the minister well knows, the lifting of the import restrictions on many classifications of fresh fruits and vegetables coming into Canada, which was announced by the Minister of Finance not so very long ago, has a direct bearing and may have a material effect upon the future of some of our growers. I mention that only for this particular reason, namely, to emphasize a point which is very often brought to my attention by the growers in my section of the country. I refer specifically to what is commonly known as the dumping duties on the tail end of the United States surplus produce coming into this country and competing with the initial period of the market for many of our crops. In view of the fact that this is one of the delicate subjects that growers from time to time find on their doorsteps, perhaps the government might give consideration to it. I know that the minister himself does not actually set the time limit and the timing of the application of the dumping duties on the imports of United States fruits and vegetables, but his department does have an important part to play, together with the recommendation of the growers and others, in the timing. I should like to emphasize this one fact, because since the import restrictions have been lifted the necessity becomes greater than ever before to protect the growers when the first part of their crop is about to be marketed, particularly in the spring or in other times of the year. As the minister knows, from time to time there has been a disposition to allow the United States stuff to spill over onto the market which our growers feel should be theirs at the beginning of their season. The minister and the committee will readily agree that many of our growers of fresh fruits and vegetables find that the early part of their market is their best market, and for that reason it is that much more essential that that period should be protected. The complaint, which no doubt the minister and many of us who come from fruit and vegetable areas receive, is that when the time is set for the dumping duties to operate an immense amount of rolling stock is on its way here and in the first period of the marketing season of our own fresh fruits and vegetables the United States stuff, which is surplus very largely, is dumped upon our markets to the detriment of our own producers. There has been a disposition to work out a reasonable solution of the problem. When they are not in a position to serve the domestic market in Canada with many of these delicious fresh foods our growers may not have objected quite so strenuously to the market being taken care of in other ways, but they do seriously object when they themselves are able to fill the market, and particularly in the first part of their producing season. At that time they do seriously object to the United States surplus being dumped on the market, thereby spoiling what would otherwise be a very good market for many of the growers. What my argument is attempting to buttress is this. In some instances there ought to be a little earlier application of the dumping duties on some of the fresh fruits and vegetables. I make these remarks in a general way because I do not want to take up the time of the committee except to urge the government to review the situation very carefully. In view of the import restrictions having been lifted, my argument becomes more forceful in regard to the point I am trying to make, and that is, an earlier application of the dumping duties to enable our growers to get the best advantage of the early part of the market for their produce.

Mr. Gardiner: I should like to say one word. The term "dumping duties", as the hon. member for Peel will understand, is not usually applied to this particular operation. There is a dumping duty provided for in the act which operates automatically with regard to different products. We have usually called these seasonal duties. They are put on for the purpose of regulating the coming onto this market of fruits and vegetables largely from the United States at a time just prior to the coming onto the market of Canadian products, at a time, as has been suggested, when the fruits and vegetables coming from farther south are at the tail end of their season.

There is no act that is administered by the different departments that is more carefully administered than this particular one. The initial action is taken by the horticultural association in indicating when they desire to have certain things done. That is then checked by the department concerned; and, as has been said, the Department of Agriculture has a great deal to do with setting dates when the act comes into operation in connection with certain vegetables or fruits. That is all done most carefully. The hon. member said he did not think that the minister had much to do with it. As a matter of fact the minister had nearly everything to do with it up to a certain point, and the minister finally said that he did not think he had the time to examine into all of these matters in the manner in which they should be examined into, and insisted upon some others doing that particular job. I must admit now that I do not do as much of the work in connection with it as was done by the minister at one time, but I do not think it means that it is done any less efficiently than it was done before. I had an idea that it would be done more efficiently if it were done in the manner in which it is done now. I have had little, if any, complaint about it during the time it was in operation. It is true that while the special provision that shut out certain American fruits and vegetables altogether was on it was not necessary for the act to operate. Now that that has been done away with, the other act does operate. The greatest of care will be taken in deciding upon the dates.

Mr. Knight: Perhaps honey would fall under this item. It would be interesting to the committee and the country if the minister would tell us the situation with respect to honey this year, in somewhat the same manner that he told us about the government's operations in apples. My recollection is that last year there was a surplus to the extent of several million pounds of honey. The matter was so serious that the government was forced to place a floor price under it. As I recall—and the minister will correct me if I am wrong—I believe that price was thirteen cents a pound.

Would the minister give some information in regard to that operation? For example, what loss to the government was involved, if any; and what is the situation this year in connection with a possible surplus on the market?

Mr. Gardiner: Last year it was represented to us that there was a surplus of 5 million pounds of honey on the Canadian market. Statistics presented to us by the honey producers led us to believe that that was correct. The question was discussed in the house last session and was also discussed with the government. Finally the government decided, and the announcement was made to the house, that we were prepared to provide funds sufficient to purchase 5 million pounds of honey in surplus supply, and to take it off the Canadian market for the time being with a view to finding a market elsewhere for it.

The fact is that we were never able to find more than 3 million pounds. We did buy that amount at prices ranging from 10 to 13 cents a pound. As this honey is pasteurized it will keep. We know that this year the producers have a short crop, and it will require the whole 3 million pounds—and probably we could use a little more—to supply the market with honey this year. So that there is no problem in connection with that. It is simply a matter of our having taken off last year's market 3 million pounds of honey, carrying it over to this year. Now we are able to put it back on the market to increase the short supply produced this year.

Mr. Graydon: Had the drought something to do with that?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, it had a great deal to do with it.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is it correct that last year the growers of raspberries and strawberries were threatened with penalties by the states of Oregon and Washington in which state legislation was proposed whereby we would not be able to ship our produce to those states; and is it a fact that we took steps pointing out to them that we purchased from those states and that in turn we should be allowed to make deliveries to them?

Mr. Gardiner: My information is that the legislation passed last year by the state of Washington along the lines suggested by the hon. member was later rescinded.

Mr. Cruickshank: That is right.

Mr. Gardiner: That was due to the fact that, after representations from British Columbia, the government here in Ottawa made representations to the Capitol at Washington, and they in turn made representations to the state of Washington as a result of which the legislation was rescinded. I am not aware of any legislation put forward this year.

Mr. Cruickshank: No, I do not think there is any.

Mr. Gardiner: If there were any further difficulties, they would meet with similar treatment.

Item agreed to.

28. Marketing service—livestock and livestock products, $1,113,750.

Mr. McLure: I notice there is an increase in the vote for the administration of this item. What new arrangements have been made with reference to the marketing of raw furs this year? Are we going to adopt a system similar to what we had last year, one which was not too successful so far as the producer is concerned?

This industry was cruelly treated by the late government in matters of taxation, and it took out of the industry, through taxes large sums of money—so much indeed that it drove the industry almost into bankruptcy.

Mr. Cruickshank: What do you mean by "the late government"?

Mr. McLure: Just you keep quiet. Now that times have changed a little, I suggest the government should adopt a different system of grading. Does it intend to drive the industry off the face of the earth altogether? Four years ago this country was producing 285,000 silver fox skins; today production will be down below 45,000. There should be an advantage in the market, when there is no surplus.

Mr. Cruickshank: We got 182 skins this year.

Mr. McLure: If there is going to be a surplus, we want to know how these skins are going to be marketed. I see a provision here for two graders, one of whom receives $4,000 or $5,000 and the other $3,000 or $4,000. That is all right, but the government is making the grade so exclusive and so high that no producer today, unless he is producing the very top from all his animals, can get anywhere near the cost of feed and wages from the sale of the furs.

It is time we had some consideration, because it is only a few years ago the government was warned that because of the unjust taxation they were placing upon raw furs they were driving the industry out of production altogether. They had a process tax on the raw article, and then on top of that a sales tax. These were the most unjust forms of taxation ever perpetrated upon any product of the farm.

There is now an opportunity for the government to look into the marketing of furs. If the government is going to give assistance to the fur producers by way of subsidy, let it subsidize sales so that the producers will receive at least the cost of production. That can be done by putting in a grading system whereby they will not grade against the price of the article, but rather grade the article as it is needed on the market.

I say the minister should give these people an opportunity to come back and receive some of the money taken from them by taxation, so they may be established once again and kept in business. I would ask that the minister give this matter some consideration.

Item agreed to.

29. Marketing service—marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $6,000, $75,000.

Mr. Catherwood: Perhaps the minister would answer a question at this time about the marketing of poultry products. In December of this year the Anglo-Canadian contract for poultry products expires. By the end of this year we will have produced and shipped to England some 46 million dozen eggs, dried, shell and frozen. It looks as though the production will be increased in 1950 and we will need a market for something like 400 million dozen eggs in all forms. A total of 350 million dozen eggs will be produced this year of which, as I said before, 46 million dozen will be shipped to the mother country.

I know the minister is concerned about the marketing of our egg products and I wonder if he could give us some assurance that this market will be maintained next year?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, as has been stated during the war, we did develop a market in Great Britain for our eggs. In the year before the war we marketed one million dozen eggs in Britain. But at the peak during the war or at the end of the war we marketed 83 million dozen. Part of those were marketed as shell or fresh eggs, part as storage eggs and part as dried or frozen eggs.

About 24 months ago we were just at the peak of supplying the British market. It is true that the year before last the British came over and suggested that they would have difficulty in taking all our eggs, but they finally entered into a contract to take them last year. Then last year they came over and suggested that they could get along without our eggs. It was not a case of their not wanting them, it was not a case of there not being a market there, it was a case of their trying to determine where they might spend the limited amount of dollars that they had.

They said that they could get eggs from other places, or at least supplies which would permit them to get along without ours. At that time we indicated to them that we would have some difficulty in meeting their wishes in that regard. In that regard I must emphasize to the committee that our position in relation to the British has not been quite what it has been pictured throughout the country.

The British have come to us with a problem. They have said that they found it difficult to get enough dollars with which to buy in Canada all the things they would like to buy. We have told them that we could scarcely be expected to ask our people to take lower returns and could scarcely be expected to feed a nation of much greater numbers of people than we have unless we could receive some return.

We told them that we were prepared to try to find a market for what they were not able to take and pay for. As has been indicated in this discussion, in some cases where we have failed to find a market for a product, such as apples, we have provided some of the product to them at our own cost. But we have avoided that as much as we could recently. In connection with eggs, we told them that we thought we could find a market for all of our shell eggs in Canada or the United States, that we could induce our people to eat a few more and be careful when marketing in the United States to do so without causing any difficulty.

If we just said to our producers that they could ship all the eggs they wished to the United States probably most of those eggs would find their way to border cities like Detroit, Buffalo and a few other places. Then there would be trouble with the producers in the vicinity of those particular cities. Instead of doing that, our people went down to cities like St. Louis and other points in the centre of the United States away from the boundary and made arrangements for our fresh eggs to be delivered to those interior points.

We had expected to sell far more eggs in the United States on that basis than we did. We could have sold far more eggs but the eggs were not available to be sold. In other words, that quantity of eggs, which the British were not required to take and which we thought we could sell on this and the United States market, we did not have to supply to any market.

I am not blaming anybody for that. I think our producers, whether of eggs or of any other product, look at the whole position and try to meet the situation as they find it to their best advantage. I presume that they handled their position in a manner which was satisfactory.

When it came to dried eggs we insisted on the British taking the 46 million dozen which we estimated at that time could be produced in that form. The British agreed to take them but it would appear at the moment that we probably will not supply more than 34 million dozen.

I merely cite this in order to say to people who are always talking about our having lost markets, about our not being able to find markets for our products, that one of our difficulties has been that we have not been able to find the product to put on the market. There is a good reason for that. Something was said about grading furs. This does not apply in just the same way to furs as it does to eggs. You can soon get eggs into a position where nobody wants to eat them, and it is not so many years ago that that was the position in this country. But we undertook to grade all eggs that were going on the market and in a few years we doubled the consumption in Canada per head of population. We have gone on to increase that from time to time by getting out a product that everyone is desirous of eating.

To answer the last part of the hon. member's question, may I say that we are attempting to make a contract with the British. We hope to make one that will take care of any surplus we may have. We are hopeful that when these contracts are made our people will put forth an effort to see that the product is produced to supply the market. I do not think anyone up to now is contending that the price range on all these products in the last few years has not been fairly good. If it has been fairly good, and if we want to market more products in the markets that are available, then I think we ought to produce them and put them on the market.

Mr. Catherwood: I know the minister feels sure that our farmers would like to be assured that there will be a market for 1950. Does the minister feel in his own mind that there will be a substantial market in 1950 for poultry products?

Mr. Gardiner: Nothing has happened which would indicate that it will be in any respect different from what it has been in the past year, and we did find markets for more than they were able to produce.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: Tomorrow is private members' day and the rules provide that notices of motions will have priority over other matters.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

THE BUDGET

ANNOUNCEMENT OF DATE OF PRESENTATION

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I wish to announce, Mr. Speaker, that, barring unforeseen contingencies, I intend to reintroduce the budget a week from tomorrow night, October 20, at eight o'clock.

Mr. Graydon: That means the same budget?

Mr. Fraser: No changes?

Mr. Abbott: It is a good budget.

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MR. CHURCH IN DEBATE ON OCTOBER 11—STATEMENT OF MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Last night when I was not in the chair the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) stated that when the Speaker was in the chair he had handed him a motion with regard to the Supreme Court Act. Doubtless he meant by the word "handed" that he had sent the text of a motion to me. I would assure him that the document never reached me, nor was it placed by anyone at my chair. I have caused a thorough search to be made through all the papers and documents which came to my chair yesterday, and it is not among them. What happened to it after it left the hon. member for Broadview I do not know.

I should further like to point out that I have carefully read the speech that the hon. member for Broadview made yesterday on the third reading of the Supreme Court Act, and there is no reference by him in that speech to his motion. In fact, he stated in part as follow:

I want to make only a few remarks on the motion for third reading. I do not wish to object to it any further.

Standing order 45 provides that all motions, before being put from the chair, must be moved by an hon. member and seconded by another hon. member. According to the official report of the House of Commons debates of yesterday, the motion to which the hon. member for Broadview referred last night was never moved by him, nor was it seconded by another hon. member. Accordingly it could not in any event have been put from the chair, and I am satisfied that no injustice has been done to the hon. member for Broadview. However, my main purpose in rising at this time is to assure the hon. member for Broadview that the motion which he mentioned last night was never received by the Speaker.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): On a matter of personal privilege, by leave of the house, may I just say this. I did hand in, when the Speaker left the chair, a motion for the six months hoist. It will be noticed that in committee the Chairman told me that I could not move it, that I would have to have his consent to bring it forward or have it voted upon as an amendment. A mistake was no doubt made. I may say that you, sir, have always acted fairly in these matters. I did suggest at the time that I might have leave to recommit the bill to committee for the purpose I mentioned, and I notified the chairman of the committee of the whole of that fact. He sent me down a note that I could bring it up in that way but I would have to have a vote on the clause in committee. There is no doubt that what you have said, Mr. Speaker, is quite correct. But I did hand in a motion for the six months hoist.

D. A. Keith: trial, $2,868.66; appeal, $1,283.86.

[Mr. Martin.]

FOREIGN EXCHANGE—UNITED STATES—AMOUNTS CONTRACTED FOR, 1948-49

Mr. Coldwell:

What amounts of American exchange were contracted for, each week, through the Canadian banks, acing on behalf of the foreign exchange control board, covering the period from August 1, 1948 to October 1, 1948 and August 1, 1949 to October 1, 1949, by (a) all importers; (b) all coal importers?

Mr. Sinclair: The records of the department are not kept in a way which would permit giving exactly the details asked for by this question. I have discussed the question with the hon. member and have given the information which is available. I think he has agreed to drop the question and perhaps to reframe it later.

Mr. Coldwell: That is right.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—INSPECTION, APPRAISAL, ETC.

Mr. Johnston:

1. Under the N.H.A. integrated housing scheme is there a regulation covering a 25 per cent holdback of the proceeds of a joint loan to the builder building for sale?
2. If so, is this holdback held until the house has been sold to a satisfactory purchaser when the unit has been completed?
3. Under the N.H.A. integrated housing scheme is there an inspection and/or an appraisal fee of $20 permitted?
4. If so, what work is to be performed in order to earn this fee?
5. Must this $20 fee apply to each individual's property?
6. Must there be a properly written inspection and/or appraisal form made for each individual's property before this fee is chargeable?
7. To whom is the fee payable?

Mr. Winters:

1. No. However, under the 1949 integrated plan the builder is required to transfer title to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at the floor joist stage of construction and is required to trustee with the corporation the purchaser's deposit or down payment. When the property is completed and the builder has executed a transfer of title to the purchaser, the conveyance to the corporation is then cancelled and the purchaser's down payment is paid over to the builder. Prior to release of the trusteed deposit to the builder, steps are taken to ensure that he has paid all carrying charges on the property up to date of completion, including interest on advances made under the mortgage loan, taxes and fire insurance premium; otherwise the equivalent of such carrying charges are deducted from the trusteed deposit.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. Yes.

4. When completing an application for a National Housing Act loan the applicant agrees to pay an appraisal fee of $20 for which the lending institution makes an inspection of the site and completes an appraisal of the proposed property. The lending institution inspects the property at various stages of construction to assure that standards under the National Housing Act and the plans and specifications are being substantially followed, and to determine the extent to which mortgage moneys may be advanced to the borrower.

5. The $20 fee applies to each individual property except in project development where, by regulation, order in council P.C. 3138, dated July 20, 1948, the following schedule of fees is established:

$20 for each housing unit up to and including 50 units.
$18 for each housing unit in excess of 50 up to and including 100 units.
$16 for each housing unit in excess of 100 up to and including 150 units.
$14 for each housing unit in excess of 150 up to and including 200 units.
$12 for each housing unit in excess of 200 units.

6. A written appraisal report is completed by the lending institution with respect to each property. In project development an appraisal report may be completed only for each house type.

7. The fee is payable to the lending institution by the borrower.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PENSIONS

Mr. Knowles:

1. What is the total number of persons employed by the Canadian National Railways?
2. Of these how many are eligible to contribute toward a supplemental pension in addition to the basic pension of $25 per month to which they will be entitled on retirement at age 65?
3. How many are now contributing toward such a supplemental pension?
4. How many Canadian National Railways employees, upon retirement, will qualify, according to their present status for noncontributory service pensions?
5. How many employees now working for the Canadian National Railways will be entitled on retirement, according to their present status, to only the basic pension of $25 per month?
6. Is the basic pension of $25 per month available to all employees and, if so, on what conditions?

Mr. Chevrier: The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. On Canadian lines at December 31, 1948, 102,163.

2. All except temporary employees and those who commenced after age 55 and those who are now contributing to other railway pension funds, viz.: 5,462 contributors to Intercolonial provident fund and 23 contributors to Grand Trunk Railway superannuation fund.

3. Contributors to C.N.R. pension plan, 35,267. Contributors to I.C.R. and P.E.I. provident fund, 5,462. Contributors to G.T.R. superannuation and provident fund association, 23.

4. Service pensions are payable to employees who entered the service before attaining age 50 who at December 31, 1934, had at least ten years' allowable service and at age 65 have at least fifteen years' allowable service. It is not possible to say how many employees will meet these requirements.

5. There is no record of the number of employees who on retirement will be entitled to only the basic pension of $25 per month. Approximately only one-third of eligible employees are contributing to a supplementary pension.

6. Basic pensions are payable to (a) employees who entered the service before December 31, 1934, who had less than ten years' allowable service at that date and who have at least fifteen years' allowable service at age 65; (b) employees who entered the service after December 31, 1934, at not over age 45 and who at age 65 have at least twenty years' allowable service.

IMMIGRATION, 1946-47-48

Mr. Hodgson:

1. How many immigrants have been brought into Canada during 1946, 1947 and 1948?
2. How many were classed as displaced persons?
3. How many displaced persons had contagious disease on arrival?
4. Were any put in isolation hospital at North Bay?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West):

1. Immigrants admitted to Canada:

1946	71,719
1947	64,127
1948	125,414
Total	261,260
2. 1946	nil
1947	7,345
1948	47,388
Total	54,733

3 and 4. To answer these questions would necessitate an examination of all 54,733 displaced persons files, as the information requested is not otherwise available.

NEWFOUNDLAND RAILWAY

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

What have been the revenue and expenditure for the Newfoundland railway for (a) operation of the railway; (b) operation of the steamship services; (c) other operations, during the six-month period ending September 30, 1949?

Mr. Chevrier: The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

September results are not yet available, but revenues and expenditures for the Newfoundland district for the five months ending August 31, 1949, are as follows:

Revenues	$4,038,500 00
Expenses	5,543,124 73

Operations of railways and steamers are treated as one, no division being made in the revenues as between rail and water line movements.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SUPERANNUATED EMPLOYEES

Mr. Knowles:

1. How many retired employees of the Canadian National Railways are in receipt of pensions of less than $25 per month?
2. How many are in receipt of only the basic pension of $25 per month?
3. How many are in receipt of noncontributory service pensions (a) $25.01 to $29.99 per month; (b) $30 to $39.99 per month; (c) $40 to $49.99 per month; (d) $50 to $59.99 per month; (e) $60 to $69.99 per month; (f) $70 to $79.99 per month; (g) $80 or over per month?
4. How many retired employees of the Canadian National Railways are in receipt of pensions in part basic and in part contributory (a) $25.01 to $29.99 per month; (b) $30 to $39.99 per month; (c) $40 to $49.99 per month; (d) $50 to $59.99 per month; (e) $60 to $69.99 per month; (f) $70 to $79.99 per month; (g) $80 or over per month?

Mr. Chevrier: The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. 55 under C.N.R. prior plan.
2. 2,743.
3. (a), 841; (b), 664; (c), 354; (d), 275; (e), 150; (f), 108; (g), 234; total, 2,626.
4. (a), 476; (b), 2,095; (c), 1,440; (d), 1,258; (e), 731; (f), 652; (g), 2,292; total, 8,944.

METAL LOCKBOXES AND CHAIN LINK FENCE—METHOD OF CALLING FOR TENDERS

Mr. Isnor:

1. Were tenders for metal lockboxes for district architect, Halifax, Nova Scotia, called by the public works department, during the month of September, 1949?
2. If so, could tender forms and specifications be obtained in (a) Halifax; (b) Montreal?
3. Were tenders for construction of chain link fence, immigration hospital, Quebec West, Quebec, called by the public works department, during the month of September, 1949?
4. If so, could tender forms and specifications be obtained in (a) Quebec; (b) Halifax?
5. Is chain link fence manufactured in New Brunswick?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes.
2. (a) Yes; (b) yes.
3. Yes.
4. (a) Yes; (b) no.
5. No information available in the department.

INCOME TAX—FARMERS—PROSECUTIONS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many persons, by provinces, have been prosecuted in connection with infractions of the Income Tax Act from January 1, 1949, to date?
2. Of these, how many were farmers?

Mr. McCann:

1. The following is the list of prosecutions under the Income Tax Act:

Nova Scotia, 1; Quebec, 5; Ontario, 3; Alberta, 3; British Columbia, 1; Total, 13.

2. There have been no prosecutions against farmers under the Income Tax Act.

WOODSTOCK, N.B., POST OFFICE BUILDING

Mr. Hatfield:

1. Did the Post Office Department recommend to the Department of Public Works that a new post office building be built in the town of Woodstock, New Brunswick?
2. If so, when will the recommendation be acted upon?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes.

2. Due to the necessity of carrying out more urgent works, the construction of a new post office building at Woodstock, N.B., will not be undertaken at present.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Coldwell:

1. Did the government of Canada at any time from July 1, 1944 to July 30, 1949, make any offer to the government of Saskatchewan to help finance the trans-Canada highway on a fifty-fifty basis?
2. If so, when was the offer made, and by whom?

Mr. Winters:

1. Possible bases of financial participation were indicated publicly and discussed between ministers of the federal government and the government of Saskatchewan.

2. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—STAFF

Mr. Black (Cumberland):

1. How many members are on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's board of governors and executive?
2. What remuneration, salary and expenses were paid to each of these governors and executives during the years (a) 1947; (b) 1948?
3. (a) What are the names of the headquarters staff; (b) what are the duties of each; (c) what is the salary of each?
4. What is the total number of staff and employees of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?
5. (a) Who compose the staff and employees of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the maritime provinces; (b) where are they located and what are their duties; (c) what salaries, wages and expenses were paid to each of these employees during the years (i) 1947; (ii) 1948?

Mr. McCann: Return tabled.

VETERANS—CAMPAIGN STARS AND MEDALS

Mr. Pearkes:

What procedure should be followed by ex-members of the Canadian armed forces and merchant navy, who served during world war II, and are now resident outside of Canada, in order to obtain their campaign stars and medals?

Mr. Bradley: Return tabled.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—SECRETARIES, ADMINISTRATIVE BRANCH

Mr. White (Middlesex East):

For a copy of order in council P.C. 34/2231, dated November 3, 1923, dealing with the establishment of secretaries, administrative branch, Post Office Department, effective April 1, 1923.

TARIFFS AND TRADE

ANNECY NEGOTIATIONS—IMPERIAL PREFERENCE

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), after quoting an article from the Globe and Mail, asked if Mr. Wilgress, our high commissioner in London, was expressing government policy on the question of the trade agreements. The answer is that Mr. Wilgress at the time was in fact speaking as chairman of the international conference on the agreements, but the views he expressed were in line with government policy.

The hon. member for Broadview also asked:

What is the effect of that policy on empire preference—which should be first, last and always in our minds—and on trade within the empire.

The answer is that under these agreements there are some minor reductions in empire preferences; also the agreements would produce some reductions of tariffs between countries of the commonwealth and other countries. So that on balance its effect should be to increase trade between countries of the commonwealth as well as between other countries. The fact is that the agreements have been entered into by all the countries of the commonwealth. Britain and Australia, like Canada, have already signed.

Mr. Church: May I say to the hon. gentleman that the proposal also hangs preferential trade on the sour apple tree, like John Brown's body.

Mr. Claxton: That is a good place for it too.

STANDING COMMITTEES

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF STANDING ORDER 63 TO INCLUDE PUBLIC HEALTH, WELFARE, SOCIAL SECURITY AND HOUSING

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, standing order 63 be amended by adding after subsection 1:

(m) on public health, welfare, social security and housing, to consist of thirty-five members, ten of whom shall constitute a quorum.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very glad indeed to have the opportunity of submitting this motion to the house today. In one sense it is the reward of patience, because I have had this same resolution on the order paper in each session commencing with October, 1945. This is the sixth session, and this is the first time that it has been reached with opportunity for debate.

I may say that the suggestion contained in the resolution was first offered to the government on September 27, 1945, at which time the then prime minister undertook to look into the matter and consider it.

Sir, the resolution requires some brief review of the committee structure of the house. I wish to do this briefly. I do not wish to weary the house, but I think there is some information which may be of interest particularly to the newer members.

What has happened this afternoon in the appointment of the select standing committees of the house brings this matter directly to our minds. At the present time we have in the house twelve standing committees. As well there are two joint committees of both houses. A third committee was appointed today to assist Mr. Speaker in connection with the restaurant. In what I have to say I am making no reference to the last committee. I am dealing with the standing committees, of which there are today twelve, and then the two joint committees, those on printing and the library.

When one reviews the history of the committee structure of the house, Mr. Speaker, one begins with the rules adopted by the house in 1876. At that time the rules did not set forth, as they do today in standing order 63, the list of committees. In standing order 63 we have a list of the committees, and we also have the number of members who constitute those committees, and also the quorum in each case fixed by the standing order.

In 1876 there was no list of committees set forth in the rules, but there was a reference to some of these standing committees. At that time it was apparently the practice of the house to appoint standing committees at the beginning of the session, but there was no catalogue of committees that the rules required the house to set up at each session. However, at that time three standing committees were referred to in the rules, namely, banking and commerce, railways, and a joint committee of both houses on printing. In some respects these committees thus enjoy seniority.

In 1890 a revision of the rules added reference to another standing committee, namely, that on miscellaneous private bills. In 1906 several additions were made to the list of standing committees, the number at that time being fixed at eight house committees and two joint committees on printing and the library. In 1910 three more committees were added, making eleven, and the two joint committees. These three were on marine and fisheries; on mines and minerals; and on forests, waterways and water-courses.

In their present form our rules date from the revision of 1927. The rules in this respect are today exactly as they were adopted in 1927, with the exception of one amendment that was made in 1945, which I shall mention in a moment.

The effect of the 1927 change of the rules with reference to standing committees was briefly this. First, two of the standing committees, namely that on mines and minerals, and that on forests, waterways and water-courses, were combined into the standing committee on mines, forests and waters. In the second place, a committee on industrial and international relations was added. In the third place, the rule fixed for the first time the number of members of which each committee was to consist and the number that was to constitute the quorum. At that time there were thus ten standing committees, plus the two joint committees of both houses.

One change was made in this list of committees in 1945. Hon. members of the last parliament will recall that in September, 1945, Mr. Bracken, then leader of the opposition, drew attention to the fact that the committee on industrial and international relations embraced two subjects that were not closely related, but were of such great importance as to justify the appointment of a standing committee on each. That suggestion was accepted by the prime minister, and an amendment was made in September, 1945, eliminating the committee on industrial and international relations and replacing it by two committees, one on industrial relations and another on external affairs. This brings us to the present time, with twelve select standing committees of the house and the two joint committees of both houses on printing and the library.

I make this one observation on that subject before I leave it, to draw attention to a remark of the then prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, in 1945, in dealing with the suggestion of the appointment of two standing committees, namely on external affairs and industrial relations.

On page 110 of Hansard of September 12, 1945, the prime minister said in response to the suggestion of Mr. Bracken:

> If there were two separate committees, therefore, it might and I believe would improve the opportunities of hon. members to give careful study to these questions.

If I might say so, Mr. Speaker, that is the keynote of my approach to this question today. The appointment of committees of this house should be designed with that object in view, namely, to improve the opportunities of hon. members to give careful study to questions of importance coming before the house.

The resolution that I have the honor to submit to the house today will, if it is adopted, provide for the establishment of a select standing committee of the house on matters of the highest importance to all Canadians, and the appointment of that committee will improve the opportunities of hon. members to give careful study to these questions, namely, public health, welfare, social security and housing. In my submission every one of them is a question of vast importance to all Canadians, and when the four of them are linked together, as I think may properly be done, in the scope of this committee, it offers to hon. members an improved opportunity to give careful study to these questions.

Now, sir, it is fair to ask, how is our present committee structure working? I have indicated that it has not been revised in the last 22 years. There has been just this one amendment. I have before me a table, for which I am indebted to the committee branch and the parliamentary librarian, indicating the number of meetings which each of the select standing committees has held in the past five years. I have begun with the first session of the twentieth parliament of Canada. I put the figures before the house to illustrate facts which I think are of importance. In the first place there is public business of very great importance which at the present time does not fall within the scope of any of the standing committees. In the second place, if the suggestion is made that we have enough committees now, I would answer directly by saying that some of these committees are not meeting at the present time and apparently have not met for years. If there is any question of either reducing the number or avoiding any enlargement of the number of committees, then I suggest we might very well eliminate some of the committees which do not meet today, and replace them by a committee which will meet to deal with the matters of importance set out in the proposed resolution.

The first of the select standing committees, that on privileges and elections, has not met in the last five sessions of parliament. The committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines during the past five sessions has met four, four, five, three and six times respectively. The committee on miscellaneous private bills met two, two, three, four and five times respectively. The figure I am giving in each instance is the number of meetings the committee held throughout an entire session of parliament, beginning in 1945.

We realize that the committee on banking and commerce is an active committee. We find it held 10, 20, 26, 25 and 2 meetings respectively. Turning to the public accounts committee we find that in the last five years it met once in the 1945 session, and in 1946 did not meet at all; in 1947 it met 28 times; in 1948 it did not meet, and there were two meetings in 1949.

The committee on agriculture and colonization did not meet in 1945, 1946, 1948 or 1949, but held six meetings in 1947. The committee on standing orders held one, three, six, one and three meetings respectively. The record for the committee on marine and fisheries stands at two, two and one, respectively; this committee did not meet in 1948 or 1949.

The committee on mines, forests and waters did not meet in the last five sessions. While the committee on industrial relations did not meet in 1945, it held 48 meetings in 1946, nine in 1947, nine in 1948, and failed to meet in 1949. It is one of the new committees, having been established in 1945. It can be seen that it met a need, because it was more active than most of the other committees.

The other new committee established in 1945, on external affairs, held 15, 21, 15, 9 meetings in the first four years, and none in 1949.

The committee on debates did not meet in 1945, 1946, 1947 or 1949, but held one meeting in 1948. The joint committee on printing held its meetings as follows: one, one, one and three respectively, up to and including 1948. It did not meet in 1949.

The joint committee on the library of parliament held two meetings, one in 1946 and one in 1948. In the lifetime of the preceding parliament the only meeting of that joint committee was held on July 22, 1943.

For the convenience of hon. members I would ask that this complete table be placed on Hansard.

Note: The same special committees are not appointed session after session. Where an "X" is indicated, the committee was not appointed that session.

I believe it is no disparagement of other committees to say that the two committees which were established first in 1945, did fill a need in the committee organization of the house, as evidenced by the large number of meetings they held. This points unmistakably to the fact that there is a need of modernization of the committee machinery and structure of the House of Commons. Because of the inadequacy of the committee structure there are great gaps in the allotment of public business within the scope of the various standing committees.

I do not believe that in the House of Commons, in this year of grace 1949, it should be necessary to say anything about the cardinal importance of the subjects which I suggest should be assigned to a new standing committee. In my resolution I include public health, welfare, social security, and housing. Each of them is a subject of first importance, and happily they are related. I suggest they lend themselves logically and reasonably to inclusion within the scope of reference of one committee.

There is no reason why the subject of housing ought not to be included within the scope of a committee studying health, welfare and social security. I am sure hon. members are aware that in Great Britain the subject of housing falls within the departmental responsibility of the minister of health. I do not believe any member of the House of Commons will contend seriously that housing is not directly related to public health, welfare and social security.

There is need of better opportunity in the house, through the machinery of the house, for the study of these subjects. There is need of provision being made so that hon. members may give careful study to these questions, again using the expression of the prime minister in 1945.

Social security is not a subject on which we have reached the end of our legislative responsibility. It is going to present continuing problems, and it is needful that the house should undertake a comprehensive approach to this question as it pursues the study of social security problems. If I have a criticism to make of the manner in which social security questions have been approached in parliament in the past, it is that the approach has been piecemeal and has not been comprehensive. The time has come when that condition should be remedied. I see no way, apart from the assistance of a committee of this kind, in which the house would be able to undertake that comprehensive approach. Such a committee would provide an opportunity for continuous study, the gathering of information and the eliciting of opinions from responsible organizations which have studied these questions. These opportunities do not exist at the present time.

The committee organization of the house does not now admit of the calling of any person before a committee of the house to discuss questions dealing with public health, welfare, social security, and housing. It is true that when the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) brings in his departmental estimates they will be considered in committee of supply. The committee of the whole house will sit here, and the minister will have one or two officials in front of his desk. He will have opportunity to confer with them in hushed whispers, and will be able to give us his opinions and also information elicited at second hand from his officials. But we are not permitted to question the officials.

It is no invasion of the principle of the responsibility of government to parliament to propose that, as in the case of the other standing committees of the house, hon. members should have an opportunity of eliciting at first hand information from these departmental officials. An opportunity should also be provided through the committee machinery of the house to enable responsible organizations, represented by people who have made exhaustive studies of these questions and whose opinions and information would be of the greatest assistance to parliament, to come before a standing committee so as to make that information and those ideas directly available. Today if they wish to lay their information before parliament all they can do is go to the minister. What goes into the minister's files does not come before the house; we do not have access to or knowledge of submissions made by such organizations.

I am glad that the matter of national health has come, by reason of the insistence of the house and increased public interest, to be regarded with greater and greater respect, and, I hope, urgency. I hope that before this twenty-first parliament runs its course some concrete and forward step will be taken in the field of public health, something more far-reaching than we have heretofore attempted as a nation. That step should be taken in concert with the governments of the provinces. But under the present organization of the business of this house it would be impossible to give to such a measure the close and detailed study it ought to receive.

Hon. members will recall that some seven years ago a special committee of the house was set up to study the whole question of national health in Canada. There was also a special committee on social security. Those committees terminated in each case with the end of the session in which they were appointed. The fact that it was found necessary to set up special committees in the fields of social security and national health is proof abundant that a standing committee embracing those two important subjects would be of the greatest assistance to this house in the discharge of its duties and in meeting a need that is being urgently felt today.

We have been told by the government that it is intended to introduce a measure at the present session to amend the National Housing Act. I am sure the house is awaiting with interest the introduction of that measure. As a matter of fact, I think most of us wish the government would bring it down quickly. Any measure that promises assistance in solving the national housing problem ought to be brought down without a moment's delay. When the measure comes before this house I can see that it will be of the greatest assistance—unless we are to be treated as mere rubber stamps or as people whose ideas are of little interest to those bringing down the measure—if a committee is available to which the measure can be referred and in which we may obtain the views of those who are dealing with this problem in its various aspects throughout the country. In that committee the measure could be reviewed, and the result would be legislation that would be vastly superior to anything that is likely to be passed by this house if information of the kind were lacking.

Would it not be of the greatest assistance to hon. members when dealing with that measure if, for example, they could have before them the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, hear his ideas and obtain directly from him any information he may have? He is not a deputy minister, and there could not be any suggestion of an invasion of the principle of the responsibility of government in proposing that the head of a crown corporation should from time to time appear, along with his officials, before a standing committee of this house in order that the house may perform its duty in seeking firsthand information from the corporation with reference to the discharge of its responsibilities. Under our present procedure there is no opportunity for carrying out that important duty. I am sure I need not dwell further on the value the individual member of such a committee would derive in obtaining information.

I have respect for the information that hon. members possess, but I think that I am being only fair and realistic when I say that regardless of how intensive our study of particular subjects may be, it is impossible, in the time available in one lifetime, considering the other duties we must discharge, to obtain all the information available on any subject. If hon. members could have access thus to further information and research I am sure it would enable them to do a vastly superior job as members of parliament.

Far from invading the principle of responsibility I suggest that such a committee could be of great assistance to the ministers concerned, in the one case the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and in the other the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. I am sure that these ministers would appreciate receiving the considered views of those who had made an intelligent study of the problem under consideration. Any minister worthy of his office should welcome the assistance that a standing committee would be able to give.

The need for such a committee is illustrated further by the fact that there has for years been in existence under this roof an informal committee made up of members of both houses who are interested in the subject of national health. That committee does not make any attempt to go into the field of housing or social security or welfare; it deals only with health. It has no status in either house; it is simply made up of a group of interested individuals who arrange luncheons from time to time, to which the members of both houses are invited, and at which they hear papers read in relation to the subject of public health.

This committee is of limited assistance because it has no status, but the fact that such a committee has existed, informal as it may be and limited as its effectiveness has been, illustrates, and I think proves conclusively, the need for a standing committee in this field.

I should like to refer briefly to some of the observations that have been made in times past on this subject. I hope it will not be said that there are too many committees of the house. That would be a poor answer to make to a suggestion of this kind. If the need exists, the fact that there are fifteen committees today is no answer to the request that a sixteenth committee be appointed to enable this house to discharge its responsibilities with reference to the public business. If that had been the answer given by Mr. Mackenzie King in 1945; if he had said that eleven standing committees of the house and three joint committees were enough, we would not have had the two committees which were set up in 1945 and which have proven to be exceedingly useful and active. I refer to the committee on external affairs and the committee on industrial relations.

Can it be said that the existence of standing committees subtracts one iota from the principle of responsibility? I submit not. What is the difference between twelve standing committees and thirteen standing committees in respect to the principle of responsibility? Surely one more committee to deal with subjects as important as these would involve no subtraction from the principle of responsibility. If the appointment of twelve committees constitutes no invasion of the principle of responsibility, then the addition of another committee would create no subtraction from that principle.

Ten days ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), speaking for the government, agreed that another standing committee of the house should be appointed, this time on atomic energy. Why? Because atomic energy is a subject that has attained first importance, in the national as well as the international sphere. Because of that fact the government agrees that there should be another standing committee of the house, in relation to subjects pertaining to atomic energy. There was no suggestion then that that violated the principle of responsibility. If there was no violation then, there certainly is none involved in the resolution I have submitted to the house this afternoon.

[Mr. Fleming.]

In the face of those facts I hope that no one will suggest that we in this house are drawing too close to the United States system instead of sticking to the principle of responsibility. If we have anything to learn from the committee structure of congress at Washington, I do not know why we should be too proud to learn it. Personally I think parliament ought to welcome the opportunity to create possible improvements in the operation of the machinery of the house wherever it can find means of doing so. If, as I urge upon the house, the addition of this committee to the machinery of the house provides that opportunity, I submit that we should welcome it.

On previous occasions the government has been asked to consider this proposal. I shall give the house one extract from Hansard which reports what was said the last time the subject was before the house. I may say that my suggestion for such a committee on this occasion was made in the course of the debate in committee of supply on the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. I refer to Hansard of June 11, 1948, when the present Minister of National Health and Welfare was dealing with the suggestion that there should be such a standing committee. He was reviewing some of the suggestions made by hon. members in the opening debate on the estimates of his department. At page 5141 of Hansard of that date he said:

> I do not think I have now anything else to say, except that the suggestion made for the setting up of a committee dealing with both health and welfare matters is one which is receiving attention. The suggestion has much merit, and I am hoping that I shall be able to take some definite steps at a later date in connection with it.

I hope the significance of those remarks will impress the house. The Minister of National Health and Welfare, the member of the government most closely in touch with matters which would come within the scope of this proposed committee, said that the suggestion that there should be a select standing committee of the house on matters of national health and welfare, social security and housing had much merit. He adds:

> . . . and I am hoping that I shall be able to take some definite steps at a later date in connection with it.

It seems to me that the resolution which I respectfully offer to the house presents an opportunity to do something definite, in the words of the minister, in connection with a matter that has much merit. It is a resolution which, in the words of Mr. Mackenzie King on September 12, 1945, will improve the opportunity of hon. members to give careful study to these questions.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to prolong the discussion. I merely rise to compliment the sponsor of the resolution. That is one time that he has put his talents to good use. He did an excellent job in introducing it and he put a lot of work on it. I want to give him full credit. I agree with all his arguments. For several reasons there is a great necessity for a committee such as the hon. member advocated. For example, there are ninety-two new members of the house. Many of them will not get an opportunity to speak, no matter how much they would like to do so. There are also several reasons for that being so.

The committee structure gives a member, new or old, great opportunity to learn what is going on in the country in all of its ramifications, much greater than he would have merely sitting in the house no matter how long he may remain here and how many speeches he may hear. For that reason I think it is a good opportunity to give the new members, the younger ones particularly, a chance to meet experts in every field in committee meetings. The fields that the hon. member mentioned are of the greatest importance to the Canadian people.

The question of health leaves much to be desired, despite grants to the provinces, the building of hospitals, and so on. Hospitals may be built, but unless you have money you cannot get into them. A large percentage of our population is not receiving the advantages of medical science that are available today. That is a matter that should be examined very carefully, but I shall leave any further remarks on it to my friend who was on his feet when I rose and who, as a medical doctor, is much better qualified to speak on the subject than I am.

There has been a lot of work done in committee on the question of social security. We had the Marsh report. We studied it; we studied the Beveridge report, and the New Zealand set-up. We spent months in committee on the question of social security. Witnesses were brought from all parts of Canada at great expense. It cost the government a lot of money. The Marsh report has gone to the archives to gather dust. I think it would be a good thing if the Marsh report were brought forth again and submitted to the committee that is being advocated at the present time. That report covers the whole field of social security. A lot of work has been done in the past and it should be followed up.

The federal government is making health grants to the provinces but many of the provinces are not spending the money. I think in 1948 Nova Scotia only spent about one-third of what was available. They said that plans were needed and that certain things had to be done before they could take advantage of the grants. The question of housing is tied up with the whole matter of health. I am sure that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters), who has that problem under his consideration at the present time, would welcome a subcommittee of the main committee to study it with him, do some of the work, take some of the responsibility, and assist his department. It can be done. There are hundreds of people in Canada with expert knowledge in all these fields. The machinery should be created whereby they could come here and give the government and the committee the benefit of the information they have.

I have no intention of delaying the matter at all. I merely rose to support the hon. member and compliment him for raising the matter.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): First of all I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) on bringing this matter to the attention of the house. This resolution has been on the order paper—I was going to say for years—during the last session of parliament, and unfortunately we never had an opportunity to discuss it. Taking the place of a standing committee of the house, there has been a voluntary committee on health which I have found very entertaining. Meetings have been held about once every six weeks. Very often scientists have addressed us on matters concerning health or research. The trouble with such a committee is that it is not practical. Entertaining though it may be, it is not practical to gather in the members to discuss a matter of research or a highly technical matter effecting some cure. The committee is not fulfilling its purpose. The fact that it is well attended proves it is an entertaining committee and that members are anxious to attend the lectures. It reveals an interest on the part of every member of the House of Commons in the matter of health. Members realize their responsibility to their constituents regarding health and social security. They attend meetings to find out what they would like to tell their constituents and what they would like to do for their constituents.

I congratulate the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) on the attitude he has taken. He mentioned the Marsh report, however, and I intend to show that national health in this country has changed so rapidly that the Marsh report is now getting old. If such a committee were set up the ground covered by the Marsh report would have to be covered again. I said conditions in this country were changing, and I intend to show that ideas formerly held concerning national health have gone by the board. Diseases which were on the top of the list as a cause of mortality have now gone to the bottom of the list, and the whole picture has changed.

We have been through a war. It is unfortunately true that the greatest progress in research and the treatment of new diseases has been made under the stress of war. Scientists were faced with the problem of dealing with some of these situations and the whole scientific army of our nation set to work to find answers to our problems. We are still reminded of the last war, of its inhumanities and the cruelties that were perpetrated. During this post-war period we are trying to envisage a future in which the physical well-being of all people will occupy the minds of those who are striving for better conditions throughout the world.

Use should be made of the scientific knowledge accumulated in the last three centuries. A few hundred years ago the goal of those interested in the art of healing was to have physicians so well learned in the knowledge of diseases that the sick under their care got well. The thinking at that time was in terms of curing disease. There was no conception of the fact that the physical welfare of a community meant more than proper nourishment and shelter, or that under such conditions only a small part of the population could benefit from the new treatments and additional skill. During the past two decades the fight to eliminate disease and suffering has received an acceleration which was not possible in previous centuries.

In talking of this matter we are all very much aware of the discoveries of scientists like Pasteur or Lister. Bacteriologists have made tremendous advances in the discovery of viruses and the part played by insects in causing or transmitting diseases. Remarkable progress has been made in immunology, nutrition, hormones, vitamins, and some of those discoveries have been little short of miraculous. Newspapers and magazines have been filled with articles about new discoveries. Some of those articles give the public false impressions. The false impression received by the laity through these articles sometimes causes a great deal of trouble. Our laboratories, our hospitals and our physicians have been armed with new scientific equipment and drugs. They are providing services which were unknown a century ago.

