OFFICIAL REPORT

Speaker: The Honourable W. Ross Macdonald

FIRST SESSION—TWENTY-FIRST PARLIAMENT

The twentieth parliament having been prorogued and dissolved by proclamation on Saturday, April 30, 1949, and writs having been issued and returned, a new parliament was summoned to meet for the dispatch of business on Thursday, September 15, 1949, and did accordingly meet on that day.

Thursday, September 15, 1949

This being the day on which parliament is convoked by proclamation of His Excellency the Governor General for the dispatch of business, and the members of the house being assembled:

Léon J. Raymond, Esquire, O.B.E., the Clerk of the House, read to the house a letter from the Assistant Secretary to the Governor General informing him that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, would proceed to the Senate chamber to open the first session of the twenty-first parliament of Canada on Thursday, the 15th of September, at twelve o'clock noon.

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

His Honour, the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber, when the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable Members of the Senate and Members of the House of Commons:

I have it in command to let you know that His Excellency the Governor General does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present parliament of Canada until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law, but this afternoon, at the hour of three o'clock, His Excellency will declare the causes of calling this parliament.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

ELECTION OF SPEAKER

MR. W. ROSS MACDONALD, MEMBER FOR THE ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF BRANTFORD

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Raymond, now that we who have been elected to this house to form a part of the twenty-first parliament of Canada have made our first formal bow to His Majesty's representative, and have been duly reminded of our obligations under the British North America Act, the moment has arrived for us to comply with the section of the act which requires the members elected to form a parliament after a general election, and, at the first opportune moment, to choose one of their number to be their Speaker.

Four years ago my predecessor, Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, as prime minister, gave an interesting résumé of the provisions of the law and the requirements of practice and tradition in the selection of a Speaker, together with a precise enumeration of the qualifications it was fitting to find in the member chosen for that high office. I shall not take time today to repeat what was said on that occasion, but any hon. member who wishes to have his memory refreshed will find that interesting review in the first issue of Hansard of the twentieth parliament.

I hope and believe that the nomination it will be my privilege to make for this high office will meet with the approval of all members of the house. I am quite sure it will meet with the hearty approval of all hon. members who in previous years had the privilege of sitting with the hon. member who is to be nominated, especially those of us who were here during the last parliament and were able to observe with what ability and distinction he fulfilled the office of Deputy Speaker and chairman of committees.

Hon. members will have understood from my last remark that it is my intention to move that Mr. W. Ross Macdonald, member-elect for the constituency of Brantford, be chosen to preside over our deliberations during this parliament.

Mr. Macdonald is still a young man. He was born not earlier than 1891, and for several years has been a distinguished member of the House of Commons. As we all know, Mr. Macdonald has had a distinguished career at the bar; his legal attainments and objective view of questions of order and procedure that might arise in the course of our deliberations cannot but commend themselves to those who know him. I am sure it is also an added pleasure to his colleagues in this house, in choosing him for this high office, to honour one who had such a distinguished career in the service of our country during the first world war.

The position of Speaker is of course a difficult one, but I am sure the qualifications of our colleague will enable him to discharge the responsibilities of that office not only with fairness and impartiality, but in such a manner as to add to the dignity of the proceedings of this parliament.

It is with a feeling of great satisfaction, Mr. Raymond, that I move, seconded by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe):

That William Ross Macdonald, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Brantford, do take the chair of this house as Speaker.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Raymond, there will be wholehearted approval in all parts of this house of the name that has been mentioned in connection with this motion, which I am sure will be supported unanimously. I have not had the extended experience others have had of sitting in this house with Mr. Macdonald, but it happens that I had the privilege of knowing him for many years before I came here. It is a fortunate thing for this house, and for the people of Canada whom this house serves, that a man of his distinction and ability should have occupied already the position of Deputy Speaker with satisfaction to all hon. members.

As has been pointed out by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), Mr. Macdonald has had long years of public service in the legal profession, in the military forces and in local public service. He has been a member of this house for many years, and I feel sure there will be no more distinguished part of his service than that which he will give as Speaker of this house, where, as the one in whose hands lies the authority of the house itself, his judicial qualities and wide experience will guide the discussions in the Commons, which have so much to do with the welfare of everyone in Canada. I wish simply to add my words of hearty approval of this motion, and to express my confidence that Mr. Macdonald will be a worthy successor to the distinguished men who have preceded him. I feel sure I speak for all those sitting with me when I wish him health and happiness in the occupancy of the office to which he will be chosen.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Raymond, it gives me personally a great deal of pleasure to support the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), as well as to do so on behalf of the party we represent in this house.

As the Prime Minister has said, Mr. Ross Macdonald was elected to parliament in 1935, and some of us have been associated with him ever since. We respect him, and we have grown to have an affection for him, not only because of his unfailing courtesy in all matters having to do with the business of the house, but because in many respects he is a man of modesty. I am quite sure the high honour and dignity attached to the office of Speaker of the house will be maintained by him, and that his occupancy of the office will be worthy of the best among those who have presided over the business of the house in the past.

In this house, constituted as it is following the election, it is essential that the Speaker show impartiality and fairness to all hon. members, regardless of the party to which they belong and regardless of where they sit in this chamber. I am reminded of statements made by Speakers of the British house from time to time, that it is the duty of the Speaker to protect individuals or groups who find themselves in a minority position. I have no doubt that Mr. Macdonald will do that.

It is therefore with the greatest pleasure that, on behalf of those who sit with me, as well as on my own behalf, I support the motion presented by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Raymond, I should like to indicate, on behalf of the group for which I speak, approval of the motion moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). We believe that Mr. Macdonald is well fitted for the very high office for which he has been nominated. We shall support the Prime Minister's motion.

The Clerk of the House declared the motion carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente, and the Hon. W. Ross Macdonald, member for the electoral district of Brantford, duly elected to the chair of the house.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald was conducted from his seat in the house to the Speaker's chair by Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent and Right Hon. C. D. Howe.

Mr. Speaker: Gentlemen of the House of Commons, may I express to the house my humble acknowledgment of the great honour which you have conferred upon me by choosing me to be your Speaker.

Messieurs de la Chambre des communes, je désire remercier tous les membres de la Chambre du grand honneur qu'il leur a plu de me conférer. Je suis vraiment honoré d'avoir été choisi comme votre Orateur.

The unanimity of approval with which my name was received by the members on both sides of the house, and the all too flattering references made to me, are deeply appreciated and will ever be cherished in my memory. But above all, they will serve to remind me of my great obligations to you who have entrusted so much to me.

It is true, as some hon. members have mentioned, that the experience which I gained as Deputy Speaker in the last parliament will be of assistance to me in solving the problems which will arise in this parliament. May I, however, remind hon. members that any little success I had in carrying out the duties of Deputy Speaker was due entirely to the assistance, advice and co-operation which I received at all times from all hon. members.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons, Messieurs de la Chambre des communes: You have entrusted to me the honour, the rights, the privileges and the prerogatives of the Commons. I assure you I shall endeavour to be worthy of this great trust and at all times to be fair and impartial as between parties and as between members, and with your co-operation I shall strive to maintain order and decorum in this house, whose servant I am.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to be the first to have the privilege of addressing you in that capacity. On this occasion I do so merely to suggest to you that you declare the sitting of this house suspended until three o'clock this afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

At 12.37 p.m. the sitting was suspended until 3 p.m. this day.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber. Then the Hon. W. Ross Macdonald, Speaker of the House of Commons, said:

> May it please Your Excellency,
> The House of Commons have elected me their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me.
> If in the performance of those duties I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their King and country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of speech in their debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all reasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favourable consideration.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate, addressing the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons, then said:

> Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to assure you that your words and actions will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

Then His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to open parliament by a speech from the throne.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to report that, the house having attended on His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate chamber, I informed His Excellency that the choice of Speaker had fallen upon me, and, in your names, and on your behalf, I made the usual claim for your privileges, which His Excellency was pleased to confirm to you.

VACANCIES

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that since the general election held on June 27, 1949, communications have been received from several members notifying the chief electoral officer, in accordance with chapter 145, section 2, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, that the following vacancies have occurred in the representation, viz.:

Of Hon. Ernest Bertrand, member for the electoral district of Laurier, consequent upon his acceptance of an office of emolument under the crown.

Of Hon. Joseph Jean, member for the electoral district of Mercier, consequent upon his acceptance of an office of emolument under the crown.

Of Eugene Marquis, member for the electoral district of Kamouraska, consequent upon his acceptance of an office of emolument under the crown.

Of Elphège Marier, member for the electoral district of Jacques Cartier, consequent upon his acceptance of an office of emolument under the crown.

Of Léon J. Raymond, member for the electoral district of Gatineau, consequent upon his acceptance of an office of emolument under the crown.

Of Thomas Reid, member for the electoral district of New Westminster, consequent upon his being summoned to the Senate.

Of Benoit Michaud, member for the electoral district of Restigouche-Madawaska, by decease.

Of J. E. McMillin, member for the electoral district of Greenwood, by decease.

Accordingly new writs of election were issued for the said electoral districts respectively.

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

There has been deep satisfaction in all parts of the country that the steady improvement in the health of the King has enabled His Majesty to resume most of his customary activities.

The opening of the twenty-first parliament is marked by the presence for the first time of the representatives of the new province of Newfoundland. It is a pleasure for me to welcome their participation in the national affairs of a greater Canada.

With the admission of the new province of Newfoundland the Canadian nation attained the geographical limits planned by the fathers of confederation. You will be asked at the present session to approve measures designed to facilitate the attainment of the constitutional limits of our nationhood. To this end, a bill will be introduced to amend the Supreme Court Act so that the Supreme Court of Canada will become the final court of appeal for Canada.

You will also be asked to approve addresses praying the parliament of the United Kingdom to vest in the parliament of Canada the right to amend the constitution of Canada in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces nor affecting the constitutional rights and privileges of the provinces or existing rights and privileges with respect to education or the use of the English and French languages.

My ministers will seek to arrange for early consultation with the provincial governments with a view to agreeing upon an appropriate procedure for making within Canada such other amendments to the constitution as may from time to time be required.

The hopes held four years ago for world peace and security under the aegis of the united nations have not yet been realized. The menace of communist totalitarianism continues to threaten the aspirations of men of good will. It is, however, gratifying that the North Atlantic treaty has been brought into effect and is already proving its worth in lessening the risks of armed aggression.

The defence needs of Canada both as a separate nation and as a signatory of this treaty are being kept constantly under review. Good progress has been made in the co-ordination and unification of our armed forces and conditions of service are being improved. Special attention is being given to research and development intended to provide the forces with the most modern equipment suitable for present requirements.

A measure will be introduced to consolidate the legislation respecting the defence forces and the Department of National Defence.

It is the view of my ministers that the economic health and stability of the nations of the north Atlantic community must be the real foundation of their ability to resist and, therefore, to deter aggression.

Although the nations of western Europe have made substantial progress towards recovery from the ravages of war, they have not been able to restore completely their economic strength. Their shortage of dollars continues, and international trade remains in a state of unbalance. The government is seeking by all appropriate means to co-operate in measures to restore economic equilibrium. The achievement of a pattern of world trade in which the trading nations can operate together within one single multilateral system continues to be the ultimate aim of my government.

Since parliament last met the international wheat agreement has come into operation. The agreement together with the other arrangements made to dispose of our surplus agricultural products will provide additional economic security for many of our farmers.

At home we continue to enjoy prosperity. Agricultural production generally continues to be high. Private capital investment and employment have remained at high levels. Relations between employers and employees have, with few exceptions, been satisfactory.

As a result of legislation passed at the last session of parliament, new agreements with respect to old age pensions have been completed with nine of the provinces, and increased pensions have now been made available to the aged and the blind in those provinces. The completion of a similar agreement with the province of Newfoundland awaits the enactment of the required provincial legislation.

The continued co-operation of the provinces in the implementation of the national health program has resulted in further progress being made towards the desired objective of improved health facilities and services for the people in all parts of Canada.

While more housing units are being built this year than ever before, the demand for housing continues. Following discussions with the governments of the provinces your approval will be sought for legislation to broaden the scope of the National Housing Act.

A bill to provide for the continuance of functions now vested in the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, including the ministerial responsibility for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, will be placed before you for your approval.

You will also be asked to approve a measure to enable the government to assist in the provision of a transcontinental highway.

The government has concluded new air agreements with the United Kingdom and the United States. The agreements provide new routes for our international air services to the United States and to the Orient, and additional traffic stops in United States and United Kingdom territory for our present international services on the north Atlantic, to the Caribbean and to the south Pacific.

Measures demanding your consideration will include a bill respecting a national trade mark and true labelling; a bill respecting forest conservation; a bill to incorporate the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation; a bill respecting assistance to the shipbuilding industry and merchant shipping; a bill to extend the life of the Export and Import Permits Act; and bills to amend the Exchequer Court Act, the Industrial Development Bank Act, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the Customs Act and the Veterans Land Act of 1942.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to make provision for the public service for the current fiscal year. The budget resolutions introduced at the last session of parliament will be submitted for your approval and the enactment of the appropriate legislation.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I pray that Divine Providence may bless your deliberations.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR PRECEDENCE OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Friday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business except the introduction of bills and government notices of motions, on Mondays, Wednesdays and Thursdays until disposed of.

This will enable us, on Tuesdays and Fridays, which under the standing orders of the house are government days, to proceed at once with government business without waiting until the completion of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

I hope this motion will meet with the approval of the house, and that it may not require too many Mondays, Wednesdays and Thursdays to complete the consideration of His Excellency's address.

Motion agreed to.

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED MEMBERS

THE LATE BENOIT MICHAUD—THE LATE J. ERNEST MCMILLIN
THE LATE SENATOR MACKENZIE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it has just been Your Honour's unfortunate obligation to inform the members of this house that since the last general election two of the members elected to sit in this parliament have died. I refer, of course, to the members elect for Restigouche-Madawaska and Toronto Greenwood.

Mr. Benoit Michaud, the member for Restigouche-Madawaska, had been ill for some time before the conclusion of the last parliament. I am sure that those who sat with him during the last parliament sincerely deplore the fact that a young man, practically in the prime of life, who had shown such great promise in this house, is not with us today.

(Translation):

Mr. Michaud was born near Grand Falls, New Brunswick, in 1902. A brilliant student who distinguished himself at Saint Anne's college and at the university of New Brunswick, he first turned to the teaching profession. His admittance to the bar marked the beginning of an outstanding career during which he was associated with a man who is now a member of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, Mr. Justice Arthur Anglin. The latter was associated with our lamented colleague, the late Hon. Francis Bridges.

Mr. Michaud took a keen interest in all the social activities of his community. He was for some time clerk of the county court of his district. Then, for a few years, he acted as protonotary of the supreme court of his province. The manner in which he acquitted himself in the discharge of his various duties brought him into public esteem.

He belonged to every social organization formed by our Acadian brethren. In 1944, he entered the political field, being elected to the New Brunswick legislature, where he represented his home constituency. The following year, he was a candidate in the general election and became the member for the constituency of Restigouche-Madawaska.

We, who were here at the time, remember that Mr. Michaud seldom spoke during the first two sessions of the twentieth parliament, but in the third session, he took an active part in the debates. Our friends on the opposite side of the house considered him a redoubtable opponent while we, on this side, hailed the talents which the new member was revealing.

Tributes to Deceased Members

He had always been a member of the Liberal party, but he had his own ideas on many subjects and also as to the conclusions to be drawn from the great principles of the Liberal party. He had no hesitation in voicing his views quite frankly and openly in this house.

He was, of course, very fluent in his mother tongue, but he spoke English with equal ease, and was thus able to express himself objectively in both languages.

As I said a moment ago, we deeply regret that so promising a career was interrupted so soon. I am sure that all the members of this house wish to be personally associated in the expression of our most sincere condolences to Mrs. Michaud and the four children of our lamented colleague.

(Text):

I had not the privilege of personal acquaintanceship with the member-elect for the constituency of Greenwood, but I am sure all members of this house wish to extend to his family, to his friends and to the leader of the opposition and his colleagues sincere condolences on the untimely death of a colleague so shortly after his successfully contesting the election in that constituency.

Mr. Speaker, though it may not be the usual practice, I am sure the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and all other hon. members will not find it surprising that on this occasion I should depart from the usual custom and say just a word about a former member and distinguished colleague who was long associated with this house. I refer to Senator Mackenzie, who died at the beginning of this month.

The late Senator Mackenzie was born in Scotland of humble parentage, on July 27, 1890. He put himself through the famous highland school of Kingussie and the university of Edinburgh, almost entirely on scholarships won by his own achievements. He had always been a brilliant scholar, and had specialized in Celtic languages and literature. That fact did not prevent him, however, from bringing close and careful attention to the study of law; in two years he qualified for the degree of Bachelor of Laws. In 1914 he came to this country as an immigrant, but we remember that before the end of that year the institutions of this country—indeed, those of the free world—were under a serious threat. He immediately joined the Canadian forces and went overseas as a member of Canada's Seaforth Highlanders. I shall not at this time say anything about his career in the army. We know that it was distinguished, and we know that his physical prowess was such that it must have made a considerable impact upon any enemy who came within reach of him.

On returning to British Columbia after the war he took up the practice of law, and immediately evinced keen interest in the affairs of the veterans. He became president of the Vancouver command of the Great War Veterans' Association, and soon became its dominion vice-president. His interest in the welfare of the veterans never lagged from that moment up to the day of his untimely passing to a better world.

Ian Mackenzie was elected to the British Columbia legislature in 1920 and re-elected in 1924. He was again elected in 1928, in which year he became a member of the British Columbia cabinet. In 1930, after ten years in the British Columbia legislature, he began his eighteen-year representation of the constituency of Vancouver Centre in the federal house. He was successful in the federal election of that year, but though shortly before the election he had become minister of immigration and colonization, after the election the administration was in the hands of one other than my distinguished predecessor, and Ian Mackenzie sat in the ranks of the opposition until 1935.

On the return of the Liberal party to power in 1935, Mr. Mackenzie never ceased to urge the importance of military preparation. He was appointed minister of national defence, and in that position had much to do with the reorganization of the Canadian militia and with the obtaining of some increases in the military budget. I say "some increases", because, in the light of what is now regarded as necessary for the defence forces of this country, those increases would appear to be relatively quite small.

I am sure that our late lamented colleague will be best remembered for his administration of the Department of Veterans Affairs when that department was created under him in October, 1944, and for the beneficial schemes which he worked out for the rehabilitation of the men who served their country so effectively during the last terrible war. In 1947 he was honoured by His Majesty the King, who made him a member of his imperial privy council. In January of last year he was appointed to another place, where he continued to advocate, with the vigour we knew him to possess, the causes which appeared to him to be in the interests of the Canadian public.

I am tempted to make just one reference to the fact that Ian Mackenzie was one of the most colourful speakers it has been my privilege to listen to in the almost eight years I have had a seat in this house. It was always a joy to listen to him and to hear the musical resonance of his striking phrases.

I am sure hon. members agree that it was not improper that I should depart from the usual custom and, for them as well as for myself, offer our sincere condolences to his young widow, who had enjoyed only two years of marital bliss with our late lamented friend.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join in the appropriate expressions of sympathy which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has voiced on behalf of the members of this house in regard to the death of two of the members-elect and of one other colleague who had sat here for so long.

I should like to say something about the member-elect for Toronto Greenwood, Mr. McMillin, because naturally we on this side of the house were personally associated with him. I know that his widow and his daughter will appreciate what has been said here of the regret felt by the whole house at his decease.

It was particularly tragic that a man who had just been honoured by election to this house, and was looking forward very much to taking his place here—as his family were —should have died so short a time and so unexpectedly before this house met. Like other hon. members who sat in this house and whose names have been mentioned, he had a long record of public service in his own community. In his family, service to the public was a tradition. He had been brought up in a home where the idea of public service was natural. His father was mayor of the town of East Toronto before East Toronto was amalgamated with the city. From the time he was a very young man Mr. Ernest McMillin had taken an extremely active part in everything that was in the interest of the community in which he lived. He was particularly interested in the young people with whom his work was always associated. In his business career he followed in the footsteps of his father. He was engaged in the extremely important occupation of building houses and other structures of that kind, and at the time of his death was extensively engaged in that work. He was for many years a member of the Toronto board of education, and was regarded as its financial adviser.

I mention these things because they are the qualifications which he would have brought to this house. He also took a very great part in the activities of the Toronto East General hospital. The special interests that he had in the nurses' training school there resulted in the training of a large number of young women at a time when they were so greatly needed. I believe an hon. member who was most closely associated with him will have something to say in that regard. But I know that his work was very important, and that he had arranged scholarships for these young nurses, which has encouraged greatly the entry of young women into this useful work.

I join with the Prime Minister, as I know all hon. members do, in expressing our sincere sympathy to his widow and to his daughter, and the regret we all share that he should have been deprived of the opportunity of carrying forward that public service.

The Prime Minister has spoken of the career of Mr. Benoit Michaud, and the tragedy that a young man of such great brilliance and such wide attainments should have been lost to this house by death. All hon. members who were here earlier in the year know that he had been ill at that time. He displayed considerable courage in continuing his service in the house, and equal courage in contesting the election, knowing that his health was not good. In mentioning Mr. Michaud's wide field of attainments the Prime Minister indicated the basis of the type of public service which he was capable of giving. Not only is it a great loss to his associates, to his family, and to those who had chosen him in their own community to serve in their behalf; it is a tragedy to Canada as well that the services of this man have been lost.

I join with the Prime Minister in expressions of sympathy and regret in the death of Senator Ian Mackenzie. The Prime Minister has fully covered the wide and varied career of a very colourful man who so long sat in this House of Commons. He never at any time permitted anyone to forget where he had been born, and he at all times showed his pride in the place of his birth; but having gone to live in British Columbia he was no less insistent that everyone he met should appreciate the outstanding qualities of that part of Canada in which he had chosen to live. That characteristic is in itself one of the things that enrich the whole life of our country. Therefore on behalf of those with whom I am associated in this house I join in expressing our regret that these men should have been lost to the public service of Canada by death. I also join in the message of sympathy to their families who mourn their loss.

Mr. J. H. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the house for a moment or two while I pay a word of tribute to those who have gone on before us. Naturally, sir, I think of my colleague, an ex-officer of my organization, who came from the half of my own original riding which I had the privilege of representing for close to twenty years, and of how he, John Ernest McMillin, more commonly known as Ernie McMillin, looked forward to being of some service to his community.

I look around this chamber, Mr. Speaker, and I see before me no one who has been here continuously since I first came here. That shows how quickly the scene changes. I pay tribute to the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), who happens to be absent at the moment. But for the first time in three decades, after listening each year to tributes paid to men of high qualifications, and men of honour who have passed on in the intervening period, I ask your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, and I do not think I am asking too much, for a moment or two while I say a word about those with whom I have been associated.

John Ernest McMillin, a younger man than myself, was well known to me. A constituent of mine, he left behind a very able Christian widow and a most charming daughter eighteen years of age. He left behind him an estate and a reputation for fair dealing. As my leader said a moment ago he was more than a builder of houses; he built upwards of a hundred, of which today seventeen are under construction and have to be finished. He was a builder of character and citizenship within the community, and by example as well as precept he showed the rest of us the way we ought to go. He was chairman of the board of stewards of his church, and served in a similar capacity in community enterprises of one kind or another. He was instrumental in raising many thousands of dollars for charitable purposes. The late Mr. McMillin was a member of the board of education in Toronto, in which endeavour he took a keen interest, and always showed himself to be anxious to give service to his fellow men. All of us learned to love, respect and admire him.

My leader has been good enough to mention a hospital employing a personnel of not only 250 nurses but an additional 350 persons. The late member on his own motion, through the board of that institution, instituted scholarships with a view to encouraging the nurses in their great work. But he went further than that, Mr. Speaker. He believed that within the confines of their plant, valued at about $5 million, they might find some little space to be used as a chapel where those in distress might come to meditate. As I have said, in the new plans for the $2 million addition to that building, with which the minister of health is now helping us, he made sure that there would be a chapel. He went further, and undertook to see that the $10,000 which would be required for the building of that chapel for those in distress would be available in due time.

The late Mr. McMillin was cut off in middle life. Speaking to his widow this morning I asked her to be of good cheer. I assured her that we had all loved her husband, and that we cherish his memory. I am sure she will be cheered by the words emanating from this chamber this afternoon from the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the leader of the party to which I belong (Mr. Drew), and I shall consider it my duty to see that those words are conveyed to her.

I shall not attempt to discuss the many ramifications of the works undertaken by the hon. member whose loss we have suffered within less than two months of his being elected. His connections with businessmen's associations, the Y.M.C.A. and community projects of other kinds are well known to his many friends. That is where they should be known. It is with a heavy heart, sir, that I offer these few words this afternoon to be placed on Hansard in order that they may be embalmed in the records of this honourable assembly. I trust that in due course they may be of some comfort to the members of his family.

I believe all observant members of the House of Commons know of the reasonably close friendship between me and the right hon. gentleman who, toward the close of his public service, sat in another place. I know that while serving as a minister of the crown the Right Hon. Ian Mackenzie helped many of us who were trying to be of service to our communities. I learned to know him as a man, and as a public-spirited servant of the people of Canada.

I have met his family. Let me at this time pay tribute to the work he did for Canada both in this chamber and in cabinet council. Perhaps I shall not be considered selfish if I pay tribute to the work he did on behalf of certain charitable institutions in which other members of this assembly were interested—and I take second place to few when I say that.

The hon. member who takes his place in this chamber as Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is a gentleman of high calibre who has the health of Canadians at heart. I trust that in the House of Commons he will implement the obligations taken on by his predecessor to make a happier Canada by promoting the health of his fellow men.

It was not my good fortune to meet the young man from the maritimes whom the party opposite has lost. However, I extend my sympathies and those of my constituents to the Prime Minister in the loss that Canada has sustained through the passing of all three members since we last met.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is an unusual experience when, on the first day of a parliament, we must record the passing of two of its elected members. I had never met Mr. McMillin, but I am sure his loss will be felt by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the party with which he was associated. We extend to his widow and family in their loss our deepest sympathy, and we express sympathy, too, with the loss sustained by the Progressive Conservative party.

Most of us knew Mr. Michaud well. He sat about opposite where I now stand, and was at all times one of the bright spirits in the house. Often he livened speeches with appropriate interjections. We shall miss him sorely, because he gained the friendship and respect of all of us, irrespective of where we sat in the chamber. It is sad indeed that a young man should pass under these circumstances. We knew that during the last session he was ill, and that upon his return after an illness he looked far from well. It is tragic indeed that a young man with a promising career before him should pass at a time when he could have rendered great service to his constituents and his country. To the widow and young family he has left behind we extend our deepest sympathy in their loss.

May I express to the government and the members of the Liberal party our regret at the loss of another of their colleagues. I believe the Prime Minister was justified this afternoon in referring to the passing of Senator Ian Mackenzie, who for so long was a member of the House of Commons. However, it has been customary on such occasions to refer only to members of the house, and at this time I propose only to express on behalf of my colleagues and myself our sympathy with his widow in her loss.

I trust there will not be many such occasions during the term of this parliament, which has assembled today for the first time.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the tributes which have been paid this afternoon to the three hon. members who, through decease, have been lost to the public service of Canada.

I did not know Mr. McMillin, but from what has been said I am sure the Progressive Conservative party and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) will miss him sorely. Our sympathies go out to them and to the family of the deceased.

Let me say, concerning my late friend who represented Restigouche - Madawaska, that this good man had my greatest respect and highest regard.

I sat opposite him for four years and learned to appreciate his many fine qualities. It was because of his high sense of public duty, so characteristic of him, that he attended the spring session of parliament and gave of his best. That is a matter for admiration, no matter on which side of the house a man so actuated may sit.

My sympathies go out to the Prime Minister and the Liberal party on the loss of this promising young man. To the family of Mr. Michaud go our deepest sympathies, and the hope that God will soon heal the wounds they have suffered. His memory will always be held in high regard.

Just a word about the late Senator Mackenzie. I think it proper that the Prime Minister should mention his passing, and that we should pay a tribute to one who was a member of this house for so long and whose colourful career has not passed unnoticed by any Canadian who is informed. We extend our deepest sympathy to his widow and to all who are grieved by this passing.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose standing committees of this house under standing order 63, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Fournier (Hull), Claxton, Casselman, Johnston and Weir.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Honourable Alphonse Fournier, Minister of Public Works, the Honourable D. C. Abbott, Minister of Finance, the Honourable J. J. McCann, Minister of National Revenue, and the Honourable F. G. Bradley, Secretary of State, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled: An Act respecting the House of Commons.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Report of the joint librarians of parliament. —Mr. Speaker.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS AS TO AMENDMENTS—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, you and hon. members will have noticed a paragraph in the speech of His Excellency which states:

My ministers will seek to arrange for early consultation with the provincial governments with a view to agreeing upon an appropriate procedure for making within Canada such other amendments to the constitution as may from time to time be required.

This is a matter of concern to both the federal and the provincial authorities. Yesterday I dispatched letters to the premiers of the ten provinces. I am tabling a copy of the letter written in French to Premier Duplessis, and a copy of the letter written in English to Hon. Leslie M. Frost, Premier of Ontario. I may say that the letters to the other premiers were in terms identical with those to be found in the copy of the letter to Premier Frost.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house resolve itself at its next sitting into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 57.

Standing order 57 does not prevent this from being done at this time, but provides that as soon as the address in reply to the speech from the throne is adopted, there shall be set up a committee of ways and means and a committee of supply. Hon. members who were here during the last parliament will recall that we voted interim supply for a period which will expire at the end of this month. While it is hoped to deal with the estimates as early and as expeditiously as possible, it may be necessary, in order to prevent any disturbance in the public service, to ask for additional supply, because it is hardly likely that the supply bill can be adopted in its final form before September 30.

I think it would be desirable to have these committees set up at the earliest possible moment so that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) may table his estimates. Naturally the estimates will be the same as those which were tabled at the last session, and on which the interim supply passed at the last session was based. I hope I shall have the agreement of the house to the adoption of this motion.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house do at the next sitting resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 57.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That Joseph Alfred Dion, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Roberval, be appointed chairman of committees of the whole house, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 56.

As hon. members know, the chairman of the committees of the whole is also the Deputy Speaker. I have named as candidate for that office a gentleman who I think has the qualifications to fill it with the fairness and impartiality that have heretofore distinguished the holders of this office. He is Mr. Joseph Alfred Dion, member for the electoral district of Roberval, a distinguished lawyer. As hon. members who were here during the last parliament know, he was an attentive follower of the deliberations of this house, and one who on many occasions made valuable contributions to its debates.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is provided in rule 56 of the rules of the house that a deputy chairman of committees may be appointed. I think our experience in the performance of the duties of that office by a gentleman who is now in another place has shown us the value and desirability of having a deputy chairman of committees.

I should like to move:

That Louis René Beaudoin, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Vaudreuil-Soulanges, be appointed deputy chairman of committees of the whole house, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 56.

I am sure that those who were here last year were impressed, as I was, by his constant attendance and attention to the business of the house. I believe that his qualifications —those which he acquired when he qualified for the practice of law in the province of Quebec, and has demonstrated during the years in which he has been engaged in that profession, as well as those he has displayed since entering the house—fit him admirably to replace our former colleague, who won the affection of us all.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF DR. ARTHUR BEAUCHESNE AS HONORARY OFFICER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the 20th of September, 1917, Sir Robert Borden, then prime minister, rose and from his place made the following statement:

An intimation has been already conveyed to the house that the Clerk of the House purposes retiring from the duties of his office, which he has discharged for some fifteen years. Previous to his acceptance of the office which he now holds, Dr. Flint had a distinguished career in parliament and in the public life of the country, and since he undertook the responsibilities of the important office of Clerk of the House, all of the members who have come in contact with him have appreciated the ability, zeal, and industry which he has uniformly displayed in the discharge of his duties.

I desire to express my own personal recognition of his uniform courtesy and his unfailing attention to all matters which I have had to bring to his notice in the ten years which I served as leader of the opposition, and in the six years which I have had imposed upon me the responsibilities of First Minister.

I feel perfectly confident that my right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, will join with me in proposing a resolution which I am sure will meet with universal acceptance by all the members of this house. It is my privilege to move, seconded by Sir Wilfrid Laurier:

"That in view of the long and faithful services of Doctor Thomas B. Flint, Clerk of the House of Commons, he be continued after his retirement an honorary officer of this house, and that he be allowed the entrée of the House of Commons and a seat at the table on occasions of ceremony."

I think it is fortunate that, as the years go by, we can find occasion to repeat such gesture to men who have faithfully and long served the House of Commons at the table. Hon. members have noted that, after many years of efficient, courteous and devoted service to the members of this house, Dr. Arthur Beauchesne has reached the age of retirement, and has retired.

I have had the opportunity of discussing with the leader of the opposition, and the leaders of the other groups, the precedent established in this house over thirty years ago. It is my privilege to move at this time, seconded by the leader of the opposition:

That in view of the long and faithful services of Dr. Arthur Beauchesne, the recently retired Clerk of the House of Commons, he be appointed an honorary officer of the house, and that he be allowed the entrée of the House of Commons and a seat at the table on occasions of ceremony.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): In seconding this motion, Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that all hon. members will be happy to have the privilege of giving this evidence of their appreciation of the great contribution Dr. Beauchesne has made to the clarification of procedure in the House of Commons. To settle most arguments on procedure it is necessary only to mention a reference in Beauchesne. In a great many ways we have adopted the practices of Westminster, but here in this House of Commons we have also developed practices of our own; and to a very considerable extent those practices have taken form and have been clarified and interpreted under the guidance of this great student, who will long be remembered as the man whose views were regarded as so decisive in most cases in which they were cited. Along with that of Dr. Bourinot, I feel that the name of Dr. Beauchesne will be remembered as among those who have done much to design the general practice and procedure that has grown up in this house.

While we are paying this extremely well deserved tribute to Dr. Beauchesne, may I add that I am sure it will be a very real source of satisfaction to the new clerk of the house, who sits in his place, to know that from time to time he will have the benefit of the guidance and experience of Dr. Beauchesne, which I am sure will be of value to him in that way as it has been to this house for so many years.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF CLERK AND CLERK ASSISTANT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that the governor in council has appointed Léon J. Raymond, Esquire, O.B.E., as Clerk of the House of Commons, and Edward Russell Hopkins, Esquire, as Clerk Assistant of the House of Commons.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1949-50

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1950, was presented by Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1949-50

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1950, was presented by Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: As determined by a motion adopted earlier today, the business tomorrow will be the consideration of the speech from the throne. I imagine it might suit the convenience of hon. members to learn now whether we are to go beyond the speeches of the mover and seconder. The usual practice has been to have the mover and seconder speak on Friday and then have the debate adjourned until the following Monday. If it were desired to follow that practice in this instance I think hon. members would be glad to be so advised, so they might make their plans accordingly. If that is agreeable to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) I think hon. members might like to know.

Mr. Drew: Yes, Mr. Speaker; that procedure will be agreeable.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.07 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, September 16, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

BRITISH EMPIRE SERVICE LEAGUE

WELCOME TO DELEGATES TO TENTH BIENNIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Speaker: No doubt hon. members have noticed in the press that the tenth biennial conference of the British Empire Service League is now being held in Ottawa. A number of distinguished delegates to this conference are with us this afternoon and are now seated in the south gallery. I am confident that you would like me to extend to them on your behalf a very warm welcome to our midst.

Delegates have come to Canada from some twenty-one different countries of the commonwealth. Those who are with us this afternoon represent the following countries: Antigua, Australia, England, Gold Coast, India, Ireland (northern area); Ireland (southern area); Malaya, Newfoundland, New Zealand, Nigeria, Nyasaland, Pakistan, Rhodesia, Scotland, Sierra Leone, South Africa, St. Lucia, Trinidad and Wales.

You will notice that the delegation is made up of both men and women. These delegates, together with the delegates of our own Canadian legion, are under the outstanding leadership of their chairman, Lieutenant General Sir John Brown. I can assure them that they are indeed welcome guests to Canada, and I have pleasure in expressing to them on your behalf the earnest hope that their deliberations will prove of far-reaching benefit to the many hundreds of thousands of ex-service men and women who have so valiantly and well served in His Majesty's armed forces.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

(For list of departmental and other reports tabled, see Votes and Proceedings, No. 2, of September 16, 1949.)

INCOME TAX

QUESTION AS TO ALLOWANCE OF TRADE UNION DUES AS DEDUCTION FROM TAXABLE INCOME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question either to the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the recent favourable decision by the exchequer court, what action will the government take to provide for the allowing of trade union dues as a deduction from taxable income for income tax purposes?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I thank the hon. member for having given notice of his question. I shall give him an answer early next week.

TARIFFS AND TRADE

ANNECY CONFERENCE—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): I desire to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would it be possible for him to table the report of the proceedings of the conference held at Annecy?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The results of the tariff negotiations conducted at Annecy will be made public on or about the 10th of October by the United Nations, and at that time will be published also in the various capitals of the countries represented at the conference. In addition to those already tabled, documents arising out of the operation of the general agreement on tariffs and trade will be tabled in this house in due course.

NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): In view of the fact that tomorrow the North Atlantic council meets in Washington, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs care to indicate the composition of the Canadian delegation to that council, and also in general what position our delegation will take at this very important meeting?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. gentleman was good enough to give me notice of this question. It is true that the North Atlantic council will hold its first session tomorrow morning in Washington. Canada will be represented at that meeting by myself as Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I shall be accompanied by the under-secretary and will also have the assistance of the Canadian ambassador in Washington.

When the Atlantic pact was signed last April it was agreed to establish a working party to prepare for presentation to the members of the council at its first meeting a report on a suitable organization to be established under article 9 of the pact. That working group, on which Canada was represented, has completed its work, and its report will be the main order of business at the council meeting tomorrow morning. At this stage, of course, I cannot give the house any indication of the details of that report, but we hope it will be made public either Saturday evening or Monday. I can say, however, that it provides for the establishment of a defence council which would consist of the defence ministers of the various countries concerned, or their representatives, and also for certain subsidiary organizations in the field of defence planning and military supply. When the report has been considered and approved by the council it will be made public.

The report has been considered by the government, and we think it provides a suitable basis for the organization required under the Atlantic pact, so that it can become an effective instrument for the carrying out of its primary purpose, that of assisting the United Nations in preserving peace and preventing aggression.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS AS TO AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): In view of the importance of the correspondence tabled yesterday by the Prime Minister, including letters to the premiers of Ontario and Quebec in relation to the amendment of the British North America Act, would the right hon. gentleman consider proposing that those letters be printed either in Hansard or in Votes and Proceedings?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): If it is the desire of hon. members that these letters be printed as an appendix to Hansard, I do not think there could be any objection; and if Your Honour will so direct, I think most hon. members will be glad to have them in that convenient form.

(For text of letter to premiers of provinces, see appendix, pages 25 and 26.

[Mr. Pearson.]

COLLECTIVE SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO ARRANGEMENTS AFFECTING PACIFIC AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the government will consider the question of a Pacific pact. The Atlantic pact involves only two hundred million people at our front door, whereas a Pacific pact would involve all of the people of Asia, amounting to two or three times that number.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. gentleman has raised a very important question, which it would be hardly appropriate for me to go into at this time. I can tell him, however, that the matter he has mentioned, the establishment of a collective security arrangement in the Pacific, has been considered by all the Pacific countries in recent months, particularly by those who are even more directly concerned than Canada. There are, of course, some obvious difficulties in the way at the present time. The matter, however, is of great importance, and I am sure that all the governments concerned will continue to give it consideration.

Mr. Church: There is ten times more reason for considering a Pacific pact than there was for an Atlantic pact.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. MAURICE BOISVERT AND SECONDED BY MR. ARTHUR LAING

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Boisvert (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, it is with unconcealed emotion and deep apprehension that I rise to speak in this House of Commons which, for close to a century, so often rang with the voices of so many masters of eloquence sprung from our great Canadian political parties. What immense pride it gives me, however, to discharge such a pleasant duty as moving an address to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, in reply to the gracious speech, so full of promise for the future of our nation, which His Excellency has been pleased to make to both houses meeting on this solemn and moving occasion of the opening of a new parliament, proudly attended for the first time by hon. members of the new province of Newfoundland whom all

hon. members of the other provinces are glad to see and welcome today.

Seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Arthur Laing), I have the honour to move:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Viscount Alexander of Tunis, Governor General of Canada and Commander in Chief of Canada:

May it please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

I now hasten to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on your elevation to the speakership of this house. It was a cause of sincere rejoicing for all of us to learn that you were chosen to fulfil such noble and important duties. A better choice would not have been possible and the government deserves our gratitude for having made it. The sterling qualities I know you to possess had destined you for the functions you will discharge. Guardian of the prerogatives of our house, you will, we are sure, guide our debates with dignity and impartiality. I am convinced that all hon. members will strive to ease your task because they trust your uprightness and your spirit of fairness. There are men who exalt the public functions to which they are appointed. You are, like your predecessors, one of those men. If our parliament enjoys so great a prestige it is due to the unquestionable worth of its Speakers. Anything I might add to what I have just said would be a verbal garland which would offend your modesty.

To some people, our constitutional institution may seem antiquated and ridiculous. There are writers who make fun of our parliamentary procedure. Recently I read the following statement made by Sir Herbert Morrison, Lord President of the council, in England:

We must not be mistaken as to the survival of ancient customs and practices. Some say: Such an institution dates back to the "pre-machine" era! It goes back to the feudal ages! It should, at all costs, be adapted to modern needs! I believe they are taking form for substance. Judging by the results, I declare that our parliament is the most efficient instrument in the world, the best adapted to its end. One should see the practical utility of our "anachronisms." Why must all this pomp and panoply accompany Mr. Speaker? Why such extreme deference in word and gesture when addressing him? Why the wig and robes? Why all the bowing before the Chair when entering or leaving the house? Why such courtesy—supposedly out of date—during the debates, when the worst adversary is called an "honourable member," "gentleman of honour," "learned gentleman" or "right honourable gentleman"? Members entering the house for the first time look upon the whole ceremonial as an absurd custom handed down from ancient times. But they very soon realize that it adds greatly to the authority of the presiding officer, is conducive to the maintenance of good order during debates, and exalts the dignity and "esprit de corps" of the house in the eyes of all, both inside and outside parliament.

May I be permitted to say, with regard to this judicious comment, that our well-ordered procedure is the safest guarantee against any form of political, economic or social dictatorship. We must already keep in mind the possibility of a social dictatorship! I hope to have during this session an opportunity of supplying particulars in the language of the majority. I have the most sincere respect for my English-speaking countrymen and the greatest confidence in their desire to achieve Canadian unity of such a strength that we shall be able, without clashes or efforts, to maintain the traditions and the prosperity of our country.

(Text):

If I have insisted on quoting Sir Herbert Morrison at length it is because I believe, as he does, in the supreme value of the institutions which have been transmitted to us through tradition. According to established custom I must address this house in my mother tongue, which is the old French language. I will not quote the British North America Act—although I could—as the basis of my right to use that language. I would rather invoke the established custom to which I have referred, and which does greater credit to our parliament and the country as a whole.

The French spoken in Quebec is not the fancy French spoken by the Parisian. It is the old French of the seventeenth century, which we jealously safeguard, knowing that from the standpoint of basic French it compares with Parisian speech. The knowledge of French acquired in Quebec equals that which could be acquired in France. What notable service would be rendered if we dispelled this legend of Parisian French, which is not a use of words different from ours but is merely a relatively new way of expressing oneself. Whoever reads Molière and then talks to a French Canadian will soon recognize in the latter's conversation words used by the former in writing his immortal masterpieces.

The text from which I quoted Sir Herbert Morrison was written by him in the language which I am using with pride today. I know this pride will be shared by my constituents in particular, and by all French Canadians in Canada, who will be deeply grateful to the Prime Minister for having chosen me, as a representative of an entirely French-speaking constituency, to move in my own tongue the address in reply to the speech of the Governor General of Canada at the opening of parliament.

We were present yesterday at the opening of the first session of the twenty-first parliament. It is fitting to congratulate our leader, the Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, upon his unprecedented victory. That victory is more personal than political. It is of course due to the fact that he is leading a party whose historical and political role had much to do with the development of our country since confederation, but his superior qualities, his deep understanding of public service, his frankness, his personal dignity have enabled that greatly esteemed and sought-after lawyer of Quebec to enjoy the confidence of the Canadian people to such a degree that today he embodies the entire soul of the nation galvanized in an ideal of peace and social progress. There have been few such examples in the world.

As I said, the right hon. Prime Minister has won a personal victory without precedent in our political history. His victory is also that of the family man, of the devoted husband, of the father devoted to his children, of the loving wife, of the children actuated by the finest feelings towards their father and mother. The right hon. Prime Minister has restored the value of the Canadian home, which is every day the target of renewed assaults. Divorce, separations from bed and board, dispersal of children, hatred between those who had chosen to love each other, abandonment of the paternal roof by children who too easily forget their parents, are endangering the very foundations of civil society and national life.

It is in our own homes that we must learn to acquire the true feelings of brotherly love as the basis of human relations and without which we cannot wish to love our fellows. There can be no international understanding without a natural inclination to love our fellow men. But this will become an impossibility if we let the family be destroyed, if we do not hastily restore in the Canadian home the same spirit and the same love which are found in that of the Prime Minister.

It is an extraordinary lesson of wisdom in our modern times, and a lesson of universal application. Let us note, however, that the evil is more deeply rooted elsewhere than in this country. I trust with all my heart that the lesson shall be understood by our young people. True creative happiness lies within the family. I wish to pay tribute to the right hon. Prime Minister for showing to the whole country the sacred character of the family, which so many known and secret agents are endeavouring to destroy.

The solemn and impressive ceremony which attends the opening of the session of a new parliament should not make us forget those which death has deprived of the fruits of victory. Two of our colleagues, Mr. McMillin and Mr. Michaud, have gone since June 27.

To the condolences of this house, which were so well justified, I wish to add my personal sympathy. Death has taken them, but they shall be remembered.

A great Canadian, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, will no longer sit among us in this house. Each one of us could have benefited from his long and wide experience. His profound knowledge of the events that have marked Canadian life over the past fifty years would have been most useful to us, when the time comes to examine and solve the national and international problems that will be brought to our attention. May I say to him that his memory will forever live in our minds and that we hold him in such high reverence that he will always be among us. We will pray God every day to keep him in good health that he may for many long years remain among us, who respect and love him. I congratulate the government on the appointment to the cabinet of the representative of Lotbinière, the Hon. Hugues Lapointe, and that of Outremont-St. Jean, the Hon. G. E. Rinfret. The former is the son of the late Ernest Lapointe, with whom I was associated when I first began practising law. The latter is a nephew of the late Fernand Rinfret. Those names are well known in the political field and still fresh in the mind of every Canadian. Both were loyal friends of the Right Hon. Mackenzie King.

Another personality well known to all Canadians will no longer sit among us; I mean Mr. John Bracken. May I assure him that he stills enjoys the admiration of all his fellow Canadians. We all regret his recent defeat. We will long remember his services to our country.

The electors of Nicolet-Yamaska were delighted to learn that the prime minister had chosen their member to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Many of them have asked me to express their thanks to the Prime Minister for the honour bestowed upon them.

The constituency of Nicolet-Yamaska is 70 per cent agricultural. Its people are mostly of French descent, its population of 35,000 numbering not more than 300 inhabitants of British or foreign origin. The riding, a flat open country, is watered by three large streams, the Yamaska, the St. Francis and the Nicolet, as well as by four smaller ones.

Forty years ago, the first three were still navigable for several miles. The soil is rich, agriculture being the main industry. Farms are neat while the people are hard-working and honest.

The riding has only one town, that of Nicolet, which is renowned for its religious teaching institutions; among others, mention must be made of the 150-year-old seminary of Nicolet and of the convent of the Assumption Sisters. Since their inauguration, these two institutions have generously devoted themselves to the higher education of the boys and girls of that district.

In my student days, priest teachers, many of whom had attended great European universities, were being paid $100 a year. The sisters of the Assumption are giving hundreds of young girls the very fullest of trainings for no other consideration than the regard of their pupils. Those nuns are in charge of schools in several towns in Ontario. They teach fine arts, literature, mathematics, et cetera. They are training young girls many of whom play important parts in our Canadian community.

Nicolet seminary has produced three bishops now living—Bishops Courchesne, Mélançon and Gagnon—several deceased bishops who are honoured figures in our religious history, several statesmen who have honoured their country and numerous writers who were taught there the art of writing in verse and in prose.

I take pleasure today in paying tribute to the people of my constituency and to those educational institutions, as well as to the many other civil and religious institutions that are building our whole future on the goodness of the earth, love for the land and the poetry of a truly beautiful nature. Farms filled with sunshine and children, a happy, calm and proud people, that is the country we must love and praise. Such is the people the Prime Minister first had in mind when he chose me, among many others better able than I am, to open the deliberations of this house. From a thousand that they were in 1760, our people now number 35,000. Sons have replaced fathers on the ancestral farm and nearly all are direct descendants of the first settlers who as vassals, under the French dominion, occupied the numerous seigniories granted by the King of France and parcelled out of the territory of the former counties of Nicolet and Yamaska.

I should like the government to show more and more interest in the good rural population of this country. A great business man and former president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company stated in Toronto in 1935, and I quote:

> However, any economic progress, not only in Canada but anywhere in the world, depends essentially upon the development of agriculture which is truly the basis of human civilization.

Family life and agriculture are therefore the two factors best suited to ensure the happiness of mankind, the abatement of strife and the revival of our civilization, which two world wars and a depression have threatened with subservience to those dark forces that would exploit human beings as tools of an all-powerful state.

Dictators have built their forces on fear. They did not concern themselves with politics. Politics is the art of adapting people to constant world changes by means of well-ordered legislation. Democracy consists in using the many and flexible ways offered by the country's constitution to ensure the common weal. The art of government is a difficult one, requiring moderation, caution and wisdom, especially when nations are facing problems which could likely change the course of history and the way of life of the free peoples of the world.

This statement leads me to congratulate the government for the measures it intends to introduce during this session.

Never since confederation has more important legislation been submitted for the approval of parliament. The main portion of it comprises three parts.

1. Abolition of appeals to the privy council.

2. The right of the Canadian parliament to amend its constitution with respect to all matters within its jurisdiction, except in the matter of the constitutional rights of provinces, the use of French and English, and education.

3. Consultation with the provinces with a view to amending the constitution, through a bill passed by the parliament of Canada, as far as their respective constitutional rights are concerned. It is the obvious road that leads to the absolute independence of the Canadian nation. It bears the mark of the Canadianism of our Prime Minister. There will be deep satisfaction in all parts of the country that the government is determined, not to sever historical and constitutional bonds, but rather to put Canada on an equal footing with the leading nations of the world: the United States, Great Britain and France.

Since 1939 the government of our country has made history more than it has indulged in politics, and the present Prime Minister will be looked upon as the statesman who, more than any other, saw to it that politics be conditioned by the historical and juridical evolution of the country.

With the Statute of Westminster, which goes back only to 1931, Canada received a charter of independence; with the legislation the government intends to introduce, she will obtain the charter of her complete and absolute independence.

The three aspects of the question are closely interlinked.

In the logical order in which they appear in the speech from the throne, the abolition of appeals to the privy council comes first in the form of a bill to be introduced to amend the Supreme Court Act so that the latter will have final and exclusive jurisdiction in all matters. At this point, a brief historical review is in order.

Before 1875 the supreme court did not exist although governments had attempted to create it.

In 1875 the Liberal administration of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie brought in a bill instituting the Supreme Court of Canada.

The Hon. Mr. Fournier, the then Minister of Justice, indicated during the discussions that abolition of appeals to the privy council might be provided for:

> He would very much like to have a clause inserted stating that the right of appeal to the privy council no longer exists. There were strong reasons in favour of the right of appeal to the privy council, but there were even stronger ones against that right. This right of appeal has been widely used, and he might add considerably abused, in the province of Quebec by wealthy people and corporations so as to force plaintiffs to compromise when they had won their case before the courts of the country. However, as he already stated, he made no mention of this in the bill now before the house, but left it aside for decision on some future occasion.

Sir John Macdonald followed the minister and, after congratulating the government, stated:

> As to the matter of appeals to the Privy Council, he had always been of the opinion that, as long as we remained in a state of dependence, it was important to maintain the right of every Canadian, as of every other British subject, to appeal to the court of highest jurisdiction, although in his estimation such right of appeal was sometimes a means of oppression in the case of a rich man against a poor man, because of the considerable costs involved. It seemed to him that the ruthless abandonment of the right of appeal meant the severance of one of the ties binding this nation to the mother country.

Since that date, the abolition of appeals has been a subject of controversy and it has always been demanded by a large body of public opinion in this country. In 1904 a league organized in the province of Quebec ardently urged abolition of these appeals.

The Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, member for Nicolet and one of the movers of the address in reply to the speech from the throne in 1896, was an ardent advocate of abolition.

In 1916, the Canadian Senate collected opinions from several legal experts.

In 1938, a direct bill to abolish appeals to the privy council was introduced before the Canadian parliament by Hon. Mr. Cahan.

The Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, then Minister of Justice, requested closer study of the constitutional and legal problems involved in this important legislation.

In 1939, the matter again came up before parliament in the form of a bill, No. 9, amending the Supreme Court of Canada Act which would give the latter exclusive, final and definite jurisdiction. On April 24, 1939, it was decided to adjourn the debate to refer the constitutional character of the act to the Supreme Court of Canada.

On January 19, 1940, the Supreme Court of Canada declared that the act was constitutional. An appeal was made to the privy council and the decision was confirmed by the latter on January 13, 1947.

During the last session a bill was introduced in parliament for the purpose of granting the public's wish to see Canada at last enjoy supreme authority in legal matters.

Three opinions now prevail among members of the legal profession: The first one is to the effect that the abolition of appeals to the privy council may place the provinces in a precarious position as regards their constitutional rights and powers and the government of Canada cannot give to the Supreme Court of Canada final and exclusive jurisdiction with respect to anything that relates to the matters exclusively attributed to the provinces by the British North America Act.

According to a second opinion, we should maintain appeals to the privy council for the following reasons: (a) the council's decisions are a useful contribution to our common jurisprudence; (b) those appeals are one of the last links which bind us to the empire and their continuance will help us foster better understanding and will help us achieve a higher concept of justice and of the high attributes we give to it.

It is even being suggested that the government absorb the costs when it pleads against a private individual and that certain talented jurists in Canada be made members of the privy council. A third avers that Canada should enjoy full and absolute sovereignty and that its appeals to a tribunal of Great Britain is a vestige of a form of independence which no longer suits our status as an independent nation.

The privy council's decision disposes of these arguments.

Since 1939, the historical evolution of Canada has progressed rapidly.

In September 1939, Canada entered the war, which enabled England to resist the invader after the defeat of France. Our hearts are still echoing with the pathetic words spoken by Churchill when he lauded our war effort. To the immortal glory of our pioneers is added that of Canadian servicemen of the first and second world wars.

At the end of the war, Canada, together with her cousins to the south, pulled Europe out of the squalor of its pitiful and horrible troubles. Then Canada joined the United Nations, annexed Newfoundland, obtained an amendment to her constitution in order to give the province of Quebec representation proportionate to her population. Lastly, on March 15, 1949, the Canadian government signed the North Atlantic treaty as a country enjoying the most absolute measure of sovereignty, under international law.

Such a rapid development in our evolution enables us to fully understand that part of the speech from the throne which reads as follows:

> You will be asked to approve constitutional measures designed to facilitate the attainment of the constitutional limits of our nationhood.

On February 3, 1949, the right hon. the Prime Minister stated:

> A nation which, like Canada, takes pride in its peacetime achievement must assume all the responsibilities of a sovereign state. A sovereign state cannot let the courts of another country have the final say in its litigation.
> There is another vestige of our colonial past of which I should like Canada to be freed. You all know that the terms of confederation are written in the British North America Act. This act is the charter of Canadian union, the essential part of our constitution.

This evolution is not directed against any country. It is a natural condition with free people and I find this confirmed in the preamble to the North Atlantic pact:

> They are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law.

A nation's freedom must remain indivisible, if that nation is expected to play its full part in world affairs and promote permanent peace. I submit therefore that Canada, a sovereign country as far as the executive and legislature powers are concerned, should also be sovereign in the matter of judicial powers.

It is quite apparent that Canada must be empowered to amend its constitution, subject to the conditions outlined in the speech from the throne. I congratulate the government for taking the necessary steps. History shall record them as landmarks of our development, a development achieved without a single drop of blood being shed. Wars and revolutions have always brought about changes in the constitution of countries, empires, kingdoms and ancient democracies. Most countries have won their liberty and independence through bloodshed; in Canada, however, liberty and independence are the fruit of wisdom and sagacity, of understanding and good will. Our country stands as a living example of the tolerance, magnanimity and happy outlook needed for the logical development of the universal order of things.

I note with great satisfaction that the government is anxious, in spite of all that has been said during the past few years, to co-operate with the provinces. An examination of the speech from the throne reveals that the government is desirous of avoiding anything that may bring about conflicts between the federal and provincial authorities. It would be useless to work for the maintenance of peace if we cannot, within our own boundaries, come to an understanding in the best interest of our people. The various components that make up our country must combine their efforts to ensure our economic expansion and a greater Canada. Those matters must remain above party politics. True patriotism dictates the policy that should prevail in our internal relations.

The time at my disposal allows only brief consideration of our external relations. We are faced with this dilemma: on the one hand, United Nations; on the other, Russia and the countries under her domination. Then, there is that great bulk of humanity that still does not know, because its political evolution is not sufficiently advanced, in what sphere of influence it will fall or with what group of powers it will freely associate itself. Now that renewed hope has come to Europe, the spectre of war crops up here and there to disrupt international entente. This naturally gives rise to unwholesome anxiety, to unbalanced trade relations. Such a state of things calls for caution. Since the government seems headed in the right direction, we will do our best to support its present policy. This is the price we must pay for our prosperity, our happiness. Caution is less costly than catastrophe.

Development of international trade, marketing of our farm products, appropriate measures for continued prosperity, housing assistance, educational grants, prevention of strikes, social security, health measures, these are the hallmarks of good administration. To increase social security, I would suggest to the government, if I may, that, in so far as our financial means allow, a pension plan be inaugurated for needy invalids. This would be looked upon favourably by the people of Canada.

Up to the present time, the government has provided for the blind, for the aged, for children; certain provinces grant pensions to needy mothers. The time has come to consider those poor unfortunates who, by accident or by birth, are crippled for life and gaze with sombre melancholy upon the happiness of others. A pension scheme designed to help them would ameliorate their plight. The kindness of the state would atone to some extent for the harshness of life.

Let us keep scientific progress in step with social progress and we shall drive away communism. Communism is the philosophy of despair. Whenever despair takes root in the soul of several individuals, there are men who are willing to change this despair into an instrument of power, provided those who despair are willing to become slaves. There are in Russia ten million forced labourers. Whereas Canada was the first nation to ratify the North Atlantic pact and whereas the Prime Minister was one of the first sponsors of this statute of liberty and security for the peoples of the earth, the communist members in the governments supporting the pact voted against it, in the name of peace. It is by avoiding within our frontiers racial and class struggles, economic chaos, that we will succeed in convincing the communists that, in the words of a French economist:

"Nothing has been found that could advantageously replace liberty as a means of ensuring to everyone the maximum amount of dignity and happiness."

He added:

"Therein lies the real solution of post-war problems, not only in France, but throughout the world."

In order that these things may come to pass, social progress must be as rapid as material advances.

The monthly bulletin of one of the larger Canadian banks contained the following statement:

In spite of all the new means of manufacturing what we need, we have not paid sufficient attention to one need in particular. We have not solved the problem which arises from the thousands of complications which the new way of life has brought into human relationships. Society has not bridged the gap between social needs and social science in the same way as we have bridged the chasm between material needs and physical sciences.

We must address ourselves to the future. We must make plans so that the needs of the future may be satisfied. For our own preservation and that of society and of the human race, we must devote all our energy to useful ends and bear in mind the social implications of our behaviour.

Canada is a democracy governed by a Liberal government. We hope that it will meet the wish of the Canadian people, who want to live in peace as free and happy men under enlightened laws.

The recollection we have of the King and Queen makes all Canadians appreciative of the recovery of His Majesty the King. Our prayers for the restoration of his health have been heard. Praise be to God!

I am quite conscious of not having performed in a manner commensurate with the honour that was done to me the task I accepted with too much temerity.

(Text):

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my first words in this parliament will be to express thanks and appreciation to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his colleagues for having given me the distinctive honour of seconding the motion for an address in reply to the speech delivered most graciously yesterday by His Excellency the Governor General. I shall be ever mindful that this honour—and, Mr. Speaker, at the moment for me, this tremendous responsibility—is far less a tribute to myself than a tribute to the beautiful province from which I come, and to the people of my riding of Vancouver South.

It is most appropriate that, coming as I do from our most westerly province, I should take this opportunity of welcoming to the parliament of Canada the elected representatives of that great and beautiful province of Newfoundland. I do so in the hope and confidence that they will be happy here and that the province will grow and develop in the atmosphere of freedom and equality that is characteristic of the Canadian family.

This new parliament of Canada chose yesterday a Speaker to preside over its deliberations. Under our parliamentary system the Speaker is not only the first commoner, but is responsible for the preservation of the dignity of parliament as a whole. It was my privilege in the past to have known Mr. Speaker as the hon. member for Brantford City, and from the impressions then gained of his graciousness, wide understanding and deep sincerity, there was no surprise when yesterday his elevation to the speakership was acclaimed in all parts of the house.

To the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert), who has had the senior honour of moving this address, I tender my heartiest congratulations upon his splendid presentation today, tempered and qualified by the envy that is mine at the immense facility with which he used both our great tongues. He is to be congratulated also because he and his riding became the spearhead of the Quebec campaign which resulted on June 27 in an almost unanimous endorsation in his province of the policies of this government and its leader.

It is my good fortune to be among the first in this house to express congratulations to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the members of his government upon the unprecedented success of June 27. Many opinions have been given and more will be heard to explain this victory, which is unparalleled in the parliamentary history of this nation. All words will fail, as my words now will fail, to put in proper perspective the supreme position occupied by the Prime Minister, who came to the service of this country upon the tragic and untimely death of another of Canada's giants.

He served with great distinction, first as Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and later as Canada's first Secretary of State for External Affairs. In this latter position he carried Canada's stature and respect among nations to new and impressive heights. On August 7, 1948, he was called to the leadership of the Liberal party by the widest support a national leader had ever received from delegates from all parts of Canada. His record in government had been excellent and indeed the history of all the departments of government he headed has been highly acceptable to the people of Canada. But neither his departmental record nor the general attestation of his government would have availed in such a victory without the monumental characteristics of leadership which he personally displayed.

The Canadian electorate prefers character to incandescence. The Canada-wide tour of the Prime Minister was a personal victory unequalled in the history of Canada, and reminiscent Canadians are called to remember in that connection the great personal magnetism of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I find it impossible to pay a higher tribute to my leader than to say that the pathway to this House of Commons for so many members who have come here for the first time was the solid foundation of his integrity.

When I refer to our Prime Minister it is easy for me to recall our leader of another day who across the years was the engineer and architect of so much of the road by which we have so safely come. His absence from this parliament will be keenly felt after a distinguished public service dating from 1908. I am of the thought that the senior members of this house will think that the house is not the same without the presence and counsel of the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King. Hon. members in all parts of the house will rejoice with me that Providence has vouchsafed to him a continuing and even improving health so that he may further benefit the people of this country by putting on permanent record details of the events and the challenges of the tempestuous days in which it was his privilege to serve.

As a British Columbian it is my great pleasure to say a word in merited praise of the minister from my province (Mr. Mayhew). His untiring efforts on behalf of his department in all the provinces of Canada, his zeal for the affairs of people as they are touched by federal policies in all parts of the country, his efficiency and deep integrity of purpose, have endeared him to our people and have greatly enhanced the standard of public service in our country.

We who come to this parliament for the first time from our most westerly province wish to pay our respects to the senior and continuing members from British Columbia who at all times have shown fidelity and diligence in the discharge of their public duties. Permit me to compliment the senior members in all parts of the house who have returned to this high office in the gift of the people. What a remarkable commentary upon personal service and what reassuring evidence of public gratitude it is when in this twenty-first parliament of Canada we can welcome one, in the person of the distinguished hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), who without interruption throughout the years has been a member since the thirteenth parliament. I note that in this parliament we have among us one who first came to the house in 1911.

I should like to express our sorrow at the death of the late Right Hon. Ian Alistair Mackenzie, who had been appointed a senator from British Columbia. We were proud of his life and accomplishments, and we deeply regret his passing. His was a distinguished public service, first in the provincial field and then in the wider sphere of federal affairs. His memorial, more enduring than bronze, is the veterans charter of Canada; his supreme eulogy the deep and abiding friendships which he made. No higher tribute can be paid to our country and to the opportunities it offers for those of ability and perseverance than the story of this Scots immigrant lad who forged to the very forefront in his people's regard.

It is the happy privilege of those who participate in this address to say a few words concerning their own provinces. Our beautiful province of British Columbia is enjoying an era of vast expansion. Industrial development and an equable climate have focused the eyes of all Canada upon our Pacific shores. Our population has more than doubled since 1931 and the increase since 1941 has been estimated at 400,000.

We have tremendous wealth in forests, mines and fisheries and all three industries, spurred both by demand for their products and by technological advances, have enjoyed great growth. Our agriculture is both unique and important in its diversification. Soft open winters in the coastal areas are ideal for dairying and the overwintering of many seed crops. In our central and northern sections, altitude and latitude combine to produce disease-free seeds of great vitality which command a ready export market as yet not fully exploited.

In the Okanagan valley particularly, where irrigation water is the farmers' gold, but also in the Kootenays, we have established a tree fruit industry and a marketing service whose products, for quality and pack, have become the standard by which all others, imported and domestic, are judged.

Our agriculture is intensive. Hon. members who come from agricultural ridings will catch the importance of my words when I remind them that we have dairy farms in the province of British Columbia where the municipal tax alone is $8 per acre, and in some places irrigation has now reached a cost of $25 per acre; but, as if to make up for these costs, our production is exceedingly high. Local production figures have been recorded in recent years, as to potatoes, of over 1,000 bushels per acre; oats, 150 bushels per acre; and apples, 1,800 bushels per acre. Our provincial government has embarked upon a program of expansion of the industrial and communication services into our hinterlands. Ours is a province in which communication is arduous and costly. The recent announcement of the Prime Minister of his intention to recommend to parliament certain assistance in the extension of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway from Quesnel to Prince George has earned the gratitude of the people of the province of British Columbia.

Our people will rejoice that legislation is being introduced to facilitate, in co-operation with the provinces, the construction of a trans-Canada highway. Nothing so much as a broad highway connecting us will supplement those sentimental threads and economic cords that bind our provinces together.

British Columbia is a province of surpassing grandeur. Our northern park lands, our deep, rich valleys, our lakes and tumultuous waterways, our deeply indented seashores, which combine the qualities of the Mediterranean and the Norwegian fjords, are becoming the mecca of many thousands of tourists. Tourist visitors to the province of British Columbia from outside Canada are expected this year to exceed the total population within the province. If we had opposite us the great congested cities of New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and Detroit, it might well be that the tourist traffic in British Columbia would be our first industry.

We are beginning to see now that what we thought once was our great drawback is in reality one of our greatest assets. Ranges of snowclad mountains feed rushing waters through tortuous and narrow defiles to the sea, to give us the second greatest potential of electric energy in all the provinces of Canada. Vast established industries are looking toward us for sites where low-cost power and all-year shipping facilities provide ideal conditions for manufacturing.

Our blessings have come not unmixed. Indiscriminate development of water power could jeopardize our famous salmon industry, because the upper reaches of our rivers provide spawning grounds for the salmon which create this immense source of wealth. In this connection the superb contribution being made by the engineers and biologists under the direction of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission should be duly noted and appreciated.

The influx of new citizens has created in all our major centres a demand for housing which, though per capita we have built more houses than any other area of Canada, still greatly outstrips the supply. The people of British Columbia will welcome the announcement that legislation is to be introduced to accelerate the building of new houses in our country.

Our windows look out upon the Pacific; we depend for our prosperity upon our export trade, and we share the concern of all Canadians, in common with the citizens of all western democracies, as to the implications of present currency difficulties. But, Mr. Speaker, we share also the pride of all Canadians in the predominant showing made by the representatives of Canada in the recent discussions concerning these problems. We also share the confidence of the people of Canada that these difficulties can and will be overcome, and we in British Columbia stand behind the policy of the government in seeking multilateral trade so that we can develop our trade in any part of the world with anyone who will trade with us.

The riding of Vancouver South comprises a narrow southern strip of the city of Vancouver running east and west, bounded on the east by the municipality of Burnaby and on the west by the Musqueam Indian reservation, inhabited still by a number of Indians whose forebears gave Simon Fraser considerable trouble in his explorations of 1808. Vancouver South holds the distinction of being the electoral district with a larger number of home owners than any other electoral district in the Dominion of Canada. It slopes towards the sun, and intense pride of ownership is indicated by beautiful boulevards, well-kept homes, and artistic surroundings. Commendable civic foresight has provided many and large public park facilities throughout the entire area.

On the south the riding is bordered throughout its entire length by the north arm of the Fraser river. This arm of the Fraser river is a narrow and shallow stream, but it is carrying today a volume of water traffic second only to the St. Lawrence among Canada's natural waterways. Great lumber mills, plywood and sash and door factories, furniture industries, and all the activities allied with lumber, line its banks for miles.

This stream knows nothing of the majestic deep sea steamers, but it is the home of the towboat, the little work horse of the sea. New industries of all kinds are being attracted to the area, which is the most rapidly expanding section of our city. Last year more than 800 million board feet of logs and lumber came into the river, and products in excess of a value of $46 million were transported on its narrow surface.

But more interesting than the industries of Vancouver South are its people. In the older residential districts are the homes of industrialists and members of the various professions. The newer districts have seen extensive building to provide homes for merchants and those engaged in our nearby industries. We have in our riding over 8,000 voters of German ethnic origin, very few of whom came to us from their homeland. We have sturdy sons from the lands of the Croats, the Serbs and the Slovenes. We have many independent and vital people of Ukrainian origin. We have some Chinese, and we have some Hindus. All these people came to us in search of economic and political freedom, and some of them came to us in search of freedom to worship their God. In many cases they had fought, in the lands from which they came, a losing battle against tyrannies and despotisms of various kinds, and they may be depended upon to stand shoulder to shoulder with us against the encroachment of despotism here, and in the preservation of those things which eternally matter to a nation and its people. Not alone in independence, but in their culture, too, they are bringing enrichment to us.

This is the economic pattern and this the social mosaic that is Vancouver South. More than that, it is the tapestry that is Canada. Our strength is our diversity. The contributions of our people in the arts, in science, in technology and in culture are the sum total of all the pages of man's history. Our social alchemy is producing pure gold. Among all our people there is one common objective, the hope and aspiration of those who dwell on the farmsteads that slope to the St. Lawrence, of those who live in the land of Evangeline, of those hardy souls who sail forth to the Grand Banks, and of those who till our western plains. Their chief objective, indeed their one objective, is that in peace and security they may have the right to make the most of their individual lives.

Probably this world will never free itself from troubles. Twice in one generation our young nation has seen the rugged finger of sacrifice point the way, and twice Canada has answered. Old discords lie in uneasy sleep, and the far-off thunder of new discords is already heard. Our generation finds itself in the travail of working out a reasonable compromise between two opposed ideologies. The first places complete personal liberty and absolute freedom of independent action, with no restraint, as its goal for the happiness of mankind. At the other extreme are those who would concentrate all power in the state, on the assumption that if men of evil with concentrated power could bring evil upon the world, then men of good will could produce only good. Both extremes fail to heed the oft-repeated warning that power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely.

This is the current crisis to which mankind, in its groping, has come. The contest is raising new frontiers. They are frontiers that are less and less nationalistic or of creed. They are frontiers being raised in the hearts and minds of men everywhere. Extremism has had its victories, only to find its people either in ashes or in chains. How strange it is that we should continue to debate the feasibility of a middle way. We in Canada are the middle way; and to those who conjure up in their minds dangers of sweeping political victories, let me suggest a study of Liberal faith. We have no fixed boundaries. The party to which I have the honour to belong is a social journey, not a political destination.

In our national life there are certain fundamental credentials which elevate and advance. They are the same articles of faith that create character in the individual. They direct that we shall accept our responsibilities and keep our word. Our nation's contribution to the cause of free men everywhere during two wars, and its efforts to restore mankind afterwards, make her the admiration of every other country and the envy of most. Our resources are vast; our technologies in the forests, in the mines and above all in the air, are nothing short of superb. Our people are wise, and of good heart. Their continuing fidelity will ensure success in attaining that prime objective of humanity, which is human happiness expressed in its widest interpretation.

On motion of Mr. Drew the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: As was understood yesterday afternoon, I move that the house do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 4.40 p.m.

APPENDIX

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—PROCEDURE IN AMENDMENTS

LETTER FROM PRIME MINISTER TO PREMIERS OF PROVINCES OTHER THAN QUEBEC

Office of the Prime Minister
Ottawa, September 14, 1949.

The Honourable Leslie M. Frost, M.L.A., Premier of Ontario,
Toronto, Ontario.

My dear Premier:

For some time the government has been giving consideration to devising a satisfactory means of removing the necessity, on every occasion on which an amendment to the British North America Act is required, of going through the form of having the amendment made by the parliament of the United Kingdom. It does not accord with the status of Canada as a fully autonomous nation that we should be obliged to have recourse to the parliament of another country, however close our association with that country, to determine our own affairs. Moreover, it has been made increasingly clear to the government that the parliament of the United Kingdom has no desire to perpetuate the existing anomalous situation any longer than is absolutely necessary.

Before the recent election I stated on several occasions that it was the view of the government that a method should be worked out to amend our constitution in Canada, and that any such method should include the fullest safeguards of provincial rights and jurisdiction, and of the use of the two official languages and of those other rights which are the sacred trust of our national partnership.

I stated also that it was the intention of the government, after the election, to consult the provincial governments with a view to working out a method of amending the constitution in Canada, which would be satisfactory to all Canadians.

My colleagues and I recognize that the working out of a satisfactory method of making all kinds of amendments will not be easy, and the government has accordingly decided to submit to our parliament, at the forthcoming session, an address requesting an amendment of the British North America Act by the United Kingdom parliament which would vest in the parliament of Canada the authority to amend the constitution of Canada but only in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces, nor affecting the rights and privileges of the provinces, or existing constitutional rights and privileges with respect to education and to the use of the English and French languages.

Such an amendment would give the Canadian parliament the same jurisdiction over the purely federal aspects of our constitution that the provincial legislatures already possess over the provincial constitutions, while giving both to provincial rights and jurisdiction and to the historic rights of minorities an express assurance of legal protection which we feel they should have.

We recognize that amendments may be required from time to time in the national interest of those provisions of the constitution which concern both federal and provincial authorities, and that it would be desirable to devise a generally satisfactory method of making such amendments in Canada whenever they may be required.

The federal government would appreciate the opportunity of consulting with the governments of all the provinces on this matter in the manner most convenient to the provincial governments, at an early date after the conclusion of the forthcoming session of parliament. If the provincial governments should desire, meanwhile, to have a preparatory conference of constitutional experts, we would be ready to have federal officials participate.

Our aim is to reach agreement, as soon as possible, on a method of amendment which will relieve the United Kingdom parliament of an embarrassing obligation, and establish within Canada full and final responsibility for all our national affairs.

To this end we are inviting the co-operation of your government and the governments of all the other provinces of Canada.

Yours sincerely,

Louis S. St. Laurent

LETTER FROM PRIME MINISTER TO PREMIER OF QUEBEC

Bureau du Premier Ministre
Ottawa, le 14 septembre 1949.

L'honorable Maurice-L. Duplessis,
Premier ministre
de la province de Québec,
Hôtel du gouvernement,
Québec, Qué.

Mon cher premier ministre,

Depuis quelque temps, le gouvernement cherche à trouver un moyen satisfaisant d'éviter la formalité nécessaire, chaque fois qu'il est besoin d'amender l'Acte de l'Amérique du nord britannique, d'avoir à s'adresser au Parlement du Royaume-Uni. Si étroite que soit notre association à un autre pays, le fait que nous soyons obligés de recourir à son Parlement pour décider de choses qui nous concernent en tant que nation, ne concorde pas avec notre statut de nation autonome. Du reste, il est devenu de plus en plus évident au gouvernement que le Parlement du Royaume-Uni ne tient pas à perpétuer plus longtemps qu'il n'est absolument nécessaire, l'anomalie de la situation actuelle.

Avant les dernières élections, j'ai déclaré en maintes occasions que le gouvernement était d'avis qu'il était opportun d'élaborer un mode d'amender au Canada notre propre constitution et que tout procédé à cet effet devrait comporter les garanties les plus formelles pour la protection de la juridiction et des droits provinciaux, ainsi que de l'usage des langues officielles et des droits qui sont le dépôt sacré de notre unité nationale.

J'ai aussi déclaré que le gouvernement avait l'intention de consulter, après les élections, les gouvernements provinciaux afin de trouver un procédé acceptable à tous les Canadiens, par lequel le Canada pourrait amender sa propre constitution.

Nous reconnaissons, mes collègues et moi, qu'il ne sera pas facile de trouver un mode satisfaisant et général d'amender notre constitution; en conséquence, le gouvernement a décidé de soumettre à notre Parlement, à la prochaine session, une adresse priant le Parlement du Royaume-Uni de conférer au Parlement du Canada le droit de modifier la constitution du Canada, quant aux affaires ne relevant pas de la compétence des législatures des provinces, et ne touchant pas aux droits et privilèges constitutionnels des provinces, ni aux droits et privilèges actuels en matière d'éducation, ou relatifs à l'usage des langues française et anglaise.

Un tel amendement accorderait au Parlement canadien, sur les aspects purement fédéraux de notre constitution, la même juridiction que possèdent déjà les législatures des provinces sur la constitution provinciale, tout en donnant à la fois à la juridiction et aux droits provinciaux, ainsi qu'aux droits historiques des minorités, l'assurance explicite d'une protection légale qui, à notre sens, devrait exister.

Nous reconnaissons qu'il est possible qu'il faille, de temps en temps, dans l'intérêt national, amender des clauses de la constitution qui intéressent à la fois les autorités fédérale et provinciales, et qu'il importe de trouver un mode généralement acceptable de faire au Canada de tels amendements lorsqu'ils s'avéreront nécessaires.

Le gouvernement fédéral serait heureux d'avoi l'occasion de consulter, de la façon qui leur con viendrait le mieux, les gouvernements de toute les provinces sur cette question, aussitôt que pos sible après la clôture de la prochaine session d Parlement. Si, entretemps, les gouvernements pro vinciaux trouvaient opportun la convocation d'un conférence préparatoire d'experts en matière cons titutionnelle, nous serons prêts à y participer.

Notre but est d'en arriver aussitôt que possibl à une entente sur le mode d'amendement qui li bérera le Parlement du Royaume-Uni d'une obli gation embarrassante, et donnera au Canada plein et entière responsabilité sous tous les aspects d notre vie nationale.

A cette fin, nous serons heureux d'avoir la co opération de votre gouvernement et des gouver nements de toutes les autres provinces du Canada

Votre bien dévoué,

Louis-S. St-Laurent

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, September 19, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

S.S. "NORONIC"

DESTRUCTION BY FIRE ON SEPTEMBER 17—STATEMENT AS TO INVESTIGATIONS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the very unfortunate disaster which occurred in Toronto on Saturday morning, September 17, when the Canada Steamship Lines S.S. Noronic took fire at her berth, with a loss of life reaching well over 125, according to latest reports. I understand that all the passengers have not been accounted for, and the list of persons missing over and above those whose bodies have been recovered stands at approximately 70. I am sure that all the members of this house will join with me in extending to the families and relatives of those who have lost their dear ones our most sincere sympathy in their hour of grief.

The passenger list of S.S. Noronic was made up of nearly 500 United States citizens and some 20 Canadian citizens. It is deplorable that such an accident should have occurred where loss of life affects so many families of our friends in the United States, and I am fully conscious of their sorrow and tribulation in the fate of their next of kin. I would like to pay tribute to the authorities of the city of Toronto for the magnificent way in which they marshalled their various emergency organizations to give assistance in connection with this tragedy and to alleviate, as far as is possible in such circumstances, the physical and mental burden of those afflicted.

As soon as the extent of the tragedy became known, I immediately appointed Captain W. N. Morrison, supervising examiner of masters and mates, Toronto, to hold a preliminary inquiry under the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act. He will be assisted in his duties by Captain G. L. C. Johnson, assistant to the supervisor of the nautical division here in Ottawa. The inquiry was started this morning in Toronto. Also under the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act I have appointed Hon. Mr. Justice R. L. Kellock, of the Supreme Court of Canada, to act as commissioner in a formal investigation which will be proceeded with as soon as it is humanly possible to get it under way.

I would like to inform the public in both the United States and Canada that I examined the report of the steamship inspection of S.S. Noronic and found that the vessel had complied with the steamship requirements of the Canada Shipping Act. On April 23 the master of the ship was given his certificate authorizing him to operate the vessel on the great lakes and connecting waters, carrying up to 600 passengers and 200 of a crew. This certificate is issued after it has been found that the engines, boilers, fire extinguishing equipment and life saving apparatus are operating efficiently and in accordance with the act. The report also indicated that the owners had installed a new fire alarm system. The certificate issued by the steamship inspection service of the Department of Transport is recognized by the United States coastguard service. I am also advised that when the S.S. Noronic called at a United States port early in the navigation season, a representative of the United States coastguard inspected the ship, and as he was satisfied with the condition of the ship, he likewise issued a certificate under the provisions of the United States act. I think I should state that the owners of the vessel had complied with the requirements of the Canada Shipping Act and of the United States coastguard inspection service in so far as it applied to Canadian ships.

This terrible disaster is of such gravity that it has been considered advisable to appoint a justice of the Supreme Court of Canada to hold an inquiry. As the investigation will be proceeding immediately, it would be improper for me to make any further statement at this time. However, the inquiry will be a public one at which all the facts will be fully disclosed, and if there is any blame or negligence on the part of anyone, it will be brought to light.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I should like to ask the minister one question. Why is not the inquiry into this terrible disaster in one of our harbours, to a guest ship which had rights and privileges not allowed to our Canadian shipping, being held under the Inquiries Act rather than by officials of the department?—because that is what it is. It is in the public interest that the investigation should be under the federal Inquiries Act.

S.S. Noronic

I suggest also that the minister should ask that services be held in our churches next Sunday to express our sorrow at the disaster and our appreciation of what we owe to the people of the United States.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if the hon. member was able to hear the statement I made about the appointment of a commissioner under the Canada Shipping Act. Such a commissioner has the same power as a commissioner appointed under the Inquiries Act.

Mr. Church: The investigation should be under the Inquiries Act. It would be a much wider investigation than one made under the Canada Shipping Act. I know the minister is not to be blamed for everything—far from it; but a royal commission should be appointed. There should not be merely an inquiry by officials of the department.

Mr. Chevrier: The Canada Shipping Act provides for both a preliminary and a formal investigation, and both are being carried out in this case.

Mr. Fraser: Has consideration been given to compelling passenger ships to use flash- or fire-resistant paint in the interiors instead of ordinary oil paint?

Mr. Chevrier: The steamship inspection branch of the department has given consideration to that from time to time. I understand that in the United States, following the disaster to the Morro Castle, consideration was given to the passing of regulations to that effect.

Mr. Fraser: Is it not compulsory?

Mr. Chevrier: So far as I know, no such regulations have been put into effect in this country.

Mr. Fraser: I think the minister should put them into effect.

NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL

COMMUNIQUÉ WITH RESPECT TO PROCEEDINGS OF FIRST SESSION—ESTABLISHMENT OF DEFENCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) told the house on Friday, September 16, the first meeting of the North Atlantic council was held in Washington on September 17. The council approved a communiqué which I now have the honour to table. Because of its importance and interest I believe it would meet the wishes of hon. members if it were printed in Votes and Proceedings.

At its first meeting on September 17 the council also established a defence committee in accordance with article 9 of the treaty. This defence committee will be composed of the defence ministers of all the signatory states. It is expected that the first meeting of the defence committee will be held at Washington on October 5.

SUPREME COURT ACT

VARIOUS AMENDMENTS—ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of this bill is to create in the Supreme Court of Canada ultimate exclusive appellate jurisdiction by abolishing appeals to the privy council and making the judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada final and conclusive.

Mr. Church: You mean statutory appeals only, and not appeals of grace to the King, which cannot be abolished; but the bill does not say so.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PUBLIC WORKS

POST OFFICE BUILDINGS—WINNIPEG AND PETERBOROUGH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether construction of the new general post office in Winnipeg will be undertaken soon.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I shall look at the file and tell my hon. friend exactly where the matter stands.

Mr. Fraser: When the minister is looking that up will he also find out and tell me when he is going to start the one in Peterborough?

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REMOVAL OF OPERATING HEADQUARTERS FROM WINNIPEG TO MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the repeated representations that have been made to me by my constituents about the transfer of T.C.A. personnel from Winnipeg to Montreal, will the minister be prepared to make a statement in the near future?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall be glad to obtain the required information from Winnipeg and make a statement in due course.

IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED

QUESTION AS TO ROUTING OF PROPOSED PIPE LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the government received any representations from western Canada asking that Imperial Oil Limited be directed to build its oil pipe line through Canadian territory to Port Arthur instead of south to a terminal at Superior, Wisconsin? Has the government considered the matter, and if so, has a final decision been reached?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have received representations from Fort William and Port Arthur, as well as from a number of surrounding municipalities. I should like to point out, however, that, by virtue of the pipe lines bill which was passed by the House of Commons at the last session, all jurisdiction over the routing and location of pipe lines was placed in the hands of the board of transport commissioners. The board held hearings at which representations were received from the lakehead, and a decision of the board has been rendered approving the route as filed by Imperial Oil Limited.

Mr. Thatcher: Has the minister issued a licence to this particular company to export oil?

Mr. Howe: Yes. The Department of Trade and Commerce, as a matter of ordinary routine, has issued a licence under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, which permits the company to export oil for reimport into its refinery at Sarnia.

Mr. Thatcher: Then the decision is final.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, September 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Boisvert for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to extend my warmest congratulations to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on his elevation to the position he now occupies. No higher honour can come to any Canadian than to be chosen, by the free decision of the people of this country, for the high office of first minister. As I said on another occasion, he has every reason to be satisfied with the decisive support he has received from every part of Canada. No matter how much many of us may have wished that the results had been somewhat different, I sincerely extend to him my best wishes for his health and happiness in carrying out the heavy responsibilities of his great office. Whatever differences of opinion there may be from time to time as to the way in which the business of our country should be carried on, I am sure there will be general agreement that he will occupy that office with distinction, and with credit to himself, his race, his profession, and the historic party which he leads.

No matter how much some of us may have preferred to see a different disposition of the seating arrangements in this chamber, we can all sincerely thank God that we do live in a country in which decisions of this kind are made by a free people, who will be equally free to make other decisions on other occasions in the future.

I wish also to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Boisvert) and the seconder (Mr. Laing) of the motion now before us—and I do so, Mr. Speaker, not as a matter of mere formal expression. Each discharged in an able manner the responsibilities delegated to him, and each expressed that pride in the particular part of Canada he represents, which is in itself a source of strength to the whole nation. No matter what party we represent—and most certainly that representation is overwhelmingly one way—we do collectively, by the choice of the electors, represent all the people in every part of Canada. They have made their decision, and we are gathered here to do the business of those people, who are fully represented by those who sit in this House of Commons. It will certainly add greatly to the strength of Canada as a whole when every member has the feeling of pride and affection for the constituency he represents which was so unreservedly expressed and so well exemplified in the words of the mover and the seconder of this motion.

May I say something at this point about the announcement made a few moments ago by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). As leader of the opposition I wish to join with him and with the other members of this house in expressing deep regret not only that such a dreadful tragedy should have occurred, but also that it should have involved so many of our friendly neighbours who visit Canada in large numbers and whose constant movement back and forth is one of the factors contributing to the deep understanding which exists between the two countries.

The announcement that inquiries are already under way to determine the cause of the disaster will undoubtedly be reassuring. They will serve the purpose of determining in what way the repetition of such a calamity may be prevented. It would be unfortunate indeed if there were any fear on the part of those using our lake ships that such a tragedy might occur again. Undoubtedly it will be conducive to the continued use of the many ships which carry visitors to Canada, as well as our own people, to know what steps will be taken following the inquiry to strengthen the various legislative measures which provide protection to travellers.

Perhaps a reason for special precaution in connection with ships which are primarily for summer use is the fact that their crews are not associated with them during the whole year. Without any suggestion that every member of the crew did not completely perform his task, it would seem that some special supervision might be required of ships which start their services in the early part of the summer and continue for only a few months, to ensure that every member of the crew has a knowledge of safety standards and the handling of passengers. In making these remarks, I do not feel that I have transgressed the boundaries which are imposed by the fact that an inquiry is now under way by one of the most eminent jurists of the country.

It is only natural that in the speech from the throne there should be little that is new, because, although this is a new parliament, a session at this time is necessary only because the business of the house had not been finished at the time of dissolution. It will be a pleasing and unusual novelty that nearly all —though certainly not all—the statements in the speech from the throne will receive the support of most members of the house. Those that are new are referred to so briefly and in such general terms that they can be much better discussed when legislation is introduced which will set forth in exact terms what the government has in mind. This is particularly true of the reference to procedure for changing the constitution. I am sure that every hon. member of this house will warmly approve the proposal to consult the provincial governments in regard to the procedure by which amendments to our constitution should be made. There is some suggestion, however, that this consultation will relate only to that part of the procedure which would affect limited fields of provincial jurisdiction. I earnestly hope that there will be consultation with the provincial governments before any proposal is put forward to settle the procedure for the amendment of our constitution.

That constitution is necessarily one and indivisible. In a great many instances the borderline between national and provincial jurisdiction is not too clear. This is perfectly natural. The constitution was framed at a time when many of the most important activities of this country had not even taken form. For this reason many of the appeals to the privy council have been for the purpose of determining whether a particular subject fell within the national or the provincial field of jurisdiction. This being so, I urge the government not to make an attempt to draw a distinction between a national and a provincial authority in any of those doubtful areas, or, in fact, to take any step which would have the effect of changing our constitution, without first consulting the provincial governments and obtaining their views. Under any federal system the procedure by which amendment to the constitution is to take place, and the determination from time to time of the expanding responsibilities of all governments, are of the utmost importance. It is not so much a question of who has the power or who has the authority; it is a question of how this can best be done. Agreement as to the procedure is of particular importance in Canada because of the special circumstances under which the provinces joined to form one nation.

As the details are not before us, it will be more satisfactory to discuss this subject when the legislation is before us; but once again I urge upon the government the importance of consulting the provincial governments before this parliament is called upon to make any decision which would have the effect of changing our basic constitution. There never was a time when the avoidance of any possible misunderstanding in regard to a matter of this kind was of more importance to the future of this country than it is today.

One subject referred to in the speech from the throne is of paramount importance. There is a brief reference to the currency situation. The real problem is, of course, world trade and the necessity for finding satisfactory means by which the currencies of different countries can be used effectively for the purposes of international trade.

The past week has in many ways been the most eventful since the end of the war. A week ago today the conference between the foreign and finance ministers of Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States terminated in Washington. From Tuesday to Friday representatives of forty-eight member countries attended meetings of the international bank and monetary fund. While many subjects were under consideration, it was obvious that the primary subject was the closing of the dollar gap. On Saturday the foreign ministers of the twelve countries in the Atlantic pact took steps to organize the Atlantic pact council. Yesterday Great Britain announced the bold and generally unexpected decision to change the value of the pound for the purposes of international trading from $4.03 to $2.80. Each of those events was directly related to the other, and each had an impact upon the other. Each will have a profound effect on the future of all free nations of the world.

When the ten-point recovery plan was announced at the end of the Washington conference it was difficult for those who were gaining their information from the press and the radio to find reasons for the optimism expressed by those who had attended the conference. Important though the decisions were, and gratifying though it was to see a unanimous plan of this kind produced, the ten points put forward did not seem to solve the really fundamental problems, and some of them would in any event take many years to work out. It is now apparent that the confidence expressed related to the fact that the decisions of those attending the conference were to be followed by a revaluation of the currency in many countries for the purposes of international exchange.

This is at least a first step on the road towards flexible international exchange which will facilitate free movement of goods and commodities from one country to another under normal trading practices. It does seem clear that the international value placed on the pound sterling is an attempt to estimate the actual present value of the pound in international trading. It is to be hoped that this is merely the beginning of a more flexible procedure, and some measure of continuing adjustment to actual international exchange values, as was intended when the world bank and the international monetary fund were set up.

Quite apart from any detailed results which may flow from the A.B.C. conference, as it has already come to be called, there was one great achievement which will undoubtedly bring satisfaction to everyone; its importance cannot possibly be overestimated. There is no doubt that the efficacy of the Atlantic pact rests upon the economic strength of the nations who have joined together in order to preserve peace. Their unity depends, however, upon something more than trade and economic stability. It depends also on mutual good will, friendship, and understanding. There is no escaping the fact that during the latter weeks of the summer there had been alarming suggestions of increasing friction between the United States and Great Britain, growing out of the economic problem. I am not suggesting that there was any evidence of friction between the governments, but there certainly was some reason for concern about the increasing misunderstanding between many of the people in those two countries. If this friction had become a reality, it might have threatened the whole future of the North Atlantic pact, because the wholehearted friendship of the United States and Great Britain is the very foundation of that great fellowship.

Much has been accomplished, and undoubtedly now that the facts are more fully known it certainly will be agreed that more has been accomplished than was originally thought; but if nothing else had emerged from the Washington conference which terminated a week ago than the clear evidence of harmony and good will among Canada, Great Britain and the United States, that meeting would still have been a very great achievement at this particular time. In bringing about this measure of friendly understanding of their mutual problems, Canada's representatives played a part which will, I am sure, meet with the approbation of Canadians generally in every part of the country.

It is important that we remember, however, that dramatic and far-reaching as were the decisions announced yesterday, and important though the decisions may be that will be announced by the Canadian government later today, this is only the beginning of the solution of our major problem, gratifying as the steps already taken may appear to be. Although the government of the United Kingdom expresses confidence that the revaluation of the pound will greatly expand Britain's export trade, the problem still remains of finding a way in which Britain and the other sterling countries can purchase our products. Undoubtedly the intention and the hope in this decision is that this change will make it possible for Britain to export more dollar-earning goods. But still dollars must be earned, and therefore it is only the first step and not the ultimate solution of the problem itself.

Much of what Britain has been buying from us had depended upon the availability of ECA funds. It is expected that those funds will no longer be available after 1952. In the meantime the amount available is steadily diminishing. It is not to be expected that the United States, enormous though their production power may be, can long continue to assume the tremendous international burden which they have assumed during the years since the war. Therefore everything that is now done, every plan that is now examined and considered, should in caution be based upon the assumption that the funds will no longer be available after 1952, and that in any event a diminishing amount of these funds will be available for purchases in Canada by Marshall Plan countries.

There has been a tendency for Canadians to feel that this is a problem remote from us, that it is a problem affecting Great Britain alone, and that we can stand back and hope to see them find a solution to their own problem. But we Canadians are not on the sidelines. This is not merely a problem of dollar shortage in Great Britain. We must sell in the export markets of the world if we are to survive. Our economy is a delicate and very highly specialized one. No other country has greater opportunities for the future than we have to sell our goods in the markets of the world. No other country has greater concern about the solution of this problem, which, as I said before, is not a problem of dollars, but a problem of world trade. It is a problem that affects us almost as directly as it does the people of Great Britain. If Britain is short of dollars, then we lose our established market for a very large part of our products of the farms, the forests, the mines and the sea.

It cannot be repeated too often that jobs on the farm, in the factory, the forest, the mine or anywhere else in Canada depend upon trade and the money which comes from that trade. There is only one sure solution of our problem, and that is to bring about as soon as possible an interchangeability of currency which will give us the widest possible markets, not only in Great Britain but throughout the whole sterling area. The revaluation of the pound and other European currencies marks a vitally important step in the history of the economic problems of the past few years. The next step, and one which the Canadian government should explore in every possible way with the government of the United Kingdom, is to find some means by which the Canadian dollar and the pound may be freely interchangeable. This is no suggestion outside of the realm of practical international exchange or operation. It was the clearly stated intention of the international monetary fund. Every effort should be directed toward the taking of that second step, which is quite as important in its ultimate results as the first.

There has been a tendency to look upon increased exports to the United States as a satisfactory substitute for exports to Great Britain and other countries overseas. I am sure that all Canadians want to see exports to the United States increased to the highest possible level. One thing we must remember, however, is that the whole system of transportation and distribution is designed to handle an enormous overseas trade. Our railways, our seaports, our shipping, and all the many services associated with them, as well as the municipal organization of the seaports themselves, depend upon continued trade overseas. There is no more important task facing the government than that of taking such steps as will ensure the maintenance and expansion of that overseas trade. Primarily this means trade arrangements, through some adjustment of the financial problem, with Great Britain; because the solution of the exchange problem with Great Britain will carry with it the solution of the exchange problem throughout the rest of the sterling area.

There is an added reason why a solution to this problem must be found. Competition is becoming keener every day. Many products which we have been able to sell almost without competition since the end of the war must now be sold in competition with the products of countries which are rapidly restoring themselves to pre-war levels of production, or even higher.

It is necessary for Canadians to remember that there are two nations which present a very real question mark in this whole matter, namely, Germany and Japan. Now that western Germany has been established as a nation, there will be increasing insistence upon their right to trade freely with other nations. The Germans have great industrial skill. The world has had much too tragic evidence of that fact to make any emphasis of it necessary. Already a number of their products are being sold in Canada. It is difficult to see how Germany can be excluded from some measure of free competitive trading, unless she is to be held down to a point which might encourage the spread of communism, which the western powers are trying so hard to prevent. Undoubtedly this will be a problem calling for the utmost wisdom on the part of those who are supervising the rebirth of what, it is hoped, will be a free and democratic German nation.

All these remarks would apply with almost the same force to Japan. We had evidence of Japan's great industrial skill. Small though it may be, the products of that country are beginning to re-appear in Canada. They too have a very high degree of skill. In years gone by they demonstrated their willingness to put every effort into export trade; and if they are given an opening to the markets of the western world, undoubtedly they will sell at prices which will make competition increasingly strong.

Then there are the great industrial nations of Europe. Although Czechoslovakia is behind the iron curtain, she is selling to the western world; and we know that she too has high industrial skills. Czechoslovakia, so long as she is permitted to sell to the western world, will provide extremely keen competition.

It seems to me all this points to the fact that as soon as possible we must get ourselves out of the strait-jacket of controlled international trading. If we are to meet the kind of competition growing up in the sterling area; if we are to meet the kind of competition emerging from the revitalization and recovery of so many of the industrial nations devastated by war, we Canadians, who have demonstrated our ability and our skill, must be free to go out and meet that competition by vigorous and effective salesmanship, as we have done in the past. We have the very best of natural products. Nature has endowed our soil with qualities which give us special advantages in many types of production. Canadians have demonstrated their industrial skill; and I should think there is a general belief that Canadians can sell against any type of competition if their salesmen are free to go out and sell by ordinary selling methods.

Now that the first step has been taken by so many countries to make international currency an effective vehicle for promoting international trade, I urge the government to do everything in its power to find a way of taking the second step, at least so far as Canada is concerned, within the sterling area.

I am sure every hon. member will hope that the bold decision taken by the British government will bring the results they expect. To a very great extent the whole problem has resulted from the enormous sacrifices made by the people of Britain in two world wars. Canada stood beside them in both those struggles for the freedom of all mankind. But because there was a wide ocean between us and Europe, we did not in the same way feel the direct physical impact upon our soil. It may sometimes be forgotten that the only nation in the world outside Germany which felt the full physical impact of those two wars was Britain. And Britain has paid an enormous price for its contribution to the survival of freedom.

This country has demonstrated in many ways its sympathy with their situation, and its willingness to assist Britain in meeting its problems. No matter what hon. members may feel about the details of the procedure to be followed, I am sure all of them will hope that Great Britain, as a result of the steps she has taken, will be in a position to meet the problems which lie ahead.

It is not my intention to move an amendment—and not only because it would obviously be defeated by an overwhelming vote. After all, the voting strength of the government is not the factor which determines the duties of the opposition or influences the introduction of an amendment seeking to express a certain opinion and to call for an expression of opinion by hon. members of the house. The truth is that rarely indeed has any government in Canada been in such a commanding position to carry its own motions. This government has just had a decisive vote of confidence from the people of Canada. For that reason I believe the introduction of an amendment would serve no useful purpose. Perhaps I may be permitted to add, however, that the introduction of amendments during the present session will not be influenced by the fact that we may well anticipate what the nature of the vote may be.

By the very size of its majority in the house, the government has assumed a great trust and a great responsibility. Because of the mandate so freshly given to it to speak on behalf of the people of Canada, the government is in a most favourable position to participate in the international discussions that are taking place. I hope this great trust and responsibility will be carried out in the best interests of the people of Canada.

Under our democratic system, the opposition, too, has a great trust. We will fulfil that trust to the best of our ability. It is in that sense that we will take our part in the debates of the house—not only as the representatives of the 1,742,000 Canadian voters who supported the Progressive Conservative party, but also with a realization of the responsibility, which I am sure is shared by all members of the opposition, of all parties, to demonstrate that our people in Canada do not believe in a one-party system, and that a vigilant, vigorous and effective opposition is an essential part of our Canadian parliamentary procedure.

I would hope that my omitting to deal with any particular subject mentioned in the speech from the throne will not be taken as approval or otherwise of the measures proposed. I have mentioned that there are a number of subjects which are stated in very general terms, and which are very important; but it will be much more satisfactory to deal with them when the legislation is before the house and the way in which the government proposes to deal with them is known to the members of the opposition as well as to the government.

With its great majority the government is in a position to give leadership at this extremely critical time. As Canadians we have been very fortunate, but there can be no escaping the fact that we are passing through a grave period in the world's history. When I speak of an opportunity to give leadership, I mean especially leadership in the international field. The solution of the problems which will face us in the comparatively near future, if all our hopes for recovery from the war and the preservation of peace by the combined strength of free nations are not to be shattered, depends upon vision, depends upon boldness, depends upon willingness to try new courses in meeting those tasks. It calls for confidence on the part of the government in our own great future, which is so clearly before the eyes of every Canadian who has had an opportunity to see Canada as a whole.

As I said a few moments ago, we will seek to fulfil our historic obligation as the official opposition in this house. In meeting the tasks which must be undertaken, and in seeking solutions of the many grave and important problems which must be solved, we will at all times offer constructive criticism and constructive suggestions, and we will be ready to help the government in every way that this can be done by the members of His Majesty's loyal opposition.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first of all may I once more express my best wishes to you and my congratulations upon the distinguished manner in which you have begun the discharge of your duties. I should like also to express very sincere thanks to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) for the chivalrous and kind remarks with which he opened his address this afternoon. I thank him personally for his wishes of good health, which I reciprocate. I think both of us come before our colleagues of the house this afternoon with some evidence that there is a prospect of those wishes being realized.

It is gratifying that, whatever the result of an appeal to the people may be, those who made that appeal, and who have come here as a consequence of their electors' response, should feel that they have a responsibility not only to those who supported them, to the members of their party, but also to the people of Canada as a whole. I can give the leader of the opposition the assurance that at all times we will endeavour as best we can to serve the interests of all Canadians. I am sure that the constructive criticism which he has promised to offer as occasion may arise will also be offered in the hope that it will be of benefit to the entire public.

I have much pleasure in joining with him in extending congratulations to the mover (Mr. Boisvert) and the seconder (Mr. Laing) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. These newly elected members have delivered their maiden speeches. We who have been here before know that it is a pretty trying experience to speak for the first time in the House of Commons, and we realize that when such an event takes place at the opening of a new parliament the difficulties are increased by that circumstance. I am sure we are all proud of the admirable manner in which these two new members, the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska and the hon. member for Vancouver South, spoke in moving and seconding the address.

As to my friend the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska, those of us who had the privilege of following all his remarks can testify to the fact that he acquitted himself in a fashion most creditable to his electors and to himself. He comes to the House of Commons with a sound reputation arising out of his achievements at the bar and in other fields, and I think we would all wish to say to him that he has added to that reputation by the manner in which, on Friday last, he moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Those of us who knew something of the background of the hon. member for the federal riding of Vancouver South were not surprised to hear the address which he delivered. To those of us who have recently seen the part of the country from which he comes, it was no surprise to hear him extol its beauties and resources. The hon. member for Vancouver South has not only taken an active interest in the affairs of his local community, which he served from an early age, and in a distinguished manner, before coming here. Not all but a good many of us on both sides of the house appreciate the fact that for a long time he has been taking a keen interest in the organization work of the Liberal party in his native province.

Those of us who heard these hon. members, all feel, I have no doubt, that they are to be commended for their broad grasp of public questions as well as for their vision. They have impressed us by the fact that they come here with confidence and look forward to a future in which they hope to have some part in realizing the happy prospect referred to this afternoon by the leader of the opposition as the ultimate destiny of the Canadian nation.

No doubt, as the leader of the opposition has said, it will be more helpful and more pertinent to discuss the matters referred to in the speech from the throne when the measures dealing with them come up for detailed consideration. I am sure that all will agree with that. I shall refer only briefly, as the leader of the opposition has done, to some of the measures forecast in the speech from the throne.

First of all, the hon. gentleman referred to that portion of the speech which forecasts a measure to further the constitutional development of our institutions as fitting for those of a completely autonomous nation. He expressed the hope that that could be achieved without provoking any clash with the authorities of our Canadian provinces and also the hope that there would be no attempt to draw that rather shadowy line between matters that may be of special concern to the federal government and parliament and those other matters which may be the exclusive concern of the provinces or the joint concern of both the federal and the provincial authorities. He said that he hoped that that might be arrived at by consultation with the provinces.

I would be most happy, indeed, if I could expect such a result could be achieved in any short period of time, but I am afraid that it will be a considerable undertaking. Not because there would, on either side, be any effort to obtain an advantage one over the other but because of the realization which we all must have that anything which is done in that respect is done for a long period ahead and to serve a constantly enlarging Canadian nation. Having that responsibility, no one can easily contemplate giving any consent or acquiescence which might under any possible circumstances take from one or the other of those authorities something which it would otherwise have enjoyed.

But there are other ways in which this tenuous or shadowy divisional line may be pointed out or marked, and these ways have been followed since the earliest days of confederation. I refer to the judicial process. I think it will be a prudent course to have the language used indicate that there will be ample opportunity for anyone who may feel that anything which is being attempted does not come within that language to challenge its correctness before the courts of justice and have them determine whether what is proposed is something which is exclusively of federal concern, exclusively of provincial concern, or of joint concern to both the provincial and the federal authorities. I hope we shall be able to dispel any feeling that there is an attempt to settle by legislation something which could more properly be determined by judicial process.

The hon. gentleman dealt with the situation in which the world finds itself, and to which reference is made in the speech from the throne in the declaration that the ultimate aim of the Canadian government is to move toward that situation where trading nations can engage freely in mutual trade under a multilateral system. There is no doubt that currency is a medium of international trade, and I think it is obvious that there is a serious sterling-dollar problem which has been an impediment to the restoration of that trade in which this nation has perhaps a greater proportionate interest than any of the nations with whom we have been discussing these problems.

I tried to realize for my own benefit, and to point out to some of those to whom I was speaking the other day, the extent to which we are interested in international trade. I got figures from our statistical department showing that our exports were of the general order of $3,000 million. I told those to whom I was speaking that I had never seen a billion dollars nor even a million dollars. In order to get some conception of what such a figure means I have tried to reduce it to a simpler form. A simple calculation has shown me that for every family of five in this Canadian nation we are required to sell something over $1,200 worth of our surplus in order to continue to live as we have been living in the past. I would be surprised if there were any of those with whom we have been discussing these problems who find it necessary to export such a large proportion of their surplus as is required to be done by this country in order to maintain the level of welfare for its people.

As the leader of the opposition stated, during the last week most important international meetings have been held and well-intentioned efforts made to remove the impediment to world trade resulting from this sterling-dollar problem. I think the hon. gentleman was quite right in pointing out that such solutions as have to be envisaged must be predicated on the statement that was made in the communiqué issued by the ministers of finance at Washington, that by the middle of 1952 no more extraordinary help will be coming from the North American countries. That being so, it is quite apparent that we have all got to work toward a situation where the earning of dollars by sterling countries, or those tied closely to sterling as their main currency, must become sufficient to enable them to secure from us the things that they need and want from us, the things it is very important for us to be able to sell to them, the things for which we have no immediate use in our own economy.

I should not like in any way to say anything which would anticipate what my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), will be communicating to this house this evening, but I can give hon. members the assurance that all those factors are very much in our minds in the consideration we are giving to what action, if any, is required at the present time from Canada in view of the announcement made by the United Kingdom and followed by so many others yesterday and today.

I believe that, with the leader of the opposition, we are all satisfied that this Washington conference proved conclusively that, when men of good will meet and frankly expose what they believe to be the causes of the difficulties which are to be overcome, their very frankness is evidence of the degree to which they can have confidence in each other and to which they will contribute to the best possible solution of those difficulties. We were all, of course, rather scandalized at the tone of some of the comments on both sides of the ocean during the last few weeks concerning the attitude of the other. I am confident that what has taken place from the time the President of the United States made his speech a couple of weeks ago and preparations were actively undertaken to bring about this meeting in Washington, as well as during the course of the meeting itself, demonstrates that reasonable minded people in the three nations—who are the vast majority—recognize the inevitable nature of the difficulties which have arisen. These difficulties they regard as facts, not as faults to be attributed to any of them.

I am sure what has been accomplished does, to a degree, implement that which the government had in mind in expressing the view that the economic stability of the western world was extremely important, as important possibly to resisting and therefore deterring aggression as military strength itself. Within the last week, I believe, reasons have been given, first of all by the representatives of the United Kingdom, United States and Canada, then by those who attended the meeting of the international monetary fund and, last but not least, by those who attended the meeting to implement the causes and purposes of the North Atlantic treaty, why aggression would be resisted, could be resisted, and therefore will not be undertaken.

Now, the hon. gentleman has said that many of these difficulties arise out of the great sacrifices made by the United Kingdom in two world wars. I am sure all of us have the greatest possible admiration for what was done in those two world wars, and the greatest desire to understand the lasting effects of those sacrifices as well as the conditions they have created and the necessity imposed upon us all to co-operate for the alleviation of the consequences of those conditions. Whatever decisions any of us have to make should properly be conditioned by our appreciation of the manner in which our share of this tremendous job of putting the world back on its feet can be done and will be done. I am sure that, although we will not be claiming we are giving leadership, we will not be found wanting in our willingness to do our part, as we have done in the past.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): First, I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Boisvert) and the seconder (Mr. Laing) of the address. I have been here on a number of occasions when that has been done and I say most sincerely that I do not think two new members ever acquitted themselves better than the two hon. gentlemen who respectively moved and seconded the address.

I should like to associate ourselves, too, with the leader of the opposition and the other members of the house in expressing our sympathy with those who suffered loss and the relatives of those who died in the tragic event which occurred at Toronto last week. I suggest to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) that every consideration should be given during this inquiry to the strengthening of the legislation, if necessary, and the supervision of the building and equipping of our ships in order that such an event may not occur again.

On June 27 the Canadian people elected this parliament and the government received an overwhelming majority at the polls. On behalf of my colleagues as well as of myself, I should like to join in congratulating the Prime Minister personally upon that victory. As an older member of this house who has sat in parliament during the past fourteen years, may I say this to the new members. Whatever we thought of the government's policies, we always appreciated the unfailing courtesy and consideration the Prime Minister extended to every member of this house. I wish to join with everyone in wishing him health and happiness in the high office to which he has been called.

May I say of my own party that we are a democratic party and, as such, we accept the verdict of the people as delivered at the polls. We believe our policies and our program are sound. The election showed we have a substantial following in Canada. We are certain that, as in so many other respects, time will justify many of the proposals we have made from time to time as well as during the course of the general election. As for our policy in this house, we shall continue to do as we have done in the past: to advocate progressive measures and policies in the interests of the whole country and to support every proposal, no matter from where it comes, which seems to tend towards better conditions for the Canadian people. We shall oppose anything that we believe will restrict their freedom and their opportunities.

The overwhelming support accorded the government places an obligation upon the Liberal party to fulfil, during the lifetime of this parliament, the promises which the party has made for many years and which, in a number of instances, remain as yet unfulfilled. I would remind the government that we still lack a national social security plan, including national health facilities as free to all our people as are the public schools to our children. That is a target at which this parliament must aim. The senior citizens of our country, as the old age pensioners are now often called, still await the fulfilment of the specific promises made in the government's manifesto of 1945 and repeated on many platforms during the election period, for a national old age pension plan without a means test.

I could enumerate, of course, other promises we regard as unfulfilled pledges. But with the overwhelming following which the government has in this house, there can now be no excuse for delay in bringing down the necessary legislation to implement the promises and the pledges that have been made to the Canadian electorate from time to time.

Looking at the speech from the throne, we find that it foreshadows a great deal of important legislation and it would seem to involve a heavier and a longer session than some observers thought likely before the house was called. Before parliament was dissolved in April last, the budget resolutions had not been considered. Little discussion of the estimates had taken place. The house had granted interim supply to the government to enable it to carry on the business of the country until the end of this month. One of the present duties of this parliament is of course to scrutinize the expenditures of the government and to provide money to carry on its business in the future. I think it is our duty to scrutinize carefully the expenditures made, and I suggest that the public accounts committee should be called early this session so that past expenditures may be more thoroughly scrutinized than they have been in some former sessions.

The speech from the throne records the presence in this parliament of representatives from the new province of Newfoundland. We join most heartily in welcoming them as members of this House of Commons, and in expressing the belief that the entry of Newfoundland into confederation will prove beneficial to the people of old Canada, to the new province of Newfoundland, and indeed to the new confederation. In this session of parliament in which for the first time are united all the scattered British colonies of North America, as I believe they were called at the time of the Quebec conference, it is fitting that we should consider ways and means of rounding out our nationhood so that it will be more complete than it has been in the past.

In the same spirit we welcome the decision of the government to consult with the provinces at an early date with a view to agreeing upon an appropriate procedure for making within Canada such amendments to the constitution as may be necessary from time to time. We agree with the statement to this effect in the speech from the throne and trust that the hopes held out for the success of such a conference will prove to have been well founded.

The speech from the throne also expresses the hope for world peace and security under the auspices of the United Nations, and specifically and correctly states that the hopes we held in 1945 and the years that immediately followed have not been fulfilled. We believe of course that the fear of military aggression has been minimized by the North Atlantic agreement, but we urge the government to continue every effort to bring into effect the security provisions of the United Nations charter, thus relieving Canada—as I remember the Prime Minister stated before the assembly in 1946—and all the other nations from the crushing burden of national defence and rearmament, and releasing for us the means of improving in so many respects the conditions of our own Canadian people. After all, the best insurance against war is a healthy social and economic structure enjoyed by all our people. It is of the utmost importance that we shall do everything we can to improve the economic and social well-being of our people and of the north Atlantic community. But it is equally important—and in some respects perhaps more important—that the economic health and well-being of the peoples of Asia and of the world generally shall be promoted in every possible way in order to remove the economic causes of war and the discontent which fosters the spread of totalitarianism in any form.

Canada has been a direct beneficiary of the economic aid which the United States has given to the European nations. Without that aid our own position economically would be vastly different from what it is today. Indeed, the provision of United States dollars for the purchase of Canadian wheat by the United Kingdom enables us to market a large quantity of that commodity this very crop year. United States aid to Europe has enabled Canada to maintain a considerable amount of economic stability which, incidentally, is as vital to our own country as it is to the economy of the European nations. When we remember that some $800 million of Marshall aid, so-called, will be spent in Canada during the next year, we can understand why, in common with the United States, we have been able to maintain an unexpectedly high level of employment and trade—and I use the word "unexpectedly" advisedly, because I remember the report of the James commission, the government's own commission, which was placed before this house in the late years of the war, which predicted considerable post-war unemployment. Happily this has not yet materialized.

But it is authoritatively stated that this United States aid will end within the next three years. It is therefore the obligation of the government and of this parliament to review all our commercial policies with a view to protecting the Canadian economy against the difficulties which are almost certain to arise when this aid ends. In spite of the search for alternative markets for Canadian products, our best and most stable market for our wheat, fish, fruit, lumber and a good many other surplus commodities, both now and in the future, is bound to be in the United Kingdom. As we have been reminded during the last few hours, the position of that country has changed fundamentally because of the loss of overseas investments and of shipping in two world wars, a condition to which both the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) properly referred. If we are to market vast quantities of Canadian goods in the United Kingdom, it is vitally necessary that we increase our imports from that country. Under the new circumstances that have arisen, we cannot expect the United Kingdom to buy some $700 million worth of goods in a twelve-month period, while we, Canada, take from her in return less than $400 million worth of imports in the same period. The United Kingdom cannot find the dollars unless of course we are prepared to accept sterling, freeze it, or invest it in the sterling area or the British colonial possessions.

With regard to our imports of British goods, over the week end we have seen some steps taken by the United Kingdom to enable her to market more goods in North America. I am not going to discuss them now because they will be before us in more detail tonight, I presume, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) speaks. A great deal of discussion has taken place recently in Canada and the United States with regard to the increased cost of production of British goods and the necessarily higher prices charged for them abroad. If this is true, it seems to me that, apart from the currency matter, attention should be given by this parliament to a drastic reduction in Canadian tariffs against United Kingdom commodities in order to promote the exchange of goods between our two countries on a more even basis than in the past. For after all the old contention that Canadian industry requires protection from cheaper British goods, if it were ever valid, no longer has any basis in economic fact if the statements made regarding the costs of British goods are in any sense correct. We therefore urge the government to consider at this session a drastic reduction of tariffs as a major step in promoting Canada's trade with the United Kingdom.

I note that the speech from the throne speaks with a great deal of satisfaction about the international wheat agreement. Coming from the prairies, I welcome that particularly, and I believe that it should be welcomed by every hon. member of this house. But, when we see these agreements, they bring before us in a very concrete form the new pattern of world trade which is emerging among the nations. The old system of unplanned, unregulated, competitive and so-called multilateral trade has passed away, and a new form of trading relationship, based upon planning and co-operation among the nations, is taking its place. It is difficult sometimes to understand the interpretation placed upon that term, "multilateral trade", in this very modern and new setting. To some it seems to mean the old-fashioned laissez-faire system which some people think existed before the war, when indeed it did not exist. Yet the people who advocate in our country and elsewhere such a policy are often those who within the confines of their own countries and within Canada demand protection against foreign competition, and who have often succeeded in stifling all competition within their own domestic economy by building nation-wide monopolistic enterprises. In no country is this more true than in Canada. In the United States they have the Sherman anti-trust law. We have nothing comparable to it. It is true we have the Combines Investigation Act, but it is not in the same class as the anti-trust legislation in the United States. As those of us who were in the last house and saw the reports made by the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act know, we have no effective means of dealing with combines and with monopolistic practices in our own country.

In the speech from the throne the government emphasizes the necessity for international trade, and yet at the same time, for example through its tariff protection, and as of July 1, through its restoration of certain tariffs against British cotton and rayon piece goods, it aids powerful industry, and is endeavouring, it seems to me, to promote a certain type of national self-sufficiency. This policy, incidentally, was followed in the United States, which because of its wide and varied resources, enabled that country to establish self-sufficiency, an example which is being followed in many other countries of the world. Therefore it is the duty of this parliament to give close attention to economic policies which will expand rather than restrict our ability to trade with other nations of the world.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) pointed out a few moments ago, there is no country in the world so dependent, because of the peculiar type of our production and of our economy, on external trade and exports as we are in Canada. It is true that we should make every attempt to improve and increase our domestic consumption, but even if we increased our domestic consumption greatly we would still have vast surpluses which must be disposed of by export trade.

Now I want to turn to another problem which I think affects a good many of our people and which requires immediate attention. In the speech from the throne we are told that new legislation will be introduced to broaden the scope of the National Housing Act. As we have contended for some years, the need is for subsidized, adequate low-rental housing for the low income groups. That is made particularly necessary by the very high cost of living which is now, according to our bureau of statistics, at record heights. It is possible that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) may announce some dollar policy tonight—I do not know—involving further increases in living costs in this country. I do not propose to say anything further about that until I know what he has to say this evening.

Cases have been brought to my attention from time to time, and I am sure to the attention of every hon. member, of families, including many young war veterans, who are compelled to pay one-third or more of their meagre income for accommodation in what is often submarginal housing. Go around this city and you will find families with one room and a clothes closet turned into a little kitchen with an electric grill or oil stove. You will find them paying one-third of their income sometimes, particularly if they are students, for that kind of accommodation. When the government has provided housing as for instance for veterans, as in my constituency of Rosetown-Biggar in a suburb of Saskatoon, the quality has often been unsatisfactory. I use this as an example. Contractors from time to time—not always of course—have failed to live up to the specifications, and the veterans have sometimes been left to make expensive repairs in the first year or two of occupancy. In some cases inferior equipment has been installed and little or no redress has been forthcoming either from the contractor or from the responsible department of government. In Montgomery place, Saskatoon, hot-water tanks installed had not been in use for one year before they developed holes in the sides from poor quality or deterioration. Veterans and their families, with houses having ill-fitting doors and windows, doors and floors that sag, poor insulation, lacking eaves-troughing, and with no sidewalks to save them from the mud, have in my opinion a legitimate complaint against the failure of contractors or the government to live up to the specifications and proper standards. There has been inadequate planning for the comfort and convenience of residents in new districts of that sort.

As I said at the beginning, we believe that low-rental houses must be subsidized; there is no other way of dealing with the problem. But in the interests of health and of happiness, planning and construction should be given careful supervision in order that proper standards of building and equipment should be maintained.

I know that the project to which I have referred, and other projects of a similar sort, have been brought to the attention of the government from time to time, but in some instances—and in the instance to which I have referred—while some improvements have been made, they are insufficient to rectify entirely the unsatisfactory conditions. If public moneys are expended in the construction of homes, or financial guarantees given to investors and veterans, and others are forced by circumstances to purchase homes, then it is the duty of the government to exercise supervision and to rectify any defects in construction or material within a reasonable time of occupancy or sale.

A national subsidized housing program, then, as we have said for several years, is essential. But parliament must insist that the government should assume responsibility for the supervision of construction, and guarantee satisfaction to the purchaser or occupant. When I refer to the "government" I do not necessarily mean the federal authority. If it is a regional plan, then the responsible authority should see to it that these abuses do not occur.

One other point in connection with housing: meantime, the public must be protected against excessively high rentals by the continuance of rent controls. Indeed, persons who have been compelled by circumstances to rent new occupancy housing units should be given the right to appeal against unreasonable rents to which most—and again I say not all—have been subjected. Let me emphasize that this is particularly true in view of the spectacular heights to which living costs have risen since the removal of other beneficial subsidies and controls.

While the level of employment is high, there have been some disturbing lay-offs in Canada. Unemployment in the United States, we read, during the summer reached approximately 4,000,000, although there has been some seasonal diminution lately. We have no assurance, other than expenditures for European aid, that lay-offs will not increase in Canada during the next year or two. So that various public projects should be planned and undertaken to safeguard the people against such a condition.

Two of these are mentioned in the speech from the throne. Apart from the necessity of providing employment, these in my opinion are essential in any event. The two mentioned are the trans-Canada highway and forest conservation.

The wastage and depletion of our great forests has been for years a national disgrace. We shall await the government's proposals for conservation which we hope will do more than conserve in a narrow sense, and will be sufficiently comprehensive to include reforestation, afforestation and flood control, to be undertaken of course in co-operation with responsible provincial authorities. We would hope, too, that in co-operation with the provinces our forests may be planned, and that also there may be proper planning of their development, exploitation, or whatever appropriate word one might choose, so that future generations may not be denied what we have enjoyed.

The building of the trans-Canada highway is long overdue. Obviously this must be an all-Canadian project. Let me make the suggestion that a flat grant of money to the provinces on a percentage basis will not suffice. It seems to me that the federal highways plan in effect for many years in the United States should be considered and studied. The experience gained there should be used as a guide in this country.

The needs of the provinces vary: some are richer than others. Some of the provinces have great distances and sparse population, with consequently larger mileages per capita of all types of roads to build and to maintain. In other provinces there are mountain regions and soil conditions which would mean that the kind of highway the trans-Canada should be would prove a costly undertaking. Indeed it would be too costly for some of the less favoured provinces to bear. Those factors, as well as the choice of the best, most efficient and most economical route should be reviewed carefully by parliament as well as by a federal-provincial conference.

Now that the matter of Canada's right to amend her constitution has arisen, and we believe that the constitutional rights and privileges of the provinces must be recognized and protected, we believe that ways and means must be found by agreement to assist the provinces in improving other public facilities, particularly those having to do with education. A modern system of education involves large expenditures in plant and equipment, but of the most vital importance is the type of person engaged in the teaching profession. As I have good reason to know, unfortunately many of our most able, most gifted and best fitted young men and women either leave the profession or do not enter it because of the lack of opportunities and remuneration it offers. The limited financial resources of some of the provinces, and the communities comprising them, simply cannot cope with this situation. In the discussions with the provinces I should hope that some consideration would be given to the problem of providing federal aid for education in all its branches, without restricting the rights of the provinces in that regard.

Opportunities for discussing other aspects of the proposed constitutional changes will arise. Therefore I am not going to discuss them at greater length today. We shall await presentation of other matters mentioned in the speech from the throne, requiring consideration by the house, before attempting to discuss them. I see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his seat. Let me say to him that I hope the proposed amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act will increase the benefits and enlarge the scope so as to enable all farmers affected by crop failure to participate in the benefits of that act.

It has been said already this afternoon that opposition members in parliament have a most important function to perform. The Liberal party has been given an unprecedented mandate to govern this country. Under the circumstances, however, an alert and vigorous opposition becomes of the greatest importance. It has been said often that the best kind of government is the government that is a bit insecure in office. Having sat in several parliaments, I believe the best one in which I have served, because of the discussions which took place and the manner in which hon. members kept on their toes, was the last one, in which the government had a fairly slim majority.

Consequently in this parliament we find that more responsibility falls upon members of opposition parties. Though we are small in number, the C.C.F. will do its share in making critical examination of the government's proposals and activities and, as in the past, will continue to work for social and economic justice for all our people.

Because we believe there are certain specific measures which for some years had been promised by the Liberal party, I do not propose to follow the example of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and let this opportunity go by without offering some amendment. Therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I move this simple amendment:

That the following words be added to the motion: "We regret, however, that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to propose legislation to remove the means test from the old age pension."

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to join with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in expressing congratulations to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on the overwhelming victory which he won in the election last June. I thought that the leader of the opposition expressed that feeling of congratulation very graciously, and I sincerely join him in every word he said, and the things which he meant in that connection.

I should also like to express my sincere congratulations to the mover (Mr. Boisvert) and the seconder (Mr. Laing) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It has rarely been my privilege to listen to more eloquent and beautiful addresses in French and in English than I heard on Friday last. Without question you have brought to this house very high ability, and doubtless we shall hear more from you in the days to come.