The point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is that, if this new knowledge and equipment are to be used effectively for the benefit of the whole nation, it is not sufficient to improve only the method of curing disease. Our great objective should be to keep people well. We have the advantage of these discoveries that were made. We are positive now, for instance, that there is no reason why any child in this country should die of diphtheria. Scientists have discovered a method of immunizing that child against this disease. The time has come, Mr. Speaker, when a coroner's inquest should be held if a child dies of diphtheria. If an accident occurs on the highway and someone is killed, a coroner's inquest is held and the whole affair investigated. A child can die of diphtheria and the only formality is a certificate signed by the attending physician. I say that when a child dies of a disease against which it could have been immunized, it should call for a coroner's inquest.

New discoveries made in other branches of medical science have broadened our idea of that remarkable thing we call life. I use the term "life" as it might be applied to the human body. Our knowledge of preventive medicine today shows it would be foolish to attempt to keep all the people well by curing disease. The advances made in preventive medicine will bring about less disease. This is the ideal towards which we should strive. As knowledge is gained in the field of public health, there should not be the call for additional hospitals and physicians. That may be a new viewpoint in this matter, but I submit, sir, it is the ideal towards which we should strive. It will cost less to keep people well and the nation will enjoy a state of health that would have been unknown a century ago. We can look forward to a new concept of health by using the discoveries already made to keep people well.

I bring these matters to the attention of the house because I believe this resolution calls for a committee of the House of Commons. These matters could be placed before that committee. When matters affecting national health are considered in this house, the consideration is limited to the few hours during which the estimates of that department are before us. Questions are asked of the minister and answers are given. No opportunity is afforded to study the broader aspects of a program of public health that would serve the nation and avoid this mortality rate. The members could learn what it means not only to cure people but to prevent people from becoming ill.

Professor Winslow of Yale university medical school, and editor of the American Journal of Public Health, gives a good definition of public health—and this is what should be before every member of this house if he had a chance to hear about it on a committee —which is as follows:

Public health is the science and art of preventing disease, prolonging life, and promoting physical and mental health and efficiency through organized community efforts for the sanitation of the environment, the control of community infections, the education of the individual in principles of personal hygiene, the organization of medical and nursing service, for the early diagnosis and treatment of disease, and the development of the social machinery which will insure to every individual in the community a standard of living adequate for the maintenance of health.

I can give the house another definition—this is a shorter one and is more concise—from Webster's dictionary, in which the state of health is defined as follows:

The state of being hale or sound in body, mind or soul, especially freedom from physical disease or pain.

As to the history of movements in public health, during all the years of man's existence he has been worried about diseases which afflicted him. He spent his time and his money trying to cure and to prevent those afflictions, but he laid more emphasis on the question of cure. His efforts were doomed to disappointment because he knew nothing about the etiology of these diseases. But, sir, the whole picture has changed in the past forty years. Those diseases which I mentioned in the beginning as being at the top of the list as a cause of death forty years ago are now down at the bottom, and at the top of the list we now find diseases of adult and advanced age. Those diseases of adult and later life are now listed in the first ten causes of death. The health problems of today therefore are entirely different from those at the beginning of the century.

There are other matters affecting our population which I think should be brought before a committee. We are all aware of the high cost of hospitalization. Any of us who have been unfortunate enough to have to deal with a situation like that have found out about the tremendous cost of hospital beds and the bills which had to be paid. This puts the matter of hospitalization and relief in time of sickness beyond the financial powers of the ordinary man. The cost of hospital beds has reached a height which makes it difficult for people in the lower income brackets to pay for them. Even ward rates are now at such a height that they are equal to the cost of a private room some years ago. In seeking to obtain hospitalization and to pay for hospitalization, the public are in a difficult position. This matter again could be threshed out in a committee where the costs could be obtained from the people who have to deal with institutions.

Infant mortality in Canada has shown a sharp decline. I remember speaking in this house four years ago and calling attention to the high rate of infant mortality in Canada. Since that time the rate has gone down. This decline is due in large measure to a decrease in the number of deaths from diseases of infants such as diarrhoea and enteritis. Immunization against infectious disease has helped to cause the decline, by controlling communicable diseases of childhood. Whereas diphtheria was the leading cause of death forty years ago, it has now practically disappeared in centres where a campaign of immunization has been carried on. Serious illness at the childhood ages has been much reduced. Pneumonia is another example. We all remember the mortality rate of pneumonia and how it was dreaded by the populace some years ago. It once ranked high as a cause of mortality, but owing to the changes in treatment of this disease, the death rate is now about the same as that for tuberculosis. The reason for this decline is the use of important scientific discoveries, such as the sulpha drugs and penicillin. The result of all these changes has been that major illnesses and chronic invalidism now exist mainly at the older age levels. This is the result of scientific discoveries and of treatment which saved a large number of people from premature death, and which spared them from infancy to the prime of life. The leading causes of death are now those conditions common at older ages. Death from these causes in older people are now a large part of the total.

Years ago, sometime about the year 1710, Joseph Addison, the great English essayist, wrote an essay which appeared in the Spectator. He called this essay "The Vision of Mirza", which it might be of interest to the house to review, having regard to what I have been trying to say about the changes in the causes of death.

In this allegory, which Addison professes to find among certain oriental manuscripts picked up in Grand Cairo, the writer is taken into the high hills of Bagdad, where he has a symbolic vision of life. A spirit asks him what he sees, and the tale goes on:

"I see a bridge," said I, "standing in the midst of the tide." "The bridge thou seest," said he, "is human life; consider it attentively." Upon a more leisurely survey of it, I found that it consisted of three score and ten entire arches, with several broken arches, which, added to those that were entire, made up the number about an hundred. As I was counting the arches the genius told me that this bridge consisted at first of a thousand arches; but that a great flood had swept away the rest, and left the bridge in the ruinous condition I now beheld it: "But tell me further," said he, "what thou discoverest on it." "I see multitudes of people passing over it," said I, "and a black cloud hanging on each end of it." As I looked more attentively, I saw several of the passengers dropping through the bridge, into the great tide that flowed underneath it; and upon further examination, perceived there were innumerable trap-doors that lay concealed in the bridge, which the passengers no sooner trod upon, but they fell through them into the tide and immediately disappeared. These hidden pitfalls were set very thick at the entrance of the bridge, so that throngs of people no sooner broke through the cloud, but many of them fell into them. They grew thinner towards the middle, but multiplied and lay closer together toward the end of the arches that were entire.

There were indeed some persons, but their number was very small, that continued a kind of hobbling march on the broken arches, but fell through one after another, being quite tired and spent with so long a walk.

That is the story of this vision. Hon. members will note from the story that the number who dropped through at the beginning of the bridge, which would represent infantile mortality, since the hidden pitfalls were close to the entrance of the bridge, grew thinner at the middle and lay closer together toward the end of the arches which were entire. The three score and ten arches of the bridge represent the years of human life. I give you that little part of the essay of Addison to represent what is happening at the present time. Instead of the body falling off at the beginning it now falls off toward the end of the bridge.

Every party in this house is committed to some form of national health plan. We possibly do not all agree as to how this will be brought about, but we are all striving toward the one goal. There are certain facts which stand out. First is the proportion of the people in middle and later life who require treatment and attention. The second is that the chief causes of disability and death are today, and possibly will be in the future, those which are characteristic of middle and later life, the cardiovascular-renal diseases; that is the heart, kidneys and blood vessels. They are now well at the top of the list as the cause of death or as the cause of disability in mid-life and later life. Heart disease mortality, and especially coronary disease of the heart, has become all too common. It is difficult now to pick up a paper in which you do not read that somebody in the prime of life has been suddenly snuffed out by coronary disease of the heart. Science has produced early and better methods of diagnosis, but apart from the strain and the stress of life during this decade, the causes of this disease, which is apparently bringing about an increasing number of deaths, demand research. We must make provision for the treatment and the care of an increasing number of cardiac cases which cause disabilities and invalidism.

Again I say, sir, that the whole picture has changed. These matters should be before a committee where we can ask specialists, and those who are learned in these matters, why these things exist, just what we are doing about them in the way of research, and what we are doing about the increased necessity of hospitalizing these people.

I am now going to talk about cancer for a few minutes with the same object in view, namely, to show the necessity of a committee considering these matters. This is a problem with which we must deal. It presents a problem so far as research is concerned, but it presents a challenge to those who are doing research. Every year in Canada approximately 14,000 to 15,000 people die of cancer, and according to the last statistics of the disease it still stands high as a cause of death in this country. I have stated several times that these statistics show changes, but it would appear that the number of cancer cases is increasing as the span of life grows longer. We can illustrate the picture more clearly by considering the fact, or at least the probability—and this is not pleasant to think about—of eventual death from this disease. The number of cases has increased steadily, and while it may be because of the better methods of diagnosis, yet the casualties are rising. It would appear that the number of new cases is higher. People are becoming more aware of the problem and are demanding better diagnostic facilities. It is a tragedy, sir, that cases of cancer are discovered in patients at a time when little can be done. The people who are competent to deal with these cases do not get them early enough. Better diagnostic facilities would mean a great deal for many cases of cancer, if they could be diagnosed in the early stages. The treatment of early lesions under skilled care has proven to be very valuable and often results in entirely eliminating the disease. We thought at one time that there was no hope. Now we do believe that with early diagnosis there is a hope that a large percentage of these cases will get better. We must take steps to intensify any method which has been shown to be of value in holding the disease in check.

I might also point out that the people who are unfortunate enough to acquire this disease are elderly, and have to undergo a long period of invalidism and hospitalization. Many of these people have not the resources to pay for nursing and attention over a long period. This is a case where health insurance and sufficient hospital accommodation could be of great assistance in providing better care.

There is another great question facing us, namely, the problem of mental health. The average member of the House of Commons takes for granted that when a minister makes a certain statement or gives certain figures or statistics that is the end so far as he is concerned, or his connection with the estimates before the house. In the case of mental health, if we had this committee—and I bring this to you again, sir,—where every member could ask questions of these people, and understand them, the members, irrespective of their political affiliation, could deal with the matter in a way that is not possible when it is merely brought to the attention of the house for an hour or two some afternoon. Mental health is assuming a great significance in Canada. This is a remarkable statement, but it is true. The number of beds occupied by patients suffering from mental disease, or emotional breakdowns, is nearly equal to the number of beds in all the other hospitals. Mental disease is now equal in importance to physical handicaps. I do not think that the average hon. member is aware of the significance of these two statements. We must pay more attention to the provision of hospital or institutional facilities for advanced cases, and mental hygiene must take its place in dealing with a situation such as that.

Unofficial estimates—and I have checked these as well as I could from the material at hand—show the number of the mentally ill in Canada at the present time to be 200,000, 100,000 permanent and 100,000 temporary. The word "temporary" refers to those who have probably had an emotional upset and are temporarily deranged. The health league of Canada estimates another 600,000 partly disabled, making a total of 800,000 people in Canada. The cost of mental disease in Canada is approximately $500,000,000. Statistics show that the number of people in mental hospitals is increasing faster than the general population in Canada. That is something which we should all consider. Any person within sound of my voice hearing a statement like that cannot well vote against a resolution which calls for a committee in which hon. members would study these matters and make arrangements for the treatment and hospitalization of these people in the future. It may be that the increase in the number of patients is due to more complete diagnosis. The Canada Year Book says that the number of patients in mental institutions per 100,000 of the population in 1946 was 399·5, as compared with 396·5 in 1945; 388 in 1940; 352·8 in 1933; and 305·4 in 1931. The number per 100,000 of the population in 1931 was 305·4. The number in 1946 was 399·5. These statistics are taken from the Canada Year Book and they are absolutely authentic.

It may be that in the consideration of these matters before a committee of the house some hon. members might feel that political affairs would enter into the discussion. Let me place on record what happened in the committee on veterans affairs. For four years that committee held meetings. I remember the former minister of veterans affairs stating in the house that this was the greatest committee that had ever functioned, and he made highly complimentary remarks about the work accomplished.

While there might have been the occasional incident which might not fall within that description, we can forget about that. The fact is that ninety-nine per cent of the time the veterans on that committee worked for the benefit of veterans in Canada. I am sure every hon. member of the House of Commons is interested in this matter of health. Is there any reason why a committee of the house would not be of assistance to any minister holding the portfolio of national health and welfare, so as to work out arrangements and discuss health matters to the advantage of all the people in Canada?

I have mentioned mental diseases and cancer; I have referred to the changing view so far as the population is concerned, and the arrangements we will have to make in the future in order to deal with that situation. As I said in the beginning of my observations, when such enthusiasm is shown over a voluntary committee called once in six weeks to hear a scientific lecture, it seems to indicate that that is something members want to hear about and to discuss.

I have said that every political party in the house is committed to some form of health insurance. I do not agree with all of them. I have no doubt we will be told in the house about the benefits of the plan in England, or that in New Zealand. Those plans may be advocated here. Any plan, sir, that has to do with the relief of human sickness or pain is praiseworthy. We must discuss this matter in the light of what will be the best plan for all Canada.

A committee could consider these plans. As I see it, politics need not be brought into its deliberations. On such a committee we could study what has happened in England, where they have a system of state medicine. We could discuss what is happening in the United States, and consider what would be the best plan for Canada.

Those are matters of importance, matters of life and death. They are vital, so far as this nation is concerned. I am not going to discuss at length the matter of health insurance of various types.

It has become apparent, however, that some of the health insurance plans already submitted in connection with state medicine have been very costly, and in some respects have not achieved the objectives they sought to achieve in the beginning. In connection with some of them the cost has gone up at a tremendous rate. I know of no substantial group in Canada who are urging state medicine as an alternative to the present system. I know of no important exponents of state medicine, in that sense; but I think we are all committed to some form of treatment whereby people will have the advantages of the scientific discoveries of past years.

The suggested committee should have the power of discussing this plan. There should be available to all citizens in Canada a program of medical care which will provide preventive, diagnostic and curative services. This program should provide a service of a high standard under conditions satisfactory to the doctors and to the public. Such a plan should not in any way infringe upon the principles of either the medical profession, the public or any others concerned. It should be a method of accumulating funds for services required to maintain the health standards of this nation.

We cannot take on something that we cannot afford; let us be sensible about that. The United States is now in the throes of discussing some plan of that type. These matters should be discussed before a committee, so that when we do adopt a plan to which all parties in the house are committed, it may be the best we could have for this country. That matter should be fully discussed.

We will never get anywhere spending two hours in a discussion of the estimates some afternoon when there is no other government business. I appeal, sir, to the members of the house to consider these matters, and to realize that we are dealing with matters of life and death. It is shocking to think that scientific discoveries have been made, and that we have failed in the House of Commons to approve of them, or have permitted them to become matters of political discussion—and this at a time when people are suffering and dying.

Let us have this committee; let us discuss these matters intelligently. Let us look into the question of mortality rates in Canada. Hon. members will recall that I have said there are some things that can be well handled, given the opportunity; for instance, I have in mind the immunization of a child. As I said at the beginning, a matter like that should call for a coroner's inquest, and not simply be passed over by parliament during some hour or two in an afternoon when the estimates are being considered.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, it is a delight for me this afternoon to support the motion offered by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), in which he calls for an amendment to standing order 63, having for its purpose the setting up of a standing committee or committees to deal with the subjects of public health, welfare, social security and housing.

I appreciate the observations of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair), who has just taken his seat. I am not as well qualified as he to speak in matters of health. By profession he is a physician, and speaks whereof he knows. At the same time I would add that the imperative need for health, welfare, social security and housing in these days makes an impact not only upon the minds of physicians but upon the minds of all people with ordinary sense.

I rise to support the resolution not only because it involves these four subjects, but because it would necessitate a change in standing order 63. In these days when we must face many problems, the committees which must deal with those problems should be an asset to any government having the responsibility of determining policy in Canada.

I am not going into the details of public health itself, but I should like to present one angle of this subject. There is quite a move on foot in other nations as well as ours to bring in what is commonly known as state medicine. Are we to assume that in connection with a subject of that kind the government is going to take full responsibility of determining policy without any parliamentary investigation? State medicine is a big issue. Some of us would oppose it on the basis that it was socialistic while others would support it because they believe, whether rightly or wrongly, that the Canadian citizen would be better cared for in matters of health through such a system. All I am saying now is that there are two opposing views in connection with that problem.

Surely the government should be willing to say: "Let us lay the subject open, let us lay it bare before the people of Canada. Let us have a parliamentary committee to which any organization, any individual or any municipal or provincial government could come to make their views known, and upon the basis of such an investigation we as a government will determine our future course and policy". I mention that as one reason for setting up a parliamentary committee.

The cost in connection with any system of public health or welfare or social security would be tremendous, and the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) has touched on this phase of the question. During last session when the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) presented the government's policy with respect to social security I delivered a speech, although it was not what might be called a major speech. I asked the minister a most pertinent question. I wanted to know if this government was going on and on and on with certain social security measures which would cost a tremendous amount of money and which in this day of apparent prosperity it might be reasonable to suppose the taxpayers of Canada could provide, and what the minister would propose in the way of financing such a program should there be a period of depression.

Surely we could have expected that a responsible minister would have projected his thinking into the future far enough to be able to say what this government or any succeeding government would do in such a case, but the minister did not answer along those lines. He gave no indication of what plans would be made to meet such huge obligations. He answered my question by saying, "Oh, well, we have always done it before, I feel confident we will always be able to do it again". Any business corporation in Canada that went out on a limb like that would be considered very unsound indeed, and yet we have the government administering what is perhaps the biggest business in the country not being able to say what they will do in the event of possible adverse circumstances facing this nation.

I am in favour of this resolution because it calls for the setting up of an additional committee to deal with these matters, but I am disappointed that the resolution does not go further. I am disappointed that it does not propose the setting up of committees to study a further number of what I would regard as very important problems facing Canada today.

Government today is not the same as it used to be. There was a day when parliament met purely as legislators. There was a day when the government administered the affairs of the country simply on the basis of the legislation that had been passed. I am not saying that in those days governments went on holiday, but all they had to do was to see that the legislation already passed functioned reasonably smoothly throughout the year. But we seem to have passed that day. Government has become big business. Government has set up all sorts of government corporations.

Parliaments have met and in their legislative responsibility have delegated tremendous powers to the government. We have become not only legislators but in a sense administrators. We are asked to take a holiday from the administrative angle of it at the close of each session. But government being big business makes it most important that everything of national importance done in this country should have the closest scrutiny.

I should like to ask a question or two with regard to some of these government corporations. I am entirely in sympathy with what the hon. member for Lanark said when he asked what opportunity this parliament had to discuss these vital issues except for an hour or two on some estimate. I need to mention only one or two of these corporations, for instance Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which would be covered by this resolution which calls for a committee on housing. That particular government corporation is big business, but there is no opportunity for the details of that business to be considered by this parliament.

The minister may suggest that we can discuss it on the estimates, but I should like him to point to one estimate in that blue volume that has anything to do with the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. His answer to that would be that we could discuss it on the first item, departmental administration. We know how far we would get in discussing a corporation of that kind on item No. 1 of the department. Surely a corporation that is responsible for the administration of a tremendous amount of housing in Canada should be scrutinized carefully by a parliamentary committee. I say that is only reasonable.

There are other similar matters. I believe the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) mentioned the other night that there should be a complete revision of the standing committees of the house. Take, for instance, the civil service of Canada. I believe there are in the neighbourhood of 123,000 civil servants. What opportunity have we in the house to discuss the administration of the civil service? We should have a standing committee so that any civil servant, be he office boy or the head of a department, could come and make his wants and wishes known. As legislators, how much do we know about the inner workings of the civil service? Perhaps someone will rise and say that we have an opportunity to find out. It is all very well to say that, but I assure you there are not enough hours in the day for me to read everything that comes to my desk. We all know that is the case. Why should we not have specially delegated duties imposed upon various committees? Why should we not specialize in this or that subject and leave no stone unturned in respect to any important matter that faces the country?

Then there is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. By way of licence fees it takes from the taxpayers of Canada about $5 million a year. Then it comes to parliament over and over again for loans from the consolidated revenue fund. Nevertheless there is no standing committee on radio broadcasting.

In the estimates there is an item of nearly $3 million for the international shortwave station. Three million dollars is a lot of money to spend on broadcasting to the world. I know it can be said that we can discuss that on the estimates, but there should be a committee examining these matters very carefully.

The national film board requires about $2 million a year. Let me point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that the national film board, a great and powerful medium of propaganda, places before the people almost anything it pleases, using motion pictures, which not only mould people's minds but so affect their emotions that they reach decisions one way or another. On top of that there is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. To be polite, I suppose I should say that it is a powerful medium for the dissemination of information, but all information is propaganda. You can call it by a nice name if you want to.

Here are these powerful government institutions. Are we going to say that the only time we have to discuss such matters is a few minutes on the estimates, which are usually brought in in a rush near the end of the session? These subjects should be scrutinized with a great deal of care.

I said that government was big business. I must say I believe the ministers of the crown bear a tremendous burden of responsibility. I do not see how they can keep their fingers on all the details of their departments. I know it is done through an efficient organization from the man at the top down. Let us take the Department of National Revenue. If ever anything needed to undergo an overhauling it is the administration of the Income Tax Act. I cannot discuss a resolution on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), but I know that all over the country there is dissatisfaction with the administration of that act. I do not blame the minister entirely. He has a tremendous job on his hands.

I think ministers of the crown should welcome committees that would go into these matters and make reports in order to assist them in the determination of policy. I see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) in his seat looking at a newspaper. I know he has a tremendous responsibility. I wonder how much opportunity the house has to scrutinize in detail all that is done by the Department of Public Works. We know that last year a decision was made to move the printing bureau to Hull, and that it caused a great deal of concern. I think the minister was a bit embarrassed.

Mr. Fraser: He got the votes though.

Mr. Hansell: I do not know, but it seems to me that the minister would have been well advised to have had a committee go into the matter and recommend where the printing bureau should be established.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I remind the hon. member that the location of public buildings is decided by a body created by statute in 1946. I refer to the federal district commission. If you read the statute you will see that this body makes recommendations as to sites. That is the way it was proceeded with in this case.

Mr. Hansell: I am not criticizing the fact that the minister may have proceeded according to a statute. I merely suggest to him that it might have been better if a committee could have given advice on the matter. If the minister says that they have proceeded according to a certain statute, that is playing into my hands. That supports my argument because the statute may not be a good one. If it is not a good one what could be better than to have a standing committee of the house suggesting that the legislation should be changed?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You did not oppose that measure.

Mr. Hansell: No, I did not; the minister has misunderstood me. I am not criticizing him. I am merely suggesting what might have been done, or what might be done in the future, by select or standing committees having their hands on every detail of government administration.

I believe I can conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that our democracy has become topsy-turvy. First of all, governments determine their policy. Legislation is brought down and put on the doorstep of parliament. The government says, "There you are, boys; that is it. What have you got to say about it?" It does not make any difference what we have to say about it. What difference does it make? We could holler so loudly it would give the lie to the disappointing acoustics of this chamber, but it would not do any good. The government has decided. It is similar to saying, "The gods have spoken."

As I say, our democracy has become topsy-turvy. That is not the manner in which the business of the country should be conducted. The government determines policy and has the last say on the matter. Members of parliament have become what the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) said, merely rubber stamps. We like to throw out our chests and say, "Well, we are members of parliament." We are members of parliament, but for what? If democracy means anything, before government policy is determined the matter should be brought before the people's representatives. This would enable the government to ascertain what the people want and, on that basis, determine what government policy should be. The picture would then be that the people would be asking the government to do this or that. At the present time the converse is true. The government tells the people what they should have.

I am saying, Mr. Speaker, that there should be a revision of our standing committees. Those committees should have the opportunity of going into every detail and scrutinizing with the greatest care everything that is of national importance. There is another matter which I think is of tremendous importance. I know when I mention it someone is going to make a mountain out of a molehill. In the United States, for instance, the seriousness of communist forces in that country has been recognized. A committee on un-American activities has been set up. As soon as that is mentioned someone says, "Yes, and what a farce." I wonder whether it is a farce. It may have appeared to be so, but I should like to tell you that it has brought the danger of the infiltration of communistic forces into the United States to the attention of the average citizen of that country. At the moment, I do not know that I would be prepared to suggest that a committee of that sort be set up in this house. I may say that the issue is tremendously important in Canada. We are trusting that the government has the matter well in hand, and that is all we can say about it.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, every national issue that concerns the welfare of our people, whether it is the paying of income tax, whether it concerns a different way of life, whether it is a matter of security and health or whatever it is—someone mentions the atomic bomb. I do not know that we need to know a great deal about the atomic bomb, but I am going to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that if two or three of them were directed at Montreal, Vancouver, Winnipeg—

Mr. Thatcher: And Moose Jaw.

Mr. Hansell: That might be a good idea. I want to say that the people of Canada would not know what to do under such circumstances. I believe it would be a good thing for the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) to tell us sometime whether anything has been done to inform the people of Canada on what they should do in such a case. No one can say with any certainty that something might not happen overnight. Wars are no longer declared; let us remember that. The firing of the first gun starts them. This is another of those great issues upon which information should be furnished. We are running our parliament with committees that were set up before I was born. I do not think I need to say anything more about that, Mr. Speaker, except to bring to your attention the urgency of this matter and ask hon. members to support this resolution.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to take two or three minutes in this debate. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) made one remark which I thought was particularly pertinent. He stated that parliament is not like what it used to be. That is very true. As a matter of fact, this session parliament seems to be like a morgue or a church. While waiting for a vote, perhaps we should sing hymns instead of "Home on the Range". I am in favour of setting up any committee if such action will liven up the house.

I have been a member since 1945 and have seen a number of parliamentary committees set up. These committees sit for a while, discuss matters and report to the house. Quite frequently, nothing is done thereafter about those reports. For instance, I remember the first committee to which I was appointed —the flag committee. I felt very important because I had been chosen by our group to be a member of that committee. I was present during many hours in which the committee met and finally selected a Canadian flag. The committee reported, but we have never heard another word about its recommendations for a flag. Before setting up another committee, I suggest to the government that it would be wise to do something about the reports of committees, which were set up in the last session.

The Indian committee which my friend the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) has mentioned a few times was set up in 1946. That committee sat for three sessions and made some excellent recommendations. We have not heard much about them since that time.

Mr. Hodgson: Neither have the Indians.

Mr. Thatcher: No, neither have the Indians. Then, the prices committee was set up with a good deal of fanfare. That committee managed to waste several hundred thousand dollars of the taxpayers' money. A report was brought in, but prices are still going up and very little has been done about the recommendations which the committee made. I could mention other committees but I shall not take the time of the house.

Then there have been royal commissions along the same lines. It seems to me a committee was set up to study the rules of the house. There was a royal commission on prices, a royal commission on fuel, and others. The royal commission studies a matter, but usually nothing is done about its report.

Why set up another committee if it is simply going to discuss matters and result in no action? If the committee is to mean anything, and I support the setting up of the committee if it will mean anything, I think the government must give some undertaking that action will be taken after recommendations are made. This resolution today calls for a committee to discuss housing. Housing is an acute problem, and I think the people of Canada want some action in the matter now. They do not want it to go to a committee and be buried there for six months or a year, then have a report back and still no action taken. I think there is that danger.

I approve this resolution in principle. If the government adopt it, I hope they will give some undertaking that they will make use of the committee and adopt some of the recommendations it makes. I know that my time is not perhaps as valuable as that of some hon. members; but I do not want to waste it again in another committee, spend months sitting on it, and then have the government just bury the report. I speak personally in this regard.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to support this resolution and to take the opportunity of associating myself with what has been said by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and by others who have spoken in this debate. I think it must be admitted that there is a great deal of truth and merit in what has just been said by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). It seems to me that committees of this house can be of two kinds. One kind is a committee to help the government avoid responsibility; that is the kind of committee that the hon. member has just mentioned such as the prices committee, the flag committee and so on. We all regret the waste of time and money that those committees involve, and I think the protest just entered by the hon. member for Moose Jaw was fully justified.

But in addition to that kind of committee—that is the committee to help the government to avoid responsibility—there is another kind; and fortunately it can be said with a great deal of truth that the majority of the committees of this house are of that other kind, namely, the kind of committee to help the government share responsibility. This committee which the motion of the hon. member for Eglinton envisages is, I am certain, that type of committee. What he has in mind is a committee which will be available at all times to examine the various problems in the fields which he has suggested should be made the responsibility of a committee; which would be available, independently as it were, to obtain evidence and opinions on those matters, in order to enable the members of the house to express their opinions in the light of those views; and, further, would be available as a standing committee of this house when such important legislation as the proposed bill to amend the National Housing Act is being considered in the house. If there were such a committee, then it would be, one hopes, a matter of course that such legislation would be referred to it. Then the president of Wartime Housing Limited and the president and officers of the various welfare organizations across this dominion could come before that parliamentary body and give their direct evidence; and of course it is quite impossible for them to do that in the house.

I think the hon. members who have spoken previously have outlined the advantages which would follow in the sphere envisaged by this resolution. But I also want to associate myself fully with everything the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) said just a few minutes ago. As he pointed out, the other night when the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs were being discussed I made a few brief remarks on the necessity for overhauling our committee system. It seems to me that this is another proof that the time for that overhaul is ripe; I refer to the fact that so many members, on a resolution this Wednesday afternoon, would speak in this manner and would support the motion of the hon. member for Eglinton. I should just like to mention a few more reasons which I think were omitted, if I may use that word, from the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod.

Things which in the past Canada did not seem to be immediately concerned with, and things which the Canadian government as a government were not concerned with, have since the time of confederation and since the time of the various revisions of our rules become matters in which the government is deeply involved. These are matters on which it is surely necessary that we should have committees of this house to assist in doing two things. One would be to assist the government in putting legislation through with the utmost co-operation from all members and from all parties in the house. I think that is one quite legitimate function which would be served by a committee. The second is to enable the members of the house to inform themselves on the issues involved in the legislation which is discussed in the committee, and to inform the government as to what are in fact the views held by the various sections of the country which they represent.

As has been said already, our government is in business in a big way. It is a development which some of us have regretted from time to time, or opinions have been expressed regretting it. Some say that governments should not be in business. But it does not matter, Mr. Speaker, what your view on that subject may be, the fact is that the government is in business. It is probably correct to say that the developments that have taken place in the world and in this country in the last few years and the developments which it seems will take place in the future are such that the government cannot help getting into business, and will go on getting into business in a bigger and bigger way. That being the case, the machinery which was set up—

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend is talking like a socialist.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, but I would point out to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that it is his government which, over the past fifteen years, has been getting into business in a big way. It is not a socialist government.

Mr. Mitchell: May I point out to my hon. friend that I think I know something of the position of his party and its arguments for the American system of government.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Labour does not know what I am talking about, because I have not come to it.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. member does not even know himself.

Mr. Fulton: I did not know that the minister had added to his accomplishments that of mind-reading.

Mr. Mitchell: It is not difficult to read my hon. friend's mind.

Mr. Fulton: The point is this. Whatever may be one's views, this government, in common with all governments in the world, is getting into business and has to deal with business problems; I do not mean merely commercial business, or business in the narrow sense of the word. The very nature of things has seemed to make it essential that the government should become more and more intimately concerned with the average everyday activities of the life of this nation. That being the case, it is a fact that the machinery devised for the conduct of the business of government many years ago is no longer adequate for conducting the business with which the government has to concern itself at the present time. I think that is the main reason why we should have an overhaul of our committee system.

If everything is to be done on the estimates, and if our only opportunity to examine what the government is doing in these different spheres is to be confined to the estimates and the committee of the whole which is called the committee of supply, and it is a committee of this whole house with 262 members, we would need thirteen months a year just to get through the estimates alone if we were really to examine these things as they should be examined. We would need to sit here solidly for those thirteen months, if we could have a year of thirteen months. The only alternative is to revise our committee system and to set up, to deal with these various problems, a number of committees to which members may be appointed, thus giving them a chance to study those subjects in which they are interested, to become informed on them and to deal with them in the detail which they merit.

I should like to mention a few matters to show that there are conspicuous gaps in our present committee system. There are such things as the judiciary. We have no committee now to which any of the constitutional measures coming before us at this session can be referred. The bill which we passed yesterday and the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for a further amendment of the constitution are cases in point. We have now in Canada a court of final resort, namely, the Supreme Court of Canada. It is in a sense a part of our constitution because it is the court of final appeal on constitutional matters. We have no committee which can deal with that aspect of the matter. There is no committee on the judiciary; there is no committee on defence. As the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) mentioned, the atom bomb is a great source of peril hanging over the nation and over the minds of the people of the nation. Whether it is regarded as a part of defence or not there should be a separate committee to deal with the matter, which has been promised. It is involved in defence. There is no committee on veterans affairs. There is no committee on housing, and that brings me back directly to the resolution which is before the house at the present time.

If I may put it this way, Mr. Speaker, enough has been said to convince any person taking a detached view of the need of this country, and taking a detached view of the opportunities available to hon. members to study these problems and of the means by which hon. members may find their opportunities, that he should not vote against the resolution so ably put forward by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming).

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, ordinarily the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) would have spoken to this motion, but he is at Lake Success as one of the Canadian delegates to the meeting of the United Nations, and as acting Minister of National Health and Welfare the responsibility has fallen on my shoulders of speaking to this motion.

I must say that from the time taken by the six hon. members of opposition groups who have spoken on the motion it began to look as if a new device was being practised in this house, and that is, that hon. members of the opposition were engaged in an endeavour to talk out their own motion.

Mr. Fulton: You have thirty-five minutes now.

Mr. Claxton: I will not take thirty-five minutes, and at the end of my remarks I shall be ready to have a vote, if that is the wish of the house, but I hope that what I say will make that unnecessary.

Hon. members who have spoken have taken a very reasonable position, and have put forward points of view which they have expressed quietly and in a way to command respect as well as attention; but I do suggest to the house that one or two things can at once be mentioned which indicate that there are two sides to the question.

The first is that in the history he gave of the development of committees in this house the hon. member for Eglinton referred to the fact that in 22 years there has been only one change, and that was made in 1945, which I think should lead hon. members to the view that the house has not lightly disturbed the set-up of committees.

The second point which I might mention is that in the discussion of the six speakers who have preceded me it is rather noticeable that not a single one of them has referred in any way, shape or form to the practice followed in the other countries in which there are British parliamentary institutions. My belief is that the system of government which we call the British parliamentary system is the best form of government yet devised by man to regulate his affairs. The fact is, as hon. members must know, though they did not refer to it, that in no parliament of the British commonwealth, so far as I know, is there in existence any committee of the kind suggested by the hon. member for Eglinton.

In a minute or two I propose to develop the reasons why that should be so; but before doing so may I at the outset say that the suggestion made by the hon. member and the point of view which I am going to express on it have no reference to the subject matter of public health, welfare, social security and housing. I am in favour of public health; I am in favour of welfare; I am in favour of social security and I am in favour of housing; and I do not want my remarks on the subject of this motion ever to be construed in such a way as to indicate for a second that anything I have said is in the direction of blocking further development in all these four important matters.

If there were any tendency to misunderstand the position regarding them, then I could point to the fact that possibly the reason why I should be speaking today in the place of the Minister of National Health and Welfare is that from some time in 1944 until 1946 I held that portfolio, and during that time I was responsible for the administration of the social security measures and the health measures of this government; and also as a member of the committee of the government I had a part in formulating the green book proposals which are still the most forward-looking and comprehensive plans of social security and health yet put forward in any country.

The motion is one to amend standing order 63 by adding after subsection (l) words which would create a new standing committee:

> (m) on public health, welfare, social security and housing, to consist of thirty-five members, ten of whom shall constitute a quorum.

It is a motion to set up a committee and not to give Canada and Canadians a new heaven or a new earth, and I suggest that the arguments put forward by the hon. members who have spoken, all representing opposition parties, indicate clearly and unmistakably what is really in their minds. If I may put it this way, what they would like to see is what is only natural, and that is government by a committee and notably a committee of opposition members; whereas we believe in the system of government by a committee, but a committee representative of the party in power and responsible through that party to parliament and to the people as a whole. I believe that there the issue lies. Let me say at once that if this were the only committee to be suggested, or if we were to proceed only in a certain direction to a limited extent, then the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), and reinforced by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair) particularly, would be very persuasive. If the committee were a committee to study a matter so as to enable members to be better informed on subjects of public importance, then it might serve a very useful purpose.

But that is not the object of the committee, as developed by the hon. members. It is very clear that what they have in mind is a committee which would be responsible for initiating legislation involving the expenditure of public funds and amounting in effect to a program of legislation to be put forward by a committee representative of various parties, and not by the cabinet which is responsible to the crown and which under our constitution is the only group that can advise on a matter of public expenditure.

As the hon. member for Eglinton has said, this matter was first put forward in the house on December 15, 1945. At that time I was minister of national health and welfare, and made a brief reply. It was put forward again, and on April 10, 1946, Mr. Speaker ruled that the motion was out of order, on the ground that a special committee had been set up to assist him in reference to standing orders.

The suggestion was renewed on May 30, 1946, upon which occasion as reported at page 2052 of Hansard I said:

> I must say that my own idea with regard to this some time ago was that there should be such a standing committee; but on considering the matter and looking into the practice in the United States and in England, I am coming to the view that it probably would be a mistake for us to have a number of standing committees dealing with the functions of different departments, such as they have in the United States. That leads to a totally different parliamentary system, one which is very much more similar to that in force in the United States than that on which we have modeled our own parliamentary system, namely, the parliament at Westminster, where they have no functional committees. They have five standing committees, and matters are referred to one or another of the committees by Mr. Speaker. From such examination as I have made of it, and comments made in England I believe that the British procedure is the best; that the multiplication of functional committees in the United States leads to an effort by committees to administer departments. I believe that experience has shown that our system is as good as, if not better than, any in the world.

Mr. Fleming: Would the minister read the next sentence in which he said he had an open mind on the subject?

Mr. Claxton: Certainly. As I have indicated, I had already changed my mind. The hon. member will not trap me in any way in that respect. I went on to say:

> Therefore, on that point, on which I have an open mind, I certainly am not convinced that we should change. I think we should consider most cautiously the institution of standing committees which have a definite relationship with the department and to which estimates would regularly be referred.

But I can add that as my hon. friend knows very well, since he has followed me through Hansard, on two later occasions I indicated that the views I now hold are definitely opposed to the views he has put forward.

As I have said, the position is that in the United Kingdom, where they have a system of government on which our own is modeled, there are six standing committees lettered A, B, C, D and E, and one dealing with Scottish matters. There are no functional committees. The only matters referred to the lettered committees are legislation.

The only authority bearing on the advisability of this procedure is found in Campion's An Introduction to the Procedure of the House of Commons, where, at page 238, he says:

> The function of a standing committee is to consider and amend public bills. It is true that S.O. No. 47, permits the reference to a standing committee of "other business" as well as bills, and that in 1919 the experiment was tried of referring to a standing committee certain portions of the estimates. But this experiment is not likely to be repeated.

In other words, since 1919 the only matters referred to standing committees in the British House of Commons have been bills, and those references are made by Mr. Speaker of his own volition to one or other of the named committees.

Mr. Fulton: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Claxton: I think I should be allowed to finish. I should like to see this go to a division, if possible.

Mr. Fulton: I would like to ask a question. I was going to say that probably the minister will agree that in the United Kingdom parliament sits practically all the year round, whereas in Canada we sit for about six months. Does the minister agree that that has any bearing in the matter?

Mr. Claxton: No, not the slightest.

Mr. Fulton: When we are considering the period of months in which we have to look into these matters—

Mr. Cruickshank: That is long enough to listen to you.

Mr. Claxton: If the hon. member will look into it further he will see that in Canada we sit for about the same number of days as they do in the United Kingdom. The fact that those days may be concentrated more at one season of the year than another, it seems to me—and I may be unable to follow the hon. member—has no bearing whatsoever on the point under discussion.

Further, one would have thought that if this were going to be such a panacea for governments it would have been adopted in some of the other countries which follow the British system of parliamentary government. I have in mind, for example, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and now India and Pakistan. I have had inquiries made, and I have made inquiries of representatives of these countries, and I am assured that they have no such committees.

What is more, since I have been interested in the subject of parliamentary procedure ever since entering the House of Commons, and at one time held the view that it was desirable to have such committees, I have discussed this matter with the leaders of various parties in various countries of the commonwealth; and I have found without exception that they share the view I am now putting forward, namely that the institution of functional committees of this kind, if extended, inevitably would have the effect of breaking down our representative and responsible system of government.

The hon. member for Eglinton said, "Let no one say we should not have this because they have it in the United States, and we would be getting too close to the American system." He added, "If we have anything to learn, we should not be too proud to learn from the United States." I thoroughly agree with his last remark—if we have anything to learn. While I have the greatest possible respect for the American system of government and for American institutions which, in so many ways, are similar to our own, I certainly will not acknowledge that in any respect whatever are their parliamentary or congressional systems superior to ours.

I believe that the reason for that is the historical development of the country which resulted in the system of checks and balances which they found necessary when they "cut the painter" as a consequence of the American war of independence. But we have had no need to cut the painter in that way. Our development has been orderly and peaceful and it was not necessary for us to say to the king, "We will have no more." It was never necessary for us to impose checks and balances because our development, like that of the British system, has been orderly, peaceful and progressive.

It should be made clear just what the difference is between this country and the United States. In the United States all executive power is invested in the President, not in the governor in council or in the cabinet. The President's cabinet are not elected and are not responsible to congress; they are responsible only to the President. The President is elected for a fixed term and the only way in which he and the members of his administration can have continuous association with the members in both houses of congress, and vice versa, is through the device of the congressional committee. It is before the congressional committee that the administration and its representatives put forward the legislative programs, meet objections and answer questions.

But that is not the case in Canada. Here the Prime Minister and his cabinet are appointed by the crown because the party they represent commands a majority in the House of Commons—and what a majority it is. That is because they have received the support of the electors in a majority of divisions. The Prime Minister and his colleagues meet the members of parliament because they are also members; they meet those members every day on the floor of the house and answer questions and explain legislation. They are not separated from the members by that separation of authority which exists in the United States.

The two systems are entirely different. To pick bits out of the United States system and endeavour to introduce them here is showing a failure to understand how fundamental it is to our system of government that legislation involving the expenditure of funds should be introduced as a government measure which may or may not be referred to a committee, depending upon the will of the house. Once you set up a whole range of committees to deal with all the operations of government it becomes inevitable that those committees will endeavour to administer the affairs of the different departments and thereby remove from the government the responsibility which is theirs and theirs alone, and which is the great reason for the success of our form of government. We can be held to account in the house and in the country, but the President of the United States cannot be held to account for legislation that is introduced in consequence of a sitting of a congressional committee.

These proposals are apparently plausible and reasonable but they must be examined and scrutinized with the greatest care because they strike at the roots of the fundamental principles of parliamentary democracy as we know it in Canada. Of course it may be said that we have done it already. Of course we have. But that, subject only to the exception of the committee on external affairs, happened a long time ago. The activities of these committees have become pretty well defined. But what has been suggested today by most of the speakers is that the committee should take on itself the responsibility for laying out lines of policy involving expenditures.

Another reason why that course is objectionable is that under our system the government goes to the people, outlines its platform and either secures or does not secure the support of the people. Having been returned to office it feels that it has a mandate. Each year in the speech from the throne it lays before parliament its program for the session. Since our governments are reasonable, and I believe as intelligent and as responsible as any that can be found, that program is conceived with the idea of meeting the needs of the Canadian people with such means as the people are willing to put at the disposal of parliament for the purpose.

In other words, the art of government is the art of the possible, the art of balancing what is desirable with the means by which it can be achieved. That can be done only by a government that has a long view of the whole comprehensive picture of departmental activities. If you have one committee on social security, another on housing, another on agriculture, another on fisheries and another on defence, each initiating lines of activity and developing programs of their own, then where will you have that comprehensive program that is necessary in order to carry on the government of the country?

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Claxton: I am watching the clock. I do not know if the hon. member wants to have a vote on this.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister be logical and go as far as to recommend the elimination of all standing committees?

Mr. Claxton: I have indicated already that I would not do that. In conclusion may I draw to your attention in a most summary way the reasons why I think this motion should not be acceded to. In the first place a committee considering policy, administration, appropriations and expenditures would be useless unless it made recommendations to the house. Such recommendations would have to be accepted or rejected by the government after it had already arrived at a decision in respect of the very matter which was the subject of recommendation. Such a decision would have been arrived at by the government in the light of its knowledge and appreciation of the various needs of government and the means whereby those needs might be met. That is where the responsibility of the government comes in.

To the extent that a committee substituted its views for those of the government and the party to which the government is responsible, and the majority in the house to which the government is responsible, it would remove responsibility from the government.

In the second place such a committee would remove responsibility from the party supporting the government and tend to get away from the two-party system which we believe fundamental and essential to the maintenance of parliamentary democracy.

In the third place it would throw out of balance the government's program for the raising of revenue and the allocation of appropriations. Fourth, it would cut directly across the fundamental principle that only the government can propose expenditure. Fifth, it would put departmental officials in the position where they would either have to agree or disagree with the minister to whom they are responsible or state that an answer could not be given as contrary to government policy, and so interfere seriously with the administration of the public service.

The hon. member who moved the motion, and I believe three out of four others who spoke, made other suggestions relative to the reorganization of the committee set-up. I must say that the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), in giving the list of fifteen committees, made out a pretty good case for the elimination of some of them because they have seldom if ever met during the last five sessions.

I suggest this is the kind of thing which could only be considered as a part of a general examination of the rules of procedure of the house. I suggest also that to consider the establishment of a single committee, when several others have been put forward by hon. members, would not be the best course to follow. While I am personally opposed to the project and would vote against it if it is put forward now, it seems to me that the best time for the matter to receive consideration would be at a moment when the rules of procedure and the structure of parliamentary committees as a whole were under consideration.

Motion (Mr. Fleming) negatived on division.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow the Prime Minister will move the motion in his name under government notices of motion concerning sittings on Mondays. Then we will take up item No. 11 under government orders, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Mines and Resources, and then item No. 16 under government orders, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Fisheries. Then we will go into supply and first take up Agriculture, then Veterans Affairs, Transport and Labour, but I cannot give the order of the last three departments.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, October 13, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

NEWFOUNDLAND CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

What is the amount of revenue collected for (a) customs; (b) excise; (c) other sources, in Newfoundland, for the six-month period ending September 30, 1949?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON MONDAYS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Monday, October 17th instant, and every Monday thereafter to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

He said: In moving this order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the opportunity to express what I believe to be the feeling of most members of this house, namely, appreciation of the interesting debates we have had so far this session on private members' notices of motions and public bills. More time for these debates was made available by the fact that we disposed of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne in much less time than it has occupied in any other session since I first came to this house. Several hon. members have indicated to me that in their opinion the debates on these motions were much more interesting than a protracted debate on the address would have been. Personally I should be inclined to agree with that view. I suggest to hon. members that they think the matter over and ask themselves whether it would be a more interesting use of the time at the disposal of the house to have at the beginning of the session these opportunities for debating the various subjects dealt with in the notices of motions placed on the order paper by private members. I am sure that the debates we have had so far have been interesting and valuable, and I should like to extend my compliments to those who have participated in them.