I should also like to join in expressing sincere regret and sympathy to those who suffered as a result of that most incredible disaster which took place in Toronto harbour last Saturday. I say incredible because it seems almost beyond one's imagination to think that such a thing could happen right within the harbour of that great city. Knowing something about ships, it is difficult for me to understand just what caused such a terrible tragedy. I want to commend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) for his positive and swift action in ordering an inquiry into the disaster.

I also wish to say how happy I am to see in this house representatives of the newest province of Canada, Newfoundland, and also to see amongst those on the front benches a minister of the crown representing one of the ridings of that province. I join with other members in welcoming to the house these and all other new members, and I express the hope that they will enjoy their experiences here, the family squabbles along with the many instances of family accord that we shall have in the days to come.

I have been thinking of late, Mr. Speaker, about something which was drawn to my attention some weeks ago, and I thought that it was of sufficient importance to merit a place in what I shall say in the few minutes I shall speak this afternoon. I say few minutes advisedly. I am going to follow the example set by the leader of the opposition. I think he sensed that if he spoke too long this afternoon members might feel that he should take some of the feathers out of the wings of his imagination and put them into the tail of his discretion. I noticed that his brief but very fine remarks were greeted with enthusiasm by members on all sides. I am certainly not going to be guilty of continuing this debate beyond a reasonable time. I thought, however, that this matter which was drawn to my attention a short time ago should also receive the attention of the members of the house.

I refer to what appears to be a concerted drive by certain sections of the Liberal press across Canada to influence the Speaker of this house and the Prime Minister into denying recognition to what these newspapers call splinter parties, and also denying them what they are pleased to describe as the very great privileges that these parties enjoy at the present time. I refer more particularly to the Lethbridge Herald and the Montreal Star. At first I thought by splinter parties these partisan newspapers might mean the Conservatives and the C.C.F.

I once went to see an entertainer whose specialty was playing the xylophone. I found him to be an accomplished musician, especially on this particular instrument. The climax of his entertainment came when he announced that he would render that famous old selection, "The World is Waiting for the Sunrise". In the course of playing the piece he scattered bits of his precious instrument all over the platform. After the last piece had flown to the far end of the platform he explained to the audience that he believed in doing the job thoroughly. He said, "By rendering the piece I meant splintering it or tearing it to bits." What the Liberals did to the Conservative and the C.C.F. parties in the election of last June, and what they did not do to the Social Credit party, led me to believe at the time these articles appeared that the expression "splinter parties" simply could not refer to us. Nevertheless, these particular newspapers, the Lethbridge Herald and the Montreal Star, came right out and made it perfectly clear that it was the C.C.F. and the Social Credit parties they meant, and they called us splinter parties.

I do not know of any special recognition, Mr. Speaker, that has ever been granted to us by anybody. Furthermore, I do not know of any special privileges that we have enjoyed beyond membership on committees of the house, which I suppose would have come normally had we been merely members of the opposition. The government has always maintained and retained a majority on all committees. Therefore I cannot quite understand what these newspapers meant, but there is this point that has impressed me. I have never seen a press that has been as inconsistent as the Liberal press of this country. I refer particularly now to the Lethbridge Herald. When we held the provincial election in Alberta last year, and returned fifty-one Social Crediters out of fifty-seven members in the legislature, the Lethbridge Herald, together with other sections of the Liberal press across the country, shouted to high heaven that the province of Alberta was going to the dogs because what was needed most was a good strong opposition.

After the election of last June they turned around, and in several different editorials they bemoaned the fact that the people of Alberta had not seen fit to add to the 193 Liberals who had already been elected. They wondered why it was that the people of the province did not vote Liberal, why it was that they were so crazy as to vote anything but Liberal. The fact is that the people of Alberta did not vote Liberal, and the reason is quite obvious. The province of Alberta has been enjoying the kind of good government under the Social Credit party that makes it unnecessary for them to change to any other party.

I want to pay a high tribute to the government of Mr. Manning in Alberta. It is being recognized more and more every day that through wise policies of management of resources and finance and of the affairs of the people they have brought that province to the forefront of the provinces of Canada. Because the people there are happy and contented, not even the presence of Santa Claus along with several other forces that came into the province with the Liberals could help those Liberals win against the Social Credit government in the province and the Social Credit feeling.

We have here ten good men and true, men who know exactly where they want to go, men who stand together. Furthermore they are men who have not sold their independence. They are men who are prepared to fight for the independence of the people of this country. I say to you that if this country needs one thing more than another it is more independence and independents in this House of Commons.

Let me refer just briefly to something which the press evidently has overlooked. Those who have been guilty of attempting to influence the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and the Speaker of this house, so as not to recognize the so-called splinter parties, should realize that the tree of liberty has not yet been so firmly rooted in the soil of this country or of any country in the western hemisphere that adverse winds cannot blow it down. No one denies that there are winds and storms about. Therefore we are still in need of increased faith, of vigilance, of work, of the will to fight and sacrifice in order to ensure that this old tree is kept standing and growing and putting forth new branches.

Our fathers fought and bled and died to establish freedom and personal liberty in this country. They fought and bled and died to secure for us the right to speak our minds freely, to worship Almighty God in our own way and in our own churches, to take part in our own government and to live our lives as individuals and not as members of regimented groups. I say to you that if our attitude toward these freedoms that have been so dearly bought becomes careless, then they will depart from us just as surely as darkness comes upon the earth with the setting of the sun. It is for that reason that I feel that the newspapers who sponsored this drive across the country have insulted the intelligent people of Canada who value their freedoms and who are determined that they shall continue to exercise them and to have as many parties as they want.

I do not say that I support the idea of a multiplicity of parties, but I say that if the people of this country want to organize in a democratic manner for high purposes that are perfectly out in the open and not in any way subversive, that is their right and no newspaper nor any pip-squeak newspaper writer ought to be allowed to interfere with that right.

I should like to say just a word about this most important matter of the devaluation of the pound. I think I am safe in saying that this whole matter is so complicated that perhaps no one man can grasp at once the whole significance of it, nor can anyone say what may be the results of the action that was taken by Great Britain last Saturday. So many factors are involved, including the human factor. If we could anticipate what organized labour will do under the impact of devaluation or what reactions may be expected from capital and from the United States exporters and industrialists, perhaps we would have some idea of the outcome of the present action taken by Great Britain. But I think we can see ahead clearly enough that a few words of warning might not be out of place at this time.

As a result of all the evidence that is available, I believe that we are justified in drawing certain conclusions. In the first place, Great Britain did not devalue the pound sterling voluntarily. I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind that Great Britain was bludgeoned into it just as she has been bludgeoned in other ways in recent years, including Bretton Woods. I have noted the repeated statement by Sir Stafford Cripps that Great Britain would not resort to the devaluation of the pound, a statement that was repeated right up to the day that his vessel came into the harbour of New York when he was on his way to attend the Washington conference. Sir Stafford Cripps has intimated over the past year that pressure was being brought upon Great Britain. I see in the Christian Science Monitor of September 13 an article under the caption "World Bank Spurs Devaluation", written by Mr. Neal Stanford. Mr. Stanford refers to the report recently issued by the international monetary fund and the international bank for reconstruction and development. Mr. Stanford quotes that report in one or two instances quite briefly as follows:

> An adjustment in the exchange rate may be the "only" way for a country with high production costs to expand exports.
> "The principal aim of deficit countries should be to increase their exports to the United States" so as to earn dollars.

And again:

> Deficit countries cannot afford to forego any suitable instrument, including any necessary exchange adjustment, that could expand their dollar exports and thus provide their people with imports.

I think it can be assumed from what has appeared in the press in the past seven or eight months that tremendous pressure was put upon Great Britain and that the world bank was foremost in applying that pressure.

The second conclusion that one can reach as a result of the action taken last Saturday is that Great Britain must expand her exports by thirty per cent in order to break even, and by more than thirty per cent if one single extra dollar is to be made available to her. The question is: Can she do it? It seems a fantastic increase to make. What if United States industry and exporters make substantial reductions in the prices of their products? There is only one answer. Cut-throat competition on a world-wide scale could easily develop and this would wipe out the benefit of devaluation. Is there any guarantee that such a thing cannot happen?

May I voice a third conclusion, Mr. Speaker? I think we are justified in the conclusion that Britain's dollar problem could have been solved quite as successfully and with much less danger to the whole world through reductions in United States tariff rates, coupled with a sensible easing of customs regulations, rather than through devaluation. It must be remembered, sir, that Britain has advanced to the position where her trade is in balance with the rest of the world. However, it appears that very powerful interests and blocs in the United States have successfully opposed this sensible alternative, and the world bank as well as the government of the United States have allowed themselves to be influenced by political rather than by humanitarian and economic considerations. Only when men in high places fully realize that honourable and just economic relations underlie harmonious and happy political relations can we ever hope to begin to build for world peace and the brotherhood of man.

At this point I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on his forthright talk to the people of the United States about their responsibilities in this world of confused and unbalanced trade relations. I thought he did well. If I have any criticism at all, it is that only technicians and profound students of world trade could possibly understand the exalted diplomatic language he used. After all, these things have to be impressed upon the understanding of the average citizen of our neighbouring country if the necessary pressure is to be generated to induce a favourable change of attitude and just action. The United States must join the rest of us in relieving Britain of some of the burden of the loans and gifts as well as other forms of assistance she has been forced to advance to other countries. Britain must not go down. I am afraid there are powerful forces seeking to destroy her.

I come to my fourth conclusion. It is hard for me to find real justification for the drastic devaluation of the pound. There might have been some justification if large-scale unemployment existed in Britain, but it does not. For some time there has been full employment in that country. We therefore have to seek in other directions for whatever justification there may be.

This leads me, sir, to a fifth conclusion. The heavy pressure which forced Britain to devaluate appears to me to be part of a world-wide scheme to bring about deflation. Business, you know, has been too good. Labouring men have been, generally, too prosperous and happy to suit the powers that hunger and thirst after power. Wages must be brought down, prices must be forced to lower levels, and the volume of purchasing power available has to be reduced substantially in every country of the world, they contend. How can interest rates be brought up to their accustomed level and how can men be rendered docile and subservient without widespread and drastic deflation? Those are the questions vested interests are asking. Those are the things they are demanding.

If this conclusion proves to be well founded, and I think it will be, I ask the government what is going to check the deflationary trend before it forces producer prices to uneconomic levels and wages below the subsistence level? Moreover, if these latter conditions do return, what is going to prevent the whirlwinds of revolution from shaking the world? Let us not forget, Mr. Speaker, that the people of the democracies will not tolerate a repetition of the dirty thirties. What will the "Big Bear" be doing while we are floundering in the morass of trade stagnation, unemployment and breadlines that might follow that sort of deflation? It would be easy for me to venture a guess on what he might be doing.

This leads me to the sixth conclusion. Some students of world affairs see in this whole business a move to discredit the pound and make the dollar the undisputed master of the world. This may or may not be so, but I am inclined to believe it is. One thing is certain, and that is that for too many years now the world has witnessed a conflict between the manipulators of the two systems of currency, the dollar system and the pound sterling system. Millions of people in many countries throughout the world have suffered needlessly as a result of that conflict.

Surely, it must be evident to all thinking people that in international trade the important thing to our country, as to all other countries, is to succeed in getting the surplus Canadian goods in the hands of people in other countries who need and want them, and to bring back into Canada the surplus goods from those other countries which Canadians want and are prepared and able to buy. No currency war should be allowed to interfere with this normal and natural process. No currency manipulations can prevent just, successful, and mutually satisfactory exchanges of goods and services internationally, provided the worship of gold and the almighty dollar, as well as the power that goes with it, is replaced by a sincere and honest desire in the hearts of men to love their neighbours as themselves.

I urge the government of this country in the next week or two while this serious crisis exists—it might last longer than that—to use the utmost caution in meeting the situation which they are facing. Britain's action, I presume, will force Canada to devaluate if we are to be able successfully to meet the competition of such countries as Australia and the other countries that have already followed Britain's lead. Canada should not take sides in the currency war by championing either currency. Rather, I think, it is Canada's duty to take the lead in an effort to achieve a happy world of honest trading relationship, even if it might involve completely by-passing the present currency requirements. Surely, sir, goods balances are more important, and more tradeable for that matter, than are money balances.

At this stage I am led to remark that we in this corner of the house are prepared to assist the Prime Minister and the government in any worthy moves that they make to improve conditions for the people of this country. We do warn the government that we shall fight with all our might any tendency towards restricting the freedoms of the people of this country through the government's efforts to be fatherly or paternal in their attitude towards the people of this country. We will not be found carping in our criticisms. We hope that the government will allow us the same privileges we have had in the past of expressing our views as a group, but we are not asking for any special privileges. We of the Social Credit party will continue to work for the freedom of the people. We shall continue to explore and to advocate every means of achieving in Canada a national economy based on individual enterprise in which the production of all wanted goods and services is kept at the highest level required to satisfy the needs of the Canadian people; in which the distribution machinery provides for the equitable distribution of our total production; in which the cycles of booms and depressions are eliminated through the use of sensible financial policies; in which every individual is afforded the opportunity to obtain the highest possible level of social security and is accorded the maximum degree of personal freedom; and in which justice is as readily accessible to the poor as to the rich. Those are the things for which we stand. Those things it is our determination to help bring into our fair country.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, for a few moments this afternoon I should like to call a few matters to the attention of the house and the country. In the first place I want to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on the victory he achieved. After all is said and done, I am one of those who believe that the people should rule, and the people have given their decision. I also want to compliment the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I have known him longer, I think, than anybody else in the house has. I have always looked upon him as a sportsman more than a politician. I am not a politician myself, never have been one, and do not claim to be one. I am more of a sportsman than a politician. I came into this house just for three or four purposes. I congratulate the younger members of the house, a large number of whom come from the province of Quebec. I have always had a high admiration for the people of that great province. I believe that the house and the country would be far better off if we had more men coming up from the municipalities to this parliament. I also want to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on the high office you occupy. You have been well equipped for it. Your diligence and zeal not only as a lawyer but as chairman of committees and Deputy Speaker have fitted you well for the post you occupy, and to which you were elected on the unanimous vote of the House of Commons.

I always look upon the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne as an opportunity to bring matters before the house and the country. I do not speak from the party standpoint because I am not and never have been a hidebound party man. I make some mistakes. We all have our faults. You may speak of the Toronto district as you like, but since 1935 we have never had a representative in the cabinet. We used to have five or six. Is it fair that we should not have one? Is that one of the cardinal principles of Liberalism as we have it in this country at the present time? Sir Wilfrid Laurier used to visit the city of Toronto, as did the Prime Minister; and I know of no city where they were given a better reception than in Toronto. The present Prime Minister will always be well received there. He has opened our winter fair. He has had a keen interest in the city and is well liked there.

I am speaking today without any preparation because I did not wish to occupy too much of the time of the house or to prevent the address in reply from being adopted. But is it fair that the city of Toronto should have no cabinet representative? The greatest financial district is in our city. It pays nearly forty per cent of every dollar the government collects. The city of Toronto is a centre of trade and commerce, the centre of education in the province of Ontario, the site of the university of Toronto, which has given so much to medicine, the arts and the sciences, and is the greatest taxpaying centre in the dominion today. Is it fair, right or proper, under the name of Liberalism, that that great district has never had a representative in the cabinet since 1935? I think it is a great mistake for any government to take that position, and I am in hopes that we shall have a representative. There are in the Liberal ranks some good men from our city, and I hope that the situation to which I have referred will be remedied accordingly.

There are some other matters that I wish to bring to the attention of the house. I believe that the debate on the address affords an opportunity of calling to the attention of the house and of the country grievances which the country has—and the country is full of grievances at the present time. For example, in the Toronto district, where there is a shortage of housing, there is no cheap land. Last year there was a long debate in this house on prefabricated housing. In our city only 117 houses have been built in the last year. We did not have this difficulty in the past. As the former member for Davenport said in this house in answer to the bright young minister from Nova Scotia, cheap land is what is wanted. I remember that the former member for Davenport told the minister that land used to be obtainable for $6 a foot right back of the district I used to represent in the house when I first came here, in northwest Toronto, away out from where the soldiers built their homes, then all around the fringe of the city starting away down east of little York and east Toronto, right north to the township of York and right straight across the city of Toronto. Land was cheap then.

It is unfortunate that we do not get more support from the steam railways. Toronto is the only large Canadian or American city I know of that has no suburban steam service. The people cannot get out to the country. The city has spent millions of dollars on roads, giving services to the surrounding districts; street cars and buses, water, sewers and many of these other municipal services have been given far beyond the city limits into the township and the county of York.

I remember being one of the heads of the city when the township of York, which I described as going around the city to the east, north and west, took only one hundred horsepower from the city. The city had to provide the poles and give them that cheap light and power at cost, directly. That action of providing transportation and cheap power did a great deal for housing. I hope something will be done to give us a suburban steam service, because there is no cheap land in the city. We are the only city I know of that lacks suburban steam service. The city of Montreal has such a service given by the rival systems, the C.P.R. and the C.N.R., with the distance between the tracks equal to about the width of this room. During the summertime the people are, by this service, taken out to those villages and towns on the border of the St. Lawrence river, such as Beaconsfield, Dixie, Lakeside and Dorval. People can live out there for eight months of the year. Some of them live there all the year round. In Toronto we have not that suburban steam service. I am sorry the railways do not do something more for us.

I believe that the time is coming when we should be up and doing something for labour. I have always had the nearly unanimous support of the working classes and of the trade union movement ever since I entered public life—as a member of the school board, as alderman for five years, as controller for five years and as mayor of the city for seven years. The city of Toronto system bought out the old street railway that gave service only to Bloor street practically; and the city from 1911 to 1921 built itself civic car lines. About sixty per cent of the new city was served by civic car lines, with six tickets for ten cents, until 1921. We obtained the York radials for nearly nothing. The Metropolitan railway, one of the York radials, used to run freight cars from lake Simcoe all along Yonge street in the centre of the road, to the C.P.R. crossing on Yonge street; and the city of Toronto, with the province, in the clean-up deal of 1918-19, purchased the power companies in the Niagara district for $32 million. Under the street railway agreement of 1891 and the city system between 1915 and 1921 and a little before, we built city car lines of standard gauge in the new districts, so much so that when we took over the railway on September 1, 1921, we had the new city supplied already with street cars of standard gauge, and that did a great deal for housing.

Over the Don river, the riding which I now represent, they had hardly any bridges. Ashbridge's bay was just a marsh. It had no industries. We had a very large delegation of 130 members of the House of Commons who were invited by the board of trade and by the city to come up to our city the year before last. The board of trade, the city and the province, along with the lieutenant governor, entertained them. They saw something of our city, of the harbour, and of Ashbridge's bay. They saw our street railway system and many other things. We were glad to see them there and we hope that they will come again.

There are one or two matters to which I was referring the other day. I should like to see some action taken on a Pacific pact, as the Pacific is the back door into Canada; whereas the Atlantic pact is at our front door. The Atlantic involves only two hundred million people, but in the Pacific we have six or seven hundred million people. We need to take some action immediately against communist Russia, which has met its match in the west, but it is now out to control the east, which is our back door into Canada.

In 1938 I called the attention of the house to it. I pointed out that from Puget sound to the southern Queen Charlotte islands there was nearly seven hundred miles of an unprotected western coast of Canada, and it was only by a miracle that Canada escaped direct invasion after Pearl Harbor.

Canada should take some action to thus control the east and stop communist Russia from controlling Asia. The Atlantic pact and the Marshall plan discourage them in the east, which is our front door into Canada, but let us not forget that, unless we have a Pacific pact, all we do at the front door of the west will be of little effect, and will not prevent Russia from overrunning all the Far East. There must be a considered plan backed by economic support from the countries that are involved in the Pacific.

General MacArthur has done good work in the Far East, and the United States should take the lead in establishing immediately a Pacific pact. In these modern days, when bandits and burglars are so busy in our large cities, one must not forget to lock the back door as well as the front, and it is the same in warfare in the Atlantic and the Pacific at present. I think that is very good advice.

There are many other matters to which I might refer. I want to refer to the speech that my friend General Crerar made at the Canadian National Exhibition. He asked the government of the day, "Are we secure, or are we not secure"? I asked the Prime Minister the same question. I asked the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) the same question away back last spring. Are we secure, or are we not secure if we were invaded from the east and west, the front door, the Atlantic, or the back door, the Pacific? We are apt to be invaded as we were in 1914 and 1939. I can tell you that we have not the security which we should have. We can no longer depend on the British fleet to defend our shores. They protected our shores for four centuries, in the days of Louis XIV, Philip of Spain, and Napoleon and later against the Kaiser and Hitler. For generations there was nothing but the command of the sea that saved the dominions. A million men went into the war of 1914. They enlisted under their own status, under their own autonomy and under their own sovereignty. A hundred and forty thousand of them fell on the field of battle, and what they did in the first war changed the whole history of the world.

In the second world war what did they do? They enlisted in five to ten times the number. They enlisted voluntarily, not to fight for Britain but to fight by her side against the enemies, and they came in much larger array, on land, on sea and in the air, and we saw the result of it. They came to the aid of the mother country. The dominions were the only ones who were supporting her, and they had to go on for nearly three years before anybody came to their support. What they did saved the whole human race and the whole world.

I believe that General Crerar was quite right in what he said at the Canadian National Exhibition on Warriors' Day. He wanted to find out if we were secure. I say that we are not secure. It is the duty of the government to inform the house and the country whether we are secure or not. Depending on the UNO will never get us any security. It is the biggest tower of Babel that I know of. The UNO seems to be the cornerstone of the government's policy. Even the right hon. leader of the house when he was Secretary of State for External Affairs felt that way about UNO. I believe it was on the last day he was Secretary of State for External Affairs that he gave an address in the house—I think it was June 25—in which he said that the cornerstone of the policy of the government was based on the United Nations. Well, if it is, it is the biggest talk fest that I know of. It has got this house and the Senate beaten forty ways. We have had that kind of a pact for many years. It was the league of nations. This is not the first time we have had a league of nations. They had it over a hundred years ago. Away back in 1815 they established a league of nations, between Prussia, Austria and Russia, the three powers that are causing us all this world trouble today. It was known then as the Holy Alliance. It lasted from 1815 to 1823, when the great Prime Minister, George Canning, decided to get out of Europe altogether. What did it do? Well, it led to the Monroe doctrine. What was the Monroe doctrine? I can tell you what it was. It was the supremacy of Britain on the high seas. That is what the Monroe doctrine was first, last and always, and always will be. It saved the world in the four centuries I named, and it will save it again.

With regard to the particular address of General Crerar, I believe he was absolutely correct. We have no security, nor have the other dominions. We do not know where we are going. Russia and her satellite countries now have over 400 divisions ready to take the field. That is what they have at the present time. They may march; you can never tell. What is going to become of us? They have set the world in darkness for so long that the pact to which I have been referring should have been brought about long before this.

Mr. Churchill made a speech at Fulton in 1946. Right up until 1948, in spite of his warning, the western democracies did nothing to arouse the countries of the world to the real situation. However, last fall those democracies became more alert to the grave danger facing them. We heard the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) speak in this connection on April 5 and 6 in the House of Commons and I, too, said that I thought something should be done. I pointed out that we could not depend upon Britain to do it for us.

On that occasion I read certain questions into Hansard, setting out what the United States was doing in the matter of submarines. We have no large submarine. Admittedly we have none this year. In the address I made on that occasion I referred to many other matters. During the second world war a secret session was held in the House of Commons, at which time it was learned that submarines had come up the St. Lawrence river as far as Riviere du Loup. While I was visiting the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) in August, 1947, I saw the cove which those submarines had used.

Surely we will not depend upon the United States much longer. I believe General Crerar was right in his recent statement, and I now ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) to answer this question: Are we or are we not going to be invaded? I asked the same question in the House of Commons in 1938, when I saw a second war coming. On that occasion I moved the adjournment of the house to see whether, if war came, we would be invaded.

We have gone through a war caused by Hitler. I believe we have no security at the present time on the sea, on the land or in the air. We depend entirely upon Washington, and in my opinion that is one of the greatest mistakes we have made. We have been surrendering too much politically, economically and financially to Washington. I have great admiration for the people of the United States, and always will have. However, I believe we follow them too much.

Let me in conclusion say a word about the Noronic disaster which occurred over the week end. Since I have been a member of the house I have tried to have the government realize its responsibility in matters of this kind. Since I have been a member I have repeatedly mentioned the lack of any proper or adequate life-saving equipment on our rivers and on the great lakes.

Some hon. members are from Ontario and the maritime provinces. I can remember a time away back in 1927 when men who had served at St. Julian and Vimy Ridge and other famous battlegrounds had to depend upon an American life-saving station. That is a fine basis for nationalism in this country!

Ever since I came to the House of Commons I have been advocating adequate and proper life-saving equipment. We need a maritime commission for the great lakes. Why should our present commission operate only for the benefit of one section of the country, and at the expense of the rest? I repeat that not only do we need a maritime commission for the great lakes, but that we must have proper life-saving equipment.

Hon. members will recall what happened to the Northumberland last spring. I know, too, its sister ship, the Dalhousie City. I know that the Northumberland was in commission for six weeks, but that government officials did not know anything about it. That boat burned at the dock in Port Dalhousie. It is a wonder it did not go to the bottom of the sea long ago. It came originally from Prince Edward Island.

The tragedy which occurred in Toronto last Saturday took place on a guest ship, and I say a proper inquiry should be made into what happened. We do not want any whitewashing, because in our city we have nothing to hide. As the founder of the present harbour commission in Toronto, I can say that we expect something better than that from the government.

The tragedy which happened in connection with the Noronic might just as easily happen to the Cayuga. We know that something similar did happen to the Northumberland; and it might happen at any time on any of our inland waterways and lakes.

While I was in the Muskoka district—and I spent only five days there—I saw a boat carrying 1,460 passengers. I do not wish to criticize the owners of that boat, because I believe they are good people; but I can say that on that same lake there was an accident last spring when people in motor boats carrying passengers to Bala struck a reef which destroyed the boats and drowned the passengers.

The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Rooney), who is a member of the Royal Canadian yacht club, knows that this life-saving station is necessary. Why have we not proper life-saving stations all along the great lakes? Shipowners need federal aid in this matter. We have no such stations either on lake Erie or lake Ontario or on the upper lakes. In the United States this service is under the control of the United States navy, and it is personnel from the navy who man these stations. But along the St. Lawrence, and at points like Port Dover and Port Burwell, we have not that service.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Church: Mr. Speaker, I wish to finish the few remarks which I was making regarding the great disaster which happened in the city of Toronto early Saturday morning. I was speaking about that when the house rose for the recess. Since I have been a member of the house I have pointed out to the government that their first duty, as I see it, is to look after the health, wealth, happiness, peace and prosperity of the citizens of Canada.

[Mr. Church.]

Let us say a citizen gets on a boat travelling on the inland waterways of Canada. He does not know what is going to happen to him. I was comparing the facilities on the two sides of the great lakes. Let us suppose that the space between here and the government benches represents lake Ontario. There is the south shore with the Niagara river and New York state. On the north shore there are several towns and cities, and the same thing applies to lake Erie. What facilities are there to protect anyone who gets on a steamer on these lakes? You start away down on the south shore at Brighton and Belleville, and you call at Cobourg and all those intermediate ports right up to the city of Toronto. There are no life-saving facilities on that waterway.

What is there on the United States side of the lake? The war department of the United States is in charge, and there is a wide difference between the two countries. On the United States side, under the protection of the navy, they have coast guard stations. There is a station at Charlotte, and there are stations right down to Buffalo. There is a large station at Buffalo. There are stations at Geneva, Erie, Ashtabula, Cleveland, all the way along right up to Detroit, and then on up the great lakes.

There has been a great disaster. I am glad to see the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) coming into the house because he represents a maritime constituency in Ontario. I can tell him that, since I have been in the house, on several occasions on the upper lakes in the late fall there have been storms which have not only wrecked ships but have also taken the lives of men who served at Vimy Ridge, St. Julien, and other places in the first war, and also the lives of some who served in the second war. Not only have ships been sunk and lives lost; there has also been the loss of cargoes of grain on lake Superior and the other great lakes.

Are there any facilities on the Canadian side? No, not at all. There is not an adequate life-saving station on the great lakes today. For that reason I proposed in the house last spring that we should have a maritime commission for the great lakes. What happens when these men are faced with disaster? All they can do is sound their sirens and hope that by the grace of God—and many of them are returned men—they may blow hard enough that the crew of some United States life-saving station will come to their rescue and save their lives.

If that is a form of nationalism in this country I am surprised to see it because many of these sailors are returned men. Many of them have been drowned, some from Collingwood, some from Owen Sound, some from Meaford, and from many other places. At last we have in this house many younger members who are interested in the municipalities. I know they are, and I know that they are men who will advance sane and sensible ideas if they are asked privately about this question.

It is the duty of the government to establish life-saving stations on the Canadian side of the great lakes. Why should we have to depend on the United States life-saving stations when an ex-soldier or a sailor is drowning? Is it any wonder that we cannot get enough men in the merchant marine to man the ships? Something has to be done about it. We need a maritime commission for the great lakes. We need a life-saving system for the inland waterways of Canada. What is there on the inland waterways of Canada today? There is only a rowboat. When I took over the Toronto harbour commission I came to Ottawa to see the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Hazen, a wonderful man who rendered brilliant service in the first world war, the father of the former member for Saint John-Albert.

What did they have on the great lakes? There was a boat about as long as from here to the desk of the hon. member opposite. It had oars in it and all that kind of thing. That was all that was available as life-saving apparatus. We have no life-saving stations on the great lakes, and many of these disasters have happened. The same thing that happened to the Noronic in Toronto on Saturday last might well have happened to the Cayuga, to the boat running to Port Dalhousie. One of the two boats running to Port Dalhousie was burned at the dock. What did the officials say? They answered me by letter and they said, "Oh, the boat has not been on the route yet." I used to see that boat on its way out, an old dilapidated ship which came up from the maritimes forty years ago and was put on the run to Port Dalhousie. The officials said she was not on the route yet. I saw the boat making two trips a day, one at about 8.15 in the morning and one at about 2.30 in the afternoon. The old Northumberland was on the route for about four weeks and yet they said she had not made any trips yet.

She was burned at the dock—and there is no life-saving station at that port. What I say is true of the inland waterways. At lake Simcoe people call the Toronto life-saving station when somebody drowns. I referred to the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Rooney) this afternoon. He has seen the truck of the Toronto life-saving station go up there. That service is paid for by the taxpayers of Toronto and costs about $80,000 a year. The people at lake Simcoe, Huntsville and other places simply telephone for the Toronto life-saving service to come up and find the drowned persons.

That is about all I have to say. We want a proper inquiry into this disaster, not a whitewashing inquiry. We do not want any whitewash. We want to know the facts. The people want the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. They are not getting the truth and the facts about the case. I do not see why anybody from the municipalities should object to having us know what happened to the ship. It is a guest ship and they can do what you cannot do under the Canada Shipping Act, that famous statute. They want to have an inquiry under that act instead of a proper inquiry under the federal Inquiries Act. A proper inquiry should take place.

I hope the day is not far distant when we shall go back to preferential trade. We know what that has done for Canada. We all know what the great Joseph Chamberlain did in his lifetime for the city of Birmingham. He created the policy of preferential trade. The first time we ever had it was under Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Fielding. They proposed to give six cents a bushel on grain; and my former leader, Lord Bennett, was very much in favour of it. Let us forget all about isolationism and separatism in all these things. Let us go back to the old way of doing things.

Where would this country have been in the early thirties, when we were on the gold standard, off the gold standard and on the gold standard again, had it not been for preferential trade with the dominions? What was true then is true today. That policy was founded in 1897 by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was one of the authors along with Mr. Fielding. What was good for the government of that day should be good enough for the present government.

We should have trade with our sister dominions who stood with us in the two wars. Had it not been for the aid given by the dominions to Great Britain we would have lost the first war. We had to wait some time before our friends to the south came in. Then in the second war the dominions had to come to the side of the mother country, only in ten times the strength. It saved the whole world before Pearl Harbor, before the United States came in.

This country should buy from the mother country. Preferential trade should be restored. That is what saved this country away back in the thirties when Lord Bennett was the leader of my party. That policy increased trade between Canada and Great Britain 43 per cent, and it increased Great Britain's trade with the dominions 41 per cent. Not only that, but Canada increased her foreign trade with the countries on the seven seas.

A magnificent trade exhibition was held in Toronto under the auspices of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). We were able to see what Australia, New Zealand and other dominions were offering. We should trade with our sister dominions as much as possible and re-establish the system of preferential trade. I believe the future of Canada depends on that. This is what Sir John Macdonald said in 1844:

> I, therefore, need scarcely state my firm belief that the prosperity of Canada depends upon its permanent connection with the mother country.

And then in 1891 he said:

> For a century and a half this country has grown and flourished under the protecting aegis of the British crown. Under the broad folds of the Union Jack, we enjoy the most ample liberty, we govern ourselves as we please, and at the same time we participate in the advantages which flow with association of the mightiest empire the world has ever seen. As for myself, my course is clear. A British subject I was born and a British subject I will die.

That spirit still lives and breathes in this country today, no matter what may be said to the contrary.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since it appears that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is not to make his statement on the exchange situation until nine o'clock, I rise to speak in support of the amendment moved by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), which reads as follows:

> We regret, however, that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to propose legislation to remove the means test from the old age pension.

Frankly, I do not see how any hon. member of this house can vote against that amendment. A proper old age pension, free of the means test, is now part of the platform of every political party in this country. I remind hon. gentlemen opposite in particular that, during the recent federal election campaign, Liberal after Liberal contended that that was one of the things he would fight for if elected, namely, the abolition of the means test. I heard over the radio, from the lips of Liberals in the part of the country from which I come, the statement in strong terms, "The means test must go." Those who gave expression to that sentiment during the election campaign have the opportunity to vote that way when the vote is called on this amendment. I am sure that many Liberal members of this house who are new to this chamber will, when they look at the amendment, say that that is something that they want to vote for. I hope that they will vote the way they really feel, the way their constituents expect them to vote.

This whole question of a proper old age pension is something that it has taken time to popularize in this country. When old age pensions were first being proposed on the floor of this house in the middle twenties there was strong criticism of the idea. As hon. members know, the first Old Age Pensions Act that was passed in this house was turned down in the other place. In the meantime, largely through the efforts of my predecessor, the late Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, former member for Winnipeg North Centre, and of this party across the years, it has been accepted by the Canadian people that as part of our national economy there should be a proper retirement plan.

I have no doubt that one reason why many people voted Liberal on June 27 was that they felt even the Liberal party had become convinced of the need for a proper old age pension plan. They felt that if given another chance in addition to all those chances they had had so far the Liberals would bring in a proper old age pension plan. I know, as do all hon. members, that at the present time we are facing grave international problems with which this house must cope, but I insist that we must not let our concern for those broad international problems blind us to the necessity of dealing with our domestic problems and of setting our internal house in order in the best possible way we can. High on the list of our domestic problems is the need for a proper retirement plan.

As hon. members who have been here before are aware, I have given most of my time in the speeches I have made on the address in reply to the speech from the throne to this question. Through the years I have tried to document our case with figures which I have been able to secure from the bureau of statistics, from the Department of National Health and Welfare and from other sources. Hon. members will recall that in March, 1948, I gave figures which I had obtained from the bureau of statistics, particularly from a report having to do with the changes in our population structure, which showed that through the years we are becoming a nation with a larger number of older people. To be specific, the figures given out by the bureau of statistics show that whereas in 1941 only 6·7 per cent of our Canadian people were sixty-five years of age and over, by 1971 10·1 per cent of the people in this country will be sixty-five years of age and over. In other words, the necessity for grappling with this problem increases as the years come and go.

That same bureau of statistics pointed out in that same report that, not only is the percentage of older people increasing, but so is the percentage of those in the working brackets. In other words, the bureau of statistics pointed out for all members of this house and all parties to see that the increased problem of providing proper retirement for our older people can readily be met by reason of the fact that there is an increasing number of people to do the work, to produce the wealth out of which to set aside a share for a proper retirement.

In March of this year I dealt with another phase of this problem, pointing out that, despite all of the efforts being made by private enterprise and through government action to set up pension plans, as yet we are hardly scratching the surface of the problem. The figures I gave related to the total number of people in our country who are trying to provide for their old age, including those in the civil service, those who are buying government annuities, those who are contributing to various pension plans in private industry, and those who are buying the kind of life insurance which will provide for their retirement. When those figures were all put together—I need not repeat them now but they can be found in Hansard of March 3, 1949—they showed that the best we are doing at the present time enables only about one in eight of our people in the working group between the ages of twenty and sixty to make provision for their old age.

I pointed out at the time that it was not to be assumed that that one in eight is making adequate provision, for in many cases the provision being made is extremely meagre. But that whole set of figures underlines the fact that this is a problem with which we have scarcely started to deal.

One of the reasons I dealt with that phase of the problem last March was the fact that a little over a year ago a publication issued by the Canadian Manufacturers Association published a story to the effect that private enterprise was doing a good job in this field. After reading this story, rather than argue with it, I felt it was a subject worthy of investigation. To my amazement, after I had given this analysis of the situation in the house in March of this year, that same publication, which is known as Industry, published by the Canadian Manufacturers Association, made reference in its issue of April, 1949, to the speech I had made. I shall not take the time to read the whole of the article dealing with my speech, but what the article attempts to say is that I, in fact, proved the very point the Canadian Manufacturers Association was trying to establish. What they were trying to point out, and they are perfectly right in it, is that about half of the pension plans now in effect are under the direction of private industry. In dealing with it in the house, this publication says I simply proved that point. In other words, the Canadian Manufacturers Association completely overlooks the point I tried to make then, and which I repeat tonight, namely, that when you give full credit to everything private industry is doing, full credit to the life insurance companies, full credit to the government annuities program, and full credit to the civil service pension plans of all governments in this country, the fact remains that only about one in eight of our Canadian people between the ages of twenty and sixty is in a position to provide for their old age.

These facts simply underline the necessity of getting on with this problem early in the life of this new parliament. I repeat, there are great international problems with which this parliament must deal, but that must not blind us to the fact that these domestic problems are equally important. We in this group welcome the references in the speech from the throne to the discussions as to ways and means of amending the British North America Act within Canada. While the speech from the throne does not say so, it seems to be taken for granted, and we hope correctly, that one of the fields in which there is interest, so far as amending the British North America Act is concerned, is this field of social security. According to those who write in our various publications about what is in the government's mind, that sort of amendment is high on the list; that is what the government wants to be able to do, to make the necessary amendments to the British North America Act so that this whole question of social security can be put on a proper footing.

With respect to that, there are two things I should like to say. On the one hand, I stress the point that it is not necessary to wait for an amendment to the British North America Act to remove the means test from the present Old Age Pensions Act. That is what the amendment of my leader, which I have had the honour to second, calls for at this time. I suggest that in view of the pronouncements made by all parties, in view of the pronouncements made by candidates who have been returned to this house that they would support that sort of thing, such an amendment should be approved. It should be an instruction to this government to bring forward—immediately—legislation to remove the means test from the Old Age Pensions Act.

A further reference I wish to make about seeking ways and means of amending the British North America Act—I am going to speak quite frankly—is that we do not want another round of political footballing over the British North America Act so far as old age pensions are concerned. Four or five years from now we do not want another election on the issue of social security, with the Liberal party going to the country and saying, "We tried to do it, but this province or that province interfered." This time I hope the government will approach the provinces in a manner that will bring forth co-operation and get this job done. It is not going to be satisfactory to the Canadian people in 1953 or 1954 to throw out the Liberals because they did not bring in a proper social security plan. What the people of this country want is for this parliament, this government which they put in power, to do the job now.

In common with a good many members of this House of Commons who have come back for another term, during this past week I have spent quite a few hours going through my filing cabinets with a view to getting rid of some of the material that has piled up over the years. One thing that has amazed me has been the number of files relating to old age pensioners that need no longer be retained because those people have passed away without having had the opportunity of enjoying a decent old age pension which this parliament should have given them. I hope there will be no more delay in connection with this measure.

Mr. Speaker, it is our contention that something should be done about the Old Age Pensions Act immediately, and we feel there are other things that should be done as well, such as the raising of the amount and the lowering of the eligible age, and so on. For the purpose of this debate, however, we have tried to pinpoint our attack on one item, namely, the means test, and that is the issue now before the house.

In addition to amending the Old Age Pensions Act, there are other ways in which the government could show its interest in social security, its interest in the welfare of the old people. I have raised in this house on many occasions the plight of our superannuated civil servants. Members who were here in the last session of the last parliament will remember that, towards the end of that session, a prolonged debate took place during which the members of all parties called upon the government to reverse its stubborn position in this matter and do the fair thing by these retired civil servants. That is something they could do right now to show they are genuinely interested, not in just talking about it or using it as a campaign slogan during elections, but in doing something for our older people.

Another way in which something could be done in the broader contributory field in which we are interested is by bringing in a railroad retirement act similar to that in the United States. Again, I will not take the time to go into it because I have done so a good many times before; and what has interested me in this chamber, when I have argued the case for a railroad retirement act, is that despite the fact that some hon. members regard me as a nuisance on these matters and despite the fact that members are opposed to me politically, the house has always followed with interest my appeal for a proper railroad pension plan.

I mention railroad workers in particular because they are a group whose labour relations are already under federal jurisdiction. In other words, it seems to me that no amendment to the British North America Act is required to bring in a railroad retirement act for workers who come under federal jurisdiction. There again is a chance for this government with its huge majority to show whether it is interested in over-all social security, whether it is interested in getting something started, or whether we are in for another four or five years of political footballing over the British North America Act, with the result that nothing gets done.

I also want to say a few words about the need for more definite and progressive steps in the field of national health. My leader referred to this subject again this afternoon. It too is one of the fields in which we feel that the people of this country expect fulfilment during the course of this parliament, and they do not expect this government to wait until the eve of the next election. They want action now.

In this whole question of doing something for the health of our people there are three main fields in which action must be taken. In the first place, provision must be made of adequate equipment and personnel—hospitals, doctors, technicians, nurses, dentists and so on. In the second place, there must be health insurance to enable the people to pay for the services. It is no use having the best services and the best doctors available if people cannot afford to make use of them. In the third place there is required in a great many cases in this country, and increasingly so, a sickness benefit to take the place of the pay envelope that stops when the worker is off sick. Despite all the publicity that has been given and all the talk about the forward steps being taken by this government in the field of health, this government has so far really dealt with only the first of these three things. It has asked parliament to provide money, and parliament has done so readily, to assist in the building of hospitals and in the providing of the necessary equipment. But literally nothing has been done in the field of health insurance. We are asked to vote a little bit of money for health insurance studies, but even that in former years had never been fully expended. And nothing at all has been done in the field of providing a sickness benefit. When we have raised this question in discussions related to the Unemployment Insurance Act and have pointed out the need for a benefit for unemployed people when they are sick, we are told by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that actuarially that cannot be done by him, that it has to be part of an over-all social security plan. We agree, but the time to get such a program going is now when this government sits here in this parliament with an overwhelming majority and can do not only whatever it wants to do but what it has promised the people of this country that it will do.

There is just one other question, Mr. Speaker, about which I should like to say a few words tonight. It is in a slightly different field, but I am going to take this opportunity to speak about it because I feel it is extremely important and because of the promise which the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) made to me on Friday last, to the effect that he would give an answer to my question early this week. The minister might ask why I do not wait until I hear his answer, but my fear is that, if I do not give him some of the arguments in advance, he might give the wrong answer.

I refer to the whole question of the right of trade unionists to deduct their trade union dues from their taxable income for income tax purposes. As hon. members who were here in the last session will know, it is the case that certain groups of people are permitted to deduct, for income tax purposes, the fees they pay to the professional societies to which they belong. That deduction applies particularly in the case of lawyers, and there is a notable exchequer court decision of a few years ago which makes it clear that it applies to lawyers not only when they are working on their own but also when they are employed by a firm and paid a stated salary. For a long time it has been the contention of the trade union movement that if lawyers are allowed to deduct, for income tax purposes, the fees to the law society which they have to pay in order to practise law, so should trade unionists, who have to be members of their trade union in order to carry on in their trade, be permitted to make a comparable deduction.

This matter was brought to a head in a legal way by two Winnipeg trade unionists—they were moving-picture projectionists—who in 1945 claimed this deduction, and when it was denied to them by the income tax authorities they appealed and eventually took the case to the Exchequer Court of Canada. This year, I believe on June 8, the exchequer court in the person of Mr. Justice Angers issued a judgment in favour of these two trade unionists. The position taken by the judge of the exchequer court was precisely the one that we had been taking through the years. He pointed out that if, under the section that was in the act, it was possible for lawyers to deduct their fees to the law society, there was no reason why trade unionists should not have the same privilege and be permitted to deduct their fees to their trade union.

As I say, that decision was handed down on June 8, but it did not reach the newspapers until about the middle of the month. I know that in trade union circles the decision was greeted with a great deal of satisfaction and it was felt that here indeed was a fair decision on the part of the Exchequer Court of Canada. But, lo and behold, within a day or two the officials in the income tax department began issuing statements which reached the press, and these same officials threw cold water on the idea that trade unionists henceforth were to be able to avail themselves of this privilege. Nothing was said by the Minister of National Revenue himself, so far as I could find in the papers, and I doubt if anything was said by his deputy. But these well-placed, well-informed officials told the press that this 1945 case could not be taken to apply across the board. In the main they said two things. First of all, they said that no trade unionist who did not claim this exemption in 1945 can get it now, as can these two men who took it to court, because the time for appealing has elapsed. That could be understood. One could see the administrative difficulties if it were possible to go back over three or four years and get all these exemptions. My colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), points out that the income tax people could do that, and he is perfectly right. They reassess the returns of corporations, and there really is no reason why they could not reassess the returns of individual trade unionists right across the board.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): They do that for individuals now.

Mr. Knowles: Good. I am getting even more support than I had expected, and I am glad to have it. The point I want to make is that the other statement made by these officials was, to my way of thinking, more serious and more ominous. In fact it seems to me nothing more or less than a defying of the decision of the courts. The other pronouncement made by these unnamed officials in the Department of National Revenue was that, in the meantime, the act had been changed and we are now under the 1948 Income Tax Act rather than under the old Income War Tax Act of many years' standing, amended time and time again. Well, I have compared these two acts, namely, the one that was in effect in 1945, the Income War Tax Act, and the new Income Tax Act, which is in effect now. There is a slight change in the wording of the relevant section, but it seems the meaning is clear. Although I am not a lawyer I do not see how any judge who made the decision that Mr. Justice Angers made on June 8 could fail to make the same decision if in the case of a return for the year 1948, under the new act, trade unionists were forced to take their case to the exchequer court again. It seems to me that if the government decides they are not going to allow these deductions, but are simply going to force the trade unionists to go to the exchequer court again, they are just delaying justice, and certainly the trade unionists of this country will wonder what kind of action this is on the part of the government. After all, respect for the fairness of the courts is one of the cardinal principles of our democracy, and it does seem to me that this decision, recognized to be eminently fair, should be implemented in full by the officials of this department, and by the government.

In the old Income War Tax Act, as it was in effect in 1945, the section under which lawyers were allowed to deduct their fees to the law society, and the section under which Mr. Justice Angers decided that trade unionists should have the same right, was section 6, subsection (1), subparagraph (a). It is under the sectional heading "Deductions from Income Not Allowed". The section reads:

> 6. (1) In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be assessed, a deduction shall not be allowed in respect of
> (a) disbursements or expenses not wholly, exclusively and necessarily laid out or expended for the purpose of earning the income;

That is put in the negative form. The positive form means, as it meant to Mr. Justice Angers, and as it meant to the income tax department in dealing with lawyers, that if the expenditure was made wholly, exclusively and necessarily for the purpose of earning the income it could be deducted.

That clause has been changed. Here is its wording in the new Income Tax Act. It is section 12, subsection (1), subparagraph (a), and reads as follows:

> 12. (1) In computing income, no deduction shall be made in respect of
> (a) an outlay or expense except to the extent that it was made or incurred by the taxpayer for the purpose of gaining or producing income from property or a business of the taxpayer;

[Mr. Knowles.]

Again it is put in the negative form. But put it in the positive sense and it says that you can claim a deduction if the outlay or expense referred to was made or incurred for the purpose of gaining or producing income from property or a business of the taxpayer. I suppose there might be some quibbling over the question of what a business is, but that is most unlikely. Surely if the law is a lawyer's business, printing is a printer's business and blacksmithing is a blacksmith's business. Since these workers have to pay their trade union fees in order to practise their trade, just as the lawyers have to pay fees to the law society in order to practise law, the case is surely all on the same level.

I know that there is very keen feeling about this question amongst trade unionists generally, and I would hope that if the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), in getting ready the statement that he is going to make early this week, has not already decided to give a favourable answer, he will take these considerations under advisement. I am sure that hon. members, regardless of party, even as last April they agreed with me in the position that I took then, will agree with me that in all fairness there is no question but that trade unionists should be allowed these deductions.

There are many other things that we in this group might talk about, but I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has come in, and perchance he is ready without waiting until nine o'clock to make the important statement that this house is waiting for. Therefore I shall not detain the house longer. I just want to say—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: New members will soon learn that they do that every time I speak.

An hon. Member: Then why do you speak?

Mr. Knowles: That is the reason Winnipeg North Centre sent me back here—to speak, and to speak about these things.

I just want to say, Mr. Speaker, that despite all the things that are being said at the opening of this parliament about the fact that we do accept the decision of the people, in that we have a parliament with an overwhelming Liberal majority, that imposes upon that Liberal majority the obligation not to sit here complacently, but to fulfil the promises that they made. If they do not, it will not be long until the people begin to wonder whether they did not make a mistake. Many of those who voted Liberal are doing that already. I call upon this government to get on its toes, and I call upon the back-benchers who are here in such overwhelming numbers to see to it that the government delivers the goods.

I suggest that there is no better place to begin than in the fields I have been talking about tonight, namely, in a broader and better old age pension plan, in a proper health plan for the Canadian people, and in doing something about this injustice to the trade unionists of this country.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): In spite of your speech I agree with you.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Coldwell) which was negatived on the following division:

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

ADJUSTMENT OF 10 PER CENT IN EXCHANGE VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I could have the unanimous consent of the house to revert to motions, I should like to make a statement with respect to Canada's exchange rate.

Hon. members are aware, of course, of the details of the important announcement which was made yesterday afternoon by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the United Kingdom, and which has been followed by announcements from other capitals.

As the chancellor has said, the United States and Canadian representatives to the tripartite discussions in Washington were informed at the outset of the ministerial talks that the government of the United Kingdom had taken the decision to devalue the pound sterling. However, at that time the United Kingdom government had not yet decided what the extent of the devaluation would be. The proposed new parity of the pound sterling was communicated to us in a message from Mr. Attlee to the Prime Minister on Friday.

The government had immediately to consider Canadian policy in the light of this development. It was clearly not possible to give full consideration to this matter until we had more knowledge of how many, and what countries, would follow the action taken by the United Kingdom and the extent of the exchange rate adjustment, if any, that they would put into effect. We felt it desirable to await the more complete information which would be available during the course of today. Consequently, I issued the following statement last evening:

In view of the decision reached by the United Kingdom government, to devalue the pound sterling by 30 per cent, and of similar action which has already been taken by a number of other countries, the government of Canada has instructed the chairman of the Foreign Exchange Control Board to advise all authorized dealers and agents of the board not to deal in foreign exchange in Canada until the rates effective as from the opening of business Tuesday, September 20, are communicated to them by the board.

Before I go on to inform hon. members of the decision of the Canadian government, I should like to say a word of comment in regard to the British action itself. For some time it has been clear that a fairly radical re-alignment of some currencies was a necessary element in the readjustments required to balance international trade. The decision, however, was one which the countries concerned had themselves to take. The action which the United Kingdom has now taken constitutes a courageous and positive effort by the British people to do their part in the common endeavours that are necessary to provide the basis for a real and enduring recovery of world trade.

Since the end of the war we have been confronted with repeated dollar crises, each threatening to produce a breakdown in the economic relations between the democracies of the western world. These crises had their origin in the widespread economic dislocations and heavy losses caused by the war. Hon. members are familiar with the co-operative measures taken in the past to deal with these difficulties. First, there was the work of relief undertaken by UNRRA and the military authorities; then we had the establishment of the two international monetary institutions at Bretton Woods; this was followed by the extension of large loans and credits by the United States and Canada to the United Kingdom and other European countries. Finally there was the adoption of the Marshall plan, which has provided further substantial financial help from the United States. These measures have been highly successful not only in averting the incalculable consequences of economic and political collapse, but have been essential elements in the successive stages of physical reconstruction. With the help of these measures the peoples of western Europe have been able to perform the remarkable feat of repairing, in a few short years, the physical ravages of the most destructive war in history.

Although physical production has been largely restored, we have continued to face a most serious unbalance in world trade. The so-called dollar shortage has continued to get worse and has become all but universal. How to overcome the widening disequilibrium between the dollar and non-dollar world was the central task of the Washington discussions. Each of the participants was keenly and deeply aware of the consequences of failure. Unless the trend could be reversed the free world would, through the force of events, divide itself into two economic blocs. With this division there could not be a sound or lasting basis for political co-operation and security.

The problem was approached in the realization that these great issues were at stake. The atmosphere of co-operation and understanding in which the discussions proceeded could not have been better. Each side was prepared to re-examine its policies in the light of the adjustments that are required. The United Kingdom, the sterling area, and other non-dollar countries had to find ways and new incentives by which their dollar earnings could be quickly and substantially expanded. The dollar countries on the other hand would have to follow policies which would enable that expansion in dollar earnings to take place; and wherever possible undertake the removal of obstacles which stand in the way. The decisions taken by the government of the United Kingdom to achieve this common purpose were announced yesterday by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The courses of action adopted by the dollar countries are clearly set forth in the communiqué issued at the conclusion of the Washington talks. Hon. members will agree that these decisions and courses of action constitute a positive and comprehensive effort to achieve a soundly balanced and expanding world trade upon which the prosperity of Canada so greatly depends.

At this point may I say that I know I am expressing the sentiments of my colleagues, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), when I thank the hon. leader of the opposition for the generous references he made in his speech this afternoon to the contributions which we were able to make at those discussions.

The action taken by the government of the United Kingdom, and followed by many other countries, has, aside from the longer-run effects, important immediate implications for Canada as well. It is clear, now, that a widespread and substantial readjustment of currencies is under way.

The Canadian economy is bound to be affected by changes in the exchange rates of countries which take so large a part of our exports. We are bound to be affected also by any changes in prices which prevail in our most important markets and sources of supply.

In considering the immediate and prospective impact upon Canada we have to look particularly at our balance of payments and foreign exchange position. Because of the dislocations in world trade which have prevailed since the end of the war, foreign exchange policy has been a major factor in our affairs. Hon. members will recall the heavy loss in foreign exchange reserves which we experienced during 1947, owing to the inability of our customers in Europe to pay for a large part of their imports from us. The measures which we were obliged to take in November of that year to stop the drain were highly successful. A substantial current account surplus in our balance of payments was achieved during 1948, and our reserves of gold and United States dollars was increased from a low of $461 million in December, 1947, to $998 million at December 31, 1948.

However, at the beginning of 1949 it was clear that the worsening world dollar situation and our rising imports from the United States would result in a sharp reduction in our current account surplus. The current account surplus in our balance of payments has in fact been declining and it is now estimated that, for the year as a whole, it will in any case be very small. Consequently any developments which tend to bring about a reduction in the total value of our exports or an increase in our imports is likely to create a deficit in our international accounts. Such a deficit would result in a loss of exchange reserves.

While, as I have said, our exchange reserves have recovered substantially since the end of 1947, they have not been restored to the level which is adequate for our needs. In these circumstances it is highly desirable to pursue policies which would help to prevent a deficit in our trading position.

The substantial devaluation of currencies throughout the sterling area, and in many other countries as well, cannot fail to have important implications for our balance of payments position. Many of our exports are bound to face increased price competition in both the non-dollar and dollar markets. At the same time the extensive exchange adjustments abroad will tend to result in an increase in the total value of our imports. While we stand ready to co-operate with the efforts of overseas countries to expand their sales to us we cannot receive more imports from all sources without going into deficit in our international accounts.

In these circumstances the government has decided to adjust the exchange value of the Canadian dollar to the extent considered necessary.

Canada's basic position will continue to be strong. Our exports have been and will continue to be competitive. Our production is efficient and our costs are relatively low. Because of these underlying factors the government has felt that an adjustment of 10 per cent is appropriate. Such a change requires consultation with but not the approval of the international monetary fund. This consultation took place today. An order in council has therefore been passed adjusting our exchange rates on the basis of a 10 per cent premium on the U.S. dollar. The chairman of the foreign exchange control board has been instructed to advise all authorized dealers and agents of the board that rates effective as from the opening of business Tuesday, September 20, will be as follows:

	Buying Rate in Canadian funds	Selling Rate in Canadian funds
U.S. dollar	$1.10	$1.10½
Pound sterling	3.07¼	3.08¾

With the permission of the house, I should like to table as part of my statement a copy of a joint communiqué which was issued following the joint discussions in Washington. With the consent of the house, it might be convenient if it were printed as an appendix to Hansard.

CONSIDERATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Boisvert for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): My mind reverts back, Mr. Speaker, to the day in 1946 when the initial parity move was made by the then Minister of Finance, the Right Hon. James Lorimer Ilsley. That initial mistake has had dire consequences which have resulted in this evening's move. As the house will remember, the move was made as an anti-inflation measure. In other words, the excuse given for the then parity move was to cushion the Canadian economy against the rapidly rising prices in the United States. Since then the net result has been that practically every succeeding month has seen an increased basic cost of living in Canada until last month it reached an all-time high. Therefore, from the point of view of preventing an increase in the cost of living and an increase in the dangerous pressure of inflation, the move was certainly not a success. Particularly was it not a success when it is considered that the cost of living in the United States has been falling, not substantially but quite considerably, for some time. Our parity move, instead of cushioning us against increasing the cost of living, actually resulted in a continuously increasing basic cost of living.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we came through more and more difficult trading conditions until the move that has been taken tonight became more and more obvious as each succeeding week went by. The fact is that our hard currency reserves did for a time actually increase, but only owing to the stringent austerity moves taken in that famous radio speech by the Minister of Finance in 1947, and only because of the import controls put into effect. Those import controls are a direct negation of what we built this country on, namely free and open international trade. They were necessary because after the parity move our hard currency and gold reserves ran out at such a rate that not only had they passed the danger point but they were approaching a state of near exhaustion. That was the result of the parity move: a continued increase in the cost of living and the rapid diminution of our hard currency and gold reserves. We then proceeded by steadily retrogressive steps to impose travel restrictions, currency restrictions, import quotas, prohibitions and exchange control more and more rigidly until we approached a state of considerable austerity.

Many vital imports, even of foodstuffs and machinery, were restricted from the United States—a necessary action, Mr. Speaker, because of the rapid drain on our currency resources, but not a move favoured by a young and virile country with an expanding economy, not a move that this country took happily or gladly. We then saw a continuous and gradually worsening international trading situation. We saw bilateral deals, barter pacts, exchange controls, multiple values of currencies and other subterfuges raised by many of the countries in order to overcome the regulations of the international monetary fund and the Bretton Woods agreements. We saw these things sweep the world like a plague. We saw the world divided, completely divided into a dollar and a non-dollar area. We were in a dollar area and every minute of every day our trade with the rest of the world became more and more difficult.

It was even suggested by the foreign exchange control board itself that we should enter into barter deals with the rest of the world. In fact, I believe that actually one or two barter deals were consummated. I want to speak very briefly on what barter deals mean. Barter deals mean nothing but state trade. If we enter into barter deals it means that a government agency is responsible for the sale of our goods abroad. We have seen what happens in the sale of wheat, and now coarse grains and many other agricultural products. If we entered into barter deals as between country and country it would mean that our entire economic life would be in the hands of the central government. This is state socialism and nothing else. Fortunately the Canadian people and the more conservative members of the Liberal party rejected state trading, barter and bilateral deals. But the rest of the world, because of the division of the world between dollar and non-dollar areas, was forced to take these steps, and as each new barter deal was consummated between other countries it was just one more area from which Canadian goods were excluded.

Some months ago it was calculated that nearly five hundred individual bilateral barter deals had been made throughout the rest of the non-dollar world out of a total possible of some 700. That is nearly three-quarters of all the non-dollar trade, and the non-Marshall trade was being done by barter agreements. That was a situation that Canada simply could not tolerate. This country was built on export trade, but it was built on multilateral and free export trade. We, in our own right, have built up the greatest per capita export trade of any country in the world. Not only that, but there is no country in the world which depends on export trade to the extent that we do in Canada. We depend on export trade and we are more vulnerable in the present situation than either the United Kingdom or the United States. That is a fact which is not generally appreciated by the public in Canada.

If our export trade fails, if we are unable to export the produce of our mines, our forests, our farms and our manufacturing industries, the economy of Canada comes to a standstill. That is the situation with which we are faced. There were two ways out of it. There was the way which the government has just taken. I would remind you, sir, of the ridicule, and scorn, heaped upon myself and my leader when we proposed the 10 per cent devaluation, which has just taken place, as one of the steps necessary to re-adjust our currency position. We were told, Mr. Speaker, that 10 per cent was a useless palliative, and would not cure the ills that beset this country. Fifteen minutes ago they adopted this useless palliative, and I say, Mr. Speaker, it is a useless palliative at the present time. It is inadequate now to cure the ills which beset us.

What are we faced with? We are still faced with a ninety-cent United States dollar. Those to whom we must sell must provide themselves not with one hundred cents of hard currency but with ninety cents of hard currency, and any country that has no hard currency is going to find it just as difficult to get that ninety cents of hard currency as it did to get a hundred cents of hard currency. The point is still that the trading economy of this country is in a strait-jacket.

During the last session we advocated the abolition of exchange control. We realized, Mr. Speaker, that our adherence to the Bretton Woods agreement and our membership in the international monetary fund required us by treaty to have our views presented to that organization before we took action. With that I am in entire agreement and concurrence. Rightly or wrongly we put our name to a treaty and we must stand by our name on that treaty. There were, however, and there have been for some time past, means which we could have taken to have overcome the difficulties which were gradually besetting us, and I say that they were troubling us a great deal more than they were either of the other two countries in the English-speaking partnership. We stood to suffer. We were the small country between the two great trading empires. Not only were we the small country. We were the small country with an enormous productivity and an enormous export trade. And yet we put ourselves in this strait-jacket of demanding payment in a currency or in gold which the other member of the union which was our principal customer could not provide itself with. If there was ever a time when it was the bounden duty of Canadian statesmen to do everything possible to break down this impasse in currency, then this is the time. This is a matter of nothing else but currency control. We have the goods the world wants, and we can produce them at competitive prices. We have the foodstuffs, we have the timber, we have the base metals, and a greatly expanded manufacturing industry efficient enough to compete with the rest of the world.

All we needed was the right type of chip to play in the game. But all through the years 1946, 1947, 1948 and 1949 the government said, "The game is going on; we must play it, but we are not going to try to provide ourselves with the right sort of chips." We maintained our tie with the American dollar, which as the months went on became more and more difficult for the rest of the world to acquire.

The economy of Europe has made a great recovery. However at the same time that it has made the recovery it has also entered the competitive markets of the world to a point where, instead of Europe being a great consuming market for Canadian goods, today Europe is becoming a competitor. We find industry after industry, first kept out of the market by our exchange rules, and now in the second place not only finding the market gone but, where there was once a market, finding now an active competitor.

There can be no solution for this impasse until we have a convertible currency. To attempt to fix the value of any currency by government edict is doomed to failure. It may continue even for a matter of years; but unless the world will freely and openly accept your currency at the amount at which you peg it, then what you say your currency is worth has no real or valid meaning. That has been the result in all attempts to control currencies throughout history. For a time they have succeeded. It is devoutly hoped that the courageous action taken by the United Kingdom will succeed at least until such time as she builds up a near equilibrium in trade. But it will not succeed if the world does not consider the English pound worth $2.80 in United States currency.

It is not for the government of England to say what that currency is worth. They pass a law saying it is worth so much; but they have to enforce that law by police action, just the same as we have to enforce our currency control law by police action. That is, the officials at the border must prevent people from having more than $150 in United States funds. Investigators have to watch service stations and tourist resorts to see that they do not accumulate United States dollars.

Increasing police action to control the value of our currency means that that currency is not freely accepted; and unless a currency is universally accepted at its face value, the exchange rate is not a true one. Twice in the House of Commons I have moved for the abolition of the foreign exchange control board. I realize however that to take precipitate action now is probably impossible. Unless we can do away with currency control, unless we can have a currency freely exchangeable in the markets of the world, we are deluding ourselves that real trade recovery is taking place. That is the situation today in Canada.

The current move, the move that was so hotly denied as likely to take place, yet one which has become more and more obvious and inevitable as time has gone on, will not in my opinion relieve the pressure on our economy. It will not make it easier for us to trade internationally. Let me say just one thing about international trade; unless we can build up a trade and maintain it with the entire world, we are going to become ever more dependent upon the United States market. As each market is lost to us and as each market becomes more and more restricted against us, because we still demand payment with 90 cents of hard currency, our trade will become more and more concentrated on the North American continent.

What does that mean? It means simply this, that we are becoming more and more dependent upon the United States for our economic well-being. Perhaps you say that that is as it should be, that no two countries have better feelings toward each other, that nowhere is there more genuine good will than is to be found between the United States and Canada, and that therefore they should trade. Quite right; they should; and the greater volume of trade we can carry on with the United States, the better. But if our trade becomes overwhelmingly with the United States, and if our markets elsewhere are either lost or so restricted that they are negligible, then the power exercised by a great industrial country ten times the size of us will be so great that our economic future will be in jeopardy. I want to make it very clear that if our economic future is in jeopardy our political future is also in jeopardy. If such a percentage of our trade is done with the United States, and if, by reason of depression, because of surplus products in the United States, or for other reasons, that market is closed to us either by government or economic action we shall find our economy virtually strangled. If so, Mr. Speaker, I warn the house that our future as an independent country is in grave jeopardy.

There can be no question of that. The history of the last twenty-five years in Europe has shown that a small country which became entirely dependent on a large neighbour lost its security and eventually its identity. The small countries which have remained have remained because they were virile traders and independent producers in their own right. The small countries that have disappeared have been those which became wholly dependent on their large neighbours. That is the grave danger which this country faces today. We must trade internationally to exist. We can no more allow ourselves to become wholly dependent on one market than we can afford not to co-operate with the other nations of the Atlantic pact.

Possibly never in our history has so grave a decision been necessary on the part of the Canadian people. Never before has the impact of international trade been so important to us in Canada. We must find a solution for the currency question. Artificially pegging currencies through the device of exchange control will not solve the problem. Entering into barter deals, bilateral agreements, will impose state trading agencies on this free country. The channeling of our trade overwhelmingly with the United States will make us so dependent on that country that our economic well-being will be in jeopardy.

There is one solution which I have suggested. My party adopted it as a part of its platform. It is still an important factor in the life of Canada. We have got to provide ourselves with a convertible currency. It is suggested that the only common denominator against which currencies can be compared is gold, or a currency freely convertible into gold at a fixed rate. The United States dollar, Mr. Speaker, does not fulfil those requirements because it is not convertible into gold on account of the United States Gold Act, which prevents nationals from buying gold at the statutory price of $35 in the United States. Therefore in order to establish a medium of exchange, and a way in which we could provide ourselves with a convertible currency, it is suggested that a free-gold market be established in Canada against which all other currencies would have their due and proper price. Not only that, it would provide a free market for currencies in Canada so that the buyer and the seller could meet in the open market place and carry out their trading deals.

If we do not get back to a condition of free trade we are faced with the acceptance of the socialist idea of blocked currencies, barter pacts, bilateral deals, or else, on the other hand, we must accept the domination and increasing control of our trade by our great partner on this continent.

The move taken tonight was ridiculed by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). In my opinion it is not the correct one, nor is it sufficient. Nevertheless we will continue to offer criticism and assistance to the government on this question. This is not a problem of party politics. This is a problem on which the very existence of Canada depends. If I thought the move already taken would be adequate or sufficient I would welcome it, but it restores the status that existed before 1946; it restores the currency to where it is 90 cents to the United States dollar in 1949 after the great inflationary expansion throughout the world has taken place.

It is for that reason, among many others, that I say that the move is inadequate. It does not solve the basic problem of convertibility and still keeps the economy of Canada in the strait-jacket of exchange control.

(Translation):

Mr. Raymond Bruneau (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, may I, at the outset, congratulate the hon. members for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) and for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) on their eloquent contributions on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

As a former translator of the debates of this house and of the Senate, as well as of the proceedings of the parliamentary committees, I wish, especially, to tender my most sincere compliments to the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska on the interesting and felicitous statement he has made in connection with the language we speak in this house. The French language, even though it may not be the one spoken in Paris, is nevertheless the pure language of the seventeenth century, which has immortalized Corneille, Racine and many others.

May I add, Mr. Speaker, that the matter of abolishing appeals to the privy council certainly evidences the Canadian nation's will to consecrate fully perhaps not its autonomy but surely its sovereignty. I would be tempted to repeat these words from a great Liberal leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the silver-tongued orator and former head of our great Liberal family: "I remember France who gave us life, I love England who gave us freedom, but I am bound to hold uppermost in my thoughts and turn my eyes to my Canada, my beloved country."

There is also, Mr. Speaker, the timely proposal made by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska in connection with a pension for disabled persons. The implementing of that suggestion would, I believe, remedy some deficiencies. I may say that since the election held on June 27, I have personally met some needy persons who, not being eligible for any other kind of pension, would at last obtain thereby some measure of relief.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, with your kind permission I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) and the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) upon their eloquent speeches in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I was pleased with the reference made by the hon. member for Vancouver South to the necessity of multilateral trade with other countries which had been referred to in the throne speech.

With that multilateral trade I feel that we shall be in position to realize the prophecy of another outstanding Liberal leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who less than fifty years ago said that while the nineteenth century was the century of progress, the century of the golden era for the United States, the twentieth century belonged to Canada. I think we have in the speech from the throne all that is necessary to realize that prophecy.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate but I feel that all hon. members who have been here for any length of time must be rather surprised that the debate on the speech from the throne should end so abruptly. I am rather surprised that the large number of new Liberal members would not want to take advantage of the opportunity offered by this first all-inclusive debate to speak of those things of which they must feel they are obligated to their constituents to speak.

Not being particularly prepared to speak, as I had hoped to speak at a later sitting, perhaps it would be a good thing for me to take this opportunity tonight to practise my next Sunday's sermon on this congregation. Seeing the way the vote went tonight on whether or not we should do away with the means test after so many Liberals had stated in the election campaign that they were in favour of doing that, I think a suitable topic for my sermon would be: Repent ye, lest ye all likewise perish; or I might possibly take as my text: Be sure your sins will find you out.

Considering that this is the first complete day we have had in this session, considering that we have listened with interest to the leaders of the various parties and have waited with some tension for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to make his statement, I think we have had a good and full day, and with that statement I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion negatived.

Mr. Hansell: I wish to thank the house for its courtesy in permitting me to continue the debate. I am amazed, Mr. Speaker, that this house should have rejected the amendment which was made to the main motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should like to call the hon. member's attention to the fact that it is not proper to reflect on the proceedings of the house. The amendment was put to the house.

Mr. Hansell: I was not going to debate the subject matter of the motion itself; I was going to analyse the political repercussions that might take place as a result of it.

I believe we all agree, however, that we are rather sorry the speech from the throne was not more definite with respect to the progress that might have been made in the matter of the social services in this country. We had been led to believe, when the Liberal party were bidding for power, that if they were returned to office we could expect great strides to be made in the field of social services. We regret that we do not find in the speech from the throne anything definite about legislation of that kind being brought down.

We are reminded that for the past few years, for instance, an unfortunate class of people in Canada known as incurables have been pressing, as much as they in their small way are able to press, for some consideration of their plight. Here are people who are, perhaps, crippled for life. They have no means of earning a livelihood. Perhaps they are what are known as shut-ins, bedridden cases. These people are thrown upon the mercy of municipalities to be included on the relief rolls or they are thrown upon the mercy of their own relatives and friends who may have enough interest in them to assist them.

Here is a class of people whose plea for some security should be heard by any responsible government. I say this because I had something to do with an organization known as the Canadian Association of Incurables. They are not asking much. They are not asking the government to revolutionize any system or turn everything upside down. Even if the government did that for them, it would be permissible. All they are asking is that they be placed in a position where they will not be dependent upon relatives or upon relief from the municipalities. Now, that is a reasonable request.

I wish to say this, and I am only reminding the appropriate minister of what I intimated to him during the last session, that these unfortunate people have no way of earning a livelihood. I prophesy that any legislation which the government may eventually bring down respecting social services will be of a contributory nature. Personally, I would be opposed to that, particularly as it might apply to old age pensions or to social services for these incurables, because the incurable has nothing to contribute to any insurance scheme. Any assistance rendered to them must be in the form of an outright gift. I do not agree with some who speak of the psychological repulsiveness of receiving anything from the state. I am not one of those who believe that it is something to be shunned. So far as incurables and old age pensioners are concerned, I believe that anyone who devotes his life to the welfare of Canada until he reaches the age of sixty-five or seventy is entitled to a pension by right of citizenship and not by virtue of any contribution he may be able to make to any scheme. That applies to men and women alike.

Furthermore, might I suggest that during his lifetime that person has not only put his life into the general welfare of Canada; throughout his life he has contributed under the scheme of taxation which this government, especially, deems it wise to impose upon our citizens. Considering all these things, I say that our aged citizens have a right to some reward for good citizenship. If not, then we are living in Canada under a system of dog eat dog, get all you can and let the other fellow go by the board. This does not contribute to a healthy, loyal Canadian citizenship. I say that our aged people have a right to expect a pension. And when I say "pension" I use the term in the sense of a pension and not in the sense of a return on an insurance scheme. The return from an insurance scheme is to my mind not a pension at all; it is simply getting back something that you put into it. That might be all right. On the side you can do that. Many insurance companies offer pension schemes. Any citizen can take advantage of one of them if he so desires. But, in addition to those schemes that are managed by insurance companies, why cannot our aged citizens or any of our citizens look forward to a time when they may retire with honour on a real pension given to them as a right of their citizenship? That is what I plead for.

Referring now once again to the incurables I certainly believe they have a right to an honourable existence; and an honourable existence means not a handout in the form of the crumbs that fall from the taxpayers' table, but the right to an honourable and decent living because they are our Canadian sons and daughters. I believe that is only reasonable, and that it is not asking too much.

With respect to old age pensions, I believe that the age limit should be lowered to at least sixty-five. Personally I should like to see it lowered to sixty for aged women and at least to sixty-five for aged men. I believe the pension should be increased, especially now since the announcement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) tonight with respect to the devaluation of our dollar. As far as I can see, the cost of living will naturally go up now because our people will not be able to buy as much for their depreciated dollar as they have in the past. What effect will that have upon the old age pensioner who must get along now anyway on what might be considered a pittance? I know that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is sometimes inclined to strut around a little bit and to pat himself on the back because the allowable pension has been increased in the last little while and the old age pensioner is getting more now than he did in previous years. But I wonder if he is really getting any more. You cannot measure what he gets in cold hard figures of dollars and cents. The way to measure what he gets is by what his present pension will buy now compared with what it would buy some years ago when he did not get as much. If his pension at the present rate will not buy as much food and clothing, and as good housing, as it did when he was getting $20 a month, then he is not getting as much today as he was getting then. That is the way to calculate whether or not the old age pensions have been increased.

There is sometimes some difficulty over the complicated way in which old age pensioners must prove their age. I am not going to be too hard on the administration in that respect, because I quite agree that, if the age is to be seventy, there should be some way for the applicant to be able to prove within reason that he has reached that age. But complications have arisen many times because a good many of our citizens who have reached the age of seventy cannot prove their age by virtue of its being registered somewhere in the vital statistics of this country. Seventy years ago mothers and fathers were not so particularly careful about whether the births of their children were registered or not. I am informed that some countries did not even register the birth of their infants seventy years ago, and sometimes it is difficult for people to find those certificates.

I know that the administration do not wish to cut anyone off. Those in charge of the various pension boards throughout the country have no desire to deny a pension to an applicant if he is seventy years of age. But somehow or other there are a good many things they will not accept as proof of age when, to my mind, the proof is quite reasonable. I believe that some type of medical evidence could be given. There are other ways in which age could be proved.

May I now branch off to another subject, Mr. Speaker. We have been told that the present Liberal administration is anxious to build a trans-Canada highway. Personally, I have not been able to fully convince myself that the present administration is not playing with the problem. I do not see that there is any problem in building an all-Canada highway. I do not see that there is any problem about asking a provincial government if they desire a highway to go through their province. I do not see that there is any problem about asking a provincial government if they would like to accept several million dollars in order to improve a certain highway through their province. I have yet to be convinced that the government is serious about putting through an all-weather, all-year-round, paved highway from one end of this country to the other. I know that considerable pressure has been put on various governments, provincial and federal, to have highways go through this, that or the other route. When some delegations have waited upon the premier of Alberta they have said, "We should like the highway to go this way." There seem to be about three "main drags" through that province by which it could go. There is the one from Medicine Hat, down to Lethbridge, through the Crowsnest pass, Nelson, and on that way. I would have no objections if it went that way. Then there is the other route, through Medicine Hat to Calgary and through Banff and on through that way. I have no particular objection to that. Then there is the other route which concerns many people. That is the northern route by way of Saskatoon, Lloydminster, Edmonton, Jasper, Yellowhead and down that way.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is that below Vulcan?

Mr. Hansell: I will give my friend an answer to that. When this delegation appeared before Premier Manning, what did he say? He said, "I can answer yes as far as this province is concerned to any of the routes, because our objective is, as far as Alberta is concerned, to put three highways through."

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: My hon. friend does not have to laugh at that. All he has to do is to go into Alberta now and he will find that two of them are practically complete. What the other provinces do in connecting these three highways is their own business. But I do say that there is no reason in the world why a country as wealthy as Canada in natural resources, and in what-have-you—we have everything—should not have one of the best highways on this continent running from coast to coast. We have all the gravel we need; we have all the cement we need; we have all the sand we need; we have all the oil we need; we have all these component parts that go into the paving of a highway and—

Mr. Johnston: No American dollars.

Mr. Hansell: We have not got enough of somebody else's money, a sort of crazy idea, I think. Perhaps Bernard Shaw was right when he said that if some race of people from some other planet could look down upon this earth and discover how we were running things, especially if they looked at Canada and the Liberal administration, they would conclude that this little planet would make a good lunatic asylum for the rest of the universe.

We have all sorts of materials; we have manpower. There is gradually becoming an unemployment problem in Canada. I am not going to paint the picture too dark. We have all sorts of materials, we have all sorts of manpower, but somehow or other we cannot get enough figures in bankers' books to be able to effect the exchange of goods to the extent that we can have that cement or that asphalt or whatever it takes to make a highway across there.

You know, we have a lot of brains in Canada.

Mr. Cruickshank: You would never know it.

Mr. Hansell: But somehow or other we have not enough brains to make financial figures fit the physical facts. We believe we have some in this corner of the house. But if governments and administrations want to stumble on in their stupidity about this thing, let them do so. The day will come when force of circumstances will perhaps change the minds of even the Liberal administration.

May I ask that the government stop playing around with this all-Canada highway business. Perhaps, as the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) reminds me, that will be one of the planks in their next election platform. We want to see something materialize a long time before the next election rolls around. There is no reason why that highway cannot be started almost immediately. It is granted that winter might hold up some parts of the country. There is no reason why that highway cannot be completed in one or two years. When I say "that highway" I do not mean a lot of gravel on some prairie trail. I mean a highway to be proud of, a highway throughout Canada such as there is from Toronto to Hamilton or from Calgary to Edmonton or through the Crowsnest pass so far. I want it to be a real highway, so let them stop playing around with this thing. Let them get down to business and tell the world. Let us tell our American friends that if they come to Canada they will be able to get home safely.

I was in Vancouver this summer on a little vacation. I must say I went by way of the United States because I felt that with my wife and family we could ride more smoothly and enjoyably on a United States highway, at least between Spokane and Seattle, than we could on the present route through British Columbia.

Mr. Cruickshank: That was after the 27th.

Mr. Hansell: My friend reminds me that I went there after June 27. It was the end of July, and I still found a tremendous lot of wind and fog out in British Columbia. The air was not a bit clear. As a matter of fact, when I was looking around for information they said to me, "For goodness sake don't go through the Fraser valley because the fog and wind are so thick and hot there that you will never get out alive". I am sure it could not be that bad because our friend the member for Fraser Valley is here with us again to delight our hearts with his comments; and since democracy has spoken we are of course pleased to welcome him back. I must confess that I did speak in his constituency. What was I speaking about? Oh, the all-Canada highway. In order to safeguard the welfare of my family when I went to Vancouver I decided to go by way of Spokane and Seattle because I did not want to risk driving that route over those mountains where you can look down a few miles with not a stone to keep you from going over the side. I put up at a small tourist cabin in Vancouver, and became engaged in conversation with an American tourist who gave the appearance of an outstanding gentleman. He said, "I see you are from Alberta. Which way did you come?" I replied, "I came by Spokane and Seattle." "Oh", he said, "you did not come on this Big Bend road?" I said, "No, I have never travelled that road." "Good for you", he said; "I came that way, but I shall never, never travel that road again."

That conversation reflects the impressions gained by an American tourist. I am not saying British Columbia has not done a good deal in connection with its highways, because they have some very beautiful ones—almost as good as those we have in Alberta. I cannot blame the government of British Columbia for what that man said. I realize it takes time to build highways, and that the funds in the hands of provincial governments are limited.

But I do say this, that since last year the government made the pronouncement that they were going to do something in respect of an all-Canada highway; and since they went into the election campaign proclaiming to the four winds of the earth that they were going to do something about that highway, we want to see it done—and we do not mean during the next election. We mean right now. There is no reason why we should have to route our traffic through another country, thus missing some of the best tourist attractions to be found anywhere in the world. When I say that, I am referring to the beautiful scenery.

There are many subjects clamouring in my mind concerning which I might go on until after midnight. However, rather than take a half hour to develop another subject I shall be pleased to give the floor to my hon. friend.

On motion of Mr. Balcer the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: It is intended tomorrow to proceed with the second reading of the bill in the name of the Minister of Justice to amend the Supreme Court Act and, when that is disposed of, to move that the house resolve itself into committee of supply to consider the estimates. If we get into committee we will ask to have five departments opened, so that on Tuesdays and Fridays we may consider the estimates of those departments. Hon. members realize that on Fridays we cannot start on a department which has not been introduced on another day of the week. If we get into supply we will ask to mention five departments, and to proceed with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Appendix A

TEXT OF JOINT COMMUNIQUE ISSUED FOLLOWING BRITISH-UNITED STATES-CANADIAN MONETARY TALKS IN WASHINGTON

1. Representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, and Canada have met during the past week to examine the trade and financial relationships between the sterling area and the dollar area. The pound and the dollar are the two principal world trading currencies. While the development of a satisfactory balance of payments between the two areas is a matter of fundamental concern to the democratic world, it involves many problems which concern in the first instance the governments which are the centres of these two currency systems. The present discussions were held to examine these problems. It was recognized that the task of working out conditions under which world trade can develop steadily and in increasing freedom will require a strenuous and sustained effort, not only on the part of the United States, the United Kingdom, and Canada, but also by all other countries desiring the same objectives.

2. It was agreed that the common aim is to work toward an ultimate solution which will maintain employment and establish equilibrium of international trade on a mutually profitable basis at high levels. These objectives and general course of action have already been set forth in the United Nations Charter, the Bretton Woods agreements, and the Havana charter for an international trade organization. It was the broad purpose of the present meetings to explore, within this general framework, various specific measures which the three governments might take to prevent a serious breakdown in the dollar-sterling relationships which would have led to a crippling limitation of dollar imports into the sterling area and to hasten the achievement of those objectives.

3. These conversations have carried forward the consultations initiated in London during July 8-10. They have resulted in a clear understanding of the character of the difficulties to be faced and an increasing realization that a fully satisfactory solution will necessitate continuing efforts in many directions. In the course of these conversations it has become possible to discuss with complete frankness specific problems and the types of measures which will have to be taken if the three countries are to achieve their common purpose.

4. In the early stages of the discussion, attention was given to the immediate problem confronting the United Kingdom and the rest of the sterling area as a result of the rapid decline of gold and dollar reserves. Note was taken by the three governments of the emergency action which sterling area countries have decided to take to meet this situation. These measures are not pleasant ones; they will cause difficulties and sacrifices for everyone concerned. Nevertheless, they are a temporary necessity, and are recognized as such by all three governments.

5. The ministers were in complete agreement that no permanent solution to the problem could be found in the emergency steps contemplated. A more fundamental attempt would have to be made by all concerned to expand the dollar earnings of the sterling area and to increase the flow of investment from the North American continent to the rest of the world, including the sterling area.

6. This more fundamental attempt would involve both separate actions of the three countries operating individually, and joint action by the three acting in co-operation with each other. In approaching these possibilities of individual and joint action on the sterling-dollar problem, there was common agreement that this action should be based on the assumption that extraordinary aid from the North American continent would have come to an end by the middle of 1952. This would require that the sterling area increase its dollar earnings so as to pay its way by 1952. This would require in the sterling area the creation of appropriate incentives to exporters to the dollar area and a vigorous attack upon costs of production to enhance the competitive position of sterling area products. Maximum efforts would be made to direct exports to the dollar area and build up earnings from tourism and other services. As a part of this export campaign by the sterling area countries, it was recognized that an essential element was the creation of a feeling of confidence on the part of sterling area exporters. They must feel that they will be afforded the opportunity to remain in the markets of the United States and Canada in which they will have gained a place, and that the minimum of difficulties will be placed in their way in entering those markets.

On their part the creditor countries undertook to facilitate, to the greatest extent feasible, an expansion of dollar earnings by debtor countries, including the sterling area. It was agreed that the United States and Canada should reduce obstacles to the entry of goods and services from debtor countries, in order to provide as wide an opportunity as possible for those countries to earn dollars through the export of goods and the provision of services, including tourism. It was recognized that such a policy would be in the interest of producers in the United States and Canada, for only in this way can the future level of trade provide adequately for those sectors of the American and Canadian economies which depend in considerable part upon foreign markets.

7. The discussion of possible individual and joint actions, both long-run and short-run, ranged over a wide field. In addition to the question of dollar earnings of the United Kingdom and the rest of the sterling area, mentioned above, the ministers gave special attention to the following subjects:

1. Overseas investment
2. Commodity arrangements and stockpiling
3. Limitations on items which may be financed under present ECA procedures
4. Customs procedures
5. Tariff policy
6. Liberalization of intra-European trade and payments
7. Sterling balances
8. Petroleum
9. Shipping
10. Provisions for continuing consultation

8. A working group on overseas investment reviewed both recent experience and future prospects for the flow of productive investment, both private and public, from North America to overseas areas, especially underdeveloped countries. It was agreed that a high level of such investment could make an important contribution toward reducing the sterling-dollar disequilibrium and that every aspect of this problem should be explored on a continuing basis. In order to initiate this work, the President's Committee for Financing Foreign Trade will be asked immediately to explore possible lines of action in co-operation with corresponding groups of British and Canadian financial and business representatives. While dealing with all aspects of private and public investment, the committee will be expected to address itself especially to the problem of incentives and of providing a suitable environment for a high level of private investment.

9. A working group on commodity arrangements and stockpiling gave special attention to rubber and tin. The Canadian representatives stated that the Canadian government was prepared to take steps to increase reserve stocks of tin and rubber in Canada. The United States representatives reported that the United States government was prepared to open to natural rubber a substantial additional area of competition, including a modification of the government order relating to the consumption of synthetic rubber. The United States would review its stockpiling program, with particular reference to rubber and tin.

10. Special attention was given by another group to the practical difficulty being experienced by the United Kingdom in making fully effective use of its ECA aid to cover its dollar deficit. This difficulty arises out of the fact that, although the United Kingdom needs dollars to pay for goods in the United States, to make settlements with other countries, to pay for services, and for other purposes, the types of transactions which may be financed by ECA dollars have been definitely limited. It has been agreed that, in order to carry out the basic purposes of the Economic Co-operation Act, it will be necessary for the United Kingdom to finance with its share of ECA funds a wider range of dollar expenditures than has hitherto been eligible, both within and outside of the United States. After careful examination of the dollar expenditures proposed to be made or authorized by the United Kingdom, it appears that eligibility requirements can be broadened to the extent required within the limits set by the Economic Co-operation Act. This would broaden the use but not increase the amount of ECA funds allocated to the United Kingdom.

11. In the consideration of measures which creditor countries might take to reduce barriers to trade, it was recognized that customs procedures may create obstacles, psychological as well as actual. Technical discussions of this subject disclosed that the United States, through administrative action and proposed legislation, was already contemplating constructive steps in this field. Canadian representatives stated that the Canadian government would undertake a further review of the administrative operation of its Customs Act in the light of these discussions. As to tariff rates, it was noted that high tariffs were clearly inconsistent with the position of creditor countries. There had already been significant and substantial reductions in U.S. tariffs during the last fifteen years. The policy of the United States government was to seek further negotiation of trade agreements through which additional reductions might be made, within the framework of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

12. There was agreement that one of the ways in which the competitive position of the United Kingdom products might be improved was by a widening of the area in which such products competed freely with those of other countries. In this connection as an initial step toward a more general liberalization the United Kingdom delegation outlined its proposals for liberalizing trade with countries with which it did not have balance of payments difficulties, and raised the question whether the provisions of section 9 of the Anglo-American Financial Agreement, and article 5 of the Anglo-Canadian Financial Agreement presented an obstacle to such a plan. It was the view of the United States and Canadian delegations that such liberalization of United Kingdom import regulations should be considered since the United Kingdom shortage of dollars should not in itself force the United Kingdom to reduce its purchases from areas with which it does not have a shortage of means of payment. It was agreed that any United Kingdom import regulations as they affect United States and Canadian products would be the subject of continuing review by representatives of the three governments through continuing facilities for consultation.

13. (a) A further subject which was discussed was the United Kingdom liability represented by the sterling balances of other countries. A large number of countries has been accustomed to hold either all or a part of their foreign exchange reserves in the form of sterling. The existence and availability of such holdings is an integral feature of the wide-spread multilateral use of sterling for the purpose of financing international trade. One of the problems of the post-war period has been the existence of exceptionally large accumulations of sterling which were built up, mainly during the war, as the result of payments by the United Kingdom for goods and services purchased overseas in furtherance of the common war effort. In June 1945 these balances amounted to $13½ billion. Since then there have been considerable fluctuations both in the total and in the holdings of individual countries, though the amount outstanding at the end of 1948 was approximately the same as at June 1945.

(b) In principle the whole of these balances represents a charge on United Kingdom production of goods and services. In practice, however, a substantial proportion will continue to be held as reserves by the countries concerned. To the extent that the balances are liquidated, some proportion of United Kingdom production of goods and services is used to discharge this liability instead of to pay for current imports of goods and services.

(c) This whole problem in its various aspects, including the necessity to provide capital goods for development, was discussed in a preliminary way on the basis of prior technical examination by the experts of the three governments. It was agreed that this was one of the subjects which concerned other countries and would require further study.

14. Investigation of the ways in which the sterling area could move toward a position in which it could earn its own way led to the discussion of other special problems, including petroleum and shipping—two important elements in the sterling area balance of payments picture. The United Kingdom representatives set forth the facts of the very large dollar deficit which the sterling area presently incurs because of oil transactions, and their desire to reduce this deficit to the minimum possible level. It was mutually recognized that the question of oil production and refining, and geographical distribution raised problems of extreme complexity involving the protection of legitimate interests of the major producing countries and companies. The ministers recognized that these two questions of petroleum and shipping could not be resolved in the short time available to them, and that further study would be required. In the case of petroleum they agreed to appoint representatives to analyze the facts and to provide the basis for subsequent discussions.

15. There has been agreement on the objective toward which policies should be directed and agreement on certain immediate steps which will be taken to bring that objective nearer. There are, however, as has been emphasized, a number of questions requiring closer examination than this short conference has allowed. It is proposed, therefore, to continue the examinations, initiated during the conference, of questions on which it is hoped that useful understanding can be reached under the direction of the present ministerial group. These arrangements for continuing consultation—supplementing the usual channels of communication between governments—will be used to keep under review the effectiveness of actions already agreed upon and to prepare, for governmental consideration, measures which could carry further those adjustments which are considered to be necessary. In establishing these arrangements for continuing consultation, the three governments wish to emphasize that these arrangements underline rather than diminish their interest in the development of economic co-operation within the entire community of western nations. The tripartite arrangements will not in any way encroach upon, or detract from, the area of competence of the OEEC and other existing organs of international economic collaboration. On the contrary, these arrangements for continuing consultation by contributing materially to the solution of problems which today adversely affect the working of the entire OEEC group and yet are not susceptible of solution within that group, will facilitate the progress of economic collaboration in the wider field.

16. In summary the ministers of the three countries concerned are satisfied that a real contribution to the solution of the sterling-dollar difficulties has been made by the conclusions recorded above. They are confident that, with sustained efforts on all sides and with the seizure of every opportunity by sterling area exporters to enter into and remain in dollar markets which are open to them, there is the prospect of reaching a satisfactory equilibrium between the sterling and dollar areas by the time exceptional dollar aid comes to an end.

Tuesday, September 20, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

EXPORTS FROM MARITIMES—QUESTION AS TO PAYMENT IN STERLING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. H. Hatfield (Victoria-Carleton): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the exporters of surplus potatoes, fish, lumber, and other commodities of the maritime provinces be allowed to accept sterling in payment for exports to the British West Indies and South American countries, thereby retaining those markets which they have built up over the years?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I received notice of the question a few minutes ago. I will give an answer tomorrow.

IMPERIAL DISABILITY PENSIONS—EFFECT OF DEVALUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): In view of the devaluation of the pound and the plight of imperial pensioners in this country, I should like to ask two questions. Will the Canadian government continue to adjust the exchange rates on imperial disability pensions paid to Canadian citizens domiciled in Canada at the time of enlistment? Has the position of other imperial disability pensioners been brought to the attention of the British government, and if so, does the minister know whether the British government is giving consideration to adjustments of imperial disability pensions paid in Canada to offset the loss occasioned by the devaluation of the pound?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The answer to the first question is yes. The answer to the second question is that I do not know whether or not the British government has given consideration to this matter.

COMBINES

OPTICAL COMPANIES AND BREAD COMPANIES—QUESTION AS TO PROSECUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I should like to ask whether the Department of Justice has taken any action against the companies mentioned in the reports of the investigations under the Combines Investigation Act into the optical and bread business.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The answer is that in both of these instances the preparation of the case and the handling of it are in the hands of counsel who I understand are making as swift progress as they can.

SUPREME COURT ACT

VARIOUS AMENDMENTS—ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

He said: In its progress towards full self-government, Canada until the present time has retained two badges of colonialism. The first is that we must petition the United Kingdom parliament to pass a United Kingdom statute which alone can amend our Canadian constitution. The second is that the ultimate determination of Canadian statute and other laws is the responsibility of the judicial committee of the privy council, a United Kingdom court.

The bill which is now before us will strip off the second of these badges by abolishing appeals to the privy council. In that sense it represents an important step towards complete nationhood for our country.

Clause 3 of the bill sets out its principle, and its major purpose, namely, to create in the Supreme Court of Canada exclusive, ultimate, appellate civil and criminal jurisdiction within and for Canada by abolishing appeals to the privy council and by making the judgment of the Supreme Court final and conclusive in all cases.

No principle is involved in the other sections of the bill. They are either consequential or they clarify the law without significantly changing its substance. I would suggest, therefore, that they can be discussed to a greater advantage in committee.

Clause 3 deals with one of the most vital parts of the mechanism of government in Canada. When in 1875-76, the United Kingdom Colonial Secretary, the Earl of Carnarvon, was carrying on a spirited discussion with Hon. Edward Blake, then Attorney General of Canada, on the very matter we now have before us, a memorandum of the United Kingdom privy council said this with regard to this matter of supreme appellate authority:

> The supreme appellate authority of the empire or the realm is unquestionably one of the highest functions and duties of sovereignty. The power of construing, determining, and enforcing the law in the last resort, is, in truth, a power which overrides all other powers; since there is no act which may not in some form or other become the subject of a decision by the supreme appellate tribunal and that tribunal can alone determine the limits of its own jurisdiction.
> This power has been exercised for centuries as regards the dependencies of the empire by the sovereigns of this country in council; that is to say, the sovereign to whom the prayer for relief is addressed affords that relief, with and by the advice of a certain number of the most eminent judicial officers and jurists of the realm, who are sworn of the privy council for this purpose. The final order made on each appeal is the direct act of the queen in person. So that by this institution, common to all parts of the empire beyond the seas, all matters whatsoever, requiring a judicial solution, may be brought under the cognizance of one court—

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to note this particularly.

> —in which all the chief judicial authorities of this country (the United Kingdom) have a voice.

I suppose, sir, that at first blush one might think that the words "a power which overrides all other powers", are rather strong language. I am sure that brief reflection on the effect that judicial interpretation of the British North America Act has had upon our ability in this country to deal effectively with questions of social welfare, marketing, and the fluctuations in the business cycle, will indicate that this statement is perhaps not quite as strong as it may at first appear.

At any rate, the situation today is that the supreme appellate authority of Canada, the power of construing, determining and enforcing the law of Canada in the last resort, a power which this United Kingdom memorandum says is one which overrides all other powers, is still vested in a United Kingdom court in which all of the chief judicial authorities of the United Kingdom have a voice, but in which Canada, from time to time, has had but a slight voice or none at all.

It is this situation with which clause 3 of the present bill deals. I should like, therefore, to discuss at some length this clause, its background, and its implications.

The section of the British North America Act which we are invoking to pass this bill now before us is section 101, the relevant portion of which reads as follows:

> "The parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this act, from time to time, provide for the constitution, maintenance and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada . . ."

What immediately strikes a casual reader, is that the language of section 101 of the British North America Act empowering this parliament to establish a federal appeal court with ultimate and exclusive jurisdiction is clear and unequivocal. But until the passage of the Statute of Westminster, 1931, the legislative power thus created was not the power of a sovereign state. According to the decisions of the privy council it was the legislative power of a British colony and subject to three constitutional bars which prevented this parliament from effectively exercising it in order to create a court of last resort in Canada.

The first of these three bars was the Colonial Laws Validity Act. This act provided that any colonial law which conflicted with any United Kingdom statute applicable to the colony was void to the extent of that conflict. Since at that time there were imperial statutes which gave a right of appeal to the privy council it followed that under the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, neither the dominion nor the provinces could then validly legislate so as to abolish this right of appeal given by the imperial statute.

The second constitutional bar to the abolition of privy council appeals by either the dominion parliament or the provincial legislatures was the legal doctrine of extraterritoriality. This doctrine was that each colonial legislature could legislate only as regards matters within its own geographical territory. The so-called prerogative right of appeal to the privy council, or, as the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) mentioned yesterday, the appeal as a matter of grace, was, as Viscount Sankey put it in the British coal case, "a residuum of the royal prerogative of the sovereign as the fountain of justice." Since this fountain was situated in the United Kingdom, it was beyond Canada's territorial jurisdiction, and no Canadian legislature was competent to pass laws abolishing or dealing with it.

The third constitutional bar was the express terms of section 129 of the British North America Act itself. This section provided that all the laws in force at the time of confederation, in Upper Canada, Lower Canada, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, should continue, subject to repeal or amendment by the parliament of Canada or by the respective provincial legislatures. But this section specifically excepted imperial laws—that is, laws of the United Kingdom—in force in these four provinces at confederation. Therefore, since the right of appeal from these provinces to the privy council had been legislated upon by the United Kingdom parliament, it followed that this right of appeal was specifically excepted from this section 129 of the British North America Act; and that the parliament of Canada was not considered competent to abolish it.

Such, then, was the legal position of this matter before the passage by the parliament of the United Kingdom of the Statute of Westminster, 1931. As you, Mr. Speaker, will recall, this statute was passed to give effect to certain resolutions which had been arrived at by the imperial conferences of the United Kingdom and the various dominions of the British commonwealth, held in the years 1926 and 1930.

Some of the older members will recall that the late Hon. C. H. Cahan was of the opinion that the passage of the Statute of Westminster in 1931 had removed the constitutional bars to which I have just referred. Acting in that belief, he introduced in this parliament in the year 1938 a bill to abolish privy council appeals, the main operative provisions of which were identical in substance with the clause 3 which we are now considering. Mr. Cahan's bill, after some consideration by parliament, was referred to the courts for a ruling whether it was within the power of this parliament to enact. In due course this reference came before the judicial committee of the privy council, which held in its judgment—cited as the Attorney General of Ontario v. the Attorney General of Canada, 1947, A.C. 127—that the Statute of Westminster had indeed removed these three constitutional bars, and that the draft bill under consideration by the court in that case was within the power of the parliament of Canada to enact.

Some parts of the privy council judgment are so relevant to the present discussion—that is, although they deal with legal matters they are relevant to the political issue whether or not we should pass the present bill—that I venture to quote from them. For example, their lordships said:

> It is in the light of this act of transcendent constitutional importance—

They were referring, of course, to the Statute of Westminster, 1931.

> —that the question must now be considered whether it is competent for the parliament of Canada to enact not only that the supreme court of the dominion shall have appellate—civil and criminal jurisdiction within and for Canada, but also that that jurisdiction shall be "exclusive" and "ultimate." This question must be considered under two heads, first, in regard to appeals from the supreme court itself, and secondly, in regard to appeals direct from the provincial courts to His Majesty in council.

With respect to appeals from the supreme court itself, their lordships found that there could be no doubt as to parliament's power to abolish them. Once the fetter upon the legislative power of the dominion could be removed and had been removed by the Statute of Westminster, it followed that the power of the dominion parliament to enact that the jurisdiction of its own supreme court should be ultimate was beyond question. As they put it—and I bespeak careful consideration of these words—"No other solution is consonant with the status of a self-governing dominion".

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Who is speaking there?

Mr. Garson: Their lordships of the privy council.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The minister does not know which one?

Mr. Garson: No. As the hon. member knows they give only the one judgment.

This statement of the legal position has a bearing upon the political position. We who submit this bill to the consideration of parliament can and do justify the passage of clause 3 upon the grounds that no other solution than that of abolishing these appeals is consonant with the status of Canada as a self-governing nation.

The privy council went on to deal with appeals direct from the provincial courts to His Majesty in council. They pointed out that it was in regard to these appeals that the validity of the bill had been most strenuously challenged. That was indeed the case, because when the Supreme Court of Canada found that the bill in its entirety—with two dissenting judgments, one a complete dissent and the other a partial dissent—was within the power of parliament to enact, an appeal was taken from that judgment by the Attorney General of Ontario and three other provincial attorneys general. The respondent in the case was the Attorney General of Canada, joined by the attorneys general of two provinces, one of whom, I am very happy to say, was the Attorney General of my own province of Manitoba. Therefore in the proceedings before the privy council on this appeal, the Attorney General of the United Kingdom having taken no part at all, the real contest was between the dominion and certain of the provinces on the one hand and others of the provinces on the other. And as their lordships point out in their judgment, it was in regard to this question whether the appeals brought from the provincial courts should be abolished that the validity of the act had been most strenuously challenged. Their lordships came to the conclusion that the dominion was competent to exclude appeals not only in criminal cases, not only in civil cases falling within the subject matter of section 91—which is the section of the British North America Act dealing with these matters coming under federal legislative jurisdiction—but also in every other case which can be brought before any provincial court in Canada. Upon this point their comment is as follows:

In coming to this conclusion, their lordships do not think it useful to embark on a nice discrimination between the legislative powers contained in sections 91—

That is the dominion powers.

That is the provincial powers.

—respectively of the act. Nor, as it appears to them, is it necessary to determine whether the words of head 14 of section 92, "The Administration of Justice in the Province," would, if they were disembarrassed of any context, be apt to embrace legislation in regard to appeals to His Majesty in council. There appear to be cogent reasons for thinking that they would not. But their lordships do not make this the ground of their decision; for it is elsewhere, it is in section 101 of the act that the solution lies.

Then they go on to quote from the language of the former Chief Justice of Canada, Sir Lyman Duff, in his judgment in the very case which was then under consideration by the privy council, and they quote him in these words:

Assuming even that section 92 gives some authority to the legislatures (of the provinces) in respect to appeals to the privy council—

That is to say that if head 14 of section 92, concerning the administration of justice within the provinces, were considered as giving the provinces some authority with respect to appeals to the privy council, nevertheless says Sir Lyman Duff:

—that cannot detract from the power of parliament under section 101. Whatever is granted by the words of the section, read and applied as prima facie intended to endow parliament with power to effect high political objects concerning the self-government of the dominion (section 3 of the B.N.A. Act) in the matter of judicature, is to be held and exercised as a plenary power in that behalf with all ancillary powers necessary to enable parliament to attain its objects fully and completely. So read it imports authority to establish a court having supreme and final appellate jurisdiction in Canada.

That is the end of the quotation of Sir Lyman Duff. Then I go on with the language of the privy council judgment itself, as follows:

The vital words in the passage cited, with which their lordships are in full agreement, are the words in the last line, "and final,". But in the opinion of their lordships the same considerations lead to the conclusion that the court so established must have not only "final" or "ultimate" but also exclusive appellate jurisdiction. They would emphasize that section 101 confers a legislative power upon the dominion parliament which by its terms overrides any power conferred by section 92 upon the provinces or preserved by section 129.

"Notwithstanding anything in this act" are words in section 101 which cannot be ignored. They vest in the dominion a plenary authority to legislate in regard to appellate jurisdiction, which is qualified only by that which lies outside the act, namely, the sovereign power of the imperial parliament... What then is the power of the dominion parliament since the Statute of Westminster has come into operation? . . . To their lordships it appears reasonably plain that, since . . . the subject in conflict belongs primarily to the subject matter committed to the dominion parliament, namely the establishment of the court of appeal for Canada, to that parliament also must belong the power not only to determine in what cases and under what conditions the appellate jurisdiction of that court may be invoked, but also to deny appellate jurisdiction to any other court.

Then notice the next sentence:

The natural attribute of sovereign power was no doubt qualified by an external constitutional limitation, namely, the existence of imperial statutes, but, given the power——to abrogate such statutes, the authority conferred by section 101 stands unqualified and absolute.

Which is contained in the Statute of Westminster.

Then their lordships go on to say this, which has a bearing on the political questions with which we are concerned here today:

Giving full weight to the circumstances of the union and to the determination shown by the provinces as late as the imperial conferences, which led to the Statute of Westminster, that their rights should be unimpaired, nevertheless it appears to their lordships that it is not consistent with the political conception which is embodied in the British commonwealth of nations that one member of that commonwealth should be precluded from setting up, if it so desires, a supreme court of appeal having a jurisdiction both ultimate and exclusive of any other member. The regulation of appeal is, to use the words of Lord Sankey in the British Coal Corporation case, a "prime element in Canadian sovereignty," which would be impaired if at the will of its citizens recourse could be had to a tribunal in the constitution of which it had no voice.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that, based upon the language of the judgment, the question before us today is whether we are to use our undoubted legal powers to regulate the appeals from our own courts to our own supreme court of ultimate appeal. Are we to exercise this prime element in our sovereignty by providing our own courts of ultimate appeal? Later in the judgment their lordships say:

It is, in fact, a prime element in the self-government of the dominion that it should be able to secure through its own courts of justice that the law should be one and the same for all its citizens. This result is attainable only if section 101 now authorizes the establishment of a court with final and exclusive appellate jurisdiction.

Again I say that the question we must decide is: Do we wish to provide our citizens with the prime element in self-government of our dominion, that the law should be one and the same for all its citizens? If so, are we prepared to attain this result in the only way possible by authorizing, as we seek to do in the bill now before us, the establishment of a court with final and exclusive appellate jurisdiction?

Well, sir, I submit that there can be only one answer to these questions, and that an affirmative one.

This is the present condition of the law as interpreted by the privy council in the year 1947, and of course applicable today. I have gone into the text of the judgment at some length in order to show how the Statute of Westminster has established unqualified and absolute rights in this parliament with the natural attributes of the sovereign power of a nation having complete powers of self-government—or, to be precise, having available to it, for the asking, complete powers of self-government.

From now on the only impediment to our governing ourselves fully and completely is our own inability to agree among ourselves, first, whether we should do so, and, if so, how we should do so. That, I suggest, is an intellectual and moral impediment which exists in the minds and character of our public men and citizens. It is not a legal impediment which needs to continue to exist in our constitution.

Having full powers of self-government available to us, we have to decide whether we shall use them completely to govern ourselves, or whether we shall leave important functions of the government of Canada to be discharged by legislative and judicial bodies of the United Kingdom—by the United Kingdom parliament at Westminster, and by the judicial committee of the United Kingdom privy council. And if we come to the point in the interests of complete self-government in Canada where, for example, we no longer ask the United Kingdom parliament to amend our constitution for us, it is certainly not because the United Kingdom parliament—the mother of parliaments, the outstanding sanctuary of political freedom—is not a most excellent legislative body.

If we no longer wish to have the United Kingdom privy council hear the final appeals of our Canadian lawsuits, and to be the ultimate interpreter of the laws which we make in this chamber, it is not because the privy council is not today perhaps the strongest law court in the world. We shall always be grateful for the massive judicial services which the privy council has performed for this country. We shall still remain conscious of its greatness as a court of exclusive ultimate appellate jurisdiction. Indeed, sir, we desire in our supreme court to emulate that greatness as a court of ultimate exclusive appellate jurisdiction; and we think that the best, if not the only way, in which we can begin to do so, is to make our own supreme court also one of exclusive appellate and ultimate jurisdiction, by passing the bill we now have before us. If, as has been urged upon me by persons opposed to this move, our supreme court lacks experience as a court of last resort, it certainly cannot get that experience until it becomes one; and the first step toward its becoming one is the passage of this bill.

In support of the passage of the bill there are also a number of other arguments of a more practical nature, and, I suggest, of no inconsiderable force. It is said, for example, that the extra appeal to the privy council in respect of the ordinary case tried in a province, appealed to the appellate court of that province, from there to the supreme court and finally to the privy council, gives a great advantage to the more wealthy, reckless litigant, who, having lost his case in our supreme court, can, by the threat of further expensive proceedings, force a less wealthy or more prudent respondent to choose between having his judgment discounted into an unfavourable settlement, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, risking the hazards and the expense of another appeal to a court on another continent.

It is argued that privy council appeals tend to make the Supreme Court of Canada merely one of the appellate tribunals through which the Canadian suitor or lawyer must pass before he reaches that court in the United Kingdom which alone is clothed with power to determine, finally, Canadian litigation in general and his lawsuit in particular.

One of the difficulties of this arrangement has been that of counsel advising his clients as to when, and under what circumstances, and in what class of cases, the litigation in which his client is involved is likely to be ended if taken to the Supreme Court of Canada at Ottawa. He is always confronted with the chance that if it be taken to Ottawa it may, in the long run, have to be fought out all over again in London, in which case there is the added cost and delay of the appeal to London and of the application to the privy council for leave to appeal. Perhaps in some instances he is disposed to conclude, therefore, that it would be better to go direct from the provincial court to the privy council. This, in part, explains why, in spite of the fact that the very considerable expense of going to the privy council is greatly in excess of that involved in going to Ottawa, there are a number of cases in which the parties bypass the supreme court altogether and go to the privy council direct. This condition will continue as long as the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada is not final and conclusive. For until it is made final and conclusive, as we propose to do in this bill, there is no sure and certain ultimate destination for the Canadian litigant, short of the privy council, in any of the large class of actions within privy council jurisdiction.

This situation is further aggravated by the fact that this court, to which Canadian lawsuits must go for final determination, is one in the composition of which Canada virtually has no voice, and upon which it has never had adequate representation. Under the British North America Act we have power in our provincial legislatures and in this parliament to make our own laws, but heretofore we have had no say with regard to the tribunal which is finally to interpret them.

But, sir, these more practical arguments, it seems to me, are by no means the most important by which the abolition of the appeals to the privy council can be supported.

The real issue in this matter, I submit, is whether, having available to us, for the asking, all the constitutional power which we require to take unto ourselves the complete powers of self-government of a sovereign nation, we as members of parliament can rise above lesser loyalties and lesser considerations to think and act as citizens and legislators of a great country. In many other respects our forefathers and we ourselves have done so. The first pioneers of this land, the hardy pioneers of New France, have been described, by one unsympathetic by temperament and religious views to those of whom he wrote, in language the eloquence of which is unsurpassed in our literature.

"The French dominion," wrote Francis Parkman, "is a memory of the past, and when we evoke its departed shades, they rise upon us from their graves in strange romantic guise . . . A boundless vision grows upon us; an untamed continent; vast wastes of forest verdure; mountains silent in primeval sleep; river, lake and glimmering pool; wilderness oceans mingling with the sky. Such was the domain which France conquered for civilization. Plumed helmets gleamed in the shade of its forests, priestly vestments in its dens and fastnesses of ancient barbarism. Men steeped in antique learning, pale with the close breath of the cloister, here spent the noon and evening of their lives, ruled savage hordes with a mild, parental sway, and stood serene before the direst shapes of death. Men of courtly nurture, heirs to the polish of a far-reaching ancestry, here, with their dauntless hardihood, put to shame the boldest sons of toil."

Even our school children know that enterprisers in the fur trade—this is particularly true of my own western part of Canada—ranging over the continent in the competitive search for new trading fields, conducted, almost as a by-product of their business activities, voyages of exploration and discovery which in conception, competence and achievement would have done justice to professional explorers. It is true that in some cases these men were not Canadians by birth, but Canadian was the environment which evoked their genius and made them great.

The United Empire Loyalists, whose adherence to the political principles in which they believed drove them into the virgin forests of the maritime provinces and of Canada, strove and succeeded in laying there some of the most important foundations of our nation. Canadians and new immigrants to Canada, with almost incredible rapidity, transformed the wilderness of the prairies and the mountains into fruit lands and huge timber, mining and fishing industries and into a granary, not only for Canada but for the world.

Statesmen, businessmen and workmen of the little Canada of some 4½ million souls of the 1870's, with a sublime, almost a ridiculous, confidence in the Canadian future, embarked upon the construction of a transcontinental railway, over 3,500 miles long, no less, the western 2,500 miles of which had to traverse the Pre-Cambrian shield and the prairies and three mountain ranges in order to reach the Pacific coast; and in the beginning had to depend upon less than 200,000 men, women and children dispersed throughout this vast area for its operating revenue. Yet their efforts too were crowned with success.

And in the realm of the spirit, this Canadian nation, thanks to the tolerance of her people and to the fairness and wisdom of her statesmen, I am happy to say of all parties, has contained two main races, two great religious groups, and two languages, with less enmity and more unity than any other country in the world in which these conditions obtain, with the possible exception of Switzerland.

All these Canadian men and women thought and felt and acted as the citizens of a great country. So, too, did those who contributed to the war effort of Canada in two world wars, in which in relation to her manpower and resources Canada has made heroic efforts and sacrifices in defence of freedom and peace.

By far the most powerful argument, therefore, for the passing of this bill as a step towards complete self-government is that Canada in almost every other respect—politically, financially, economically; in the realm of foreign affairs; in both her primary and secondary production; in her trade and commerce; in her assistance to less fortunate nations; in her armed support of freedom and peace—has attained a complete and honourable nationhood. The question is whether it is consistent with that nationhood that we should continue an arrangement with regard to the hearing of our law cases which was begun in colonial times and still preserves its colonial characteristics; and whether we should continue this arrangement in the face of the privy council judgment which in the clearest possible terms declares Canada's sovereign right to pass laws to establish her judicial sovereignty.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, we have here a country which from the beginning has had many qualities of greatness, which is more united, magnanimous and powerful today than it has ever been, and whose resources and possibilities seem to require only that we should ourselves act as the citizens of a great country to make our Canada achieve the destiny of which she is capable.

We, the citizens of such a country, should not ask those of another, even though they be of our own blood, to decide our lawsuits for us, interpret for us the laws which we pass here, and provide amendments for our constitution at our request when we need them. If in smallness of mind and meanness of spirit we needlessly perpetuate such a situation, we are unworthy of the efforts and sacrifices of our fellow-Canadians, and undeserving of the bounty which Providence has bestowed upon our country.

I submit that the passage of this bill will be an historic occasion. It could well have taken place before now. It should not be postponed for an instant longer, and it should be followed by the last essential of our complete autonomy, namely, the taking unto ourselves of the right to amend our own constitution.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the printed bill in English was not available until late this morning, and I understand the bill in French has not yet been delivered, I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is agreeable to the adjournment of the debate, and I so move.

Mr. Church: It is a most unusual proceeding.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Mr. Ross (Souris): If the Minister of Agriculture is not going to make a statement on this item, I desire to make a few remarks and ask some questions.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, may I take this opportunity of congratulating you on your appointment as Deputy Speaker and chairman of committees of the whole house. I should also like to express my appreciation to the Minister of Agriculture. After his severe illness I am sure that all hon. members are happy to see him back at his post, and we wish him a rapid recovery and many years of good health.

The cost of living in Canada has been increasing month by month until it has reached an all-time high. I wish to refer to the false accusations which have been made with respect to agricultural production being responsible for this. I should like to quote a few figures taken from the Winnipeg Free Press of September 15, the day that parliament opened. They are quotations at Winnipeg, Manitoba, as to Canada, and at St. Paul, with reference to the United States, with the exception that in the case of wheat the quotation is at Minneapolis, the twin city of St. Paul:

	St. Paul	Winnipeg
Choice steers, live weight	$0.32	$0.22
Good cows	.20	.14½
Veal calves	.28	.24
Hogs, live weight basis	.21½	.22
Lambs	.23	.20
Wheat (Minneapolis)	2.22½	2.05*
Wheat (Minneapolis)		2.12†

*Contract
†Open market

You will note that under our contract with Great Britain the price of wheat is $2.05, and on the open market it is $2.12.

In recent years it has been frequently admitted that our neighbours to the south have a much higher standard of living than we have, but that their cost of living is also very much higher. For purposes of comparison I have some figures that should be interesting to every household in Canada. They are taken from the same newspaper, the Winnipeg Free Press, on the same date, September 15. They are as follows:

	St. Paul	Winnipeg
Sugar cured side bacon	$0.43	$0.47
Spring lamb	.59	.59
Pot roast of beef	.39	.38
T-bone steak, commercial	.59	.57
Canned ground pork and beef	.39	.50
Grade A roasting chickens	.43	.49
Canned shrimp, 5-ounce can	.33	.55
Argentine corned beef 12-ounce can	.43	.47
Oleomargarine, per pound	.29	.39
Butter, first grade	.59	.61
Shortening, 3-pound can	.85	1.15
Bread, wrapped, pound loaf	.11	.10½
Orange juice, 48-ounce can	.29	.58
Soap flakes, large package	.27	.35

I am sure that is a most interesting contrast between what the agricultural producer in Canada receives for his products and what is received by the agricultural producer in the United States, and, on the other hand, what the farmer's wife and every housewife in Canada has to pay for the articles that I have mentioned. That was the situation on the day that parliament opened.

A recent survey by the Sanford Evans bureau in Winnipeg points out, with respect to wheat, that in the period from 1945 to 1949 the Anglo-Canadian wheat agreement cost Canadian farmers $536,229,978. That is the loss—the difference between what the farmers in the United States received for their product compared with the amount received by our agriculturists. According to this bureau, the average half section in western Canada, had a loss each year of $1,064, or, on a bushel basis, the United States farmer received approximately 50 cents more per bushel for his wheat than his Canadian neighbour did during those four years.

At a given point, North Portal, where the main street divides the village, and the United States farmer delivers his grain to the elevator on one side of the street and the Canadian farmer delivers his grain on the opposite side of the street, there is a very great difference today. The United States farmer is receiving considerably more per bushel for his wheat than the Canadian farmer, for the same grade, just across the street in the same village.

I pointed out in the last session of parliament that since 1942 the policies of the government have cost our agricultural producers over $2,000 million that they might have had if they had been able to market their product on the same basis as the farmers of the United States. I point that out because today we are facing falling markets for our agricultural products. We were assured in this house by the then Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture that such a condition would have to be taken into account in a period of falling prices. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will give us a lead with respect to those statements which he and the former Prime Minister made so often in this house.

I referred to the cost of living. According to the Bank of Canada report for August, the cost of living now stands at 162·8, an all-time high in the history of this nation. It has risen consistently month by month for some time, and anyone can see that if he refers to the figures. As I stated, while that cost of living has been rising month by month, the prices received by our agricultural producers have been falling month by month.

I have here the most recent copy of the Rural Co-operator, an Ontario paper, pointing out that farm produce prices have dropped during the past year. It names many of the articles we do not produce in the prairie provinces, so it is quite apparent that this situation extends from coast to coast. There is mention of a severe drop of 54 per cent for pears and other fruits. There was a drop in potato prices as well as in the prices for Ontario wheat, which is not handled by the Canadian wheat board. The figures for the drop in the prices of oats and barley are given. It is an interesting article published by a farm organization in the province of Ontario.

Last night the Minister of Finance announced a ten per cent devaluation in the Canadian dollar. I do not think there is any doubt that this will again proportionately increase the cost of living to every householder in Canada. I know personally that it will increase the cost of production on every farm in Canada. The cost of new machinery as well as the general cost of production will be increased as a result of that measure.

So much for that point, Mr. Chairman, and the many false accusations that have been made in various parts of this country, blaming the farmer for the increased cost of living. The blame lies somewhere else. A year ago we had a costly and futile investigation into the cost of living. It proved little or nothing and prices continue to increase.

I should like to mention a matter which particularly affects the three prairie provinces. It has to do with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. This act is supposed to cover the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Every grain farmer who sells a bit of grain has to make a contribution of one per cent to the fund provided for by the act, although this does not take care of the entire insurance scheme.

I have here the last Searle Grain Company report, which says that 70,000 farmers will draw assistance payments under the act. Thirteen million dollars will be paid to 50,000 farmers in 1,700 townships in Saskatchewan. Twenty thousand farmers in Alberta in a thousand townships out of a total of 100,000 Alberta farmers, will receive approximately $4 million. These payments will be made to farmers whose fields yielded eight bushels or less per acre. It will be remembered that all farmers contribute to this limited form of cash insurance by paying each year one per cent of the value of the grain they deliver to country elevators. It will be seen, therefore, that thirty-six per cent of all Saskatchewan and twenty per cent of all Alberta farmers will be receiving Prairie Farm Assistance Act payments.

No mention has been made of Manitoba. I am not sure whether any township in that province will come under the act this year. I believe surveys are being made now to determine that. Some mention is made in the speech from the throne of amendments to this act. I want to point out that it has proven very unsatisfactory, because it is applied on a township basis, even though each grain farmer makes his contribution. During this past growing season, in most parts of Manitoba there was a most promising crop. I have never seen a heavier stand in my life. In the midst of that growing season part of Manitoba suffered a severe infestation of aphids. The aphid is a bug which is so small that it is difficult to see.

Here and there throughout southwestern Manitoba there were farmers who did not harvest any cereal crop. The township average, however, might still be high. This infestation was most peculiar. There would be a group of farmers with a splendid crop, and next to them there would be a farmer who had no cereal crop. As I say, the township average would be well over the eight or twelve bushels per acre. Many farmers—I am sorry to say that a large number of them are veterans operating under the Veterans Land Act—have come to me and said that they cannot properly sustain their families for the next twelve months and have seed for next year's operations. I am pointing this out to the minister now because it is possible we might be dealing with the amendments to this act before we come to the proper item in his estimates. I hope his officials will give consideration to this situation, and that amendments will be brought forward whereby the payments will be made on an individual basis. With the payments on a township basis, as they are under the present act, payments cannot be made for individual crop failures.

We in Canada, as has often been said, have a potentially large agricultural production. At times, however, our export problem becomes great. True enough, it is an international problem now. A large percentage of all our agricultural production must be exported if we are to have prosperity in this country. In recent years we have been extremely fortunate because Britain, one of our very best customers, has been able to use ECA funds from the United States for the purchase of our agricultural products. I am sure we were all pleased that our governmental officials were able to succeed at Washington in having United States funds provided to complete the fourth year of contract under the Anglo-Canadian wheat agreement. I do not believe Britain would have found it possible to complete the fourth year of contract had this fund not been provided.

I believe we all realize, however, that this is a rather temporary state of affairs. We are greatly concerned about future markets. We realize there must be a considerable amount of advance planning for agricultural production in this country, whether it be grain-growing, livestock or dairy production. I know that many people in my neighbourhood have not finished this year's harvesting, but they are keenly concerned about what they should be doing with regard to production in 1950.

It may be that the next session of parliament will not be convened early enough for the people to be told what they should produce. It is not only the people who produce the materials who are interested in that, but those who sell it, those engaged in transport, bankers, and a host of people in all parts of the country. It is a matter of importance to the other branches of agriculture in the various parts of Canada, to the British Columbia fruit producer and the dairy producer in the east. It is important to the potato grower, concerning whom a question was asked today at the opening of the sitting.

I know that as a matter of administration there is a technical division between our agricultural production and our markets. The Department of Agriculture is solely responsible for guidance as to production, while the Department of Trade and Commerce is responsible for markets. I am sure that at this point no one is going to be concerned over the technicalities as between these two departments. But before we pass this item I hope that the minister, for the benefit of Canadian producers, will indicate what he expects in the coming year in the way of markets for many of these agricultural items. You cannot expect people to produce beyond their own requirements if there is no satisfactory market in sight in some of these other countries. I trust the minister will take the first opportunity of making a statement in this regard.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I had intended to make a short statement but I am pleased that the hon. member for Souris took the opportunity of expressing his point of view before I had the opportunity to do so. I wish to join with him in expressing my own appreciation of the fact that you, Mr. Chairman, have been appointed to the position you now occupy, and I am quite sure that we shall carry on in this committee under your chairmanship much in the traditional manner.

The house itself is composed of members selected from all parts of Canada; and as a sort of mild reply to some of the suggestions which have been made by the hon. member for Souris I should like to point out that by far the greater part of the agricultural sections of this country is now represented in this house by members from rural areas who support the government in such great numbers that many of them are obliged to find seats to the left of Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Especially from Saskatchewan.

Mr. Gardiner: That fact in itself should be a fair indication that at least the farming population of Canada has been fairly well satisfied with the agricultural policy of the government.

The suggestion which was made a few moments ago to the effect that I should be prepared to give to the committee, at this stage, figures with regard to production, marketing and all that kind of thing, leads me to make some suggestions which probably are not as familiar to those new members who have been elected to the house as they will be to those of us who have been discussing these estimates over a considerable period of time.

This item before us is the item of administration; and in this committee since I have been here, that is, for the last fifteen sessions, and I think for a long time before that, on this item hon. members have been encouraged to discuss agricultural questions in a general way, basing their right to do so on this item on the fact that administration covers all parts of the Department of Agriculture and therefore that on this item a general discussion can take place on almost anything having to do with agriculture. But I can assure you that it never has been the custom to expect the minister on this item to give detailed information with regard to quantity or anything else having to do with the particular items which will be discussed individually as we move along from one item to another. When we are on the item which has to do with production I shall be prepared to give all of the information which is available with regard to the production of agricultural products and the relationship of their consumption in Canada to the necessity of marketing them outside Canada. Hon. members need only look at the estimates in order to find where that item is.