Several days have been devoted during this session to private members' motions. As hon. members know, there is a large volume of public business that must be dealt with. Even though we have devoted several days to the consideration of estimates we have not yet disposed of one department in its entirety. It has been found also that discussion of the estimates gives hon. members an opportunity to bring before the house matters which they feel are deserving of consideration, and that it would be well to be able to proceed with the estimates in a more leisurely fashion than is possible at the very end of a session. For this reason I hope that the motion will commend itself to the house, and that, before the business of the session can be considered as completed, ample opportunity will be given to hon. members to deal with matters which appear to them to be of public interest.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I think that hon. members will agree with much that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has said. There is one matter that I should like to mention, Mr. Speaker. It arises out of what the Prime Minister said with respect to opening up the estimates of the departments. On previous occasions the government has first settled upon two or three departments only, and often the estimates of many departments are left until the closing days of the session. The item of departmental administration gives hon. members an opportunity of discussing in a general way the policies and details of the department concerned. I suggest to the government that in this session, and in future sessions, if it meets with their convenience—I am sure it will meet with the convenience of hon. members generally—we have a wider distribution of departments, from the point of view of the estimates presented so that at least the item of departmental administration may be discussed in leisurely fashion. This would meet the wishes of many hon. members who desire not to be rushed at the very last minute in discussing major items. I should like the Prime Minister to take this suggestion into consideration, if he will. It would improve the whole standard of debate.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I do not think there is any objection from this group to the motion which has just been moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). We are all appreciative of the opportunity we have had this session to discuss private members' resolutions on private members' days, which it was not possible to do in other years, particularly during the war years and the years immediately following, because of the urgency of government business which resulted in the curtailing of private members' days. But I hope that I did not understand the Prime Minister to suggest that in future if we want to have private members' days we would have to curtail the debate on the address. As a matter of fact, private members' days are provided for under the rules of the house, although there is no guarantee as to how many there shall be. At least, under the standing orders of this house, we are entitled to some, and I do not think we should be told that if we are good boys we can have them, but that if we are not, they will be taken away. What happened this year was that the debate on the address was completed in time to give us Thursdays, which we would not have had if the debate had continued for four weeks, as sometimes happens. Subject to these comments, may I say that we are quite agreeable to the Prime Minister's motion being adopted.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to add one word to what has already been said. We shall have no objections at all to the passing of this motion, but I should like to say to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that we have appreciated the opportunity to discuss private members' resolutions, some of which have been on the order paper since last spring.

I understand that prior to the war, when sessions were carried on in a more leisurely manner, private members' days were greater in number than they have been since. As one member of this group I welcomed the return this session to a greater number of private members' days early in the session. I do not know whether that came about simply as a result of the shortness of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. But we have appreciated it, sir, and in future sessions I should like to see even greater recognition of the right of private members to discuss their resolutions as fully as possible. However, I think the time has come in the present session when we should pass this motion.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I want to make one observation. I hope the adoption of this motion will enable the government to expedite the bill to amend the National Housing Act. I think many hon. members have regretted that there should have been any delay in the introduction of that important measure. May we have some indication as to when that measure will be introduced?

Mr. St. Laurent: With respect to the remarks made by the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), may I say that I shall be glad to have my colleagues give consideration to suggestions made at any time by representatives of any of the groups as to bringing forward one department instead of another, so that there may be an opportunity for discussion on the item of general administration. We appreciate the fact that when these matters are brought forward it is desired by hon. gentlemen sitting opposite that we make better progress than we do, and for this reason, if for no other, we shall be glad to give sympathetic consideration to any such suggestion.

I did not intend to suggest that I was asking hon. members to behave in any special manner. What I was referring to was what the hon. member (Mr. MacInnis) himself agreed to. It is only the first four Thursdays that are private members' days. In previous years the debate on the address has taken up those four Thursdays; therefore there were none available for private members' notices of motions. During this session we have had three of these Thursdays available for discussion of private members' motions.

Mr. Knowles: Just two.

Mr. St. Laurent: With respect to the introduction of legislation, we do wish to bring forward at the earliest possible moment all of the legislation announced. The housing legislation would have been ready at the very first day of the session had it not been for the correspondence that is still going on with representatives of provincial governments. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) wished to get as clear a statement of the views of the provincial governments as possible before bringing in a printed bill; otherwise the provincial administrations might believe it to be too late to make any further suggestions.

Mr. Church: Will any appropriation be included in the coming budget for the cost of these private members' motions?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, but it would be only the item which provides generally for the cost of legislation.

Motion agreed to.

SHIPPING

TIE-UP AT HALIFAX—QUESTION OF FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. This morning's press carries the following headline: "Mothball fleet grows; 72,000 tons of shipping idle in Halifax; no cargo; federal aid only solution."

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should not at this time read newspaper headlines or articles.

Mr. Fraser: All right. Has the department of the Minister of Trade and Commerce taken any steps to relieve the situation which prevails at Halifax—and it may be the same at other points on the Atlantic coast—where 72,000 tons of shipping are idle and many men are out of work?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question asked by the hon. member is one which the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) had intended to ask.

Mr. Graydon: You are giving him notice of the question now.

Mr. Chevrier: I might tell the house that the present plight of shipowners and ship operators is serious, first of all because of the increased costs of operation. I am informed that the costs of operating a Canadian ship are at least twenty-five per cent higher than the costs of operating a United Kingdom ship. Costs of construction vary to the extent of fifty per cent as between Canada and the United Kingdom. A further serious situation is caused by the deterioration in ocean freight rates. Finally, the exchange situation brought about by devaluation has had an effect. I regret to say that for these reasons some ships have had to tie up. I can assure the senior member for Halifax and the hon. member for Peterborough West that the government is giving careful consideration to the matter.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to ask a further question. Despite what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has said, is it not also a fact that we have lost our foreign markets?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Perhaps I might reply to the hon. member by telling him that in the year ended September 1 last, the latest date for which figures are available, exports were the highest of any previous peacetime year in the history of Canada.

Mr. Gordon B. Isnor (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, so that there may be no misunderstanding in the minds of hon. members, may I point out that in the regular fashion, and as a matter of courtesy, I had sent notice of my question to the Minister of Transport. In my question I asked:

> Will the Minister of Transport, in the very near future, make a statement in respect to what, if any, action will be taken to assist the shipping interests at Halifax and other Canadian ports to overcome the loss of business, because of the exchange situation and the lack of overseas cargo?

I wish to place this question on the record.

CANADA FORESTRY ACT

FOREST PROTECTION AND EXPERIMENT, CONTROL AND MANAGEMENT

Hon. Colin Gibson (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to present a bill to authorize the governor in council to establish as a national forest or as a forest experimental area lands belonging to His Majesty in the right of Canada and to exercise control and management thereof and construct works therein; to establish and maintain forest research laboratories; to assist provinces or owners of forests and to enter into agreements respecting the protection and development of forest lands. The Minister of Mines and Resources is authorized to appoint temporary officers and employees for the carrying out of the provisions of the act.
> Expenditures incurred are payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the minister ought to take advantage of this occasion to make a statement, which I have no doubt he is now prepared to make.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I have a brief statement to make. I had proposed making it, however, in committee, if that is satisfactory.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Mr. Chairman, this resolution was on the order paper at the last session of parliament, but was not reached; consequently we are proceeding with it again at this session.

Hon. members will recall that we have as chapter 78 of the Revised Statutes of Canada an act known as the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act. In 1930 the National Parks Act was passed. It dealt entirely with the national parks and removed from the original bill all the provisions referring to them. In the same year, 1930, the natural resources owned by the dominion in the western provinces were transferred to those provinces, with the result that all national forests which had formerly been set aside were placed under provincial jurisdiction. As a result, the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act, as it exists, is out of date and no longer adequately meets the program and policy of the government.

While it is true that the natural resources of Canada come under provincial jurisdiction, the dominion government does of course recognize that it has a direct interest and responsibility in assisting in the development, protection and utilization of our forest products. The dominion government secures considerable revenue from forest industries. The employment they provide and the subsidiary industries that are maintained have contributed in great measure to maintaining the high standard of living which we have at present in Canada. It is not the intention in any way through this bill to invade provincial jurisdiction, but it is felt that by close co-operation and agreement with the provinces we can assist in the development of a constructive forestry program throughout the country. This bill is intended to provide a basis for that assistance.

It should not be assumed that up to the present time nothing has been done in this regard. I would draw the attention of hon. members to some of the activities of the forestry branch. In the dominion forestry service we are at the present time operating three research laboratories, one at Ottawa and one at Vancouver; and we assist in the operation of the pulp and paper research institute at Montreal. The functions of these laboratories are to experiment with new uses of various products, to take steps to preserve the life of the woods we produce, and to prevent waste. In addition to laboratories we have five forest experimental stations which are operating in five different provinces. Those have been set up for the study of problems concerning silviculture, the protection of forests, and the utilization of the products of our forests. Those forest experimental stations cover an area aggregating 227 square miles.

In addition to those laboratories and forest experimental stations we are doing a considerable amount of research work along other lines. For example, we have gathered together a tremendous amount of statistical information that is of great benefit both to the forest industry and to the provinces. By means of air photographs we have been able to secure valuable information as to the extent and quality of the forest resources of this country. New techniques and equipment have been developed which have greatly improved the work being done. The time and the cost required to secure this information have been cut down. I think we might well be gratified to know that the equipment we have developed in this country is now being used in many other countries, as well as by the provincial authorities.

There are many problems concerning forest conservation which require consideration. There is the problem of protecting our forests from fire, from insects, and from disease. These problems are common to all the provinces and undoubtedly can best be met by a combination of effort in research work which will be of benefit to us all.

The problems of reforestation and publicity can best be met by a joint program to be carried out in close co-operation with the provinces. The bill that is to be introduced will provide that the dominion government may enter into agreements with the provinces, with other departments of government and with other persons, in order to promote efficient forestry development.

I should like to point out one mistake that has been made in printing the resolution as it appears on the order paper today. This may have been copied from a similar resolution that was up for consideration last session. The resolution reads in part:

> The Minister of Mines and Resources is authorized to appoint temporary officers and employees for the carrying out of the provisions of the act.

There is nothing in the bill giving that authority to the minister, and I do not think it should be in the resolution. Any employees that will be taken on for the purposes of carrying out the activities authorized by the bill will be appointed in the usual way through the civil service.

Mr. McIvor: I have no doubt that many hon. members of this house know that the lakehead is the centre of development of our timber industry. During the last three or four months considerable alarm has been felt at the lakehead over the extensive ruination which has occurred in our forests because of the budworm. I am sure that those who know anything about the ravages of this budworm will welcome the statement which has been made by the minister and will read it carefully.

I commend the minister for what he has said about giving assistance to the provinces and to owners of timber land. We certainly would like to have a laboratory at the lakehead, right at the place where things are happening.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): As one who comes from British Columbia I commend the minister for introducing this measure. The forests of this country are of great value as a source of continuous income for our people from one coast to the other. I had the experience last year of proceeding along the Mackenzie river in northern Canada and observing a forest fire which had been burning for several weeks and which was wiping out great areas of timber which even today would be of commercial value.

I hope that the bill to be introduced will make possible the planting of state forests throughout this dominion. I do not think this country could make a better investment for the future than to have many forests under cultivation. Some of them could be planted on marginal lands which are not particularly fitted for agriculture—I am thinking of the valleys of British Columbia.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The Fraser river valley, of course. There has been a continuous change in the value of the forest products of this country. Only a few years ago the timber in northern Ontario was regarded as having no commercial value. I can remember when the timber along the Canadian National Railways was not regarded as having any commercial value. Yet within one's lifetime there has been developed one of the greatest pulpwood mills in the world, and it is utilizing timber products which at one time were considered to have no value. This goes on all over the country.

Up in the Peace river country, some of which is in the constituency which I represent, there are stands of trees suitable for saw mill manufacture and possibly the greatest reserves of pulpwood available in this country are to be found along the Peace, Finlay and Mackenzie rivers. There is no doubt that this measure is of the utmost importance to the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, in the 1946 session, speaking at considerable length, I urged the government to give assistance to the forest industry to a greater extent than had been done up to that time; therefore I am pleased to see that a bill is to be introduced to carry out some of the suggestions I then made. I shall reserve my main remarks until I have had an opportunity to study the bill. I should like, however, to ask the minister to what extent the provisions of this bill will apply to dominion-owned lands on the Indian reserves.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): The bill will cover all lands held in the right of Canada. The dominion forestry service will issue regulations to govern forest areas. The provisions of the bill will apply to dominion lands as well as to lands covered by agreements which we may make with the provinces in connection with experimental stations located on provincial limits.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I think we all realize that the conservation and maintenance of our forests is of vital interest to the Canadian people. As a member representing a constituency in which a large number of people derive their livelihood from the forest industry, and as one who has spent almost his whole life in developing a small forest, and in the growing of trees, I take great pleasure in making a few remarks on this resolution.

First of all may I say that I am pleased that the government has decided to introduce this resolution. I shall look forward with interest to seeing the bill that is to follow. The subject of the resolution is of particular interest to me, if you will pardon a personal reference, because I am a man who derives far more pleasure from skidding trails, a deck of logs, the perfume of sawn lumber, and woodland operations generally, than from listening to nebulous arguments on some intangible point of law. These things mean more to me and exemplify reality, shall I say.

I am happy to note that in recent years interest in forest conservation has widened. I have made a considerable study of forest conservation, tree planting, selective logging and things of that kind, and looking back over the years I find that there is now a much wider interest in forest conservation and maintenance than there was twenty-five or thirty years ago. I am pleased to note that in recent years trade union organizations and farm organizations in Canada and the United States have expressed themselves as being greatly concerned about the conservation of our timber resources. These people are becoming more aware of the importance of our forests from the point of view of climate, employment, irrigation, and flood control.

Forestry was the first industry on the North American continent. It has been in existence ever since Leif Ericsson came to the shores of this continent and took cargoes of timber back to Greenland. Then there was the development of the lumber industry by the New England colonists who first cut spars for masts for British ships and for shipment to Great Britain. We of this continent are the most fortunate people in the world in having forests containing between 1,100 and 1,200 different species. Today we can see the difference in type between the pulp timber of northern Ontario and the giant trees found in California in the Sequoia national forest, one of which is estimated to contain, if scaled, some 621,000 feet of lumber. Interest in forest conservation in Canada, so far as my reading of the subject is concerned, developed towards the concluding days of the nineteenth century, but the first large-scale organized expression of growing public opinion with respect to the conservation of forests was in the calling of the Canadian forest congress in 1906 by the forestry association of Canada. I believe that congress was called as a result of the successful holding of a similar congress in the United States about twelve months previously.

Although we have had but one major congress in Canada, since that time there has been increasing interest on the part of provincial governments because of their acquiring natural resources within the provinces. At the same time we have had federal government officials doing all they could with the money they had to spend. I should like to bring to the attention of the house a paragraph from a pamphlet known as "Forest Facts", published in the 1920's, to indicate how little had been done up to that time. The quotation reads:

> The forest resources of Canada are being depleted at the rate of about five billion cubic feet annually through cutting, fire, insects, and decay. If the reproduction and young timber are not protected, the stand of merchantable timber accessible for exploitation will not withstand this drain for more than twenty-five years . . . Few people realize the urgent need which exists for a forest policy in Canada.

That was the situation in the 1920's. We have had the dominion forest conservation commission, which conducted a survey of our forest resources in 1913 and 1914 without making recommendations. As I said before, we have had officials of various departments of the federal government doing limited work in connection with forestry. We have had the provincial governments taking an increasing interest. In addition to these efforts, a very encouraging development in recent years has been the increasing interest of the industry itself. I think it is only fair to say that the forest operators of Canada, large and small, are contributing large sums of money, either toward conservation policies given effect to by individuals, or in support of policies advocated by organizations, and for general publicity purposes to stimulate public awareness of this most important and vital situation.

In this respect I might say in passing that the Canadian Forestry Association has carried on an excellent work throughout the years. Various newspapers, and other publications such as "Woodland World," have also made a contribution. As a result of the fact that we have gradually moved from a pioneer civilization into an industrial civilization, there is a greatly increased consciousness of how basic the forest industry is to Canada. I have read a great deal about various conservation and management policies, and so on. I have read a lot of things written by people who read books and then wrote articles based on pure theory. I have heard lumber operators sometimes unjustly criticized because the person who criticized them did not have knowledge of the conditions under which they were working.

To formulate a policy for forest conservation and for forest management means that you have to formulate a policy to meet a great number of different conditions throughout the country. For instance, on the Pacific coast we have large timber stands with virgin timber that in many cases is five to six hundred years old. It is easy to criticize the operators for cutting those large stands, but on the Pacific coast you must cut virgin and mature stands clean, and follow with a policy of replanting or of leaving seed trees to carry on reproduction.

In the interior of British Columbia there is an entirely different situation facing operators. They are operating largely in second growth stands with timber up to 125 years old. There they can log selectively. There some operators are beginning to take a limited amount of timber per acre per year from their holdings. Then we come to the timber forest conservation policy of the prairies, where it is almost entirely a policy of replanting under entirely different climatic conditions. Then we come to the pulpwood industry of northern Ontario, which represents an entirely different problem. Therefore in Canada we must have a policy drafted to meet different conditions and changing circumstances. I would urge that the dominion government give every support to the forestry congress proposed by the Canadian Forestry Association to be held in 1950. We all recognize that the management of forests comes directly under the provincial governments, but I am of the opinion that if we are to have an understanding of our forest problems, and if we are to get satisfactory public support for conservation policies that are drafted with a realization of the varying conditions in Canada, we must bring together all interested people at a national congress to function as a clearing house of ideas and opinions. Therefore I urge the minister and his department to give every support possible to the plans for a proposed forestry congress in 1950.

In this connection I should like to quote from an excellent brochure published by the Canadian Forestry Association. I believe it is worth any member's time to read this pamphlet. The excerpt reads:

> The Canadian Forestry Association feels it is urgent to the welfare of Canada that a second Canadian forestry congress be convened, with the widest representation from all who are directly and indirectly interested in the forests of Canada.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the essential steps that must be taken to establish a sound forest policy have been well defined as a result of wide Canadian experience. I want to mention briefly some general principles concerning the establishment of such a policy in this country.

In the first place I think we must proceed to halt and control the major destructive forces and processes such as shifting cultivation, overgrazing and burning, and the exploitative and excessive rate of utilization of productive forests. I believe we must create a body of public opinion on forest policy and law, and apply it through a competent professional organization. I believe also that we must ensure understanding of and support for these programs; that we must estimate the prospective need for forests in the various provinces, and determine what the forest lands of the country can produce under proper management. I believe it is necessary to apply forestry practices which will be effective and economically feasible, and also to learn a great deal more about forests, forest products and the utilization of waste than is known at present.

I could go on at greater length, Mr. Chairman, but when the bill is introduced I intend to deal with some matters I shall not mention at this stage. I do believe, however, this resolution is evidence that the government is cognizant of greater public interest in the conservation of our forests, and that it now realizes that our forests are a basic resource and must be treated as a national trust. Truly our woods and forests are one in our lives with soil, water, animals and food. Soil and water conservation, flood control, lasting abundance in industry and prosperity on the land—all are involved in the proper use of our forest resources. With all the ravages of the past, the errors and delays, the time required to develop a widespread realization of the problem before us, I am certain that the genius of Canadian democracy can yet restore our forests, redeem our watersheds, bring new life to ghost towns, and find increasingly successful ways to fight fire and pests, if this parliament and the legislatures of this country are willing to give the lead by co-operating one with another.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I should like to expand my reply to the question of the hon. member for Nanaimo concerning forests on Indian lands, to point out that while this measure will not directly apply to forest resources on Indian lands, it will of course apply to forest reserves that may be established on those lands.

Mr. Low: I have in mind two questions I should like to ask the minister, but before doing so I want to say briefly how much we appreciate the action of the government in bringing down the legislation which is to be based on this resolution. It must give great satisfaction to Canadians from one end of the country to the other who know anything about the situation that has developed with respect to our forest regions. When we consider the figures which were put on Hansard the other day, showing that in the period from 1940 to 1948 something like 17,000,000 acres of timber land in this country were ravaged by fire; when we realize the tremendous value of the merchantable timber on those lands that were burned over, and when we realize how destructive these fires have been, not only to our timber resources but also to our soil and water conservation measures, I believe we must all acknowledge that the minister and the government are to be highly commended on bringing in legislation to provide for closer co-operation with the provinces in better methods of control and utilization of our forest resources.

My constituency of Peace River—not Cariboo, by the way, which is represented by another hon. member—is a big lumber producing area; but year after year we are finding it necessary to go further and further back into uneconomic areas in order to get the timber required. Unless new methods are adopted that will enable forest areas closer to the settlements to produce the lumber which is required, some day it may become economically impossible for our people to get out that timber and make use of it. All too frequently the government of my province has found itself utterly incapable of coping with the fire situation. It just has not the resources. That was one reason why some years ago the province entered into negotiations with the federal government and the predecessors of my hon. friend in the Department of Mines and Resources, with a view to bringing about closer co-operation between the dominion and the provinces with the ultimate objective of preserving the watershed on the east slope of the rockies. Eventually those negotiations bore fruit, and some two years ago a joint board or commission was set up. I understand the work that has been done by that board in the past year and a half has been especially good, and I hope that in the course of his remarks the minister will say something about that work. It seems to me that the joint board set up for the preservation and reforestation of the east slope of the rockies might be a pattern for the action envisioned in this resolution. I would ask the minister, when he has a moment to speak, to give us some report of what has been done and the success that has attended the efforts of that board.

The minister acknowledged that there was a printing error in the resolution, and that the following words should not be there:

> The Minister of Mines and Resources is authorized to appoint temporary officers and employees for the carrying out of the provisions of the act.

Under the circumstances would it not be well for the minister to move an amendment deleting this sentence? Otherwise when the committee passes upon the resolution that part will be included, and we feel that the resolution should not be adopted while it contains those words.

Personally I want to commend the minister for his vision. I think he has the interests of Canada at heart when he brings forward this resolution. It seems to me he is exhibiting statesmanship and leadership in his department that we have not known there for a long time, and I extend my congratulations to him on what he is doing. I think this bill opens a new era of co-operation between the provinces and the dominion in connection with the conservation of the rich resources with which this country has been endowed. I am sure all provincial governments will welcome the legislation, and will take advantage of every opportunity to co-operate with the minister and his department. I know something of the work that has been done at these experimental stations in attempting to discover the causes of diseases that have been rapidly destroying some of our finest trees, and the promise of an expansion of that work is something to be commended. I am sure the people of this country will receive it with thanksgiving and joy.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I quite agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Peace River in regard to the work of the joint board set up to look after the conservation of the forest resources on the eastern slope of the rockies. I have not had a chance to visit that area, but I know they are doing valuable work, and the progress they are making in the preservation of that watershed should be of great benefit to the prairie provinces. I agree with the hon. member also that probably a motion should be made striking out from this resolution the words:

> The Minister of Mines and Resources is authorized to appoint temporary officers and employees for the carrying out of the provisions of the act.

As I cannot make that motion myself, I would ask my colleague the Minister of Public Works if he would make it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move that the words quoted by the Minister of Mines and Resources be struck out of this resolution.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): With my colleague from Nanaimo, I come from Vancouver island which probably has the greatest stand of soft woods left in the British empire. Naturally I am greatly interested in this new bill which the minister proposes to introduce. I think we are all conscious of the fact that the economy of Canada is greatly dependent on the forest industry. I am rather curious to find out why at this late date there is a necessity for the introduction of such a bill. It has always seemed to me that surely the federal government has been conscious of the tremendous revenues that have accrued from the forest industries. We have had our forest laboratories in operation, of course. I am rather curious to find out from the minister just what this bill purports to do that he has not already authority to do.

As to reforestation, it becomes a matter of simple economics. I think it is a matter for the closest liaison between the minister's own department, the Department of Finance and the department of the Minister of National Revenue, whom I see over there, to make it of advantage to investors to put their money into a reforestation program. After all, if you put money in now, it is never going to do you any personal good. Trees take too long to grow for people to expect to get anything back in their own lifetime, usually. Many submissions have been made by the forest industries of British Columbia and of other provinces to the taxation department asking that more latitude be given to them so that it would be made more attractive for investors to put their money into reforestation programs. I should be glad if at some time, perhaps at the congress mentioned by the hon. member for Kootenay West, it would be possible for the forest industries to present their problems and suggestions to the taxation department in that regard. I can think of nothing that would cause more trees to be grown in Canada than making it attractive to private enterprise to put money into that particular business. I should like the minister to explain to me, if he will, just what he hopes to do through this bill that he has not already authority to do.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): As I said in my opening remarks, we already had a bill, the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act, which was out of date, and it was decided to bring in a bill to authorize the activities of the department more in keeping with the program and policies of the department at the present time. We have had operating, it is true, laboratories and experimental stations. Those have been authorized by vote of the House of Commons, and the money has been authorized for that purpose. But it is felt that we should have the forestry program modernized so that the department would have less difficulty in entering into the agreements that are required to carry out the joint program with the provinces.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni mentioned the profit from growing trees. There is a definite profit in reforestation because, when you plant your trees, you plant them thickly; and in a few years' time you can trim them out and sell what you trim out as Christmas trees. That is being done in Ontario at the present time, and I believe that Ontario has about the best policy of reforestation of any province in Canada. In fact, I know it has.

I feel that one reason for that is that for some years now the Ontario Horticultural Society, which is separate from the province, has been encouraging the growing and the planting of trees. Some few years ago Mr. Carter—I believe he lives in Guelph; he is a past president of the Ontario Horticultural Society—gave trophies in the rural schools throughout the province, to schools that would plant the best area or district in trees; and the Ontario government would give every school the trees to plant. That plan has been growing and growing each year. Some of the schools started in with a quarter of an acre. I think that is what they were supposed to plant. The program has grown and many of the schools now have many acres in plantations. The schools can even make money in trimming the trees.

The hon. member for Peace River commended the minister for bringing in this resolution. I have read in the press many a time, as I know the minister has also, "Born twenty years too soon." I feel that this measure should have been brought in at least twenty or thirty years ago. Back in 1940 when we were going over the estimates of the minister's department, out of an expenditure of some $240,000—if my memory serves me aright; I have not the figures here—the government planted only some fifteen acres of trees. The rest of the money was spent in cutting out and so forth. The minister mentioned that they have laboratories for finding out ways and means of using wood, pulp and one thing and another. But I do not believe that his department have the facilities for finding out what will save our forests. I know that right here in this house we plugged for something to be done with regard to the budworm; I believe it was with the Minister of Agriculture and also with the Minister of Mines and Resources. In my district this year we had a worm that some people call the army worm. We had it last year too. I believe the province call it the tent caterpillar. It was certainly on the march. They travel as close together as my fingers and travel at such a rate that they could cross the road nearly as fast as a turtle. They just jammed the highways. They travelled into the woods, and before half an hour had passed after they crossed the road, not a leaf would be left on any of the trees. I believe this department should find some ways and means of killing that worm. The government was asked if they could do anything to help, but nothing was done. Some people suggested spraying from the air. But you cannot spray from the air in populated districts, especially in the summertime when tourists are there.

The minister mentioned the fact that he was going to confer with the provinces. He did not say that he had conferred with them. I wonder if he would say whether he has already done so, and what they intend to do in this matter.

There is one point which has not been mentioned so far. It is the fact that if the forests are thinned out, as they have been in the last fifty or one hundred years, and that thinning out keeps up, we shall have nothing at all with which to attract United States tourists. If we did not have trees along our river banks and along our lakeshores the fish in those rivers and lakes would not live because they depend on the slow seepage of water into these rivers and lakes to get the food which they require. It has been found in places where the river banks and lakeshores have been cleared of trees that the fish have eventually disappeared. Has the minister talked to the provinces? Where does he intend to set up nurseries? Will they be set up in conjunction with the provinces, or will they be set up on dominion government land?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I did not say that government nurseries were to be set up anywhere.

Mr. Fraser: Should they not?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): As I pointed out originally, the control of natural resources is first of all the responsibility of the provinces. We had dominion forests in this country and in 1930 we turned them over to the provinces for their control and management. Therefore it was realized that the dominion government is not primarily responsible for the development of national forests, although we are keenly interested in the preservation of the forests and we want to do what we can to assist.

The hon. member for Peterborough West asked if we had consulted the provinces. We have had close co-operation with the provinces, and I can say definitely that they were consulted as to the provisions of the bill. We have had close co-operation with them, and we intend to continue it. The bill founded on this resolution will provide for agreements with the provinces to assist in mutual projects to protect and to develop the natural resources which are primarily the responsibility of the provinces.

Mr. Fraser: Does the minister think that it would be wise at once to get in touch with the provinces and consult with them? The minister's department has had no experience really in regard to forests, and the provinces have. The minister just said that the federal government had no responsibility for national forests. They certainly have some responsibility for national forests.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I did not say we had no interest in the national forests. I can assure my hon. friend that the officials of the forestry branch are in close consultation with the provincial authorities in the various provinces. They have been working together dealing with forest pests. We have not only the spruce budworm but various diseases that are attacking our forests. Our experimental stations are working in close co-operation with the provincial authorities in order to find cures and to assist in preventing damage that will develop in our forests if no action is taken. The same thing applies to fire protection. We realize that it is a great expense to the provinces to deal with that alone. I am quite sure that the co-operation which has existed in the past will be continued by our officials in the future.

Mr. Adamson: This resolution deals with the whole ecology of our forests. The forest, whether it is provincial or federal, is like the king, indivisible. Likewise, the impact on the whole forest economy is a total impact on the economy of all of Canada, which cannot be overestimated. For that reason the bill, founded on this resolution, will be welcomed by all sides of the house. So far the debate has done one thing. A large number of members have spoken and they have each posed a different question. In many ways the questions were technical, dealing with reforestation, cutting, pest control, fire and its effect on the water resources of the country.

I want to make a suggestion to the minister. It arises out of the debate we have had this afternoon. In many ways this is a highly technical question. It is not a question on which there can be any political difference of opinion. Every hon. member is as jealous of the forest resources of Canada as any other hon. member; therefore I do hope that when the bill gets into the committee stage the minister will allow it to go to the committee on mines, forests and waters. I make this suggestion specifically so that in the committee we can hear the expert opinion of the pulp and paper industry, the conservation authorities, the provincial forestry authorities, the large timber operators on the Pacific coast, and people such as the wildlife conservationists. All these authorities and all these people have a vital interest in the forests. They all have a special problem. If I may say so, their problems in the main are technical. It would be a great advantage and help to the house if that evidence could be adduced in the committee. It would be a great service to the country to have evidence given by experts in that committee. For instance, we could have information on a comparison between Canadian and Scandinavian practices with regard to conservation, cutting and reforestation.

The matter of the water table destruction is important, that is, the ever decreasing and ever deepening level at which water is found practically all over the country. Co-operation with the new river valley authorities set up by the province of Ontario is important. That is a new act passed by the Ontario provincial authorities setting up what are known as river conservation authorities. They take one complete river and plan the conservation of it. Methods and remedies such as the replanting of trees, contour plowing, construction of storage dams and the restoration of the normal flow on the river are used. The most glaring example, and one on which much work has been done in this connection, is the Ganaraska river and now the Thames river near London in western Ontario. As a matter of fact, a very active conservation department is in operation under the Ontario provincial government at the present time.

There is the question of soil erosion and of the value of farmer's woodlot. Then there is the old forest reserves and national parks act. Will it be repealed? Certainly, in many ways, it needs amendment apart altogether from the bill which is to be founded on the resolution we are now discussing.

Then we come to the question whether it is advisable to set up a forest products laboratory such as the forest products laboratory in Madison, Wisconsin, where a great deal of study and research is being done on the use of all kinds of wood products, for example, the use and the salvage of what were waste products such as sawdust and bark, and other waste products which used to be burned. There is the question whether it is feasible to set up such a laboratory in Canada so that the efficiency and economy of the whole wood products industry may be improved. While I understand that stumpage, and dues paid by owners of timber limits, are provincial matters, it would be interesting to know how far that money would go to rehabilitate the land and to replant the forests so that the crops of trees might be continuous, and the land might not be exploited. The forest is a continuous asset; it must not be used as a rich resource to be exploited by the first man or company on the scene.

The restoration of the forest covering in the old and settled parts of Canada is one of the most important matters with which we could deal. Soil erosion and the resultant destruction of wildlife, the increasing incidence of fires, the destruction of rivers, and the fact that the percentage of farm lands under forest covering has been greatly decreased, far below the limits of safety, are indications of the perils and problems which beset large areas of Canada.

I refer to the importance of forests, not only to the great forest areas of British Columbia and northern Ontario and Quebec, where the forest product industries are located, but more particularly to the importance of forests to farmers and others in the central and southern parts of Ontario and southern Quebec.

These may be technical matters, but there are people in Canada who have the answers. Parliament would be rendering a service if, for these reasons alone, this bill were sent to the committee on mines, forests and waters, so that every hon. member and the people throughout the country may have explicit, accurate and complete information on the vital problem of preserving our Canadian forests.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to delay the committee long, but there are one or two points which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister and which in my view are germane to the subject under discussion.

First of all I did not think the minister gave a clear answer respecting the negotiations carried on or the discussions held between the dominion government and the representatives of the provinces. I mention this only because a few moments ago the Prime Minister, answering a question with respect to the introduction of housing legislation at an early date, indicated that one of the reasons the measure had not been proceeded with earlier was that he did not want the provinces to learn for the first time some aspects of the dominion government's point of view in any legislation which might be brought down. He indicated, in other words, that he was anxious that the provinces should have a fair opportunity to discuss the whole matter before legislation was brought to the house.

In expressing agreement with the principle of the resolution, I wish to have it understood that I believe it is important that in all matters such as this, where it is the intention of the dominion government to co-operate with provincial jurisdictions, the dominion should be very careful to lay the groundwork well in the first instance, so that there may be no reason for a lack of co-operation at a later time.

I have no doubt our forests are assets which present a challenge to the minds of every member in the house and of our people generally. I remember in my earlier years attending a public meeting in Ontario and hearing the late Hon. William Finlayson, the then provincial minister of lands and forests, deliver a speech. I believe that would be some time in the twenties. In that speech he referred to our forests as a crop and said —and I agree with him—that too often we have regarded our forests as a necessarily wasting asset instead of handling them as we would ordinary field crops. He pointed out that we would not think of planting a grain crop in the agricultural areas, and then proceed to harvest them without doing something about the next crop. He added that in some instances it took more than fifty years for those crops to develop.

I remember clearly the response to that suggestion by an old gentleman from a farming district in the county of Peel. This old gentleman, whom I knew well, sat in the front seat of the meeting. I hesitate, in the presence of such a highly developed and sensitive group of gentlemen, to use his expression; but the old gentleman said, "Mr. Minister, did you say fifty years?" and when Mr. Finlayson said that he had, the old gentleman said, "Well, to a farmer like myself that seems to me like a damned slow crop".

I believe that the pioneering work done at that time did create in the minds of the people generally the thought that, after all, the forests must be regarded as a crop, in the ordinary sense of the term. If I were to offer any criticism of the resolution it would be that perhaps we had begun too late to deal with this great asset, this important heritage.

I was looking up a few figures a short time ago and, while I have not all of them up to date, the ones I have indicate that we have in Canada three-quarters of a million square miles of productive forest lands. That, in itself, constitutes a challenge in the matter of conservation. It has been pointed out that ninety per cent of the forest areas in Canada are owned by the crown either in the right of the province or in the right of the dominion. I have no doubt the minister will agree that that means that a move of this kind is made that much easier by virtue of the nature of the ownership of those forests.

Figures show that in the past the dominion government has spent less than half of one per cent of the revenues derived directly or indirectly from the lumbering industry on the conservation of our forests, and general expenditures in relation thereto. When one realizes that out of every 100,000 feet of lumber cut an additional 40,000 is lost through fire, insects and disease he must have some understanding of the importance of any measure which, working co-operatively between the dominion and the provinces, will bring to an end at least some of the wastage so apparent in this great national heritage and asset.

In our section of Canada, as the hon. member for York West pointed out a few moments ago, a section which has been settled for perhaps a longer period of time than some others, the questions of soil conservation, flood damage and flood control have been engaging the attention of our provincial authorities.

I never could see eye to eye with the dominion government—of course this is not the first time—in its policy toward the river authorities which were set up to deal with the Thames, the Ganaraska, the Etobicoke and other rivers. I have often wondered why they did not take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the provincial legislation to bear part of the expense of operating those projects. The provincial legislation which was passed about two years or more ago provided that the municipalities immediately involved would pay 25 per cent of the cost, the provincial government 37½ per cent and the dominion government 37½ per cent. Perhaps the minister is unaware of the long negotiations that took place because the representations were not made to his department, but the dominion government declined to pay anything toward the cost of operating the various authorities set up. The result has been that the provincial government has had to bear 75 per cent of the cost of the works that were undertaken, while the municipalities have paid for the balance.

I am glad to see that there is an indication that the dominion government has become conscious of the necessity of working hand in hand with the provinces in a great and forward-looking venture for the purpose of preserving this most important, although slowly developing crop, and seeing that in the days that lie ahead we shall not have wasted this great heritage that is ours.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, I feel that one of the greatest menaces to our forests—I am referring now to my own province and county—is the operators themselves. It has been asked whether this legislation will invade provincial jurisdiction. In New Brunswick our forests have been mismanaged and today it is necessary that the federal government come to our assistance.

In my own county the method of logging 25 years ago could be styled as a horse-and-buggy method. If we had to depend upon that same method today our mills would be closed because it is now necessary to haul logs as far as 100 to 150 miles in order to get supplies to the mills. The land in the immediate vicinity of the mills has been cut and slashed and the result is that nothing is left. I am referring now to crown and privately owned lands in my county.

I have walked through tracts of land in the county of Charlotte and have noted how they were crisscrossed with roads that had been dug with bulldozers through the woods. To my way of thinking that was hardly necessary. It will take at least 50 years or possibly 100 years before anything worth while can be grown on that land. I know of one particularly nice stand of spruce in my county that was sold two years ago for stumpage. I know quite well the gentleman who cut that off. He was instructed to cut everything that would make a two by three. The result was that what had been a fine piece of woodland was nothing but waste and would be nothing but waste for another 50 years.

I believe in free enterprise; but my thought is that, though you may give all the assistance you wish to the provinces, until there is some form of forest management in the provinces it will be a waste of time and good money. History shows that those European countries which have had planned forest management have forests that are more valuable today than they were thirty or forty years ago, but you cannot find that situation in New Brunswick.

The large companies have gone in and cut and slashed and destroyed without any thought of future generations. If the federal government feel that they are in position to help the provinces there should be some method evolved whereby this destruction will be made impossible in future. We now have members in the house from Newfoundland, a province which is sometimes referred to as backward. However, from the information I am able to gather, they have a much better system of forest management than exists in any of the provinces of Canada. They are protecting their forests.

It might be said that when the government steps in and tells you that you must not touch this or that in the forest we would be getting away from freedom of action, but I think this industry has been brought to a position where some means must be found to protect it if it is to be carried on in the future.

I would think that the people who would be more interested than any others in the preservation of our forests would be the operators themselves. If they would agree to some plan for the preservation of our forests, I think they might be in position to ask for federal assistance. If assistance is going to be given and the operators still allowed to cut and slash and destroy as they wish, it will give those citizens who are providing the funds for this purpose little encouragement to support such a subsidy.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see that the hon. member for Quebec South is in his seat. I know that he is better qualified to speak on this subject than I, but I am going to say a few words and I know that as he is a good friend and citizen he will not make any remarks. I am not an expert on this matter but I do want to take part in this debate, speaking only as a citizen who is anxious to see developed a general offensive which may result in a victorious battle against fire, insects, wastage and perhaps apathy in some quarters, the result of which is destroying slowly but surely one of our greatest assets.

My remarks will be confined entirely to personal observations. Not being an expert, as I have said, in order to sustain my contention I shall have to rely upon what has been said by those whose goal it is to preserve our forests against devastation by the means to which I have just referred.

Many people who are members of protective associations, forestry associations, the Canadian pulp and paper industry and so on are constantly looking for new designs and methods which may be used to develop a program which could be studied and perhaps finally accepted by the various provincial governments. Concerted action may be the successful means of giving the assurance of a new era in the protection of our trees, the continuance of our water power and, to a certain extent, the permanent irrigation of our soil. Some have proposed that a national congress should be held, but I suggest that there should be a dominion-provincial conference to deal with this matter and study it carefully. The apathy of our population may prove disastrous if even the layman is not interested and leaves the job to be done by others.

I often have the privilege of enjoying fishing and hunting trips in the Laurentides. My county is divided into two parts from east to west by the Laurentides, these lovely and enchanting mountains, the oldest in the country. I have often noticed the lack of cautiousness shown by some people in the handling of camp fires, matches and so forth. We will never know the loss suffered by the taxpayers of Canada because of carelessness and lack of proper education. People should at least be willing to observe the warning posted in that forest. They only have to read the posters issued by the different associations and governments by the thousand and meditate on the meaning of one sentence that can be read on them, namely:

One tree can produce one million matches; one match can destroy one million trees.

But how many read it, and if they do so how many think of it and for how long?

The trouble lies in the absence of the program of widespread education I was advocating a few moments ago. Preventive medicine has learned that education must start at home with the help of the father and mother so that our children will know where danger lies. Prevention of forest destruction by fire and insects should begin at home and be continued in the primary and secondary schools. Naturally when a child grows older he is inclined to forget, and if public opinion is not aroused it will endanger and probably render impossible what I might call, when I speak of reforestation, the resurrection of the Canadian forest.

The arousing of public opinion is urgent. I hope that the step taken by the Minister of Mines and Resources will strike the right note, show the way, and provide the necessary incentive so that the march towards realization will be on for good. I urge the members of the house to look carefully into the wells of information given to us by the Canadian Forestry Association. Not being an entomologist I will not discuss the loss the forests of Canada have suffered from insects, but I will say a few words about wastage. Walking in the forest I often have deplored the enormous quantity of timber lost by careless exploitation. The forestry association tells us that five hundred million cubic feet are wasted in logging each year, and that you have to add to that figure four hundred million cubic feet wasted in sawmill operations. You will see what that amounts to in the depletion of our forests.

In co-operation with the provinces we should find a way to use waste timber of all dimensions which is left on the ground and provides, if not cleared out, a wonderful centre of culture for insects and fires. In the wintertime many poor people need fuel wood. Even in the best managed country of the world there will always be poor people. My proposal is to form an organization whose function would be to collect this lost timber, haul it out of the forest and forward it to charitable institutions in various communities so that the poor would be provided with the fuel wood they lack. With the help of the various governments interested, Canadian Forestry Association contractors, jobbers and others, we might come to a point where it would be possible to work out a system to give, to those in need, fuel wood which otherwise would be left to the ravages of fires and insects. I think I could see from the remarks of the minister that he had in mind the elaboration of a general program of research and education to be carried on co-operatively by the federal and provincial governments.

Let us follow the example of a highly industrialized nation which years ago climbed the ladder of fame by its industry. They left nothing untouched; they created something out of almost nothing and came to a point where an industry was the pivot of world industry. If an insane leader had not misled that nation her potentiality would still be a power to deal with. I refer to the German nation. Let us be industrious and use the waste, reference to which is found in the pamphlet sent to us by the Canadian Forestry Association, and which is entitled "The Case for Forestry in Canada". They show that the waste from fire, insects and disease is eight hundred million cubic feet annually, and they go on to say:

> This loss can be greatly reduced by better protection and education.

I stress the reference to education. It should be enlarged and forced into the minds of our people, especially our children. The pamphlet continues:

> Waste in utilization.
> Logging waste .....500 million cubic feet
> Sawmill waste .....400 million cubic feet

If we were as industrious as the German people we would not lose that waste. We would bring it out somehow by means of some kind of organization. It takes only good will, co-operation, understanding, and an absence of political purposes, to form an organization of that kind so that we can use every piece of that timber that we see in the forests, which is now good for nothing and is lost to the population. It is only good for the insects and for fires. We could use it for the benefit of our population. We all remember that before the war the Germans used to manufacture tin toys for the little ones out of tin cans. We should follow that example, and I am sure that everyone in the country will be satisfied. The children will be glad to know. It would be a lesson in patriotism for them to know that a great deal of our timber is being used for their own benefit. To that end we need an example from the government and these associations.

I hope that the program the minister wants to put into effect will be followed by everyone, and that the march is on for the recovery and resurrection of our Canadian forests.

Mr. Church: I wish to support the resolution of the government. There was never a time in the history of Canada when a national forest policy was more needed. We are a nautical people, and it took the second world war to show the country the necessity of conservation of the forests on the part of federal, provincial, municipal and other public bodies. Prior to the second war they were depleted by almost fifty per cent. The historian Parkman devoted several pages of his history book to the forests of our country and the need to preserve them for future generations; but, as I have said, they have been squandered at an alarming rate.

In speaking on this resolution I want to congratulate the Canadian Forestry Association on the good work it has done in this connection. This is one of the most constructive steps to be taken by the government at this or any other session. There never was a time in the history of Canada when we were more in need of a national policy to protect our forests. Parkman referred to the Indians and Eskimos away up in the northland, and said there was not a river entered or a cape turned but the way was led by an Indian or Eskimo. They were with Frobisher, they were with Hudson, they were with Mackenzie, and they were with Fraser when those men explored these great rivers. They helped show the people of southern Canada what a great heritage we have in our forest resources.

This resolution also refers to other matters which I am not going to mention, since I am going to speak only for three or four minutes. It provides that the government will—> —exercise control and management thereof and construct works therein; establish and maintain forest research laboratories; assist provinces or owners of forests and enter into agreements respecting the protection and development of forest lands.

That all links up with what Parkman had to say. The old schoolbooks used in both the public and separate schools of this country contained large pictures having to do with these matters, and the subject now has reached the universities, where I am glad to say they have research and forestry departments. We certainly should teach the rising generation something about the history of their own country, the wealth of vast forest resources, and the influence the forests have on water power, lumbering, logging and forestry.

This resolution also deals more or less with water power. We have a potential of 45,000,000 horsepower in this country, of which only one-seventh has been developed at the present time; and part of that is only seasonal, where some industries require it for only three or four months in the year. The great development in hydroelectric power brought about by the second world war has helped to fulfil the dreams of those who have been associated with this project for many years past and wanted a national hydro policy for Canada.

The history of the timber industry in Canada goes back for many years. Away back in 1885 loggers were taken from the city of Ottawa and other parts of Canada all the way to the Nile river, where they assisted in the relief of General Gordon at Khartoum. We are a nautical people, and Providence has provided us with a magnificent chain of rivers and inland streams and lakes. We are also fortunate in that we have great deposits of some twenty-five or thirty minerals; and for all these reasons we have long needed a national policy of this kind. If you turn to Houston's Annual, which used to be a standard textbook, you will find that much of the wealth of this country, including the timber along great sections of the Ottawa river, has been underwritten by and turned over to interests in New York city. I am glad that now we are going to develop a national policy for the protection of our own natural resources. During the last war, when we were giving minerals, lumber and many other things to Russia, and when we were told that from Puget sound north we had 760 miles of undefended coast, it was suggested that we should have a national policy of conservation. Now I hope that policy will be really developed. I remember when the harbour of Toronto was being developed, and we had to bring very heavy timber and logs all the way down through the Panama canal and up to Toronto for that work; and it was wonderful timber. If any hon. members visited the trade fair held in Toronto last May they must have seen something of the great importance of the timber wealth of our Pacific province to this country. As an example, Douglas fir and many other kinds of lumber are used in about twenty-six different forms in public buildings throughout the east, and in Toronto our public buildings, schools and national exhibition use all these; which shows what can be done by means of conservation.