The Department of Agriculture is divided into five divisions: administration service, science service, experimental farms service, production service, marketing service and special. What I am pointing out is that when we come down to the item which is production service, either I shall have all the information here at my own fingertips or the two gentlemen in front of me will have it at theirs to answer any question that anyone desires to ask or to give the kind of information which the hon. member for Souris has just said that this committee will expect at some stage. He suggested that the committee might expect it at this stage under "administration". I would suggest to hon. members that if we are to proceed on that basis there would be no necessity at all for our considering the other items. We would be considering them all on this item. Therefore I am hoping that the chairman will keep us in order and permit a sort of general discussion on this particular item which will permit of members expressing opinions with regard to certain matters having to do with agriculture, but that we shall all content ourselves until we get down to the individual item about which we are concerned, and not ask for detailed information based upon statistics.

Having said that, I just want to point out that on page 2 of the estimates there is a table which gives a summary of the expenditures for the last year and the proposed expenditures for this year. Agriculture, because of the fact that it begins with the letter "A", is the first department in that summary. At the top of that summary hon. members will find that the amount to be voted for this year—that is for 1949-50, the year we are now in—is $49,396,253 and the amount authorized by statute is $12,000. Therefore the total is $49,408,253. The total for the year previous was $60,044,038. In other words, there is a decrease of $10,635,785. It may be thought by some that that is a decrease in the payment for what is generally known as agricultural services in Canada, but that is not exactly correct.

Just for a moment or two I should like to give a few figures with regard to past expenditures on agriculture, expenditures during the peak years of wartime and the expenditures we are making now, in order to illustrate the reason why the proposed expenditures are lower for the year we are now in than the actual expenditures for the year preceding. In the early 1930's—that is, prior to the war—the expenditure of the Department of Agriculture for all purposes ranged from around $7 million to $8 million a year. By 1938-39 total expenditures had risen to approximately $22 million a year and they remained at that figure until 1940-41 when they were still around $22 million. In other words, there had been a considerable increase in expenditures for general activities in relation to agriculture in the years immediately preceding the war. Then in the following year, 1941-42, expenditures under this department jumped to $83 million. There was no important change in the regular departmental expenditures nor in the general administration costs. The increase was largely accounted for by payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which was a new act, the wheat acreage reduction plan and the introduction of food production subsidies, in order to encourage the provision of those large supplies of food which were required to supply the British demand in the early years of the war. The peak year of expenditures was 1943-44, when through this department we spent $110 million. In fact, the expenditures of the department during most of the war years ranged from $95 million to $110 million annually. Food production subsidies and freight assistance were major items during those years. Costs of administration moved up moderately owing to increased salaries and rising cost of supplies, but there was no great increase in costs of administration, the item we are now dealing with. During the years when there were these considerable rises and falls in the expenditure of this department the regular departmental services declined in cost from $10 million in 1938-39 to $8,800,000 in 1943-44. That is, from one of the years just prior to the war down to the peak year of the war there had been a decline in expenditures for ordinary activities in the department. The great increases had to do with matters that pertained largely to the prosecution of the war, and the necessity of supplying food in connection with that prosecution.

Coming to the point that I wish to make, following the cessation of hostilities food production subsidies declined in amount and were eliminated one by one, until at the present time the only important remaining items in this category are freight assistance on feed grain moving from the prairies to British Columbia, and from Fort William eastward, and quality premiums on hogs. These two items still remain. I might say that the quality premiums on hogs were in existence back, I think, as early as 1922 and continuously from then on to the present. The only difference in the premiums now, as compared with the period prior to the war, is that they were paid out of the sale price of the hogs in the years preceding the war through an arrangement entered into with the packing houses. Now they are paid out of the treasury of Canada, and have been since early in the war period. Therefore that item appears in our estimates; whereas it did not appear there before.

These items now account for expenditures in the neighbourhood of $20 million annually, depending somewhat on the volume of production in different regions, that is, the volume of production of feed grains in different regions. If the production is low in the east and high in the west, then of course there is much more feed—I speak now of the west as the central prairies, and I include British Columbia along with the east. If the supplies are high in the one area and low in the other, then it affects the amount of grain which has to be moved back and forth in Canada, and affects the amount of assistance which is given on the payment of freight for that movement.

In the main estimates now being considered by the house, provision is made for about $20 million for these purposes. But I call attention again to the fact that that is in comparison with the $22 million which we were expending just prior to the war. The great rise in expenditure from $22 million to $110 million was largely due to very special conditions existing during the war which required large expenditures of money in order to persuade farmers to change from one activity to another and in order to obtain exactly what we required during the war period. As an illustration, in one period we required cereals, and we switched later from cereals to a supply of livestock products. Then we switched back from livestock products to a supply of cereals again, and in the process certain subsidies were paid, or certain encouragements were given to farmers to go from one line of production to another. We are not following that line of policy at the present time, and therefore these expenditures are not made. But we are continuing the very heavy expenditures which have to do with the payment of freight on feed grain from one part of Canada to another, which has something to do with the increase from $22 million up to $50 million. We are also now paying out of the treasury these considerable amounts that constitute the premiums on high-grade hogs which were previously paid in another way. They are being paid perhaps to a little greater amount at the present time than they were before. That makes up largely the new expenditures; but as we go along in dealing with these estimates it will be found that there have been considerable increases in connection with the general expenditures having to do with agriculture.

The other items which are almost entirely new since four or five years before the war are what we call the specials, which are at the end of the table. These specials have to do largely with the work which is being done in different parts of Canada in order to bring about the developments which we think are worth-while in agriculture. In British Columbia we are spending some money to assist in the bringing about of irrigation in some of the valleys where it is urgently required. We are doing something to bring about proper drainage in some other valleys, particularly where returned men of one or other of the two wars, or both, have been settled in that province. These expenditures are comparatively new. They started just before the war, were continued during the war, and are still going on. Then on the prairies we have expenditures having to do with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. That is the rehabilitation of an area which most of us, I think, are agreed now had not been properly settled in the years when it was being settled under the administration of policies which originated in Ottawa.

Therefore some years ago the parties generally in this house agreed that some money should be spent in order to rehabilitate those areas. I think a better word to use in connection with it is to resettle some of these areas and get people off submarginal lands in so far as it is possible to do so and to improve the land on which they are going to settle and where others have already settled, under conditions where it will not be necessary, even in the most difficult drought years, to move, provided better use can be made of the water available. Therefore there is an expenditure there which is new in the years beginning in 1935 and extending down to the present, which we did not have before. In addition to that, there is an expenditure upon an item which was mentioned by the hon. member for Souris, namely, prairie farm assistance.

What I should like to emphasize at this time is the fact that prairie farm assistance is an item which was placed in our estimates first in 1939 because of legislation which we placed on the statute books in that year. It is not generally understood that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is closely associated with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. Under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act it was planned that over some twenty or twenty-five years we might make a very great contribution toward the resettlement of those areas where it had been proven that drought is so persistent that people cannot make a comfortable living on submarginal land, and that these people ought to be removed from these lands as soon as possible, or conditions should be created, through the expenditure of money upon irrigation, which would make it possible for them to live on some of them, which are only submarginal because of low rain fall. Therefore, while we are going on with the development of the plan, it was felt wise to make some provision to enable people to live where they are until such time as we can either bring about better conditions where they are or make it possible for them to move elsewhere.

So we undertook prairie farm assistance. I am afraid many people still have the idea that that is a form of individual insurance. If it had been, we could never have put it into effect here. That has been tested out on other occasions. It was suggested at one time that we should have hail insurance brought into effect by the federal government. However, it was investigated at that time and the declaration was made that insurance is a matter which falls within the control and responsibility of the provinces. If we began to levy premiums in the manner in which premiums are levied in connection with insurance, we would be running into difficulties both constitutionally and financially.

Other forms of dealing with the situation were considered. In respect of hail, the insurance was brought into being in each of the three western provinces. It has been administered with more or less success in each of those three provinces, although it has been changed from time to time. However, it has always been done by the provincial governments and authorities. There has been no suggestion that we should carry it on from Ottawa.

When we brought down the Prairie Farm Assistance Act we acknowledged that. We said that it was not possible for us to bring it down in the form of insurance legislation. We could not put it on the basis of individual premiums paid by individuals. We recognized also the fact that even if we desired to do so, and had the authority, it could not be made effective for the particular job which had to be done. That job was to make it possible for some people to live where they had been put, or where they had been encouraged to go—and where they never should have been encouraged to go—until such time as we can prepare conditions under which they can live to advantage in those areas, or provide some place to which they can be moved and where they would be better off than they are now.

Therefore we have said we must provide some fund from which payment can be made on a basis which would make it possible for them to continue. But this was not on the basis of an insurance from which they would draw a certain percentage of the value of the crop which in good areas it would be possible for them to grow. That plan could never be financed in Saskatchewan. However, it has been shown, as the hon. member for Souris has said, that it could be financed in Manitoba. It has been just as effectively proven, however, that it could not be financed in Saskatchewan. The amount of money which would be necessary in any one of the bad-crop years to insure crops in Saskatchewan would be more than could be raised by any system of raising revenues which one might wish to follow in that province. Any fund created for the purpose would disappear in such a short space of time, on occasions, that no one would undertake to build it up again.

We said therefore that, in order to make this effective, about all we could guarantee to the people living there would be that their store bills would be paid. We said that the store bill a farmer might run up during a summer season might run from $150 or $200 up to $400 or $500. We said that it was impossible for a merchant in the village or town to carry farmers through a season, with accounts of that size, knowing that there was a possibility of a complete crop failure at the end of the year, in which event no payment could be made by those people. Not only would the farmers be in difficulty, but every businessman in the community and every wholesaler and manufacturer in eastern Canada who supplies retailers in western Canada would be in a difficult financial position.

We said therefore that what ought to be done would be to tax all the people of Canada for a time, because a government representing all Canada possibly had made some mistakes in the beginning in connection with the settlement of these people, and that therefore we should take over that obligation for a time in order to make it possible to pay the store bills. Therefore we set up what is known as prairie farm assistance.

It was our intention in the beginning to take all the money for this whole program out of the treasury of Canada. Suggestions were made to us, however, by those representing farm organizations and farm groups, that the farmers themselves in different parts of western Canada would be quite willing—indeed they would prefer—to subscribe something toward the fund to be set up. We said therefore that in order to collect something from most of the farmers of western Canada we would collect at the elevators one per cent of the value of all the grain delivered in any particular year, and would put it into this fund. This means there are people living in areas who never expect to collect. I have in mind the greater part of Manitoba. The people living in the area in which I live have never collected, and perhaps never will. That is true of a large part of the northeastern section of Saskatchewan. This year, for instance, the crops are just as good there as those in Manitoba described by the hon. member for Souris. But in the southwestern part of Saskatchewan for three years the crops have been just as poor as they were at any time during the worst years of the thirties.

Mr. Brooks: Has the minister's policy succeeded in moving the people out of that section of Canada for which all the rest of Canada has been paying?

Mr. Gardiner: I shall come to that in detail when the item is reached, but I shall answer it briefly in a moment. However, those are the matters with which we dealt, so far as the western provinces are concerned.

My hon. friend from New Brunswick has asked whether these people had been moved. Let me say that before the war began we had taken out of cultivation or possible cultivation 1,500,000 acres of land, and fenced it in for community pastures. We regrassed land which had been broken up and cropped, and which was considered to be submarginal. We had moved 1,400 families off those lands onto other lands. Some of those lands were in Alberta and some in Saskatchewan. In Saskatchewan there were 1,300,000 acres in the pasture category. The greater part of the remainder was in Manitoba. The only reason we did not convert a very considerable part in Alberta into community pastures was that the government of that province preferred to carry on its own program in that connection, and did not wish that we should carry it on in the same manner we had in Saskatchewan or in Manitoba. At the present moment, in a limited way, we are getting into Alberta with that policy, and we are proposing to proceed with it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Is that in the southeast corner?

Mr. Gardiner: Partly there, and up along the east side. The hon. member from New Brunswick has asked how much we have done. I am prepared to admit that 1,400 families are not very many; but I remind the hon. member that this was all done before the beginning of the war. When the war began there were many reasons into which I shall not now go, but which the hon. member will understand, why it was neither necessary nor possible to carry the policy further at that time.

However we are now back at it again, and the items in these estimates under the heading of specials will afford an opportunity to discuss all the questions with which we are now confronted in putting in larger irrigation projects to take care of people who are living on lands which are very good and which are submarginal only because of the weather.

Several projects have been carried on for the purpose of creating more areas to which people can be moved from some of these submarginal lands.

We expect and hope that in the years that are just ahead these people may be moved in thousands whereas they were moved in hundreds before.

That in general is what we have been dealing with in the western part of Canada. In connection with the eastern part of Canada we have had a long standing battle in this house, which hon. members know about and no one better than the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), to try to have something similar done in connection with the marshlands in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and in a more limited way in Prince Edward Island. I am not yet familiar enough with Newfoundland, although I hope to go down there and become better acquainted with that province, to know whether the same thing should be done there as is being done in the other maritime provinces.

The fact is that there are lands there which were some of the most productive and most helpful in maintaining farm population. These had been operated for one hundred and fifty years or more as lands protected from the sea by dikes that had been built around areas that were flooded when the tide was high but were not flooded when the tide was low. Because of certain conditions, which I will not refer to now, having to do with the tariff levied against us from time to time by the country to the south, the state of agriculture in that part of the country was somewhat changed. The production of livestock was not considered as important as it had been at one time and some of this area was allowed to go back. The dikes were washed out, the sea came in, and the land was no longer productive.

We have carried on experiments on a piece of that land in association with the experimental farm near Amherst. These have proved to us that three times as much hay can be grown on that land, if it is properly protected and properly taken care of, as can be grown upon it if it is not so treated. The first effort toward that experiment was carried out by my predecessor, who purchased the land. Just about the time he purchased the land there was a change in government.

I went down and looked at it some fourteen years ago and came to the conclusion that he had previously come to, that it was something worth doing. As I say, we have had a long battle, or perhaps "long discussion" would be the better term to use, from that time down to this in an effort to convince members on all sides of the house who have any influence upon the administration, either provincially or federally, that a problem such as that is somewhat akin to the irrigation problems in the west.

No group of farmers can pay all the capital cost. They did not in the first instance. I understand that France had something to do with some of the first works that were erected during the period that she was operating on this continent. Great Britain had something to do with some of the others. Usually these works were carried out following a war, when there were troops available. The method used was similar to that followed in the construction of other great works such as some of the canals that we have in the central part of Canada. That kind of thing never can be done and charged up against the land that is going to benefit any more successfully than you can charge $50 per acre as an irrigation cost against land in western Canada.

Finally we prevailed upon this house and the government of Canada to permit the spending of money down there for that purpose. Of course, expenditures will go on in other provinces in eastern Canada for similar purposes, but they must be similar before we can justify them on the same basis. These expenditures will go on from time to time in order to make land productive and capable of producing greater quantities of food, not only for the people in this country but for people elsewhere.

In general those are the activities that will be carried on under the last item. This last item, together with the two items I referred to a moment ago, namely, the payment of freight on grain from the prairie provinces to British Columbia and to eastern Canada and the payment of a premium upon hogs, are responsible for the greater part of the increase from $22 million to close to $50 million which is now being expended on matters having to do with agriculture.

That is all I wish to say at the moment. As all hon. members know, this is a time when they are free to get up as often as they please to ask questions, and when I am free to speak as often as I like. I am supposed to be able to answer the questions asked by members but I say to hon. members that if they will wait until the proper time to ask their questions I will guarantee to answer them. If they insist on asking all the questions in the next two or three days, when we are dealing with the general item, I am afraid I shall have to sit here and listen to those questions and try to remember them, and then have them repeated when we get down to the particular item. I hope it will not be necessary for us to do that and that hon. members will not make it necessary for me to tax my memory to that extent.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Chairman, on this my first opportunity to speak I should like to compliment you upon your new appointment as chairman of the committees of this house. As we have known you during past sessions we are sure you will fill this position with justice and honour.

I should like to say, both personally and on behalf of our group, that we are glad to see the Minister of Agriculture dealing with his estimates with his usual vigour. We understood that his health was poor, but we are glad to see that he has taken over the handling of his estimates in his usual capable manner.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): His voice was never sick.

Mr. Wright: It is a pleasure to see him doing so well. While we do not always agree with with him back in the province of Saskatchewan, we always enjoy a fight with him out there. Sometimes he wins and sometimes we win. This time he believes that with the return to this house of a number of rural members from Saskatchewan there is an indication that there is agreement generally in Saskatchewan with his agricultural policies. However, I would point out that there were other matters besides his agricultural policies which entered into it.

One of the things causing a great deal of concern, not only to farmers but to consumers, is the increased cost of living in this country. A great many people when looking at the cost of living indexes which are issued from time to time are inclined to blame the major part of the increase on the increase in the cost of food. I am sure that if they will go into the matter more deeply they will find that, while that is a major item, it is not the farmer who is getting all of the benefit of the increase in the price of foodstuffs. If you consider what the farmer was receiving in 1944 and 1947 during the war and compare it with what he is receiving today you will find that today there is a greater difference between what the farmer receives and the price the consumer pays than there was during those years. The processors and the people selling agricultural products have increased their margins. The increased cost is not all going to the farmer.

One thing which is particularly alarming to the farming population of Canada is the loss of our markets for certain products. In reading a bulletin on foreign trade issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce, I was surprised to find, in the issue of August 27, certain figures which indicate a tremendous drop as far as our markets for agricultural products in Great Britain are concerned. The Minister of Agriculture may say there are factors there over which his department has no control, such as currency, and so on. I will admit that, but nevertheless the policies of the government have largely been the cause of the loss of those markets, either by reason of refusal to reduce tariffs in this country to allow British goods to come in and thus provide the necessary dollars with which Great Britain could purchase our foodstuffs, or by reason of other policies of the government.

The bulletin to which I have referred states:

> Results of the policy of substituting soft-currency countries for dollar countries as sources of supply for imports into the United Kingdom are apparent from the trade returns for the first six months of the current calendar year. Typical Canadian products like oats, beef, poultry, apples, canned tomatoes, canned salmon, chilled and frozen fish and linseed oil have disappeared entirely from the list of imported commodities.

Then the article proceeds to give a further list of products which have been greatly reduced. It goes on to state:

> For the second year in succession, there were no sales of Canadian oats to Great Britain; practically the only source of supply was Australia with 979,000 hundredweights.

The article proceeds to point out that the market which we formerly had has gone to Russia and some of the other eastern European countries. Then the article continues:

> In over-all imports of flour (6·1 m. cwts.) there was a drop of 20 per cent. Canada's contribution (4·1 m. cwts.) fell by 46 per cent, while Australia (1·6 m. cwts.) supplied nearly ten times the previous year's quantity.

Further on the bulletin states:

> With the exception of bacon, Canada has now been practically eliminated from the United Kingdom market as a source of supply for meat.

The article states, as to poultry:

> The poultry market imported a total of 237,000 hundredweights or nearly double that of the previous year. Australia, Poland, Ireland and Hungary shared this increase, but there were no purchases from Canada.

As to shell-egg imports, the article states:

> The rise in shell-egg imports by 23 per cent to 116,000 dozen was principally due to substantial increases in imports from Denmark and Ireland. Canada's shipments (9,000 dozen) were only one-third of those recorded for the corresponding months of 1948. Purchases of liquid or frozen eggs totalled 364,000 hundredweights, more than double the 1948 figure. China, Poland and Australia stepped up their consignments. Canada's share fell to 2,000 hundredweights as compared with 38,000 hundredweights in the first half of the previous year.

As to dried eggs, the article states:

> Canada supplied 14,000 hundredweights as compared with 50,000 hundredweights in the corresponding period of the previous year.

It is the same story with fish and timber.

Another matter in which we are particularly interested in the province of Saskatchewan is the export of various seeds, alfalfa and grass seeds, et cetera. The bulletin states:

> There was a heavy cut in purchases from Canada of agricultural seeds. The quantity recorded during the half year was 30,000 hundredweights, only one-quarter of the previous year's figure . . .
> Much of the Canadian business was switched to Denmark and the Netherlands, which contributed 48,000 hundredweights and 84,000 hundredweights respectively.

This is a serious matter as far as Canadian agriculture is concerned. In western Canada we are starting to export more and more grains rather than finished products. That inevitably will result in the depletion of soil fertility. The Minister of Agriculture was one of those who advocated diversified agriculture in the province of Saskatchewan. I think he was right, but today he seems to have forgotten that policy. He has told us during his remarks that during the war his department was able to direct the production of agricultural products in Canada, was able to switch from dairy products to grain, and from grain back to other products which were needed by the markets during the war. If that is possible in wartime, if it is possible to direct agricultural production in our economy toward certain ends, then I say it is equally possible in peacetime to direct agricultural production toward the end which will produce more dairy products, meat products, and those other products which will protect the fertility of our soil.

Mr. Gardiner: May I point out that in wartime we had the War Measures Act, and in peacetime we have not the War Measures Act.

Mr. Wright: If we have not the War Measures Act then it is time that the minister, after consultation with the provinces, did some of these things. I am sure the provincial departments of agriculture throughout Canada would co-operate with the minister if he would get together with them to formulate an agricultural program extending over a period of ten, fifteen or twenty years in order to direct agriculture in Canada toward ends which would be of benefit to the country. The minister may smile. He has not tried very hard to co-operate with the government of Saskatchewan on a great many matters, but I do not want to go into that now. We may go into it at a later date.

Agriculture is a matter which comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces and the dominion. It is a matter in which we have to have co-operation if we are to have an agricultural policy in Canada that will look to the future, not merely from year to year, not merely contracts which you make this year and renew next year, and then again the year after. Agriculture is something which must be planned and directed toward retaining the fertility of our soil.

I have an article from the Lethbridge Herald which reads:

> In 1944 Canada exported 291,000,000 bushels of wheat, 40,000,000 bushels of barley and 83,000,000 bushels of oats. Those exports represent 219,126 tons of nitrogen, 94,234 tons of phosphorus and 47,341 tons of potash besides the trace minerals from the soil needed to produce the grain.

Further on the article reads:

> We cannot go on forever drawing from the fertility bank without making some deposits to our account.

I think that is quite right. I think the minister should give the house some idea of what his department is planning for agriculture. Toward what end are we directing our agriculture? I can see in the future even more difficulties in maintaining our markets in Europe than we have had in the past, because of the recent devaluation of the pound. Today it takes more pounds to buy the products which the farmers of Canada have to sell. It is true that as a result of the devaluation of the dollar by ten per cent we get an advantage on the United States market, but what good is that market to us for most of our agricultural products? Unfortunately in the United States there is an economy which produces to a large extent the very things that we produce here. We have a market there for beef at the present time, but that is the only agricultural product that I know of for which we have any extended market in the United States.

In the United States they are faced with some very serious problems. I have in my hand a clipping from the Christian Science Monitor which reads in part:

> It took world war II to bail the government out of its previous spending spree in farm commodities. No such "solution" is now in sight. And things are now piling up faster than 10 years ago. After five years of such accumulations, the government still in 1940 had only about 10,000,000 bales of cotton, 500,000,000 bushels of wheat, and 200,000,000 bushels of corn. But in little more than a year it has now sunk almost twice as much money in farm products as its cumulative investment in the entire 1930's. And the recent twelve months' investment looks like not only a total but an annual rate.

The article goes on to state that at the present time the corn crop is being stored in oil tanks, university dormitories, and every place in which storage can be found. It indicates that in another year meat production will be increased in that country, so we might not have that good market for our beef which we have today. It is my opinion that our long-term market for agricultural products is Europe. We must do something to retain those markets.

Within the next month or two I expect our contracts for agricultural products, such as the one we have with Great Britain, will be coming up for renewal. I should like the minister to give us some idea as to the prospects for renewing those contracts. I should like him to tell us what the prospects are with respect to other markets for agricultural products which we can raise in quantity. Those are some of the things about which I should like to hear the minister speak. I do not want him to go into details on the various items in his department. We will do that at a later stage. I do insist that two things are important at this time: one is markets and the other is production in a manner which will retain the fertility of the soil in this country.

Mr. Quelch: I should like to make a few comments at this time. I believe that, generally speaking, agricultural prices are fairly satisfactory today. On the other hand, there is a good deal of fear and uncertainty in the minds of the farmers as to what the future holds in store for them. I believe that is holding back a good deal of the capital development on the part of farmers because, unless they have some assurance as to what might happen in the future, they are going to be hesitant about making any large-scale investment in capital developments on their farms.

The farmers remember that since 1942, as part of the government's program, they were compelled to accept less for their farm produce than they might otherwise have received. That program was carried out in the name of stabilization, yet so far the only legislation on the statute books is the Agricultural Prices Support Act. True, there is the international wheat agreement, but apart from that the only legislation is the Agricultural Prices Support Act, and that expires on March 31, 1950. So far the government has given no assurance that, upon the expiration of that statute, the operation of the act will be extended.

As I say, at the present time prices are fairly satisfactory. On the other hand, unfortunately, crop conditions in many parts of western Canada were very unsatisfactory this year. In the district I represent, Acadia, crops were disappointing. Up until July 15, in the eastern part of the constituency crops were generally good. It appeared as though a bumper crop might be harvested. Unfortunately, after July 15, hot dry weather continued and in a short space of time the crops deteriorated, and as a result large parts of that area will harvest no crop. Strange as it may seem, the reverse was true in the western part of the constituency. The first half of the year was very dry and on July 1 most of the fields were still black; little or no grain had come up. After July 1, there were heavy rains and the grain came up. The grain was so late, however, that when heavy frosts occurred on September 9 most of it was frozen and a great deal of it will not be worth cutting. Consequently, a large part of that area will be eligible for payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

The people of Acadia constituency do appreciate the assistance that is granted under that act. I agree with what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated when he said the federal government had some responsibility for helping to rehabilitate those people. The people in that area were encouraged to go there while it was still under federal government control. They were encouraged to settle there despite the fact that the federal government had received word that the land was not suitable for settlement. The history of that area has been tragic. Over sixty per cent of the population have moved out. With the help that has been given them under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the remaining forty per cent are now getting on their feet.

This area, however, will never be a safe area for agriculture until irrigation has been established. A program for irrigation was first set up in 1922; I believe that is when the first survey was made. Since that date surveys have been made from time to time, until today we have a project known as the Red Deer diversion project. I think it is unfortunate that that project has been made a political football. At no time has that project been made such a political football as during the last federal election. During the last election campaign, the Liberals in that part of the country told the people that unless Liberals were elected that scheme would never be put into operation. On the other hand, if they elected Liberals, the federal government would start construction of that project next year.

At this point I should like to compliment the Minister of Agriculture, because when he went out to the Acadia constituency during the federal campaign to speak at my home town of Morrin, and at the town of Hanna, he refused to take any part in that type of propaganda. He said that whether or not a Liberal was elected, he was afraid it would not be possible to start that program next year. He wanted them to elect a Liberal, but he wanted to make it clear that if they did he was not going to promise the government would commence work on the Red Deer project. While I appreciated his attitude at that time, it was not appreciated by the local Liberals.

In that area work has been done on small projects. Two dams were built on Berry creek and I believe a third is being built this year. Unfortunately, these projects depend entirely on the surface runoff to provide water for irrigation purposes. Unfortunately, the dam which was built last year did not contain a single drop of water this year and consequently was of little use in taking care of the drought condition that developed. I am hoping that at the earliest opportunity the government will proceed with this project.

I quite realize that what the Minister of Agriculture states may be sound when he says that, first of all, the government has to complete the St. Mary river project and the dams on the Bow river. We have had his assurance —I hope I am correct in saying we have received his assurance—that when these projects are completed the government will then be prepared to proceed with the construction of the Red Deer diversion project. This can be regarded as a self-liquidating project. It would irrigate a half million acres and it would be possible to increase the population of that area by thirty thousand people. Services are already established. It would be a worth-while project and would relieve the government of a great deal of expense in the way of Prairie Farm Assistance Act payments, because those payments are not made on irrigated land.

I notice that when the last dam was built on Berry creek, instead of making provision for taking the water by ditches onto the land, provision was merely made for letting the water out into the creek, and that any lands to be irrigated from that project will apparently have to be irrigated through the sprinkler system. I believe the sprinkler system is becoming recognized as the most efficient form of irrigation, and that over a long period of time the actual cost of irrigating the land by this method may be just as cheap as, if not cheaper than, when it is done by ditches. But on the other hand the initial cost is heavy for the pumping equipment and the pipe. I understand from the local P.F.R.A. representative in Acadia that the federal government are making a grant of $350 toward the purchase of aluminum pipe. At a later time I hope the Minister of Agriculture will be able to say something on that matter, because there seems to be some uncertainty as to whether or not that money is actually being paid. I should like to have an assurance that it will be paid. Then I hope it may be possible to get the provincial government to match that payment, because if irrigation is to be done by the sprinkler system instead of by ditches there will be a great saving of money not only to the federal government but to the provincial government as well; and the provincial government may very well make a contribution toward the cost of the pipe in order to avoid paying for the cost of ditches.

There are other matters that I should like to discuss with respect to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act but, as the minister has already suggested, I think it would be better to leave matters of that kind until we come to the individual items. When we come to the item with regard to the P.F.A. Act, I hope the minister may be able to intimate briefly what form of amendment is to be brought down. I am not asking him to tell the house what the amendment is, but if he will tell us whether or not the amendment has to do with the establishment of the basic unit, it would be a guide to us in a discussion of that kind; because if an amendment is to be brought down to deal with the very thing we want to have done, it will not be necessary to take up the time of the house in discussing that point at this time. On the other hand, if the amendment that is to be brought down is not of that type, a number of us would like to make suggestions as to what type of amendment might be brought down.

Mr. Gardiner: In answer to that last question I might say that I thought I stated to the house in the last session that the bill which was prepared has to do entirely with that question, namely, the unit upon which payment is to be made. As far as I know, the bill will be brought down in the same form as that in which it was then drawn. I also think I said in the last session that I was quite prepared to submit that bill to the committee on agriculture so that it could be discussed there and so that all ideas could be brought forward at that time.

Mr. Hansell: I do not propose to make a speech, but I should like to ask the minister a question which I am not certain comes within any specific item under his estimates. Would he care to say whether he thinks the announcement made by the Minister of Finance last night with regard to the devaluation of our dollar will have any effect on the present agricultural agreements with the United Kingdom? I know that the minister is aware of the wizardry performed by these economic experts, which goes on behind the scenes. He expressed himself on that subject when he was in England some time ago. Some of us are not so conversant with that wizardry. I am quite certain that the farmers of this country are not crack economists, but I am sure they are concerned as to whether or not the dollar devaluation will affect those agreements. I know that some of those agreements are in force for only another year. But considering the little that we know about the operation of international exchange, I think that the committee should have an expression of opinion from the minister on this matter.

Mr. Gardiner: Just in a few words I would say that the agreements which we have with Britain, including the wheat agreement, specify that we are to be paid in Canadian dollars. Britain will pay us in Canadian dollars and therefore the farmer will get the same number of dollars for his wheat and for his other products as he is getting. I think that has been stated by nearly all of the experts who are not employed by the government and who write the financial pages of the papers across the country. As far as I have been able to read, they have made a statement to that effect. There is a possibility that the action which we took may be of some benefit to the farmers on the long-time wheat agreement. I am not going to attempt to explain how much that will be or what it will be. I do not think anyone can at this moment tell what it will be or what the exact result of the action is going to be. All I can say is that I satisfied myself, before agreeing with what we were doing, that it was going to be in the interests of all of the people of Canada, including the farmer, to do that particular thing. I think that is all I care to say at the moment.

Mr. Herridge: I am going to speak briefly, but in view of the concern of my farmer constituents—fruit growers, poultry producers and others—about the insecurity of the future with regard to markets, I feel that I should make a few comments.

I realize that the Minister of Agriculture has one of the most responsible positions in Canada at this time. I am quite sure that any fair-minded person would sympathize with him in the problem he is facing, under present world conditions, in attempting to find outlets and markets for Canadian agricultural production. In reviewing the main estimates I regret to notice that those of such an important department show a reduction of $10,635,000. I think that is unfortunate when we consider the basic importance of the agricultural economy to the prosperity of Canada as a whole.

At the present time we hear a great deal about the arsenals of democracy. But I want to preface my few remarks by saying that finally, after all we have done and all that we can do in the nature of armed defence, in my opinion the basic arsenals of democracy rest in agriculture. The peace of the world and the security of the peoples of the world are to be found, finally and fundamentally, in well-fed, well-clothed, well-housed and contented people.

The agriculturist is faced with a dilemma at this time. To reduce production is unthinkable, in my opinion. Yet in some industries, particularly in the fruit industry, there is some thought of reducing production in certain varieties because of lost markets. In that connection I wish to quote briefly from our British Columbia farm paper Country Life. The article deals with the question of production and increase in production.

> How can a reconciliation of these factors be effected? The answer is not available but progress is being made towards working it out. Note this: "Less than ten per cent of the world's food production is exchanged today between country and country, representing only three-quarters of the volume before the war," so the FAO council reports. A large share of the present movement originates in North America. Naturally, variations in output in Canada and the United States have now a greater effect on supplies and prices in the producing countries and entail more serious consequences for consumers elsewhere than would be the case if the volume of international trade were greater and were more widely distributed between suppliers throughout the world.
> At a time when hundreds of millions are still hungry, the inability of the world to devise policies which would enable the surplus-producing countries to avoid a deliberate curtailment of efficient production, should not be tolerated, the FAO council proclaims and every humanitarian will agree with it.

No question presents a greater problem to the minister and to all of us, sir, than the welfare of agriculture in Canada at this time. I hold in my hand a report of the department of agriculture of British Columbia for 1948. This report deals with the question of increasing world population in relation to a declining agricultural production. While this is a very complex question—I do not think the solution is going to be easy or simple—we must recognize certain principles in approaching it. I think the first one is this. We profess to the world that we are a Christian nation, a Christian democracy. In view of that, do we think that we can see starving millions of the world go without food because we will not produce it? No doubt the question will be faced from the ordinary commercial point of view. The minister and his officials will do what they can do to find markets through the regular channels; they will try to make sales agreements and so on. But if we are going to face this problem satisfactorily and find even a partial solution in the near future we have to do some unorthodox things. We have to convince the Canadian people that the stability and the prosperity of the Canadian nation depend on a stable agriculture. If that is going to be possible under present conditions all of the Canadian people must make some contribution to the stabilization of our agriculture and to the sale of our commodities. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in a few words I suggest that in addition to finding a market through normal channels, commercial bulk sales agreements, or personal trading, we have got to be willing to supply these people who require food with food when they require it and where they require it, in other ways: in the first instance on long-term loans at low interest and in some cases as straight gifts. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that if the position of Canadian agriculture was explained to the Canadian people, if the seriousness of the situation in general was explained to the Canadian people as a whole, they would understandingly assume the burden of extra taxation required to finance such a program. That is all I am going to say in that respect at this time.

Before proceeding to make a few remarks concerning my own constituency, I want to emphasize my complete agreement with the remarks made by the hon. member for Melfort when he was dealing with the necessity for a long-term over-all agricultural policy in Canada. I readily recognize that during the war period such a policy could not be developed under abnormal conditions, but I do think it is necessary, and it can only spring from and be the result of much closer agreement and much closer co-operation between the federal and provincial governments. We need a long-term marketing policy worked out between the government. We need a long-term production policy. In going around my own district and other districts I am amazed to see—and I give credit to the scientific staffs of our departments of agriculture for the excellent work they have done—that necessary information does not reach all the people settled on the land. I find people, after all these years of experience, planting the wrong varieties of trees. I find people clearing land which should have been left in timber. I find people attempting to produce crops which are unsuitable, and as a result they gain their experience through unnecessary cost and labour. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I heartily support the hon. member for Melfort in his contention that we need a long-term over-all agricultural policy, devised as a result of joint and increasing co-operation between the federal and provincial governments.

I am going to deal with one or two things which are not strictly within the purview of the Minister of Agriculture. They come within his purview only in the sense that I think the minister is doing what he can as a member of the cabinet and within the cabinet to improve rural living conditions. We have to give every consideration to that if we are to keep our younger people on the land. I should like the Minister of Agriculture to use his influence toward doing all that is possible in the development of a trans-Canada highway, because if a trans-Canada highway is built across this country, and the provinces are assisted, not only will the food producers, the egg producers and others in many parts of this country have better roads to market their products, but the provinces will have more money to surface and improve feeder roads. That is an important item when it comes to moving soft fruits and other commodities of that type in the constituency which I have the honour to represent.

In my constituency there are a large number of people living in isolated areas who get very poor radio reception. In fact, the only programs most of them enjoy in the evenings are American programs. I trust that the minister will use his influence within the cabinet to see not only that the urban dweller gets good radio reception but that people in the backwoods, people in the country, have every opportunity to enjoy Canadian programs.

Farmers of my district are concerned about the grading of hay and the inspection of cereals imported particularly from Alberta. I think without question there have been some quantities of low-grade hay, poor hay and very questionable feed imported from Alberta. The farmers I represent are anxious for me to bring that to the attention of the minister. They are urging increased inspection facilities so far as hay and feed commodities are concerned.

In addition to that, we find some of our people living in the backwoods who are trying to build houses. Some of them are log cabins, others of frame construction. They are really living a pioneer life under present-day conditions. During the last year or so they have found it very difficult to obtain baling wire and barbed wire. It has been almost impossible to obtain barbed wire, fence staples and things of that type for some time. I do hope that the Minister of Agriculture will use his influence within the cabinet to make certain that the first people who receive these things will be the rural people who are developing the backwoods areas of this country and need them badly.

The people I represent are also interested in the operation of the Canadian farm loan board. I made a forty-minute speech on this question in the session before last but I wish to refer briefly to the subject again. Personally I am still of the opinion that the Canadian farm loan board does not serve the pioneer in the backwoods communities to quite the same extent as it serves the well-developed communities. In my opinion these people are somewhat of the impression that the backwoods farm, where the farmer is making possibly, in the early years, 75 per cent of his living from the sale of logs, poles, cordwood, is not as good a risk, not as good an investment, as possibly a well-developed farm which is paying far higher taxes. The type of man who goes to the backwoods and develops a farm under pioneer conditions is often the best type of credit risk you can obtain in Canada. I hope the minister will use his influence to see that the Canadian farm loan board gives every consideration to those who are wanting some assistance in the pioneer districts of the west. The farmers I have the honour to represent believe, too, that interest rates on loans made through the Canadian farm loan board should in fairness be reduced.

Let me add, to what I have said, that our poultry producers are greatly concerned about the uncertainty of the future. Here is an illustration where there is great necessity for provincial and federal planning in production and marketing. Owing to the recent slump in poultry prices and the loss of poultry markets—and in this I am sure the hon. member for Fraser Valley will bear me out—in recent months hundreds of poultry producers have gone out of production.

The poultry industry is in a most unstable condition. It is not fair to permit people without knowledge and experience to enter into the production of poultry on a large scale. No doubt the minister is familiar with the conference which was held at Regina, upon which occasion poultrymen expressed their desire to have floor prices placed under eggs and poultry, according to the terms of the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

I offer these few remarks so that the matters I have mentioned may be placed before the minister, and in conclusion I express the hope that he will use his influence within the cabinet to remedy the conditions I have mentioned.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I shall not take much time—just about an hour and a half. I shall cover a number of subjects, but first of all I would say to the Minister of Justice, who is now in his seat, that I hope he takes my advice when he is considering the appointment of judges, or anyone else, in my riding in the future.

I shall now digress from fruit and eggs—

Mr. Sinclair: Bathing beauty judges?

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member for Coast-Capilano must know that I happen to have ability he does not have, in that I can judge anything satisfactorily.

The remarks I shall now direct to the Minister of Agriculture might have the support of the hon. member for Coast-Capilano. May I say to the minister that the minimum price at which we can produce filbert nuts in British Columbia is 25 cents a pound, and that at no profit to ourselves. Those nuts are being sold on the Winnipeg market today, and on European markets, at 15 cents a pound. The Americans have a protection to the extent of a duty of 5 cents, but we have no such protection, with the result that they are being imported into Canada.

I would ask the minister to consider this matter seriously, particularly in view of the fact that it requires from five to seven years to produce filbert nuts. Yet they can be brought to Canada to sell at 15 cents a pound. These nuts come from Sicily and Italy—and I do not know what either Sicily or Italy ever did for this country.

Mr. Sinclair: Liberal free trade.

Mr. Cruickshank: There are only two free traders here, the Minister of Agriculture and the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I would submit, particularly for the benefit of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and the junior member for Coast-Capilano, that to add insult to injury, a company from Hamilton is now installing a margarine factory in my riding. Surely there should be some law against that.

I speak seriously when I refer to the filbert nuts, because this is a matter which affects my district in which we have about 500 acres in production. There would be that much if my riding and New Westminster were taken together. We can produce figures to show our cost of production, which indicates that we cannot possibly produce them for less than 25 cents a pound. Yet they are being sold today at the low price I have mentioned. Further, I am informed by the association of growers that many of these imported filberts are diseased. We do not want the disease to affect our production.

I shall not discuss eggs or other matters, because I shall have time to do that in the future. The Ottawa Journal is a newspaper of note, and I have been interested to see that in one week it contained an editorial praising me, while in the next week it condemned me. So it must be a pretty good paper. It carried an editorial yesterday in which mention was made of a few of the scrub apples grown in Ontario. I want everyone to know for sure that we in British Columbia do not ship our scrub apples; we do not even make them into cider, as was mentioned in the editorial. We just send them out to the Pacific coast for pig feed.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Before the hon. member leaves the matter of nuts, would he tell the committee the percentage of oil or fats in the nuts he proposes to grow in his community. No doubt the fat from the nuts to be produced there will find its way into the margarine factory he has mentioned. I imagine it would run about 30 or 40 per cent fat.

Mr. Cruickshank: I cannot answer the hon. member's question, but I do not wish to be turned aside into a discussion of margarine, because in most cases it is made out of whale oil and any other useless kind of oil one can get. However, I cannot answer the question which I have been asked.

While I do not wish to discuss dairy products at this time, I would ask the minister to give serious consideration to a floor price, or some protection for the filbert growers in British Columbia, not in my constituency only.

Mr. Jones: I should like to take some time to deal with a subject which I believe has been neglected, namely the fruit of the Okanagan valley. I know it has been suggested that we talk a good deal about this subject, but we do so because we are not satisfied that it has received the recognition it deserves throughout Canada.

First of all I would express my thanks, and those of the industry in general, to the Minister of Agriculture for producing and passing the marketing act at the last session. The growers have worked hard for some protection of that kind, and I can tell him truthfully that the reception given the news was as great as that given the news of a victory overseas during the war. It was only just that the government should take away the great element of gambling from the growing of fruit. They have had to gamble with the weather, with pests and other hazards of the fruit-growing industry, and I cannot see any reason why they should not be given all the protection the government can give them, particularly in the domestic market. This bill can be the source of that protection as far as the domestic market is concerned, and I fully believe that the minister has that in mind.

But we must consider other markets as well. A couple of weeks ago I was in England for the summer holidays and I went out of my way to find out the type of apple that was being offered for sale. I was amazed at the low-grade apples that were displayed in the stores of London, Manchester, Liverpool and other cities. These were apples which, I think the hon. member for Fraser Valley will readily admit, would be considered in British Columbia as culls of a very inferior type. They would not be allowed to be offered for sale in that province. I understand the statement has been made that the British people are getting all the apples they want, but I can state definitely that that statement is not correct. The apples they are getting are of a most inferior grade.

An hon. Member: Where are they from?

Mr. Jones: Most of them were domestic.

[Mr. Harris (Danforth).]

An hon. Member: Fraser Valley.

Mr. Jones: Most of the dealers and consumers that I spoke to told me that they regretted the Canadian apple was not available. They all felt that the best apple that had ever been offered on the British market was the Canadian apple. As far as they were concerned—I am referring now to the consumers and dealers, not to the government—they were willing to do anything reasonable in order to get the Canadian apple back again.

I should like to deal briefly with the domestic market. As is known, we in British Columbia have geared our production of fruit to the needs of the British market. We selected and pruned our trees in order to produce the varieties demanded by Great Britain. They do not care for a large apple or one that is too small, so we pruned our trees to produce an apple that suited the British market. But the British market has been lost and the apple we are producing is not suitable for United States or domestic consumption. Therefore, this apple has become a heavy member of the cull group, not because of quality or colour but simply because of size.

We contend that we have suffered a terrific loss through losing the British market for this particular variety of apple, but what alarms us most is the fact that dumping of apples and other fruit products by the United States and Europe is being permitted. I should like to read extracts from two resolutions which were passed this spring by the British Columbia Fruit Growers' Association. One reads as follows:

> Whereas the West Kootenay was put on a quota of 27 per cent for processing of Bing and Lambert cherries for the 1948 season, and
> Whereas the growers of the district, covered by the Sunshine Bay local of this organization, would like to know definitely whether the above quota will be maintained for the future, and whether there is any definite hope of an increase—

In other words, the growers of cherries were placed on a quota. At the same convention, possibly the same day, the following resolution was passed:

> Whereas a processed cherry industry of considerable importance has been established in Canada during the past seven or eight years, and
> Whereas, growers have been encouraged to produce cherries suitable for this industry, and
> Whereas our market for these cherries is seriously threatened by the importation of similar cherries from Italy, packed in brine and subject only to a tariff of 17½ per cent ad valorem.

The implication is that the policy of the government is to allow cherries to be imported from Italy in direct competition with cherries that could be produced and processed in the Kootenay valley. I am going to suggest to the minister that consideration should be given to this industry and if possible the dumping duty regulations should be enforced when necessary. I feel that as long as we can grow first-class fruit in the valley we should be given the preference in the domestic market. Another resolution was passed as follows:

Whereas for many years the government of Australia has imposed an embargo against the import of Canadian apples on the ground that fire blight might be carried to Australian orchards, and

Whereas horticulturists agree that it would be impossible to transmit fire blight through shipments of packed apples.

The resolution goes on to ask the government to take steps to have this embargo removed, and I support that resolution. I feel that we have been most generous with the Australian people. Last year and the year before we carried on certain trade with Australia. All the imports from Australia were agricultural products while all the exports from Canada were manufactured goods. I think a balance should be arrived at whereby a break could be given to the fruit growers of British Columbia.

At the same time the Australians have been sending onions into British Columbia duty free. A shipload of No. 1 hard arrived in Vancouver last year. Our first crop of onions are not No. 1 hard; they do not reach that grade until they are matured. Our onions had to go on the market in competition with the Australian No. 1 hard with the result that in the opening week our price had to be dropped from $60 per ton to $40 per ton, which the growers claim is $2.50 per ton less than the cost of production.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Jones: Before the recess I was speaking of some of the difficulties encountered by the fruit and vegetable growers of Canada in regard to the importation of certain agricultural commodities, resulting in depressed prices generally. I realize that the government is faced with certain difficulties, and particularly the Department of Agriculture, in putting a stop to this condition. I have in mind an instance last year when United States carrots were imported into Canada long before ours were ready. They were brought in in such vast quantities that naturally our carrot growers were anxious to know if the market was going to be flooded. The minister co-operated to the fullest extent by placing a stop order on the importation of United States carrots as soon as ours were ready, but unfortunately the damage was caused by allowing importation in such vast quantities that they were put in cold storage throughout the dominion and kept there in order that they might be released week by week. That practice went on for several weeks.

As our young carrots came on the market, United States carrots stored prior to the stop order were used to depress the market. I realize the difficulty in meeting that situation. Possibly drastic action would have to be taken by allowing the importation of quantities sufficient only for the immediate needs of the market, and not for storage purposes.

The same is true of the importation of soft fruits, particularly in the province from which I come, where apricots, peaches, and other soft fruits are brought in from California and the state of Washington. They are more or less dumped in British Columbia because the best market for United States products, as for our own, is in their home country. After the home market is supplied, the residue is usually dumped in another country. That has been particularly true of peaches and apricots along the border between British Columbia and the state of Washington. We are very anxious to stop this practice, because we have an industry that is growing rapidly and is expanding far more than we thought was possible. I have figures for peaches, apricots, et cetera, but I will only mention peaches. In the year 1939 we had 503,000 packages and in the year 1947 we had close to 2,000,000. In the current year that amount will be greatly exceeded.

"Dumping" probably is not the correct word to use, but it is one that might be applied to the existing condition where fruit is allowed to enter the country at a lower price in competition with our own. Vegetables also enter in the same manner. I have a letter here from the British Columbia Pea Growers Limited. They are speaking not only on their own behalf but on behalf of the pea growers of Alberta, Ontario, and other parts of Canada where peas are grown. I will not read the whole letter, but in part they point out that:

. . . prices of peas have been arrived at in a very logical manner. They have been scaled to give a return to the farmer on a parity with what he could get growing wheat on the same land. Therefore they have tried to keep that price in order to induce the farmer to grow peas. There is a tie-up between the price of peas and the price of wheat. This year a serious threat to the Canadian dried pea business is posed by the surplus of peas in the United States.

The letter points out that there are many bags of peas left over from last year's crop, and there is a large increase in the crop of peas for the current year. The letter goes on to say:

The impact of this situation has been felt here where samples of last year's whole dried green peas graded U.S. No. 1 are offered at $3.50 per cwt. f.o.b. country shipping point which is eastern Washington. Green split peas are similarly offered at $4.50 per cwt. This price is less than we must pay our growers to produce in competition with wheat offers. It is the opinion of this office that American dealers are sloughing last year's surplus at a sacrifice in preparation for a plugged market this fall.

The letter goes on to deal with the various prices quoted and also points out that the United States government has a parity price on peas of $3.50 per hundredweight. These peas have been offered f.o.b. Moscow, Idaho, at a price of $3.85 per hundredweight which is 35 cents extra for cleaning, packing and bringing the peas to market. Canadian producers of the same commodity claim that these services cannot be given for less than $1 per hundredweight. This letter is very fair, and goes on to point out:

We realize and were advised . . . that dumping is a very difficult fact to establish, even though we may be completely sure that such activity is occurring. We are advised, therefore, to plead our case on other grounds. These may be outlined as follows:

The government support price of wheat in Canada is in direct competition with our own price to growers for acreage; the government support price in the United States to peas has encouraged much speculation and overproduction in pea growing; and from what we gather in the newspapers and from the radio, the recent agreement of the American government to allow ECA funds to purchase Canadian wheat in the face of an American surplus of wheat puts us in a very difficult position, because by way of compensation for this to the Americans, surplus American fruits and vegetables are apparently to be allowed entry into Canada. You can readily see how disastrous this action is to us, who with no government supports or favours, must operate a business in what ultimately is government competition—both here and abroad. It is on the grounds of these latter-mentioned facts that we must base our plea to Ottawa to re-impose the emergency restrictions on the importation of American peas (and beans), which were removed about one year ago, and which have subsequently piled up surpluses of Canadian canning and edible peas.

Mr. Ferrie: How is it that they cannot produce these peas in British Columbia as cheaply as they can produce them in the United States?

Mr. Jones: I did not attempt to read the whole letter, but I tried to outline that the price in Canada is governed to a certain extent by the price the land would bring if it were producing wheat. Apparently it is good productive land, and in order to get the growers to plant peas they have to give a price equal to what would be received if the land were planted in wheat. I take it that is the reason the price is a little higher.

There is one other thing I should like to mention. I feel that we must do something about our export market. I know it is a sore subject, and a difficult one, but recently in England I noticed in all the larger towns that they have a great deal more South African canned products, not only canned fruit and vegetables but also canned fish, than when I was last there. We are losing out in the British market on a commodity in which we excel. Incidentally, everywhere I went people said to me, "What has happened to the Canadian salmon?" It is almost unobtainable in England. If steps are not taken soon to protect that market we are going to abdicate in favour of other members of the commonwealth who are, fortunately for them, in the sterling bloc.

The object of my brief talk is to impress upon the minister the vital need for restoring the overseas market for Canadian fruit and canned vegetables. I know there are difficulties as to currency, dollars, but I have noticed that other countries have overcome those difficulties either by a straight exchange of goods or by some other means. I understand there are several methods, and I would suggest that they be investigated and possibly given a trial to see if they will work out with the commodities I have mentioned. Failing that, I would certainly urge the minister to protect our domestic market with strong and forceful anti-dumping laws. It is our only sure market, and owing to the loss of our overseas market a healthy, prosperous domestic market is a must, if we are going to keep a large body of people operating successfully in the fruit and vegetable industries, not only in British Columbia but in the whole of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I shall not be in the chamber when some of these estimates with particular reference to agriculture will be dealt with in detail. With your leave, sir, and the leave of the committee, there are two matters that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister at this time. One has to do with a situation that has arisen in the province of Saskatchewan and to a lesser degree in Alberta.

While crops have been generally good, there are large areas in which there has been, in whole or in part, a complete failure. This afternoon the minister dealt at some length with his intention to introduce amendments in connection with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. He set forth in detail the operation of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, joining them together as two measures designed to relieve and assist the people of the prairie provinces against recurrent drought and its effects.

The first matter to which I wish to direct the attention of the minister is—it applies in part to my own constituency and to others in southwestern Saskatchewan where there has been a total or almost total failure of the crops—that there are two or three areas in which the farmers have gone into cattle and hog production on a large scale. They find now that the outlook for fodder in the months ahead is extremely dismal.

Over the years since 1941 provision has been made for the granting of freight assistance on western feed grains being exported to eastern Canada. A number of farmers have communicated with me, one as late as today, asking whether or not the government intends to do something towards providing free freight on fodder for hogs and cattle brought into these areas. I have before me a letter received today in which the situation is set forth in some detail. After referring to the events of the last few years, and the shipping of fodder to eastern Canada, this man says the elevator agent at his point tells him that the price the wheat board will charge for barley will be $1.17 per bushel in the elevator. He says:

> I have about sixty hogs, so I will have to have about a thousand bushels of barley between now and next fall. If I have to pay $1.17 per bushel plus freight for the feed, I will have to dispose of these hogs.

Has consideration been given to the granting of free freight or freight assistance on fodder brought into these areas? I think there is a general demand for it. Secondly, could the minister direct the attention of the wheat board to the need for keeping a supply of barley on hand in the various elevators in these areas in order to meet the local situation, where barley and oats are, in fact, being produced though not in the quantities required in those areas?

The other matter with which I wish to deal is one that has been dealt with on many occasions in the past. At this time I want to add a word of congratulation to the minister on what is being done in connection with the exploratory work on the south Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project. It is not everything the people want but, at the same time, it is a step in the right direction. When this matter was before the house last year, the minister said it would be impossible to decide on the location of that dam or to proceed with the work until such time as the consent of the three provinces had been secured. The work done on this project in the last few months has been rather extensive. When the report was filed last year it was found that the benefits that would flow from this project were as follows:

(1) Irrigation of some 500,000 acres in the province of Saskatchewan. (2) Restoration of lake levels and, in particular, restoration of the level of Last Mountain lake, to which I shall not refer in detail this evening. (3) A water supply for Regina and Moose Jaw.

During the events of recent months one of the matters discussed in Saskatchewan, particularly in the cities of Regina and Moose Jaw, was the need of something being done about ensuring these two urban centres of the necessary supply of water throughout the years that lie ahead. The development of power was another matter, but I am not going to refer to that because it has been dealt with before.

This project has caught the imagination of the people in our province and they are looking forward to more extensive developments taking place in this connection within the next year. The increase in the amount of the vote that is being requested indicates that some further development is to take place. Would the minister let the house and the country know what he can add to what he said last April regarding this matter? Has any finality been achieved in determining the location of this dam? When the location is determined, have the necessary representations been made to the several provinces and their consent secured so that the project may be undertaken?

The committee on water has been set up. Is the minister now able to say that, as a result of the work that has been done and is to be done, the project is a feasible one and that, in so far as the supply of water is concerned for the Qu'Appelle valley, particularly the supply for human consumption in Regina and Moose Jaw, that supply may be soon achieved? Will they be proceeding with the work without unnecessary delay? This is one project toward which the people of our province are looking forward and I know they await from the minister a statement which will indicate that the project will not be long delayed. In particular, they want to be assured that the urban centres to which I have referred will be assured of a water supply and that the level of Last Mountain lake will be restored, because the preservation of this lake depends on the work being undertaken at an early date.

Mr. Gardiner: I hope the hon. member's optimism will be borne out in the discussions in committee. He suggests that he will be away for three or four days. These items that are spoken of are the last items in my estimates. I hope they will all be through when he comes back three or four days from now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is why I am giving the minister the opportunity now to give the information I have requested.

Mr. Gardiner: Sitting where he does in the house, the hon. member probably has more justification for that optimism than I could possibly have. With that explanation, I shall be pleased to give what information I can with regard to the matter; but, with regard to the south Saskatchewan river project, I would suggest that the questions asked have to do with next year's estimates. The estimates we are dealing with at the present time are the estimates for the financial year 1949-50. As is understood by hon. members who were here in the first session of this year, we had advanced to us sufficient to carry us through the first six months. In other words, half of this vote is already spent, and any part of the other half that is going to be spent will be largely spent within the next two months because out in our country it will freeze up two months hence. We are pretty well on with our expenditures of the sum of money that is herein involved, as has been suggested for expenditure on the south Saskatchewan river project. We have placed in these estimates, and we have spent a considerable part of it already, $2 million for the purpose of determining finally whether this project is a feasible one or not. I am sure the hon. member will agree with me that until we get the report on that expenditure, which is being prepared at the present time, it will be impossible for me to give reasons for any opinion I may hold with regard to the future development of the project. It will be necessary also for me to discuss with the government the possibility of getting a vote next year to proceed farther than we have gone before I can make any statement to the committee on that matter. So I would suggest to the hon. member that when we get down to that item—I hope it will be through before he comes back, but there is some reason for thinking it may not be—I will give whatever information I can, but I doubt very much if it will be much more than I have just now given, unless it be that I am able to account to the house for the expenditures which have been made up to the present time in connection with operations this year. I agree with the hon. member that those operations have been somewhat extensive, particularly in his own constituency, but that is only because the site of the dam is located in his constituency.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No mistake was made.

Mr. Gardiner: If it were in my constituency, there would be just as much spent.

Then on the other question having to do, not with prairie farm assistance direct but with the shipment of grain into the drought areas, I should just like to remove the implication in the one suggestion that there is any relationship whatsoever between the freight rate paid on grain out of western Canada into the eastern provinces and out of western Canada into British Columbia, and any freight which might be paid by this government or any other government on assistance given because of drought in western Canada. As a matter of fact, my understanding of the position is that we have a special rate on grain being shipped out of western Canada eastward and westward if it is going out of Canada. In other words, we have a long-standing arrangement—I am speaking now from memory and may not be exactly correct—which I think is based in part at least upon the Crowsnest pass agreement, which gives extremely low rates on the shipment of grain in Canada, both east and west, if it is on its way out of Canada.

Those low rates on that grain going out of Canada created a condition under which it was costing more for farmers in the maritime provinces and in British Columbia to get feed grain to be used on their own farms, if it was produced on the prairies, than it would cost the Chinese to get grain to feed the chickens over in China to produce eggs to sell in competition with eggs produced in British Columbia, and more than it costs the people in Denmark, Britain or elsewhere over in Europe to get feed grain with which to feed livestock to produce livestock products which would be sold in competition with those which are produced in the eastern part of Canada.

Under those circumstances, until such time as there is a consideration of the equalization of the freight rates on grain and other commodities being shipped from western Canada to other parts of Canada and vice versa, and until that matter has been determined, an appeal was made that the federal government should give some assistance toward paying the freight on the grain that is moving into those other parts of Canada. That, I repeat, is a reason and a condition that has no association whatsoever with the fact that we sometimes have drought in western Canada.

Coming back to the question of what should be done under the circumstances, since we have drought and since assistance must be given by someone in order to see to it that grain is available for the feeding of livestock in the drought areas of the west, I may say that that has always been considered to be a provincial problem. The basis upon which it has been dealt with in the past is that, when those conditions have arisen, the province has gone to the railways and has made an arrangement under which the grain has been shipped into those areas at lower rates. The basis on which the railways assisted in years gone by was this. Where the farmer paid all of the cost of the grain which was shipped to him, he paid the freight too. But where the grain was given to the farmer because of the conditions which made it absolutely impossible for him to pay, then the governments and the railways shared the cost of shipping that grain in. In other words, as I remember it, the railway reduced their rate down to fifty per cent of the actual cost, the province took twenty-five per cent of the cost, and the dominion took twenty-five per cent. Some arrangement similar to that was made down until the time when prairie farm assistance was brought in. Since then the federal government has taken the position that, by taking care of relief problems in areas where there have been crop failures, our share of the responsibility has been fairly well taken care of by the payments that we make in connection with prairie farm assistance. During these last few years they have totalled sums ranging up to $14 million, $15 million, and $16 million; and this year, I understand, they will amount to a sum about equal to the highest of those figures I mentioned. That being the case, we have not considered that there was any problem in the west that necessitated our taking any direct action in connection with the matter of freight.

Last week Mr. Nollet, the minister of agriculture in Saskatchewan, was in Ottawa. Prior to that, just a few days before he came, he had written to me making representations somewhat similar to those that have just been made by the hon. member for Lake Centre, indicating that resolutions to that effect had been passed by some farm organizations in the areas where the drought had taken place, and suggesting that freight ought to be paid. No request has been made by Mr. Nollet that we should pay all the freight. He has suggested that probably we ought to give some assistance toward the payment of the freight.

On the other question of maintaining the grain in the area, that has always been taken care of by direct request of the provincial governments to the wheat board, and the wheat board and the provincial governments working in co-operation have arranged that grains which are necessary in order to maintain livestock in any given area, provided that the grain is there, is retained in that area sufficiently long to permit all farmers to go to the elevators for the grain in them, or to go to a neighbouring farmer, get the grain, and take it to their farms. As I say, a certain length of time is given, sometimes two months, sometimes three months in advance, and it is indicated that no grain will be shipped out of the elevators in those areas during that period. The farmers are notified that they should go there within that period and get their grain. That of course avoids, to the extent that grain is available, the necessity of having any freight whatsoever paid on grain that is being moved about.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has that been done this year?

Mr. Gardiner: I imagine so. It is not our responsibility to do it. Every time that the provinces have asked us to have it done it has been done, and I would assume that the provincial government has undertaken its responsibility in that respect. There is no reason why it should not, and if they have there is not any doubt that it is being done. If it has not been done, then I am quite sure that the discussion which has been raised here tonight, if it is reported tomorrow, will bring about action which will see that it is done. From the discussion I had with Mr. Nollet last week I was under the impression that that kind of thing had been done—at least he did not suggest to me that there was anything further for us to do about it in order to see that it was done. Therefore I presume it has been done. The only question that he had in his mind was as to whether we did not think we had some obligation in the matter of paying freight, and he based it on the fact that we were paying freight on grain going east and west. I explained to him, as I have explained to the committee, that we did not think there was any connection between the two things, and therefore no responsibility passed on that line. I also referred to the arrangement which had always been made by the railways, and he explained to me that that seemed to be impossible at the present time. The railways do not acknowledge that there is any way in which they can deal with the situation. In addition to that, they have also denied the farmers the special rates which they had been allowing on seed grain. On the railways in years gone by there was a very special rate, a low rate, on grain which was being shipped from one place to another in order to provide seed. It was based on the idea, the better the seed the more tonnage the railways would have to ship; but this year for some reason or other—I presume it is associated with the investigations which have been made into freight rates—the railways have cut out all the special rates. They have cut out the special rates on taking livestock to fairs. Everything of that nature has been struck out. Therefore the farmers are having a little more difficulty in getting arrangements made. It is on that ground that Mr. Nollet suggested that probably the federal government ought to do something. I have asked him to write to me, giving me a detailed statement of the position that they find themselves in. I have suggested to him that after I receive that detailed statement I shall be quite prepared to place the matter before the government; and, when I do receive it, it will be placed before the government.