I am glad to see this resolution on the order paper today. We have needed a national policy for a long time, and I hope now something will be done about it. I think a great deal can be done by means of education. We read of the great fires that occur in our timber lands and the wealth lost as a result; and it is appalling to realize how little is being done to preserve our forests for future generations. We have the greatest natural resources of any country on earth. Compared with other countries our forests represent unlimited wealth, together with our copper, zinc, platinum, gold, silver, asbestos, tin and other minerals. I believe the time has come when we should have a national policy not only for our forests but for our mineral resources, so that the wealth of this country may be safeguarded. It belongs to the people of Canada, and I believe that here we have a constructive resolution which will help develop in this country government of the people, by the people and for the people.

Mr. Harkness: I am glad the government is going to introduce a bill designed to assist in the conservation of our forest resources. During recent years there has been an increasing awareness on the part of the general public, on the part of people engaged in the timber industry and on the part of governments of the necessity for better methods of forest management and improved forest conservation.

I do not intend to go into those matters today, however. I saw something of the forests of Great Britain, Italy and northwestern Europe; and one has only to see those forests to realize that we in Canada have a long way to go to catch up with the countries of Europe in the matter of forest management, conservation, reforestation, and so on.

In his remarks today the minister, as far as I could gather, did not say anything about the first part of this resolution. He spoke chiefly of what this measure was going to do to enable the dominion government to assist the provinces and to work in conjunction with them. However, I am far from clear as to exactly what this bill that is to be introduced is to do. What is the purpose of it? I should particularly like to know what the first part of this resolution means:

> That it is expedient to present a bill to authorize the governor in council to establish as a national forest or as a forest experimental area lands belonging to His Majesty in the right of Canada . . .

And so forth. As far as I know, the only lands in the control of the dominion government are those in the Yukon, in the Northwest Territories, in the Indian reserves and in the dominion parks.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): May I point out to my hon. friend that we have such lands as the Petawawa military area and some on military lands of that type.

Mr. Harkness: In addition to the areas I have indicated there are, then, the military reserves. However, the minister has already pointed out that it is not proposed apparently to establish any of the Indian reserves as national forests or forest experimental areas. I should like the minister to tell us just what the first part of this resolution means. Where are national forests to be established? Is it proposed to establish a national forest in the Northwest Territories, or is it proposed to use part or parts of some of the national parks, such as Banff national park or Jasper national park, for that purpose? When those national forests are established, what is the purpose of them? Are they going to be used as part of a reforestation scheme or as examples, you might say, of what can and should be done in the matter of forest culture? Exactly what is the purpose of them? It seems to me that before the resolution goes through we should have a little bit more information with regard to the matters I have mentioned.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Harkness: Is the minister going to answer?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): Several questions have been asked. I was waiting to hear any other members who were desirous of speaking on the motion. The last speaker has asked what was the purpose of the act. In the first place we are, under the act, repealing an old act that has been on our statute books for a good many years and which dealt not only with national forests but with national parks; and we are bringing the legislation into line with the present program of the government. We also have five experimental stations on which forestry research is being conducted, and experiments are being carried on in the matter of forest conservation. This bill will not override the National Parks Act or the Indian Act, but if it is at any time later deemed advisable to declare some of the dominion lands to be national forests, it gives us power to do so. There is no immediate intention to do so. For example, we have an experimental station on the military area at Petawawa. While that land belongs to the Department of National Defence, through negotiations with that department we maintain an experimental station there.

The hon. member for Peel asked if we had had any previous consultation with the provinces. While I was not in this department at the time, I understand that the appropriate ministers of all the provinces except Prince Edward Island submitted a brief to the government as far back as 1943, asking practically for what is now provided for in this bill. Subsequently the matter was informally discussed with each of the provincial governments, so that they would know what it was proposed to include in the bill; and I am informed that the majority, if not all, have expressed strong approval of this measure.

Mr. Higgins: Before I deal with the resolution proper, I want to say that I thoroughly agree with it, but I should like to ask the minister who was the authority from the tenth province that was consulted in 1943. I should not imagine there was such a person. I should be interested in knowing if such were the case.

As to the resolution itself, it entails the presentation of a bill. I cannot imagine anybody opposing the resolution. As I am sure all hon. members must know, forty per cent of all United States dollars earned by Canada come from the Canadian pulp and paper industry. I believe that some one-quarter of a billion dollars is paid out annually in wages in Canada by that industry. Three out of every five newspaper pages printed anywhere in the world are printed on Canadian paper or on paper made from Canadian pulp. If that fact in itself is not sufficient to indicate the importance of the bill which it is proposed to introduce, as indicated by the minister today, I do not know what more hon. members would require. To me this measure is extremely important not only for Canada as a whole but particularly for what one of the hon. members today termed "the backward province of Newfoundland". I may say that we do not regard Newfoundland as being backward, and we shall regard this term as being used in a humorous way.

I might add, however, that the greatest single contribution to the Canadian economy, as a result of confederation, was the pulp and paper industry of Newfoundland. This industry brought into the Canadian economy some $40 million. That is no small amount when it is considered that it came from a province with a population as small as that of Newfoundland, particularly when it is recognized that sixty-five per cent of the newsprint produced in Newfoundland is sold in the United States for United States dollars. It is difficult these days to get away from the Yankee dollar.

In passing I should like to refer to a couple of statements made by the heads of our pulp and paper industries in Newfoundland. I hope it will not be deemed inappropriate, because I want to deal with them a little bit further later on. As a result of devaluation I feel that hon. members should know the views of these important people; at least they are important to us. This is a C.P. dispatch dated September 30, from Corner Brook, and reads as follows:

Sir Eric Bowater, president of Bowater's Pulp and Paper Mills here, biggest in the world—

I may say that the pulp and paper mill at Corner Brook in Newfoundland is the biggest single paper mill of its kind in the world.

—yesterday expressed the hope of obtaining more United States markets for newsprint in view of the expected loss of sale to the United Kingdom.

Sir Eric was commenting on a report from London that Britain proposes to switch her huge newsprint imports from the dollar markets of Canada to soft-currency sources in Scandinavia.

He said his company now is planning to increase production to meet further orders agreed upon for delivery to the United States in January, 1950.

He warned mill workers, however, that costs of production must come down and quality improve if the company were to expand sales in the highly competitive U.S. market. "The U.S. publishers can assure us a market only if the price is right," he said.

On the sulphite pulp situation, the president said markets in the sterling area have already been lost, but it was thought an outlet might be found in the United States.

The entire Canadian newsprint industry may be on short time next year, E. M. Little, president of Anglo-Newfoundland Development Company, said yesterday.

The president of the newsprint firm, commenting on a London report that Britain will buy her newsprint in Scandinavia instead of Canada to save dollars, said in a statement:

"The American market is at present good, but if the business decline in the United States continues, newsprint must eventually be affected . . .

The whole of the Canadian industry may be on short time next year, but to what extent is difficult to forecast as yet.

Conditions are not bright but this company must become and continue to be competitive. As money becomes available this mill will be modernized."

The reason I am quoting these statements is that a measure such as the proposed bill will be of great value in bringing down the cost of the production of newsprint. I take it that that is part of the program that the minister would contemplate in the investigation that he proposes to have made by the various research boards to be set up.

I would recommend that hon. members read the September 17 edition of the Financial Post. I believe every hon. member has been provided with a copy. I was. It is of great interest to anybody who is concerned with the pulp and paper industry and the value of that industry to the economy of Canada. One excerpt I should like to read is a statement by Mr. D. W. Ambridge, president of Abitibi Power and Paper Company, which was made to a pulp and paper meeting earlier this year. He was asked a question as to how much should be spent by industry on research if it is to do a proper job. He said that $6,400,000 annually should be spent by industry in research. That is entirely apart from the government assistance. There are five more points to which he referred and I should like to read them to the committee. They are as follows: Here he is referring to starting points for research:

Wasted trees—millions of trees die each year from old age or disease or fire. Some are inaccessible, but most should not have perished. Research is needed to develop methods of saving them—new cures, new fire suppression methods, new uses for everything the forest grows instead of only the trees the industry can most easily use.

Waste liquors from chemical processes—usually disposed of, they carry away with them untold quantities of various materials which will some day be used. Sugars in the sulphite liquor are now being utilized in alcohol and yeast manufacture.

Bark—Mountains of bark are lying unused beside mills, yet in Europe bark is a valuable ingredient in a variety of products.

Lumber—Hundreds of small sawmills make lumber out of small logs, often waste 50 per cent of the wood in the tree. Even the finished lumber itself is often wasted; on construction jobs, for instance, where lumber used for concrete forms is usually burned afterward as part of tidying up.

Other fields for research—Development of efficient mechanized equipment for woods operations, including thorough clean-up after well-planned cutting, in order to make use of the slash, leave behind best possible conditions of growth for young trees and seeds. Application of the latest developments in science to the paper-making process. New by-products.

What's being done about these problems. On an industry basis, one of the most important factors in pulp and paper research has been the pulp and paper research institute which is a co-operative venture founded in 1928 by the industry in conjunction with the Canadian government and McGill university.

The minister referred to this institute. In the same article he said that up to 1947 the industry gave $50,000 a year to this research institute, but it is now giving $100,000 a year. When the minister replies will he tell us what the government is contributing to that institute and how much is being paid by industry?

In conclusion I should like to quote from page 52 of the same paper:

Pulp and paper men say that a national forest policy is necessary and that its needs are few and relatively simple.

First, they say, Canada should have complete air surveys and maps of the forests. Today their extent is not even completely known and there is no comprehensive and proper estimate of forest increment in Canada.

Secondly, Canada needs to check the insects and diseases which periodically reach epidemic proportions. Also greater effort is required to prevent the ravages of fire. Lightning is constantly causing fires in crown land forests and forest operators are constantly threatened by fires in unoccupied forest areas adjacent to their limits.

Finally, industry men say that Canada should increase the extent of its research work on the forests and on forest products.

Both federal and provincial authorities have through research contributed to the development of agriculture, minerals, and fisheries, but the forests receive less attention. Pulp and paper men say that the forests require at least as much interest and attention as are given to other valuable national resources.

That, Mr. Chairman, rather sums up the picture as far as I know it. But the value of our forests is important to the economy of Canada, and its value to the province of Newfoundland is so great that one can do nothing but most heartily endorse the resolution. Since we have problems which are peculiar to our province I should like to ask the minister whether it is not possible to place one of these research bureaux—in fact anything that is envisaged in this resolution —in the province of Newfoundland. We have nothing in the maritime provinces. We have one in Vancouver and one in Montreal and there is one in Ottawa. Certainly, the maritimes are entitled to one, and naturally the newest province, with all its problems, with all its worries, with the value to it of the forest industry, should be entitled to one of these research bureaux.

Mr. Gillis: After listening to the discussion I have wondered just exactly what the resolution means. As I understand it, the minister has merely moved a resolution for the purpose of introducing a bill. It remains to be seen what that bill will contain. This is not the place for a major speech. I am going to reserve whatever criticism I may have of the bill until it comes up for second reading. I am just wondering what the minister or his advisers had in mind because of the way the resolution is worded. Although a wide discussion has been permitted I cannot see where the resolution has anything to do with the pulp and paper industry. The fact of the matter is I cannot see that it is intended to bring in a bill that means anything if the wording of the resolution means anything. I say this for the minister's benefit. I hope that it is not the intention of the bill to set up a central experimental board for the purpose of providing research facilities for the benefit of those who exploit the forests of this country for profit. If the wording of the resolution means anything, that is my conception of it. It has nothing to do with reforestation; not a word is mentioned about that. It has nothing to do with conservation. It has nothing to do with the pulp and paper industry. So far as I can see, it is the intention merely to provide a small experimental area somewhere for the purpose of spending the government's money to carry on research for the benefit of those who exploit the forests for profit.

I cannot agree with those who take the position that it is a wonderful thing for us to be sending the real wealth of Canada to the United States or to some other country so as to bring in American dollars. Unfortunately that is the position we are in today; that is one of the fallacies of the system. I believe however the day is coming, and coming pretty fast, when that will be corrected.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): You cannot eat newsprint.

Mr. Gillis: But we can process our pulp in this country, and create an industry here which will pay wages to our workers. Except in Newfoundland, the maritime provinces have very little by way of a pulp and paper industry. I am safe in saying that 80 per cent of the pulpwood from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick crosses the border to be processed in the United States. The wages are paid over there. The product comes back to Canada, and we pay a high price for it. I say it should be processed here.

Dollars are not the real wealth of a country. We send our real wealth out of the country when we export our products. I hope that when the minister brings in his bill the areas he intends to set up as research laboratories will have something to do with fire prevention. I trust there may be some definite recommendation in that connection, because the greatest destroyer of our forests is fire.

Secondly, I hope that if and when this area is developed a part of the research will deal with ways and means of processing our own lumber, building up a pulp and paper industry of our own, putting our own people to work and making proper use of our own resources. If the federal government is to provide funds for that purpose, then I hope the minister will tell us to what extent the pulp and paper industry, or any other industry in Canada which may gain from such research, will be taxed. The operator pays stumpage. If the federal government intends to set up these research facilities, to what extent will the industries contribute to it?

I trust that when the minister brings in the bill he will give on second reading some information as to the mechanics of operation, because I want to have the answers to these questions. That is why I am asking now, so that fire prevention, reforestation and all these other matters may be taken into consideration when this area is being developed.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, as a forester I am pleased to see the interest taken by hon. members in the legislation, because in my view the proposed measure is an important one. Forest conservation is of major importance to the lumbering industry. I cannot agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton South when he says that in this proposed legislation he sees only the installation of an experimental station; because the resolution states that the government is anxious to co-operate with the owners and with provincial governments so as to enter into agreements respecting the protection and development of forest lands.

I must say as a forester that in the past I have had occasion to see evidence of the co-operation which has existed between the federal and provincial governments, and the different owners of timber limits and private lands. The measure now before the committee has been prepared because of the encouragement given to the exploitation of the forests in a scientific manner. The measure looks toward the improvement of the management of forest areas for the purpose of conserving and perpetuating the forest empire in Canada, an empire which occupies more than a third of the whole area of our country and stretches from the Atlantic to the Pacific in a belt ranging from 600 to more than 1,200 miles wide.

It is said that the forests are the spinal column of Canada's economy, and they form a great source of wealth for our country. Our forests offer a great attraction to tourists, and a sanctuary for wildlife. The annual wealth produced by our forest industries is tremendous. The annual harvest of forest products, plus the value added by manufacturing, is over a billion dollars—and this figure does not include the transportation of the various products, or the revenues from tourists, hunting or fishing.

One of the most important characteristics of our forests is that they are a product of the soil. Like the farmers' crops, our forests grow; unlike the farmers' crops they take many years before they are ready for harvesting. The science of forestry is based upon the principle of treating the forests as a crop during the growing period, and harvesting that crop in such a way that another will follow.

This is called silviculture—and is the tilling of the forests, just as agriculture is the tilling of the land. The job of the forester is to practise forestry, and to produce from the forests the greatest possible quantities of the most valuable products in the shortest time and at the lowest possible price.

In many parts of the world the only effective way to reproduce forests is by planting, what we call artificial reforestation. Fortunately in our country conditions of soil and temperature help natural reforestation. It is important however that we do more artificial reforestation, especially near unproductive lands located in the vicinity of pulp mills or saw mills. By passing this legislation I think the government will help the provinces and the different owners of timber limits.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to speak at length on this subject. Since my profession is related to the timber industry, however, I should like to say a few words.

I am sure that in all parts of the country, everyone interested in lumbering is glad to know that the government intends to introduce this legislation now. I would suggest to hon. members that they secure, if possible, a copy of "La Forêt québecoise", especially the July-August and the September, 1948, issues, and read therein the pastoral letter of His Grace Monsignor Labrie, bishop of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. In his letter, Monsignor Labrie stresses the importance of the forest. He points out how we have neglected the forest, the source of one of our largest industries. I wish to quote a few paragraphs from the letter, as published in the July-August, 1948, issue. Speaking of the forest, Monsignor Labrie quotes Professor B. E. Fernow, LL.D.:

"It can be said without fear of contradiction," wrote Professor Fernow, "that next to the products necessary for the sustenance of human life nothing is so widely used, so essential in domestic and public economy as timber. It is impossible to conceive of civilization without lumber, large quantities of lumber." Those words, written in 1906, are still amazingly timely. In spite of staggering development in other spheres of industry, new techniques and uses, as well as transformations of a physical and chemical nature, the lumber industry has maintained its enviable position in the economy of our country.

We must protect our forests. Bishop Labrie, who is an authority in that field, mentions elsewhere in his pastoral letter, some of the steps initiated by various governments. I repeat his words, although I have no intention of praising our governments. Here is what Bishop Labrie writes:

Before setting forth the duties of each and everyone, we wish to commend what has already been done. As early as 1903, Professor B. E. Fernow, LL.D., stirred public interest in the matter by his series of impressive lectures. Since then, government authorities and lumber companies as well as universities, have spent large sums of money for the establishment of schools of forestry. In addition, they have sent engineers, specialized in forestry, to study the organization of the magnificent European forests.

Bishop Labrie, who assuredly held no brief for any government, obviously recognized, however, to what extent various administrations and other organizations had helped the forest industry. I fully appreciate that a great deal remains to be done in this respect, because forests are not only a national asset but also a national problem, one that should be approached from the national standpoint by co-operating with the provinces and with owners of timber claims.

I am glad the government is introducing such legislation. The wording of the resolution clearly indicates the procedure required to implement this bill which will contribute so substantially to the conservation of Canadian forest resources.

(Text):

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that before this resolution passes a word of thanks should be expressed publicly to the minister for the most interesting and well put-up volume on the native trees of Canada which all of us in this house received with his compliments a few days ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: This book is so well done and does such a good job of interesting people in the trees of Canada that a way should be found to get it into all the schools of this country. I would guess that a large number of those which have been distributed to members of parliament have already found their way into some of the schools in the different constituencies, but the fact is that all of us have not just one but many schools in our constituencies. I am sure it would do a great deal to increase interest in Canada's trees and forests and would pay dividends in the long run if the government spent a thousand dollars or so in providing sufficient copies to hon. members to be sent to the different schools in their constituencies. If the minister is afraid that we will not send them to the right schools we could send the names of the schools in our constituencies to the minister.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I am not worrying about that.

Mr. Knowles: With each book was enclosed a card saying that additional copies could be obtained from the King's Printer for $1.50 each, and I might point out that this book has been most favourably reviewed by the press throughout the country, but I would doubt that that will result in many school boards going out of their way to buy it. I hope the minister will consider this suggestion. He will note from the applause that greeted my suggestion that it meets with the approval of hon. members generally.

I want to take advantage of this opportunity to mention another book on Canada's trees. This is not a government publication and I do not suppose the government could go out into the market and buy books of this kind for the type of distribution I have mentioned. The book I refer to was produced recently by a well known Canadian, Leonard Knott, and like his other books it is exceedingly well done. Leonard Knott is a Canadian who thinks that we have just as much of interest in this country as there is in the United States and he has demonstrated his belief by writing a series of books for children, including "The Children's Book of the Saguenay" and "The Children's Book of the Great Lakes" and now this latest one, "The Children's Book of Trees".

This book is well written and beautifully illustrated. I tried it out on a couple of young Canadians and I know it produces a real interest in this great natural resource that we possess. I wish there was some way in which that book, as well as the one put out by the minister's department, could be placed in every school of this country. They go very well together. The book produced by the department is more in the form of scientific treatise, while Mr. Knott's book is written in a more flowing style. It is addressed particularly to children but is good reading for adults, too. I am sure that these two books would do a good job of interesting the children and young people in our schools in this great natural resource.

The other comment I should like to make has to do with fire prevention. It seems to me we should pursue every suggestion that might help to eliminate the destruction of our forests by fires. My colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton South, has already referred to the tragic loss by fire that we sustain every year.

In this connection I have been following the efforts that have been made by interested people in the United States and by some people in Canada to ascertain the extent to which cigarettes are the cause of forest fires. I understand there has been on foot for a number of years, particularly in the United States, a move to have eliminated from cigarettes saltpetre or such other chemicals as are put in them for the express purpose of making them burn faster. I do not happen to smoke myself so I cannot speak with too much authority, but I understand cigarettes do not last very long, and that apparently the tobacco people would not be too interested in anything that would make them last longer because then hon. members of the house would not have to buy so many more.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): We would pick up longer butts.

Mr. Knowles: The whole idea which I am suggesting is that if cigarettes could be made in such a way that, when discarded, they would not produce fires so readily we might save ourselves a great deal of the loss that we now sustain. I am told that the matter has been a subject of interest on the part of people in the United States for twenty or twenty-five years. I am also told that they have not made much headway yet. The interests on the other side—namely the tobacco people—are pretty powerful, but that is no reason for not proceeding at least with research.

Press reports indicated that this question was discussed at the annual convention of the association of Canadian fire marshals held a month or so ago. It was indicated that representations might be made to the federal government asking them to bring in legislation outlawing the manufacture or sale of such cigarettes as I have referred to, which are so ready a fire hazard. I asked certain questions about this matter on the order paper, but the answers I got on October 3 of this year, as found at page 439 of Hansard, were not very helpful. Accordingly I wrote to the office of the dominion fire commissioner and had a very interesting letter in reply in which I was told that, although the representations were not made formally by the association of Canadian fire marshals to the government, nevertheless the president of that association has been making such representations, and has suggested to the government that definite research in this matter be pursued.

I suppose that one of the places for that research to be done is the national research council, but I notice that the resolution now before us calls for research work as to our forests. I suppose that research in the main is towards developing ways and means of increasing growth, methods of reforestation, and so on, but it would seem to me that it would also be a legitimate subject of research to go into the question of the extent to which cigarettes are the cause of forest fires. If it turns out that those who are interested in this matter are right, and that cigarettes with saltpetre in them are a major cause of forest fires, surely it would be the part of wisdom for the government to bring in legislation to improve the situation. I hope the minister will give the same sympathetic consideration to this point that I am sure he will give to my suggestion about getting more copies of that beautiful book of his into the schools of the country.

Mr. Balcer: I should like to extend my congratulations to the minister on this beautiful book and to ask him a question. Can we expect a French edition of this beautiful work on trees to be published soon?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I am not sure as to that. I shall be glad to make inquiries and let the hon. member know if and when that publication will be available in French.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 62, respecting forest conservation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISH INSPECTION ACT

FISH AND FISH CONTAINERS—MARINE PLANTS—EXPORT AND IMPORT REGULATIONS

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure for the purpose of regulating the inspection of fish and fish containers and of marine plants for export and import, and to provide for the appointment of inspectors and other officers and employees required for the proper administration of the act.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): On the previous measure I asked the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Gibson) if he would not make his statement before you left the chair, Mr. Speaker. I believe on the present resolution some members desire to make their addresses while you are still in the chair, and I would ask the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) to be good enough to make his statement before you leave the chair.

Mr. Mayhew: Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to make a short statement on the resolution at this time, but I should like to point out that there will be a number of occasions later when opportunities will be provided to speak on the measure. We propose to have it sent to the standing committee on marine and fisheries when it reaches second reading. There will be an opportunity to discuss the measure at length on other occasions. I would hardly believe that we would want to spend much time on the resolution stage, again on second reading, and again when we go into committee, and then have a further discussion in the standing committee on marine and fisheries. I will make my statement now. It will be a short one.

During the past two years we have considered the revision of the present fish inspection legislation. Fish inspection is carried on under two separate acts. Canned fish inspection is under the Meat and Canned Foods Act; other types of fish are inspected under the Fish Inspection Act. It is with the latter act that I am going to deal. This act was passed in 1914 to take care of the problem of pickled barrelled fish. Since then it has been amended on several occasions. We again reached the stage when we found we lacked the necessary statutory authority to meet present-day quality control problems. There was also the question of the validity of the act itself from a constitutional point of view.

Therefore the present act has been revised with three purposes in view: (1) to provide for inspection of fish which moves in interprovincial and export trade; (2) to revise the regulatory powers to meet present-day problems; and (3) to amplify and simplify some of the enforcement procedure.

The provisions of the existing Fish Inspection Act are not confined to export and interprovincial trade but deal with inspection generally. The act covers inspection of fish whether such fish is sold within the province or outside the province, and it is here the difficulty has arisen. Inspection, if it deals only with fish that is sold within a province, is a matter for provincial jurisdiction. Some years ago it was thought that this problem would be overcome by getting the provinces to pass enabling legislation, so-called legislation by adoption. Several of the provinces, where the act has been applied, passed acts which in effect said: "We adopt this act as our own, in so far as it might deal with matters which are outside dominion jurisdiction". Since 1932, however, there have been judicial decisions which cast a doubt on the legality of such an arrangement. So it was decided that one of the things that must be done to put our house in order so as to be able to meet these problems was the revision of our basic inspection act.

Under the new act authority is sought for quality control and inspection of products which move in interprovincial and export trade. In connection with the revision of our legislation, we have had several conferences with provincial authorities, and before the revision was finally drawn up we had a conference with all the provinces. The officials of the fisheries divisions of the provincial governments agreed to co-operate with us and to recommend any necessary provincial legislation to cover any deficiency in respect of inspection, particularly at wholesale and retail levels, which is within provincial jurisdiction.

The second purpose, as mentioned before, was to extend the regulatory control under the act. Before regulations of any kind can ever be made the necessary statutory authority must exist. Parliament will be asked to pass an act giving the government the necessary power to meet the present-day quality control needs of industry. This does not mean that we are proposing at this stage any new regulations; we are merely seeking to establish the necessary statutory authority for instituting any inspection procedure whenever that becomes necessary. The industry will, of course, be more interested in the inspection regulations themselves that might be proposed from time to time.

Again I call attention to the fact that we will be in a much better position to discuss this bill—and I hope we will confine ourselves to the bill—when we have it before us.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Green: Before this resolution is reported I want to ask the minister a question which may not be strictly germane to the resolution itself but which is of great importance to the fishing industry. In the press this morning I noticed mention of renewed Russian competition in the market for canned salmon, particularly in the overseas market. If that report is correct the results may be extremely detrimental to our own salmon industry. Could the minister tell the committee just what is the position?

Mr. Mayhew: A couple of months ago we sold Great Britain 410,000 cases of canned salmon from the 1949 pack. That pack has not been completed yet, so what my hon. friend is worrying about now is not the 1949 pack but the 1950 pack, and already steps are being taken to see what can be done about that. With regard to the Russians coming into the trade to any greater extent than before, that is news to me. I have not heard of that, though they were in the British market last year.

Mr. Green: The dispatch appeared in this morning's Gazette, and it might be worth while for the minister to check on it. It points out that the Russians have devalued their money to correspond with the British devaluation, and it is expected that they will get into the overseas market in quite a large way.

Mr. Mayhew: I can assure the hon. member that the position will be watched very carefully, and that everything possible is being done to protect the interests of Canadian fishermen from coast to coast.

Mr. Higgins: Is it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Shall I report the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Green: This resolution has not been carried. The hon. member for St. John's East is on his feet. The government has no right to try to rush this resolution through in this way, and it is the privilege of the hon. member to be heard. It is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Higgins: Before making the few remarks I intend to make on this matter, Mr. Chairman, and asking a couple of questions that worry me a little bit—I am sure they will not worry the minister—I want to take the opportunity of saying to the minister how greatly pleased we are with the co-operation he has given the fisheries board of Newfoundland and indeed how greatly the people of Newfoundland and the fisheries appreciate the work that has been done by him since he took over the office he now occupies.

I should like to remark, and I do not believe that it is hurting the feelings of anyone in this committee, that fish and fishery matters are of little concern to Canadians as a whole. This industry is more or less an orphan child of Canada, of interest to only a few of the provinces. I believe these provinces have been described as the "have not" provinces. I can assure hon. members that, with the entry of your newest province into confederation, you are likely to hear a great deal more about fish and fishery matters from this time on.

I am sure that if you will bear with me you will understand why you are likely to hear more about fish than you might be expecting to hear, because fish and Newfoundland have been more or less synonymous terms for a great number of years. In fact, I believe for practically four centuries Newfoundland's economy has been based on the fisheries and, to use a common term in Newfoundland, the fisheries are the backbone of the country. It was the fishery and all the business associated with the fishery that brought the settlers to Newfoundland, and it was the fishery that kept them there. When I speak of the fishery, I mean chiefly the cod fishery. As one of my friends boldly put it one day—and I certainly do not agree with him—it was a cod that brought people to Newfoundland, it was a cod that kept them there, and it was a cod that brought them to Canada. But I certainly do not agree with that remark in any way.

Up to 1894, practically ninety per cent of the export trade of Newfoundland was made up of fish and fishery products. That is not true today. The proportion now would be roughly as follows: wood products, approximately 48 per cent; mineral products, 26 per cent; and fishery products about 24 per cent. But that is not the true picture in any way, because the greater number of the population—that is of the wage-earning population—of the island of Newfoundland are engaged in the fishery. The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay would be much more conversant with the picture than I am, but I should think 48 per cent to 49 per cent of those capable of working are engaged in the fishery. That is a fairly high figure. You can therefore appreciate the importance of this industry to Newfoundland as a whole.

As I said before, up to 1894, and in fact for many years after that, dried fish was the main industry. The changeover from dried fish to fresh frozen fish has taken place only in recent years; it started some ten or twelve years ago. I might give hon. members a little bit of local history.

In 1939 the commission of government of that time made a contract with General Seafoods Corporation of New York. As a term of that contract they agreed to build a plant in a place called Lapoile, Newfoundland, which is in the district represented by the deskmate of the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay. The commission of government was to provide them with the sum of $200,000. They were to be given a monopoly for twenty-two years and they were to employ Newfoundland labour exclusively. The codfish fillets were to be imported into the United States free of duty. It was a beautiful proposition, as hon. members will readily realize, as far as we in Newfoundland were concerned. The only unfortunate thing that happened was that the fishing industry and those associated with it began lobbying. I believe the start of it was in Boston. The people there had powerful interests in Washington, and as a result the United States congress passed legislation which completely finished the proposition.

I mention this matter to the committee because Newfoundland fishing firms in the fresh fish industry are again faced with that same proposition. Only today I picked up a Newfoundland paper and on looking over the headlines I saw this one: "Newfoundland Fish Draw Protest". The subheading reads: "United States Fish Association Claims Imports Will Ruin United States Industry". As I say, this matter may not be relevant to the present discussion, but I cannot help bringing it to the attention of the minister because it has to do with his department. The chairman of the fisheries board made a statement on September 24 to this effect:

> In regard to sales of frozen fish and herring to the United States market, the effect of devaluating the Canadian dollar in terms of the American dollar should be beneficial.

This particular statement, reported in the St. John's Evening Telegram, asks congress in Washington to make an investigation. Thomas D. Rice, executive secretary of the Massachusetts fisheries association, in the concluding part of his statement, is reported as follows:

> Rice urged an immediate investigation into the situation by representatives in Washington as "the very survival of the three-hundred-year-old fishing industry here is at stake.
> "Unless our government acts now, some firms here may have to go out of business. Our fishing vessels will be forced into idleness, large numbers of workers will lose their jobs," he declared.

That matter is extraordinarily important to us. I know it is not germane to the particular motion, but I am sure the minister will not mind my introducing it in that fashion. He may care to make some comments later on.

What I really wanted to ask him, having read over the statement he made this afternoon, is this. As I have it, the minister said that the present act has been revised with three purposes in view: (1) To provide for inspection of fish which moves in interprovincial and export trade; (2) to revise the regulatory powers to meet present-day problems; and (3) to amplify and simplify some of the important procedures. He also said that they were not proposing at this stage any new regulations but that they were merely seeking to establish the necessary statutory authority for instituting any inspection procedure whenever that becomes necessary. Briefly put, that is what I understood him to say.

But the questions that I wanted to ask are in connection with the statement on fisheries contained in the statements on questions raised by the Newfoundland delegation during the negotiations for the terms of union between Canada and Newfoundland; it is that part specifically dealing with fisheries, and I think it is covered by the bill which it is now proposed to introduce. On page 37 of this booklet, entitled "Report and Documents", I find the following paragraph:

> At present the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act prohibits the sale of bait to foreign fishing vessels in Canadian territorial waters, except by special treaty or convention. An amendment to this act will be introduced in order to continue the practice now followed by Newfoundland in this matter.

I wonder if that amendment has been introduced. That is one question. The other one is in connection with the next paragraph, which is as follows:

> Licensing of premises to pack fish (including filleting and freezing plants).
> It is understood that, while these matters will come under federal jurisdiction at the date of union, the Newfoundland fisheries board, during the time that it continues to operate, will be the medium through which application for licences will be made and the relative regulations brought into effect.

That is the other particular point that I wanted. There is also this paragraph:

> Power of Newfoundland fisheries board to negotiate contracts.
> The Newfoundland fisheries board will not be required to deal through the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and may in its discretion continue to charge a fee or commission for its services in negotiating contracts, subject only to such export and import controls as may exist.

The government is proposing controls here, I presume. The next paragraph is as follows:

> Fish wrappers and packages
> Wrappers provided by purchasers in the United States for their suppliers in Newfoundland will be dutiable after the date of union but will also be eligible for the 99 per cent draw-back on re-export as containers of fresh frozen fish.

I want to ascertain if that is correct and if it is still in effect. The paragraph continues:

> Efforts are being made to arrange for the continued use for export of the present stock of wrappers marked "product of Newfoundland."

I want to find out if these steps have come to fruition or what the position is in Newfoundland. I continue with the quotation:

> Inspection Fees on Export
> The present policy is to make no charge for inspection services.
> Tariff Agreements.

I am not quite sure whether this comes within the scope of the bill. I have not seen the bill.

> The position after union of the agreement between Newfoundland and the Dominican Republic providing for a low rate of duty on imports of Newfoundland codfish into the latter country is being examined. If necessary the Canadian government will initiate discussions on this matter.
> Bait Service
> The Canadian government will seek legislation or take such other steps as may be necessary to provide that the Newfoundland bait service will be taken over and operated without fundamental change by the Department of Fisheries. If, after the date of union, changes are made for the benefit of Canada as a whole, the question of payment will be discussed between federal and provincial authorities.

These are the questions. I trust the minister will not think that I have jumbled them all together. If he can help me out on the matter I shall greatly appreciate it.

Mr. Mayhew: I have noted the questions and I think I could give the answers to them because we became pretty familiar with them while the committee was here dealing with this matter; but when I make a statement I would prefer to know that I have all the facts. The questions will be answered when we are in committee on the bill, or if we have to wait longer, when we are on the estimates, which I hope will be in a few days.

I fully appreciate everything that the hon. member for St. John's East has said. I know how important the fishing industry is to the province of Newfoundland, and I would be the last one to want in any way to shorten any of the debates that we have on that industry. I have visited all of the ten provinces since June 27 last, and have discussed this matter with the provincial governments, with the fishing industries and with the fishermen themselves. When we are on the estimates I hope we shall take time to talk about fisheries.

There is something in what the hon. member has already said, namely, that in Canada we have not been very fish-conscious. With the support of the hon. members from Newfoundland and some others, I think that the program which we hope to initiate will be of benefit to all concerned and that it will show how we can develop one of Canada's finest natural resources. For that reason I would not want to limit anyone who wishes to make a statement at any time in this house. However, this is a resolution. In the last few years it has become the habit here to have three debates on legislation rather than the one we used to have when I first came to the house. I was anxious that we would not get sidetracked tonight but that we would stick to the resolution. When the estimates come down we can give the hon. members who are not fish-conscious a chance to go and have a smoke or to sit and listen to the discussion because it will be something that will vitally interest everybody. I am the last man who would want to limit discussion.

Mr. Green: With all deference I do suggest that the minister should answer these questions in so far as he is able to do so this evening. He has his parliamentary assistant sitting with him. If he has not the officials of his department available in the building that is his fault and not the fault of the hon. members who are asking questions. When he says that there should be only one debate I point out to him that that simply is not the fact under our rules. A resolution is brought in, and that resolution can be debated. Then the resolution goes into committee and at that stage an hon. member quite properly asks general questions such as the hon. member for St. John's East has asked this evening. The minister says that he should not ask these questions now; that he should wait until the bill is brought in and is in committee, or until the estimates come down. Private members are not required to wait until the minister's estimates come down to get this information. If they try to question the minister when the bill is in committee and ask a question on a certain section some hon. member can rise on a point of order and say that the question cannot be asked on that particular section. We are now at the stage when these questions should be answered. The minister has admitted that he could answer some of them. I think he should go ahead and do so, and not make a pleasant little speech about the fishing industry and all the hon. members getting together six weeks or two months from now, and perhaps two or three days before we go home when there is a great rush. Private members are entitled to ask the type of questions that have been asked by the hon. member for St. John's East. It is particularly important, because he is a member from our new province. I do urge upon the minister that he give us what information he has this evening and not simply give us a general talk which contains absolutely no information whatever.

Mr. Mayhew: I do not know exactly the purpose of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I can assure him that I am not going to answer the questions because I am afraid I would not be able to answer them in the detail that would be satisfactory or fair to the hon. member for St. John's East. The officials of the department will be here. I will have the records in front of me. I do not intend to attempt to answer something when I am not perfectly sure that I can give an accurate answer in every detail. I was hoping that we would get through this resolution tonight because I do not think that we shall get the most out of the discussion at this stage. Hon. members will get the most out of it when they have the bill before them. We shall answer any questions we can when the bill is before us.

Mr. Green: No minister of the crown has a right to come into this house and tell us that we cannot ask these questions.

Mr. Mayhew: I did not say that.

An hon. Member: Who says so?

Mr. Green: That is what the minister said.

Mr. Mayhew: I beg your pardon.

Mr. Green: I have the floor. Furthermore, the minister has said that he will not try to answer these questions tonight.

An hon. Member: He has not.

Mr. Green: That is exactly what he said. You cannot imagine the Minister of Agriculture coming into this house and taking that position.

Mr. Gardiner: I have.

An hon. Member: Put that in your pipe and smoke it.

Mr. Green: If the Minister of Agriculture did that he was wrong, and I dare say the only reason he did so was that he did not know the answer, although it is not very often that he does not know the answers to anything having to do with his department.

Mr. Fraser: Right or wrong.

Mr. Green: This is an intolerable situation. We were told last night that this resolution would be under consideration today. The Minister of Fisheries should have had his officials here.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No.

Mr. Green: So that he could answer these questions.

Mr. MacNaught: No.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not on the resolution.

Mr. Green: This attempt to cut down the rights of hon. members—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Nobody is trying that.

Mr. Green: —is not good enough, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McIlraith: Did you have a good dinner?

Mr. Green: If the Minister of Fisheries persists in his refusal at least to try to answer these questions, then we can draw only one conclusion, namely, that he does not know the answers and that he should know them.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): He just said so.

Mr. Noseworthy: Will the minister give us any other information? Will he tell us whether the measure that is to be introduced is to be an independent bill or an amendment to an act that is already on the statute books? As I recall it, in previous sessions we discussed the right of the government to make inspection of fish for import, export and so forth. There is nothing in the resolution to indicate whether it is to be a new act or an amendment of the one now on the statute books.

Mr. Ashbourne: Mr. Chairman, coming from Newfoundland, and as a representative from a very important section of the fishing industry of Newfoundland, I think I can speak with assurance concerning the resolution now before the house.

Mr. Fraser: What part of the cabinet do you belong to?

Mr. Ashbourne: Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that I represent a part of Canada—Newfoundland—and I congratulate the Minister of Fisheries upon having introduced this resolution. I speak from experience because, as the hon. member for St. John's East has said, for years we have heard the expression that the fisheries are the backbone of Newfoundland. We have found from experience that a certain amount of standardization has been necessary; and certain regulations which have been in effect for many years past in Newfoundland to govern fish inspection have proved most beneficial. In my view this resolution is a move in the right direction.

We know that fish forms an important food article. As we have seen in the past, proper and efficient merchandising of food articles requires adequate inspection. Also a certain amount of standardization is required so that when the customer places an order for a certain article he may know that the article will be graded according to certain recognized standards.

I could speak for the forty minutes allotted to me, but I do not think it is necessary at this time to do so. I shall have more to say when the bill is in committee. As a member from Newfoundland, let me say that I appreciate the action taken by the government by way of bringing in certain controls, which no doubt will be envisaged in the bill.

Mr. Mayhew: In answer to the point raised by the hon. member for York South, let me say that this will be an entirely new act. I intimated before six o'clock that when we had first reading of the bill it would be circulated so that hon. members might see it. I am sure when it is seen it will be clearly understood.

Mr. Bryce: Will this legislation apply in any way to the prairie provinces? After the fish is canned, will the inspectors have control—because the fisheries out there are under provincial jurisdiction. When the inspectors are appointed under this measure will they have control of fish after it is packed?

Mr. Mayhew: Yes, they will have control of inspection over any fish sold interprovincially or for export purposes. It affects all provinces.

Mr. Higgins: I presume the minister is aware of the action United States fish merchants propose to take?

Mr. Mayhew: Last year United States fish merchants put on the same sort of demonstration in an endeavour to reduce the quota of fish sold by Canada to the United States. Evidently they are doing the same thing again this year. I do not know how far they will go, but the situation is being watched carefully in the interests of Newfoundland and the rest of Canada.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mayhew thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 63, respecting the inspection of fish and marine plants.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Marketing service—

29. Marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $6,000, $75,000.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Chairman, in the details at page 117 we find an additional $50,000 being spent this year for advertising. For what purpose is that amount to be spent? Is it for the advertising and sale of surplus products going on the market, or just what schemes of advertising does the department propose to put into effect?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, the committee will recall that prior to the war we had a large vote for the advertising of agricultural products. Much of that money was used overseas, and some of it used in Canada. During the war however there was no object in advertising overseas, because all the food was delivered to the British government, and it made distribution on a quota basis. There was no reason for advertising our food in Britain at that time. As a matter of fact during the greater part of the war, and for some little time thereafter, Britain did raise objection to the advertising of any particular food in that country, because they wanted to make distribution irrespective of where it came from.

Today however the position is somewhat changed, and we feel it is necessary and advisable to do more advertising than we have been doing. We have asked for an extra sum of money to be able to accomplish that. Speaking from memory, I think it will be found that when I get to the further supplementaries there will be still another amount to be added in order to take care of these advertising programs.

We are broadening out in order to advertise products in Canada. When it is reported that there is a surplus of a certain product we assist in advertising it in Canada in an effort to increase its consumption rather than to look entirely outside of Canada in order to find a market.

Mr. Wright: I am glad the minister has given that answer. I do not want to leave the impression that I am opposed to advertising, because I think the department is wise to go ahead with this advertising program, especially of agricultural products that may be in surplus supply. Last year we had a surplus of honey, and I know the British Columbia people may have a surplus of apples. These advertising campaigns have certainly broadened the markets for various agricultural products.

Mr. Bryce: What products are advertised in Great Britain? I know that people there have thought they were getting United States bacon when in fact they were getting our good Canadian bacon. We should advertise our bacon, our apples, our honey and other products. I know this is done at the different exhibitions held over there, but the fact remains that Canadian and United States bacon have got mixed up in the people's minds and I know that our western bacon is much superior to any such products coming into Great Britain today.

Mr. Gardiner: The position with regard to advertising in Great Britain is not too clear. We have been given to understand by those with whom we have come in contact that the British prefer that we do not advertise. I made that statement a year ago and to my surprise a question was asked in the British house, which I presume started from here, and the answer given was that they did not object. However, our experience is that they do object, no matter what the answer in the house may be.

I can quite understand why they should. The British are buying food from all over the world. All the food purchased is marketed by the government, not by individuals. If we went into Britain and advertised Canadian bacon as being the best in the world, if we tried to tell the people that that was what they ought to eat and thus induced the British consumer to demand that his government get Canadian bacon, I can understand the difficulty it would create for their government. It may be perfectly true that there is no law against it, that there is nothing to prevent its being done, but I have an idea that, if we did it, it would not be long before we ran into difficulties. For that reason we have thought it inadvisable to put on any definite program of advertising in Britain.

We do certain things when the opportunity presents itself. For example, the deputy minister came to me the other day and told me that we had not been allowing people to include butter in the parcels they were sending to Britain and he asked me what I thought about it. I told him that as some people thought we had a surplus of butter in Canada it might not be a bad thing to allow people to put Canadian butter in their parcels instead of having Eaton's or Simpson's buy Danish butter to be sent over to Britain. Regulations are being sent out indicating that it will be quite proper to include Canadian butter in these parcels. This will be a form of advertising of Canadian butter. At some time we may have a surplus which we will want to sell and it might be a good thing to encourage people in this country to put it in their parcels so that our products would be advertised in an indirect way. Outside of that kind of action it is most difficult to evolve any plan to definitely advertise our products over there.

Mr. Bryce: I hate to think I have been breaking the law in recent weeks by sending good Canadian butter to Britain. We have good products to sell and we should tell the world about them.

Mr. Quelch: Has the trade been told that it is permitted to send Canadian butter to England? I have here a list of food that may be sent in parcels to England and butter is not included.

Mr. Gardiner: The decision was just made within the last seventy-two hours so I do not think there has been much opportunity for anyone to take advantage of it. I do not want it to be understood that the trade, as we understand that term, is to be permitted to do that sort of thing. I doubt very much if the trade would be permitted to do it, not because of anything we might do but because of what the British government might do if business people here were permitted to ship this particular product to their counterparts in Britain.

But there are companies like Eaton's and Simpson's and a few others that make a practice of putting up parcels to be sent to Britain by individuals in this country. Certain food products have been included in those parcels, but butter was not one of them. We are now saying that it is quite proper to put butter in. The reason it was not permitted to be put in last year was that we were bringing in butter from outside in order to supply our own people. Some people complained because some of the products being put in these parcels were Danish, but one could hardly complain about putting in food products from another country if we did not permit food products from this country to be included in the parcels. We now have sufficient butter to supply our own people and there is no reason why butter should not go into these parcels and serve as a form of advertising.

Mr. Quelch: I remember the minister being somewhat critical about Canadians sending parcels from Denmark to England, but the only reason that was done was that you could not send butter from this country. The reason for that prohibition has been given by the minister.

Mr. George: I should like to ask a question in connection with a remark made by the minister the other evening, as reported on page 696 of Hansard, as follows:

> If it has been fairly good, and if we want to market more products in the markets that are available, then I think we ought to produce them and put them on the market.

The question I intend to ask will apply equally to bacon, poultry and other products. Would it be possible to persuade the English to give us their quotas or commitments a year in advance of what they are doing now? It is practically impossible for a farmer to plan his poultry production unless he knows at least a year and a half in advance.