Mr. Studer: It is not my intention this evening to prolong the discussion on the estimates; but since I am one of those who have come from Saskatchewan, one of the new members, as we are called, perhaps it would not be amiss to let the committee know that fourteen of us came back from Saskatchewan this year, and we think that if we kept quiet all during the session hon. members might not be aware of the fact.

Since it is customary for one who speaks for the first time to extend congratulations, perhaps it would not be out of order if I went along with the others. Most of those who have spoken so far have extended congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I can assure them in all truthfulness, as one of the new members, that the speeches were two of the best I have ever heard in this house, and I can also say that they were two of the best speeches that I ever expect to hear.

Compliments have been paid in considerable number to prominent people, including our Prime Minister. It was suggested that this one or that one was responsible for the winning of the past election. We should like to agree with all that has been said. Remarks have also been made to the effect that agriculture is the backbone of a nation and that the economy of a nation is founded on agriculture, or we can call it food. I believe it is. I believe that the general economy of the world is founded on food. I so believe for this reason, that man can get along without anything else except food. It is the one essential of life. I believe that the economy is based on food. If that is true, and if the welfare of the people of Canada, as well as that of other countries, is based on the production of food, and if the welfare and prosperity of the farmers are based on what has been produced in the way of food, and on export and its prices, then we should compliment one man who has been outstanding in connection with the prosperity of Canada, namely, the present Minister of Agriculture. If prosperity has been in evidence as a result of agriculture, he is one of the men who have brought this about. In saying that, I do not wish to detract from what has been said in all kindness—and I agree with it—of anyone else, or of any other member of the government. These remarks apply not only to the Minister of Agriculture but also to his assistant, the deputy minister, and to his other assistants. If we continue to have prosperity in Canada it will be due to the prosperity of agriculture. When the farmer is prosperous everyone is prosperous. That has been true up to date. I do not think this government can ever originate or bring into operation any plans which will make the farmers too prosperous. I do not believe that that has ever existed on earth. The only danger to this country and to every other country arises when agriculture is not prosperous, because the whole economy of everybody in this country is built on a prosperous agriculture. We should keep that in mind. There is no danger of agriculture ever becoming too prosperous. The more prosperous it becomes the more prosperous everyone else in this country becomes.

I should now like to turn to the estimates, if I may. I just wish to deal with one item. I hesitate to throw a discordant note into what has been said so far this session. Much has been said about improving conditions, and this is as it should be. Even the opposition has been in general agreement that the country has not done too badly up to now, that the government has not done too badly, and that there is some measure of prosperity in the country. There is some evidence of international wheat agreements which will result in security, and there is some stability in regard to prices. We are all interested in increasing agricultural prices and making them permanent. However, in some parts of the country, I regret to say, the people are still suffering. The hon. member for Lake Centre dealt with it just a moment ago, as did the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon. I believe he said that in some large areas in Saskatchewan the situation is as bad as it was in 1937. I am one of those who believe that when one member of the body suffers the entire body suffers. Not all the communities in Canada are prosperous. We want to endeavour to bring all of them along, at least in some degree.

Incidentally, I believe the expression "crop failure" was coined in the constituency of Maple Creek. I believe that was one of the first places where people suffered such a thing, if I remember correctly. I have been there for thirty-three years and I cannot give any good reason why I am still there, because on an average in the last five years I have not had five bushels to the acre. But I believe there is good reason for saying that I along with others, have stayed there because we are firmly convinced that over a period of time we will create some stability in that country. We know that we will, and we are not prepared to throw up our hands and to leave the country, and thus follow the line of least resistance. If we were to leave the country it would be detrimental to its further development.

We are not prepared to do that. We believe in that area of the west, and as time goes on and as problems increase in this world, if one looks at the map of this country and of the United States and determines what areas are suitable for agriculture, he must conclude that those areas on the face of the map of Canada are pitifully small in relation to world development of the future and to the production of foodstuffs for people throughout the world, to which Canada can make so great a contribution.

Therefore those of us out in those areas feel that if you will just bear with us and continue assistance to us over a period of years—and it will not be too long—it will turn out all right. After all, it has been only ten years, and there have been many countries on the North American continent which have suffered for more years than that before they became self-sustaining. We believe that if you will bear with us we will make ourselves self-sustaining, and make as great a contribution to the future welfare of Canada as will any other area of this country.

For a few moments I shall refer to crop failure, to which reference has been made today. In that connection we would suggest that consideration be given to continued assistance for another short period of time, until we can make ourselves self-sustaining. We should have the advantage of P.F.A.A. assistance to make our conditions livable, and make it tolerable for the people in this country, who have suffered through these long years in trying to make their contribution to Canada. We should make it possible for those people to realise their ambitions, to stay in that area and build their homes.

Some of us will move, because that is a country of vast extent. The constituency of Maple Creek has, I believe, 265 polls in it. It extends about 180 miles along the Montana border, and about 80 miles along the Alberta border. People will be moving out of that area in sufficient numbers when the incentive is provided for them, or when they have better possibilities to earn a living elsewhere.

As we know, the dominion government has no land available on which they can settle. It might not be agreeable to the other provinces to move these people to irrigated land in other provinces. I think it is the intention of the government—certainly I hope it is—to make it possible for those people to obtain land the government will have in irrigated areas, and in whatever province they may be, so that when they have to move they will move to a place not under the same conditions, thus they would have a better prospect of making a living.

In the meantime those people are there. I am one who believes that to make that area productive we have to increase the methods we have been following. Farmers must have more land in arid areas than they need in those parts of the country where they have an annual rainfall of from twenty to thirty inches. There may be some people willing to move to those irrigated areas which are provided. Then we will follow a system of double summer-fallowing of our land and summer fallowing of our water and summer fallowing of grass. We have to summerfallow our water out in the west. You will build a dam through P.F.R.A. which will hold the spring runoff, and so that you may have sufficient water to irrigate. Last spring there was very little runoff, so that we have had to build other dams to hold two years' supply, so that in a dry year we will have sufficient water to irrigate the land.

If we get moisture we will make a contribution to this country—and I hope in the not distant future. We will not be standing here asking for assistance for the dried-out areas of Saskatchewan in the Maple Creek area.

Meantime, farmers have been getting along with prairie farm assistance. It was never intended from any other motive or for any other reason than to keep the people off relief, as was pointed out this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture. However, in the minds of the people of Saskatchewan the dominion government is the senior government, and the one responsible for a greater share in the interests of those people. Some think that the payments to farmers under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be increased, and we are repeating that to the government. We believe that, in those townships which have suffered crop failure two years or more consecutively, a supplementary bonus should be paid for the coming year. Owing to the decreased value of the dollar below what it was in 1938, when the act was brought into force, they will be able to pay the same amount at the present time, with the increased amount of the supplementary payment, that was paid when the act was brought into force in 1938.

To illustrate what would be involved: During the ten-year period from 1938 to 1948 there were 1,810 townships in the three western provinces which yielded less than four bushels to the acre. That would be an average of 181 townships for each year for ten years. If these figures are correct, and the same happens in the next ten years, it means that not more than 181 townships in any year in that ten years would come under this program.

So I would ask for consideration by the government in giving assistance to these people during these most difficult times. They are interested in their spring operations. Sometimes people think that, when we speak of townships with five bushels or less on an average, the yield in that township is five bushels, or the equivalent of $10. But only too often there is no yield whatsoever in the township, and consequently no revenue.

I would suggest to the government, therefore, that they give consideration to this, so that it may give some benefit and some relief. This will not be a gift, because I know it will be repaid a hundredfold. These thoughts, Mr. Chairman, I humbly offer for your consideration.

Mr. Argue: In rising to speak this evening I wish to express my pleasure in seeing the Minister of Agriculture once again restored to health. So far as we could tell this afternoon, he had never been ill at all. Apparently, however, our impression would be wrong, because I noticed in the press that shortly after the election he had gone for a ride in the Saskatchewan air ambulance plane. I am sure it speaks well for that service when a man of the standing of the Minister of Agriculture is prepared to take a chance in what many people call a C.C.F. plane.

I can agree with much of what has been said by the hon. member for Maple Creek. It is true that conditions of farming in that area are very risky. Crop failures occur frequently. However, it is still an area which can be a permanent agricultural area, and it could give a satisfactory standard of living to the people who reside in that country if certain agricultural policies were followed by the government.

I believe one of the most important problems with which we should deal at the present time is that of soil conservation and land utilization. I am glad to see that some steps are to be taken to protect our forests.

I should like also to see legislation advanced to protect land under cultivation. Dr. J. J. Booth of the Department of Agriculture, writing in a booklet called "Summary of report of special committee on land use", had this to say in respect to land in the eastern provinces:

> In reviewing the past, an examination of census statistics in the use of land in the older provinces reveals that four million acres, at one time classified as improved land, have been lost. These census figures do not take into account abandoned farms, and an additional area, which might well total several million acres, has been lost through complete farm abandonment.
> It is thought that of major and primary concern is that conservation policies should aim at protecting the productivity of land in active use and increasing its efficiency.

There is land which, because of topography and nearness to water, could best be used under irrigation; but irrigating two or three million acres more land in western Canada than is irrigated today is solving only one problem of land utilization. It will not stand us in very good stead if we merely increase our irrigated acreage considerably and then lose from production, by bad cultural practices, much of the land that we are now farming.

I suggest that the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act should be extended. More money should be made available for the taking of certain land out of the production of wheat and putting it back into grass. Money should be available to farmers in certain areas who are to contour farm and regrass slopes that have been badly eroded. Money should be used to buy farms from some farmers whose unit is uneconomic. The policy in the past has been to fence in a large acreage as a community pasture and then try to obtain some suitable farm land to be exchanged for the land being put into community pasture. Sufficient money should be made available to purchase outright from farmers the land placed in community pastures. With the help of money received from the sale of submarginal or inferior land a farmer could buy better land and be able in the future to look after himself and his family more in keeping with an adequate Canadian standard of living.

At the present time the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act pays a farmer $125 for the construction of a dugout but in our particular district the farmer himself must pay the contractor $300. If the farmer has a crop failure during a dry year, and often that is the only time he can construct a dugout, he may find that he has not the additional $175 needed to pay for the dugout. I suggest to the minister that this allowance should be greatly increased, at least doubled, so that the farmers can afford to build dugouts and conserve the spring runoff.

I was interested to hear the Minister of Agriculture say this afternoon that the main reason the government had not undertaken a crop insurance scheme was that the federal government did not have sufficient constitutional power. I do agree however that an insurance scheme against crop failure, as we understand ordinary insurance schemes, is not practical for western Canada, at least for many parts, since in a high risk area premiums would be entirely too high. But I do not think the minister should use the constitutional argument as an excuse for not expanding and improving the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

I was interested to hear the minister state that the payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act were probably just about enough to cover a farmer's grocery bill for the past summer. A farmer would not need to have a very large family to find that it would not go even as far as that. I wonder how the minister thinks a farmer can obtain money with which to meet his other expenses if the payments under the act are sufficient only to meet his grocery bill.

Mr. Gardiner: I said store bills.

Mr. Argue: For groceries and clothing. That is in keeping with some of the advertisements put out by the Liberal party during the election campaign, which said that the amount was sufficient for the grocery bill and the clothing bill, and to some extent would pay the other farm expenses.

Mr. Ferrie: Why does not the hon. member keep within the bounds of truth?

Mr. Argue: I would ask the hon. member to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Ferrie: I do not have to withdraw that. The hon. gentleman made a statement.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Assiniboia has requested the hon. member for Mackenzie to withdraw a certain remark he has just made. I am sure the hon. member for Mackenzie does not want to offend the hon. member for Assiniboia in any way and therefore I think the hon. member for Mackenzie is ready to reconsider the remark he has made.

An hon. Member: We hope.

Mr. Ferrie: Mr. Chairman, do I have to withdraw that remark if I can prove that the hon. member is wrong?

Mr. Argue: I have asked the hon. member to withdraw his remark, but apparently he does not think he should. I realize he is a new member. I know something of the reputation he has earned for himself in certain parts of the country, and, knowing that, I shall not press the matter any further. I just want to say—

Mr. Ferrie: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Argue: I have the floor.

The Deputy Chairman: I would add to the remark I have made by saying that I do not think the hon. member for Mackenzie intended to impute any motive to the hon. member for Assiniboia. He merely questioned the accuracy of the statement made by the hon. member for Assiniboia. At a later stage the hon. member for Mackenzie will perhaps seek to prove his assertion.

Mr. Argue: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am sure if I have made an incorrect statement about Liberal advertising the minister will correct me, and I shall be willing to stand corrected. I was saying that the present payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, agreeing with the minister, are certainly no more than enough to pay the farmer's store bill. The farmer's store bill is only a very small part of the expenses he must incur in farming each year. He must pay his taxes. If he has a complete crop failure he must buy seed. He must buy fuel, and pay for repairs. He must carry on all his farming operations for at least another twelve months, and certainly $200, $300, $400, or a maximum of $500, as the case may be, is not nearly sufficient for the farmer to do that.

I am glad to learn that amendments to the act are being brought in at this session. I understood from the minister this afternoon that the basis for payment, the township, would be reduced. I welcome that announcement, but certainly even that change is not nearly sufficient. This group would like to see the payments made on a more equitable basis. We would like to see them paid on an individual basis. I should also like to see the residence qualifications, if I may term them that, changed to some extent. At present to obtain payment a farmer must reside on his farm from the first of May until the first of November. A number of my friends and neighbours had crop failures this year. Some of them had very small farms, and some quite large farms. They did not want to stay at home on the farms all winter with very little income, so they have moved to the cities to obtain employment. A number of them feel that unless there is an increase in the amount of precipitation before next spring they are not going to return to the farms. If they do not go back to the farms, then they cannot qualify for payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I think it is certainly not a wise thing to ask a farmer to remain on his farm two or three months after his crop is lost and twiddle his thumbs merely to obtain the bonus.

As I said before, we would like to see the money paid under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act greatly increased. I think the maximum payment of $2.50 an acre is far too small and should be increased to at least $6 an acre. If it were increased to $6 an acre that would be somewhat less than the selling price of four bushels of wheat per acre. Surely no one would suggest that farmers would stay on their land merely to obtain the bonus even if that bonus were increased to the sum of $6 per acre.

It has been stated that economic conditions in western Canada are pretty good. It is true that the prices of non-farm products are reasonably satisfactory, but it must be borne in mind that the farmer's costs are also high. We should keep in mind that, with the farmer's costs high, it is much more difficult for a farmer to operate when he has a crop failure than if the government had maintained some control over his costs, some control over the cost of his machinery, oil, and so forth.

The announcement yesterday of the devaluation of the Canadian dollar will increase the farmer's costs to some extent. The devaluation of the British pound announced on Sunday is going to make it more difficult in the future for us to hold the British market. Prices of our products are going to go up to the people of Great Britain. We are concerned lest our markets in Great Britain continue to fall. We all know that the quantities stipulated in the food contracts that have been signed for this year are very much less than they were a few years ago. I have them here, but I will not tire the house by quoting the figures. The contracts have dropped in some instances to less than fifty per cent of the quantity a few years ago.

In western Canada there is a trend away from the production of coarse grains and livestock to the production of wheat. That is all right if we have an assured market for the quantities of wheat that we are likely to produce in the years ahead. But from articles that we read from day to day we know that the world's production of wheat is increasing rapidly. According to a Canadian Press dispatch from Ottawa on July 8, world wheat stocks are now almost as high as they were back in 1930. We have an initial price continuing until July 31 of next year of $1.75 a bushel basis No. 1 northern, Fort William, but the government has not announced what policy it will follow after that date.

It is true that we have a guaranteed market under the international wheat agreement which our group supported. Canada's share in the agreement at the time it was signed was 203,000,000 bushels of wheat per year. I wonder if the Minister of Agriculture would tell us at some time during the discussion of these estimates whether or not all the countries have entered into that agreement so that we can in fact expect an export market thereunder of 203,000,000 bushels.

I noticed a few weeks ago that all the importing countries had not yet signed, and therefore we are not assured of a market for even 203,000,000 bushels of wheat per year. That quantity of wheat per year, if the international wheat contract operates to its fullest extent, is still perhaps 100,000,000 bushels of wheat per year short of the quantity necessary to absorb all our surplus wheat.

The government may very naturally congratulate themselves, and we congratulate them as well, on their election to office with so large a majority. Naturally the government and the Liberal party are pleased that their support in western Canada has been increased. I do not know all the reasons for that increase in support. The farmers I talked to around the first of June felt that one of the reasons they could safely support the government was that the government, beginning August 1, was removing oats and barley from the grain exchange, and the wheat board would be the sole marketing agency for those grains. On June 1, 1949, there was a Canadian Press statement reading as follows:

> The Canadian Press Wednesday learned that the complete buying and selling of western oats and barley will be taken over by the wheat board, leaving the grain exchange only the marketing of rye and flaxseed.
> An earlier announcement from the trade department merely stated that the board would undertake the marketing of coarse grains and did not indicate the extent.
> The Canadian Press later learned that the marketing of coarse grains, similar to wheat, would be removed from the grain exchange.

In all the reports of the speeches of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), from that day until the end of the election, I did not see any denial of the report that the wheat board was going to handle oats and barley in exactly the same way it has been handling wheat. We were therefore surprised indeed on August 1 to find that the wheat board was buying coarse grains at local elevator points and using the facilities of the grain exchange to market the grain.

We in this group, and we think the organized farmers of western Canada agree with us, believe that the grain exchange should be closed permanently and that speculation and fluctuating prices should be removed in the sale of grain. Next year the government should change its policy in respect to the initial price for oats and barley. At our local elevator point, the barley sold nets the farmer 67⅞ cents, that is for No. 2 feed barley. The price of oats is something over 40 cents per bushel. The return on wheat at that local point is $1.58½ a bushel. The return on a bushel of wheat therefore is more than twice as much as for barley and almost four times as much as for oats. If these prices continue, the farmers will be forced to abandon the seeding of coarse grains next spring, and I think that would have serious consequences.

Mixed farming is the only method by which agriculture can be continued on a sound basis. After looking at the wheat markets of the world today, I think all of us agree we cannot be certain of an adequate market. I would therefore urge upon the government the need to increase the initial price for oats to 75 cents and barley to $1 per bushel at local points. Then farmers will continue to seed some coarse grains and by that means maintain agriculture on a more sound basis.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the Liberals from Saskatchewan, I wish to congratulate you on your elevation to your present position. We from western Canada are not used to this eastern atmosphere; the air is heavy, so it will take us some time to get used to it. You have already had one demonstration in the house and I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, while I am congratulating you on your elevation to your position, before the Saskatchewan delegation is finished with our friends over there to the left you will have plenty of time to exercise that discretion which I hear you possess in such large measure.

This house has been regaled for two days by the members from Saskatchewan in the C.C.F. party. We in Saskatchewan feel some responsibility for that party because it started in our province. I believe I speak for the fourteen Liberal members from Saskatchewan when I say that, since it started there, it is up to us to eradicate it from that province. I think we can assure you that three years hence that job will be done.

Our friends have a right to speak in this house, however. They have exercised that right for two days continuously. Yesterday we had a demonstration when they introduced an amendment concerning old age pensions, not with any hope of securing old age pensions but simply for the purpose of political propaganda.

Mr. Knowles: Order; there are two points of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am afraid I must point out to the hon. gentleman that we are now dealing wth the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The point of order is well taken and my point has also been well taken.

We are fortunate in having as Minister of Agriculture a man from an agricultural province. Some bright newspaperman who works for the Ottawa Journal inserted an item in Saturday's paper to the effect that the Minister of Agriculture and I had almost engaged in fisticuffs twenty years ago and that we were sitting in approximately the same relative positions in this house as we occupied in the Saskatchewan legislature. We can scrap fairly quickly and get over our difficulties just as quickly. The Liberal party in this dominion has proven it is broad enough to take in anybody in Canada.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You said it, brother.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I had not noticed that my hon. friend the member for Lake Centre was not in the house. I regret that he is not here. I believe that eventually hon. gentlemen of the Conservative party are going to find out that he was elected by half the Liberal votes in his constituency and that he will be taken into the Liberal party.

An hon. Member: Taken in is right.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but if we are to make any progress I would ask him to keep to the item.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I am coming down to the agricultural estimates. Certain remarks have been made in connection with those estimates, Mr. Chairman, by the members of the C.C.F. They have criticized the administration of the department. Most of us have read the pamphlets they brought in, even the Christian Science Monitor. I think they have brought in every pamphlet except Eaton's catalogue and the Western Producer. The Minister of Agriculture and the efficient officers in his department have read most of these treatises.

The group for whom I am speaking represents thirteen rural constituencies in the province of Saskatchewan. I believe my hon. friends in the C.C.F. have one practical farmer in the person of the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). He is quite free to join us in consultation on agricultural matters.

In connection with the estimates for this department, there are certain things that bother the western farmer, whether he is from Saskatchewan, Alberta, or Manitoba. I realize that the Minister of Agriculture is not in charge of the selling of our grain but that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is charged with that duty.

I trust that when I question the minister, even though he may to a certain extent have to usurp some of the functions of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, he will try to give us some information that will be useful to our constituents. For instance, one thing that is bothering the western farmer is the matter of the surplus grain that has been accumulated in the United States. Those of us who are familiar with grain handling realize that, by a system of subsidization which is followed in the United States, and by increasing the acreage the last few years until last year, the United States has gradually accumulated a surplus of wheat. We also realize that England has been purchasing our western grain with United States funds.

We as members from Saskatchewan have discussed the matter, and if it will aid the minister at all I may say that we feel that a strong protest should be made to the representatives of the United States government, suggesting and requesting that on no account shall their excess of grain be declared surplus and Great Britain be required to buy that grain with Marshall dollars. We are naturally concerned about that matter. I do not know whether the minister wishes to make a statement about it or not. That I believe is the feeling of the Saskatchewan Liberals and I believe it will be the feeling of those here representing a farming constituency. It will be noticed that in the United States congress and senate it has been advocated that wheat be declared a surplus. We representing the western farmers should make it known to the United States that we are strongly opposed to that action being taken, and that we do not think it is fair in view of what has happened between our respective countries and under the United Nations.

Last night we listened to the announcement made by the Minister of Finance. Whether we belong to the C.C.F. or to the Liberal party, we are all here together representing our constituencies. I think we are concerned rather deeply not only over the effect of the devaluation of the British pounds—over which, of course, we have no control—but also as to the effect of the devaluation of the Canadian dollar by ten per cent. Our cattle now have access to the United States at a reduced duty. In view of the fact that we now receive ten per cent more for our cattle as a result of this drop of ten per cent in our money, I would ask the minister whether in his opinion the farmers of western Canada and of eastern Canada who are exporting cattle to the United States can logically expect to receive roughly ten per cent more for their cattle shipped over to the United States. I believe that would be correct. I think the same thing will apply to alfalfa seed which is sent from northern Saskatchewan, practically all of which goes to the United States, and also to the shipment of our seed oats particularly, of which we send a great quantity to the United States.

Our friends in the C.C.F. do not like to point out the benefits of what the government does, but I think they should be optimistic enough to realize that those are effects that we can expect—ten per cent more for our farmers in connection with those products. The situation in the British market is one of concern. But again I say that we have nothing whatever to do or say about the devaluation of the pound. That was purely a matter for Great Britain herself to settle, and she has settled it. Naturally it will take more pounds to pay for Canadian farm products. But the whole object of the devaluation —and again I do not think we should be unduly pessimistic—is that England expects to get on her trading feet, and figures that this is the way to do it. After all, I say again to my friends in the C.C.F. that they should be optimistic because in England there is a Labour government which at one time they held in high esteem. They have done that in England, and while it may temporarily hurt some of our exports, I believe the minister has stated that we have been able to export everything we have in the line of farm products except apples and an excess of wheat. That is the situation so far. I do not know whether the minister will want to make a statement on what effect, in his opinion, this action will have on our bacon market, but it would be of interest to us. I would ask him what, in his opinion will be the effect on our wheat agreement with England next year. As I understand it, it will mean ten per cent more for the western farmers. Is that correct, in the opinion of the minister?

[Mr. Stewart (Yorkton).]

Mr. Gardiner: I think the present position is, as I said this afternoon, that our wheat agreement provides that wheat be paid for in Canadian dollars. Therefore the price of the 1949 crop will be as has been arranged under the agreement, and the farmer will get the same as he would have got had there been no change in Britain. But on the long-time agreement which starts with the 1950 crop, the arrangement made in that agreement is that payment is to be made in terms of U.S.A. dollars as they were on the day that the agreement was signed, which means that we shall be paid for our wheat on the basis of $1.80 in United States funds; and the reduction of ten per cent which has been brought in by this government will mean an increase of approximately eighteen cents above that, which puts our wheat for the term of the contract in this position, provided that the present thirty per cent devaluation continues in Britain and the ten per cent devaluation continues in Canada, that we will get by what we did approximately eighteen cents more, which would put our wheat back close to $2 in Canadian dollars instead of $1.80, which the farmer would have received had exchange remained at par.

Mr. Larson: I understood some time ago that the matter of marketing wheat under the Canadian wheat board had been fairly well settled. Many of the members of the committee know of the struggle that the farmer and the farm organizations went through to get their wheat marketing away from the open exchange. The reason this was done I will leave to your imagination, although I can explain it. But whenever we have had a great deal of wheat on hand we seemed to have low prices. Finally, with the concurrence of the province, the federal government established the Canadian wheat board. I think the committee is with me in congratulating the Minister of Agriculture on the matter of marketing wheat. Just after that wheat board came into existence we began to get floods of propaganda to the effect that the farmer had lost some $400 million. Since that time participation payments have been made to the extent of nearly $400 million. I noted here this afternoon that one of the hon. members claimed that we have lost $525 million. I almost hope that is right. The Minister of Agriculture somehow or other produced the $400 million. I wonder if somehow he now can produce the other $125 million. I think we have been fairly well dealt with.

Mr. Byrne: I should like to associate myself with all those who have extended congratulations to all the ministers and their associates. I am certainly wholeheartedly in agreement with everything that was said, and I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the committee except to congratulate the minister under questioning on his recovery. I am certainly glad that he is back with us today.

The constituency of Kootenay East, which I represent, is an extensive one and its industries include farming, mining, logging and small businesses. Although it is not a good political position to take, it has been customary for me to say exactly what I think; and on this occasion I intend to do so. I have been elected from a diversified constituency. You will find in that fact conclusive proof that I am a Liberal and have been elected on the same basis as a great number of hon. members here also who are prepared to look after the best interests of all in our society.

With regard to the farmer, the hon. member for Yale and the hon. member for Kootenay West outlined the difficulties which are prevalent in the fruit-growing areas. There is a large fruit-growing area in the western portion of my riding. These hon. members must have made an extensive study into the difficulties that prevail among the fruit growers. I should like to say further that I hope the government will continue in their policy of expenditures looking for further markets, markets which are certainly essential to the welfare of the fruit-growing areas.

It has been said by the hon. member for Yale that the domestic market is one on which we are prone to rely. I feel quite certain that when the estimates for some of the other departments come up we shall fully realize that this government is making forward plans which will ensure the development of Canada in general and British Columbia in particular, thereby providing employment for a greater number of people in that area. There is one small matter which is of concern to the Creston valley, to which I refer. During the war years and shortly after the war a great number of people migrated to the balmy Creston valley. Probably they had not heard the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver South but they must have heard a similar one because there is an excessive number of people there at the present time. In order to sustain the people who are there I should like to suggest that in the estimates the government make every effort to see that irrigation is provided for some of the arable lands in that area. By doing so they would ensure an efficient industry being established there. In my riding milk is 22 cents a quart. I am sure that a market could be provided in Kimberley, which is a mining area, and also in Trail, which has a large industrial plant. If some of these fertile fields were irrigated it would help to solve the problem of a slightly overpopulated district.

We have one problem which I think is unique in my riding and it concerns the farmers in the great Columbia valley. The Columbia valley is some two hundred miles long. I might add that my riding is another fifty to seventy-five miles longer than that. It runs approximately close to three hundred miles in a northern and southern direction. The farmers in the northernmost portion of my riding are in the position of having a very small market for their produce, unless they are able to journey to Calgary, a city with which you are all familiar. It is a logical market for their produce. They also desire to purchase in the city of Calgary equipment, supplies and so on for their farms. However, they are in this unique position. Although they are only one hundred and sixty-three miles from Calgary they find it necessary to travel four hundred and seventy-five miles to get there. They have to travel from the northern to the southern part of the riding and then westward to the Crowsnest pass and up to Calgary to take the smallest amount of produce to market. That is a condition that I heard of only in the last year, although it has prevailed for a considerable length of time. The reason for that is that they do not have highways connecting the Columbia valley with Calgary and other large centres in Alberta, but they have two national parks between them and this large city. Because they are not allowed to drive even the smallest truck carrying the smallest amount of produce through those parks into Calgary, they find it necessary to travel these four hundred and seventy-five miles. I ask the minister to use his good offices and make some effort to alleviate this irregularity which is prevalent in my riding. Since I represent a large group in a large riding, and since I speak for them, you will hear more from me.

Mr. Bater: Mr. Chairman, we shall now leave British Columbia and come back to Saskatchewan. In doing so may I say that I happen to be one of the fourteen Liberal members who come from the province of Saskatchewan. I started on my way on June 27 last.

At the outset, sir, I should like to concur with other hon. members in congratulating the Prime Minister on his return to this house as Prime Minister of this great dominion. Along with other hon. members I should also like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Last, but far from least, may I say I am pleased to see that we have with us in the house tonight one who just a few weeks ago we were afraid might not be with us on this occasion. I am referring to the one who is in charge of the department which we are discussing tonight, namely, the Minister of Agriculture.

Since we are dealing with agriculture estimates, Mr. Chairman, I shall try to stay as close to that subject as I possibly can. I shall try to the best of my ability to stick to the point in my few remarks.

After listening to the many speakers today we have all come to the conclusion that agriculture still has many problems, hazards and pests. We have heard of the new pest from Manitoba, the aphid. We know we have drought in southwestern Saskatchewan. We had the grasshopper. Then we have heard of a new one, one that I had never heard of before, which is attacking the nut growers of British Columbia. They too have their problems. But their problem is one which has been mentioned once or twice before in this house. I refer to tariffs. In connection with agriculture I have heard some say that tariffs should be reduced or taken off. Others have said that they should be increased. I hold in my hand a letter which I received from the secretary of a rural municipality in Saskatchewan, which brings to our attention that there are other pests in Saskatchewan at this time. This one happens to be weeds. In this letter this municipality advises me that during this season they have used upwards of a hundred and thirty thousand pounds of atlacide in the attempted destruction of toadflax. They, too, think they should have assistance.

Something was said about the loss to western agriculture on the price of wheat. I question whether we have lost anything. Let me repeat what I said last summer on the hustings, and I say it now in all sincerity, that I do not think there is any government in any country of the world—and I am taking in a lot of territory—which has endeavoured during the pre-war, the war and post-war periods to do more for the stability of agriculture than has the government of this country. When we take into account subsequent payments for our wheat, in face of the fact that we have sold all our wheat, I think it is possible we will not have lost one cent.

I wonder if we are altogether fair when we make comparisons with our neighbour to the south in the matter of grain prices, especially wheat prices. I believe I am correct when I say that our neighbour consumes about 80 per cent of the wheat she grows, whereas we export 80 per cent of our wheat. Our problem, and the problem of this government, or any government which may hold office in Canada, has been and will be the great problem of marketing our grain. I believe this government will see to it that we get every cent that it is humanly possible for us to get in the sale of our wheat.

Something has been said about prairie farm assistance, and the minister has said that amendments will be brought down. I have every reason to believe and hope that in the amendments consideration will be given to bringing under this scheme more farmers who have less than eight bushels to the acre, and less who have more than eight bushels to the acre.

I shall conclude my few remarks by saying that I believe this department, under the direction of the Minister of Agriculture and his deputy minister, will keep its sights high and see to it that measures are brought down from time to time, possibly in this very session, which will bring about a greater measure of stability for Canadian agriculture.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, I understand you are keeping us very close to the item under discussion this evening. Therefore I must justify what I intend to say, because I intend to speak about higher education. I say that with some confidence, because the minister and I graduated from the same school of higher education. He may disclose that in what he does and says now; but I am frank to admit I was a faker there —and some of you think I am now.

In those days in the place where we went the courses were limited under which one might graduate. There was natural science—and that was the one I chose because, upon inquiry, I found that was the easiest way to become a bachelor of arts—there were classics, moderns, mathematics and philosophy. That about ran the gamut of those subjects with the aid of which one could acquire this so-called higher education. While the minister and I attended the same school, I graduated by trickery—I got a medal for it, as a matter of fact. The minister, of course, was the sterling character that he is now, and did not take advantage of things as I did—for instance, crawling up a rain pipe to steal the examination papers in botany before I wrote them. And that was my last connection with botany; I do not mind telling you that.

I find now, however, that higher education has gone much further—and I use the expression "higher education" as being synonymous with university education. Now we find that degrees are given to women. The minute they learn that when they quit eating starches, fats and sugars they lose weight, that gives them a degree. I think, too, that we should give a special degree to those who discover that you can have a proper beefsteak only when it is broiled over charcoal. But that would be a new departure in higher education.

The thing that disturbs me at the present time, and which compels me to speak now, is that I now see a new departure in higher education, namely the game of football.

An hon. Member: The Calgary Stampeders.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I hear an echo from my left, from a supporter of mine and of the Calgary Stampeders. For several days I have sat here listening to congratulations, in the hope that no one would say what I am now going to say, and that is to congratulate and to welcome the more than ninety new members who have come to the House of Commons. I say that for a number of reasons, but principally because we welcome them to this so-called finest club in Canada. My old friend Carl Stewart from Yorkton, who spoke a moment ago, has now arrived in a club where he is absolutely welcome, and there are no conditions or anything of that kind to detract from full membership in this organization. So I am sure they will all be happy here.

As I said a moment ago, the new course of football has now been introduced in higher education. I say that because I come from a place called Calgary, where we have the best football club in Canada—and even if the Secretary of State for External Affairs had been here, I would assert that as a simple fact. We have the Grey Cup. I do not know of any better proof than winning the Grey Cup.

But returning to my subject of higher education: we had three very good lads out there named Pullar, Tomlinson and Wilmot, who formed a good part of our line. They were Calgary born, and splendid lads. But in this higher education McGill stole the three of them from us two days before the season opened—and we had only two days to replace them.

You will realize, Mr. Chairman, that I am addressing my remarks to the first item in this department. Under the agricultural estimates we find a vote for research, which brings me back, right in the groove, so to speak, and in line with what the minister has in mind. I have seen a lot of football players; I saw some in Ottawa last Saturday. It appeared to me that they could not get any higher education in football; they are all quite clever. But while I was watching them it occurred to me that higher education may be obtained in various ways. Having seen them I thought the best method would be to bore a hole through their heads. That would not hurt them very much and you could then pour in the higher education through the hole, and God knows what might happen after that.

I know that there are many alumni of the old university of McGill here and I want to compliment them upon being the great protectors of amateurism. But the fact is that they stole three players from one club because they were able to pay them more money than we can. That is how we are being protected in this sport business. Then they came along and took another one who was the best kicker I ever saw. He was already getting higher education because he belonged to the university of Alberta.

I congratulate the alumni of McGill university on having raised money to make higher education available to poor boys who are not able to pay their way through college or whose parents are not able to pay for them. But the father of this boy could buy out the whole side of this House of Commons and have plenty of money left to live on the rest of his days. But they were willing to pay more for higher education than we can pay for football players. Perhaps that is a new idea. Perhaps it is an excellent thing. Dear old McGill! May their colours some day rise from the bottom of the heap to the top. I ask you to pass your judgment on these raiders of professional football clubs.

How do I attach all this to the agricultural estimates? Your guess will be just as good as mine. I notice in the estimates that a lot of money is to be spent for research. We all live from the soil; that is the basis of everything we have and do. I think if the minister were really put to it he could justify it. I have never known a man who could justify things as he can. I know that if he were really put to it he could find something in his estimates which would provide a new scheme instead of having to bore holes through their thick skulls. I know that he and his research staff could find a better method of finding out whether they can kick a football farther than anybody else.

I pay that compliment to his natural ability which has been so much enhanced by the fact that he has sat where he is for so long. I spoke to him a moment ago and asked if he did not think we were getting a little beyond things. He replied, "I think probably we are." I did not say it then, but I say now that the minister is a past master par excellence at that sort of thing.

Now that I have finished my speech on the agricultural estimates I hope that the people of McGill university will not send out some low-flying aeroplanes to spread insecticides which will do almost anything but help these lads pass their examinations. It must be remembered that our club is well represented in this House of Commons. I am vice-president and the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition are both honorary vice-presidents. Last year I gave them definite assurance of that in the form of a cleverly drawn certificate with a little red ribbon on the corner and all that sort of thing. That was drawn by my stenographer because I was not capable of doing it. I turn now to the agricultural estimates and in that respect I am going to take a great deal of your time in saying exactly nothing.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Now that our dollar has been devaluated I wonder if the minister could state what our quota of cattle is to the United States and what was the total exported last year by producers in Canada?

Mr. Gardiner: There is no quota on our cattle going into the United States. An arrangement was made prior to the war under which we were permitted to export only so many cattle. All countries in the world were permitted to export only so many cattle to the United States. During the war that regulation was dropped, but it was understood that after the war it might be reinstated. Foot and mouth disease has developed in Mexico since the war, with the result that no cattle from that country are permitted to enter the United States. No restriction was placed upon cattle from Canada to the United States. My memory is that last year somewhere between 450,000 and 500,000 cattle went from this country to the United States.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Did they pay any extra duty?

Mr. Gardiner: They paid the reduced duty.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Did they all pay it? My memory is that it was a cent and a half for the first 200,000.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

Mr. Gardiner: That would have applied if the quota regulations had been enforced, but my information is that the quota was not enforced last year.

2. Publicity and extension division, $242,760.

Mr. Wright: The details show that $52,000 is for acquisition of equipment and $25,000 for the printing of agricultural bulletins. This branch was set up to disseminate information with regard to various agricultural activities and I am wondering why $52,000 should be needed for the acquisition of equipment and only $25,000 for the printing and distribution of this material.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that the extra $25,000 is required owing to the fact that during the war the printing and distribution of this material was greatly curtailed. Now that there is a greater demand we are trying to meet it by printing these publications for distribution across the country.

Mr. Wright: What was the equipment that was required to the value of $52,000?

Mr. Gardiner: Motion picture equipment amounting to about $10,000 was acquired.

3. Advisory committee on agricultural services, $5,000.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Who constitute the personnel of this committee and what are their duties?

Mr. Gardiner: Two committees in connection with agriculture are more or less of an advisory nature. The first is composed of the ministers of agriculture of the different provinces of Canada. There have been some changes compared with the list I have here, but whoever happen to be the ministers of agriculture in the various provinces comprise the advisory committee on agricultural services. The chairman is the Minister of Agriculture for Canada. That is the committee itself. The advisory committee is composed of the deputy ministers and the deans of the different agricultural colleges of Canada.

Mr. Ferguson: In view of the comparison of prices given today by the hon. member for Souris, and in view of the statement made that 400,000 head of Canadian cattle were exported last year to the United States, does the minister not think that there is not only a nigger in the woodpile but also a wolf in sheep's clothing as far as the poor people of Canada are concerned? The consumers of Canada are paying these high prices, and apparently it is a fact that it is not the farmer who is making all this money, but somebody else. The prices board could well afford to investigate the situation to see where the robbery is occurring. A prices commission sat here last year. When one hears the Canadian retail price for meat, and the fact that we shipped 400,000 head of cattle to the United States and paid a slight duty on them, and when one learns that the United States consumer buys these meat products at a lower price than the Canadian consumer pays, then it is almost time that the government set up a fact-finding committee, including representatives of agriculture, to investigate the exorbitant high cost of living in Canada today.

Mr. Gardiner: This is not just the item upon which that matter should be discussed, but I think that I probably should correct the impression that may have been created. Speaking this afternoon someone—I think from the C.C.F. group—suggested that we should have some proof that an undertaking given to this house by the previous Prime Minister and myself is being carried out. That undertaking was that over a certain period of time after the war, and after prices for farm products had gone down in the United States, the farmers of Canada would still receive something more than the farmers in the United States were receiving. The reason for that was, as has been stated by one of the members on this side of the house, I think it was the member for The Battlefords, that we succeeded in stabilizing farm prices in Canada. Everyone agrees that we did not permit farm prices to go up as high as they went in the United States for a few months following the removal of their controls. During that period many members on the other side of the house suggested that we were robbing the farmers of this country because we did not permit these prices to rise.

During that period, it is true, the Prime Minister of that day, and I as Minister of Agriculture, said that for some time after prices in the United States did come down to our levels an effort would be made to maintain our prices at a stable level in order that some of these returns might go back to the farmers. I am not sure that the hon. member has selected a good item when he takes beef, because the hon. member for Souris did not read all the items in the article he referred to this afternoon. I happened to have the article in my pocket when he was reading it, and I took it out of my pocket and checked it rather carefully. In so far as pork products are concerned, it is true that prices in Canada are somewhat higher than they are in the United States. For example, it is stated in this article from the Winnipeg Free Press that sugar-cured sliced rindless side bacon at St. Paul is 43 to 49 cents a pound whereas in Winnipeg it is 47 cents a half pound. In other words, the price of bacon in Winnipeg is just about double what it is in St. Paul.

It is stated in this article that the claim is made by the packers of Canada that what you are talking about when you talk about Canadian bacon is quite a different product from what you are talking about when you speak of bacon in St. Paul. That may be true, but they go on to say that some people like United States bacon just as well as Canadian bacon.

On the other hand, taking spring lamb, it is 59 cents in St. Paul and 59 cents in Winnipeg. If you take a pot roast of beef, commercial grade, it is 39 cents in St. Paul and 38 cents in Winnipeg. There is not very much difference there. A T-bone steak, commercial grade, is 59 cents in St. Paul and 57 cents in Winnipeg. In so far as beef products are concerned, they appear to be almost the same, or possibly slightly lower in Canada than they are in the United States.

Mr. Ferguson: Have you considered the value of the United States dollar, as admitted by this government? It is higher.

Mr. Gardiner: The two currencies were supposed to be at par at that time.

Mr. Ferguson: No matter what they were supposed to be, the fact was that they were not.

Mr. Gardiner: I must say, in the light of what my hon. friend has said, that I used that same argument myself in another place the other day, and I was informed that ninety per cent of the transactions between Canada and the United States are on the official level, which is par. I presume that transactions such as those between cattle dealers on this side of the line and cattle dealers on the other side have been on the official basis. When I go to the United States and spend some money and try to pass a Canadian dollar it is true they cut me down to 90 cents right now, and have done so in the past; but in so far as official transactions are concerned they are carried on on the official basis, which is par. Therefore the prices at St. Paul are comparable.

I say as far as beef is concerned there is not any great difference. I should like to say, in reply to those who represent constituencies that are largely composed of persons who are consumers and not producers, that we thought two years ago, and we still think, that as regards some of these farm products it has been justifiable to maintain prices in Canada at a slightly higher level for a period of time than the level to which they have gone down in the United States, as a result of the fact that United States prices were allowed to go up as high as they did and our prices were held down for the few months during which that condition prevailed.

4. Contributions to commonwealth bureaux, $86,139.

Mr. Wright: Where are these bureaux situated to which we make this contribution, and does Canada supply any of the personnel?

Mr. Gardiner: The commonwealth agricultural bureau is a bureau that compiles information from different agricultural departments all over the world that may be of use to people in other parts of the commonwealth. A bureau has been conducted in London during the past few years. One of those bureaux was transferred from London to Ottawa during the war period. My understanding is that it is to remain here. These bureaux were set up for the purpose of gathering information from all parts of the empire and sending it to anyone who may require it in order to form a judgment as to whether that particular part of the empire should proceed in the same way. The only way that information could be made available was to have it accumulated at one place and have each section pay a proportion of the cost. This item covers Canada's share.

Mr. Wright: How are the personnel for these bureaux selected? Are they selected from the various countries?

Mr. Gardiner: The scientific services in the different countries select the men who are to serve on these bureaux.

5. Science service administration, $680,070.

Mr. Harkness: The major portion of this item amounting to over $500,000 seems to be for the acquisition and construction of buildings. It is so large a sum, I wonder whether the minister would explain what buildings this item covers?

Mr. Gardiner: The reason for putting it in this item is that it is concerned with a number of divisions, that is production, experimental farms as well as some of the others. There is no one item under which we could put these buildings, so we have placed them in the item covering scientific services. Really, they are concerned with scientific services.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

One building for which this money is being provided is being opened at Lethbridge the day after tomorrow. As my hon. friend will know, that building has to do with the study of certain diseases in livestock. For a long time it was located at a different point outside the city of Lethbridge and some distance from the experimental farm. It has now been located closer to the experimental farm. A year ago the money was provided for the land on which to construct this building. It has been constructed and is to be officially opened the day after tomorrow.

Another of these buildings is located at Sault Ste. Marie in the northern part of the province of Ontario. It is connected with the department of entomology and is concerned with the fighting of forest pests. We have those buildings established at different places across Canada and the money is for them.

Mr. Harkness: I understand that this item covers a series of buildings. Could the minister tell us how many?

Mr. Gardiner: Those I have named are the major ones. I believe a start has been made on a building at London, but it is not completed. I believe those are the three buildings involved.

Mr. Harkness: Would the minister tell me what amount was spent on the buildings at Lethbridge to which he just referred?

Mr. Gardiner: I am sorry, but the information we have here shows a lump sum for the three buildings. I have not a breakdown of the expenditure, but I can get that information for the hon. member at a later date. I can bring it in when my estimates are again before the committee.

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister tell the house what progress has been made in the investigation into "little cherry" disease? What staff is employed now on that work?

Mr. Gardiner: Would the hon. member return to that matter when we reach the item concerning botany? In that way, the information can be given in the order in which we have it here.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Does the item discussed a few moments ago cover the acquisition of the land?

Mr. Gardiner: No. As I said a while ago, the amount for acquiring the land was obtained in a previous estimate about a year ago. After the land was obtained, this amount was needed for the construction of the building.

6. Animal and poultry pathology, $353,515.

Mr. Pearkes: Early this summer the animal pathological laboratory which had been located at the experimental station at Saanichton was transferred to the university of British Columbia in Vancouver. For a great many years that animal pathological laboratory under the direction of Dr. Bruce had served the needs of the dairy and poultry farmers on the southern portion of Vancouver island. Since its transfer to Vancouver, these people have been deprived of those services. I realize that these laboratories serve a double purpose, one of research and one of servicing the general needs of the farmers in the area.

It is likely that the research functions can be carried out to better advantage at the university of British Columbia. This means, however, that the poultry and dairy farmers of Vancouver island are left without the services to which they have been accustomed for a great many years. There is a shortage of civilian practitioners on Vancouver island and such as there are are located mainly in the cities where they look after pets. The people in the rural areas are deprived of the services of a qualified veterinarian.

I realize there will be difficulties in returning that laboratory to Saanichton. It might not be desirable, but I would ask the department to have Dr. Bruce, who has retired, replaced by a qualified veterinary officer so that the services which were carried out by this laboratory for so many years might be continued. Would that be possible?

Mr. Gardiner: I shall certainly have the matter investigated to ascertain whether that is possible. I was just asking whether the station at Saanichton had been entirely closed. I am given to understand that such is not the case and some work is being carried on at that point. Some work has to be centralized on the mainland at the university, but that would be there in any case. This work will be continued at that point. I would think there is some justification for suggesting there should be some services available on the island and I shall look into the suggestion.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to speak on this item for a moment because we have fought for many years to have that station moved from Saanichton to the university of British Columbia or the Agassiz experimental farm. One of our biggest assets, particularly in acquiring United States funds, is the shipping of purebred cattle to the United States. All the tests for those cattle had to go over to Saanichton. Any one farm in the Fraser valley has more cattle on it than the whole of Vancouver island. The logical place for these tests to be made was at the university, if not right in the centre of the Fraser valley. After all the years we fought to get the station moved, if the minister or his department attempts to move it back to a point where there are only half a dozen cattle and a few chickens raised by the retired people of Saanichton, there will be a battle.

8. Botany and plant pathology, $1,154,500.

Mr. Gardiner: The question asked was as to what the position is in connection with little cherry disease of cherry trees. Little cherry disease is caused by a virus continuously spread in the Kootenay and Arrow lake district as revealed by a survey conducted by dominion and provincial officials. The insertion of buds from diseased cherry trees into peach, prune, apricot, choke cherry and wild cherry and of buds of peach, prune and choke cherry growing near diseased cherry trees into healthy trees and the artificial pollination of healthy cherry trees with pollen from diseased trees, all failed to produce any clear-cut symptom the following year as would be expected if the little cherry disease had been transmitted. A tree-to-tree survey was conducted in the Okanagan valley by provincial officials with the assistance of the staff of the Summerland laboratory of plant pathology, which covered all the southern part up to and including Kelowna. No tree with definite symptoms of little cherry disease was found. One tree in the Oliver district was removed on suspicion.

All that indicates is that investigations are going on and the results of those investigations are as they are shown here. In answer to the question, all I can say is that the work is still going on.

10. Agricultural entomology, including a payment of $3,500 to the commonwealth biological control laboratory, Belleville, Ontario, for special services, $1,321,926.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I should like to ask the minister what his entomologists have found with regard to the probable outbreak of grasshoppers in each of the three prairie provinces in 1950, and what success they have had in controlling the outbreaks this summer. Many farmers are greatly concerned about what the situation will be next year.

Mr. Gardiner: The practical battle against grasshoppers on the ground is carried on by the provincial governments. My information is that during this last summer they have been fairly successful in combating the grasshopper plague. I presume that is because the means of doing it now is much more highly developed and they have more successful means of doing it than they had a few years ago. This department is making a survey to determine what is likely to be the position next year, but that survey is not yet completed. There is therefore no information that I can give out which would be of any great help at the present time. It may be that before the session is over, and maybe before we are through with these estimates, we shall have a report which I could give to the committee. But at the moment it does not exist.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I hope the minister will give us that information. His officials now make surveys in the different districts, and it would be beneficial if, when he has the report, he would at some time give the committee the benefit of the surveys.

11. Forest entomology, $1,087,490.

Mr. Herridge: What work is undertaken under this item of forest entomology, and where are investigations being carried out in Canada at the present time?

Mr. Gardiner: Some forest entomology work is being done in every province in Canada; but of course the greater part of the work is done where the greater forests are. That is in British Columbia and Ontario, and in some of the eastern provinces. Of course, where disease is threatening, a considerable part of the work is done there. But in direct answer to the question I would say that work is being carried on in every province in Canada.

Mr. Hatfield: Why should it come under the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. Gardiner: It is a matter of research, and a considerable part of the entomological work must be done in the Department of Agriculture. I do not say that the forestry must be done there, but the same experts who deal with insects that are pests to crops are experts in the handling of insects which are pests to trees. As a matter of fact, in most countries forestry is considered as a part of agriculture. The production of trees is considered to be agriculture just as much as the production of any other crop that grows out of the ground. As to entomology, in the department here the practice is followed of maintaining the staffs to do this work, both for forestry and for agricultural products, under the operation of this department.

12. Plant protection, $639,320.

Mr. Wright: Has the department any information with regard to the rather severe infestation of a weavil which has destroyed the small sweet clover and alfalfa seedlings in the northern part of the three prairie provinces? There has been a rather serious outbreak in the last year or two. I was wondering if the department had any information on the matter or if they had any methods of control worked out with regard to it.

Mr. Gardiner: The proper place to have asked that question was, of course, on the last item, which dealt with entomology. This particular item is to prevent the bringing in of commodities in such a way as to bring along with them diseases of one kind or another. The question asked comes under the other item. I do not think we have any information with regard to the matter, but I am pleased to be informed that there is some of that infestation in the area mentioned, and we shall see that someone looks into it.

Mr. Hansell: I should like to make a suggestion to the minister. I think most of us know that the government is desirous of protecting our orchards and our plants by destroying the diseases that may come into Canada from the United States by way of the transportation of certain fruits. I am just wondering whether the customs authorities at the border points where that rule applies might give to those coming in with fruit some reason why this regulation is in force. I make that suggestion because we can quite understand that, if a carload of peaches or something of that nature comes into Canada, it is likely to bring in some disease. But this regulation does not apply only to commercial quantities coming into Canada. It applies to certain types of fruit no matter how small the consignment may be. A tourist may come along with twenty-five cents worth of peaches in a bag. He is informed that he cannot go any farther unless he eats those peaches; or if he does not care to eat them there are disposal cans at the back of the immigration buildings where he can dispose of the fruit. That is what happens. That was my experience. I was not going to dispose of any fruit in that manner. Therefore I sat there and ate it, and I also shared my bag of fruit with the immigration authorities who were quite happy about it, too. But while I was there I noticed one or two who were highly incensed as they hustled off with their few peaches, or whatever they had, and dumped them into the garbage can. I did not know anything about this and so I asked one of the authorities, as we were standing there eating our fruit together, why these regulations were put into effect. I said, "I am a member of parliament at Ottawa and I must confess in my ignorance I had not heard of it before." He said, "It is a regulation of the Department of Agriculture." He explained to me that some type of germ, moth or something got into the stones of this fruit and when people ate the fruit they threw the stones away. The stones dried and the moth, or whatever it was, flew out and the orchards became infested with the disease. The explanation was a good one. I do not expect them to go out of their way to tell a long story to every tourist who would come in, or to citizens of our own country who cross into the United States; but it would be more satisfying to those who come in if some word were given to them in that regard. I might even suggest a little printed sheet. It would not have to be elaborate. This sheet could be handed to them and it would explain the matter to them.

Mr. Gardiner: The procedure followed is that the officials of the customs hold up the fruit or other product which might be carrying disease into the country. It is just possible that some of these men are not equipped with the knowledge which would make it possible for them to make a full explanation. The regulations are there, and it must be done. The fruit or vegetables, as the case may be, are held until one of our inspectors goes there and inspects it. That might take place after the traveller has gone through. It is a regulation made to apply probably to larger quantities, and it may apply successfully to larger quantities. It is more or less of a nuisance for people who are going hurriedly back and forth across the line. Possibly the last suggestion made by the hon. member is a fairly good one, that these men be supplied with slips upon which the explanation is made. All they will need to do is to hand it to the person. I think it is good and we shall consider that method of dealing with it. Some way should be found of giving these people the information. I may say that it is a regulation which does not apply only to this country, as everyone knows. A very high official came to me a short time ago and said that he could not get certain plants put on an aeroplane going to England. He was a very high official from Britain. He said he was surprised that he could not send these plants to Britain, and that they would not accept them on the plane. I said, "That would not be our regulation, that would be a regulation of your own government." On checking it he found out it was a regulation of the British government. They could not load on a plane here to be taken into Britain certain plants which might carry diseases from Canada to that country. It is a general regulation and a good one as applied to plants being moved from one country to another throughout the world. But I quite agree that some way ought to be found of telling the ordinary person who is just going back and forth across the line why the commodity is being seized.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I suppose the answer to the problem is that you should not bring into Canada moths in your stones, as the hon. member tried to imply.

Experimental farms service—

13. Experimental farms service administration, $113,470.

Mr. Knight: Is this the correct place to discuss what we call forestry farms? We have one in Saskatoon.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Knight: I should like to say a word or two on that question. What is the work carried on there? Is its only purpose the growing and distribution of small trees for the purpose of farmers establishing shelter belts and so forth? I shall have a word or two to say afterwards on another use which I conceive to be perhaps even better than that. In the meantime, is that the business of that particular institution?

Mr. Gardiner: The purpose of these forestry farms is to propagate trees to be supplied, I think free in all cases, to farmers in the prairie sections of western Canada. So far as the one at Saskatoon and the one at Indian Head are concerned, they deliver largely to farms in Saskatchewan, but they also deliver to farmers outside Saskatchewan. The reason for that is that it is very difficult to grow trees in some parts of that section of the country.

Mr. Cruickshank: And anything else.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend back here says, "and anything else". We did a better job of feeding all of our people than they have done in British Columbia with the farm lands there. But in any case, trees are put out to farmers free of cost on condition that they plant them under the regulations which are laid down by the department.

Mr. Knight: Can the minister give me an estimate of the number of trees which have been distributed annually, and during the last year for instance?

Mr. Gardiner: I am informed the number would run up to five or six million trees a year.

Mr. Knight: The other use of that particular farm is one which should be mentioned. I should like to pay a tribute to the Department of Agriculture and to the management of that particular farm. This particular forestry farm, as the minister knows, is just a mile or two out of my city. It is on the north side of the railroad town of Sutherland, and thousands and thousands of people during the summer months find relief from the heat by going out there on Sunday afternoons and in the evenings after work. That particular farm is fulfilling a fine function in that regard. It is a farm which is particularly well kept. The lawns in particular are like a cushion and the flower beds have been beautifully kept during the last year or two. I suppose the present management has been the inspiration of it. They are now making a small attempt at an animal park. They have a few deer and pheasants and that sort of thing.

Mr. Lennard: And mosquitoes.

Mr. Knight: I should like to say to the hon. gentleman that probably he has more experience with mosquitoes than we have.

Mr. Lennard: I was out in Saskatchewan and I was nearly chewed up.

Mr. Knight: May I say to my hon. friend that there were more things than mosquitoes that were chewed up in Saskatoon during this past summer. In saying that, I am being just a little political. I shall get back to my story.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): It may be political but it is not politic.

Mr. Lennard: It is not good politics.

Mr. Knight: This, sir, is higher education. To go back to this particular item, and I have a reason for mentioning it, the minister has said that there is a particular difficulty in growing trees in that area. I do not know what dust does to trees, but the only fault with that particular farm is that the trees and the flowers and the lawns are continually covered with a coating of dust. In dry weather, which is normal in our part of the country in the summer, with the thousands and thousands of cars which are travelling over the road and the avenue into that particular place during the summer, there is a constant cloud of white dust, which is a menace. During the last summer the town of Sutherland approached me, as the member of parliament for that district, and I was also approached by the council of the city of Saskatoon and asked to bring this dust menace to the attention of the proper government department. They asked that the road which goes through that part be hard-surfaced.

The matter was brought to a head by the fact that the provincial government had been persuaded to hard-surface the road through the town of Sutherland. The dust menace, as I have no doubt the minister knows, is particularly bad there because all the traffic travels down the main street—perhaps I should say the only business street in the town. The dust was constantly in people's eyes, in the stores and everywhere. The provincial government did hard-surface the road through the town. I do not remember whether the pavement goes farther than the railway tracks, but the idea was that while the machinery was there on the job perhaps the dominion government might have been persuaded to co-operate with the province and hard-surface this particular stretch of road leading to this beauty spot.

We know that in the middle of the summer the minister was busy, as were many of the rest of us—and probably engaged in the same sort of business. I was informed that in the absence of the minister nothing could be done about it, and that certainly there was no provision for such an item in the estimates. I tried the Minister of Public Works, with the same results. When I went there I was referred back to the Minister of Agriculture. I take this opportunity tonight to suggest to the minister that there might be some way in which the dominion could co-operate, as a result of which a good road might be built into that particularly beautiful spot, out of which so many people gain restful pleasure during the summer.

14. Central experimental farm, $1,330,560.

Mr. Hatfield: Why is there this increase in the expense in connection with carrying on the central experimental farm? About nine years ago the estimate for this farm was only about $400,000. Why do we have all these extra men and this extra expense at the farm?

Mr. Gardiner: There has been a great deal of discussion in the house on the matter of increasing wages of persons employed at the farm, and increasing the salaries of scientific personnel associated with the farm. All of that has resulted in an increase as compared with some years ago. However, it will be noticed that, as compared with last year, there is this year in the item a reduction of $85,281. So that in the estimates of those two years we have this year a reduction rather than an increase.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): How much land has been added to the experimental farm in the last two or three years?

Mr. Gardiner: The Caldwell farm was added in the last twenty-four months. I am not sure of the size, but I believe it was either one hundred or one hundred and fifty acres.

Mr. Hatfield: That makes 827 acres for the whole farm.

Mr. Gardiner: The total is about 1,100 acres.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): What was the cost per acre of the farm?

Mr. Gardiner: I shall have to work that out, because I have not that information before me. I shall bring it down tomorrow.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Then, may we let the item stand?

Mr. Hatfield: What is the revenue from the farm?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like the item to stand until we have an answer.

Mr. Hatfield: Would the minister tell the committee the amount of revenue from the farm?

Mr. Gardiner: If the item stands I shall answer all that later.

15. Branch farm and stations and illustration stations, $3,819,403.

Mr. Cruickshank: Has any provision been made for an illustration station in British Columbia in connection with small fruits such as raspberries and strawberries? If so, where? Has any station been established in connection with tulip and daffodil bulbs? If so, where?

Mr. Gardiner: A survey is being made to establish an experimental station in connection with fruit. I was asked the question today by way of a note from one of the new members from British Columbia, and I replied to him to the effect that a survey is being made, and that when a report is received it is our intention to establish a station somewhere. I am not in a position to say at the present time just where it will be.

Mr. Cruickshank: It is for small fruits?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. The station which does give out information in connection with the growing of bulbs, and which has been established for that purpose, is at Saanichton. It is in operation now.

Mr. Cruickshank: Quite a large amount of money is involved. Will the minister give consideration to establishing an experimental plot at the present experimental farm at Agassiz. We brought in some bulbs from Vancouver island, and some disease has developed in our Fraser valley bulbs.

The minister has said that they are considering establishing a station somewhere; I suggest that it should be located where the small fruits are grown. Let me point out that 85 per cent of small fruits are grown around the central part of the Fraser valley, and I suggest that would be the logical place for the station. I am not particularly concerned about where it is located, but that would seem to be the logical place for it.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I do not like the inference left by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, that the diseased bulbs came from Vancouver island.

Mr. Gardiner: Some work is being done at the Agassiz farm in connection with bulbs. I believe the hon. member is right when he says that there is not enough work being done in connection with small fruits. It is my understanding that quite a number of people in that section of British Columbia have a feeling that we ought to move the farm. I do not know that that will be done. Probably there is some good reason for having it remain where it is. No doubt some work will be done there in due course. But the general opinion, as a result of a survey, is that the station should be farther down the valley. I am not sure that that will be acted upon, but it indicates the present position.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should be consulted before a change is made.

Mr. Harkness: I have had inquiries from farmers in Alberta in connection with the experimental farms in the province and I should like to ask where those are located, what particular type of work is being carried on, and the number of personnel employed in each instance.

Mr. Gardiner: There are farms at Beaverlodge, Lacombe, Lethbridge and Fort Vermilion, and then there are other experimental stations here and there throughout the province. The general practice is to rent land from a farmer, allow him to utilize the crop for any purpose desired, provided he follows instructions in seeding and permits people to be taken on to the farm to be instructed as to what is being done.

Mr. Harkness: What are the activities being carried on at each of the four main farms?

Mr. Gardiner: There are eleven stations in Alberta, there are seventeen in British Columbia and fifteen in Saskatchewan. Those are all apart from the experimental farms. Very few if any of those experimental stations are on land that we own; they are generally on land rented from the farmers.

With regard to the work carried on, Lethbridge has to do with the type of agriculture carried on in that district and, as hon. members know, the Lethbridge area is an irrigation area. Another type of work carried on has to do with the large stock farms and ranches in that area. There is a considerable amount of work being done to promote the production of the best type of stock for those ranches.

Mixed farming is carried on in the central part of the province and the farm there is to assist in the carrying on of agriculture in that area. Persons engaged in agriculture have access to the farm and the farm officials go out on extension work, particularly to the illustration stations that are established here and there.

The work carried on at Beaverlodge has to do with the utilization of two types of land which fortunately are to be found on that farm. The farm is situated on the edge of two large areas and experimental work is carried on in order to assist farmers going onto those lands.