Mr. Gardiner: During the war we were able to make contracts that extended for more than twelve months; in some cases we were able to make contracts for two years, and in the case of wheat we were able to make a contract that extended for four years. On all other products two years was the limit. While we had those contracts it was possible to let the farmer know at least a year in advance what he was going to be required to supply under them. Unfortunately that is most difficult at the present time; in fact I think it is impossible. It is not because of anything we do about it. The British are battling in order to maintain their dollar position, and they come over here once a year and indicate to us how many dollars they have available to carry on trade with us. Then they try to divide those dollars among the different types of trade that we carry on with them. So much is allowed for agriculture.

After they have taken that position we have another discussion with them as to whether the amount can be increased in so far as our food products are concerned if more dollars are needed in order to take care of our surplus. What I was suggesting the other night was that, in our experience up to the present, we have not been able to supply as much as Great Britain finally agreed they had the dollars to buy of those products that we were discussing. As long as that is the position, I can only say to those who are saying that we have lost markets, or that we should be finding markets, that the only reason for finding more markets would be to produce more products. We are now consuming much more of all those products in Canada than we were prior to the war, and as to many of them even more than during the war. For that reason we have not so much to export, but our difficulty up to the moment with the British has not been one of having been refused markets. We have found difficulty in supplying even those markets for which Great Britain has provided so many dollars to buy farm products.

Mr. Harkness: I think the minister will agree with me that from the long term point of view, if we are going to continue to have markets in Great Britain for our agricultural products, we must be in a position to live up to the contracts into which we enter. We had a discussion on this matter a few nights ago when the minister's estimates were before the house previously, and he more or less pooh-poohed the idea that there was any chance we might lose markets in Great Britain because we had not lived up to our contracts. Nevertheless, from the long-range point of view, I still believe if we do not live up to those contracts year after year there will be considerable disinclination on the part of the British to enter into further contracts with us with any idea, as far as they are concerned, that we will live up to them.

I should like to ask the minister what measures he thinks might be taken, and whether the government has any ideas in mind as to what steps we might take so that we would be in a position to meet our contracts. I refer particularly to bacon. Perhaps more than anything else we have been notably deficient in meeting our contracts for bacon. Then there are eggs in which we have also fallen down, and generally all agricultural products concerning which we enter into contracts to supply the British market.

Personally I think we are in a poor position to bargain with Great Britain or any other country if we are deficient in meeting the contracts into which we have entered. I would say that it places us in a bad bargaining position to have to go to a country and say: We contracted to supply you with 160 million pounds of bacon, and all we will be able to supply is 50 million pounds; we are sorry there is this big deficiency. It seems to me that our general agricultural policy should be directed along the line of securing sufficient supplies to meet our contracts. What particular steps may be necessary to do that is a pretty complicated matter, but nevertheless I do not like the idea of entering into contracts, which the minister said has been done year after year, to supply so many thousand pounds of this and so many tons of that, with the idea always in mind that we will not be able to live up to them.

I think that the minister should give us an explanation or a résumé of what the government has in mind to meet the contracts which we have at the present time, and the ones which we hope the minister will be able to enter into with Great Britain before the end of the year.

Mr. Gardiner: I have tried to tell the hon. member on three or four occasions, and apparently I have not spoken plainly enough, that we do not intend to do any such thing. We have no intention of asking Canadian farmers to try to produce more bacon for the British at the present time. The chief reason for that is that the British have told us they have no dollars to pay for it. They have come over here for the last two years and have said: We would like your bacon all right; we could eat more of it but we have no dollars to pay you for it. Therefore they said that they did not want us to send it to them.

That is where we start from. Then we say to the British: Well, that may be all right, but we got into the habit of sending you a lot of bacon during the war, and our people still think that they should have the privilege of sending it to you if they have it. We say to the British that we would like them to sit down with us and estimate the greatest number of dollars that they can afford to pay for bacon. Then we say to them: We will try to bring down the quantity in the contract to the point where your dollars will pay for the bacon we do send. We understand one another. We know that they do not feel they are in a position to pay for any and so they say that they would just as soon we did not send it. They say: In order to keep some Canadian bacon on our market we are prepared to sign a contract that will cover a limited number of dollars We start off from there and we say to our farmers: Here is the contract price for bacon; that contract price will bring you a certain price for hogs. If you can sell your hogs for a better price somewhere else then do not worry about the British because after all they would just as soon you did not send them any.

That is what we are actually saying to the farmers today. What has been the result? During the last year somewhere between 50 and 70 per cent more pork has been consumed on the Canadian market than was consumed before the war. As a result of the fact that more is consumed on this market than before the war, hogs have been as much as 7 cents a pound dressed weight higher in Canada than you can get for them under the British contract. Why would any farmer insist on his hogs being sent to Great Britain at 7 cents a pound less than he can sell them for in Canada? He just is not going to do that. He will produce more hogs to sell in Canada at 7 cents a pound above the British contract price than he would produce if you told him he had to sell them under the British contract at 7 cents a pound less.

I do not know any way to tell the farmer that he ought to have produced more hogs for Great Britain when he can get 7 cents a pound more by selling them in Canada. For that reason we have been saying that as long as the farmer can get that market at home we are not going to worry him about sending bacon to Great Britain, but we do say to the British that we would like them to continue the contract, that we would like them to undertake to take the maximum amount that we may have after we have sold all we can to the Canadian people so that when their difficulties are ended and they are able to provide the dollars we will still be in that market and they will know something about our product.

In that connection I have some figures which may be of interest, which I just happened to run across a few moments ago. They illustrate pretty well what is happening, and I only give them because they have some bearing on what we should be doing. I agree with the hon. member that it would be a good thing for the farmers of Canada if by some means or other they should come to the conclusion that they might produce more hogs than they are producing today, but at the same time I have no intention of going out and telling them so, or of trying to compel them, by means of legislation or regulation, to produce more hogs. I know how far I would get with that.

The point is that some farmers prefer to produce grain rather than hogs, and I do not blame them for that, either. A man can sow grain in the spring, let it grow and harvest it in the fall, and have considerable time to himself evenings and Sundays; and a farmer who can make enough money that way to live as he wants to live will not be easily induced to feed pigs and milk cows, which will keep him at home evenings and Sundays and all the rest of the time. So he decides to produce grain, and I would not quarrel with him over that. I know farmers too well to quarrel with them over such matters. They are going to make their own decisions, as they have always made them.

As a result we find that during the six months from January to June, 1948, the United Kingdom imported 35,000,000 pounds of bacon from Denmark, while for the same period in 1949 her imports from that country amounted to 58,000,000 pounds. In other words Great Britain obtained 15·8 per cent of her supplies in the first half of 1948 from Denmark, while she obtained 52·5 per cent of her supplies of bacon from that country in the first six months of 1949. That means, for what it is worth, that Denmark is back to within two per cent of the position she occupied before the war in supplying the British market. It does not mean Denmark is supplying as much bacon as she supplied before the war; probably Britain is not eating as much. After all, bacon is the most expensive pork product you can eat, and when people are having difficulty in finding money they do not eat as much of the most expensive foods they can find. If you want to eat a really expensive product, eat bacon. Canada's position is that in the first six months of 1948 we supplied 167·5 million pounds of bacon to the British market, as compared with the figure of 35 million pounds from Denmark. For that period of time we supplied 74·8 per cent of all the bacon imported by Britain. In 1949, however, we supplied only 22·6 per cent as against Denmark's 52·5 per cent; that is, we supplied 25 million pounds as against 167 million pounds in the first six months of the previous year. One of the principal reasons for that change is that we are consuming more and more pork in Canada, at higher prices than the British are required to pay for the Wiltshire sides that enter into the production of bacon for that market.

I only give those figures to indicate that the trend is back toward the position we occupied before the war; and we are not trying to either induce or compel farmers to depart from their chosen practice. In my experience of almost fifteen years in this department I have found that 750,000 farmers all working on the job can make a better average decision about any of these matters than any member of this house, including the Minister of Agriculture. I do not intend to try to tell those 750,000 farmers what they should do. I try to give them the facts and let them form their own judgment, and that judgment is that they should not be producing as many hogs now as they did in the middle of the war.

Mr. Harkness: I believe the pamphlet from which the minister was quoting figures a moment ago is the Searle Grain Company report of about two weeks ago?

Mr. Gardiner: No, that does not happen to be correct.

Mr. Harkness: Is that not so?

Mr. Gardiner: If the figures are correct I imagine they would be the same no matter where they were found, but this happens to be a letter on Canadian livestock products, to foster a better meat industry, prepared by the industrial and development council of the meat packers.

Mr. Harkness: In any event the figures are the same as those in this publication, and they are the figures which caused me to do a good deal of thinking, together with many other people who are engaged in the production of hogs. In his remarks the minister has left out of consideration altogether one thing about which he used to talk a good deal; that is, the long-term point of view as far as the hog industry of this country is concerned. Two or three years ago he would point out quite frequently that the future of the hog industry of Canada lay in the British market—

Mr. Gardiner: It does yet.

Mr. Harkness: —and that we should bend every effort to retain that market. The minister just interjected, "It does yet", and with that remark I entirely agree. I think it does, and that if we are to have a healthy hog industry in this country we must have the British market for our surplus pork products, particularly our bacon. I think the minister will realize that is what I was getting at in what I said before he spoke; that in this country we should be following a policy which will enable us to supply the demand for bacon in Great Britain. It is quite true that at the present time Britain is short of dollars. However, she does have a certain amount of money, some of which she is still spending for bacon; and it seems to me that in order to ensure our market in future—and this is the very thing the minister used to emphasize so strongly only two years ago—everything possible should be done to meet the British demand for bacon. If the government can take any action to put us in a position to meet that demand, I think that action should be taken. In other words we should do our best to retain that market. I think it is very bad policy on our part, in spite of what the minister has said—and he really has not dealt with this point—to enter into contracts for a great deal more bacon or any other product than we can possibly supply.

I should like to put that in the form of a question. Whom does this fool? Since apparently it is not fooling the British people, the only conclusion I can reach is that it is designed to fool our own people, particularly our producers of hogs, when we enter into a contract, for 160 million pounds as we did last year, when from present indications we will not be able to supply more than 50 million pounds at the most. That sort of thing does not seem to be good business. Certainly it is not good business as far as our farmers are concerned.

Mr. Gardiner: What figure would you put in the contract for next year?

Mr. Harkness: Nor is it good business as far as our customers are concerned, or perhaps I should say our customer in Great Britain. The minister mentioned that the 750,000 farmers of this country are the people best equipped to decide what they should produce. With that statement I agree entirely. The point is, however, that they will produce those things on which they can make the greatest profit and at the same time have a reasonable assurance that their market will remain. They will not go into the production of hogs on a large scale and as a steady business, for example, if they believe the market for pork products is liable to disappear overnight, which is exactly what happened some two years ago. People sold off weaner pigs, feeder pigs, brood sows and everything else because they were afraid of what was going to happen to the hog market.

Mr. Gardiner: Then we had 48 per cent more delivered than before. Some of my friends were saying they had sold them off.

Mr. Harkness: No. All you have got to do is look at the figures. You know it as well as I do. You have a great deal less delivered now than you had in 1947, which is the year I am speaking of. The general reason that farmers will grow hogs or will not grow hogs is, as the minister knows, the hog-barley ratio or the relationship between the amount of feed grains available and the price of those in relation to the price of hogs. During the past year the people who have been producing hogs have had a certainty that, as far as we are concerned in Alberta, the price of select hogs would not fall below $27.15 a hundred, dressed weight. That was the basic price. On that basis they were able to make their plans and go ahead.

At the present time quite a number of people I know are more than a little bit nervous as to what the situation is likely to be after the first of the year. They know that until the first of the year that is the least price they can receive; they can feed their hogs on that basis and more or less make their plans accordingly. But with the devaluation of the pound, and the fact that we have not been able to anything like meet the British contract, and the general uncertainty in their minds as to what the situation may be with regard to the marketing of pork after the first of the year—I think the minister knows I am not putting this argument up for political or any similar reasons; and he knows this as well as I do—there is a considerable amount of perturbation among the hog raisers as to what their situation is going to be after the first of the coming year. A few nights ago I asked the minister if he could give any assurance to these people, or if he could assure them in any way. He gave a long answer and, I am sorry to say, an evasive one. It was not one that was of any use to the ordinary farmer who is producing hogs. So I would ask the minister again if he can give any information, which would be of value to the hog producers of this country as a whole, as to what their position is likely to be after the end of this year.

Mr. Gardiner: In the years since the beginning of the war, I have followed the practice of letting the opposition do the prophesying as to what is going to happen; as a result I have found that they were usually wrong. I am therefore not going to start to prophesy now.

Mr. Harkness: I did not ask for a prophecy.

Mr. Gardiner: You asked me what is going to happen next year. That is a prophecy.

The position in relation to hogs in 1947, which was referred to a few moments ago, is that every member who spoke on the opposition side of the house—and it did not matter from what section of the opposition he spoke—told the story about killing little pigs and marketing sows. That was in the fall of 1947. In the first six months of 1948 more hogs were marketed in good A and B grades than were marketed in the first six months of 1947.

Mr. Harkness: No.

Mr. Gardiner: And there were 48 per cent more marketed—

Mr. Harkness: Have you any figures to support that statement?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, the figures are on the record

Mr. Harkness: I think you will find you are wrong.

Mr. Gardiner: There were 48 per cent more hogs marketed in January, 1948, to provide Wiltshire sides, than were marketed in January of the previous year. It is true that after October of 1948 the production of hogs dropped. That was all foretold by the officials of the statistics department. That was all foretold when we were discussing the question in 1947. If it is of any interest to my hon. friend, the present position is that the production is going in the opposite direction. Production was dropping in the latter part of 1948 and all through the early part of 1949. The production is now going up and we are having more and more hogs coming to market in addition to the number that came last year. That fact indicates to me that these 750,000 farmers, or that proportion of them that produces hogs, have an idea that maybe they are going to get a little better return for their hogs in the months that lie ahead.

Mr. Harkness: The hog-barley ratio is better, is it not?

Mr. Gardiner: The hog-barley ratio at the present moment is not too good. But at the same time, if you want to take the same document from which my hon. friend usually quotes his figures, it will be found that, if you can get $30 a hundred for dressed hogs, you can get $2.16 a bushel for your barley. That is considerably more than barley is selling for, and hogs are still selling around 33 cents.

Mr. Harkness: No, they are not. They are $29.50 in Calgary.

Mr. Gardiner: I am speaking of one place all the time, not Calgary; I am speaking of one of the central points of Canada.

Mr. Lennard: At Toronto they are $29.50 in today's market, or according to this morning's paper.

Mr. Gardiner: They may be $29.50 tonight. But these figures bring you down to the end of August.

Mr. Lennard: That is not present prices.

Mr. Gardiner: That is about as near up to the present as you can get reliable figures for. The fact that hogs were quoted on the Toronto market at 29 cents yesterday does not mean that they were not quoted a week ago at over 30 cents; and it does not mean that they may not be quoted before the end of next week at 27 cents. But the average over the week may amount to figures similar to those which were obtained in the latter part of August. As a matter of fact, you cannot go on the daily returns in connection with these prices. Let us go back to the point that my friend is arguing, that you do not get enough for your barley.

Mr. Harkness: No, I was not.

Mr. Gardiner: That is what the ratio between the price of hogs and the price of barley means, that if it gets down to a certain level, you are not getting enough.

Mr. Harkness: Do not try to put words into my mouth. I was not arguing that for a moment.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gardiner: If you can produce 100 pounds of pork by feeding 500 pounds of feed, you can get $2.16 a bushel for your barley if you get 30 cents for your hogs. If you get even 20 cents for your hogs you can still get $1.44 for your barley, which is just about the price that barley is. In other words, the price of hogs is 50 per cent higher than the figure which is necessary in order to produce the price of barley.

Mr. Harkness: Excuse me, but may I ask a question?

Mr. Gardiner: You have asked a number, and I am trying to answer some of them.

Mr. Harkness: I take it that this does not take into consideration the other costs of feeding hogs. This is simply the price of barley. It has nothing to do with the labour involved and the land.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend feeds hogs. I should like to ask him if he cannot buy barley, feed it to the hogs, and make money.

Mr. Harkness: I would not be in the business if I could not.

Mr. Gardiner: Of course you would not. And the farmer can make more money when he grows his own grain and feeds his own hogs than you can make buying your hogs and buying your barley.

Mr. Harkness: I am growing barley.

Mr. Gardiner: So the argument still is that the farmer is not doing too badly. If he can produce the 100 pounds—and if he is a good feeder he can do so—by feeding 400 pounds of feed, then he gets $2.70 for his barley, at 30 cents for the pork; and at 20 cents for the pork he gets $1.80. People talk about not getting enough for their wheat when they get $2 a bushel. If he is a good hog feeder he can get $3.37 for his wheat by feeding it to hogs.

Mr. Harkness: If he can make 100 pounds with 350 pounds of feed. Look at your figures.

Mr. Gardiner: No; if he can make 100 pounds of pork on 400 pounds of feed. I am sure my hon. friend will agree that he himself is a good enough feeder to be able to do that.

Mr. Harkness: I think you will find that the figure is 350.

Mr. Gardiner: No; the one I have just quoted is 400. The 350 is $2.88—no, it is not even down to 350. It is 375. There is no 350 in the table. At 450 he can get $2.40 and so on. The table indicates that it is not the case of the farmer not being able to make enough feeding the hogs that has caused him to come down in production. It is something else, and I am not going to try to guess what that is. It is a different thing with different farmers. I know what it would be in my case if I had to feed the pigs myself and clean up the pigpens. You can be sure that as long as I could get the price that I can get for grain now I probably would not do the job. That is one of the reasons why many of them take that position. They say, "We would rather have the returns that we get from the grain and not have to employ anyone since we do not want to do it ourselves. We do not want to have to employ labour in order to get the job done." I am not going to try to give all the reasons, but there are many. They are not doing it; that is the main thing.

Mr. Herridge: With respect to the marketing of fruit and vegetables, the minister's department maintains inspection services across Canada. I understand that a corps of these inspectors is employed more or less on a permanent basis, but the greater number are temporary employees employed during the period of shipping fruit or vegetables. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that while in British Columbia these inspectors have done a fair and reasonable job, in view of the importance of the inspectors' position between the producers and the consumers, has the minister given consideration to having the greater number of these inspectors termed "permanent employees"? I do not think one can expect a man to take up inspection work as a career if he is employed for five or six months a year and takes it as a part-time job.

Has the minister given consideration to the training of these inspectors? It is a very important matter so far as the industry in British Columbia is concerned. No doubt the minister knows that the industry maintains, at its own expense, a competent staff of inspectors who are of great assistance in British Columbia. At this time I want to express the appreciation of the industry for what the senior officials are trying to do in British Columbia with a very limited and part-time staff.

The minister may say that there is not enough for them to do the year round, but I just want to bring this to his attention. Just the other evening, my colleague, the hon. member for Yale, and I were walking down one of the streets of Ottawa looking into shop windows. There we saw four or five boxes of scrubby Ontario apples, I presume, piled into our extra fancy boxes from British Columbia. I presume the apples were being sold as jumbo pack apples. They were obviously all culls. They were being displayed in a large store window in our boxes labelled "extra fancy O.K. brand." Anybody knows if you buy an apple from an O.K. box that apple is O.K. Has the minister given consideration to increasing the number of permanent employees and increasing their salaries? When one considers the importance of these men of the inspection service to the industry, to the producers and to the consumers, and compares the salaries received by other very much less important people, he will agree that these men are entitled to receive treatment that would cause them to consider the inspection of fruit and vegetables as a career which would enable them to give the best service possible to this important industry.

Mr. Gardiner: As the hon. member has pointed out, the grading of apples in British Columbia is done at least as well as it is done in any part of Canada. The actual grading of the apples is done by men and women employed by the trade or by the producers. In their plants they have certain machines to grade apples with regard to size. I have watched them at work. They have individuals standing alongside the machines picking them out, and when the job is done it is presumed that one of the best grading jobs is done in Canada.

Mr. Herridge: Right.

Mr. Gardiner: All our inspectors have to do is to go along and look at them and come to the conclusion that the job is well done. When they have done that they have done their job. It takes a certain number of them but it does not take nearly as many inspectors to take care of a job of that kind at any other time of the year as it does when the apples are being shipped and marketed. I presume when we hire part-time men—the hon. member will know more about this than I do—we hire men who have been pretty well trained in the business themselves. I would imagine that when they go out to pick up men to do this job they may take some fellow who has some time on his hands at that time of the year and who has had experience in doing the job. They put him on for a few weeks or a few months. It is the same principle that is followed all the way through our agricultural activities. We do the same thing with P.F.R.A. and with P.F.A.A. It would be impossible to employ as many men and women for the whole year as are needed to do the job at that time of the year. But I do agree with the suggestion that we ought to get our staffs of competent persons who are employed for the full time up to a number which will see to it that the job is done as it ought to be done. If it can be shown by anyone that that is not so at the present time I am quite sure the department would be open to consider any representations made.

Mr. Quelch: Can the Minister of Agriculture say what the attitude of his department is toward the proposal which I understand was made by the food and agriculture organization that a food pool be set up and that food be sold from that pool to European nations and paid for in their own currencies where they lack dollars? I understand a similar proposal was made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. I should say that it actually originated with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. I think the minister will agree that a proposal of that kind would help greatly toward the stabilizing of maximum production and sales to Europe.

Mr. Gardiner: In answer to the question I can only say that I am on record in connection with the matter. The question was discussed at Quebec when the FAO was set up, and it was discussed again in Copenhagen and in Geneva. I was present on all three occasions and expressed my views with regard to it, and they were in agreement with those which had been presented to those organizations by Sir John Orr, who was then president of the FAO. I do not know of anything that was more completely earned than the Nobel prize which was presented to Sir John Orr during this present week for the, I would say, noble job that he has done in connection with the whole matter.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Harkness: You can do better than that.

Mr. Gardiner: The difficulty in connection with it is that there are too many people in the world who still think dollars mean more than anything else. The only reason I have heard presented by anybody as to why a food pool should not be provided in order to see that all people are properly fed throughout the world and producers able properly to market their products is that it might cost somebody too much. I do not agree that it would cost anyone too much. For example, this country carried 600,000,000 bushels of wheat through a very considerable part of the war, and no part of its population had anything to do with financing it, except some 200,000 farmers who produced that wheat. They carried 600,000,000 bushels of wheat to have it there towards the end of the war to feed the people in Europe who otherwise would have starved.

If 200,000 farmers can do that, then I do not know what good argument there is to come from any of the great nations of Europe as to why they should not see to it that surpluses are carried out of years of very high production into years of very low production, and particularly in connection with commodities such as wheat. I am all for it, but I do not know that I could carry all the people of Canada with me.

Mr. Quelch: I wonder if the minister would go a step further and say that the dominion government is in favour of it?

Mr. Gardiner: The government of Canada let me make three speeches on it, and did not kick me out.

Item agreed to.

Special—

31. Major irrigation and water conservation projects in the prairie provinces, $7,500,000.

Mr. McCusker: I should like to speak on this item, which has to do with irrigation, and affects the constituency I represent.

Mr. Gardiner: Would the hon. member for Regina City allow me to make a statement before he makes his speech? It might have some effect upon it—and it might not. But I should like to make the statement.

Mr. McCusker: Certainly.

Mr. Gardiner: This item of $7,500,000 is the one for major irrigation and water conservation projects in the prairie provinces. At page 118 of the estimates the division of that amount is set out at the top of the page, and makes provision as follows:

St. Mary irrigation project, $2,900,000.

Bow river irrigation project, conditional upon satisfactory agreements with the province of Alberta and others, $2,000,000.

South Saskatchewan river irrigation project: Engineering surveys, land use and economic surveys and other investigational work, $2,000,000.

Survey and engineering costs on water development projects in the prairie provinces including the Red Deer diversion project, $600,000.

With regard to the second item in this group, I should like to make an announcement. This refers to the Bow river irrigation project. The announcement is that the government of Canada has approved the purchase of the assets of the Canada Land and Irrigation Company at Medicine Hat, Alberta. The hon. member for Medicine Hat may express any surprise he desires on this occasion with regard to this having been carried out.

Mr. Wylie: I will be very glad to.

Mr. Gardiner: The purchase price is the price that was offered to myself when I was in Medicine Hat on April 13 last—and which, incidentally, was before the election was announced.

Mr. Harkness: You had it in mind, though.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not know when the election was going to be, really.

The reason for the purchase is to enable the dominion to carry out a more active program in resettlement under the prairie farm rehabilitation program. The intention is to move farmers from those lands in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba where crop production is unsatisfactory owing to continued drought conditions.

The irrigable area of land involved in the purchase is approximately 110,000 acres. There are at present over 400 farmers operating with the company at Vauxhall, Alberta. The dominion will arrange for the operation of the irrigation works. In addition, the dominion will immediately develop other irrigable lands for resettlement of farmers.

Final details of the agreement between the company and the Canadian government are being completed at Ottawa, but it will take some time before all details are finalized.

The reason for the time is that the company, the Canada Land and Irrigation Company, is located in London, England, and our negotiations have to be with persons located at some considerable distance away. Those negotiations have been going on for some time, and it has been finally agreed that the purchase be made on the basis of the offer made on April 13 last.

Mr. McCusker: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak on this item because it affects the constituency of Regina City, which I have the honour to represent in this House of Commons. Before I proceed further I think it would be well for me to say a few words on the history of the location of that city, and something concerning its development, so that hon. members in the house may appreciate some of the difficulties we have with water in that area, and so that they may understand, as the successors of former parliamentarians, they have inherited certain responsibilities.

When the Canadian Pacific Railway was built into western Canada it was understood that it was to pass along the north side of the Qu'Appelle lakes, and that Regina city was to be located in the Qu'Appelle valley. There, in that broad valley, was an abundant supply of water, shelter from the winds, a spot of great natural beauty, an ideal location for any city.

The railway was to extend farther west along the Qu'Appelle valley and along the Saskatchewan river to Estuary and along the Red Deer, and then the Bow river to Calgary. I am quite sure that the parliament of that day took the advice of the people of western Canada who knew something of the country, and agreed to build the railway in close proximity to surface water, so that the settlements which were bound to take place along the right-of-way would have no water problems.

What happened? The survey party of the Canadian Pacific Railway met with some right-of-way difficulties at Fort Qu'Appelle. It withdrew and ran the survey across the prairies thirty to sixty miles to the south of this natural water supply, across the dry plains. They ran it from Brandon to Medicine Hat. As a result we have Regina, Moose Jaw, Swift Current, Gull Lake, and many other small towns and villages in perpetual water difficulty.

I wish to deal more particularly with Regina. They located Regina on the old pile of bones or Wascana creek. It was there the Indians met after they slaughtered buffalo, jerked the meat and made pemican—there was enough water for that, but very little more. Since that time the city has developed tremendously and met with many adversities, one of which was the cyclone of 1912 which left a path of death and destruction through the city.

There was the drought period of the thirties. More recently, last winter, there was a disastrous fire which wiped out the barns and rolling stock of the transportation system. It has faced all these difficulties, and met them. It has faced all its problems and settled them—and it has always had very serious problems. One of the most serious has been the problem of the shortage of water.

To understand that problem I believe the committee should know something of the geology of the country. In the ice age the great ice cap lay over Labrador. The glacier flowed across Hudson bay and down across the prairies toward the gulf of Mexico. As the ice receded it left deposits of glacial drift —that is, gravel and boulders. At different places on the prairies there is evidence of this, and here we find water. As the glacier receded a great lake formed over that prairie country into which rivers flowed. Silt was deposited to a depth, at Regina, of 42 feet. It is impervious to water. At places the glacial drift comes to the surface, but it is difficult to ascertain the extent of this or the amount of water it contains without drilling —and drilling is a costly business.

We drill wells to depths of 50, 100 and 200 feet in order to obtain variable supplies of water. We have had the opinion of some of the greatest water engineers on the continent, such as Mr. N. S. Hill, Jr., of New York; R. O. Wynne-Roberts of Toronto; H. E. Simpson of the university of North Dakota and Professor Forsberg of the university of Saskatchewan. Their opinions vary slightly but they all state that in this glacial drift there is a limited supply of water and that we are now drawing beyond the limit of safety.

Last spring we seeded our gardens and planted our flowers. Our flowers came up, our gardens grew as they do there in the early spring when you have moisture; the flowers came into blossom and our lawns were green. Then came the hot weather and our gardens and flowers dried up and our lawns became brown. One hot day in the summer when it was 105 in the shade we could get no water on the second stories of our homes.

This is a serious problem. In order to obtain water we must go to Buffalo Pound lake, which lies in the Qu'Appelle valley about 45 miles northwest of Regina. Buffalo Pound lake is formed by the runoff water of the great plain and is deepened by a dam thrown across the valley. Normally the water from the runoff down the Qu'Appelle valley is used to irrigate 30,000 to 40,000 acres of hay lands where they have a method of flood irrigation. Then farther down they carry on market gardening.

An urban municipality has priority over a rural municipality and irrigated land in order to obtain water for its population. When we take water from Buffalo Pound lake we will jeopardize the supply of water for those who live below. I should like to ask the minister if there is sufficient money in the estimates to provide for a project to maintain the water level in Buffalo Pound lake. This would have to be done by pumping water from the Saskatchewan river. When the dam is built at Elbow the water will flow by gravity down the Qu'Appelle valley and there will be no problem, but in the intervening years something must be done to protect these people who grow hay, who have market gardens, or who have summer cottages along the valley right down to Brandon and Winnipeg.

Mr. Wylie: I want to say to the Minister of Agriculture that I am happy that an agreement has been reached between the government and the Canada Land and Irrigation Company. It is now up to the government to carry on an extension of that program. As far as my speech during the throne speech debate is concerned, and perhaps I should not refer to it, may I say that the argument was not between the minister and myself, it was between certain newspapers out west and myself. I should like to refer to a report that appeared in one of those papers. When I asked a question the other day the Minister of Agriculture gave me a rather smart answer which was applauded by many Liberal members.

Mr. Gardiner: It was an answer to a smart question.

Mr. Wylie: The minister said that he did not publish either paper. I knew, and I am sure that most hon. members knew, that the minister did not publish either paper, but most hon. members do not realize the statement that appeared in the press that day. I am going to read the report that appeared in one of the papers. When the government goes into business I think this house should be the first to be informed and not the defeated Liberal candidate in any particular constituency. That is what happened in this connection and that is why I refer to it. The Medicine Hat News of Thursday, September 29, contained the following report on the front page—

An hon. Member: What year?

Mr. Wylie: 1949. The report reads:

Government Buys Canada Land

The Canadian cabinet this morning accepted the Canada Land and Irrigation Company deal. This means the government buys the company's assets on the Bow river extension, including the Ronalane-Redcliff project, for a sum of $2,250,000.

An expenditure of $3,500,000 in addition will be required to complete all extension works to bring the water to Medicine Hat. In addition the Alberta government has a stake of $1,250,000 in the development.

The announcement was officially made to the News this afternoon by Harry Veiner, of Brooks, Liberal candidate in the last general election, after a long distance telephone communication from agricultural minister James G. Gardiner.

Mr. Gardiner stated that the company's offer to sell had been accepted by the cabinet this morning and would be announced in the house later today. Confirmation will be forwarded to Dave W. Hays, local manager of Canada Land. It consummates a proposal originated some months before the election in a conference between the three principals mentioned above, and brings closer to realization a thirty-five year dream of Medicine Hat residents.

If, as the minister tells us, this deal has gone through, I am glad and I am sure every voter and resident in the Medicine Hat area and the drought area of that part of the province is happy about it. But this will depend upon whether the government carries on with that project and shows that it means business. We have wasted another year. Nothing has been done to enlarge the canal or to extend the project further. We do not expect that anything will be done before next year, but I can assure you that we do expect to see some action taken in connection with this project.

When this project is completed I think the citizens in the semi-arid areas surrounding Medicine Hat should be given the opportunity to settle on irrigated land. When the Rolling Hills area was settled not so many years ago, shortly after the drought years of 1935, 1936 and 1937, not one farmer in the Medicine Hat area was given an opportunity to move to that irrigated area. They were all brought in from Saskatchewan. We have no particular objection to bringing people in from Saskatchewan but we want to give our own farmers, who have experienced drought for twenty-five years, an opportunity to settle on some of that land. I hope that the dominion government will take that into consideration in the settlement of the land and give some of our dry-land farmers an opportunity to settle on that project. My hon. friend says that they may bring all Liberals in there to defeat me, but I may say that if they thought they were bringing all Liberals into the Rolling Hills area they were badly fooled because first of all they voted C.C.F. and now they are mostly Social Crediters.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): They are getting crazier every day.

Mr. Gardiner: They are advancing. They will get along.

Mr. Wylie: I am sure that once they are Social Crediters they will always be Social Crediters. I had a question to ask on item No. 30, but it went by so fast that I missed it. I presume, however, I can ask it now on the item we are dealing with at the present time. It is in connection with the Ross creek irrigation project. No doubt the minister is acquainted with that. There are about eight or ten miles of canal built under the P.F.R.A. What I should like to know is the amount that has been spent on the canal up to the present time, and also if it is the intention of the P.F.R.A. to complete the canal up to the distribution point, and also the gates of the dam. I should like to know if it is the intention of the government to finish the project this fall.

Mr. Gardiner: As to the questions that were just asked, in the first place it is not the responsibility of the federal government to carry out any irrigation projects in Alberta. It is the responsibility of the government of Alberta, and it is the responsibility of the provincial governments in other provinces, to carry out irrigation work. The land that the federal government purchased from the Canada Land and Irrigation Company was purchased for the purpose of carrying out a program which was announced in 1936, and which has been carried on steadily from 1936 down to the present time. It is a policy of resettling the lands in the dry areas of western Canada.

It was stated a few moments ago by the hon. member for Medicine Hat that we put in the Rolling Hills project before the war, and we did, but it was stated at the same time that provision was not made for taking local people onto that project. One person out of every three is a local person. We took two from outside for every one who was taken from the area immediately surrounding the Rolling Hills project. It may be argued that we should have taken two from the local district for every one we took from elsewhere, but after all most of the people who were living in that district were already on irrigated land. We followed the practice for one-third of the area of attempting to take the sons of some of those who did not have sufficient land, and we brought in people from dry areas in the neighbourhood in order to take up the other two-thirds. All of them, of course, were from one or another of the western provinces.

This particular project is somewhat similar to that but on a larger scale. The land itself, which is being utilized for the purpose, will belong to the federal government. It will be utilized for the purpose of making it possible to move people off submarginal lands where we are now paying considerable sums through prairie farm assistance in order to maintain them in submarginal areas. As many of those people as can be will be moved onto these areas that will be supplied with water.

It is true that east of the area we have purchased there are somewhere in the neighbourhood of 70,000 acres of land upon which water can be placed, and to the west there is also about 70,000 acres of land, in round figures, that can be brought under irrigation, but all of those lands belong to the provincial government. They are actually the property of the provincial government, and they became the property of the provincial government when natural resources were returned to the provinces in 1931. I repeat that, in so far as there being any responsibility on any particular government to do anything about those lands, the responsibility is on the provincial government and not on the federal government.

It is true, however, that there have been discussions with regard to the provision of water for the lands both west and east of the Canada Land and Irrigation Company properties which we have purchased. There have been discussions as to ways and means of putting water on these other lands. The federal government is prepared to sit down and discuss with the provincial government ways and means of having that done. As to the amount of money which has been provided for the purpose in previous estimates, the intention was to spend a certain sum of money, something over $2 million, in the development of the ditches that have already been put in by the Canada Land and Irrigation Company for the purpose of making it possible to carry sufficient water in those ditches to supply the lands which can be irrigated to the west, and which in all probability will be developed by the province when they are developed, and to supply water for the lands to the east.

In other words, the water will have to be carried 198 miles to be exact. I was going to say 200 miles, and possibly you might remember that figure longer. The water has to be carried in the neighbourhood of 200 miles from the Bow river down beyond Calgary. Persons who drive west to Calgary on No. 1 highway travel around a little lake called McGregor lake just before they reach Calgary. That is the first storage east of Calgary having to do with that system. The ditches extend farther on, having been put there originally by the Canada Land and Irrigation Company, almost to the Saskatchewan boundary north of Medicine Hat, but those ditches east of the Vauxhall project have not been utilized to any great extent for supplying water and have remained in disuse from the time when they were first constructed in the early part of the century. It is intended to develop those projects further or at least to enter into arrangements with the provincial government under which we may give some assistance towards the development of them, but not because it is our responsibility.

It is because we realize that the costs in connection with projects of this kind are considerable, that probably some benefits will accrue to all the people of Canada because of their development, and for that reason probably we should give some assistance. I do not want the committee, or the hon. member for Medicine Hat, to go away with the idea that there is any direct responsibility, constitutional or otherwise, on this government to do that job. As long as any government, whether it be that of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba or any other province, approaches the problem by trying to convince everyone that this is a federal job, all I can say is that they are approaching it from an entirely wrong point of view. The federal government has spent nearly all the money that has been spent by any government upon these projects. Certainly practically all the money that has been spent since the present Alberta government took over the administration of that province has been spent by the dominion. I do not intend to accept the suggestion from any member of this house or any member of the government of Alberta that this government has not been meeting all its obligations. It has been going away beyond its obligations and spending millions of dollars in order to make it possible for people out in Alberta to have irrigation.

We are quite prepared to sit down and discuss the question further, but there is one thing I am going to say very plainly. We are not going to sign every document any member of the government of Alberta wants to draw up, call an agreement, sign and send down here to us. We do not intend to do that. Those are the only kind of documents before the people of Alberta or before this government at the present time. There are no agreements before this government, though we have indicated our desire and intention to sit down and discuss this matter at any time with the government of that province, and as far as I know the government of Alberta is prepared to sit down and discuss it with us. But when someone like the hon. member for Medicine Hat gets up during an election and makes the kind of speeches he made, indicating to the people that because for the last twenty years federal governments had done nothing, the present government was not going to do anything, and that all this talk about buying Canada Land and Irrigation was only so much hot air for consumption during election time—

Mr. Wylie: On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask the minister to withdraw that statement.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not going to.

Mr. Wylie: That is one statement I have never made, that it was nothing but hot air.

Mr. Gardiner: The statement you made meant that, even if you did not say it. I have your own advertisement here, signed by yourself, and I could produce two or three more. This is by no means the worst of them, but I am going to be more than fair and read one of the milder ones.

Mr. Wylie: I don't own that paper.

Mr. Gardiner: No, but you paid for this advertisement; you published it. Here is what it says:

> As thousands of electors in this district will not be able to get into the big tent, they are interested in the answers to the following questions.

Mr. Wylie: Is that the circus tent?

Mr. Gardiner: That is the circus tent that you prepared for the people of Medicine Hat in order to induce them not to vote Liberal.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, are not hon. members supposed to address the Chair?

Mr. Gardiner: I can look in the other direction and still address the Chair. The first question, Mr. Chairman, in the advertisement is this:

> What amount has been paid to the Canada Land and Irrigation Company for their interest in the irrigation scheme known as the Redcliff-Ronalane?

When that advertisement was published my hon. friend knew no one had ever said that any money had been paid the Canada Land and Irrigation Company.

Mr. Wylie: May I ask the minister what is the date of that?

Mr. Gardiner: It is the date you paid to put it in the Medicine Hat News, in June, 1949. At the bottom it says:

> Inserted by the Medicine Hat federal constituency social credit association. Keep in step with Alberta! Vote social credit. Wylie.

Mr. Harkness: And they did.

Mr. Gardiner: Then it goes on to say:

> When will the actual construction work start? Who has the contract for the actual work?

Mr. Johnston: We should have asked the Liberal candidate; he was probably the only one who knew.

Mr. Gardiner: And it goes on:

> How does the dominion Liberal government expect to socialize farming within the boundaries of this an autonomous province?

In other words he did not believe we were ever going to purchase the land and do anything at all about putting farmers upon it.

> Why haven't you signed the agreement between the Canada Land and the Alberta government as you had promised to sign?

Then he goes on with this:

> The people want the answers to these questions. Promises of irrigation are strictly out in this district. Keep in step with Alberta. Vote social credit. Wylie.

I say this is one of the milder advertisements. There were a number of others along slightly different lines, insinuating all the way through that this job was not going to be done. Only a few nights ago in this very chamber the hon. member made another speech of the same sort in which he insinuated that there was not much likelihood of this contract ever being carried out. It is all very well for him to say he was reading from the press. If I read everything the press has had to say about me, we would be here until next year. These things that appear in the press are the opinions of those who write them; and the only report that went out to Medicine Hat on the day indicated, no matter what the press had to say, was a report direct to the company that we were prepared to continue negotiations for the purchase of the property. Those negotiations have continued from that day until today, when it was finally agreed that the contract could be signed.

I do not want to be misunderstood, or to have someone say in the Medicine Hat News that the contract has been signed. I am telling hon. members, as I did a few moments ago, that the contract cannot be signed until we have completed our negotiations not only with the individual representing the company here but with the company itself, whose headquarters are located in London, England. Those negotiations are going on, and we have every reason to believe that they will be concluded successfully, that the contract will be signed, that the money will be paid and that we will proceed with the development of that project on that basis. But I want it clearly understood not only by the hon. member for Medicine Hat but by all others that the initial responsibility for this sort of thing does not rest with this government. It rests with the government of Alberta; and it is only because we are interested in resettling an area which was originally settled by the dominion government when the natural resources were under the control of the federal authorities that this government has asked the people of Canada to take an interest in the matter. Up to the present time they have taken an interest to the extent of well over $30 million, and in these estimates we are asking hon. members to vote $7,500,000 for these larger projects and $3 million for P.F.R.A. In other words this year we are asking for $10,500,000, which is just about one-third of the total amount that has been spent since 1936 in carrying on all these P.F.R.A. activities throughout the three prairie provinces. As soon as the estimates are through the house we are prepared to sit down with the government of Alberta and discuss what they think ought to be assumed by the federal government. At the same time we shall feel quite free to suggest what we think they should assume in order to get these projects under way. I am quite sure that when we do get together we will be able to reach satisfactory conclusions, providing the hon. member for Medicine Hat does not make too many speeches.

Mr. Wylie: I have no intention of carrying on a verbal battle with the Minister of Agriculture.

An hon. Member: What are you doing?

Mr. Wylie: What are you doing sitting over there? May I say this. In fairness, I think the minister should read some of the advertisements which were put in the paper by the Liberal candidate in the constituency and which precipitated these questions. If those were read, I think hon. members would understand why these questions were asked. When you have someone going around the constituency saying that the deal is all through—and the same thing appeared on the 29th of last month—something which is not true according to the minister's own words in a telephone communication with the defeated Liberal candidate, then I think it is time that something was done.

I have no intention of holding up any of the irrigation works. I believe that we should do everything possible to complete every project. I do not entirely blame the provincial government of any province, as the minister does. I have listened to campaign speeches in Saskatchewan where they have accepted the responsibility of getting some of these projects. I have heard what they are going to do with that dam across the Saskatchewan river. They have told us about that. I am sure that some of my C.C.F. friends can back me up on that. I think it is fairly well understood that, with respect to that irrigation project mentioned in the Meek report, the main responsibility falls on the dominion government. I think that was fairly well understood in that report.

Mr. Gardiner: That is not in the report.

Mr. Wylie: It is in the report, and I think it is fairly well understood that the main responsibility falls upon the dominion government. No matter what the Minister of Agriculture says about the government of Alberta, I may say this in connection with the Canada Land and Irrigation Company. The dominion government had their experts; the Canada Land and Irrigation Company had their manager, Dave W. Hays; and the provincial government had some men on it. They investigated the whole situation and they agreed as to the amount each would carry. The provincial government signed that agreement and sent it down to Ottawa for the signature of the dominion government. We are still waiting for that. Now that the project is taken over by the dominion government, there is no need to sign that tripartite agreement. But may I ask the minister this question. When the dominion government bought out the Canada Land and Irrigation Company, did they consult the provincial government?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Wylie: Did the provincial government agree?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Weir: Next question.

Mr. Wylie: The minister says that the provincial government did agree to the purchase of this company by the dominion government. According to the minister's statement, and according to some press reports from Ottawa, the provincial government had about $1,500,000 ready to put into the purchase of the agreement.

Mr. Gardiner: No, they did not.

Mr. Wylie: I am going to read you the press report. You do not have to take my word for it.

Mr. Gardiner: You can get into difficulties when you go to the press too much.

Mr. Wylie: I may be getting into difficulty but I am sure I am not in the difficulty that the minister is in. At no time did the provincial government say that they would assist in the purchase of the Canada Land and Irrigation Company?

Mr. Gardiner: No, not to us.

Mr. Wylie: I doubt very much if the provincial government ever agreed, or ever said to the Minister of Agriculture that they would like to see the dominion government take over that project.

Mr. Gardiner: Does my hon. friend doubt my word? Is that what he is saying? Is he saying that he thinks I am lying about it? I went to Edmonton prior to getting the firm offer from the Canada Land and Irrigation Company. I met four of the members of the government, including the premier, in the premier's office. One of the gentlemen sitting here at the table in front of me was with me at the time. I presented the whole project to them, just as it has been carried through. They agreed that it was the best possible thing to do; and as a matter of fact there are letters on file to the same effect. There is not any question about that at all. It was agreed to by the provincial government when four members of the government were present.

Mr. Thatcher: I must say a word on this matter. Some people may be facetious about the south Saskatchewan irrigation project if they want to be, but the fact remains that the constituency in which I live happens to be in the dust bowl; and I can tell hon. members that drought conditions this year again are serious, as the hon. member for Regina City pointed out. At one time this year you could go out in an automobile on a highway and not be able to see the front of the engine because the dust was blowing so badly. You could go out on the golf course and try to putt your ball into the hole on a green but there were so many grasshoppers in the way that it would not go straight.

An hon. Member: Do you blame the Minister of Agriculture for that?

Mr. Thatcher: The situation is serious. I am amazed to hear the Minister of Agriculture tonight get up and state that irrigation is not the responsibility of the federal government—and that is what he said, if I understood him correctly—because for forty years the Liberal party has been promising at every federal election and every provincial election that they were going to take effective action on irrigation. I remember what happened back in 1940. We have a little creek in the town of Moose Jaw not far from the main street. I remember the Liberal candidate getting up to speak, and from the way he talked I thought ships would be sailing down that Moose Jaw creek from Hudson bay. In 1945 I remember the minister and his party made a specific promise about the south Saskatchewan irrigation project. I have quoted it before in the house, and I am going to quote it again. This promise was carried in the Moose Jaw Times on June 9, 1945—not this election but the one before. The advertisement reads:

> The south Saskatchewan irrigation project will be commenced immediately men and material are available—it has been approved.

In 1945 the Liberal party stated: "It has been approved". What has happened to it? That was a straightforward statement which did not carry any qualifications that could not be met today. Yet nothing has been done. We saw the same thing in the by-election in which the hon. member for Rosthern was elected. Here is another clipping which says in effect: Elect the Liberals and you will get irrigation projects. Here is another one from the minister's nominating convention: Elect the Liberals. We will do something about irrigation.

The hon. member for Regina City was speaking a few moments ago. Here is one of his promises:

> Water for Regina!!
> Never before in the history of our city has the need for a new water supply been so urgent and immediate . . .
> Probe failed to get you a new water supply—let McCusker do it!

I say, let's get going. I want to help McCusker do it, and I want the minister to help him do it. The advertisement of the hon. member for Regina City went on to say:

> The failing water supply in Regina endangers the health of the people . . .
> Recourse to rigorous water rationing is an ever-present threat to every householder.
> Unless immediate steps are taken to cope with this crisis, Regina faces the greatest drought in her history.

And so on.

Mr. McCusker: You are just making my speech again.

Mr. Thatcher:

> A personal pledge.
> As your elected Liberal member for Regina in a Liberal government at Ottawa, I would use every resource at my command to get immediate action on a new water supply.

Every Liberal member for the past twenty-five or thirty years, as they have gone into that dust bowl area, has been talking about the south Saskatchewan irrigation project. I say that the time has come for the Liberal party to give us a little bit of action and not so many words. This estimate tonight means only one thing to the people of Saskatchewan and the people on the prairies. Only two million dollars for irrigation surveys means that once again the Liberal party is reneging on specific election promises. Once again the Liberal party is doing nothing, or very little in a concrete way, about this south Saskatchewan irrigation project which is needed so badly.

The minister is a Saskatchewan minister. Quite true, he represents all Canada, but first of all he represents Saskatchewan. I am happy indeed to see some work being done in Alberta; but I hope the minister will use his influence soon to start at least one major project in his own province of Saskatchewan which elects him, and where it is needed far worse. I think this estimate that the minister brings down tonight is a national disgrace. I think it is a national tragedy.

Mr. Low: I was very much interested in the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture, and while I am not going to enter into the pretty strong debate that has developed on irrigation, for my own information I should like to ask the minister some questions about the statement he made. If I remember correctly he said that he was not going to sign any old agreement that the province of Alberta, or somebody in that province, wants to send down already signed. If I am wrong in these words I should like the minister to correct me. Have the federal government executed any agreement between themselves and the government of Alberta for the completion of the works and the colonization of the St. Mary river irrigation development? If they have not, then I should like the minister to tell the committee why not. If they have I should like the minister to tell us when it was executed. If I am not mistaken the federal government has already spent around $2,750,000 on that project, which is a commendable thing.

Mr. Gardiner: Over $5 million.

Mr. Low: Over $5 million to date. That is even better.

Mr. Gardiner: That is a pretty good signature.

Mr. Low: I quite agree, but the minister must realize that, if there is no agreement between the federal government and the provincial government with respect to the completion and the colonization of that project, then he must admit that the federal government has gone a long way toward telling this country that irrigation is a federal responsibility. I am serious about this and not acrimonious at all. The minister ought to know, before he answers these questions, that there are certain newspaper writers in this country who are trying to make the people believe that the Alberta government does not want to sign an agreement. I say that these newspaper writers, one of whom is T. H. Grey, have been writing in some of the western papers and eastern papers lately. I want to say for the benefit of Mr. Grey, and of others, that the province of Alberta does want to sign an agreement, and they have been after the minister to get the agreement.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member is hardly correct. They have sent an agreement down signed by themselves which was never entered into by us.

Mr. Low: I know that it has never been entered into by the dominion government. Let me ask this question. Was that agreement not drafted by a representative of the government of the province of Alberta sitting with a representative of the federal government?

Mr. Gardiner: No, it was not.

Mr. Low: That is my information. I would like the minister to answer the question.

Mr. Gardiner: The question asked by the leader of the Social Credit party is a fair one and I shall try to give him a fair answer. There have been no, what are called, large irrigation projects undertaken up to date in western Canada. The policy with regard to large irrigation projects has not yet been established as between the dominion government and the provincial governments, but some few years ago the United States took the position that unless we were going to utilize the water in the St. Mary river they would probably use it. The members of the water development committee did say at that time that they thought these waters ought to be conserved in Canada, and because of this decision something ought to be done toward conserving them. Discussion started as between the government of Alberta and the government of Canada. No agreement was reached with regard to the matter. But the Canadian government took this position, that farmers could not remain on lands in Alberta, or in any other part of western Canada, if they had to pay what amounted in costs to more than $10 an acre of the lands that were going to be irrigated. Therefore they said that if it was going to cost say $40 an acre or $50 an acre to put in the works that made it possible to have the land irrigated, then the farmer himself could not pay the amount and at the same time pay his water charges and pay the taxes on his land and all the costs of operation. Therefore somebody ought to do something about establishing the capital works.

We said that we were prepared to put in the main dam. In other words we were prepared to establish the storage in the St. Mary river and thus start to utilize waters which otherwise might have been taken into the United States. When we said that, the provincial government asked us not only to build the dam in the St. Mary river but to build the storage at Pothole which is a small lake that forms the storage and is about thirty-five miles from the main dam. They asked us to pay at least some part of the cost of digging the ditch from the main dam to Pothole, some thirty-five miles, and then to pay some part of the cost of Pothole as a secondary storage. We said that we were not prepared to discuss the question as to where the division of costs should end, but that we would go ahead with the construction of the dam in order to maintain the position in relation to the United States.

As has been said, the costs that we are going to be put to there will run up toward $20 million before we are through. We have spent about $5 million. At that time the province said that they were prepared to pay the cost of Pothole and Pothole has been constructed and paid for by the provincial government; but they agreed to pay the cost of Pothole conditionally upon the federal government entering into an agreement later on to pay some part of the costs at least as far as Pothole.

Mr. Low: To make that a part of the big project.

Mr. Gardiner: To make that a part of the original project which was not to be capitalized on the land itself. The undertaking given was that whatever arrangement was made finally with regard to the works between the main dam and Pothole or beyond Pothole was to apply to Pothole itself. So that the present position is that the provincial government has paid for Pothole, and we have paid for all the works on the main dam, and negotiations are still continuing with regard to the other matters.

The document which has been sent down here relating to the construction of works, having to do with the St. Mary dam, is a document which provides for very extensive expenditures over a very extensive program. The agreement reached between the provincial government and the federal government some two years ago in the offices at Edmonton, when I myself was there, was to the effect that whatever principles we were going to follow in other large projects in western Canada would be established in relation to the construction of the St. Mary dam and any lands which were irrigated from that dam.

That is the general agreement that was entered into by word of mouth—it is not in writing, although it may be in some letters which have passed. But it was an agreement reached through discussion, namely that whatever arrangements were finally made with regard to the division of costs in connection with the St. Mary dam and the waters stored there would be followed in particular in connection with other large projects.

In answer to the direct question: "Has any agreement on the question been signed", the answer is no. I accept the document which was sent here by the provincial government, drawn up on the basis upon which they thought payments ought to be made and in that document—

Mr. Low: Is that correct? Is it correct, in view of the fact that your own representatives assisted in the drafting of that document?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that the provincial government applied to our office, as the only source from which information could be obtained, for all of the engineering information with regard to the project. And, basing their conclusions upon the information thus obtained, they asked that certain things be done, and wrote them into the form of what they would like to see under an agreement, and have sent it down to Ottawa.

Mr. Low: Just at that point—and I am only asking for information, because we have to clarify this matter—is it not true that at the time that document was sent, or just after that, you told the people in Alberta that you could not very well enter into any agreement or attempt to sign an agreement until the election was over?

Mr. Gardiner: What is that?

Mr. Low: Is it not true that you told people in Alberta, with respect to this very agreement we are talking about, that you could not attempt to enter into any such agreement until after the election?

Mr. Gardiner: No, I did not tell them that. They may have assumed from the discussion that probably we would not; but I did not at any time tell them that. I am quite sure that, if I had entered into any agreement while the election was on, the speech made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat with regard to what was said there would be mild when compared with what my hon. friends would be saying. I certainly did not enter into any undertaking to make any agreement with them immediately preceding the election; and I would not have done so, even if I had been in a position to do so—which I was not.

And I am not in a position to sign any agreement with them yet. The reason is that the document which has been submitted to us asks that we not only foot all the bills for the St. Mary dam, and all the bills for Pothole, but that we assume all the expenditures for storage at Ridge, and all the storage at Chin and all the storage at Horsefly, over to the southwest of Medicine Hat; and that we assume all the cost of digging all the ditches to connect all these storages.

They say, "If you will do all that, then we under our act will do certain things." The hon. member for Moose Jaw says, "Whose obligation is it?" Well, I was minister of highways in the Saskatchewan government for five years, and while I talked about irrigation I was not talking about anybody at Ottawa doing the job of irrigation. I was talking about my own department doing it. When I was minister of highways we had an irrigation act. We have not an irrigation act here; irrigation acts are on the statute books of provincial legislatures.

So the Alberta government asks us to do all the work to deliver the water right to the door of the farmer—and when I refer to the door of the farmer I refer to the point where the farmer takes the water out of the main ditch. They say, "If you will do that, then under our irrigation act we will organize the farmers into irrigation districts, and we will finance the construction of work in those areas, and then we will turn around and charge the farmer for the cost that we put up."

What we say in regard to that is this, that the provincial government ought to share some of the capital cost, which reduces the total cost per acre from some $40 or $50 down to the $10 that the farmer can pay, and that no part of that money ought to be collected back from the farmer. We say the federal government should put up something and the provincial government should put up something; and whatever that amount is, it should be charged up to the capital cost which the farmer is not going to be required to pay, in order that his costs may be reduced down to the $10.

My personal opinion about that is that when you take all the works for which we are responsible, including the original dam, we would be assuming far more than our total responsibility, whatever that responsibility might be based upon, whether it is a legal responsibility or a national responsibility. We would not be very far from the mark if the provincial government became responsible for half of the cost and the federal government became responsible for the other half.

Mr. Thatcher: Does the minister suggest that for the south Saskatchewan project, also?

Mr. Gardiner: I have told my hon. friend that whatever we finally decide with the Alberta government as being the principle to be applied will be applied to all of them. The difference between the project in Alberta and the project on the south Saskatchewan river is that back beyond the St. Mary storage there is another storage known as the Waterton lakes. Only today in our city of Ottawa the international joint commission held a hearing to decide the question as to whether that water belongs to the United States or to Canada, and certain findings were made with regard to it.

I do not know what those findings were, because the document is not yet made public. It will probably be out in a day or two. In any case, they have been deciding the question as to what part of that water belongs to Canada and what part belongs to the United States. A ditch about two or three times as long as the one between the St. Mary dam and Pothole would have to be constructed to take the water from Waterton lake to St. Mary dam. That water again would be required before you could irrigate the 500,000 acres of land extending east from Lethbridge upon which water can be placed—if we can get enough water to irrigate it.

As we go along, when once the federal government has entered into an agreement with regard to St. Mary, the same principles would apply with regard to the other storages. I do not know how many years it will take to do one job; but the position we are taking is that we should establish a principle on the basis of whatever we are going to do at St. Mary, and apply those principles to the other projects. That is the present position in relation to it. I do not know whether I have answered the questions asked.

Mr. Low: I wish to thank the minister for travelling forty-five miles when he could have answered the question by a simple yes or no. I quite realize however that it was difficult for him to answer yes or no, and to give a proper impression. Now—

Mr. Gardiner: That is why you would like me to say yes or no.

Mr. Low: I simply asked the question whether you had or had not signed the agreement.

Mr. Gardiner: But my hon. friend should realize this, that there is not any agreement to sign.

Mr. Low: That is right.

Mr. Gardiner: When there is an agreement we will certainly sign it, but there is not any agreement to sign.

Mr. Low: That is perfectly correct, but in the statement the minister made just before

I asked my question he implied that Alberta had been quite derelict in its duty and responsibility toward irrigation. In fact he made the statement, I think quite clearly, that Alberta had not done anything about irrigation.

Mr. Gardiner: Just let me put my hon. friend straight. The hon. member for Medicine Hat was asking what the federal government was going to do about the lands east of the Vauxhall project and the lands west of that project. I said that that was the responsibility of the provincial government because they owned the land. We know what we are going to do about the lands that we own.

Mr. Low: What the minister said was that since the Social Credit government came into power in Alberta it had done nothing about irrigation.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say "nothing," I said that they had not done very much. As a matter of fact I have just told you that they had done one thing: they built the dam at Pothole. I would like to know what else they did?

Mr. Low: The minister did not say that at first.

Mr. Gardiner: And they expect us to pay for it.

Mr. Low: The minister knows that that is not true.

Mr. Gardiner: It is hardly true because we actually built the dam but they paid for it.

Mr. Low: You paid for it.

Mr. Gardiner: They expect us to pay them the amount of money that they paid for it.

Mr. Low: That is not true either and the minister knows it.

Mr. Gardiner: That is exactly true.

Mr. Low: The minister knows that the Alberta government went ahead in good faith with nothing but a verbal agreement. They had had experience with the federal government before with verbal agreements, but they completed the Pothole storage and canals.

Mr. Gardiner: It is a written agreement.

Mr. Low: They went ahead with a verbal agreement and the understanding was that when the St. Mary river project was completed this would be entered as part of that project and whatever the cost was it would be allowed to apply with respect to the Pothole project.

Mr. Gardiner: That is all in writing.

Mr. Low: The minister comes here and says, "They expect us to pay them for it." That is not playing the game.

Mr. Gardiner: That is playing the game. I can produce it from the records. It appears in the documents that they asked us to pay it.

Mr. Thatcher: I think this debate becomes more serious as the minister proceeds, because he has enunciated tonight an entirely new irrigation policy for the Dominion of Canada, when he suggests that the province should pay a portion of the cost of irrigation projects. He has never taken such an attitude before in the many years he has been promising irrigation projects. What does that mean to the west? The budget for the province of Saskatchewan last year was approximately $53 million and I admit quite frankly that we had a fairly difficult time in balancing that budget.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Thatcher: Hon. members may laugh if they will, but this is a pretty serious matter for my constituency and my province. If we are going to have to pay one-half or one-quarter or some proportion of the cost of the south Saskatchewan irrigation project, the financial position of the province is such that we may have to wait fifty years for its completion. The minister knows that very well.

Mr. Gardiner: If we have a C.C.F. government.

Mr. Thatcher: I think Alberta is in precisely the same position. What the minister is telling us tonight is that the federal government, a government that had a surplus of a billion dollars three years ago, a billion dollars or more two years ago, and about a billion dollars this year, a government that has had those huge revenues, is now calling upon the provincial governments to help pay for major irrigation works. I think that is shameful. I think this committee should hold up these estimates indefinitely if he is going to continue along those lines. I do not know whether that is possible, but I shall do my best. I sat in this parliament during 1945 and 1946 when hundreds of millions of dollars were voted as gifts and loans to countries overseas. Probably a good deal of that was justified but surely—

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend voted for it.

Mr. Thatcher: That is not correct. If this government can be so generous with other nations, why should it find so much trouble in providing money for projects at home that are needed so badly? The minister and this parliament know the advantages of irrigation. I assure the minister that if this is a new policy he has enunciated tonight it will not receive wide acceptance in western Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: This is not a new policy being enunciated tonight; it has been enunciated every time I have spoken on the question in the House of Commons.

Mr. Thatcher: Oh.

Mr. Gardiner: It has been enunciated every time I spoke on the question in western Canada.

Mr. Thatcher: Oh my.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend does not come to my meetings. He usually has to read the C.C.F. press to find out what I have said. Coming back to this question of whether the south Saskatchewan river project should be built with the assistance of the provincial government, may I say that, when the present government of Saskatchewan took over, the revenues of the province were about $32 million. According to the statement made a few moments ago those revenues are now about $53 million.

Mr. Thatcher: We are building roads and giving some social services.

Mr. Gardiner: If the south Saskatchewan river project was built under conditions that existed some three or four years ago it would cost in the neighbourhood of $60 million.

Mr. Wright: What would it cost today?

Mr. Gardiner: If it had to be built under conditions as they are today that amount would be increased by perhaps $10 million or maybe a little more. But it would be absolutely impossible to construct the south Saskatchewan river project in less than ten years. The total expenditure required would be averaged out over that period of time at somewhere between $6 million and $8 million per year. Is my hon. friend telling me that a province that can raise $20 million more—as a matter of fact he told us a while ago that they were not able to raise it—

Mr. Thatcher: I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend said that they were having difficulty balancing their budget.

Mr. Thatcher: That is different.

Mr. Gardiner: It is the same thing to me. On two occasions I was provincial treasurer of Saskatchewan and I know how difficult it is to raise money in Saskatchewan. That government undertook this year to spend $53 million, which is about $20 million more than was spent in the last year before they came into office.

Mr. Thatcher: The federal government spent five times as much as they did in the same year.

Mr. Gardiner: The federal government gave this present government $15 million, and that is $10 million more than they gave the previous government. If the government of Saskatchewan can raise $20 million more, I think there is a good argument for saying that they can pay $3 million or $4 million a year in order to have this irrigation project carried out in that period of time.

I am not arguing that that is going to be the final outcome of our discussions, but if that is the outcome of our discussions with regard to the St. Mary river project, it will have to be applied all the way across the board. If the final decision is that we pay two-thirds and the province pays one-third of the cost, that will have to be applied all the way across the board. In other words, we will have to treat one government just the same as we treat any other government.

With regard to that, I should like to say that we are doing a similar thing in the maritime provinces. Down there we are constructing dikes in the marshlands and the undertaking is that they will pay one-third, the farmers will pay one-third and we will pay one-third. The same principle runs through that expenditure as I have enunciated in connection with the irrigation projects. I think under the arrangements that are being made down there the expenditures made by the provincial and by the federal government will be money spent and then the farmers will have to pay the other third in the form of rates charged against their land. That may work out to be the general policy right across Canada. We do not intend to apply it any differently in Saskatchewan from what we do in the other provinces. I expect we will get the same results in Saskatchewan, when we finally come to deal with it there, as we have had in Alberta and elsewhere.

Before I sit down I want to answer the first questions that were asked and which I had almost forgotten. The member for Regina City started this discussion, and we have gone all the way round the board. I should like to come back to Regina before we close. I should like to say a few words in reply—

Mr. Thatcher: Moose Jaw too.

Mr. Gardiner: When anything is done for Regina, Moose Jaw always comes in for a share.

Mr. Thatcher: Always?

Mr. Gardiner: Practically always.

An hon. Member: We always look after our suburbs.

Mr. Gardiner: The fact is that the storage of water that would be provided by the construction of the south Saskatchewan dam would be nearer to Moose Jaw than it would be to Regina, and Buffalo Pound lake is nearer to Moose Jaw than Regina. Any work that is done in order to assist Regina will assist Moose Jaw. The water passes along the way and can be taken down to Moose Jaw without as much ditch being dug as is required for Regina.

The question that was asked by the hon. member for Regina City is whether there is sufficient money in the estimates, as they are now brought down, to take care of any work which might be necessary to take water out of the Saskatchewan river, pump it over the height of land, run it down into Buffalo Pound lake, and keep the level of that lake sufficiently high to make it possible for Regina and Moose Jaw to take water out of it over the period during which construction of the south Saskatchewan dam may be taking place. All I can say about that is that there is enough money in the estimates, but it is not definitely stated anywhere in the estimates, or in connection with them, that the money will be spent for that purpose. There is $2 million in the estimates to take care of anything that we may require to do touching upon the south Saskatchewan river project which will help to determine the question whether or not we should proceed with it. It is conceivable that money could be taken out of that vote in order to do this job.

The present position is that representatives from Regina came down here and asked us what we were prepared to do. Representatives of the Saskatchewan government also came with them. The representatives of the Saskatchewan government presented the case to us, which was to the effect that they thought we should spend all the money in order to provide for the taking of water to the city of Regina. We replied then exactly as I have replied to the house tonight. We said that it was not our responsibility, that it was the provincial government's responsibility, and asked them what they were prepared to do. In reply to that the city of Regina said that they were prepared to find one-third of the cost, and the representatives of the provincial government refused to say that they would find one-third of the cost. It was suggested to them, not by myself but by the minister concerned, that the government might give some consideration to the proposal if they put forward a three-way proposition, but up until now such a proposition has not been made.

That is the present position of the whole project. There is sufficient money in the vote to take care of anything that might require to be done, provided it can be shown to be a part of the south Saskatchewan project—and I believe this might be shown to be. The government intimated that they were prepared to consider a proposition put to them by the city of Regina and the province combined. Up to now we have not had a proposition of that type.

Mr. Thatcher: Will the minister say whether this estimate means that no actual construction work will be commenced this year on the south Saskatchewan irrigation project?

Mr. Gardiner: I think that was the intimation given to the house when the estimate was first brought down, which was prior to the election. This is the same estimate as was brought down last spring.

Mr. Thatcher: But you are not talking the same way.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, yes, I am talking exactly the same way. Members of the committee and of the house asked the same questions then as are being asked now and tried to force the government to take the position that we were going to proceed with construction. We said that it was necessary to spend another $2 million before we could make a definite decision on the question whether we should proceed with construction. That $2 million is in this estimate. Up to now we have committed ourselves to an expenditure of $634,000 out of the $2 million, and we have a considerable number of months to run. In other words, we have spent a considerable part of the first six months' allotment from the vote down to the end of the six-month period.

Mr. Harkness: I should first like to correct a small item of geographic misinformation on the part of the minister a short time ago. The irrigation lake immediately to the east of Calgary, which the minister mentioned in reference to the highway passing it, is not McGregor lake but Chestermere lake. McGregor lake is considerably to the south of that. I hope that the minister will not produce a newspaper advertisement to prove to me that those two lakes had changed places.

I was glad to have the minister give us some information in connection with the St. Mary river dam and irrigation project. I should like to ask a few more questions about it. He will remember when this matter was last before the house on his estimates we had a considerable discussion about the St. Mary river project. At that time it developed that the original contractors for the rock tunnels, and so forth, were in difficulty, and I believe the contract was taken away from them and given to somebody else. Will the minister tell us whether the rock tunnels have been completed, if the amount of $2,200,000 which we voted last year covers those rock tunnels, and if any portion of the $2,900,000 which we are now voting is for the purpose of those rock tunnels? If it is not for that, or a major portion of it, I wonder if he would tell us how much of that has been expended on the earth fill, the water gate construction and so forth, and also what stage of completion the St. Mary river dam has reached. Would he also tell us about the work which is going on at the present time and when the project is likely to be completed.

Mr. Gardiner: The dam is 125 feet high now and it will be 190 feet when it is completed, which will be about a year from now?

Mr. Harkness: It will be completed about a year from now?

Mr. Gardiner: We figure it can easily be completed by a year from now. The spillway, which I understand the hon. member has in mind, which has been decided upon, and which is somewhat of a change from the original plan—

Mr. Harkness: Is that the one tunnel that is used?

Mr. Gardiner: Wait till I get through with the spillway; then I will deal with the tunnel. The proposal has been made that the spillway should be constructed by the contractor who is now on the job at the same unit rates as he gave in his contract in 1946. I think anyone will agree that rates established on a contract in 1946 would be comparatively low if applied to a contract now, and we are considering whether something should be done in respect to the present contractor. The concrete part of the structure is such that there were no unit prices in the original tender, and we shall be calling for tenders on that, whatever may be done with regard to the remainder.

Mr. Harkness: What do you mean by unit prices?

Mr. Gardiner: So much per yard of earth, so much per yard of rock, and so on. First a tunnel had to be put through in order to take the water by the dam. Then a tunnel had to be put through to take the water from the dam down to where it is delivered into the ditch for irrigation purposes. These tunnels were through a sort of sand rock in both cases. The diversion tunnel is not quite as long as the irrigation tunnel. It is true, as was stated, that tenders were called on both tunnels back in 1946. Three concerns tendered. At the time it was intimated to us by our engineers that the work could not be done at the unit prices of the lowest bidder.

Mr. Harkness: That was Bennett and White?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. We called in the contractors and explained to them that this was our information, but they said they could put in the tunnels at the prices they had quoted. We had our advisory engineer from the United States, General Ferguson, who has had great experience with dams of this kind, come up and look over the project. He saw Bennett and White and gave it as his opinion that he doubted whether the work could be done at the prices they were quoting. They still insisted that they could do it at those prices. We told them that this was the first project of the kind we were undertaking, and we said, "We cannot go ahead accepting bids on a basis on which, according to the best engineers, the work cannot be done, and then later find ourselves in the position of having to raise the price above the bid of the second bidder or even perhaps above that of the highest bidder. We cannot get into that position". In spite of that they said they were prepared to go ahead, and they did so. Their costs ran higher than the figure quoted by the second bidder, and I think even higher than those of the highest bidder. After some discussion they asked for further payments. We called attention to the discussions that had taken place in the beginning, and finally it was agreed that it would be better for them to quit their contract on completion of their first tunnel and allow the job to be carried on by someone else. The work has been given on a cost plus basis to the second bidder.

Mr. Harkness: Who was that?

Mr. Gardiner: The Assiniboia Construction Company. They are working on it now. The second tunnel has been completed as far as boring through the rock is concerned, and they are now completing the work of cementing the inside of the tunnel. So the job is being completed within the time set when the second contract was let.

Mr. Harkness: Then I take it from what the minister has said that a considerable portion of this $2,900,000 we are now voting—

Mr. Gardiner: About $910,000.

Mr. Harkness: —is for this tunnel.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: The minister said the contract for the second tunnel was given to another company on a cost plus basis. I wonder if the minister would tell us, if he has the information, where the rock tunnellers working on that contract came from and if their cost is included in the cost plus figure.

Mr. Gardiner: The men doing the work are miners from British Columbia. Even in Alberta we sometimes have to get help from British Columbia. Our information, which I think is correct, is that one of the best tunnellers in Canada is Stevens of Vancouver. Stevens was obtained by the Assiniboia Construction Company to take charge of this work, and I understand the plan is that this man makes his agreement with the miners who are brought down to do the job, and the work is done by them on the basis of agreements made with him.

Mr. Harkness: It is a subcontract, then?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. Then that is allowed as part of the cost, and the work proceeds on that basis.

Mr. Quelch: I have three or four questions to ask, but it is almost eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall take up first resolution No. 10 on today's order paper in the name of the Minister of of Justice, concerning the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act; then resolution No. 9 of the Minister of Justice concerning the Judges Act, 1946. Then we will go into committee of the whole on Bill No. 8 to amend the Exchequer Court Act; then Bill No. 9, to amend the Department of Justice Act. From eight to nine o'clock will be public bills and orders, and then we will take up estimates: Agriculture, Veterans Affairs and Labour.

Mr. Green: In that order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I could not say as to the last two departments, but Agriculture will be first.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

29. Marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $6,000, $75,000.

Special—

30. Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $3,000,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, October 14, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE

SUPERANNUATION—REFERENCE TO REPORT IN MONTREAL "GAZETTE" OF OCTOBER 14

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This morning's issue of the Montreal Gazette contains the following:

A total of 1,106 federal civil servants or their widows are receiving pensions of less than $200 a month, it was shown today in a Commons return tabled for Stanley Knowles (C.C.F.—Winnipeg North Centre).

I hold in my hand the return in question, sessional paper No. 100A, tabled yesterday, which shows that 1,106 federal civil servants or their widows are receiving pensions of less than—please note—$20 a month.

An hon. Member: Shame.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

ADDITIONAL COMPENSATION TO OWNERS OF SLAUGHTERED CATTLE

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act to provide changes in the limitation of value determined by the minister in respect to compensation that may be paid owners of slaughtered cattle; to provide additional compensation in respect to certain cattle slaughtered before the commencement of the amending act but after March 31, 1947, and for the repeal of the basis of compensation provisions.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DEVALUATION OF POUND STERLING—IMPERIAL EX-SERVICEMEN IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, notice of which I sent him yesterday. It relates to the devaluation of the pound as it affects Canadians who served in the imperial forces. The minister wrote me a note yesterday which reads as follows:

I take it from your note that you will ask a question tomorrow under orders of the day. Perhaps you will send me a copy of your question, and I shall try to give a clear-cut reply.

I sent the minister a copy of my question.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice yesterday of his intention to ask this question today.

First of all I wish to express regret that earlier discussions of this matter have been misinterpreted across the country, and I should like to make this statement as clear as I possibly can. The question which the hon. member sent me reads as follows:

I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It is in relation to the devaluation of the pound regarding those imperial veterans who reside in Canada, as there has been considerable misunderstanding about the effect of this regarding those who live in Canada.

Would the minister clarify it, as it is said that those who have resided in Canada for some time would not lose any money by the same? I sent him some letters on this subject, and he wrote me yesterday as follows:

"Dear Mr. Church:

I am sorry if the matter has been misunderstood. I take it from your note that you will ask a question tomorrow under orders of the day. Perhaps you will send me a copy of your question, and I shall try to give a clear-cut reply.

Sincerely,

Milton Gregg."

In reply I would say that a supplementary award from the Canadian pension commission is accorded to those Canadians who were domiciled in Canada prior to enlistment and who served in the imperial forces, and have been awarded a disability pension from the British ministry of pensions. To these Canadians our pension commission make a supplementary award bringing their pension up to the rate which they would have received had they served with Canadian forces. I should like to make it clear that this is a very special group who, naturally, are not worried. I now come to others who are worried, and about whom all of us are much concerned. No action is contemplated for those without prewar domicile in Canada whose disability pension from British sources is not being augmented or supplemented by the Canadian pension commission. Likewise no action is being taken with respect to those in receipt of long-service pensions, as distinct from disability pensions, from the British armed services. The extra assistance applies only to Canadians who are already receiving a Canadian supplement to their British disability pension.

Mr. Church: It applies only to those who resided in Canada for some time before the war.

CHINA

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, an Associated Press dispatch from San Francisco, published this morning, indicates that the Hon. T. C. Davis, Canadian ambassador to China, had stated upon arrival there that he believed it possible to do business with communist China. The heading states, "Can do business with China Reds: Canadian envoy." I presume the Hon. Mr. Davis will be here over the week end, and I wish to ask whether the government will make a statement early in the week as to Canadian policy with respect to China.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The government will be glad indeed to do that.

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY

APPLICATION FOR RATE INCREASE IN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. What is the government's attitude toward the Bell Telephone Company's application to the board of transport commissioners for a substantial increase in rates?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): That is not a question which should be asked on the orders of the day, and I think no one knows it better than my hon. friend. In any event—

Mr. Knowles: The minister should not try to evade my question.

Mr. Chevrier: I am going to answer it. As the hon. member knows, or should know, the government is not directly concerned with the application of the Bell Telephone Company. That is a matter which is properly before the board of transport commissioners, and it is for them to adjudicate upon. If any parties feel themselves aggrieved by the board's decision, they have the right to appeal, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. Cruickshank: Including himself.

[Mr. Gregg.]

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the government operates telephone services in various parts of this country, is not the government in fact concerned in this application?

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend were familiar with the circumstances he would not have asked that question. This is an application by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada for an increase in their tariffs in respect of their telephone lines in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. It does not concern telephone lines of the dominion government.

Mr. Knowles: The company has broken its promise to this house of a year and a half ago.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INCREASE IN REFUND PAYABLE IN RESPECT TO PRIOR SERVICE BEYOND MAXIMUM PENSION PERIOD

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act by increasing the amount of refund payable to members of the force in respect to prior service in a provincial police force where they were retained in the force beyond the maximum period of service that may be counted for the purpose of computing a pension.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, this resolution will lead to the introduction of a bill to provide a new basis for making the refund to certain members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. There are members of that force who formerly served in the provincial forces and who, when they were taken into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, to the end of securing for them pension rights with respect to service they had performed for the provincial forces, were called upon to make contributions to the pension fund in respect of the terms they had served with the provincial forces.

Several of this same group of R.C.M.P. members during the war rendered some excess service, beyond their ordinary terms, for a variety of reasons,—usually because they could not be replaced under wartime conditions. Heretofore they have been entitled to refunds arrived at by taking into account the period of their excess service, on the one hand, as related to their provincial service, on the other. But until the present time the calculation has been made on the basis of the total amount of the contribution to the R.C.M.P. pension fund by both themselves and the province concerned. The amendment will provide that in arriving at this amount there shall be taken into account only that period of service in which they themselves have individually made contributions to the pension fund. This will have the effect of almost doubling the amount of refunds they secure.

Mr. Adamson: How many men will it affect?

Mr. Garson: I could not answer that right now, but not a very large number.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not hear the answer as to the numbers affected. When the minister is answering that question perhaps he will direct his attention to one or two other matters which I might be allowed to bring up at this time.

In view of the fact that this change is being made—incidentally it has been asked for by various members of the force, and requested on previous occasions from this side of the house—may I ask the minister whether, when amendments are being made to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, he will give consideration to making further amendments which have been requested by the R.C.M.P. veterans association.

I am sure that anything that can be done or any changes which can be made in the mounted police act which will improve the morale of the force would receive the support of all hon. members. Anomalous conditions such as the one now before us certainly ought to be removed in order to ensure the maintenance of the highest possible morale.

While giving my support to this measure—and I am sure support will be general throughout the house—I would ask the minister a question which has to do with veterans of the mounted police. Has consideration been given to providing former members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police with hospitalization, medical treatment, and so on, that is enjoyed by members of the armed forces? This matter, which has been brought up before in this house, is deserving of consideration.

I live in Prince Albert, which has been one of the principal centres of mounted police activity for years. In that city are a number of veterans who joined the force prior to 1900. Their numbers are not large. I am thinking particularly of two former members of the force who are now seventy-eight and eighty-two years of age respectively. These men find it impossible to live on the pension they receive. One of them served in the Riel rebellion of 1885, and the other joined in 1891. They feel that some assistance should be given to them.

These older veterans served in the force in the early days when the rate of pay was fifty cents a day. The minister will remember that increases in pay have been of comparatively recent origin. I have in mind other veteran police officers, two of whom served in the rebellion of 1885, and who were paid fifty cents per day for many years. The pension they receive today is small, being based on the amount they were paid at the time they were discharged. These men feel that they are entitled to an increase in pension in order that their standard of living may be at least equal to that of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who were discharged in recent years.

The mounted police today is a specialized, highly trained and efficient body, and anything we can do to raise its standards or to indicate our appreciation of its work should be done. I suggest that, in the interests of improving morale in the R.C.M.P., these older veterans should be given a greater opportunity to enjoy life than they have under the present regulations.

Mr. Garson: The hon. members for York West and Lake Centre have asked how many members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would be affected by the proposed amendment. I think the exact number is either six or seven.

The bill which will be founded on this resolution deals with a rather small point in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act. The matter which the hon. member for Lake Centre has brought up has to do with a large issue upon which I have a bulky file. I may inform him that the department has been giving careful consideration to it over a long period of time; but I suggest to him that it is not relevant to the resolution before the committee. I am glad to have the useful observations of the hon. member for Lake Centre, and I shall accept them as notice and deal with them when the Justice estimates are under consideration.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I doubt if there will be any opposition in the committee to the purpose of this resolution, which does at least partial justice to men who have given faithful service to this country over a long period of years, and who, because of circumstances which prevailed at the time of their service, now find themselves in a difficult economic position.

I am glad to see that this step is being taken, even though it affects but a few. I hope in the near future the government will try to even up the position of those who have accumulated pension rights which are found to be totally inadequate to meet the economic situation that prevails today. I think we can all accept this resolution, and the government should have no difficulty in having it agreed to by the committee.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Garson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 64, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

JUDGES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SALARIES, TRAVELLING ALLOWANCES, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Judges Act, 1946, to increase the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada and to provide salaries for an increased number of judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario; also to amend the present provision respecting travelling allowances to a judge of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I think this resolution is explained by its own terms, but perhaps I should refer to the third part, which reads:

—also to amend the present provision respecting travelling allowances to a judge of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick.

Formerly there was only one judge in the city of Moncton, New Brunswick, but a recent provincial statute provides for two, and this is a consequential enactment to take care of that change.

Mr. Fulton: I think there are one or two comments which should be made on this proposal. I do not believe anyone should take it on himself to say at this stage that the resolution should not carry and that the legislation to be founded on it should not pass. But I think it is about time that we scrutinized more carefully these proposed increases in the salaries of judges. As an hon. member to my left has just remarked—I am sure he will not mind if I repeat his words—they are almost becoming an annual affair. No one is going to object to our judges being paid salaries commensurate with the dignity and responsibility of their positions. I know, as other hon. members do, that most top-ranking lawyers can earn more in private practice than they can on the bench, even with the increases in judges' salaries which have so far been granted. But it is important to bear in mind that by recent amendments to the Judges Act, judges are now entitled, and properly so, to generous retirement allowances.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. Knowles: Noncontributory, too.

Mr. Fulton: These privileges do not pertain to private practice. No longer can it be said of judges that the emoluments of office are unattractive. It is my view that the time has come for us to serve notice that increases in judges' salaries will not be accepted in the future without the closest scrutiny.

There is a most important principle to be borne in mind. The administration of justice must be such as to have the confidence of the people of Canada. Our courts and our judges must have the confidence of the people. If we go on year after year increasing the salaries of our judges, the people of Canada are going to object. It will arouse in the minds of the people a feeling of resentment against the bench, because they will believe that all that judges have to do is to request increases in salary and they get them, while the average person has to work and struggle for his increases. I certainly believe that before we go further in increasing salaries in the top brackets we should see whether we cannot increase the salaries of men in the lower brackets who have families to support.

I repeat that the time has come when the tendency to grant increases in salaries to top government executives and to the judiciary must come to an end. We serve notice that, in the future, proposals for increases in salary will not be accepted without the closest scrutiny.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the minister inform the committee as to the amounts of the salary increases proposed in the bill?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I think it is contrary to the rules of the house to disclose the contents of a bill at the committee stage. That is one reason why I made my explanatory remarks so brief. I thought we could discuss much more intelligently the justification for the increases if we had the amounts before us in the form of a bill. If we fall into the habit of attempting to discuss the contents of bills that are not before us at the resolution stage, it is a practice that can only lead to confusion, and will not really give us the best results for the time we spend in considering the legislation.

As to the remarks made by the hon. member for Kamloops, I might direct his attention to the fact that this is a proposal to increase the salaries of the judges of the supreme court only. It arises out of the fact that, by the bill which was passed by the house a few days ago, we have greatly increased the responsibilities of that court. Since it is to be the court of last resort for Canada, we must take every necessary step to make sure that we obtain the services of men of the highest ability for the membership of that court. As I say, I am quite prepared, when the bill is before the house on second reading and the amount of the increase is known, to justify the increase which the government seeks.

I am sure the hon. member for Kamloops will agree that, although he may have had some reservations as to the propriety of abolishing appeals to the privy council, once we create a court of last resort in Canada it is of the greatest importance that we secure as members of that court men of the highest talents. The membership of the supreme court is drawn from all parts of Canada. When we make an appointment to the court—I think this is true in all cases—we select a man who is a leader of the bar in his own province, who is of reasonably mature age, and who in most cases has family ties and a home in the province in which he lives. We ask him to pull up the roots which he has been spending a lifetime putting down, and to move his family and his home into an entirely new sphere. To such men in relation to what in most cases has been the very much larger income that he had been earning up until that time, we have to offer some fairly substantial financial inducement to bring him to the supreme court bench.

I am sure the hon. members for Kamloops and Vancouver East will also agree that any moneys we lay out in a wise provision of this sort, provided that we administer it properly, will pay substantial dividends to the Canadian nation.

Mr. Knowles: I want to support the views that have been expressed by the hon. member for Kamloops, and by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East, but the main reason I rise at this moment is that frankly I was disturbed by the position the minister took when he went so far as to say that it was not proper to include in the resolution preceding the bill the amounts of money involved. On the contrary the minister is not maintaining the traditions of the house when he fails to put in those amounts.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, I did not say that it was not proper to put the amounts in. I said it was not proper at the resolution stage of the bill to discuss the contents of the bill. Whether it was right or wrong not to include the amounts of the salaries in the resolution, the fact is that the resolution that is before us does not state the amounts of the salaries, and we shall not have that until the bill comes down. Under these circumstances I submit it is not proper to discuss that now.

Mr. Knowles: I want to protest strenuously against this practice being followed so often, particularly during this session—and it happened a few times during the last session as well. I am glad to note that the Speaker is in the chamber, although I am not asking him to participate in the discussion, either on my side or against it. But he will remember quite well being in your place, Mr. Chairman, when this whole issue was fought out in respect to an old age pension bill back in 1947. As we were able to point out at that time, it had been the practice of the government down through the years, in a resolution preceding a bill which had the recommendation of the governor general, to indicate in the resolution the amount of money which would be involved if that bill passed. I refer to the incident of June 26, 1947, because on that occasion a minister introduced a resolution preceding a bill without stating the amount, and some of us were able to argue, from many precedents and citations in the books, that this gave the committee, when it dealt with the bill in the committee stage, the right to move amendments asking for higher amounts. I could demonstrate my point by saying that that is the position in which the minister finds himself now. I can assure him that when he brings in his bill with the increased salaries I shall not take advantage of the opportunity to move that the salaries be made higher still.

Mr. Garson: Then why is the hon. member raising the question? What is the purpose?

Mr. Knowles: Because I want the Minister of Justice to follow the rules of this house. Citation 436 of Beauchesne reads:

> The governor general's recommendation to any resolution involving a payment out of the public treasury must be formally given by a privy councillor in his place . . . as soon as the motion has been proposed for the house to go into committee on the resolution.

Then citation 439:

> The object of the resolution recommended by the crown is to give the house a first opportunity to discuss the advisability of making a certain expenditure. The details of the projected measure are not then disclosed and debate is confined to the resolution which should not be lengthy . . .

Note this:

> . . . although care must be taken that the terms used are sufficiently wide to cover the whole of the bill which will be subsequently introduced.

Then citation 440:

> The fundamental terms of a money resolution submitted to the house with the governor general's recommendation upon which a committee of the whole is set up cannot be amended.

And citation 445:

> It may happen that the resolution sanctions some expenditure without fixing the maximum amount to be spent. If, for instance, the resolution recommends that adequate salaries be paid a newly constituted body and the amounts of the salaries are fixed in the bill based on that resolution, the committee on the bill has the right to increase those amounts, because, in doing so, it does not go beyond the scope of the royal recommendation.

From all these citations, and from the practice that has been followed by this house down through the years, as well as that followed in the United Kingdom, it is clear that the principle of governmental responsibility in respect to expenditures makes it necessary, or at least highly desirable, that when the government indicates the recommendation of the governor general it should indicate to the house to what extent that expenditure is to go.

As I have said already, I do not intend to take advantage of this opportunity to move that the amounts be increased; but I might draw to the attention of the minister citation 486, which applies particularly because of the way in which this resolution has been worded:

Reductions can be made in committee on the bill . . .

And later:

The committee is not bound by the terms of the provisions which the ministers have inserted in the bill; and, when no amount has been mentioned in the resolution—

That is the pitfall into which the minister has fallen here.

—any member may propose to increase the grants specified in the bill or to extend the application of the provisions of the bill, whatever may be the cost resulting therefrom, so long as the power conferred by the royal recommendation is not exceeded.

I ask the minister to take time to look back over our recent history. If he will look up the resolution which preceded the family allowance measure introduced in 1944, he will find that it contained full details as to the amount to be paid each child and the amount to be paid in respect of successive children in the family. If he will look at the resolution which preceded the old age pension measure and all the amendments thereto, except the one in June, 1947, when this whole issue came up, he will find that they contain all the details. I could go on and refer also to veterans legislation, housing bills, and so on. It has been the practice down through the years, and I submit that it is consistent with the whole concept of governmental responsibility in money matters for the government to indicate in the resolution preceding a money bill the total amount of money involved. If it is true, as the books say time and again, that only with the royal recommendation can money measures be laid before the house, that carries with it a responsibility to tell us, when the measure is laid before us, how much money is involved. Otherwise we would have the government going to the governor general and seeking approval for a blank cheque, keeping the details a secret until a later stage, as the minister is doing today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, yes.

Mr. Knowles: I do not doubt that the Minister of Labour knows.

Mr. Mitchell: I bow to Solomon's wisdom.

Mr. Knowles: The minister may know, but it is being kept secret from the rest of us, and this is not consistent with the whole concept of responsible government. The Minister of Justice says it is not desirable to discuss details at the resolution stage, that we must abide by the rules. He is one of the past masters in this house at discussing the details of a bill on second reading. That is out of order, but often he gets away with it. I hope that from now on the Minister of Justice and other ministers will take greater care to do what Beauchesne says should be done, and have the resolutions preceding the bill make clear what is involved in the legislation.

Mr. Garson: I think the committee owes me a vote of thanks for having provided the occasion for a fine statement on the rules of the house by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am sure we were all greatly edified by it; I know I was. I would point out to the hon. member, however, that within a very short time the bill will be brought down. If at that time there are in the house enough hon. members opposed to the amount of money involved, I presume the bill will be defeated and the purpose discussed by my hon. friend will be served. But having heard the statement of the hon. gentleman I think we might very well get on with the business and bring in the bill. Then we can see whether or not the amounts mentioned are excessive.

Mr. MacInnis: The situation that has developed today is becoming a regular practice in the house. We had it a few evenings ago in connection with the overseas telecommunications resolution. The minister in charge on that occasion either did not have or would not give the information required. We had it yesterday on the fisheries bill, and today we have it on this resolution. I should like someone on the government side to tell us the purpose of bringing a resolution before this house and this committee if we are not to be given any information as to the purpose it is to fulfil. How are we to know whether or not we are in favour of this resolution—because the resolution has to be voted upon—

if we do not know what it contains? I quite agree with what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said. What was placed before the governor general? What did he agree to? Surely this house is making a farce of parliamentary procedure by acting in this way. I warn this government that in the country today many people are greatly disturbed because of the composition of this house, with the top-heavy government majority. Further, I would warn the government not to use that majority for the purpose of departing from the accepted procedure in dealing with matters of this kind.

I want to oppose the resolution, and the bill, no matter what is in it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: No matter what amount of money is in it.

Mr. MacInnis: That is what I mean—no matter what is the amount of the salary increase. Evidently that is so important that the minister has to keep it a secret. I am going to oppose this measure for precisely the reasons given by the member for Kamloops. I am going to oppose it for the reasons that I opposed the principle in similar bills.

At the convention of the bar association at Banff, the statement was made by the chief justice of the province of British Columbia that the salaries of judges are entirely inadequate and not in keeping with the dignity of superior courts. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that a court that cannot be dignified when the judge is receiving a salary of $20,000 will not be dignified when the judge is receiving a salary of $25,000. If it is impossible for a judge to maintain his dignity or the dignity of the court on $20,000 per year, what about the dignity of hundreds of thousands of people who do not get a thousand dollars a year, and who are raising families.

Mr. Fraser: With dignity.

Mr. MacInnis: And with dignity, too. If we are to build a society in this country in which there is respect for law and authority, I suggest there cannot be so great a difference between the standard of living of those who administer the law and that of those who may have to appear before the courts. On other occasions I have heard it stated in this house that judges should be paid high salaries—perhaps the person who made the statement would say, a reasonable salary —because they should be put beyond temptation. If that is a correct statement, then judges should be lenient with people who receive low salaries who come before them, because their economic circumstances may be responsible for their fall.