The Fort Vermilion farm is 500 miles north of Edmonton and one can understand the type of work that would be done there. We endeavour to indicate to people going into the far north the manner in which they can best set themselves up in agriculture in that area.

Mr. Shaw: Approximately a year ago considerable publicity was given to a government announcement that a special station would be established in Alberta to operate either out of Lacombe or Beaverlodge in order to study the grey wooded soils. Has that station been established and, if so, where has it been established and what progress has been made in this work?

Mr. Gardiner: As I mentioned, some eleven stations of this type have been established. There is one at Rocky Mountain House which contains some of that soil. There are two types of soil there and experimental work is being done. It is intimated that at an earlier session it was suggested that we might be establishing other stations to take care of that work. We are giving consideration to these matters at all times. I have no definite information, but I have no doubt that the matter is still being considered. If not, I shall inquire into it and see that it is.

Mr. Applewhaite: It may be a surprise to hon. members to know that the representative of Skeena should take an interest in agriculture, but I would assure hon. members that agriculture is only one of our primary industries. I think the minister will bear me out when I say that he has been approached by the Terrace board of trade and other organizations in the Skeena valley on more than one occasion requesting the establishment of a small illustration station in order to ascertain the value of the soil there for the production of small fruits and vegetables.

I regret that I cannot agree with the hon. member for Fraser Valley, who suggests that as his district has demonstrated its ability to produce more fruits and vegetables it should now have an illustration station in order to prove that they can so do. I suggest in all seriousness that the location of Terrace coupled with the tremendous development that is going on in the north-central area of British Columbia justifies the government in establishing a station there so that farmers may be advised what type of produce they should grow in order to take advantage of the markets which are now right at their doors at Prince Rupert and Prince George.

It may be said that there is already a station at Smithers, but Smithers is 141 miles from Terrace and as between the two locations there is a tremendous difference in the terrain. The type of farming carried on at Smithers is largely grain and stock raising whereas the type of farming carried on at Terrace is the growing of fruits and vegetables. Terrace is the growing area possibly closest to the Pacific coast and it can readily supply the market at Prince Rupert. I request that the minister give consideration to this matter.

Mr. Gardiner: Representations were made to the experimental farms branch of the Department of Agriculture to have such a station established at Terrace and that branch has agreed that one should be established. At the present time they are looking over the area with the idea of selecting the farm upon which it ought to be established, and I can assure the hon. member that we will press on with that work as rapidly as possible.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. Members: No, stand.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Gardiner: Before I move the adjournment of the house I should like to say that tomorrow we shall continue with the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I move that the house do now adjourn.

It being two minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—

1. Departmental administration, $282,160.
2. Publicity and extension division, $242,760.
3. Advisory committee on agricultural services, $5,000.
4. Contributions to commonwealth bureaux, $86,139.

Science service—

5. Science service administration, $680,070.
6. Animal and poultry pathology, $353,515.
7. Bacteriology and dairy research, $125,335.
8. Botany and plant pathology, $1,154,500.
9. Agricultural chemistry, $368,823.
10. Agricultural entomology, including a payment of $3,500 to the commonwealth biological control laboratory, Belleville, Ontario, for special services, $1,321,926.
11. Forest entomology, $1,087,490.
12. Plant protection, $639,320.

Experimental farms service—

13. Experimental farms service administration, $113,470.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, September 21, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

GOLD MINING INDUSTRY

STATEMENT AS TO CONTINUANCE OF AID UNDER EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

Hon. Colin Gibson (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity of presenting a statement to the house defining the policy of the government in regard to the continuance of the aid which has been given to the gold mining industry of Canada since January 1, 1948, under the terms of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

As hon. members are aware, the steps recently taken to alter the value of the Canadian dollar in relation to the United States dollar have a direct benefit to the gold mining industry. In the light of these benefits it has been necessary for the government to re-examine the terms of its policy. The Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was presented to parliament and passed in order to aid an industry that had experienced a great increase in its cost of production during a period in which its product was sold at a fixed price. It was the desire of the government and of parliament not only to assist the industry but, even more, to protect the communities dependent upon that industry.

The effect of the application of the policy embodied in the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was to increase the price per ounce received by the gold mines of Canada on an average of $3.20 during the designated year 1948. It should be noted, however, that this is an average figure, and whereas some mines received as little as 50 cents an ounce other mines with higher costs received the maximum allowed, namely $16 an ounce. The effect of the adjustment in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar has been to raise by $3.50 per ounce the price that will be paid for gold produced and sold to the Canadian government. Under the circumstances it might be argued that the government would be justified in discontinuing the payments under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act because of the assistance which the mines will receive from the adjustment in the dollar exchange value.

The government has decided against such a policy. This decision has been taken for the following reasons: (1) When the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was passed, it was proposed that it would remain in effect for three years. Some of the mines have undoubtedly been basing their operations specifically on this fact. It would therefore be unfair to these mines to alter the period during which the act will remain in effect. (2) Discontinuance of the benefits under the act would not fall equally on all the mines. The effects of the payments to the various mines are directly related to the needs of those mines and their dependent communities. Cancellation of this policy would mean that some would be affected only in a minor way and that others would suffer serious hardship.

Having decided against the policy of cancellation, the government was then faced with the necessity of deciding whether the act should be left to operate without any modification, or whether some change less drastic than cancellation should be adopted, in fairness not only to the mining communities but to the taxpayers and general public of Canada.

After careful consideration the government has come to the conclusion that the fairest policy that can be adopted in the circumstances can be brought into effect by taking the following steps:

1. The present assistance payments will be continued until the end of the calendar year 1949. During this time the mining industry will have the full advantage of such payments and of the adjustment in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar.

2. Before the end of this year the government will introduce legislation to amend the act to provide that during the last year of its operation—that is, the calendar year 1950—the total amount of assistance payments made to any mine will be reduced by an amount equal to $3.50 an ounce for each ounce of gold to which the rate of assistance under the present act applies. This in effect means that any mine which during 1950 would have been entitled to assistance payments of $3.50 or less will receive nothing. Those mines entitled to receive more than $3.50 an ounce will receive the difference between $3.50 and the amount to which they would have been entitled.

The adoption of this policy will mean that during 1950 the mining industry will receive full benefits accruing from the adjustment in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar, but that the payments from the public funds will be reduced, in the case of mines that are eligible for assistance under the act, by the sum of $3.50 or any lesser amount to which they would be entitled on each ounce that would otherwise have been subject to the assistance payments. The effect of the modification in the terms of the act will, it is estimated, mean a reduction in payments during the course of the year 1950 of approximately $4,500,000. This compares with a total payment during 1948 of $9 million and a probable payment during 1949 of $10 million.

At the same time it will be noted that the probable additional payments to the gold mines coming under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act as a result of the adjustment in the exchange value of the dollar will amount in 1949 to about $3 million, and in 1950 to approximately a further $12 million.

It should be made quite clear that it is the intention of the government to terminate the assistance given under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act on the date stated in the act, namely December 31, 1950.

It was announced in the last session of the twentieth parliament that the government proposed to introduce legislation to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act for the purpose of aiding certain mines which, through no fault of their own, had been ineligible under the original terms of the act. In the speech from the throne at the opening of the present session the government's intention in this regard was reiterated. I wish now to make it quite clear that the government's policy in this connection has not been altered, and that it is proposed to proceed during the present session with the amendments which have been designed to effect this purpose.

HOUSING

ASSISTANCE TO HOME OWNERS AND BUYERS—AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES FOR PUBLICLY SPONSORED PROJECTS

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, hon. members might be interested in learning of the government's intention with respect to housing.

It is now over four years since the war ended. Some problems which were emphasized and aggravated by wartime conditions have continued into the post-war period. Housing is one of them, and it gives promise of being a long-term peacetime problem. Therefore any approach to the problem of housing should be based on peacetime conditions. Although constitutionally housing is primarily a matter for the provinces and municipalities, the federal government believes that any effective solution must involve the fullest co-operation among all levels of government, as well as industry.

Accordingly, on March 2, 1949, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) wrote all provincial premiers, stating that any suggestions or proposals they might care to submit for improving the housing of Canadian citizens would be considered by the federal government. At that time almost all provincial governments were involved with their legislative programs and were not able to give to the problem detailed attention, although most of them expressed concern and keen interest.

To facilitate consideration of the problem we recently undertook to view housing conditions, as well as building activity in each province, and have had conversations with each provincial government about housing. From our discussions it was clear that the provinces recognized their constitutional and practical responsibilities in this field, but the majority indicated that financial assistance would be required from the federal government.

This year's housing production will be higher than ever before. It is likely to reach a record high of approximately 100,000 units in 1949. This large number of units has been spread over all the provinces, but provincial governments nevertheless agree with us that having regard to the high level of economic activity, increase in population, rapid growth of family formations, immigration, obsolescence of existing housing units, and other factors, there will be a continuing need for a large annual supply of residential units. New housing, even at the present record rate of production, is barely keeping up with current needs and making no important inroads into the backlog.

The joint efforts of industry and the three levels of government—municipal, provincial and federal—in their respective fields will be required to produce a large supply of new units. I believe all provinces agreed with us that it is the desire of the average Canadian to own his own home and that the primary and most economical source of new housing had been and would be from private endeavour. Therefore any arrangements between the two senior governments should be directed toward the encouragement of more home ownership and also of rental housing by individual effort.

The increasing difficulty for the prospective home owner of low or moderate income to finance down-payment requirements in building a house was emphasized by all provincial governments. The down payment is the difference between the purchase price and the mortgage financing. The provincial authorities felt that the number of potential home owners could be increased if sound financing facilities were provided to reduce the down-payment requirements. It was recognized that larger mortgage loans might well tend to increase sale prices, and there was general agreement that if additional financing for this purpose is arranged, steps should be taken to guard against inflationary effects.

The shortage of serviced land is a very real obstacle in the way of an increased volume of housing building. The abnormally rapid urban growth of recent years has been placing important financial burdens upon municipalities. Many are experiencing difficulty in producing funds to finance roads, sewers, water, sidewalks, etc., for the current house building program. The provinces and the dominion feel that this is a field in which the municipalities may need assistance from the senior governments.

During the conversations several of the provinces expressed the view that assistance to co-operative building projects was an important way in which housing might be increased. It was felt that in the medium and smaller communities, particularly in those provinces where co-operative building is customary, it would be possible to further the development of local interest, particularly among people who are anxious to use owner-labour as their equity in their homes.

It was felt that although heavy reliance should be placed upon private endeavour to produce large quantities of housing over the years to come, it was desirable to take steps which would enable the provinces, joining with the dominion, to develop projects either for home ownership or for rental. The housing deficit is so great in certain municipalities and the obstacles facing the municipalities so severe that early steps to remedy the situation may well require that projects be sponsored by the dominion and the province. It is recognized by all concerned that care must be exercised to ensure that such projects do not reduce the flow of new housing by private endeavour.

As a result of these discussions, it is proposed to seek amendments to the National Housing Act this session to provide financing facilities to assist home owners in down-payment requirements. It is considered that such financing facilities would widen the band of potential home owners. It is proposed that the present level of loans to house builders would be little changed. However, it is proposed to seek amendment to the act extending authority to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make a loan to the home owner purchasing the house from the builder in an amount of one sixth of the loan which has been made to the builder, provided that the sale price to the home owner is fair and reasonable. This would have the effect of providing financing for the home owner to the extent of approximately half of his present down-payment requirements. Because of the danger in such an arrangement that the increased loan to the home owner would have the effect of increasing the sale price of the house, the provision of such extra financing for the home owner would be limited to houses which have been sold at a fair and reasonable price. There would be no restrictions upon the builder as to the price at which he may sell the house. However, the extra loan would only be made to the home owner if at the time of application for such extra loan, we were satisfied that the sale price was fair and reasonable. Although this larger National Housing Act loan would take the form of two advances, the first to the builder and the second to the home owner, the original mortgage deed under which advances would be made to the builder would be written at an amount sufficient to avoid additional registration and legal costs if a further loan was made to the home owner.

The same principles would be applicable to individuals who are making arrangements to construct their own homes and are not buying them from builders. Larger loans would be available to such individuals, provided that the cost to the home owner of building his house was fair and reasonable.

A number of technical matters remain to be determined. I shall be able to give a fuller statement concerning these arrangements at the time the resolution is being considered by this house. We are not asking the provinces to participate financially in these measures to encourage home ownership by reduction of down payments.

It is proposed also to seek changes to the section of the National Housing Act dealing with co-operatives. In the light of present conditions this section is not effective. Investigation is now going on in three provinces where co-operative housing is general, and I am hopeful that at the time other amendments are introduced we will be ready to proceed with amendments to the co-operative section of the National Housing Act.

We also propose to introduce legislation to enable the dominion to enter into agreements with the provinces for publicly sponsored housing projects. These projects may take the form of the assembly of land and services to enable an increased volume of housing by private builders. They may take the form of the dominion and province proceeding with moderate priced houses for sale to home owners. They also may take the form of rental projects, in which event the dominion and the province would seek local management for the completed project.

During our conversations the provinces favoured the first two forms of project. They appreciated that there is a demand for redevelopment and slum clearance. However, with the present high cost of acquisition of land for redevelopment, the high cost of construction for centrally located fireproof residential development, as well as the difficulty in rehousing families now occupying land suitable for redevelopment, there is reason for the conclusion that, whereas rental housing of this kind may be desirable, now is not the time to proceed on a large scale. I would point out, however, that the terms of the enabling legislation will be broad and flexible enough to enable arrangements with the provinces which would include rental projects either on an economic or a subsidized basis. Subject to the very real difficulties which I have just mentioned, the dominion is prepared to proceed with rental housing projects in co-operation with the provinces.

With safeguards that the residential units to be built are of a modest type, the legislation contemplates agreements between the dominion and the provinces to enter into projects in municipalities where need exists, and where suitable arrangements can be made with the help and co-operation of the municipality. Under the agreement both the dominion and the province would have to be satisfied with the nature of the project, whether it takes the form of land assembly, houses for sale, or rental units. All costs of any project developed under this joint arrangement would be a charge against the project. In developing a project each of the two senior governments would be responsible for those operations which they are best able to handle. The province would see to the acquisition of the land and make arrangements for services. The province would receive requests from municipalities and other bodies for public assistance in housing. This meets the wishes of the provinces, and it is appropriate that they should deal directly with their own municipalities.

The dominion as its share of the joint undertaking would see to the planning, design and construction of the projects. It is recognized that a number of operations within the spheres of the dominion and the province will overlap. For that reason it is contemplated that there would be joint management of the development of each project by the dominion and the province. Generally each partner would contribute managerial assistance within its own sphere.

[Mr. Winters.]

Funds for the financing of each project would come 75 per cent from the dominion and 25 per cent from the province. The project would be charged with a rate of interest slightly higher than long-term dominion rates in respect to the dominion's share of the investment. In respect to the province's share, its long-term interest rate, with a like differential, would be a charge against the project. Amortization of the original investment by the province and the dominion over appropriate periods would be a charge against the project. In the case of land being assembled for sale to private builders, and in the case of houses for sale, it is likely that the investment by both governments would be relatively short-term. Where the project takes the form of rental units, appropriate amortization periods ranging from thirty to fifty years would be established.

The annual profit or loss resulting from each project, whether land assembly, home ownership or rental units, would be shared 75 per cent by the dominion and 25 per cent by the province.

It is proposed that the municipalities would receive as a payment in lieu of taxes an amount equivalent to taxes received by them on the basis of normal assessments and normal tax rates for comparable property. The level of these payments in lieu of taxes would be determined upon the advice of the department of municipal affairs and the municipal board of the province concerned. If a province felt that municipal financial participation in the project were necessary or desirable, arrangements could be made by them for the municipality to assume a portion of the province's share of 25 per cent. In any event, the arrangement between the dominion and the provinces would be unchanged.

There are a number of details still to be worked out, but I have outlined the general proposal. We feel that it would be a desirable partnership between the two senior governments. The proposal is flexible and would enable the senior governments to provide assistance where necessary. We feel that the provinces are better able to deal with land, services and municipalities than is the dominion. As a result, the operations should be considerably more efficient than if the dominion were operating in the field alone. Care would be exercised to see that the operations of the senior governments in this field supplement rather than replace the activity of private endeavour upon which we place the greatest reliance for large volume of house building.

The legislation to enable the dominion to enter into these arrangements with the provinces is being brought forward at this session so that the provinces which need legislative authority to join with the dominion may bring the matter before their legislatures as soon as possible. I cannot forecast whether all provinces will find the dominion proposals acceptable. But I can say that without exception provincial premiers and ministers have discussed these proposals, as well as other alternatives, in a most friendly way with a determination to improve housing conditions. There is indication that they consider these proposals to be reasonable, and it is my hope that most of the provinces will see fit to join with the dominion in its effort to meet the shortage of housing in Canada.

These proposals are directed towards establishing a long-term arrangement between the dominion and the provinces whereby the nation's housing needs for its citizens can be met. It is hoped that the present form of veterans' rental housing program can be merged into the new arrangement with the provinces. It is to be remembered that a greater supply of housing of all kinds will in itself relieve the housing needs of veterans. We appreciate that the housing needs of veterans of world war II is a continuing problem. Therefore, within the framework of these proposals, by veterans' preference where appropriate, we hope that housing for veterans will continue to be provided.

It will be remembered that under the 1949 veterans rental housing program the dominion built houses when municipalities participated by supplying land and services. Our 1949 veterans rental housing program shows clearly an increasing unwillingness and inability of the municipalities to participate in the present arrangements. Therefore, revised arrangements appear to be necessary to maintain a satisfactory flow of housing of this type. Under these proposals if the municipality and the province feel that a veterans' problem exists, houses may be produced for veterans' use. In particular, the dominion would be quite agreeable to proceeding with joint dominion-provincial projects with a veterans' preference. In my conversations with the provinces it was quite evident that the provinces are as aware of the need for houses for veterans as is the dominion.

No one can estimate the amount of additional housing which these proposals will create. The capacity of the construction industry, continuing effective demand by home owners, as well as the level of income of individuals, all have an effect upon the number of completions of residential units. No single method or approach in itself is a complete solution. The measures proposed today should be helpful. They may have the effect of increasing the total number of completions. If for any reason the volume of new residential starts should tend to turn downward, these measures may well have the effect of maintaining a reasonable level of residential construction. They are an important step to minimize the wide swings in residential construction which have been the experience of the past. However, I would emphasize that these proposals are not our whole housing program. We will continue to press other measures which have proved successful in recent years, such as National Housing Act loans of other kinds, rental insurance, the expediting of building materials, the program of married quarters for the Department of National Defence, as well as research work directed towards improved methods of construction and economies in home building.

I hope the proposals outlined today will commend themselves to the house. Some success has attended our efforts in increasing the capacity of the house-building industry. There is no desire by the dominion to enter the direct construction field. The policy as enunciated by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply in 1946 is the keystone of our present policy; that is, the creation of conditions favourable to a large housing program by private individuals and companies. Only to the extent that housing needs are not being met is it proposed that the dominion and the provinces will enter the field. It seems to me that only by the co-operative efforts of all levels of government and the house-building industry can we maintain our high volume of new residential construction and increase it beyond its present level.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister one or two questions arising out of the interesting announcement he has just made? In the first place, is any specific assistance contemplated in connection with slum clearance? In the second place, is any limit being placed by the dominion government upon the amount of financial assistance it proposes to offer to the province under this policy?

Mr. Winters: These are of course matters of detail. The sections now in the act with respect to slum clearance are quite clear. I do not believe the statement I have just made is debatable at the moment, but there will be a resolution before the house relatively soon, upon which occasion I should be glad to discuss all these matters.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Purely as a matter of clarification I should like to ask a brief question. The minister spoke of various things being charges against the project. I assume he meant charges against the individual unit, so that some day a man may own his own house, and know what his debts are.

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

EXPORTS FROM MARITIMES—QUESTION AS TO PAYMENT IN STERLING

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) asked the following question:

I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the exporters of surplus potatoes, fish, lumber, and other commodities of the maritime provinces be allowed to accept sterling in payment for exports to the British West Indies and South American countries, thereby retaining those markets which they have built up over the years?

My reply is that the recent adjustment in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar as such will not affect in any way the position of exporters to the British West Indies or other parts of the sterling area. Exporters to those countries of products such as were referred to may still export and receive sterling in payment. That sterling will be converted, of course, into dollars at the new rate of $3.07\frac{1}{4}$.

So far as the South American countries are concerned, the situation is also unchanged. In those countries exporters have been in the past and will continue to be obliged to accept payment in United States dollars.

Mr. Hatfield: Do I understand the Minister of Finance to say that we can now accept sterling for shipments to the West Indies?

Mr. Abbott: We have always accepted it. It has always been convertible; if the British West Indies were allowed to import, they were allowed to pay in sterling and the sterling was made readily convertible.

Mr. Hatfield: The British West Indies have not been able to pay us in sterling.

Mr. Abbott: They have always been able to. If the hon. member means sterling that is blocked, of course they cannot. If he means sterling which cannot be used for the purchase of merchandise, he is right; but exports to the British West Indies which are allowed in can be paid for in sterling, and that sterling is made convertible by the Bank of England at the official rate. Exporters have to have an export permit to take the merchandise in. They have to secure it from the British, not from us.

Mr. Hatfield: We are still shut out.

WASHINGTON MONETARY TALKS—QUESTION AS TO RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I had intended to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but as he is not in his seat I will direct it to the Minister of Finance.

[Mr. Winters.]

I hope he will not mind answering it. Will the Minister of Finance state whether the recent financial conference between Great Britain, the United States and Canada will result in any early change in the import restrictions on United States goods coming into Canada?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. Of course that is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

PUBLIC WORKS

POST OFFICE BUILDINGS—WINNIPEG AND PETERBOROUGH

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked the following question:

I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether construction will be undertaken soon of the new federal post office in Winnipeg.

The answer is that in 1948 we filed notice of expropriation against this property, bounded by Graham avenue, Smith street, St. Mary avenue and Garry street. Sixteen properties were involved, and we have already settled and have the deeds for fourteen. The remaining two properties have been turned over to the exchequer court, and the hearings are in the hands of that court.

Plans are being prepared and developed by the Post Office Department to cover their requirements, after which it will be necessary to prepare the detailed plans. For this purpose the firm of Messrs. Blankstein and Russell, architects, of Winnipeg, have been retained. As this is a major sized building, it will require the best part of a year to prepare the detailed plans.

On the same day the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) asked the following question:

When the minister is looking that up will he also find out and tell me when he is going to start the one in Peterborough?

In 1939 we acquired a site located on the southeast corner of Charlotte and Louis streets in Peterborough. During the war no attempt was made to erect the building, on account of conditions at the time. Immediately following the war it was decided to refrain as far as possible from work on any public buildings, in the interests of making the short supply of labour and materials available to private interests.

Together with the Post Office Department we are preparing plans covering the requirements of a building to meet the demands of the former. After the requirements have been determined it will be necessary to prepare the detailed plans. The firm of W. R. & L. Blackwell, of Peterborough, have been appointed to prepare these plans, and it is expected they will take a period of six months to complete.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

QUESTIONS ASKED ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY—STATEMENT OF MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: At this time I should like to remind hon. members that it is customary, on the orders of the day, to ask of the ministry only those questions which are urgent and which may be answered briefly. I think the questions answered today by the ministry might more properly have been placed on the order paper. I suggest to hon. members that any questions asked before the orders of the day are called should be urgent, and such as can be answered briefly.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order having to do with your remarks with regard to the urgency of questions asked of the ministry on the orders of the day. Those remarks were quite in order, and I am sure most hon. members will agree with me in that.

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. Graydon: Wait until the Speaker tells me that.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

An hon. Member: He did.

Mr. Graydon: Since we are in the early stages of the session it might be well to have some of these matters clarified. I think everyone will admit that at all times the ministry should be permitted to make statements to the house on matters of urgency, and I offer no objection to the making of the two important announcements which have been made today, and which in my opinion were in order. But in the past, statements have been made by the government in an ex parte way which were not subject to debate and which in our opinion were not urgent. It leaves hon. members in the position of the government being able to make an ex parte statement without the opportunity for comment or question by private members. If the government is to be allowed this latitude, then perhaps you, sir, in your very excellent judgment, will allow similar latitude to those of us in this part of the house who from time to time may desire to have such statements clarified.

Criminal Code

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PISTOLS, AIR GUNS, MOTOR VEHICLES, LEVEL CROSSINGS AND PAYMENT OF FINES

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to amend the Criminal Code (pistols, air guns, motor vehicles, level crossings and the payment of fines).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Church: Mr. Speaker, this is a constructive bill, containing suggestions for consideration by the government. The bill this year is similar to the one I have introduced for the past four years, although not exactly the same. It deals with the following subjects: (a) the awful loss of life on the highways of Canada through motor car accidents —almost every highway, urban, suburban and rural, is coloured red as a result of death and injury; (b) hit-and-run drivers; (c) fires in homes and dwellings, and (d) level crossings. The bill sets out some amendments which I suggest would remedy matters.

While I am not attempting on first reading to deal more than in a cursory fashion with the bill, by leave of the house I should like to call attention to some of the suggestions.

One is the adoption by Canada of the law of England, commonly known there as the Summary Offenders Act, giving poor people now committed to jail time to pay fines which are levied. According to returns I have received from England, this provision has closed half the prisons over there.

We are going through very difficult times, and the loss of life from these causes, in an economic sense and in every other way, is nothing less than scandalous.

These suggestions are somewhat educational. On former occasions, especially in 1935 and 1937, although not since the second world war, the house spent some time discussing this matter. Hit-and-run drivers are guilty of one of the worst forms of murder of men, women and children. It is the most cowardly form of murder we could have.

In this bill I am suggesting an amendment which is in use in some of the states across the border; it would require motor car drivers to stop, listen, and open the front door of the car, as buses are required to do under the provincial highways act, before entering a level crossing. A fine of up to $50 could be imposed for failing to do this. I know that in the Toronto district such a law would have saved many lives during the past summer.

I would like to call the attention of the house to the clauses in the bill dealing with youth. There is no reason that I know of why parents should not be notified when teen-age youths are in trouble, although some of them are the worst offenders; and they should be represented by counsel at any trial. I suggest that the house devote some time to a discussion of these important matters. The bill contains many suggestions that should be considered, especially in these days of the mad rush for speed, which, according to the records, have followed every great war.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ONTARIO PEACHES

APPRECIATION OF GIFT OF MEMBER FOR LINCOLN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have been asked by my fellow members from British Columbia, and I think other hon. members will feel the same way, to say a word about Ontario peaches, which I have had occasion to mention in the past. I want to say that we all appreciate the splendid specimens of peaches which were presented to us today by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Cavers). I have never had the privilege of visiting Lincoln, but judging by the quality of the peaches which were delivered to our offices today, I think that Lincoln could well be annexed to British Columbia.

Mr. Graydon: May I say to the hon. member for Fraser Valley that those peaches were so good that I thought they came from Peel.

PARLIAMENT HILL

QUESTION AS TO PARKING SPACE FOR MEMBERS' CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. L. Langlois (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Since arriving here for the first session of the twenty-first parliament I have found it most difficult to find around this building a vacant parking space for my car. Apparently the space reserved to hon. members for this purpose is insufficient. When I arrived for the eight o'clock sitting last evening I was unable to find a vacant parking space, although I drove around the building twice. I then went to the R.C.M.P. constable on duty and asked him to direct me to a space where I could park my car. He then directed me to the general parking section west of the section reserved to ministers of the crown, although parking in that section is limited to an hour and a half only.

[Mr. Church.]

This morning I again went around the building without finding a parking space available. Seeing no constable on duty, I parked my car in the general section in which I had been directed to park last night. But when I went back to my car at twelve-thirty I found this notice on the windshield:

T.V.S. No. 773 Date 21/9/49 Time 11.45 A.M.
Royal Canadian Mounted Police
Room 27, Justice Building
Licence No.: L8585 Place: Parliament Hill
The driver of this vehicle has committed a breach of the regulations governing traffic on dominion property as indicated below:
Parking—Overtime: West of Commons, 9.45 to 11.45

There is no mention in the notice of where I should report, and there is no indication whether this is only a warning or not. Therefore I am apprehensively awaiting prosecution for the crime I have allegedly committed.

Mr. Cruickshank: You will get six months.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspé): I consider it my duty to bring this case to your attention. In making these remarks I have no intention whatsoever of casting unpleasant reflections on the constables in charge of order and traffic around these premises. My sole aim in speaking is to inform you, sir, of this most unsatisfactory situation, which, if not corrected, may seriously prejudice some hon. members of this house, who certainly are entitled to some prerogatives and privileges.

Mr. Speaker: May I say to the hon. member for Gaspe, and to the other hon. members of the house on whose behalf I think he has spoken, that I have had little experience in passing judgment on those who have committed breaches of parking bylaws. My experience has been more on the side of the defence. I cannot say what penalty, if any, can be imposed, but I do assure the hon. member that the question he has raised will be brought to the attention of the proper officials of the house.

FLAXSEED

AVAILABILITY FOR CRUSHING IN SASKATCHEWAN VEGETABLE OIL PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): I had hoped to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question of which I sent him notice, but he is not in his seat. Perhaps his parliamentary assistant can give me the answer. May I say that I can comply with the requirement of urgency referred to by Mr. Speaker, because an industrial plant in my city is being closed today.

My question is this: Will the wheat board, the board of grain commissioners, or any other government agency take steps to ensure the availability of a sufficient and continuous supply of flaxseed for crushing purposes at the Saskatoon vegetable oil mill and other similar industrial plants in Saskatchewan during the coming year?

Mr. Cruickshank: Are you going to make oleomargarine?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I can only say to the hon. member that I will bring his question to the attention of the proper officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and as soon as an answer can be obtained from them it will be made available.

OLEOMARGARINE

QUESTION AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF PLANT IN FRASER VALLEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is it true that at the present time a plant is being built in the Fraser valley for the manufacture of oleomargarine?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I take it from the remarks made last night by the member for that constituency that one is being built. We have no control over that.

BUTTER

DISPOSITION OF STOCKS HELD IN STORAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that at the present time the government is holding stocks amounting to 48 million pounds of butter, which seems to be a very large quantity, what action is contemplated as to the marketing or disposition of those stocks?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): In view of the ruling which you gave a few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker, it would be impossible for me to answer that question and be in order, because the answer is a page long. The question is not urgent, because a press release on August 11, 1949, made an announcement of government policy, and it is known to the public right across Canada. If the hon. member wishes to put such a question on the order paper, so that the answer may be published in Hansard, we can see that that is done.

Mr. Hatfield: The same as you did with potatoes.

CATTLE

COMPENSATION FOR TUBERCULOSIS REACTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture when the promise of compensation to farmers for the loss of cattle in tuberculosis tests will be implemented, and whether the compensation will be retroactive?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Legislation was prepared, and I think it was announced at the last session that it would be brought down. The nature of the legislation was indicated. I presume that the same legislation will be brought down this session. Payments cannot be made until it is passed.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, September 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Boisvert for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

(Translation):

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted at the outset to congratulate you most sincerely on your elevation to the speakership of this house, a high post which you occupy with so much tact and efficiency. You can rest assured that we opposition members are delighted that the conduct of the all-important debates of this parliamentary forum are in the hands of such an eminent jurist.

Speaking for myself and on behalf of all Conservatives in the province of Quebec, I am also pleased to pay a tribute to the leader of the government. I do it all the more sincerely as I have been a pupil of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) at Laval university; needless to say he taught me law and not politics.

Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to represent in this august assembly the constituency of Three Rivers, which has a population of 50,000. It comprises the progressive and industrial city of the same name, as well as seven fine rural parishes.

Three Rivers, the second oldest city in Canada, enjoys the rare distinction of being also the most French of all American cities. Indeed, in my native town, the proportion of French Canadians is 96 per cent.

Located on the great St. Lawrence river, halfway between Quebec and Montreal, Three Rivers is the centre of the beautiful province of Quebec, the very heart of that race of pioneers who, together with the gallant sons of the British isles, have made of our beloved Canada that great country which is playing today a leading part in the world.

Because of that remarkable historical fact, French-Canadian traditions prevail there in their purest form. My fellow citizens are the prototypes of the French-Canadian minority in this country. As such, they are jealous of their rights and they are anxious to maintain the prerogatives guaranteed to them by the British North America Act.

Moreover, as citizens of the great Canadian democracy, they believe in decentralization of legislative powers.

I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Three Rivers rejoiced when they saw a reference in the speech from the throne to the government's intention of promoting our nationhood to the full extent of constitutional powers.

It is gratifying to know that the government intends to sever the last colonial ties with the British parliament. It is hardly reasonable that a strong and mighty country such as ours should be compelled to appeal to a foreign supreme court, and be unable to amend its own constitution without recourse to the parliament of another country, friendly though it may be.

I wish, however, to point out the fact that the public has been surprised to learn of the government's intention to proceed with these constitutional changes, of such historical implications, during a special session or rather the end of a session. There is then good reason to hope that the government will not rush matters. Canadian history and the jurisprudence of the privy council on our constitutional law indicate that this court has always been a protection for the rights of minorities. It has always played the part of an arbitrator in settling the constitutional differences between federal and provincial governments. I doubt that the supreme court, in its present status, is in a position to act likewise.

The government also intends to request from the parliament of the United Kingdom the right to amend our constitution in regard to matters which do not come within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. The government then proposes to negotiate with the provinces an agreement relating to the procedure to be followed in bringing about in the country itself any further constitutional amendments that may be deemed necessary from time to time.

The people of our great country recognize the importance of solving, through consultation between the parliament of the dominion and the provincial legislatures, our important constitutional problem in order to give our parliament and various legislatures legal and practical means of amending the constitution.

The basis of the controversy lies in the delimitation of powers between the dominion and the provincial governments. If previous attempts to solve this problem have failed, it is precisely because the parties concerned could not agree on the delimitation of powers.

By following the procedure outlined in the speech from the throne, the government intends to decide in advance what matters come within its jurisdiction and what others come within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and then place before the latter a fait accompli.

As contracting parties of the British North America Act, the provinces which entered into confederation, thus allowing Canada to grow and become a great nation, must surely be consulted; but they should be consulted before and not after the matter has been settled. The governments of the provinces are entitled to their opinions and it is their duty to protect the rights and privileges which were the very conditions of their joining the confederation of 1867.

We fail to understand why the government intends to proceed in this way, inasmuch as the constitution of a country is the basis of its national unity.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to remind the house that these sentiments in favour of provincial autonomy and decentralization of legislative powers, which are so dear to the people of my riding and to the people of the province of Quebec, do not in any sense indicate isolationism on the part of my fellow Canadians in Quebec. We feel that it is a question of the utmost importance and that confederation is the best safeguard for the minorities in any province. We feel that democracy at its best resides in decentralization of legislative powers and in government that is closer to the public.

For these reasons I am thankful to have as the leader of my party a great Canadian and a great statesman. His past record as premier of that great province of Ontario, as well as the stand he has taken as leader of the opposition on this vital question of provincial rights, qualify him to deal with this constitutional crisis in the best interests of Canada as a whole.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I might say, on the other hand, that when it proposes to consult the provinces in order to extend the scope of the National Housing Act, the government is taking a step which will meet with the approval of the people of my constituency. Three Rivers, which is an important industrial town, suffers badly from lack of housing. Like those of the rest of Canada, the workingmen of my constituency have to be helped to meet the continuous rise in the cost of living and this appalling housing shortage.

The workingmen of Three Rivers, ably directed by competent employers, have turned our fine city into the greatest paper production centre in the world. They have a right to expect that the present government will leave no stone unturned and will seek the most efficient means of enabling them to house their families in decent, adequate and healthy surroundings.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your indulgence.

(Text):

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, in a moment I should like to say something about the statement which the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) made this afternoon about housing. I am sure that every member in the house found his statement interesting, but I am sure most people in Canada found it rather disappointing.

First of all, I should like to join with other hon. members who have congratulated the mover (Mr. Boisvert) and the seconder (Mr. Laing) of the motion which we are discussing. Despite the fact that I did not agree with some of the material they presented, I did think that they performed in an able manner the task assigned to them.

Several days ago I was sitting in one of the parliamentary offices talking to several Liberal members, among whom was the member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair). He was rather elated over the election results. I could not blame him very much. I took a good deal of ribbing about the results in so far as the C.C.F. was concerned. During the conversation the member for Coast-Capilano made one statement which I thought was significant. He said, "I do not see how any member—that is any opposition member—after that election can say anything about the speech from the throne". I cannot agree with that point of view. While it is true the Liberal members should be very pleased with themselves, I do not think that they should become complacent. The opposition still has a duty to perform and that is to criticize, scrutinize and examine the legislation which comes before this house.

While it may seem ludicrous, I should like, therefore, to offer one word of admonition to the government early in this session. I believe that, in the huge majority the government has, there are certain dangers which it will be necessary for them to avoid in the ensuing four years if they are a wise government. They should avoid any temptation to try to steam-roller legislation through this House of Commons. They should avoid any temptation to neglect the implementation of the election promises they have made. They should also try to avoid the danger of overspending and overexpanding, which is a natural one in these times of buoyant revenues.

As I said, I do not blame the government members for feeling satisfied, but I was a little surprised when I read the speech from the throne. I thought there was a shade of complacency in it. I draw to the attention of hon. members some of the phrases that were used:

> At home we continue to enjoy prosperity. Investment and employment have remained at high levels. There has been deep satisfaction in all parts of the country.
> Relations between employers and employees have, with few exceptions, been satisfactory.

I know I am biased, but it appears to me that speech contains too many platitudes and far too few tangible proposals to meet the needs of the country. In other words, I feel that this speech from the throne is a document of self-satisfaction, not a plan of action.

I refer specifically to the matter of housing, particularly in view of the fact that the minister made a statement this afternoon. I listened to him with interest, because ever since 1945 housing has been one of the most critical problems facing this country. The minister admitted in his speech that housing was extremely critical. A few weeks ago I was surprised to read an item in one of the newspapers about a brief which Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation presented to the Royal Commission on Arts and Sciences. According to the newspaper report, this is what the brief said:

> The housing needs of the Canadian people have never been more critical than they are today.

I suggest that is a significant statement, Mr. Speaker, because the admission was made by the officials of a government agency. This problem of housing is anything but new. Back in 1945 a government advisory committee, I believe the one that presented the so-called Curtis report, stated that about 750,000 new homes were needed in this country. If my memory serves me correctly, it was also stated that an additional 60,000 homes should be built to keep up with the current demand.

What has been accomplished since the end of the war? During the election I heard Liberal speakers and read Liberal advertisements that took great satisfaction from the fact that approximately 275,000 homes have been built since the end of the war. This is a large number of homes. But during that time, many thousands of homes have become obsolete. In that period veterans have been coming home, many of them with war brides. At least 300,000 immigrants have arrived in this country. Many young Canadian couples got married. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) said today that he hoped 100,000 homes would be built this year. More than that number of couples in Canada were married during the past year.

I say therefore, Mr. Speaker, that far from catching up with the backlog of housing, we are going behind. I do not think I am exaggerating when I say that, so far as housing is concerned, we are in a worse position today than we were in 1945, and yet the minister comes in with a proposal such as the one he made today. Whether we like to admit it or not, in many of our urban centres, slums, overcrowding, evictions and frustrated lives are ever more prevalent. I think that is true even in some parts of Ottawa. I ask any hon. member of this house whether it is reasonable that in a country where there is so much lumber and so much brick and mortar, so many hundreds of thousands should be without homes. What has the government promised in this respect?

I remember hearing speakers from the Liberal party say, back in 1945, that every veteran was entitled to a good home. I heard them say that under the National Housing Act houses would be available to Canadians for as low as $9.58 per month. In this recent election campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself made a radio speech on March 19 in which he said:

> We are not going to be satisfied until decent housing is provided for every family.

Then the minister of reconstruction (Mr. Winters) brings in a scheme like the one he brought in today!

The speech from the throne contained only casual reference to housing. It stated that the scope of the National Housing Act will be broadened. A few weeks ago the minister of reconstruction made a trip across Canada, as he put it, to study the housing problem. He talked with the various provincial authorities and I congratulate him on the initiative he showed in taking that trip. But what were his conclusions? What was his solution? Are we to take it that what he offered us today is his solution to the housing problem? I do not think the minister himself would be so naive. Here is a report of what he said in Regina, the capital of my province. I quote from the Regina Leader-Post of August 23:

> As yet there has been no definite solution to the housing problem but the federal government was not looking for any such solution immediately, he maintained.

Mr. Speaker, was there ever made by any cabinet minister a franker admission of government inaction in the face of a pressing problem? Then the minister of reconstruction is quoted in this manner in the same interview:

> The housing picture in Canada has not deteriorated during the past year . . . The housing situation held its own in Canada during the first half of 1949 and will probably continue to do so in the last half.

Is that not imagination? Is that not boldness? How gratifying to the people of Canada who have been living in one or two rooms maybe since 1945, how gratifying to the veterans who have come back from the war to live perhaps in some kind of hovel, to know that the housing problem is no worse this year than it was last year? What kind of solution is that, Mr. Speaker?

Then the minister of reconstruction went on and said, "After all, this matter of housing is constitutionally a provincial problem; it is really not our concern." I do not think there is one syllable in the constitution which would prevent the federal government from giving large-scale financial aid to the provinces or to the municipalities in order to finance subsidized low-rental housing, in the same manner as they have done with unemployment insurance and with old age pensions. This afternoon again I heard the minister say something about the constitution and the problem being the provinces' responsibility. But I say that the time has come in Canada when the government can no longer shirk its responsibilities on housing by mumbling legal incantations, by talking about the constitutional difficulties involved under the British North America Act, and by chattering about what some other government should do. Of course there is only one answer to the housing problem, and that is not the answer which, unfortunately, the minister gave us this afternoon.

The minister's statement is no solution at all to the housing problem, and I think every hon. member in this house realizes that. I think it is going to cause bitter disappointment in the country. The minister stated that the problem was acute. He told why it was acute. He admitted that there is a great shortage of housing. Then he went on to state that now is not the time to proceed with a large-scale housing project. Why is it not the time? When is it going to be the time? The main proposal made by the minister, if I understood him correctly, was that there would be a reduction in the down payment made on houses in certain housing projects. That means a lower initial payment. I think that is all right, but that is no solution, because it will simply mean a higher annual carrying charge and it is no relief for the average worker, who is too poor to make even that lower initial payment.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the minister is in fact continuing a do-nothing policy. By further trifling with small-scale experiments and handouts, such as he has announced today he has, knowingly or otherwise, betrayed the desperate hopes of many Canadian families. I suggest that he is today once again trying to pass the buck to the provinces and to the municipalities instead of coming to grips with the problem of housing. I cannot understand the objection of the minister to a public housing project. Surely after four years he should realize that private enterprise cannot by itself adequately cope with this problem. I cannot see why he or the government should hesitate to supplement private enterprise, on a large scale, with state spending if it is necessary.

There is one other quotation which I should like to place on record before I leave this subject. It is the quotation of a statement made in Montreal on August 31 by a national mayors' association, which is as follows:

A national mayors' association Tuesday charged the federal government with failing to live up to its pre-election housing promises and said the minister chiefly responsible was maintaining a "do-nothing" policy.

The powerful federation of mayors and municipalities, composed of mayors and reeves in most towns or cities, said in a prepared statement that the government should "face facts."

This is not a C.C.F. mayor that is talking, I may say. To continue:

It said Reconstruction Minister Robert Winters, responsible for federal-provincial housing co-ordination and recently returned to Ottawa from a national tour, had established a "do-nothing policy." Canadians, it said, would be "greatly disappointed if the only result of the recently-concluded trans-Canada 'housing' tour is to be some sort of federal-provincial arrangement to reduce the required down payment for home purchasers."

I say that all the people of Canada will be disappointed at the inadequacy of the solution which the government today offers for this acute housing problem.

There is only one other matter that I should like to mention in this throne speech debate. It has to do with the problem of irrigation in the province of Saskatchewan. I think the fact that the throne speech did not contain one word about that irrigation project should cause concern not only to the west but also to those in the east who have to sell a good deal of their products in the west. As we heard in the debate last night, and as hon. members will now know, in the province of Saskatchewan drought conditions are prevalent in the southwest corner. Once again we are seeing grasshopper plagues and dust-bowl conditions, and I think it is fairly well conceded that the irrigation project which has been proposed would alleviate those conditions. During the last election campaign the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) once again trotted out his perennial but somewhat moldy promises on irrigation which he has made so often in the past. We heard him speak in many places of the millions of dollars which were going to be spent on irrigation. For instance, speaking at his own nominating convention, according to the Leader-Post of April 21 he is reported as follows:

He said Prime Minister St. Laurent is convinced the only way to "bring the west into its own" is to start irrigation projects.

Then the Prime Minister himself came out and, speaking in Saskatoon, said, according to the Leader-Post:

Mr. St. Laurent said the drouth of the thirties taught us the absolute necessity of conserving water and restoring and maintaining moisture on the prairies.

He also said that three major conservation projects, including the south Saskatchewan project, were under active study.

One of the chief lieutenants in Saskatchewan of the Minister of Agriculture, who I believe is with the P.F.R.A., just before election time made a statement which was quite significant. I quote from the Leader-Post of April 21:

"An intensive survey of engineering and economic aspects of the South Saskatchewan irrigation and power project will begin immediately, L. B. Thomson announced in Regina Wednesday . . . This is an action program."

Where is the action? Why is it not in the speech from the throne? Then the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) made a statement regarding irrigation. I should like to welcome the hon. member to this house. I think he will be a real asset to the chamber. Naturally, in a political way, I would have preferred his predecessor. Since that is not possible, I know that the hon. member for Regina City will make a valuable contribution to this house. According to the Regina Leader-Post, the hon. member had this to say:

As your elected Liberal member for Regina in a Liberal government at Ottawa, I would use every resource at my command to get immediate action on a new water supply.

I hope to see him get that action pretty soon; I hope the pressure is a little more effective than some of ours has apparently been. Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, that in the last election speaker after speaker brought in plans for this proposed irrigation, and to dam the south Saskatchewan river. This is not the first time, because in every election in the past twenty-five years the Liberal party has used as one of its main election planks this irrigation project. For instance, here was their 1945 election pledge, carried in a page advertisement in the Moose Jaw Times-Herald of June 9:

The South Saskatchewan irrigation project will be commenced immediately men and material are available—it has been approved.

Surely that promise was specific enough; surely that was concise enough. There were no qualifications in that. Four years have gone by and still no action. I remember in the last by-election when the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Boucher) came into the house. The leader of the provincial Liberal party was lavish in some of the promises which he made and I quote a Canadian Press dispatch of a speech which Mr. Walter Tucker made at Hanley, Saskatchewan:

Walter Tucker, Saskatchewan Liberal leader, said last night the fact that two federal cabinet ministers have expressed a favourable attitude toward the South Saskatchewan river irrigation and power project in the Rosthern, Saskatchewan, by-election campaign has contributed to make this one of the main campaign issues.

It is "now up to the people of Rosthern to give their endorsement by electing William A. Boucher, Liberal candidate, if they want the project proceeded with."

The people of Rosthern, in their wisdom or otherwise, have done that. Therefore I ask, what is the government waiting for? How long is it going to take to get started? I might point out that this irrigation project is self-liquidating. It would pay for itself over a number of years. It is necessary; it is something that is urgently needed today in the province of Saskatchewan. It is quite true that according to the minister's figures it would cost about $100 million. That is a lot of money, but surely that sum fades into insignificance when you compare it with the amounts which were spent on relief in the depression days in that area. Surely that sum fades into insignificance when you compare it with the dollars which were spent in a few days during the war for destructive purposes. I suggest that the sum fades into insignificance when you compare it with the advantages which would accrue to the province and to this nation if construction was completed. Therefore I think that the people of Saskatchewan will deprecate the fact that in the speech from the throne no mention has been made of this south Saskatchewan irrigation project. I admit that I am biased, but I think it is a national tragedy and a national disgrace. I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but I do not want to take too much of the time of the house. In my opinion there are many other shortcomings in the speech from the throne. I was sorry to note that there was no mention of an over-all health program, no mention of any lowering of tariffs, and no mention of more action on control of prices in view of the recent devaluation of the dollar. No mention was made of any reform of the other house. It was rather funny the other day to notice that when they wanted a Conservative senator for the opening ceremonies they could not find one. I suggest to the Prime Minister that I would much prefer to see the other house abolished; but, failing that, perhaps it might be a gesture on his part, which would be appreciated by the country, if he would appoint some senators from parties other than his own. I for one would like to see the former leader of the opposition, Mr. Bracken, appointed, and if the Prime Minister wants any other nominees I shall be glad to suggest some other individuals.

There is one other matter which I think should have been mentioned in the speech from the throne. No plan was made of specific "on the shelf" work projects to take care of unemployment in the event of a depression. We heard quite a good deal about that in the last session. Thus I had hoped that something tangible would be done during this session.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, I say, as I said earlier, that the speech from the throne is a document of self-satisfaction and not a plan for action. I do not think it is one which will inspire confidence in the people of Canada that the government has found a method, or has plans, to alleviate economic recessions when they come.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I feel it a great honour to represent again a constituency which is as progressive, as liberal, and as intelligent as the city of Fort William. Before I forget it, I would first congratulate the chief of the protective staff of this house. The other evening an important lady lost a parcel that meant a lot to her. I had the pleasure of reporting the matter to the chief and along came the parcel in a short time, and the chief would not even take a treat for his staff. That shows the efficiency of your staff, Mr. Speaker.

Because I am a reformer there are certain things I think should be changed in this house. First, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is a very important personage. I think it was beneath the dignity of this house that when he came to Ottawa he had to go house hunting. We have a home for our governor general; we have a home for our lieutenant governor; but our Prime Minister has to hunt a place of comfort for himself. It is not in keeping with the dignity of this house that the Prime Minister should have to bother his head as to where he is to live; a place should be made ready for him. You will hear more about that later on, Mr. Speaker.

Another thing I thought I should like to see is a group of loudspeakers to aid those who are not like me, fortunate enough to hear everything comfortably. Away over yonder it is almost impossible to hear; therefore loudspeakers should be installed as soon as possible, and according to rumour there is something moving. We invite the public to come here. Why should they not hear? Why should the press gallery not hear? They should be allowed to hear everything that goes on, and I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there is little said in this house that is not worth hearing.

There is another thing I should like to suggest, and I did not see it when I came here today. When our Speaker stands up and leads this house in prayer that prayer is confined to the members. We do not let the press gallery or the public hear it, and that is not in keeping with the teachings of Him Who said, "whosoever will may come". And dear knows, if we need it the general public would be very much helped if we opened the doors at the opening of the house each day. The house will hear more about that later on.

There are two things which concern us greatly at the head of the lakes. First I would pay my tribute to the young Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) who gave today his report on housing. I have admired him for a long time, not only as a baseball player but as a tennis expert and an all-round athlete. And I see that in his activities as minister he is putting just the same punch into his work that he put into a game—and the other fellow found it out. Therefore I pay my tribute to him for his splendid report on housing.

This is one of the problems which has troubled us at the lakehead. The other day I tried to get a house for a young father and mother with two children, and I was told there were seven hundred applications ahead of them. Just think—seven hundred of them! The report the minister made today shows that now it will be possible for a man who saves a little and gets a down payment to own his own house—and that is something every young man and woman should do. They should own their own homes, and have a stake in the country.

I was greatly interested in what is being done by an Ottawa firm of bakers. The Morrison-Lamothe bakery has a scheme, which might be practised with great profit throughout Canada, under which they are helping their workers to own their own homes.

I sincerely trust that the minister will not lift rent controls. Recently I got an earful from a citizen with an office in a commercial block. He said to me, "You lifted control on these blocks, did you not?" I said that I did not do a great deal about it, but that I supposed I voted like the rest, and thought it was necessary. "Well," he said, "our rent has just gone up by 172 per cent." If rent controls are lifted in respect to private homes, then we may pity those who cannot get a house, particularly if it is in a winter season. Therefore I hope that rent controls will not be lifted.

Another thing which is interesting us at the head of the lakes is the building of a pipe line. In Alberta there are tremendous quantities of oil and gas. Last session we enacted a law giving permission for the building of a pipe line. We believe we should own and control all our resources, and the people at the lakehead are much concerned about the pipe line. Perhaps they do not thoroughly understand the details, but they would like to have them. In this connection I should like to read from page 29 of Hansard, where a question was asked by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) and a reply given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). The hon. member for Moose Jaw asked why the line was to be built to Superior rather than to Port Arthur. The minister's reply was this:

> I have received representations from Fort William and Port Arthur, as well as from a number of surrounding municipalities. I should like to point out, however, that by virtue of the pipe lines bill which was passed by the House of Commons at the last session, all jurisdiction over the routing and location of pipe lines was placed in the hands of the board of transport commissioners.

Therefore the Minister of Trade and Commerce had practically no say as to where it would be. He continued:

> The board held hearings at which representations were received from the lakehead, and a decision of the board has been rendered approving the route as filed by Imperial Oil Limited.
> Mr. Thatcher: Has the minister issued a licence to this particular company to export oil?
> Mr. Howe: Yes. The Department of Trade and Commerce, as a matter of ordinary routine, has issued a licence under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, which permits the company to export oil for re-import into its refinery at Sarnia.

There is a refinery at Regina, and it is understood that business would not justify another refinery at Winnipeg or Fort William. If the pipe line were to run from Winnipeg to Fort William it would delay the project for two years. There is no sign yet of the building of a refinery at Duluth, but just as soon as Sarnia has more oil than it can use, I am sure Canadians would like Americans to buy our oil.

The matter of social security has been bothering us somewhat at the lakehead. I commend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), who is not here, for the splendid work he did at the last session in bringing aid in the matter of hospitalization, through the help of provincial governments across Canada. It has enabled us to go ahead with much needed building projects.

I was amused on Monday when the leader of the C.C.F., the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), introduced an amendment condemning the government for not at this time having passed a bill supporting old age pensions. How could we have passed a bill before the speech from the throne was passed? Give us a little time, Mr. C.C.F., and we will show you.

Mr. Knowles: But you voted for the means test.

Mr. McIvor: I have said often in the house that I am just as much interested in old age and other pensions as anyone else, and I will not stop until every last one who cannot earn a living may have a home, bread and butter to eat, and clothes to wear. But I do not think I would be justified in supporting increased old age pensions until those who are suffering from arthritis and other incurable diseases receive pensions equal to those received by the aged. I have said before that if the Liberal party holds office long enough in the House of Commons the restrictions will be lifted, and there will be pensions of $50 a month for our aged citizens.

There is another side to this matter. I know a prominent member of the House of Commons who paid into a pension scheme for thirty-five years, but his pension will not be more than the old age pension. Therefore I say that the sooner the Minister of National Health and Welfare can bring in a national contributory pension scheme for all Canada, the better it will be for everybody. The man who is earning his living may get a little more than he needs to spend, and he can buy a little less gingerale so that he may be able to put those savings into a pension fund or scheme which will give him a decent pension in his old age. In my view that is absolutely necessary.

I was pleased to hear the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Gibson) make the statement he did today with respect to gold. I have not forgotten the last depression. Had it not been for the mines north of Port Arthur and Fort William there would have been many more people out of work than there were at that time. The mines created a lot of work, and our boys were glad to leave home to get it, because they needed the employment. We hope that the action taken will stimulate gold mining.

In gold mining, however, the forgotten man is the prospector. I have on the order paper a resolution recommending that when a prospector makes a find, a geologist be sent in. If it is found to contain gold or some other valuable mineral, then it should be investigated and developed, and when the mine is in operation the costs will be taken out of the returns from that operation.

There was something else before us for a day or two, and that is the suggestion, in connection with the royal commission investigating radio, among other things, that radio licence fees would be increased from $2.50 to $4 or $5. I shall have to have much more information than I now have before I will vote for an increase in the radio licence fee. For farmers all over the country with battery sets such extra cost would be a hardship. Members of the House of Commons with their large salaries can afford to pay a fee of $5 instead of $2.50, but it would be a hardship on a man who is making just enough to live and who has very little to spend. I would be willing to pay $5 if only for the enjoyment of hearing the hockey announcements and the good that is derived from the Sunday services that are broadcast, but I am not prepared to support any increase in the fee until I have more information.

As I indicated last year, we at the lakehead are trying to take care of our youth. I think Fort William is setting an example in the way it is looking after the boys and girls, both summer and winter. We have supervised playgrounds all over the city for boys and girls and we provide swimming pools for everyone, including the little tots who can just wade in the corner. There are paid supervisors on duty all the time. When winter comes, and we are glad to see it come, there are about 28 supervised hockey rinks where the boys and girls can play hockey, and alongside those rinks are other rinks for skating only. We believe that we must take care of our boys and girls if they are to have common sense pounded into their brains. When a boy or girl is taught to go to his or her own church or place of religious instruction then he or she will play a better game throughout life.

We did not have a swimming pool in ward four of Fort William, although there was one downtown. The people in that western section felt that there should be another swimming pool available, but the city did not have the money and apparently the dominion or provincial governments were not ready to spend any locally. The young men of that district took the matter in hand and through efficient organization and some aid from the city they built one of the finest outdoor swimming pools in Canada. If any hon. member wants to have a real swim I would be ready to take him to that swimming pool, in the summertime of course. It is an example of what a group of unselfish, willing workers can do, and I pay my tribute to them.

There are certain local matters that we are asking the government to consider. There is a river that needs to be lowered at its mouth, and a breakwater is needed in front of island No. 2. But these matters will be brought up later. At this time I want to congratulate all hon. members who were fortunate enough to be elected. I should like also to congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) and the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Low) on the splendid speeches they made at the commencement of this debate. They have shown the rest of us that long speeches are useless. When they were finished they sat down, which I think is in keeping with good parliamentary procedure. I thank you for your courtesy.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, as this is the first time that representatives of Newfoundland have taken seats in this honourable house, and as we have been welcomed in the speech from the throne, I do not think it is inappropriate that one of us should address the house upon the general issues now under discussion. Everyone has seemed so genuinely glad to have us here; and, as we have been treated with such universal kindness and courtesy, I would deem it ungracious if some one of us did not make suitable acknowledgment of that treatment. I am deeply conscious of the unique honour that has been bestowed upon me and, if I may say so, it is somewhat ironical that I, who fought confederation as long as I could, should be the one to whom this honour and privilege have been given.

I hold no brief for the other hon. members from Newfoundland who sit in this house, but I believe that I speak what must be in their minds when I say that we are all impressed with the elaborate arrangements that have been made by the people of Canada for their legislators. This beautiful Gothic structure, so medieval in its architectural style and so modern in its appointments, must be one of the glories of Canada, where legislation should be brought forward and fully discussed and passed in excellent style. It should be regarded as the highest honour that can come to any man to be selected to come here and help pass the laws of his country. It should be his proudest ambition and his fondest hope that by the excellence of her laws Canada should become ever more worthy of the respect and admiration of the other nations of the world.

During the past few days we new members have witnessed the zeal and the interest and the fervour displayed by the older members of the house. While it arouses in our timid hearts a feeling of envy, yet I think it also stirs up in us a spirit of emulation of their behaviour. I should like to congratulate you, Sir, upon your elevation to the high office that you hold. A couple of days ago we were presented with great volumes of rules and standing orders that could not help but strike terror into our hearts. So much so that we would have been too timid to address you if it were not for the fact that we have been greeted with such charitable encouragement by the members of all parties. For this we are truly grateful.

In accordance with the long-established practice, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) on the fine speeches they made when carrying out a most difficult task. As I listened to the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska I found that what he had to say was most interesting. I trust that other hon. members found his remarks stimulating because in my opinion he put forward the true opinion which every hon. member ought to have of the importance of agriculture to this country.

Agriculture is the most important industry in Canada. The ideal which he expressed, and which found an echo in the statement of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), that people should follow agriculture, not as a profitable and large industry, as it is becoming in so many places, but as a way of living, is, it seems to me, the proper one, one which has received the highest praise from no less an authority than His Holiness the Pope.

Since, unfortunately, agriculture has been neglected in Newfoundland, and as I have advocated the fostering of agriculture for so many years and written many articles about it in our local magazines, I trust it will be one of the first tasks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to see to it that as soon as possible some of these fine experimental stations that are operating in the other provinces of Canada will be set up in Newfoundland, in order that our people may have demonstrated clearly to their eyes how in agriculture they can find a way to a happy and comfortable form of living.

As I listened to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) speak of his beautiful province I dreamed of a land where it was always afternoon, but when I heard the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) speak of the fogs and the heat waves that repelled him when he visited there, and yesterday when I heard of the vicious pests and the curious diseases that afflicted the fruits of that province, I felt that after all Newfoundland was not such a bad place.

Our island, Mr. Speaker, has its places of beauty that stir our hearts and make us love her. We have our historic landmarks where in days gone by the two great pioneer races, the French and the English, fought for the mastery of this continent. In my district there is St. John's, and despite what the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) may say, St. John's is the place where Cabot discovered the new world in 1497, where in 1583 Sir Humphrey Gilbert laid the cornerstone of the British empire. In my district there is also the little settlement of Ferryland. Those who followed the election contest in St. John's West may have heard of it. Ferryland is a very historic settlement because it was there that Lord Baltimore first made his attempt at colonizing the new world. It was there that Sir David Kirke, the conqueror of Quebec and the captor of Champlain and the saintly Breboeuf, set up a grog shop when he had fallen upon evil days.

In the same district we have the beautiful settlement of Placentia, which was once the French capital and came under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Quebec and the saintly Bishop Laval. The people of that place are still proud to call it the ancient capital. Nearly one hundred years ago the sisters of the Order of Presentation came from Ireland and set up their schools there. Personages prominent in the social, political and ecclesiastical life of our country were born there. The present Archbishop of St. John's, who has presided over his See for thirty-four years now, was born there, and his coadjutor archbishop, whose early death a few days ago was lamented by so many, was also born there.

St. John's West has other features of interest besides its beauty and its historic monuments. I believe many members of the house have visited St. John's and know what an important naval base it was during the war. They know the strategic value of Newfoundland. It has always been of great strategic value, and it was the possession of Newfoundland that gave Great Britain a real chance to conquer the western world. A few miles from Placentia there is the great naval base of Argentia where President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill met during the war and signed the Atlantic charter.

I am proud to be the representative not only of the industrious fisherfolk of the districts of Ferryland, Placentia and St. Mary's, but also of the people of St. John's.

If I may revert to the proceedings of last Thursday afternoon, some hon. members from Newfoundland must have felt a certain nostalgia when they witnessed the scenes of a few days ago, because if it had not been for confederation perhaps we might have been witnessing them as the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay (Mr. Ashbourne), the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Bradley), and I witnessed them together twenty-five years ago when we sat in the same house.

I know that hon. members heard a great deal about Newfoundland in this house in the early part of this year and also last year, but I trust that they will forgive me. I do not intend to tell a prolonged story, but very briefly I wish to review the important facts and incidents that led up to our presence here today. The people of Canada, especially those who live in the western provinces, know the effects of the 1929 stock market crash. We did not feel them until 1931 when the government of the day was suddenly surprised to find that they could not borrow any more money. Then there was a wonderful to-do. Everybody tried to economize, to cut down salaries, and all kinds of expedients were adopted to save the country's economy. In 1932 the storm broke with a vengeance. There were riots; people stormed the House of Assembly where the members were in session. The government was forced to hold an election.

In the avalanche that overtook the government a new government was elected of which I had the honour to be a member, and although we strove manfully to restore the shaken fabric of our country, it was impossible. A royal commission, on which there were two Canadian representatives and one Englishman, decided, after having considered every kind of solution, even confederation—the government of Canada was not prepared to accept Newfoundland into confederation—that a form of government which had been tried once before in Cromwell's time, namely a commission of government, should be introduced into Newfoundland with three Newfoundlanders and three Englishmen, and presided over by His Excellency the Governor.