The other evening I brought a case to the attention of this house. Since doing so I have found out that the case has moved a step further. It concerned a recipient of war veterans allowance who failed to report certain income. The war veterans allowance was stopped, and this man and his wife were trying to live on a $31.25 a month disability pension. There is quite a difference between that and $20,000 a year. My information is that the war veterans allowance board has received authority to prosecute this person for concealing a certain amount of his income. I suggest to the minister, and I suggest to the government, that until the standard of living of all the people is put on a more equitable basis we should not begin increasing the salaries of those who are already receiving sufficient to provide a high standard of living, and whose future is provided for by good noncontributory pensions. These pensions are beyond anything the ordinary person can provide for himself or can receive through government social legislation. Surely we are beginning at the wrong end to improve the standard of living of our people.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, there was just one thought I wished to express about the dignity of the supreme court judges, mentioned by the minister. He said they had to leave their home ties and come to Ottawa, and there should be some recognition of that. Looking through the estimates one finds that the Prime Minister receives only $17,000. He occupies the office with dignity. If the salaries of the supreme court judges are to be raised to $24,500, then I believe the Prime Minister of this country should receive more than these judges.

The president of the United States receives more than the supreme court judges of that country. It is necessary for him to maintain his dignity. I feel that there should not be anyone receiving a salary or an indemnity from this government which amounts to more than the Prime Minister receives. It lowers the dignity of that office; I do not think it is right.

Mr. Green: The resolution is divided into three parts. The first deals with the increase in salaries for the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. The next deals with the salaries for the increased number of judges in the Supreme Court of Ontario, and the third part with provision for travelling allowances to a judge of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick. Will the minister tell us how much each of those changes will cost the taxpayers of Canada?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, all of those amounts will be disclosed when the bill is brought down. So far as the Ontario changes are concerned, I believe the hon. member is capable of making that computation. There will be two appeal court judges and two trial judges. It is just a matter of multiplying that number by the amount of the annual allowance received, which, if my memory serves me correctly, is $12,000 per year.

Mr. Green: That would be $48,000?

Mr. Garson: Yes; that is right. These are new appointments which have been certified to us by the Attorney General of Ontario. An act was passed by the Ontario legislature creating these vacancies for us to fill in order to meet the heavy accumulation of court cases in that province.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that all these matters can be discussed more intelligently when the clauses of the bill are before the members of the house. We shall be delighted to justify the amount of the proposed expenditures. In the case of the Ontario changes we have no choice. The Ontario legislature passed an act, and very properly, in my opinion, creating certain vacancies. This government asked the government of Ontario for their reasons for doing so, and received a satisfactory statement of those reasons. In the opinion of the attorney general of that province, there was a need for two additional judges in each of the divisions. Those vacancies have been created, and we will fill them if this bill is passed.

The third item concerns a minor matter. It is simply that there is a provision in the Judges Act to the effect that the judges in Fredericton and Saint John cannot charge travelling allowances unless they go from the city in which they are living to one or the other of these two cities. Heretofore, that has applied to the city of Moncton, where there was one judge. The provincial legislature made provision for two judges in Moncton, and it is their desire to have the same privilege applied to the two judges that formerly applied to the one.

Mr. Green: How much is it expected to cost?

Mr. Garson: I do not think it would be possible to estimate, since it depends on how many cases they would have to try. I would imagine it would be well under $500.

Mr. Green: The minister has told us what this measure is going to cost for the appointment of four more judges in the Ontario court, and the travelling expenses of a judge in New Brunswick. He has not yet told us what the increase in the salaries of the supreme court judges is going to cost. I do suggest that we should be given that information. That question is perfectly proper. The main concern about a resolution of this kind should be what is it going to cost, and the minister is on very weak ground when he refuses to give this information. I ask him to tell us how much this increase in the salaries of the supreme court judges is going to cost Canada. He must know, and the committee is entitled to have the information.

I cannot understand why the minister—who, after all, should be the minister most careful to observe the rules of this house, because he is the chief law officer of Canada—will not give us the information. If we cannot expect to have the rules of the house followed by the Minister of Justice, what hope is there of having the business of the house carried on in a proper manner? The rules are there. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has cited them. If they are not right, let us change them; but as long as we have the present rules, then the Minister of Justice, of all the ministers, should follow them. I ask him to give us the information. What is it going to cost to increase the salaries of these supreme court judges?

Mr. Garson: As I understand the point of order that was raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, it is that the resolution itself should disclose these figures. The resolution has not disclosed the figures. It is only a matter of minutes since we passed another resolution having to do with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, in which no figures were disclosed. Resolutions of this kind are frequently introduced in the house.

Mr. Knowles: Since the Minister of Justice came to the house, but not before.

Mr. Garson: No, not only since the Minister of Justice came here. As a matter of fact I think it was either the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra or one of his colleagues from the front benches who, on a previous occasion, called me to order on the committee stage of a resolution for discussing the terms of a bill. I was reminded that there was no bill before the house. I frankly confess that I do not understand what purpose these tactics can serve.

Mr. Fulton: We want to know how much expenditure is involved. That is why we are asking the question.

Mr. Garson: In this House of Commons week in and week out we deal with large sums of money. Every hon. member opposite must know that the sum we are discussing today cannot possibly be more than a figure which in relation to the total expenditures of the government is a very small item indeed. We should follow the rule of not discussing the provisions of the bill at the committee stage of the resolution. When the bill is brought down, we shall be delighted to discuss the adequacy of these amounts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why does the minister take this attitude? I want to join with him in assuming a rate of salary for the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada to enable them to maintain the dignity of their position. What is the idea? Is it because he has behind him an overwhelming majority? Why not give the information? What manner of excuse can he advance, except to endeavour to be facetious to the committee? I ask him to give us the opportunity of seeing that he intends to carry out what the resolution sets forth.

We in parliament have a right to information. We have always had the right to information about any money resolution and the extent of the expenditure involved. Certainly the attitude he has taken—and I am sure he will reconsider it—was not the attitude taken by any of his predecessors such as Mr. Ernest Lapointe, Mr. Ilsley, or the present Prime Minister. I do not want to hold up the business of the house, but surely a simple question such as this, if the figure has been decided upon, can be answered. When it is answered, we will be in a position to discuss the question of the necessity of the supreme court judges receiving additional salary to meet their added dignities and responsibilities.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Are we to have a ruling on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre? He said that in resolutions of this kind involving the expenditure of money the amount should be disclosed, either in the resolution itself or by the minister in charge of it. I say it should be in the resolution.

The other day when we were discussing the resolution having to do with the telecommunications system, no information was given by the minister. I think the minister was rather offended by the criticism that came from this side of the house because hon. members were looking for information of that kind. Has not the House of Commons the right to expect such information from the ministers who introduce these resolutions?

Mr. Low: I have listened to the discussion with a great deal of interest. For the life of me I cannot understand why the Minister of Justice is not prepared to give us the information asked for. If this resolution comes to a vote, my group will have to vote against it, purely on the ground that the minister is not observing the rules of the house. Unless we get the information we are not in a position to say whether there is any merit in the proposal. Until that information is provided, and the rules of this house observed—they were well explained by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—I must say that this group will have to vote against the resolution.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister to consider the words of the citation of Beauchesne to which reference has already been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre? I am certain that if he does so he will see the logic of our asking him to give us this information. Citation 439 says:

> The object of the resolution recommended by the crown—

That is, the resolution we are discussing.

> —is to give the house a first opportunity to discuss the advisability of making a certain expenditure.

We do not know what the certain expenditure is unless the resolution contains it, or the minister gives us the information. Further on the citation states that once the resolution is carried there can be no amendment of its terms. This being so, normally we shall not have any opportunity of amending the proposal as to expenditure, either upwards or downwards. On reflection I do not think the minister will consider it fair to ask the House of Commons to accept blindly an expenditure the amount of which hon. members do not know. If the minister will consider the matter he will see the justice of the position we take when we ask him for this information.

Mr. Mitchell: I am not going to get into any—

Mr. Green: The minister had better keep out of this.

Mr. Mitchell: That is all right. The hon. member for Kamloops said something about voting blindly. Hon. members are not voting blindly. The bill has to get second reading and then be considered in committee.

Mr. Fulton: According to Beauchesne, once we have committed ourselves by accepting the resolution, we cannot amend the details of the bill based on the resolution. That is why we say that before we accept the resolution we should know what is the amount involved.

Mr. Coldwell: It seems to me that the procedure we are following is a clear violation of the age-old practice of parliament. In effect the House of Commons has only one control over the ministry, and that is in the appropriation of public money. As the rule states, at the resolution stage we should know what the certain sum of money is with which we are dealing. This House of Commons cannot pass a resolution in these terms, foreshadowing the expenditure of moneys, without knowing what the amount of money is. I rise merely to say that in my opinion this is a violation of the age-old rights, privileges and authority of parliament.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, we have passed many resolutions without giving exact amounts, when we have been dealing with increases in salaries. If hon. members will look at citation 433 they will see that in that citation we can even bring in a bill without having it preceded by a resolution. When it involves increases in salaries as part of the bill—and this has been going on for over half an hour—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why have we not had the information, then?

Mr. Green: Give us the facts.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Surely that would be a victory for the opposition. They are trying to start off with a principle, and then they say, "Give us the information." Well, I am ready to argue the point at length, even discussing the citation which was mentioned here this afternoon. First turning to citation 439—

Mr. Carroll: Does the minister think that the word "certain" has been properly applied by the hon. member for Kamloops?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It does not mean what the hon. member has said—and that is the point I wish to make. The reference to making certain expenditures is not definite. It is not definite in the sense that it has to be this or that amount. If one continues to read the citation he will see it states that the details of a projected measure are not then disclosed. Well, one of the details of a measure would be the amount mentioned in the bill. The bill is preceded by the resolution.

I am not stubborn. Hon. members have known me for quite some time, and I would not unnecessarily take up the time of the house in a matter of this kind. But it seems that on some minor point some hon. members try to develop it into a great principle of procedure, and want to hold up a resolution.

The rule of procedure in the house is to give an opportunity to discuss the advisability of making a certain expenditure. That is what this is—making an expenditure.

Mr. Fulton: "A certain expenditure".

Mr. Green: Yes, a "certain" expenditure.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): But that does not compel the government to give the exact amount, especially in respect of increases in salaries. If we read it we find that it says "are not then disclosed and debate is confined to the resolution." It will be noted that it is "confined to the terms of the resolution". If the resolution is not according to the rules, then on a point of order an hon. member may try to have it ruled out. He may do that. But, according to the rules, he cannot try to discuss something outside the context of the resolution. That is one point.

Then, going back to citation 433—

Mr. Knowles: Read the rest of that sentence.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It says—

—although care must be taken that the terms used are sufficiently wide to cover the whole of the bill which will be subsequently introduced.

Well, it certainly is wide enough. But the resolution is not the bill. The resolution says that it is advisable that we increase the salaries of the judges of the supreme court, secondly provide for salaries for an increased number of judges of the Supreme Court of Ontario, and to pay expenses. That is all it says. It is in general terms, and the bill will give the details.

All this debate—

Mr. Knowles: Read on.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You wish me to read this part of citation 439:

No amendment affecting the purposes for which the grant is recommended by the crown can be allowed. The constitutional principle which vests in the crown the sole responsibility of incurring national expenditure forbids an increase by the Commons of a sum demanded on behalf of the crown for the service of the state.

Mr. Knowles: There is the point, right there.

Mr. Green: That is clear.

Mr. Knowles: It says that the Commons cannot increase a sum asked for by the crown. What is that sum? The responsibility rests upon the government to say what that sum is.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The sum will be stated in the bill. Have you ever seen an opposition try to increase salaries without having it recommended by the government?

Mr. Coldwell: We cannot.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): According to your argument, if we put the amount in the resolution you could ask us to increase it.

Mr. Coldwell: We can reduce it. May I suggest to the minister that the relevant citation which he should read is citation 433. Citation 433 states—and perhaps I had better read it:

All bills providing for the payment of salaries or for any expenditure whatever out of the public funds of the dominion must be first considered as resolutions in committee of the whole. And all such resolutions necessary to the introduction of a bill must first obtain the recommendation of the governor general. It often happens that bills are introduced with certain clauses providing for salaries or other charges on the public revenue, and in that case the bill may be introduced directly on motion, while the clauses in question (which should be distinguished by italics or brackets), are considered in the shape of resolutions in committee on the bill.

And here is the point that is important:

> But this can only be done when the money clauses are merely a part of the bill. Whenever the main object of a bill is the payment of public money, it must directly originate in committee of the whole.

Here is the committee of the whole. It must directly originate in this committee of the whole.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That citation is one which I myself have been reading for some time.

Mr. Coldwell: You did not read the right part of it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): But it does not mean that we have to precede a bill concerning an increase in salaries by a resolution. That is not the interpretation I give it.

Just to try to shorten debate—and this is only a matter of procedure—I suggest that if the minister has the amounts I would have no objection to his stating them. But I wish to say to the house that an opposition of about five members can keep a debate open for a long time—and I know the hon. member for Lake Centre can keep it up. My experience has been that we have had longer debates on resolutions than on the bills.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is the minister casting a reflection upon the integrity of men on this side of the house?

Mr. Mitchell: He did not.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): We have been raising an important constitutional point, as to whether the minister should disclose the amount of money to be expended. I do not think that is wasting the time of the house in debate.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If I cast any reflection upon the integrity of any member, then I am very sorry. I apologize and withdraw what I said. I have never done it before in the house in my life, and I will not start at this stage. But I have noticed in the House of Commons that we have spent more time on resolutions than we have on bills. Perhaps there is something wrong with the rules, but I never thought that resolutions were to promote debate on anything other than that which they contained. Bills can be discussed in detail—but not resolutions. That is against all parliamentary practice. We have taken up great amounts of time in the discussion of resolutions, in discussing things which hon. members did not know would or would not be in the bills.

This afternoon hon. members gave different amounts—and I do not know personally if they are correct. However, if it would carry the resolution, I would suggest that the Minister of Justice give that information. But that would be the only reason for doing it.

Mr. McIvor: Carried.

Mr. Green: No, it is not carried. From what has been said by the Minister of Public Works I take it the Minister of Justice would have no further objection to naming the amount.

Mr. Garson: I think this is becoming slightly ridiculous. There has been no disposition personally on my part to refuse to disclose the amounts of these increases. I am most anxious to follow the rules of the house which, as I understand them, require that on a discussion of a resolution we should not discuss the contents of a bill.

However I have no objection in the world to indicating that when the bill is brought down it will provide that puisne judges of the supreme court shall receive salaries of $20,000, and the chief justice $25,000.

Mr. Green: Raised from what figures?

Mr. Garson: From $16,000 and $20,000 respectively.

Resolution reported.

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Resolution read the first time.

Mr. Garson moved that the said resolution be now read the second time and concurred in.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Garson) which was agreed to on the following division:

Resolution read the second time and concurred it. Mr. Garson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 65, to amend the Judges Act, 1946.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND TIME FOR APPEAL TO SUPREME COURT, ETC.

The house resumed from Friday, September 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. 8, to amend the Exchequer Court Act—Mr. Garson—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 2—Appeals to Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would it be permissible, Mr. Chairman, to ask a general question even though section 1 has been passed? I have brought up this matter on previous occasions. I refer to the continuance of the anomalous requirement that a fiat of the crown is necessary before an action can be commenced against the crown.

I read what the minister said in this regard some days ago. He did not deny that it was an anomalous state of affairs that a fiat should be required, but undertook to answer it by way of evasion and avoidance, as I read his argument. He said fiats were never refused. Well, if that were correct the obvious question would be, then why continue a formula that has no efficacy under modern practice? Today the crown is engaged in business, yet a fiat is required before an action can be commenced, as far as emanations of the crown are concerned. In the United Kingdom this state of affairs was done away with as of January 1, 1948. The doctrine that the king can do no wrong was admitted to be no longer applicable in so far as actions against the crown are concerned. This fiction of the law, no longer having any application to the complexities of modern conditions, was abrogated.

I should like to challenge the statement of the minister that a fiat is never refused. Fiats are refused, and have been refused in this country in the last thirteen or fourteen years under this government. I shall be specific in my statements. I have reference to the administration of the Indian department. Conditions existing on many of the reserves of this country require to be rectified, yet Indians residing on reserves find it impossible to commence an action against the crown, however justifiable that action might be, owing to the refusal of the crown to issue fiats. I recall one very good case. Some of the Indians on one of the reserves in Saskatchewan commenced an action against the Department of the Interior. In that action, which was heard by the late Mr. Justice MacLean, substantial damages were awarded —speaking from recollection I believe they ran to $25,000 or $30,000—for malfeasance or certainly nonfeasance on the part of officials of the department. Following that, Indians on another reserve requested the right to take action with respect to matters concerning them, but a fiat was refused.

An action by Indians is one case in which a fiat should not be refused. The Indian operates under a handicap by reason of the fact that he is subject to control by and a ward of the state; and whenever Indians feel there is an injustice, they should have a right of action against the crown. I ask the minister the reason for continuing this anomaly of requiring a fiat from the crown when a subject of His Majesty feels that he has been aggrieved. I hold no brief directly or indirectly for the Indians, nor did I act in the case to which I referred. Injustices that may exist on Indian reserves should not be permitted to continue simply because the state refuses to grant to the aboriginal and the first subjects of the king the right to take action to have those injustices remedied. I should like the minister to give us the assurance that when applications are made for the right to take action against the crown in respect of injustices on Indian reserves there will be no hold up of their right to commence action, and that there will be no refusal of any fiat by the minister, as representing His Majesty the King, in any action that Indians may desire to take against any representative of His Majesty the King.

Mr. Garson: Before the hon. member resumes his seat, could he tell me the approximate time of the refusal of the fiat, the person to whom it was refused and the person by whom it was refused?

Mr. Diefenbaker: 1936 or 1937.

Mr. Garson: About thirteen years ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is correct.

Mr. Garson: Does my hon. friend know whether there have been any further requests from the person to whom that refusal was given?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I cannot say that, but the curtness with which the request for a fiat was refused would certainly discourage anyone but the most courageous. The minister will find also a case in the province of Manitoba within the same period.

Mr. Garson: About 1936?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, during that period. I know of a refusal being made to the Indians who asked for the right to take action—

Mr. Garson: Was the refusal made by the Department of Justice?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the refusal was made by the officers of the crown. The Indians have only one right, and that is an appeal to the officers of the department administering Indian Affairs. Certainly, there were solicitors acting in the matters to which I referred and they would know the proper place to make application. I would think an application made to the Indian department would have been sufficient and that, since the king is one and indivisible, a request made to that department for leave to take action against the department would have been transmitted to the proper law officers of the crown.

Mr. Garson: In my friend's absence the other day, this matter was discussed rather fully at the instance of the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith).

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, I read that in Hansard.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend says he has read the report of that debate. I do not think I have very much to add to the rather full statement which was made on that occasion. In so far as the matter which he has raised today is concerned, the application to the Indian department and a request that they transmit to the attorney general a request for the issuance of a fiat, I would be glad to look into the circumstances of the case. I suppose by now thirteen years later the rights and wrongs of it may have ceased to exist.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They still exist on a reserve near Prince Albert.

Mr. Garson: I shall be glad to look up that case; but, as I indicated in my remarks in reply to the points raised by the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), in recent years the department has followed a practice of investigating all claims against the crown. In most cases these are claims for damages and they are investigated in the same way as they would be in the case of any private citizen who was charged with having committed a tort. If, in the opinion of the officers of the department, there is a good foundation for legal liability on the part of the crown a settlement is made. The claimant secures redress without any legal expenses for court action. In those cases in which the department conscientiously believes there is a good defence to the claim which is being made, we nevertheless—I say this in spite of what my friend has said today about those Indians—issue a fiat as a matter of course.

My hon. friend says, what is the purpose of preserving this anachronism? What purpose does it serve? Administratively, I believe it serves a useful purpose in a country as far-flung geographically as Canada. It assures all those cases coming under the supervision of the Department of Justice and makes certain that the same principles of law are applied to all claims against the crown. In a great many cases our investigation, which is made by our officers, is of some service to the claimant. If settlement can be obtained without any legal action at all, that is certainly true.

In those cases where we believe we have a defence, if we are asked to state the reasons we are very glad to state them, and that also is a help to the claimant or his solicitor if he proceeds with the action. With cases arising in such distant points as Newfoundland or the Queen Charlotte islands, we are assured that the same crown attitude and the same principles are applied at every stage of the claim, even before litigation actually commences. Perhaps that statement will suffice as a supplement to the full discussion which took place the other night.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just one question: Will the minister give the committee assurance that if any of these Indian bands now apply for a fiat to take any action in the maladministration of their affairs, a fiat will be granted?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend, with a tactical sense I can only admire, is rather anxious to have me make a commitment as to the disposition of a certain matter to which he has referred, and the facts concerning which I have no knowledge at all. I can give him this assurance, that if he will be kind enough to bring the facts in this case either to me directly or to the Indian department and the Department of Justice at the same time, we will be delighted to look into the matter to ascertain whether it is an occasion for the granting of a fiat. I believe that is as far as one can go in respect of a matter which is thirteen years old and of which I never heard until about three minutes ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister quite frankly admits, does he not, that granting to a subject the right to take action against His Majesty the King is not an automatic matter at all? The fiat is not granted as of right, but depends on the results of an investigation by crown officers.

Mr. Garson: I thought I had made it clear—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not very clear.

Mr. Garson: —both today and at great length the other day that no opinion was formed on these matters as a result of telepathy or anything of that sort. We like to investigate the case in respect of which we are being asked for a fiat. Then, as I told my hon. friend, after having investigated it, we dispose of it in the manner I have indicated. I have no doubt that we are prepared to dispose of the case of which he speaks on the same basis. But on the strength of the hon. member's statement—which of course I accept, but even he would not claim that it was completely comprehensive in any sense—to commit the government and the department to any course of action until we have seen what the case is would, I think, be regarded by the hon. member himself upon reflection as a bit unreasonable.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to argue further, but on reflection I am sure he will admit that his answer amounts to this: that the issue of a fiat to a subject for the privilege of taking action against His Majesty the King is not automatic. The other day the minister took the stand that a fiat is granted without any question, and that therefore there is no reason to abolish the necessity for a fiat being granted. Now by his very argument he admits that the crown does not grant to the subject in every case the right of action for wrongdoing as against any subject representative of His Majesty the King. That being so he has advanced a strong argument in support of the removal of the anomaly or anachronism of requiring a fiat before action can be taken. Anachronism was the word he used. I think it is pertinent and descriptive. In my opinion there is no excuse for the continuance of a provision that can no longer be justified, however applicable it was 150 or 200 years ago. I say no more about the matter now except that the very fact the minister refuses to say that if any of the Indians on any of the reserves, in respect of matters that have arisen within the last few years, would ask for the right to take action as against His Majesty the King, that fiat would be granted, indicates the reason but not a justification for the continuance of the anachronism.

Mr. Fulton: The time of appeal is being extended from thirty to sixty days. I am not going to go so far as to move a formal amendment, but I would urge strongly that even at this stage the minister consider the advisability of extending the time to ninety days. From his earlier answer we know that the judgments of the court are still considerably in arrears. I make no comment on that other than to say that it is indicative of the considerable volume of work coming before the court. It may well be that, between the time that the case is prepared and argued and the time that the judgment is given, changes have occurred in the personnel of the counsel who took the case. Witnesses may have died and there may be a loss of relevant facts. It is very easy to imagine, and probably within the experience of lawyers similar things have happened, that it would take considerable time to reassemble the file and form an opinion as to whether or not an appeal should be taken. In view of the difficulty of correspondence, and the delays that necessarily occur, careful consideration should be given to extending the time of appeal to as long as ninety days.

Mr. Garson: For the reasons that my hon. friend has mentioned we thought it wise to extend the time of appeal from thirty to sixty days in order properly to consider whether it was wise to have an appeal at all. To what court was my hon. friend referring when he spoke of the accumulation of business?

Mr. Fulton: To the exchequer court, and the length of time between the argument of cases and the delivery of judgment.

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes.

Mr. Fulton: Between the argument of the case and the delivery of judgment it is quite possible that the lawyer who argued the case may have died.

Mr. Garson: In most cases I think the judgment itself would be held up until the reasons and everything else had been brought down.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I have not made myself clear.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid not.

Mr. Fulton: I am not trying to cast any reflection on the court with respect to the arrears of judgment; that is to say, the length of time lapsing between the case coming on for hearing and the delivery of judgment.

Mr. Garson: Between trial and judgment?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. The facts given by the minister in the earlier discussion of this bill indicate that there is still a substantial backlog of judgments.

Mr. Garson: Right.

Mr. Fulton: I simply say that that indicates there is a considerable volume of work and that there is a big time lag. That is why I say there may be changes in the staff of the office from which the case originally came. The counsel who took the case may have died in the meantime, or the witnesses may have died. As one who has been a practising lawyer the minister knows the difficulties which occur in that regard. In view of the length of time between the trial and judgment, and the difficulties which may be experienced in reaching a conclusion as to whether an appeal should be brought, I say that it would not be too long to make the time for appeal ninety days instead of sixty days.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I think the provision is rather liberal.

Mr. Fulton: It is the Liberal government. Perhaps it would be.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): It gives you sixty days. If you read the section you will find that in addition you have the right to apply for an extension.

Mr. Fulton: And incur more costs.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): If any of the extreme circumstances which the hon. member has mentioned occur, if some lawyer died or if something else happened, you naturally apply to the court for an extension which would be granted. This act is different from our court of appeal. They even provide that during the period of long vacation you do not need to serve notice of appeal. Under the Saskatchewan king's bench act we have to serve notice of appeal even during long vacation. It is different here. The provision is quite liberal. There has to be a finality to litigation. Two months after the judgment is delivered is quite a long time. If the lawyer dies or if the file is lost or a witness dies it is a simple matter to apply to the judge for an extension which in most cases is always granted.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to know that my hon. friend has always been able to deal with his cases as expeditiously as he appears to indicate, but he is not the only one who has read the section. These considerations had occurred to me. He has said that if a lawyer wants an extension of time he can apply for it and it is generally granted. May I suggest to him that that process involves the litigants in extra costs.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Why not make it a year?

Mr. Fulton: That interjection is not worthy of my hon. friend. It is quite customary to allow ninety days. After all, the difference between ninety days and sixty days is only thirty days. For the reasons that I have given I think that the matter might well be taken under consideration.

Mr. Garson: Careful consideration was given to the length of time. We thought we were going quite a long distance in making it as much as sixty days, which is considerably longer than the usual period allowed in cases of this kind. I do not think we would want to change it. If the experience of the next year or two appears to show that there have been any hardships we might consider extending it to ninety days. I think we should let the sixty days stand now.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO MAKE DEPUTY MINISTER OF JUSTICE THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9 to amend the Department of Justice Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as Minister of Justice I am, ex officio, Attorney General of Canada. As deputy minister of justice my deputy is not ex officio deputy attorney general, and there is not any deputy attorney general. This means that, in connection with all those matters coming before me as Attorney General of Canada, I am in the position of having no official deputy.

Mr. Green: How have you been getting along?

Mr. Garson: I sign all the papers. They come directly to me. I have some objection to having no deputy in the rather onerous position of attorney general, and the purpose of the bill is, with no increase upon the public expenditures, to make my deputy the deputy attorney general as well as deputy minister of justice.

Mr. Green: To cut down the number of signatures.

Mr. Garson: To cut down the number of my signatures, among other things.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Deputy attorney general.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask the minister whether in addition to the work which he has said will be taken off his shoulders and passed on to the deputy minister, the deputy attorney general will have equal rights with him in advising the government and the governor general? I understand that is one of his duties.

Mr. Garson: Does the hon. member refer to points of law?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes.

Mr. Garson: I believe my hon. friend will find that as minister of the department, according to the rules of the house, I am debarred from giving out any legal opinions to the house. Legal opinions made available to the house are prepared by the deputy minister of justice, who, in addition to having that designation, will now be known also as deputy attorney general. The only rights of advising shared by the deputy minister and myself are those of advising the governor general in council and my colleagues.

Mr. Green: Is there any purpose other than the one the minister mentioned earlier? Is the deputy minister of justice being given any new functions, or is it merely a matter of office routine?

Mr. Garson: No, he is not being given new functions. There are certain acts and documents which I have to sign in my capacity as Minister of Justice. There are other acts, such as authorizations for suits in the name of the crown, which I must sign in my capacity as attorney general. Without the authority which this bill seeks to convey, everything pertaining to the functions of the attorney general must come to me for my personal authorization; whereas in connection with my office as Minister of Justice there are a number of matters which can be disposed of at the level of deputy minister.

As my hon. friend knows, in each instance these matters are certified along to the deputy minister, who in turn certifies them, and I ultimately sign them. The only practical effect of not having legislation of this sort in the past has been that there has been a large volume of purely formal matters to which it has been necessary to attach my signature. This bill will obviate the necessity of my doing so, and the delays which therefore took place if I were absent. I do not think it will make any substantial difference in the administration of the department, except in that respect.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Special—

31. Major irrigation and water conservation projects in the prairie provinces, $7,500,000.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say another word on this item. Last night the minister flabbergasted the whole house and particularly the people of western Canada, when he suggested that major irrigation works might be partly the responsibility of provincial governments. He surprised us particularly because in the past he has never made such a contention either on the hustings or in the House of Commons.

Last night the Minister of Agriculture, replying to the hon. member for Medicine Hat, said:

> As long as any government, whether it be that of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba or any other province, approaches the problem by trying to convince everyone that this is a federal job, all I can say is that they are approaching it from an entirely wrong point of view.

When I spoke a moment later I said, as reported at page 771 of Hansard:

> He has enunciated tonight—

referring to the minister.

> —an entirely new irrigation policy for the Dominion of Canada, when he suggests that the province should pay a portion of the cost of irrigation projects.

And then in answer, as reported at page 772, the minister said:

> This is not a new policy being enunciated tonight; it has been enunciated every time I have spoken on the question in the House of Commons.

I took the trouble to look up some of the speeches the minister has made in the House of Commons with respect to irrigation projects, and I shall now place on record some of the statements he has made in past years. They prove, I think, that the minister always accepted federal responsibility for major projects. As reported in Hansard for 1948, page 4540, the hon. member for Lake Centre asked—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it not the intention of the dominion government to expend some 65 or 67 million dollars, provided that this dam proves feasible?

Mr. Gardiner: I am not sure it will spend $66 million. It will spend whatever part of $66 million is necessary, if it is once determined to go ahead with the program, and if we have the consent of all the provinces to go ahead with it.

And again, speaking of the river, the minister stated:

We should not allow it to rush away to Hudson bay in the spring, but should provide storages all back along the route wherever they can be usefully placed . . .

—it is assumed that the federal government will provide the money for the storages. We do not undertake to provide the money to put in irrigation or to put in power developments, but we undertake to provide money for storages.

Mr. Gardiner: That is exactly what I said last night.

Mr. Thatcher: That is not what the minister said last night.

Mr. Gardiner: Sure it is.

Mr. Thatcher: No, it is not. The minister said last night that the provinces would have to pay a portion of the cost of these major irrigation developments such as the south Saskatchewan irrigation dam. If that is not the case, all the minister has to say now is that the federal government will bear the entire cost and I will be quite happy.

Then I quote from page 4271 of Hansard of June 17, 1947, as follows:

Mr. Thatcher: Can the minister say whether actual construction work will be commenced on that project this year?

I was referring to the south Saskatchewan irrigation project.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not in a position to say at the moment whether or not it will be started this year. Once we get that report, I shall have to approach Reconstruction for funds from the amount which will be voted under Reconstruction, the $5,000,000.

On page 4598 of Hansard of May 31, 1948, the minister stated as follows:

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend is missing altogether an obvious thing. As the hon. member for Davenport has just said, somebody will have at least $100 million; the only authority that can have that $100 million is the federal government, and I cannot conceive of the three provinces sitting down and saying: We are not going to allow the federal government to spend that money.

Mr. Gardiner: That was not for the south Saskatchewan alone.

Mr. Thatcher: Here is another one I should like to refer to.

Mr. Gardiner: I would point out that that was not just for the south Saskatchewan; that was for all the projects.

An hon. Member: Including the south Saskatchewan.

Mr. Thatcher: Of course, that is quite right, including the south Saskatchewan. Then on May 30, 1946, the minister was asked some questions by the hon. member for Acadia, and I quote from page 2025 of Hansard of May 30, 1946, where the minister is reported as follows:

It is understood, of course, by the hon. member for Acadia that ever since about 1938, we have been doing a certain amount of engineering work on the project. The engineering work which is now being done is the checking of that work by an expert.

If he finds that the engineering is satisfactory and the results which have been recommended are also satisfactory of course we shall proceed from there on the basis of the engineering work which has been done.

Mr. Quelch: That is, with the construction?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes . . .

Mr. Quelch: There is a good chance of going ahead next year, then?

Mr. Gardiner: I think so.

I could give further quotations of what has been said repeatedly in this house and out of it. Time and again the Minister of Agriculture has intimated to the Canadian people and to parliament that the federal government would assume the full cost of these major projects.

Mr. Gardiner: Of the dams.

Mr. Thatcher: The minister did not suggest that last night, or if he did I did not understand it.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member did not understand it.

Mr. Thatcher: That is the point I am trying to get clear. Will the minister say specifically this afternoon that the federal government will undertake the building of the dam, which he said would cost $66 million? Is the federal government going to assume that responsibility? The minister certainly did not say so last evening. At that time the minister suggested that the dam was a provincial responsibility. I want to say to the minister as humbly as I can that as he knows the revenues of most of the prairie provinces are such that if we have to wait for them to finance part of irrigation costs, we may have to wait indefinitely for major projects, or at least for 25 to 50 years. Under the drought conditions which are so prevalent today, such a wait would be disastrous.

Mr. Ferrie: The hon. member had better swallow that book and forget it. The hon. member opened his mouth and put his foot in.

Mr. Thatcher: My hon friend can be facetious if he likes, he can joke about this if he wants to, but irrigation is pretty important in our province. Perhaps they get a little bit more rain in the north than we do in the south.

Mr. Gardiner: Would my hon. friend like an answer to his question now?

Mr. Thatcher: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: The answer is to be found in one of the quotations the hon. member just read, I think the second one. I have forgotten the exact date of it. It was definitely stated there that the federal government is undertaking to build dams and create storage. There has never been any question about that. In connection with the expenditures which would have to be made on irrigation works other than the building of dams, our contention has always been that the provincial government is responsible for a very considerable part of those expenditures. That is exactly the position we have always taken. It is recited there and it is still our position.

Mr. Thatcher: I am pleased to hear the minister make that statement. I did not take that meaning from what he told us last night, and I read Hansard very closely.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member should read it again because it is quite clear.

Mr. Thatcher: If that is the case I wish the government would get on with the work, and let us get this much-needed dam built.

Mr. McCusker: I have heard the hon. minister and other people discuss these irrigation matters in western Canada for a number of years. I heard the hon. minister discuss it during the last election, and I also went out and discussed it. It was always our understanding that the main projects, such as the dam at Elbow, would be purely federal projects—the hon. minister never tried to create any other impression—

Mr. Thatcher: The minister certainly did last night.

Mr. McCusker: Only in the hon. member's mind. The hon. member is a little confused about it. We were getting along quite well last night until he put his foot into it.

Mr. Knowles: Address the Chair.

Mr. McCusker: The minister has been quite clear in stating that when the dam is completed it is the responsibility of the provincial government to provide for the distribution of water. I have looked into this matter very thoroughly because the constituency which I represent is seriously concerned about water. I want to repeat what I said last night. We in Regina have to go to Buffalo Pound lake to obtain water. In order to obtain sufficient water there, we have to rob the great area that lies below that lake in the Qu'Appelle valley, of the runoff water in the spring which is now used to irrigate hay lands, and market gardens as well as considerable cattle land which is situated in the valley all the way down to Brandon.

When the hon. member was trying to assist me last night I think he confused the two projects. The project of getting water into Buffalo Pound lake is one which I think could well be undertaken by the federal government because it would be for irrigation of hay lands, stock-raising lands and market gardens. But the other project—of bringing water from Buffalo Pound lake to Regina and to Moose Jaw—would be the responsibility of Regina. We always have to look after Moose Jaw anyway and if my hon. friend continues to make irresponsible statements such as he has been making recently we will have to look after them politically as well as obtaining water for them; he has done us an injustice because he has confused the two issues. Regina has squared up to the issue and said that they will accept the responsibility as far as they are able to pay.

However, being unable to pay for the whole project they appealed to the Saskatchewan government. Hon. Mr. Fines and Hon. Mr. Nollet of that government came down to Ottawa and had an interview with members of the federal government, but they said that they wished only to act as intermediaries and did not want to accept any responsibility. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply expressed some surprise that the provincial government was not willing to accept this responsibility, which was theirs if the city of Regina was unable to carry it out. He said that if they were willing to accept their share of the responsibility and make it a three-way split in the cost he felt the government in Ottawa might give it favourable consideration. I think my hon. friend, in his desire to help me, confused the two issues and I just wanted to set him right. I am a new member and perhaps I do not understand the way business is conducted in parliament.

As far as I can see, I think the government is doing a lot for irrigation in western Canada by installing these dams. I believe that we should be grateful and not dig up what the minister said here at one time and there at another time: "how many bushels of barley it takes to feed a pig", "how many cents that barley costs", and other trivial items of that kind, in an effort to impede the business of the house and to try to place the minister in an embarrassing position over some quibbling little point. If we do not interrupt the business of government too much I think we will get something done, but this afternoon was a pretty sad exhibition of conducting the business of government.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I should like to clear up a point raised a few moments ago. I have in my hand yesterday's Hansard, and in the last paragraph, at the bottom righthand corner of page 768, I find the following words:

> Therefore somebody ought to do something about establishing the capital works. We said that we were prepared to put in the main dam.

I do not know how I could have made it any clearer than that. It goes on:

> In other words we were prepared to establish the storage in the St. Mary's river and thus start to utilize waters which otherwise might have been taken into the United States.

That is just as clear as I made it a few moments ago, that we are prepared to build the dam on this project. There was never any question about that. After the words I have quoted we began to discuss the question of how we are going to share the cost below the dam.

Mr. Studer: Yesterday and today emphasis has been placed on dams in their larger aspects and on large-scale methods of irrigation in the west. I think the success of any particular venture in connection with the operation of P.F.R.A., the operation of government, the operation of social services or anything else, must be judged on balance so that we have a true perspective of the whole picture and will not give consideration only to one thing thereby encouraging it and developing it to the detriment of something else. Valuable and necessary as these larger projects are, we should not adopt the attitude in connection with P.F.R.A. that they are the only ones that will happen in the future. I think no one is qualified to speak on P.F.R.A. unless he has had in his hands and has studied the thirteenth annual report of the P.F.R.A. administration with the record of achievement of P.F.R.A. over a seven-year period. If you study that document you will reach a balance in regard to what P.F.R.A. is trying to do not only on a large scale, but also, and what is perhaps more necessary, in a smaller way during the interval of time necessary to maintain certain people in drought areas of western Canada until these larger projects are in operation so that they may avail themselves of them. To give an idea of what is happening under P.F.R.A. let me read the introduction to the thirteenth annual report.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order—and I rise in a friendly spirit—I think we should abide by the rules. The hon. member seems to be launching into a discussion of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. That was item 30.

The Chairman: Item 32.

Mr. Knowles: No, Mr. Chairman, but you are to be forgiven for being confused. Item 30 was the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. Item 32 is the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. We are now on item 31, major irrigation and water conservation projects in the prairie provinces.

Mr. Blackmore: In the first place I think it is only coming to the minister that he should be highly commended for the work he has done through P.F.R.A. I believe everyone recognizes that the work the minister has done in water conservation in western Canada is commendable in the highest degree. I doubt very much that any other Canadian statesman has made anything like as great a record in preserving the natural resources of Canada and developing the country. I think the minister is entitled to those words of praise and I do not believe they are overstatements in any sense of the word.

I should like to say a word or two on the general situation confronting the country in respect to the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project. May I say that I recognize there is no man in the Dominion of Canada who has the interests of the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project more at heart than the Minister of Agriculture. For that he is also to be highly commended.

I think a word or two will be in order for the sake of new members of the house so as to bring them up to date about the development of that most important project.

On February 17, 1941, there was appointed by order in council a committee called the Meek committee. It consisted of three members. The first was Victor Meek, who was controller of the dominion water and power bureau at Ottawa. He was the selection of the Minister of Mines and Resources. Then there was George Spence, director of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act activities. He was the selection of the Minister of Agriculture. Both of those men were excellent selections. Then there was William E. Hunter, of the accounts branch, Ottawa, the selection of the Minister of Finance. I presume Mr. Hunter possesses just as fine qualities as the other two gentlemen, but I do not have personal acquaintance with him on which to base a judgment. These men were chosen to examine into the St. Mary and Milk rivers water development and to make a report. Their report was issued in February, 1942. Hon. members who have just entered the house will be interested to know that they can obtain it in the House of Commons by approaching the right man who has charge of reports and papers. If they want to study the whole question they will find plenty of reading matter and entertainment for several days.

The report is an excellent one, scientific, objective, exhaustive and full of good things from cover to cover. I think the Meek committee deserve the highest commendation for the work they did.

The Meek committee said a number of things which have an important bearing on the situation before us at the present time. In the first place they said that an agreement should be worked out and signed by the federal government and the provincial government before work begins. I fear such an agreement has not been worked out and signed even up to the present time. Who is to blame? I do not know. Probably it is just "one of those things", and nobody is to blame, but the simple fact that stares us in the face is that the agreement apparently has not been worked out and has not been signed.

The result is that neither side knows enough to say exactly enough where it is going, to be happy about the situation. We have to take that as a part of the circumstances surrounding the matter. I should like to read certain words which form the basis of the statement I have made, and which are to be found at page 8 of the report. They are:

> The construction of the main reservoirs and connecting canals would provide the necessary facilities to store in Canada Canada's share of these international waters and would thereby be an insurance against the loss of a valuable resource.

Here I interject a few words for the benefit of those who are new members of this parliament. These are international waters. Consequently, according to international usage, they should be divided between Canada and the United States. Meetings were held in 1909, 1915 and 1921, as a result of which there was a division which was highly satisfactory to Canada.

It is understood among nations that when a country has a share of international waters and does not make beneficial use of its share, the other nation with a claim to those waters is perfectly in order in moving to reopen the question and in asking for a reallocation. That is the position that has confronted Canada. Unfortunately we did not make the progress after 1921 that we should have made in providing for the beneficial use of our share of the waters. It is better not to lay the blame on anyone, but the fact is that we did not do it. As a result, by 1935 the situation had become serious; by 1940 it had become very serious, and now it is even worse. Thus we can realize the meaning of the passage I just read. Now I go on to the next sentence:

> The construction of the main reservoirs and connecting canals is, however, not enough and unless provision is made, by extension of irrigation works to provide for beneficial and productive use, the expenditure involved by the dominion would not of course be justified.

Then I read the next paragraph, which is also relevant to the present debate:

> For this reason the committee considers that before any construction is undertaken there should be an agreement between the province and the dominion that the province will undertake to construct the remaining irrigation works required to put the water to beneficial use and assume responsibility for maintenance and operation of all works. This agreement, we believe, should be conclusive and should set out, without any ground for doubt or misinterpretation, a distinct division as between provincial and dominion responsibility. It should be ratified by legislative action.

If I may interject a word again, unfortunately that wise suggestion has not been complied with. That is partly why we had a little unhappiness in this chamber last evening. We should not permit ourselves to feel so strongly toward each other however that we cannot get on with the job. Somehow or other we must devise ways and means of making up for the oversight which has occurred, remembering that the war intervened and that following the war there were reconstruction problems which commanded the attention of men both in Edmonton and in Ottawa.

Now I go on with the next paragraph:

> The committee therefore suggests as a first step, that such an agreement be entered into between the dominion and the province. This agreement should provide for a co-operative development of the proposed project as broadly outlined in the foregoing paragraph.

That is all I desire to read from that section of the report. Hon. members will realize that we have really fallen into some difficulty because we have not heeded the counsel of this group of wise men. Now I am going forward with the next paragraph of their report:

> The committee further suggests that a reasonable basis for division of costs may be as follows—

Before I proceed with that may I comment on the fact that the minister just now read his statement from yesterday's Hansard, in which he set forth that the dominion agreed to build the main dam. Well, when the estimates were first drawn up the main dam would account for an expenditure of about $4 million out of an estimated total of $13 million for the whole project. It is a fine thing for the dominion to agree to build that dam, and all credit is due them; but it must be borne in mind that the cost of the project including the dam, the canals, the distributing ditches, the reservoirs and so on is very substantial. The minister indicated complete willingness on the part of the dominion to share the cost of those subsidiary canals and reservoirs. Right there, in connection with the division of those costs, as to where the line of demarcation shall be drawn, is the point at which disagreement will arise. We must face this situation like the statesmen I am sure the members of this house intend to be and are, and like the statesmen I am sure the members of the Alberta house intend to be and are. We must iron out whatever difficulties there may be, make the very best of it and get on with the job. The committee suggested that the dominion should construct, as a one hundred per cent responsibility, the necessary facilities to store Canada's share of these international waters. We must give careful thought to the actual meaning of that expression. If we do so we see that a great deal of responsibility is placed by the committee upon the dominion government. These facilities to store the water should include all the reservoirs, of which there are at least seven, and the canals connecting those reservoirs so the water may be stored in them and the total quantity of water belonging to Canada preserved. That would be one interpretation. There may be others, but that is what the committee said. Now I read the committee's own words from the bottom of page 8:

> That the dominion undertake and assume as a one hundred per cent responsibility the construction of the main reservoirs—

Notice that the word is in the plural.

> —and connecting canals to provide storage facilities for Canada's share of the waters of the St. Mary and Milk rivers as apportioned under the order of the international joint commission of October 4, 1921.

There is a considerable amount of accuracy and definiteness in that expression, perhaps not enough but it was the best they could do. Those words formed a good basis for the agreement. Then the committee went on to suggest that the province of Alberta construct and carry out as a one hundred per cent responsibility the balance of the program outlined in section 9 of part 2 of this report. Section 9 contains sufficient reading for about five days, and I shall not endeavour to even give a synopsis of it, but that is what the committee said. Now I read their own words from page 9:

> That the province of Alberta construct and carry out as a one hundred per cent provincial responsibility, the balance of the proposed construction program as outlined in section 9 of part 2 of this report, or such changes of this program as may be found necessary and agreed to by the provincial and dominion governments.

I believe all hon. members will agree that statement is fairly specific.

Still reading from page 9, I quote:

> That the province of Alberta be wholly responsible for maintenance and operation as well as replacements after the construction of main reservoirs—notice the word "reservoirs" is in the plural again.

> —and connecting canals—

"canals" in the plural.

> —has been completed by the dominion.

Again that is fairly specific, is it not? That would constitute the basis upon which both the province and dominion would proceed and naturally the thinking of both governments will be coloured by that background. If there is disagreement between the two, let us recognize that it is an honest disagreement. Each side believes it is right and there are no ulterior motives or delinquency on the part of either group.

There is a further recommendation that the amount of administration and the amount payable by the farmer, as well as the rate of repayment by the farmer, shall all be under provincial jurisdiction. I have not read the remarks the minister made last night, but I thought I gathered from what he said that he felt a little less happy because the province would have the handling of that.

Mr. Gardiner: No, I am not. As a matter of fact, my position is that they ought to do it and that they ought to pay their share.

Mr. Blackmore: I do not want to say very much about it because I have not read the minister's words, but here are the words used by the commission. It was stipulated that there should be an agreement between the two governing bodies on the matter of ultimate settlement and colonization. As everyone who has had anything to do with an irrigation project knows, that is a major consideration. After the project is completed, provision must be made to make sure there are good people on the project who are able to make a living.

May I read from the report in this connection? I read from page 9:

> That the province of Alberta have full jurisdiction with respect to arrangements it may make with its municipalities, irrigation districts or others, as regards repayment of capital or for service charges necessary to the maintenance, operation and replacement of works.
> That the suggested agreement should provide, among other things, for ultimate settlement and colonization.

Now, that is what the two governments started with and, really, they have not got beyond that yet. Perhaps the members of the committee would be interested in knowing something about the reservoirs which are involved. On page 181 of the Meek report, there is a list of reservoirs involved in building the whole project. First, there is the St. Mary reservoir capable of storing 270,000 acre-feet of water. Then, there is the Chin reservoir enlargement capable of storing 150,000 acre-feet; the Verdigris reservoir, 140,500 acre-feet; the Milk river reservoir, 80,700 acre-feet; Raymond reservoir, 16,900 acre-feet; east Pothole reservoir, 14,000 acre-feet; and the Horsefly lake reservoir, 6,000 acre-feet.

Hon. members who have not been near a reservoir capable of storing thousands of acre-feet of water will have some difficulty in conceiving how large a project a reservoir of that size is. I can tell you that a reservoir such as the Pothole is not a duck pond; it is no puddle in the prairie. These are large reservoirs requiring huge dams. Even a reservoir capable of holding 6,000 acre-feet is quite large. Just where are you going to draw the line? Are you going to say that all these reservoirs down to the Raymond reservoir with 16,900 acre-feet are main reservoirs and the others are not? Really, all those matters should have been ironed out, and would have been if it had not been for the anxiety incident to the war.

There is one more reservoir that is of considerable importance. It is the Waterton river reservoir capable of storing 28,000 acre-feet. This one is not mentioned on page 181 of the Meek report, but it is mentioned by Walter Foss who was the engineer who designed the St. Mary dam. You will be able to find verification of that.

I shall continue my remarks when we reconvene.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

MOTION FOR SECOND READINGS

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite, Skeena (for Mr. Winkler) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill No. 15, for the relief of John Henniker Torrance.

Bill No. 16, for the relief of Edith Harriet Black Hambly.

Bill No. 17, for the relief of Margaret Reid O'Connell.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Bill No. 18, for the relief of Alton Charles Bray.

Bill No. 19, for the relief of Kathleen Gertrude Macartney Dorken.

Bill No. 20, for the relief of Louise de Forest MacAlpine.

Bill No. 21, for the relief of Jessie Fraser Blaiklock Stewart.

Bill No. 22, for the relief of Alice Lafond Burnham.

Bill No. 23, for the relief of Muriel Annie Elizabeth Hicks Kurtzman.

Bill No. 24, for the relief of Robert Walsham Herring.

Bill No. 25, for the relief of Leta Helen Butler Waller.

Bill No. 26, for the relief of Violet Blodwyn Young Murdoch.

Bill No. 27, for the relief of Joseph Tannenbaum.

Bill No. 28, for the relief of Isabel Christine MacLean Robinson.

Bill No. 29, for the relief of Marie Annette Vallieres Handfield.

Bill No. 30, for the relief of Nicholas Kouri.

Bill No. 31, for the relief of Viateur Fortier.

Bill No. 32, for the relief of Lois Elizabeth Rolph.

Bill No. 33, for the relief of Madeleine Dunn Landry.

Bill No. 34, for the relief of Arthur Joseph D'Avignon.

Bill No. 35, for the relief of Jessie Gwendolyn Paul Giroux.

Bill No. 36, for the relief of Celia Maria Gabrielle de Costa Baxter.

Bill No. 37, for the relief of Dorothy Amelia Beattie Harrison.

Bill No. 38, for the relief of Rosaline Laham Anber.

Bill No. 39, for the relief of Anna Starzynski Sztafirny.

Bill No. 40, for the relief of Marjorie Claire Dickison LeMieux.

Bill No. 41, for the relief of Dorothy Ruth Brown Bailey.

Bill No. 42, for the relief of Lorne Bradbury Ashton.

Bill No. 43, for the relief of Harry James Seaban.

Bill No. 44, for the relief of Julia Seram Odenick.

Bill No. 45, for the relief of Myrtle Elizabeth Howat Brammall.

Bill No. 46, for the relief of Francis Gilmer Tempest Dawson.

Bill No. 47, for the relief of Imelda Poirier Tremblay.

Bill No. 48, for the relief of Joseph Charles Paul Emile Chales.

Bill No. 49, for the relief of Robert Mason Watson.

Bill No. 50, for the relief of Catherine Alexandra Mackenzie Mitchell.

Bill No. 51, for the relief of Irene Filion Primeau.

Bill No. 52, for the relief of Mary Jean Strachan Taylor.

Bill No. 53, for the relief of Edna Kate Folley Dickenson.

Bill No. 54, for the relief of Gerald Geoffrey Racine.

Bill No. 55, for the relief of Yvonne Marshall Balfry Corbin.

Bill No. 56, for the relief of Colleen Ethel Thornhill Clark.

Bill No. 57, for the relief of Leith Albert Anderson Baldwin.

Bill No. 58, for the relief of Marie Jeanne Martin.

Bill No. 59, for the relief of Irene Emily Katerelos Stones.

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, once again I should like to say a few words to show that I am opposed to these bills.

(Translation):

I wish, once again, Mr. Speaker, to protest against these divorce bills. It is a shame and a disgrace for representatives of the people who should protect the higher interests of their constituents, to act contrary to God's authority and contribute to the destruction of the family, that social entity upon which depends the life of nations.

Tonight, we are asked to approve these anti-Christian and anti-social measures, although we have not even looked into the false evidence submitted to the courts during the inquiries that preceded these decisions.

Marriage being indissoluble and of divine origin cannot be dissolved by man.

St. Matthew, chapter 19, from verse 3 on.

> What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder.

In favouring divorce not only do we usurp a right which does not belong to us, but we bring down upon our country the wrath of Him who rules our destiny. Divorce is more than a calamity, it is national suicide. Its subversive character is a menace to society.

The more divorces we have in this country, the more children will roam the streets and the more inmates will there be in our prisons and penitentiaries.

The first victim of divorce is the child. He, more than any other, deserves our pity, for he is completely blameless of the evils that attend upon him and his misfortune leads to consequences less readily remedied than in the case of his parents. Parents can make a new start, as they say; not so the child. His home has been destroyed, and he is forevermore out of place.

Divorce is, by its very nature, so inimical to childhood that it suppresses the child even before its birth.

In fact, the birth rate is lowest in countries where divorce is most prevalent. It is because of its socially disastrous effect that divorce must be condemned, since the advantage of any husband or wife cannot take precedence over the welfare of the community:

> Disregarding the social repercussions of divorce would lead to a policy of compromise extremely detrimental to the maintenance of public order. Alleged termination, the Church notwithstanding, of a legal status assumed under its authority and auspices involves a dangerous responsibility.

In the general instructions which it issued to the Catholics of Canada in 1900, the first plenary council of Quebec stressed abstention:

> In the above-mentioned divorce court, let the faithful abstain from behaviour which would be conducive to breaking the bond of matrimony.

That is why, as a Catholic and a true Canadian, I wish to do my duty by opposing such evil laws. I therefore beg the house to turn down these petitions.

(Text):

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I rise to endorse the sentiments just expressed by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon). I rise as a Protestant because I have the same feeling of revulsion as the hon. member has given voice to in passing these various divorce bills without due consideration. I feel humiliated that I should have sat here during the whole of the last parliament of Canada and on various occasions have seen twenty, thirty, forty or fifty bills asking for the relief of various individuals presented before this House of Commons. I wondered why these bills were presented to the House of Commons. I did not have the wisdom nor the courage to stand up on my feet and to ask why it is necessary that this type of bill should be passed through the House of Commons without any questions being asked. I say, and I am proud of the fact, that I am a member of the Church of England. I have always believed in the sanctity of the family. From my earliest boyhood I have felt that the British empire, now called the commonwealth, with Canada, has had all its history based upon the fact that the backbone of the nation was the unity and family life of the very humblest of her citizens, and therefore it has been extremely repugnant to me that I should be called upon to pass these bills for the relief of various individuals without a proper examination of the causes and reasons as to why the various individuals concerned are entitled to relief.

I may be to blame. It may be that I should have examined more carefully the bills which had been passed in the other place. It may be that I should have attended some of the discussions of the committee which was investigating these matters. I plead guilty. I have not. It has been distasteful to me even to read the contents of the bills. It is seldom that I have done so. I have never attended any of the discussions in the committee; and while I plead guilty of having neglected perhaps my duty in that respect I know that the same negligence is true of practically every other hon. member. Very few of them have taken the time or have the time to sit in and hear the discussions of the various cases. I do not know whether it is possible for one to apply to some official of the house and have in printed form supplied to him the details with respect to the investigation carried out by that other body. Today there are about 100 new members sitting in the house, each and every one of whom will be asking himself the same question: What is this all about? Why am I called upon to sit on these chairs, like a bump on a log, and just say yea to a series of bills which, in my heart of hearts, I believe is striking at the very roots of our Canadian life, the sanctity of the home, the very thing upon which the backbone of this country has been built?

On this occasion, when within the last few weeks we have heard discussions with respect to crime comics, these matters are closer to our minds. The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) has introduced a bill in which he has regretted the prevalence of the crime comics being distributed throughout this land. That has focused attention from the Atlantic to the Pacific on this very question of the sanctity of the home.

Here is another invasion upon that great prerogative of British and Canadian peoples. Are we just going to accept these motions? Are we just going to pass them through? I would ask either the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) or the hon. member who is introducing these bills, just why we should tender relief to John Henniker Torrance, or to Edith Harriet Black Hambly, or to Margaret Reid O'Connell, or to Alton Charles Bray.

Perhaps I should have found out these things, but with the exception of the hon. member who is sponsoring these bills, and possibly his seconder, I do not believe there is one member who is able to stand up and explain to us why we should grant relief to these particular individuals.

This whole matter is most repugnant to me. Perhaps someone will say: Why raise this question now? I have given one reason —because the country is being disturbed by attacks which have been made upon home life through these crime comics, which have been brought to the attention of the whole country by such clubs as the Kiwanis clubs throughout Canada, and such organizations as the parent-teacher organizations, from one end of the country to the other.

This is one of the healthiest signs of today. There seems to be a determination from the Atlantic to the Pacific to preserve the Canadian home. It is therefore for that reason that I feel this is an opportune occasion to speak. Perhaps a minor reason which has come to my attention is that over this very week end, within a few miles of this city, services are being held to commemorate the visitation of that first great Protestant bishop, Jacob Mountain, who carried out his journeys throughout upper Canada almost two hundred years ago. In a small town between here and the St. Lawrence river people are gathering together to pay homage to that great missionary. If I have read correctly the biography of his life, no man in the history of Canada placed a higher valuation upon the home life of those early Canadian pioneers who settled, not only in upper Canada, but also in lower Canada, what is now known as the province of Quebec.

He was the great champion of the early life of the pioneers who settled here in Canada, people who came here perhaps as United Empire Loyalists after they had been driven out of what is now the United States. He was also the great champion of the French Canadians who were living in this land after the occupation. As a Protestant bishop he stood out and defended the rights of those people to worship in the way in which they had always been brought up to worship. He did not adopt a narrow point of view. The one thing which stands out all through his great life was that he was a champion of the sanctity of the home.

I feel therefore that today is an occasion upon which we may query the wisdom of passing carte blanche these numerous divorce bills. Then I was disturbed just the other day in this chamber—a week ago today to be exact—when, during a discussion of veterans affairs, some remarks were made regarding the possibility of veterans and their wives going to the United States and obtaining divorces there which would not be recognized in this country.

The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart) made these remarks in reply to the hon. member for Cape Breton South:

> The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) mentioned the matter of divorce. I do not know—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should not refer to another debate in the same session.

Mr. Pearkes: This took place during a discussion of the estimates a week ago. While perhaps I should not quote the actual words, the hon. member for Cape Breton South made it quite clear that there were difficulties experienced, so far as the veterans were concerned, where their wives might go over to the United States and there obtain divorces. In asking for a further explanation the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart) asked if he —that is, the hon. member for Cape Breton South—really meant that he was advocating that veterans should be allowed to take common-law wives, and that such common-law wives would receive the allowances, if divorces were obtained?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should not refer to that debate at the present time.

Mr. Pearkes: Well, I am extremely sorry, Your Honour; but if I am not permitted to refer to it may I conclude by saying that I was perturbed by the levity with which the hon. member for Yorkton said: "Well, if that is so, we would all get rid of our wives".

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): On a question of privilege, the member for Yorkton did not treat it with levity. He treated as serious the question asked by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and assumed that if what he advocated did happen, that would be the effect. He considered as humorous that if that was the case some of us would get rid of our wives. The hon. member for Yorkton is just as good a family man, and probably better than the hon. member for Nanaimo.

Mr. Speaker: I think probably this discussion will indicate to all hon. members that they should observe the rules.

Mr. Pearkes: I certainly am not going to enter into any discussion as to our relative family associations. I think I am capable of drawing the line between levity and humour. May I ask this question: Is it indicative of the general feeling which may be prevalent that perhaps the sanctity of the home is not regarded quite as highly as it used to be?

There is one other reason why I believe this question should be raised at the present time. We have welcomed into the brotherhood of Canada a tenth province, the province of Newfoundland. I am not learned in the law and I do not know anything about the divorce laws of that province, but I should like to know briefly what they are. Are we going to have a large number of bills presented for the relief of residents of our new province of Newfoundland?

I am in deadly earnest about this matter. I feel that this is a challenge to the times of today. As I said earlier, I plead guilty to the charge of having failed to inform myself more fully about this matter, instead of passing these bills, in so casual and haphazard a manner throughout these years. I think the time has come when we might well ask why it is necessary that this House of Commons should have to deal with these bills, and also what will be the effect of this practice now that the tenth province of Newfoundland has been brought into this Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take part in a debate on the bill; I merely want to have the record straight. In view of the exchange between the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) and the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Stewart), I feel that I must say something at this time. If I did not, Hansard would look as though I had advocated the practice of having common-law wives. I certainly do not want to leave it that way. When the discussion took place I considered that the hon. member for Yorkton was joking and I paid no attention because I thought anyone reading the debate would see it in that light.

I was not advocating divorce as such, nor the practice of having common-law wives; I was simply pointing out the difficulties facing certain service personnel in this country. While some of these men were overseas their wives divorced them in the United States.

An hon. Member: And in England too.

Mr. Gillis: Some of these men remarried and they thought everything was all right until they came to apply for pension. They had gone through a legal ceremony, sometimes with the sanction of the church, but nevertheless the pension authorities did not consider them as being married. I was merely pointing out to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) that something should be done to straighten out the status of these men and women for pension purposes. They had got into this position through not understanding the laws of the country.

In so far as the bills themselves are concerned, may I say that I served on the committee for a couple of terms. I have always been opposed to the way this is done and have always suggested that some other means should be found of handling this matter. I think perhaps the exchequer court might be used, as I do not think it is too busy. But as long as the other place and the House of Commons want to do it this way, then I think it is entirely up to hon. members.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to register my objection to these bills, not because I object to divorce as such but because I object to the way they are presented here. First of all, I would point out that we have spent several days, as much as three hours on some days, discussing other private bills but so far this session these are the only private bills to my knowledge to which the government has not objected. Some of the other private bills which in my opinion were worthy of consideration were washed out because the government registered opposition.

We are being presented with a batch of forty-five private bills all sponsored by one member. Every one of these forty-five bills is couched in exactly the same language, the only difference being the name and the place of residence of the party concerned. There is no way in which I can have any knowledge of the merits of any one of these bills.

Mr. Weir: The hon. member gets the evidence.

Mr. Noseworthy: Hon. members are being asked to pass en bloc forty-five bills about which they have no knowledge whatever, and to do that is simply to make a farce of this House of Commons.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is in the chamber because this matter is serious enough to be worthy of consideration, not only by the minister but by all members of the house. We have forty-five bills being presented under one motion for second reading, which of course has always been the practice. However, before the motion for second reading is passed I think we should have some assurance from the minister that consideration is being given to this problem. Each session hon. members have objected to the method in which these bills are handled, in fact have objected to parliament having to deal with divorce at all. I am confident that every hon. member here this evening who served in the last parliament is thoroughly disgusted with the whole procedure and is convinced that some new way should be found to deal with this question of divorce.

Protests have been made and agreement has been expressed on all sides of the house. It is not a party matter; it is a matter that concerns all of us as private members of the house. While there has been dissatisfaction nothing has been done about it. We are now in the first session of a new parliament, and I think it would be a great mistake to allow these bills to go through after a short discussion and a few complaints, and thereby establish a precedent which will be followed for the next four or five years of the life of this parliament.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

Therefore I hope that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has given consideration to a way to meet the problem, and that he can give us some definite assurance tonight that steps will be taken at an early date to get the whole problem out of the hands of parliament. It is most unfair in so many ways. First of all it is unfair to the unfortunate people concerned in the divorce actions. They have to pay far more to get a divorce in this way than they would pay to get a divorce before the courts. There is a great deal of delay. They can only get a divorce while parliament is in session. There is a great deal of publicity given to individual cases which would not be so before the courts. The transcript of the evidence taken before the committee of the other house is printed and distributed to every member of the House of Commons. I do not doubt that those transcripts become available to many people in Ottawa, and perhaps in other parts of Canada as well. The tragedies of the lives of these people are broadcast, which is a very objectionable feature, and a feature that is not allowed in some of the provinces. I know in the province of British Columbia the laws are very severe about what stories may be printed in the press arising out of divorce actions. From the point of view of the unfortunate individuals concerned, this method of obtaining a divorce is most objectionable, and I think entirely out of date.

From the point of view of the House of Commons the proceedings in connection with divorce bills are not judicial in any sense of the word. The House of Commons is not a court. We are not set up, and our committees are not set up, to try these cases as they should be tried. The procedure is wholly inefficient. It means a great waste of the time and energy of the members of the house. I believe the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) described it as a farce. He was quite correct in calling the whole procedure a farce. It is just one grand farce.

Worst of all, it is beneath the dignity of the House of Commons to have to deal with hundreds of divorce actions. I do not doubt that at this session several hundred of them will go through the mill at Ottawa. We were not elected to come down here to pass divorce bills. It is not our responsibility as members of the House of Commons. Therefore I hope that this new parliament will insist that some method be devised to deal with applications for divorce. Different solutions have been advanced—for example, the setting up of a new dominion court, or having the exchequer court expanded. Various other solutions have been suggested. I am not in a position to know which of them is the most workable, but surely there is some way in which this problem can be met. I hope that the Minister of Justice, or one of the other ministers of the crown will explain to the house whether any legislation or plan is in contemplation that will meet the difficulty.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, for at least the last fifteen years I have heard general debates on divorce in the House of Commons the first time that the bills were called for second reading. Sometimes I have participated in the debates. Tonight I thought I would remain quiet, but I have listened to the same speeches over and over again.

Mr. Green: Not from me; this is the first time I have spoken.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes, and I respect every word the hon. member uttered. I cannot agree with every word but I respect his opinion. I am the second member from the province of Quebec to speak on this question tonight. The hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) told the house and the country that for religious reasons and because of his convictions he was opposed to divorce. I agree with him; I am opposed to divorce. I should like the house not to forget that in everything I say in the few remarks I shall make that I am opposed and will always be opposed to, and will always vote against bills of divorce.

One hon. member rose and asked why it was that the government has allowed the house to discuss private bills for hours and hours since the beginning of the session and yet does not object to these divorce bills. If the hon. member will look over the orders since the beginning of the session he will see that so far we have not discussed one private bill. We have had public bills but we have not had private bills. I think he will see the difference between a public bill and a private bill.

Then there is the responsibility of members of parliament. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) said that we were not elected to deal with divorce bills. I take issue with him on that point. If he will look up subsection 26 of section 91 of the British North America Act he will find that we have exclusive jurisdiction to legislate on divorce. No other body in the land has that jurisdiction.

Mr. Green: If the minister will permit me, what I really meant to say was that our constituents did not believe when they elected us that they were electing us to come here to deal with applications for divorce.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member knows that his electors are all conversant with the British North America Act; they know that this section is there, that it is the responsibility of this parliament. As to the history of divorce, Quebec is the only province where there are no divorce courts.

An hon. Member: And Newfoundland.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Exactly; I inquired a moment ago about Newfoundland because I did not know.

Mr. Pearkes: That is why I asked the question.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Eight of the provinces have courts of divorce. Cases are heard, some are contested, but the majority are probably heard ex parte. I have read some of the evidence given before the courts and you will find that it is about the same evidence that is presented to the committee of the Senate charged with the duty of hearing it. There is not much difference. I have attended some of the sittings. The evidence is about the same, and the conclusions are the same. The only difference is that the house relies on what is done in the Senate. Our committee on private bills could call witnesses, and in the past we have called witnesses to have them repeat their evidence or enlarge upon it.

Eight of the provinces accepted courts of divorce. I think I know the sentiment of the province of Quebec, and I know that parliament would never try to impose divorce courts on that province. The great majority of the people do not believe in divorce or in courts of divorce. They do not even believe in this section of our constitution.

What is the position of parliament? We cannot hinder a person who desires to present a petition to parliament under this section of the British North America Act for the passing of a statute; and it must be remembered that each of these bills is a special statute passed just as we pass other statutes. We cannot deprive the citizens of this country of the right to petition parliament to have a bill passed. Then it is up to the houses of parliament to accept or reject these bills. Every time there has been a vote on these divorce bills they have been carried. In the ordinary course of our deliberations I have never seen them refused.

An hon. Member: You have such a majority.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not think my hon. friend is fair in making that remark, because he knows that included in that large majority are about sixty-three coming from the province of Quebec, among whom there would not be very many who would vote for these bills.

To answer the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, as to whether the government has been thinking of other means to replace this system, I can only say that in the last parliament consideration certainly was given to the question. Speaking from memory I believe a committee was even set up, composed of senators and members of parliament, to see if any new means could be devised to deal with these matters. When they began to study the question they realized the difficulties that confronted them, and they did not recommend any change in the present procedure. It was suggested that we might have a special court, a dominion court for divorces; that we might refer them to the exchequer court, and so on. Some even thought that we might accept the evidence given in Quebec as to separation of bed and board and permit that evidence to be used in divorce cases. Then we would become real rubber stamps, taking that evidence and passing bills based upon it. But that committee did not recommend any change in the present system, and no one who has spoken this evening has suggested any workable system that could be applied to the province of Quebec.

In my province we are satisfied with the way these bills are dealt with here. Oh, they do not like it, but they would rather have this system than have divorce courts in Quebec. So why should members elected from the other eight provinces try at every session to impose upon our province their way of dealing with marital cases? Some hon. members do not even know that Quebec is the only province in which divorce is not recognized.

An hon. Member: And Newfoundland.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is true. In other days when I discussed this matter there was only Quebec; now there is also Newfoundland. If the people of those two provinces do not wish to have divorce courts, why should members from the other provinces try to impose that system upon them? I will vote against these bills; I am against them. Many people who favour divorce do not like this system. Well, let me tell you that none of the systems they have devised to separate man and wife are very good. I do not know of one that is worth very much. That is my personal opinion, not speaking as a member of the government.

These people have petitioned parliament; they have brought their evidence; the bills have been passed by the Senate and are here to be discussed. If they get second reading the principle is adopted, and then they go to a committee. That committee can get all the evidence it wishes before recommending that the bills be brought back to committee of the whole here, where they may be refused or accepted. That is the system; and certainly if any of these bills are defeated it will not affect the government. We from Quebec probably would be pleased, because we do not like these divorce cases coming here or elsewhere.

I am not speaking for the government except when I reply to the hon. member who said the government did not oppose these private bills, but did oppose other private bills. Well, there were none until tonight; and the government does not interfere in these cases.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I have been here about the same length of time as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), and each session during that period I think we have had a debate somewhat similar to the one we are having tonight. I believe we are dealing with this question in the wrong way. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) that we should not be condemning divorce as such, since divorce is recognized in every province of Canada with the exception of two, but rather we should be trying to devise some method of dealing with divorce cases from those provinces so that these people would not have to come to parliament and a statute be passed to deal with each separate divorce. That is the whole issue. I do not agree with those who say that the way divorce cases are dealt with in this parliament is a farce. I believe they are dealt with with just as much care, just as regularly and just as much in accord with the rules of evidence and procedure as they would be if heard in a court of law.

Mr. Green: In the Senate; not in the House of Commons.

Mr. MacInnis: Yes, in the Senate. That brings up another point. Last year I discussed this question with some of the gentlemen in the other place and learned who were the members of the divorce committee. I found they were prominent lawyers, among others, all of them men of principles and judgment, men who believe in the institution of marriage. So these cases are dealt with according to established procedure. They come here as all other bills that originate in the other place; but we have reached the conclusion, and I think rightly—this was done many years before I came here—that there was no particular merit in discussing in this house what had been discussed thoroughly already in the other place where witnesses are sworn and evidence heard.

For some years I was on the miscellaneous private bills committee. I think all new members are put on that committee, though all new members could not go on it this time because there are so many. As far as I can remember, during the four or five years I was on that committee there were only two cases in which the evidence was heard. The reason was that the committee was satisfied with the evidence as it came from the other place.

The Minister of Public Works says the people of his province are opposed to divorce. Evidently that does not apply to all the people of Quebec; otherwise we would have no divorce cases here. There is a minority in that province who believe in divorce; that is, they believe in divorce when there is no other solution to their family problems but the dissolving of the marriage contract. We speak about minority rights. I think there is here a definite minority right which should be recognized. Remember, no one has to present a petition for divorce, either to this house or to any court, if he or she does not want a divorce. There is no compulsion about it. Surely, people who believe that it is proper, in a legal manner, to dissolve the marriage and begin life over again are entitled to have some place to which they can appeal to that end.

The member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), for whom I have the very highest respect, has referred to the sanctity of the home. He has left the impression that it is the divorce that is destroying the sanctity of the home. Surely, that is all nonsense. The sanctity of the home is destroyed first, and the divorce is a result. The sanctity of the home is not going to be restored by refusing to grant a divorce. Let us be reasonable in this matter. Let us recognize that the people of Quebec and Newfoundland who want divorce are entitled to come to this parliament until such time as those provinces establish courts. If these provinces do not establish divorce courts there should be some dominion court to which they can come, not to destroy their homes, but to try to begin their lives over again. I think that is what most of the members of this house want.

In the province of Quebec, there is a way of dissolving a marriage. It is not called a divorce, but an annulment. In any event, there is a separation and the result is the same.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. MacInnis: The marriage is dissolved and the couple separate; that is the important thing. In common with many of the members here, I hope I will never need to appeal either to this parliament or to any other institution anywhere for a divorce. There are people, however, who will have to and it would, in many cases, perhaps be very difficult to place the blame on one party or the other. When the stage is reached when they cannot live together, the decent thing—I use the word "decent" in its proper meaning—is for them to separate. Nothing could be more indecent than that two people should have to live together after the love that brought them together had disappeared.

Mr. Irvin W. Studer (Maple Creek): Many of us who are faced with this situation for the first time are certainly in a quandary in attempting to decide what we should do. I should like to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I also find these divorce bills very distasteful in more ways than one. I have all the trouble I want right at home without getting into any more. I should like, however, along with some of the others to express my opinion about some different form of making provision for these divorces that originate in provinces in which no divorce courts exist. If that were done, I would be relieved of the responsibility of passing judgment on something I do not know anything about.

This evening, Mr. Speaker, I am in a position where I just cannot vote. If I vote for the measure, I have to vote by taking someone else's word for it. It is not a proper procedure to follow. Perhaps all these bills should be passed, I do not know. Until I am in a position to say whether or not these bills should be passed, I am not in a position to say anything. With all deference to those who have spoken this evening, I have not heard sufficient reason yet for passing these bills. I should welcome some additional information, as I have no doubt the other new members would, as to how this procedure we follow came about.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, this is a subject upon which this house would be very strongly divided if it were a matter that was being introduced by the government. At the present time, I do not wish to go into the merits of the question of divorce. Some hon. members have made reference to the position in the province of Newfoundland, and it has now been made clear that we have no divorce law in Newfoundland. There are no divorce courts there. If anyone in Newfoundland wanted a divorce, he or she would have to come to parliament.

When one looks over this long list of persons, one thinks of the tragedies that must be wrapped up in these bills. I believe we should give some thought to this question of how these people came to be in that position. How could their lives be made happier, in the first place, and perhaps kept from going on the rocks? It seems to me that by providing an easy remedy such as divorce, we are not improving things for most of these people but making them worse. We all have sympathy with most of them, although we know very little about the matter, as the previous speaker has said. It is difficult to form an opinion on the subject. I am happy to say that, up to now, we have no divorce in Newfoundland. I hope we will not have it.

I have had a good deal of experience in connection with domestic matters, as have some of the other members who come from Newfoundland. Both the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) and the member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Kent) have been magistrates and they know something about domestic cases in Newfoundland. I have taken a great interest in that subject. I have tried to talk to people and tried to get them to come to an agreement so that they would live happily together. It pleases me to be able to say that it worked. I believe if divorce were made easy, many of those families would have been broken up. I have seen men and women sitting in my office who seemed to hate one another. After talking it over with them, perhaps having them back again, I found that their differences disappeared. They went back together and lived happily, I hope, ever afterwards. In any event, they did not come back to me.

Mr. Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume consideration of the matter under discussion at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Special—

31. Major irrigation and water conservation projects in the prairie provinces, $7,500,000.

Mr. Blackmore: Before the house took recess, I was discussing the recent story of the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project, also called the St. Mary and Milk river conservation project. I told of the Meek committee formed in January, 1941, which submitted its report in February, 1942. They recommended an agreement between the Dominion of Canada and the province of Alberta before work began on this project. It was recommended by them that the dominion construct all works necessary to store Canada's share of the water. This committee recommended that Alberta should construct works to provide for the beneficial use of the water. I named the eight major reservoirs which constitute the project.

At this stage, I should like to name the six main canals which form part of the project. Those canals are listed on page 181 of the Meek report. The first one is the enlargement of the Taber canal; second, the canal to the Medicine Hat district; third, the High Line canal across Chin coulee; fourth, the main canal to New Dayton district; fifth, the main canal to east Verdigris district; sixth, the main canal to Milk river district. There will be a good many other canals, some of which it will be difficult to classify as main or subsidiary.

Remembering what the committee said about the responsibility which it believed should be assumed by the federal government and the provincial government respectively, once more I say there will be room for considerable variance of opinion as between the federal authorities and the provincial authorities. I think it is fitting to observe that if any group of the hon. members who constitute this house found themselves responsible for the well-being of any one of the ten provinces in this dominion they would take their responsibilities very seriously and they would be careful not to assume any more financial commitments than were necessary under any given set of circumstances. I am sure that that would be true of the Minister of Agriculture himself, at one time premier of Saskatchewan. He must of course recognize that if a provincial government is worth anything to the province it will defend the interests of the province. The same is equally true of any group of gentlemen in this house who might be called upon to form a federal administration. They would be just as careful of the interests of the federal government, and it is just as natural that they would be. Bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, that the thing that I would resent, if I were to lend myself to resenting anything in connection with this very human situation, is this, that any one side should look upon the other as being culpable. That is not necessary. These groups of men are simply looking after the interests of the divisions of Canada for which they have the responsibility.

During the discussion of the disagreement which naturally will result from the situation which has developed, the main thing to be borne in mind by us and by the gentlemen who are charged with responsibility in each case is this: First there is water sufficient to irrigate 345,000 acres of the finest land on the American continent. I speak as a member for the district and I know. That water is at stake. That water must be saved for generations yet unborn down through thousands of years if it is at all possible.

Let us not permit any subsidiary or minor or secondary consideration to dull our minds with respect to that point. The second major consideration which we must keep an eye on is this. If we are to save that water, if we are to prevent the United States from reclaiming it, for they are all ready to do so, we must construct the various factors of that project with the utmost promptitude. There must be no delay whatsoever either on our part or on the part of any of the people charged with that responsibility.

The third thing to bear in mind is that the national value of the Lethbridge southeast water conservation project is such that it will justify the expenditure of all the money which is necessary to build the project by the federal government. Consequently no matter how much it entails—it may go over $25 million—every portion of this dominion should be fully aware that the money would be well spent and would be more than repaid, perhaps within twenty-five years, by the added wealth and production.

There are a good many people in the Dominion of Canada, especially those from Manitoba east, who are not in a position to be able to judge satisfactorily the value of this project as we are who come from the west and who know the conditions, especially those which obtain in what is known as the Palliser triangle. I think it would be doing a service for those hon. members if I were to put on Hansard, if I can have time to do so, the report of a committee which was appointed by the Engineering Institute of Canada. The document is called "Report of the Committee on Western Water Problems". The gentlemen who constituted that committee would all be Montreal men or easterners who would certainly look upon that project with critical and appraising eyes. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I shall read into the record from the report of this committee, which I think hon. members will be glad to be able to read. It gives a fine scientific summary of the whole case of the St. Mary and Milk river project as to facts, and suggestions based upon those facts, by a committee of men admirably fitted for the task they undertook.

Introductory to the report is this:

In 1935 the council of the institute appointed a committee under the chairmanship of G. A. Gaherty—

Whose name is familiar to, and much admired by, all hon. members.

—to study the problem of water distribution in the drought area of the western provinces. Subsequently a subcommittee was appointed and between these two bodies a great volume of work has been accomplished. At the annual meeting in Ottawa in 1939 eight papers were presented on this subject as part of the work of the committee. Herewith is the complete report which was presented to council on January 18, 1941.

I am not going to read the complete report, Mr. Chairman; I am going to read merely those parts which will be of particular interest to hon. members, and anyone who desires to have the original report may come and get it from me. I shall gladly let him read it. I read from the report of the subcommittee:

Your committee submits:

1. That the St. Mary and Milk rivers are international, that their waters are now partially used and can be fully used, beneficially, mainly for irrigation, but also, to some extent, for domestic and other purposes, by Canada and the United States together.

2. That the division of the waters between the two countries is governed by a treaty between Great Britain and the United States, dated January 11, 1909, and under the supervision of a permanent authority, the international joint commission.

3. That the international joint commission, after holding hearings over a period of about six years, made rulings under date of October 4, 1921, as to the methods of determining the allotment to each country, and on October 6, 1921, made certain recommendations regarding provision of storage reservoirs.

4. That either country may, for good and sufficient cause, ask for a reopening of the matter and request modification of the regulations in its interest.

5. That since October 4, 1921, the waters have been divided between the two countries in accordance with the rulings, but that there has been no joint action with regard to storage.

6. That Canada's share of the waters of the two rivers allotted to her under the terms of the treaty as interpreted by the regulations of the commission has averaged since 1922 about 393,000 acre-feet annually.

7. That Canada has been diverting and putting to beneficial use since 1935 an average of about 172,000 acre-feet annually, from the natural unregulated flow of the St. Mary river and not more than 2,000 acre-feet annually from Milk river.

8. That Canada's share, still unused, amounts to an average of about 220,000 acre-feet annually.

9. That the government of the United States has been and is proceeding diligently to use its share of the water of the two rivers. That works now constructed, in progress or contemplated are adequate to put to beneficial use all of its share and more.

10. That the general principle governing the right to the use of water for irrigation and other uses, in arid and semi-arid areas, is its application to beneficial use.

11. That, as a consequence, Canada, if she fails to exercise due diligence in putting her share to beneficial use, stands in danger of losing, in perpetuity, valuable rights allotted to her under the terms of the treaty.

12. That there is an economically sound method of beneficially utilizing Canada's share of these international waters.

13. That this utilization will create taxable wealth and a flow of trade far in excess of the cost.

14. That the utilization of this water in irrigating available lands will bring about an extension of intensive agriculture into one of the worst drought areas, a very desirable contribution to full national and provincial development, and a very substantial contribution to the solution of the perennial problems of drought, crop failure and relief costs.

With respect to the specific problems of water utilization, your committee finds:

1. That it is economically desirable to associate the full development of the St. Mary river and the Milk river with plans for their common development with the waters of the Belly and Waterton rivers.

2. That it is quite feasible and relatively simple to carry the available waters of the Belly and Waterton rivers into the St. Mary river at a point between Cardston and Spring Coulee.

That is right where the St. Mary dam now is.

3. That it is feasible to create a storage reservoir of approximately 270,000 acre-feet capacity on the main channel of St. Mary river near Spring Coulee and below the point of inflow of the water diverted from the Belly and Waterton rivers.

4. That the proposed reservoir is ideally situated in that it will control the entire annual flow of St. Mary river below any important tributary, and that, together with the diverting works, canals and auxiliary reservoirs, it can conserve for beneficial use all of the available water of these three rivers, an estimated average of 760,000 acre-feet annually.

5. That after allowing for 210,000 acre-feet for lands already having irrigation rights, this amount of water will be sufficient to serve an additional area of 345,000 acres.

6. That there is an area of tributary land suitable for irrigation and intensive agricultural development very substantially in excess of the above area, which has been designated as the Lethbridge South East Project.

7. That the proposed development is economically feasible and is definitely related to national provincial and local growth and self-sufficiency.

8. That climatic and soil conditions of the areas available for irrigation development are similar to those of the Lethbridge area. That crops that it is known can be grown to advantage under irrigation include alfalfa and other forage crops, sugar beets, potatoes, vegetables, and some fruits and coarse grains (as well as wheat), all of which lend themselves to building up intensive agricultural production and are important adjuncts to the livestock industry on adjacent grazing lands, as is so well exemplified in the present irrigated areas around Lethbridge and in other irrigated areas of the semi-arid region.

9. That there will be some important structures of large—but by no means unprecedented—size, and that the very considerable investigations already made indicate that there will be no serious foundation or other construction problems.

10. That the completed project will cost about $12,000,000—

Of course hon. members realize that that was a 1939 figure. It would probably be twice that much, or probably more, today—

—or not more than $40 per acre of irrigable land. That it lends itself to an orderly step-by-step development over a period of years. That its construction, in considerable measure, will lessen relief costs during the construction period and will thereafter result in the transfer of many farmers in the drought area from relief rolls to self-supporting, wealth-producing agriculturists.

Your committee recommends that the Council of Engineering Institute of Canada should, through the proper channels, suggest:

1. That the dominion and provincial governments, in co-operation, approve the development of the Lethbridge South East Project and constitute an agency for carrying out such development. That funds be made available for an early start on construction in accordance with a plan for orderly progress over a suitable period.

2. That an agency charged with development should, before final decisions are made with respect to important engineering structures and system layout, appoint an advisory board of engineers and at least one geologist to report on sites, foundations and designs.

3. That the same or another advisory board of engineers and economists be appointed to report on the joint engineering and economic aspects of the project.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

4. That in the interest of allocating unused water to the best advantage, the province of Alberta set up an advisory board to study this matter and advise the government. That pending the results of such procedure, action on applications for allotment of unappropriated water be deferred as far as possible.

I think that is sufficient to give hon. members from eastern Canada a chance to appraise this project satisfactorily. I thought it would be a good thing to put these quotations on the record, as support for the Minister of Agriculture. I fancy that the minister's lot constitutes no bed of roses, when he endeavours to get financial support for these irrigation schemes. He will require all the support he can get. I can think of no document I have come across which will give that support more effectively than this one I have just read.

To hon. members I wish to express appreciation of the committee for listening so courteously to me while I have given this outline. May I once more urge that throughout all the, what one might call, human bickerings which might go on between the Alberta and the federal governments, while they are struggling to protect the interests of the bodies to whom they are responsible, we shall all keep our eyes on the ball; and the ball is, first of all, that there is enough water to irrigate 345,000 acres of the finest land to be found on the continent of America. That water will keep on for hundreds of years, for the benefit of Canadians yet unborn. If we lose that water we lose a priceless heritage for those same generations yet unborn.

We must also keep in mind, while we struggle, that we have no time to waste, and that this project must be proceeded with, with the utmost promptitude. No matter what this project may cost to build—and it will not be unduly unreasonable—we shall find, I am sure, within twenty-five years, that the added wealth which will come to Canada through the building up of this project will more than repay us in revenue over and above the expenditures we shall have to lay out to build the project.

Mr. Gardiner: First of all, I wish to express my appreciation of the manner in which this question has been discussed by the hon. member for Lethbridge, in whose constituency the St. Mary dam is situated, as well as much of the area concerned with irrigation.

Along with that statement I wish to say that I have met members of the Alberta government, both in Ottawa and in Edmonton, on at least half a dozen occasions when we discussed the different projects we have been discussing here for the last two sittings. There never was a disagreeable word passed between the group that I headed at the time we met and the group that was usually headed either by the premier of Alberta—whether it was Mr. Aberhart or Mr. Manning—or by Mr. Tanner or one of the other ministers.

Our discussions were always in the same spirit as that in which this report was written. As was indicated by the hon. member for Lethbridge, this report was compiled by three men, one of whom, Mr. Meek, was named by the Minister of Mines and Resources; another, Mr. Spence, who was named by the Minister of Agriculture with the consent of the government; and a third, Mr. Hunter, who was named by the Minister of Finance. Those three men were appointed in 1941 when the war was on and they reported in 1942.

That report has been reviewed in full by the hon. member for Lethbridge and I am not going to again put on Hansard the findings which he has already placed there. However, I should like to emphasize one or two of the things that were said. It was stated clearly in the preamble to their recommendations that the responsibility was and always has been considered to be a provincial responsibility.

Mr. Thatcher: Is the minister saying that?

Mr. Gardiner: I have always said that, and that is what is said in this report.

Mr. Thatcher: Is that what the minister said last night?

Mr. Gardiner: I said that last night. My hon. friend is demonstrating that he has not really read my speech of last night. I do not want to have to read it over to him again in order that he may understand. I read part of it this afternoon which I think convinced him that he was wrong in his interpretation of it.

Anyone who has been dealing with this question has taken for granted that the responsibility for irrigation rests with the provinces. The report goes on to say that some of that responsibility has been passed on by the province to the municipalities and that some of the obligations will probably be a municipal responsibility. Then they go on to say that if it is a municipal responsibility, as between the dominion and the province it is a provincial responsibility. They make that very clear.

After having gone into that, or while going into that, they state that there must be some division of the cost as between the dominion and the province if this plan of conserving water in the prairie provinces—particularly in southern Alberta in so far as this is concerned—is to be carried out. They say that it can be done only if the dominion assumes that it has some obligation because of the benefits to be received from the project. Then they go on to say:

> The committee further suggests that a reasonable basis for division of costs may be as follows:

Then they enumerate (a), (b), (c), (d), (e) and (f), which were read out this afternoon by the hon. member for Lethbridge. Then follows a note:

> Based on the foregoing, the following tabulation gives a division of the estimated costs for the total development extending over a period of fourteen years:

Then they enumerate under "capital account", main reservoirs, connecting canals, supplementary reservoirs, main irrigation canals, distribution systems and power plants. Then to that total construction cost is added the cost of land preparation of $3 per acre. The total capital cost is given as $13,749,000, the division of that being $7,192,000 for the dominion and $6,556,000 for the province. In setting up a table of that kind that is about as near as you could get to a fifty-fifty division between the two.

Then under "revenue account" they show estimated operation and maintenance deficit during development period, colonization and agricultural services. Those are considered to be a provincial responsibility. I do not know whether we would agree that those are all a provincial responsibility, but that is what the views of this committee were at that time. When you add those up the dominion's share is still $7,192,000 but the province's share is $7,985,000.

They show the cost per acre to the dominion as $20.85 and the cost to the province as $23.14. In other words the cost to the province is a little higher per acre under the table as set out. The total cost per acre is shown as $43.99.

The next statement is most important, and it reads:

> The total estimated cost of $15,178,435 is based on pre-war conditions as mentioned elsewhere in the report. These estimates should be reviewed as related to the unit costs prevailing when construction may be undertaken.

The division of cost is set out on a fifty-fifty basis in order to indicate the division of responsibility that might be assumed, but they said that the construction was not going to take place because we were at war but that at the end of the war or some time after the end of the war the construction would be started. They indicate that before construction is started some review ought to be made of the conditions that then exist, and they go on to say:

> The proportion of costs to be repaid by the farmer is, as previously indicated, a provincial matter, and no further comment by the committee would seem necessary, except to point out that the province may recover a considerable portion of its share of the costs. Without attempting to apportion the amount to be repaid by the farmer, a division by percentage is as follows:

		per cent
Dominion share (non-reimbursable)	$7,192,449	47·4
Provincial share (subject to such reimbursements as the province may collect from the farmer)....	7,985,986	52·6

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the date of that report?

Mr. Gardiner: The date is 1942. I do not believe that the committee assumed that anyone was going to be held to the absolute percentages that were indicated. But I happen to know, from discussions which I had with the committee at the time, that what they were attempting to do was to allot the costs fifty-fifty between the province and the dominion, and then to say to the province that if their revenues would not permit them to pay the full amount some arrangement should be made to collect some of it from the farmers who are going to get the direct benefit.

That was the intention of the report. It is the report. When I was dealing with those figures I should have said that none of the engineering costs are included in them. The federal government has paid the engineering costs. They are over $2 million. You can add a figure of over $2 million, which has already been expended in connection with these projects, to the total cost at the end, and you will find that the dominion's share would then be something over 50 per cent even if you follow these tables.

All that has been suggested by the federal government is that we should follow the recommendation of the Meek report and that, on the basis of present conditions, we should revalue the requirements necessary to carry out the project, which is a much bigger thing than just the development of the St. Mary dam and the waters that will be available from the St. Mary dam. What I maintained last night was that in discussions since the report was made it had been agreed between ourselves and the Alberta government that at some time or other—and the agreement was made while we were still under conditions where it was impossible to have construction because of war—we were going to sit down and agree on a division which would be based in principle upon what has been said in the report. We have had a table made up which shows that if you were to follow exactly what is indicated in the report, that is, if you were to follow the exact reservoirs which they say are federal or which they suggest might be federal, under present conditions, and divided up the same way, the cost to the dominion would be $15,143,000, and the provincial cost would be $9,254,000. Then in addition to that we would have $2 million for engineering costs on top of our share.

All we have said is, in view of the fact a table was set up which suggested a certain division on the ground that division at the time might result in about a fifty-fifty apportionment of the cost, and in view of the changes that have taken place as a result of the fact that we had four years of war since the report was made and we have had new conditions resulting from the war, that when we sit down to reconsider the position this is a basis from which we might start. Our objective would be to get it as close as possible to a fifty-fifty basis with the same conditions placed upon it as the commission recommended, namely, that some of the money could be collected from the farmers, but that none of that money so collected would accrue to the federal government. Anything that might be collected would accrue to the provincial government.