We had great hopes that when politics were set aside our people would be united in a great effort, and we would quickly restore our country's prosperity. Unfortunately that did not happen, and although on the whole we got fairly good government, it was not until 1941, with the arrival of the United States troops, that things began to change. The construction of those great bases at Fort Pepperell in St. John's and at Argentia in Placentia bay put hundreds of millions of United States dollars into Newfoundland and quickly restored prosperity so that from that time, as hon. members know, Newfoundland was prosperous, had millions of dollars to her credit, and was able to lend Great Britain the sum of $14 million.

It was a condition of the appointment of the commission of government that responsible government should be restored when the prosperity of the country was on a sound basis. This was not done. It is easy to understand our people becoming apathetic and lethargic. They were living well, nothing was troubling them, and they did not bother about politics any more. Nobody took the initiative strongly enough to put forward representations for the return of responsible government. At last the initiative was taken by the British government, which decided that it would hold a national convention. Forty-five members from forty-one districts in Newfoundland and Labrador sat in the convention in St. John's. They met on September 11, 1946, and for sixteen months they discussed all the various features concerning Newfoundland's economy and her political future.

Hon. members, I am sure, are aware that the delegation which was sent to England from the convention returned discomfited. A delegation was then sent to Ottawa and returned. In October, 1947, a letter was received by the Governor of Newfoundland from Mr. Mackenzie King laying down the terms upon which Newfoundland would enter confederation. Beyond those, he could not go. A firm of chartered accountants in Montreal found that the new province would have a deficit of over $4,000,000 per year if those terms were accepted.

Later on, after the convention had turned down confederation, and the elections were held, another delegation came and the terms were changed. But let me tell you what happened in the convention, because I believe it should be known. By a vote of 29 to 16 the convention decided it wanted responsible government restored. The chairman said we could not have that alone on the ballot. Two things had to be put on the ballot, so it was decided to put on "commission of government" which no one in the convention wanted.

When the convention was closed the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs in England said that the question of confederation had occupied so much of the time of the government members in Ottawa and had been so fully discussed in Newfoundland that the people should be in a position to vote on it. He believed, therefore, that they ought to have the right to vote on it, and that was done. The first referendum was carried out and there was a majority of five or six thousand in favour of responsible government. Commission of government was removed from the ballot, a second referendum held, and confederation won by a majority of approximately six thousand.

After that, we had more elections. I do not wish to go into the question too fully, but elections were held. Now, sir, it is only reasonable to believe that if an event of such tremendous importance to the people as their future government is to be considered, then elected representatives should be the ones to consider the problem. Who was considering the fortunes of Newfoundland last year? A commission of government not elected by the people—in fact, some of them had been rejected by the people.

If there were to be negotiations with this great country of Canada, at what a disadvantage were our people when they had to pick men off the street and send them up here without the necessary prestige which the members who represented the government of Canada possessed? Contrast that situation with what occurred in 1895 when the delegation consisted of Mr. Bond, Mr. Morris, Mr. Emerson and Mr. Horwood. Mr. Bond afterwards became the Right Hon. Sir Robert Bond; Mr. Morris became Lord Morris, and Mr. Horwood was later knighted and made chief justice of the country. These were the finest men we had in the country who were sent up here at that time. Does it not stand to reason that, if a country is to be properly represented, this is the type of man we should send? Inexperienced men were sent this time and the right hon. the Prime Minister and his government must have seen they had a tremendous advantage in debating power over our so-called representatives.

Now, sir, I have stated to my constituents that if I was elected to this house I would ask someone on the government side to explain to me and to the people of Newfoundland—because it has not been explained as yet —what the principle was upon which the financial terms were decided in 1947 and in 1948. For some little time, sir, I have studied the question of confederation between the various provinces of Canada. As hon. members know, the principle adopted at that time was that the per capita debt of Canada and the per capita debt of the provinces were the bases upon which the financial terms were settled. That was the principle which was adopted in 1895, and that was the principle upon which the discussions had taken place at an earlier date.

I have before me the sessional papers of Canada for 1895. I will read from the memorandum the terms proposed by Mr. Mackenzie Bowell, the Prime Minister of Canada:

> Canada will assume of present debt of Newfoundland, $8,350,000.
> Canada will assume an excess of debt over the $8,350,000 amounting to $2,000,000, a total of $10,350,000.

The deduction is very simple. This is equal to $50 per head of Newfoundland's population of 207,000. On the excess of $2,000,000, Canada was to pay interest at five per cent per annum. In 1895, the position was that the per capita debt of Canada was $50 per head. Newfoundland's debt was $15,000,000, or $75 per head. The government of Mackenzie Bowell refused pointblank to accept any further responsibility because of the fear of repercussions in the other provinces of Canada.

On April 16, 1895, he wrote to the Earl of Aberdeen as follows:

> Referring to our conversation of yesterday afternoon, I enclose herewith a memorandum showing the financial aspect of our negotiations with the Newfoundland delegates, from which Your Excellency will learn the difficulties that lie in the way of our acceding to the full request of the representatives of that colony. If these figures and explanations are not sufficiently clear and elaborate, kindly let me know, and I will furnish any other that Your Excellency may require.

His idea was that Great Britain should assume the debt of $5,000,000. It was because of this that negotiations fell through.

After the referendum had been taken in 1948 and the people had by a majority endorsed the policy of confederation, a delegation was sent to Canada. This delegation was in a position, because those who opposed confederation in Newfoundland had shown it beyond any shadow of doubt, to say that the terms proposed by the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King were insufficient. The terms were then improved, but have we been given a permanent grant to make allowance for the difference in the per capita debt of the two countries? What is the per capita debt of Canada today? Is anyone in this house in a position to tell me? Is it $1,000 or $1,400? The per capita debt of Newfoundland last year was $200. The per capita debt of Canada was seven times as great. Does that not mean that the people of Newfoundland have now taken upon their shoulders this tremendous burden of Canadian debt? The per capita debt of Newfoundland is not now $200 but $1,400.

I doubt very much whether, under those terms, the people will be able to continue. They have been given an increased transitional allowance. I made a calculation of the amount of revenue which was left to Newfoundland after income taxes were taken away, after customs duties and excise taxes were removed. According to the figures supplied by the black book published by the dominion government, about $1,000,000 remains to Newfoundland. Of course, we were given a grant of $6,000,000 instead of the income tax, but that only brings Newfoundland's revenue up to $7,000,000.

The cost of operating public works alone over the last ten years has been about $10 million a year, public health between $6 million and $7 million a year, and education in the neighbourhood of $5 million a year. What we shall find now is that the poor deluded people of Newfoundland will be told that they must find other sources of revenue. In the various districts, in Placentia and St. Mary's, and in the districts that my hon. friends from Newfoundland represent, the people will be told, "You cannot get this money to spend on education now. We have not got it to give you. You will have to find it yourself. You must do what is done in the other provinces of Canada where fifty per cent of the money for education, health and welfare, and public works comes from the people directly through direct taxation." We have not been accustomed to that form of direct taxation. It is only those people whose salaries are in the higher brackets, men who pay income tax, who have been accustomed to direct taxation. The majority of our people on small incomes have been accustomed to contribute to the revenue in an indirect manner.

I told my constituents that I would ask some spokesman from the government side to explain the principle upon which the financial terms of the agreement were settled. We come here now—at any rate, I do—to seek justice and an amelioration of these terms. If our leader had been elected at the head of a party in the majority, I believe we would have had a good chance, if we could put forward a just case, for the amelioration of these terms. It may be asked what our attitude will be. I am sure hon. members must be curious to know what will be the attitude of those of us who fought hard against confederation, who were opposed to confederation in principle, or who were opposed to the means by which it was brought about, or who were opposed to the terms which were inadequate. Having given careful thought to this important matter, I should like to say that we accept the fact of confederation and that, in the interests of peace, harmony and unity, we shall work for the welfare and benefit of the country as a whole. But, Mr. Speaker, we shall always look for and expect just treatment on the part of the government.

I now wish to refer especially to two matters mentioned in the speech from the throne. The first is the trans-Canada highway. As you know, Mr. Speaker, for various reasons our country is sparsely populated and our people are interested mainly in the fisheries which surround that island, with its thousands of miles of inlets and bays. The interior of the country is hardly developed. Nevertheless, we have built over twenty-five hundred miles of roads. It is true that not all of them are first-class roads. Most of them are far from second-class. But we have the beginning of a trans-insular highway. Less than two hundred miles of roads remain to be built to link up the east and the west. If the road is built from Port aux Basques even to Corner Brook it will open up perhaps the richest part of our country and the most attractive part from the tourists' point of view. All the beautiful salmon rivers to which so many United States tourists come every year will then be open to them to drive along. Further than that, I believe that it will open up good land. Land will be accessible and people will be able to get easily to the markets and to the railway. If this road is built in our country, and I trust that it will be, and if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) takes the interest that I hope he will take in our country, I believe the country will make some progress.

But there is another feature about the system of highways in Newfoundland to which I should like to direct attention. This devaluation of the pound will have serious repercussions on our principal exports; and we are a large exporting country in proportion to our total trade. We send to Europe fish for which we have been paid in sterling, now blocked on the other side. We send iron ore to England. Before the war we sent a great deal of ore to Germany. We send paper to England. I saw in the newspapers only today statements by the managers of the two paper companies at Grand Falls and Corner Brook expressing serious concern at the situation that has now arisen. The manager at Bell Island says that it is going to create new difficulties in the exportation of their ore. That is another reason for the difficulties. But the first reason, which I did not mention, was that already there has been a sort of depression in Newfoundland. I will not blame it on confederation. I think I would rather blame it on the Liberal victory. The rosy promises that were held out about the boom that was going to take place and the prosperity that was going to be everywhere have not been fulfilled. Family allowances are a good thing. I think I was the first one in Newfoundland to advocate them. If our own responsible government had been restored to us when it should have been restored I believe we would have had family allowances before you did in Canada, Mr. Speaker. But these things are not sufficient to make up for the people over sixteen and under seventy who are out of work. We need employment; we need development in agriculture; and we need prosperous fisheries. This year in many places the fisheries have been far from prosperous. Already there has been curtailment in work in the woods. Lumbermen have been sent home earlier than usual. There is to be curtailment in the manufacture of sulphite pulp in Corner Brook. It will be seen what all these things add up to, namely, that the government of the province of Newfoundland from its inception is faced with extremely serious financial and economic difficulties.

There is one other thing in the speech from the throne to which I should like to make reference and it has been extensively referred to here today. I refer to the housing situation. I intend to mention some examples of housing in various places, and first of all I shall mention housing in Ottawa. It is regrettable that so distinguished a person as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) should find it difficult to get a place to live. I think it is really pathetic, and it is not worthy of this country that he should be placed in a difficulty of that kind. But anyone who picks up the Ottawa papers and reads the advertisements of "apartments wanted" will find a situation that I think is un-Christian. We find such examples as these: "Quiet young couple with no children", "Married couple with no children seek apartment", and so on. Several advertisements point out the fact that the seekers for accommodation have no children. Last summer in Trepassey, a little settlement in my district, I met a lady who was married in Toronto. I said, "I thought you were living in Toronto." She said, "No, I had to come home. For four months I walked the streets of Toronto looking for a place for our family, and everywhere I went I was asked, 'Have you any children?' I said 'yes.' I was then told, 'Sorry, we do not take families with children'." She said to them, "What am I supposed to do with my children? Shoot them?" I hope in a moment to make reference to this matter again. But it is not surprising that the government is criticized for its failure with regard to the housing problem when I saw an advertisement like this in the paper a couple of days ago under "apartments wanted":

> Two permanent government girls, or small bachelor suitable for one girl.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I did not read all the advertisement. The end of the advertisement reads "reliable".

In contrast, sir, to the treatment which was accorded to the lady to whom I referred as walking the streets looking for a place for her two children, I should like to draw attention to a gentleman who was written up in the Globe and Mail of Toronto yesterday morning. The item refers to Mr. R. L. Parratt of Kingston:

> Ross M. Richardson of the firm of Mitchell and Wilson, general contractors of Gananoque, also a war veteran, has a financial interest with Mr. Parratt in the building of apartments—where married people with children can live. I believe, sir, that man deserves the acclamation of this house for the work that he has done. I should also like to refer to a statement which I saw in the press yesterday about a gentleman in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, who was building low-rental houses for the accommodation of people who were seeking housing accommodation in that city.

I should like to refer to the housing problem in the city of St. John's, Newfoundland. There, sir, I believe the housing corporation, which was created a few years ago, made a tragic mistake in erecting high-class houses instead of erecting houses for those who were not able to pay high rental. The chief problem is with the poor and the middle class. The rich person is able to look after himself. I promised those of my constituents who live in dreadful hovels in the city of St. John's that I would urge the necessity of the government giving attention to the housing situation of those people down there. I trust that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters), when he was in St. John's, took the opportunity of visiting these dreadful places, and that he will take early steps to have something better substituted.

There is one other matter on the housing question to which I should like to refer, and it is an important one. Hon. members from Nova Scotia are familiar with the co-operative movement which has been created down there. They must know that in connection with the co-operative movement Dr. Tompkins developed a housing plan which has been copied, I believe, in other parts of this country. It has been copied in our own. Dr. Tompkins bought seventy-five acres of land, and he gave each man an acre. He brought down two ladies from Maine who studied with groups of ten people how to build a house. They designed their houses outside and in. They reckoned every penny that was necessary for the construction, for fittings and for furnishing these houses, and they came out right to the $2 piece. The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll) knows how successful that plan was. He knows that these houses were built and that they cost only $9 a month and were paid for in the comparatively short time of from twelve to fifteen years. I have not been able to see that plan continued since 1946, but in 1946 it was a pleasure to me to witness groups of ten ex-service men working together to build their houses co-operatively. At the time I was there they had a concrete mixer. They were all working, stripped to the waist, helping one another to build houses in which they could live with their families. That is the cheapest form of housing.

Today I understood the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to say that the people were going to get credit for the labour that they were putting into their houses. Many years ago we had a scheme for civil servants in St. John's, based on Dr. Tompkins' scheme. It fell through because the government of the day would not give the people credit for the labour they put in on their houses. If that had been done we would have had a solution to the housing problem, which we have not yet.

Finally, sir, what has the future in store for Newfoundland? What are to be the relations between Newfoundland and the rest of Canada? It depends largely upon the question whether the government intends to be just and fair. I must confess, sir, that since I came here I have found much evidence of good will, for which I am truly grateful. I hope that this good will will continue, because if it does I feel quite confident that our people, despite the handicaps under which they suffer, will do all in their power to promote the happiness and the prosperity of a great united nation.

Mr. Sinclair: Will the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) permit a question for the purpose of clarification?

Mr. Green: It is his maiden speech.

Mr. Sinclair: I know it is his maiden speech. I think he made a slip in regard to Mr. Mackenzie King. He said that Mr. Mackenzie King was Prime Minister in 1933 and opposed the confederation of Newfoundland with Canada.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I did not hear the first part of the remark.

Mr. Sinclair: When describing the royal commission of 1933 the hon. member said that they had investigated every possibility, including confederation with Canada, and that that was opposed by Mr. Mackenzie King at that time. The hon. member will recall that it was not Mr. Mackenzie King but Mr. R. B. Bennett who was Prime Minister in 1933.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy this afternoon to have the opportunity of following in this debate a compatriot from Newfoundland. I want to congratulate the seven members in this house who sit for various constituencies in that island. I am happy to find that at long last Great Britain's oldest colony has taken in Canada, and that at long last the dreams of the fathers of confederation have been fulfilled. I want to congratulate some of the members from Newfoundland on the marvellous majorities which they received in their election. With all due respect to what has just been said by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), there is every indication that by and large the people of Newfoundland favoured confederation; otherwise I find it difficult to understand how members who had supported confederation come into this house with majorities of five thousand, six thousand, seven thousand and as high as more than ten thousand. Coming from constituencies of older Canada many of us would look upon these majorities as pretty safe ones.

I noticed that the hon. member for St. John's West referred to the fact that members here from Newfoundland felt a little timid in this house. As a Newfoundlander myself I want to say to him that no Newfoundlander ever needs to feel timid anywhere with anyone. Let me tell these newly elected members, what they must already know, that Newfoundlanders have made good in this country in the professional field, in industry and in commerce. And I am sure that, now that Newfoundland is a partner in Canada, Newfoundlanders will make equally good in the political field.

It was my pleasure in 1943 to be, I believe, one of the first, if indeed not the first member in the House of Commons to raise the question of confederation of Newfoundland with Canada. Reference to my speech, which appears in volume V of Hansard for 1943, at page 4657, indicates that in that speech I argued the case for confederation on the basis of the advantages that would accrue to Canada, and not on those which would accrue to Newfoundland.

Having lived just about half my life in Canada, and considering myself a Canadian, I felt that the strategic position and the potential and undiscovered wealth of Newfoundland, and the adjacent territory of Labrador, would be of great advantage to this country. I have no doubt that confederation has already brought some benefits to Newfoundland. I can well imagine that those family allowance cheques, coming just before the election into the outports of Newfoundland, must have looked like manna from heaven. I am not going to say that those cheques had anything to do with the size of the majorities some members received. Newfoundland stands to profit by many of the measures of social legislation we have enjoyed in Canada for many years, but which Newfoundland was unable economically to provide her people. Let me say to the newly elected members from that island, however, that Newfoundland now becomes the fourth maritime province of Canada. If those hon. members have followed Canadian history they will have learned that the marriage of the maritime provinces with Upper Canada at the time of confederation has not been an entirely happy one. Indeed there have been times when the relationship has been strained.

Especially in view of the fact that we now have a fourth maritime province, I was disappointed when reading the speech from the throne to find that there was no mention of any special consideration to be given to that part of Canada. It is a well-known fact that the maritimes have suffered. I call the attention of the new members from Newfoundland to this point in order that particularly those sitting on the government side of the house may not sit back complacently and think that, because they have now confederation and now have a Liberal government, all will be well. There will be ample opportunity for those members to fight every inch of the way to secure for Newfoundland, along with the other maritime provinces, what may be considered a square deal.

Let me call the attention of the house to some features which are of great importance to the new province. According to figures published by the dominion bureau of statistics the average earnings in 1948 in the then three maritime provinces were much below the average earnings for the whole of Canada. In that year the average male earning for all Canada was $993; in Nova Scotia the average dropped to $865, in New Brunswick to $765, in Prince Edward Island to $594, with a corresponding drop as compared with the over-all average in respect of the earnings by females.

If one looks at the income of farmers of the maritime provinces one will find that while 10·5 per cent of the farms of Canada are in the three maritime provinces, the income of maritime farmers in 1946 was not the 10·5 per cent to which their population would entitle them. It amounted to only 4·5 per cent of the agricultural income of Canada.

Judged by the number of automobiles owned, the number of telephones in homes, the number of houses with radios and with electric lights and inside water, each of the three older maritime provinces falls far below the average for the whole of Canada. These are just a few of the facts to illustrate the statement I have made that special consideration must be given, particularly in view of the new province having been added. If the Liberal party as such has no policy for the maritime provinces I would suggest that it look up the policy adopted by the C.C.F. party at its Winnipeg convention in 1948.

Mr. Cruickshank: What about the Regina convention?

Mr. Noseworthy: Never mind about that; I will come to it later. I do not believe the Liberal party should have any hesitancy in adopting a few planks offered by the C.C.F. party. It has adopted many of them over the years, and has no reason to be ashamed of having done so. As a matter of fact, if we are to accept the statements made by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew) during his election campaign, the Liberal party were not very far from the C.C.F. They had become almost as socialistic as the C.C.F. What I think is most interesting is that every time the leader of the official opposition made that statement on the hustings he made votes for the Liberal party, not for himself. I am confident that the unparalleled success of the Liberal party at the last election was due in large measure to the fact that to some extent they had adopted and enforced measures which the C.C.F. had been advocating since its inauguration in 1933, and which the groups which came together then to form the C.C.F. had been advocating before that time.

I am going to check the record for a few moments because I like this business of checking the record. The Liberal campaign committee for the province of Ontario ran a series of advertisements in the Ontario press during June entitled, "Check the record." They took great credit, and they are entitled to it, for the institution of family allowances. But I want to tell them that if they will look up the C.C.F. program they will find that family allowances were adopted as part of our party program at the convention of 1942. No action was taken by the Liberals in connection with family allowances until 1944. Therefore I think we can claim some credit for having created in the public mind a demand for that particular piece of social legislation.

In that same advertisement the Liberals took credit for having introduced unemployment insurance. I should like to remind hon. gentlemen opposite that if they will go back to the 1933 Regina manifesto, to which an hon. gentleman referred a moment ago, they will find that unemployment insurance was adopted in that year as part of the C.C.F. program. It was not until 1940 when industrial labour was so essential to our war effort that the Liberal party got around to doing anything about unemployment insurance.

I am at a loss to understand the next item in the advertisement by which the Liberal party takes credit for a national health plan. I fail to understand what they mean by a national health plan. In the Liberal platform of 1919 there was a promise of health insurance, but I do not know of anything approximating health insurance that has been introduced by the Liberal party in the thirty years that have elapsed since 1919. The latest statement I can find on the matter is that the Liberal party does not want to introduce health insurance until enough hospitals have been built to provide the necessary accommodation. At the rate at which we are building hospitals at the present time, even with government help, it will be at least fifty years before we have sufficient hospitals so that health insurance can be introduced on that basis. The grants in aid that the federal government is making today to the provincial governments for health purposes represent just about ten per cent of what would be required to institute an over-all national health plan.

What is rather striking is that the Liberals take full credit in that advertisement for any collective bargaining agreements that are in existence. There again I would say that any achievements that have been made in the field of collective bargaining have been due to the fight put up by organized labour over the past fifty years, with little or no assistance from the governments of this country. If hon. members want to make a comparison I suggest that they go back again to the 1933 Regina manifesto where they will find that collective bargaining was made a part of our program. Little or nothing was done and no help was given by the Liberal government to bring about collective bargaining until 1944, when the first act was passed.

There are a number of other credits taken by the Liberals in that advertisement. They took full credit for old age pensions. Need I remind this house that old age pensions were first introduced when both the Conservative and Liberal leaders in this house needed the support of a small group led by the late J. S. Woodsworth, and the basis of that support was a promise from the former Prime Minister of this country.

An hon. Member: In writing.

Mr. Noseworthy: That promise was made in writing and it hangs on the walls of our national office. It was to the effect that if we would give support during the following session he would introduce old age pensions. Incidentally, Mr. Woodsworth asked also at that time for unemployment insurance and was promised that it would be given consideration.

The Liberal party also took credit for the veterans charter. I want to congratulate the government on the veterans charter and the extent to which they have assisted the veterans of world war II, certainly as compared with the treatment meted out to the veterans of world war I. It is one of the bright spots in our civilization; it is one of the bright spots that indicate that we as a Canadian people are making progress. I am particularly pleased with the assistance that has been given to the young veterans who have come back desirous of completing their education. While in the house from 1942 to 1945 it was my privilege to sit on a committee of the house that considered the courses of education that should be made available to veterans returning from world war II. I want to repeat a little story that I heard in my own riding. The Conservative candidate had a loud speaker in the riding and the man who was operating it was saying: "What did the Liberal government ever do for you?" After hearing that, a very staunch Conservative came into my committee room and said: "That started me thinking. When I went into world war I my education was half finished; I was about half through high school. I never had an opportunity to complete that education. My boy was in world war II. He too had not quite finished high school when he enlisted. He has since returned and has graduated from the university of Toronto, thanks to the assistance of D.V.A."

I am confident that many of the votes which the Liberal party received in the past election were received from families whose young people had been assisted in completing their education by virtue of the provisions of D.V.A. after their return from the services. I should like to call the attention of the minister to one or two improvements which might be made in the regulations. Here is what I discovered only a few days ago. A student finished his course of study within his credit year. He wrote about half his examinations within his credit year. Two or three of his examinations were written after his credit year had expired. Because of that fact I find that D.V.A. will not take into account his standing in that year although he made second-class honours. They will not grant him another year but insist on going back to the previous year on the ground that, because that boy wrote two examinations after his credit year had been completed, the regulations would not permit them to consider that year.

I am sure the men who framed the regulations never intended that they should operate so drastically as to exclude a deserving young veteran from another year of university training on a mere technicality. I took the trouble to find out how many other veterans at the university of Toronto were affected by that ruling. I found there were about ten or twelve in that university alone. I suggest to the minister that some steps be taken to override that technicality, on behalf of these young men who are entitled, by reason of their academic standing in their last year, to full credit for that academic standing, even though their credit year may have expired before they finished their examinations.

On motion of Mr. Noseworthy the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will continue this debate.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, September 22, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT—PETROLEUM AND PULPWOOD REGULATIONS

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I wish to table the report of the Department of National Revenue for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1949.

So far as the export petroleum and pulpwood regulations are concerned, none having been promulgated since the last return was made, no report will be made with regard to this item. Likewise, no report will be made in connection with the following statutes, since no orders or regulations have been made pursuant to the authority vested in me thereunder: Canada-New Zealand income tax agreement; Canada-United States income tax agreement; Canada-United Kingdom Succession Duty Agreement Act, and the Canada-United States Tax Convention Act, 1944.

PARLIAMENT HILL

PARKING SPACE FOR MEMBERS' CARS—STATEMENT OF MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Langlois) brought to my attention the inadequacy of the facilities for parking automobiles in the immediate vicinity of this building, particularly automobiles belonging to members of parliament. Immediately after the house rose last night I was in consultation with the Sergeant-at-Arms; and I am pleased to inform the house that already, in conjunction with the Department of Public Works, he has arranged for some additional space for members' cars to the right of the space occupied by the cabinet ministers.

I might also point out to hon. members that some time ago the Sergeant-at-Arms sent a questionnaire to members to ascertain who had automobiles in Ottawa. At the present time he has received notice from fifty-five members only that they have automobiles. It is impossible for him to know just what space should be allotted to members until he knows how many have cars here.

Hon. members will probably be interested to know that the parking area in the vicinity of the building has been allotted as follows: There are eighteen spaces for ministers of the crown and the leader of the opposition, forty-two spaces for members of parliament, fourteen spaces for senior officials, and seventeen spaces for House of Commons employees.

The hon. member for Gaspe has handed to me the notice which he received with respect to the parking of his automobile. I find that it is not a summons, and that it was not served on him personally but was a notice that was put on his car informing him that the owner—who in this case happened to be a member of parliament—had parked his car for a longer period than is permitted in a space reserved for officials. There is no information on the card to the effect that a penalty will be imposed, and I can assure the hon. member that none will be.

I am sure that all hon. members realize the difficulty that the Sergeant-at-Arms has in providing space for the members. Some system has to be devised so that the limited space may be allotted fairly amongst the ministers, the members and the officials of the house. All I can add is a request to all hon. members that they try to conform to whatever system may be devised.

FREIGHT RATES

JUDGMENT OF TRANSPORT BOARD—QUESTION AS TO DELAYING ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? In view of the judgment of the board of transport commissioners, issued this morning, and the serious implication of a further increase in freight rates, will the government delay any action on recommendations made by the commissioners until the house has been given an opportunity to discuss the matter, and interested provinces have had an opportunity of placing their views before the government if they so desire?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The part of the question which seeks information with reference to the recommendations made by the commissioners should be answered in this way. This is a judgment of a court of record, and not a recommendation made to the government.

With reference to the next part of the question, as a rule it is not the custom of the government to interfere with judgments of the court or with ordinary legal processes.

With reference to the question of the rights of the provinces, or of any other parties who feel aggrieved by the judgment, there is, under the Railway Act, a right of appeal.

Mr. Green: May I ask a supplementary question? Is this judgment supposed to be a judgment also in respect of the general rates inquiry, or is the board now to undertake a general rates inquiry having to do particularly with discrimination?

Mr. Chevrier: This judgment is divided into two parts. It deals first with a review of the 21 per cent increase in freight rates which was referred to the government by way of appeal, and, second, with an application made by the Railway Association of Canada for a general increase of 20 per cent in freight rates.

Mr. Green: I was referring to the instructions given to the board to make a general inquiry.

Mr. Chevrier: The answer clearly is that it does not deal with the general inquiry referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask a supplementary question? While the minister states correctly that it is not usual for the government to interfere with the judgments of a court of record, in view of the serious implications of this judgment will the government not consider that it is in the public interest to defer any action to put these recommendations into effect?

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. gentleman has virtually repeated his question. I am afraid I have to repeat my answer, and say that I have nothing to add to what I have already said.

Mr. Coldwell: Will the government consider interfering? That is the point.

Mr. Chevrier: Under the Railway Act as it stands I do not think that the government has any right to do so. I cannot speak for the government; I can speak only for myself. I say that it is not the usual practice or custom to do that.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

TRADE WITH BRITAIN—EFFECT OF DEVALUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of Canada's new disadvantage in the British market, caused by the devaluation of the pound, is the minister in a position to announce what steps are contemplated to maintain the British market, and whether negotiations will be entered into with British officials for the purpose of renewing our food contracts?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The question begins by making an assertion which I hardly think is correct; it says, "In view of Canada's new disadvantage in the British market". I think, if anything, Canada is in a better competitive position in the British market than she was prior to devaluation. As to negotiations between officials in regard to trading relations, I may say that the continuing committee which was set up at the time of the visit of Sir Stafford Cripps a year ago, is meeting in Ottawa at this moment. It is a committee composed of United Kingdom officials and Canadian officials. I am hopeful that as a result of its deliberations an improvement in the marketing situation will result.

Mr. Argue: May I ask the minister whether food contracts for next year will be renewed?

Mr. Howe: There are two sides that must agree in order to determine whether the food contracts will be renewed. I am afraid I can speak for only one side.

HOUSING

STEAM SUBURBAN SERVICE FOR TORONTO DISTRICT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. In view of the fact that we have no cheap land in the Toronto district, will he consider approaching the two steam railways with a view to providing a steam suburban service to accomplish that object?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The hon. member brought up this question last year. At that time I felt it was fully dealt with. However, I shall be only too glad to look into it again.

Mr. Church: Without such a service the minister's housing plan will not be of much assistance.

Mr. Graydon: Commutation rates to Brampton would help.

SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS

COST OF LIVING BONUS OR OTHER SUPPLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of repeated representations, and in view of the many promises made during the recent election campaign, especially by government supporters—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles: —will consideration be given—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. St. Laurent: Is not that an infringement of the direction you gave the other day, Mr. Speaker, with respect to such questions as can be asked on the orders of the day?

Mr. Knowles: In view of the urgency—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I did not hear the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: I have not yet had a chance to state it.

Mr. Speaker: May I say that in asking questions on the orders of the day, hon. members should ask questions and not make statements.

Mr. Knowles: Will the Minister of Finance give consideration to the request of the superannuated civil servants for a cost of living bonus or other supplement?

Mr. Speaker: Order. In view of my remarks of yesterday I think that this question should be put on the order paper.

Mr. Knowles: It is extremely urgent to the people concerned.

FLAXSEED

AVAILABILITY FOR CRUSHING IN SASKATCHEWAN VEGETABLE OIL PLANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce before him an answer to the question I asked yesterday in his absence?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Flax is being sold at the moment direct from the farmer to the private trade. The government has provided facilities for a growers' pool in flax, but since market prices are well above initial payment of the pool, no flax is being delivered to the pool. Therefore the proper method for the crusher in Saskatoon to follow in providing for its requirements next year is to estimate such requirements and purchase the flax on the open market.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, September 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Boisvert for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in this debate my first duty, and it is indeed a pleasure and not a perfunctory one, is to congratulate you on your elevation to the position of first commoner. I do so with personal pleasure; for over the years I have had the pleasure of observing that in your occupancy of the office of Deputy Speaker you have accorded to all hon. members that equality without which it is impossible to carry on properly the functions of parliament.

On this occasion, which in certain respects is different from similar occasions in the past, all I intend to do is to place certain suggestions before this house; because, as I see the situation, the Canadian people having spoken, and it being the duty of all hon. members to accede to the wishes and the will of the majority, what I have to say will not be a rehash of the election campaign. I shall endeavour to place before the government and this house certain matters in respect to which I believe changes might well be made.

When one comes here for the first time he expects resentment and recrimination to be the natural attitude as between parties in parliament. But, as was demonstrated a moment ago when I rose to speak, the generous attitude shown by hon. members opposite indicates that after all, there is, in this House of Commons, which is properly representative of the people, an abiding spirit of friendship and respect among members on all sides of the house. And, Mr. Speaker, without that friendship and respect parliament would be a place in which few of us would wish to be.

I have been impressed since the session has begun, as I am sure you, sir, and all other hon. members have been, by the high quality of the new members who have come to the house, constituting an infusion of new blood into this national assembly.

I was greatly impressed by the address of the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert), the mover of the address, and also by the address of the seconder, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing). The presence of these hon. members in the House of Commons will raise the standard of parliament. Again, yesterday, I enjoyed very much the splendid address of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), who is able, as I wish I were, to speak with equal facility in either of the official languages. I was impressed, too, by the address of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne).

There was a demonstration of democracy yesterday, when one of the opponents of the union of Newfoundland with Canada rose in his place and, in a spirit of good will and compromise, and with the realization that the majority prevails and that we have much to offer one to the other, joined in acclaiming the fact that Newfoundland is now one of the provinces of this dominion.

Democracy lives only when there is an infusion of able young men such as these whom I have mentioned, and there are others. Democracy lives only when there is a realization that there is a function to be performed by those who today sit to the left of Mr. Speaker—not immediately to his left, may I say, but somewhat removed therefrom. As I listened yesterday to the hon. member for St. John's West, and heard him describe the strangeness of the atmosphere of parliament—and it does have that effect upon all new members—I went to the library and got there, sir, a description of parliament which, with your permission, I should like to read. In its masterly language and in its breadth of vision it portrays something of what parliament means. It was written by the Hon. Quintin Hogg, one of the most distinguished of the younger parliamentarians in England. There is a feeling of frustration experienced by the member who comes to parliament for the first time, and surprise that parliament does not move faster. It is true that parliament moves in a traditional way with its procedure and practices brought up to date by changes, often belatedly, to meet ever-changing conditions. But, parliament is more than procedure—it is the custodian of the nation's freedom. Mr. Hogg describes it in these words:

> Parliament is not like a building designed and constructed by a single architect such as the Parthenon, St. Paul's cathedral, or the Empire State building. Parliament resembles rather an ancient family mansion which has been lived in continuously for a period of centuries, and has served the needs of those that have dwelt therein by constantly modifying and adding to its conveniences from generation to generation . . .
> To those who live in it, it is a priceless possession not to be exchanged for anything more meretricious and unified. But those who are unfamiliar with its history are sometimes apt to lose themselves in its winding corridors and to be surprised and trapped by floors built at different times and on separate levels.

That is what parliament means to me: Parliament, the protector of the people's freedom.

I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) upon his election to office. I have known him over the years, and in the earlier days of the Canadian Bar Association; and while we are separated by eighteen feet of green carpet, they do not lessen the respect I hold for him, not only personally but as the occupant of the high position he now holds.

I say, too, that in his address in this debate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) showed that he was possessed of that chivalry in public life without which parliament becomes a mere sham. I shall not fight the election over again; we shall have plenty of opportunity for that. The government has an overwhelming majority; and the responsibility of His Majesty's loyal opposition has been thereby increased and intensified. In this country we do not uphold the doctrine of a single-party state. A single-party parliament denies democracy. It inevitably leads to the dictatorship of government which tends to destroy the rights to those who do not belong to the majority.

Both in the House of Commons and in the Senate, members of the government party have overwhelming majorities. In consequence there is placed upon the opposition responsibilities which are greater than they otherwise would be. While we of His Majesty's loyal opposition should accept the overwhelming majority of the government as a condition having the approval of the people of Canada, we shall not accept it as an endorsement of everything this government chooses to bring before the House of Commons, as though it had received a mandate from the people for every measure it proposes.

We in the opposition have a responsibility to assure the people of this country that any invasions of freedom, whether the fundamental freedoms or otherwise, shall be resisted in parliament.

Some have said to me since the election that with the increase in the majority supporting the government there would be little opportunity for those of the opposition to develop their arguments. I did not believe that such would be the case. During the last few days I think it has been shown that I was right; that the members of the government realize that we of the opposition, small in numbers though we be, have a responsibility to discharge, to the end that we may preserve inviolate those rights and privileges which from time to time might be subject to attack.

It used to be said that the function of an opposition was "to propose nothing and oppose everything." That is not the view of those who have a proper appreciation of our system. Some say parliament talks too much. Parliamentary democracy can exist only where there is public discussion and debate; where public discussion is denied, freedom itself will die, and the history of other nations has shown that freedom disappears when there is no effective opposition.

We intend to support—this has been the course I have always followed—all measures which we believe to be for the general benefit of the nation. We intend to be on guard and to scrutinize every action of the government —but not, as Moncreiff has said, by "a wakeful and morbid suspiciousness", but carefully and fairly, we intend to examine all proposals that come before this House of Commons.

Governments with overwhelming majorities often make shortcuts through parliamentary procedure. They do not like to be held down by parliament. It is so much easier to pass executive orders. One of the great writers on British constitutionalism said recently that in the past twenty years the cabinets, the executives, of governments in all parts of the British commonwealth have regained almost all the powers that a cabinet had two hundred years ago. In two wars many of parliament's rights and prerogatives were abdicated. It is hard to regain them.

I think one thing the government should do at this time—I ask hon. members in all parts of the house to join me in this request—is to assure us that the course regarding orders in council adopted last year will be extended. On March 9 last the Prime Minister agreed to table from time to time all orders in council, or a summation of them. That is good so far as it goes, but it should go still further.

I should like to make a suggestion which would give an opportunity for service to the new members who have a feeling of frustration because of their inability to find anything to do. I should like to see a committee of parliament set up, that would examine delegated authority—in other words a committee on ministerial powers. At the moment I am not criticizing the principle of delegated power, but if it is carried too far it is a denial of the democratic system of government.

Delegated legislative power results from the technical nature of most legislation and the difficulties involved in legislating to meet complex conditions. In the United Kingdom it has been found necessary to set up a committee in this regard, and I should like to see a similar committee appointed by this house.

Such a committee would report to the house from time to time on all orders in council passed where there is a matter of principle in issue, and where the question of delegated power arises. Where legislative power is conferred, the committee would make the necessary criticisms of orders passed by civil servants under the powers granted by legislation enacted by parliament. Members of the house would be given an opportunity to serve. There should be no difficulty about the government having a majority in the committee. Its members would be charged with noting any breaches of parliamentary privileges and democratic rights; in fact in orders in council it would be a watchdog in the preservation of our democratic rights.

I trust that the government will set up some of the committees very soon, particularly the radio committee. It is understandable that the radio committee was not set up at the last session. Since then, however, the question of television has been dealt with by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and a question has been raised with regard to increasing the radio receiving licence fee. If I know anything of the attitude of the vast majority of the people, they will resist any increase in that fee. The whole field of radio should be examined with a view to making recommendations, in accordance with the principles upon which our national radio was set up, to the end that such improvements as are necessary may be made.

The mention of government boards brings to mind that today an order was issued by the board of transport commissioners increasing freight rates in this country. It is not for me to say that parliament should have an overriding control over a board set up by parliament, and I make no such suggestion. In the three western provinces the average level of freight rates before the 21 per cent increase was 14 per cent higher than it was in Ontario and Quebec. When the 21 per cent increase across the board was added, that discrimination against the three western provinces was increased to 16·9 per cent. A further addition of eight per cent will increase that discrimination to approximately 18·25 per cent.

I realize that increases have become necessary; you cannot keep freight rates down when costs are rising. But I do say that it is untimely to have such an increase put into effect while the Turgeon commission is sitting. Before any further increase was made there should have been recommendations for the removal of the discrimination which exists today against the three western provinces, as well as others. This is a matter on which I want to hear some of my hon. friends from Saskatchewan speak when they take part in this debate. The announced increase is in effect a continuance and intensification of discrimination which has had a damaging effect upon the building up in the western provinces of other than an agricultural economy.

There is one other committee that I should like to see the government set up. It has to do with a subject with which I am not going to deal at length, but one which is important to the future of Canada, namely, the preservation of our fundamental freedoms.

In 1947 a committee of the house sat for a considerable length of time hearing evidence on the subject of fundamental freedoms. At the end of its sessions it made a report, which in part read as follows:

> At the outset, it was apparent that at the present session only preparations could be made for a subsequent detailed study of human rights and fundamental freedoms. Consequently, your committee has invited the attorneys general of the provinces and the heads of Canadian law schools to furnish views and opinions on the question of the power of the parliament of Canada to enact a comprehensive bill of rights applicable to all Canada.

In the 1948 session the committee was again set up. It dealt in the main with an international bill of rights for the preservation of fundamental freedoms everywhere in the world. Among other things it said in its report:

> The power of the dominion parliament to enact a comprehensive bill of rights is disputed. . . .
> Clarification of the extent of the dominion's powers by reference of questions to the Supreme Court of Canada has been suggested.
> In view of the fact that decisions by the Supreme Court of Canada in individual cases would be far more satisfactory than upon a general reference in determining the powers of parliament and the legislatures, your committee gave some consideration to the question whether the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada should not be enlarged so that by leave of that court appeals would lie on questions of law in some instances in which there is now no appeal. Your committee is of opinion that the government should give consideration to such an enlargement, and so recommends.

At this session of parliament I should like to see a committee on fundamental freedoms again set up, designed to place the subject before the people of Canada and make them conscious of any invasions of freedoms that take place. I believe there should be a submission to the Supreme Court of Canada for the purpose of ascertaining the delineation between dominion and provincial jurisdiction on the enactment of a bill or declaration of rights for the maintenance and protection of fundamental freedoms in Canada.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) the recommendation of the committee to which I have referred, so that the government may give consideration to the inclusion of the right of appeal in respect of invasions or infringements of the fundamental freedoms in the amendments that are to be made to the Supreme Court Act. The committee was presided over by the predecessor of the Minister of Justice, Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley. The committee unanimously reported as follows:

> Your committee is of opinion that the government should give consideration to such an enlargement, and so recommends.

If the supreme court is to be the final court of appeal for all matters arising within our country, surely something should be done so to enlarge the powers of the supreme court as to assure the preservation of the freedoms. When one's fundamental freedoms, which everyone who lives under the British tradition has by reason of his inheritance, are interfered with, there is no right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. I suggest that the Minister of Justice give consideration to the inclusion in the Supreme Court Act of the power of appeal with leave of the court against unjust infringement and abrogation of civil liberties. Is it not a strange thing that when dollars are at stake you can appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, but when civil liberties are at stake there is no appeal to that body which the Minister of Justice said the other day would assure equality of rights everywhere in this dominion? I trust that the minister will, even if opposed to a national bill of rights, while accepting the need of an international bill of rights, at least give accord to those whose rights and fundamental liberties have been invaded, the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

I pass now to one other matter, and then I shall have finished. This session will be known as the constitutional session. There seems to be great haste in providing for all kinds of changes in the constitution. Let me read from the speech from the throne:

> You will be asked at the present session to approve measures designed to facilitate the attainment of the constitutional limits of our nationhood.

We have not been denied that right at any time within a period of thirty or forty years.

> You will also be asked to approve addresses praying the parliament of the United Kingdom to vest in the parliament of Canada the right to amend the constitution of Canada in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces nor affecting the constitutional rights and privileges of the provinces or existing rights and privileges with respect to education or the use of the English and French languages.

I do not quite understand that, Mr. Speaker. We are to secure absolute autonomy; we are to assert our independence. How are we to do it? By bifurcated methods of amendment. At this session we are to pass an address to the imperial parliament on certain matters. In other words we are to ask the imperial parliament for the power to amend our own constitution on matters in respect to which the provinces have never been consulted during the years.

As to other subjects the address reads:

> My ministers will seek to arrange for early consultation with the provincial governments with a view to agreeing upon an appropriate procedure for making within Canada such other amendments to the constitution as may from time to time be required.

Are we to be half autonomous, or half independent, Mr. Speaker, when these things are done? We are going to assert by an address to the crown the right to amend our constitution in Canada as to certain sections of the B.N.A. Act about which there is no dispute whatever. Then we are going to consult with the provinces about the other sections. Why all the haste to become half autonomous and independent? There is no question of disputed jurisdiction as between the federal and provincial governments. No question of economic or social security is involved in what is to be done at this session. It is a step, and it is a step that will be meaningless, unless, as a result of the conference, the provinces agree to the procedure for all other amendments to the constitution being made by the Canadian parliament.

I am not going into the particulars of the past, but the records since 1935 show—the Minister of Justice smiles, because he has read them—that never has it been possible, either in the committee of parliament which was set up in 1935 or in the dominion-provincial conference of 1936, to arrive at any common denominator which would permit amendments so far as the rights are concerned in respect of which this consultation with the provinces is to be had. In 1935 a committee met for some time. Most of the provinces would not make any representations. The committee reported as follows:

> The committee recognizes the urgent necessity for prompt consideration of amendments to the British North America Act with reference to a redistribution of legislative power and to clarify the field of taxation.

The report continues:

> The committee is of the opinion that before any decision upon the subject matter of the resolution is finally made, the opinions of the provinces should be obtained otherwise if at all possible, and for that reason recommends that a dominion-provincial conference be held as early as possible in the present year to study the subject matter of the resolution.

Well, the conference met, but nothing was decided. The reason for this was that political considerations, and extraneous matters, entered the discussions. The Minister of Justice is going to call a conference of the provinces. Surely he would defer to the advice of Mr. Mackenzie King with regard to the possible success of such a conference.

Mr. Garson: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he opposed to consulting the provinces on these matters?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad that my hon. friend has learned that consultation with the provinces is necessary if the unity of this country is to be preserved. He did not know that last year.

Mr. Garson: Last year I was premier of Manitoba.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, Mr. Speaker, we are arriving now at something. My hon. friend's opinion in respect to the constitution depends upon where he is located at the time.

I suggest that instead of a dominion-provincial conference, there should be convened a constitutional convention, representative of all the provinces of Canada and of all shades of political thought in all the provinces of Canada. It should not be a meeting of the political heads of provincial governments and attorneys general, but representatives of the body of the Canadian people from every province and every political party. A similar suggestion was made in 1937 by a former prime minister, a great prime minister of Canada and an authority on the constitution, Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. The Minister of Justice laughs at that observation, but he was a great lawyer and a great Canadian, irrespective of his views.

Mr. Pouliot: You are a greater orator than Mr. Bennett ever was.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) will no doubt accept Mr. Mackenzie King as an authority.

Mr. Pouliot: He was not a practising lawyer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I shall not enter into a controversy on that subject, but he certainly was a constitutionalist. This is what he said on January 26, 1937, as recorded on page 281 of Hansard. He talks about amendments to the constitution and the manner of going about it. He had had experience with interprovincial conferences. He said:

> One is the suggestion of my right hon. friend that the question should be considered by a constitutional conference, composed, as he has suggested, of members of the dominion parliament and the provincial legislatures, such membership to be representatives of all shades of political thought. I believe that method might be described as the ideal one.

To the Minister of Justice and the government I submit views of two former prime ministers. This is a problem that is not being faced in the speech from the throne. We are securing autonomy to do something that is not denied. We are dividing up the constitution and allowing the government of Canada to determine what affects the provinces and what affects the dominion. In my opinion we shall never secure those amendments, which I believe are so necessary to meet changing conditions while preserving and protecting minority rights in this country, by taking the uncertain steps designated in the speech from the throne. I suggest that something be done along the lines suggested by Mr. Bennett and Mr. King, to the end that this problem be faced and that we may come to a decision which will be accepted unanimously in this country—a decision not dictated by the whims of the government of Canada, but arrived at as a result of wholehearted co-operation among all the provinces making up this confederation.

I come back, sir, to the point at which I started. This parliament has an appointment with destiny. We are not going to revive the recriminations and prejudices that characterized the election campaign. We in this parliament have a responsibility which transcends all others, that of preserving, maintaining and extending the boundaries of freedom. To that end, sir, I have suggested a committee on a national declaration or a bill of rights, in keeping with the international responsibilities we assumed a few months ago under the United Nations. We should assure to the individual in this country his right of appeal, when his freedoms or constitutional rights are invaded, to the supreme court which, after this session, if the government's proposal receives the support of the house, will be the highest court of appeal so far as Canada is concerned.

When amending the Supreme Court Act, I ask parliament to give to the man and to the woman, however humble they may be, wherever they may be, the constitutional right to carry their appeal to the foot of the throne when and if their constitutional freedoms are in any way interfered with. On the question of the amendment of our Canadian constitution, let us not proceed in a manner that can only arouse animosities. Let us endeavour to bring together in a constitutional convention men and women from all the legislatures of this dominion, no matter what their party may be, so that they may together in unity rebuild where necessary and desirable this country's constitutional foundations, while maintaining and assuring as fundamental and inviolable the minority rights of all our people under the British North America Act.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): In rising to speak in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I wish first to extend my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address, the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing). In doing so I am not going through some mere formality or simply extending courtesy. I am expressing sincerely my appreciation of effort and ability when I see it demonstrated in this House of Commons.

I should also like to join with others in extending a welcome to the members from Newfoundland who now sit in this parliament. I know their stay here will be to the benefit of Canada and to the advantage of the province in which they live.

I am going to make a few brief remarks with regard to the speech from the throne, before proceeding to a subject that I wished to pursue last session but was unable to do so because of its short duration. First of all, let me say that I endorse wholeheartedly the approach of and the statements made by the leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), when he spoke in this debate some days ago. I am pleased to note that the question of amendment of the constitution is being considered by the government, and that the government is attempting, with the provinces, to work out some convenient procedure by which that may be done here from time to time when necessary. I am of the opinion that such a move will meet with the support of the majority of the Canadian people.

I am also glad to notice that at last the government has officially, and in this parliament, recognized the seriousness of the housing situation. I listened with attention to the minister's statement yesterday, but until I hear further details and further explanations I shall not comment further on it. I trust that this government will not submit to pressure from certain groups for the abolition of domestic rent control. I have received letters from many types of organizations expressing great concern over this matter. Thousands of Canadians are anxious about this question, because they realize the inconvenience under which they would be placed should rent control be abolished now. I have received communications from trade unions, Legion branches, women's organizations, women's institutes and other groups interested in the cost of living and the cost of rent; and, as I say, I hope the government will not give way to the strong pressure that is being exercised from some directions for the abolition of rent control.

I am pleased to note that it is the intention of the government to proceed with assistance to the provinces in connection with the building of a trans-Canada highway. I am sure many people and many organizations throughout Canada will welcome this step. I presume that the government's action in this regard has been influenced to a great extent by the strong demand for some action that has grown throughout the country in recent years.

As one who represents many constituents who are particularly interested in forest conservation, I particularly welcome the reference to a measure being brought forward in this house with respect to forest conservation. While we have heard a great deal concerning the devaluation of the dollar, I think the most serious devaluation the Canadian people have ever suffered to date is the devaluation of their natural resources owing to the lack of an over-all conservation policy.

With these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, I wish now to proceed to a subject in which I am personally interested, and one which interests many of my constituents. I wish to take the opportunity presented by this debate to bring to the attention of the house a matter which interests not only the people of my constituency but the people of British Columbia generally, and should interest all Canadians who have at heart the development of the country as a whole. Before proceeding further, for the information of the new members I should like to refer them to a speech which was made in this house. I do so not because I happen to have made the speech, but rather because it contains factual information concerning a large area of British Columbia, namely the Columbia river basin. If they are interested in this subject, and I trust that they are, I refer them to a speech I made in this house on February 21 and 22 of this year, dealing with the development of natural resources in the Columbia river basin, which is the drainage basin of the Columbia river system within Canada.

Since Thompson descended the Columbia in 1911, it has become rich in history and rich in romance, and day by day it is becoming richer in possibilities for development. I am sorry if this afternoon, in order to support my argument, I am obliged to quote somewhat extensively, but I intend to do so in order to give some proof of its validity.

First I wish to quote Professor William Denison Lyman, professor of history in Whitman college, Walla Walla, Washington, who wrote an excellent book on the history and the possibilities for development of the Columbia river system. This is what he had to say:

> . . . Although not half as long as the Mississippi, the Columbia equals it in volume. Well joined, in truth, are the sublime river and sublime mountains. One cannot fully understand the river unless he has seen its cradle and the cradle of its affluents beneath the shadows of the great peaks of British Columbia.

I want to review briefly the development of navigation in order to illustrate the importance of navigation in the past and in the future to the residents of the Columbia river basin, both in the United States and in the Canadian section.

The use of Hudson's Bay Company bateaux as one form of navigation on the Columbia commenced, generally speaking, in 1814, when the Columbia Express was organized to carry furs from Fort Astoria to Boat Encampment on the Columbia river north of Revelstoke. All fur was transported from here over Athabasca pass to Edmonton, Edmonton to Churchill and Churchill to London.

Hon. members will be interested to know that in those early days the Hudson's Bay Company took out of the Columbia river basin approximately $20 thousand worth of furs a year. The Columbia river basin and its developments should be of interest to Canadians of French descent, because many Canadians of French descent played a great part in the development of the fur trade and in the development of the lumber industry. Some of their descendants live in the district today. While this development was proceeding on the Columbia river in connection with the fur trade carried on by the Hudson's Bay Company, there was a discussion between Great Britain and the government of the United States concerning the international boundary. That was known as the Oregon boundary question. After a great deal of discussion between both governments, and at one point it almost seemed as if war was imminent, the Oregon boundary treaty was signed on June 15, 1846. This district was still slowly developing when we had the advent of steam navigation. Steam navigation commenced on the lower Columbia about 1850 and after a few years the Oregon Steam Navigation Company was formed. In reading the history of this company at one time I found that such was its development that greater profits were made in comparison with capital expended than had been made in any western American developments to that date.

On the Canadian section of the river steam navigation commenced about twenty years later. Small steamers proceeded from south of the line carrying miners and prospectors to north of Revelstoke. The Kootenay Steam Navigation Company was organized under charter in 1890, and commenced to build a fleet of stern-wheel steamers. This fleet was purchased in 1896 by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and this company increased the number of steamers by building some larger ones and improving other ships. For some years, up until about 1925, they carried on a very fine service on the Arrow lakes, which are an extension of the Columbia river, and on the Kootenay lakes, to the profit of the Canadian Pacific Railway, according to the minutes of the directors' meetings of the C.P.R. of those days.

This service declined after the building of the Kettle valley railway, because then it was possible for people from the interior of British Columbia to proceed to the coast via that route. I would recommend to any hon. member who has not been out to British Columbia that he go to Revelstoke and take a steamer trip south on the Arrow lakes and then proceed to Vancouver over the Kettle Valley railway. If he does so I am sure he will enjoy one of the finest inland trips in Canada. In that connection I want to quote Professor Lyman as follows:

> The journey down the Arrow lakes from Arrowhead to Robson is one to dream of, one to recall in waking hours, and even, we almost suspect, in another life. The two lakes together constitute 130 miles of steamboating, and every mile has its special charm.

Then later came the development of navigation on the upper Columbia. The late Captain Armstrong, whom I knew very well, built and operated the North Star, the Gwendoline and the Ruth. Owing to the expansion of the district he informed me himself that on a few occasions he grossed over $2,000 a trip in his operations on the upper Columbia.

I want to deal briefly with the possibilities of navigation on the Columbia. The United States government has given serious consideration to this question; our government has not studied it to the same extent. As my authority for the possibilities on the Columbia, I am merely going to quote Professor Lyman's book. This is what he had to say in 1909:

> When improvements now in view by government are completed, our river will be one of the most superb steamer courses in the world. That may truthfully be said already of the 220 miles from The Dalles to the ocean, as well as of the 300 miles from Kettle Falls, Washington, to Death Rapids, British Columbia.

That is north of Revelstoke. I continue:

> The government engineers in Senate document 344, February, 1890, name the amount of navigable water on the Columbia and its tributaries at 1,664 miles. This may, perhaps, be an underestimation, since President Roosevelt has recently referred to it as twenty-five hundred miles, in which he probably included the lakes.
> It will be a great day for the historic and scenic river of the west when some magnificent excursion steamer descends the thousand miles from Revelstoke to the outer headlands. And with canals at Celilo, Priest Rapids, and Kettle Falls, with some improvements at minor points, at no immoderate expense, the thing can be done.

Then I go on to quote Professor Lyman after his investigation of the upper Columbia:

> Inspection of a map will show that the Columbia possesses the only water level route from the vast productive regions of the inland empire to the seaboard. As has been shown in the course of this volume, the river is navigable throughout the larger part of its course from Revelstoke in British Columbia to the ocean. In that distance there is one canal, with locks. That is at the Cascades, sixty-five miles from Portland. Before the river can be continuously navigable it will be necessary that a canal be constructed to overcome the obstructions at the Dalles, a few miles above the city of that name, another at Priest Rapids, seventy miles above Pasco, and still another at Kettle Falls.

[Mr. Herridge.]

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, engineers of the dominion government, after an extensive survey of the upper Columbia river in 1914, found that navigation was quite feasible and practicable at considerable cost. I also recall, Mr. Speaker, listening as a boy to the discussions concerning the possibilities of hauling lumber, pulp and other forest products of the Columbia basin from Revelstoke to the sea, and also the possibility of transporting grain from Revelstoke to the sea. At that time navigation in the upper Columbia and the Arrow lakes section played a greater part than it does today. That was previous to the building of dams for power development in the United States section.

In order to indicate the value of river transportation even at the present time, which in our opinion has been greatly overlooked by this government, I wish to quote from the "Columbia Basin Joint Investigations River Transportation, Problem 21, United States, Department of the Interior, Bureau of Reclamation, 1945." This is the result of an investigation to see what could be done in the further development of the lower Columbia in the United States for transportation purposes. In brief, this is what the report has to say in summing up:

> The savings, which will accrue to the settlers and industrialists of the Columbia basin project by use of Columbia river transportation channels in the development and operation of the project, are a measure of the significance to the area of that river as a commercial route. These savings are computed on present rates for rail haul, and a probable future water rate, which it is estimated will prevail upon completion of the projects proposed for the Columbia river. Although the spread between rail and water rates may be less in the future, it is believed that rail rate reductions will result mainly from increased use of the river as an artery of transportation. Therefore, the estimated annual savings of $732 thousand represent the value of the improved river to the project area.

I have given these quotations to illustrate the importance of navigation on the Columbia today so far as the United States section of the Columbia is concerned, and how important it really is to us on the Canadian side.

I shall now deal with the point which I wish to bring before the house this afternoon. I refer to article II of the Oregon treaty which was signed on June 15, 1846:

> From the point at which the 49th parallel of north latitude shall be found to intersect the great northern branch of the Columbia river, the navigation of the said branch shall be free and open to the Hudson's Bay Company, and to all British subjects trading with the same, to the point where the main stream of the Columbia, and thence down the said main stream to the ocean, with free access into and through the said river or rivers; it being understood, that all the usual portages along the line thus described, shall in like manner be free and open.

In navigating the said river or rivers, British subjects, with their goods and produce, shall be treated on the same footing as citizens of the United States; it being, however, always understood, that nothing in this article shall be construed as preventing, or intended to prevent, the government of the United States from making any regulations, respecting the navigation of the said river or rivers, not inconsistent with the present treaty.

Then further, Mr. Speaker, to indicate just how important navigation was considered at that time, and how important the right given to us under article II was considered by the government of the United States and by the public of Great Britain, I should like to quote from a senate speech in the United States, and also from the London Times of 1846.

Senator Lewis Cass of the United States senate said in 1846, with respect to the terms of the Oregon treaty—and he is objecting to the signing of the treaty, in the belief that the United States got the worst of the bargain:

We grant the free navigation of the Columbia south of 49 degree indefinitely, or in other words forever. The stipulation reads thus: "From the point at which the 49th parallel shall be found to intersect the great northern branch of the Columbia river, the navigation of the said branch shall be free and open to the Hudson's Bay Company and to all British subjects trading with the same, to the point where the said branch meets the main stream of the Columbia, and thence down the said main stream to the ocean," et cetera.

Here, sir, is a grant of free navigation, limited indeed in its use, but unlimited in its duration. It is to endure as long as the Hudson's Bay Company shall endure, and to ascertain the longevity of the one we must seek to ascertain the longevity of the other.

The Hudson's Bay Company was incorporated by Charles the Second, by a charter dated May 2, 1671. The third section of that charter provides, that "The persons named, et cetera, shall be one body, corporate and politic, et cetera, in deed and in name, et cetera, really and fully forever, et cetera. And the twelfth section provides, that the corporation shall enjoy et cetera, all and singular the premises hereby granted, with their and every of their rights, members, and jurisdiction, prerogatives, royalties and appurtenances whatsoever, to the, et cetera, and their successors forever, et cetera, paying yearly to us for the same, two elks and two black beaver, whosoever et cetera we our heirs et cetera shall happen to enter into the said country, et cetera.

Thus we find the corporate life perpetual; and applying the charter to the treaty, we have the true measure of the obligation, which this stipulation will impose upon us. No one in this body will deny that the grant is without limitation, and will exist as long as the grantee exists, unless there are restraining circumstances, which will reduce this broad term forever within narrower limits."

No objection was raised to that point in the United States senate. It was recognized at that time that this right of navigation to Canadian citizens from the upper reaches of the Columbia to the sea was granted forever.

I wish to quote from an editorial in the London Times of 1846, written in an attempt to pacify and mollify British opinion, which was somewhat aroused owing to the loss of the Oregon territory through the signing of the treaty. This is what the London Times had to say:

This would be a concession as far as superficial area of ground is concerned. It would leave the United States master of the greater part of Oregon. But it would secure the principal advantage of the country, the free navigation of the Columbia to the servants of the Hudson's Bay Company, as well as harbourage, anchorage, and settlements for English vessels trading with China and our possessions in Australia and New Zealand forever.

There we note the Times wishes to pacify British public opinion by pointing out that although they have lost a certain area of land they have retained forever this right to navigate the Columbia from its source to the sea, through United States territory.

What is the position at the present time? We know that in recent years there have been power developments on the Columbia river. Dams have been constructed, and it is proposed to construct others. The development of the water resources of the main stem of the river in the United States is planned by means of ten dams, three of which—Grand Coulee, Rock Island and Bonneville—are in operation; one, McNary, is under construction; one, Chief Joseph, is authorized by congress; three—Priest Rapids, John Day and The Dalles—are being recommended for authorization at the present session of congress, while the remaining two are potential projects with respect to which plans have not been finalized.

The building of the Grand Coulee dam affected our access to the sea, and that is the one with which I wish to deal at the present time. It is the one which prevents navigation from Canadian territory to the sea. Americans are developing navigation of the river from the sea to Grand Coulee. Deep-sea vessels come some distance up the river; then river craft are used for carrying the natural resources of that area to the sea. The building of the Grand Coulee without locks has prevented navigation to the sea.

Construction of the Grand Coulee dam, 151 miles downstream from the international boundary, was initiated in 1933 by the United States government and the dam was substantially completed late in 1941. This structure, which rises 550 feet from the bottom of the river, was built for irrigation and power purposes. The operating head on the power plants is 348 feet and provision is made for a total installation of 1,944,000 kilowatts, of which 972,000 kilowatts are in operation. Installations under way will provide additional blocks of 324,000 kilowatts in each of the years 1949, 1950, and 1951. Neither navigation locks nor fishways are provided, but provision is made for transferring salmon from the downstream side of the dam to tributary waters in the United States.

Now, it appears that, regardless of article II of the Oregon treaty, no representations of any kind whatsoever were made by any Canadian government to the government of the United States to protect Canadian interests. In this connection I wish to refer to Hansard of June 13, 1935. This matter was first mentioned in the house by the former member of New Westminster, Mr. Thomas Reid, who took a great interest in it because of his general interest in the Pacific salmon fisheries. He has always been interested in wanting to find out the effect of the building of dams, the damming of waters, on the spawning of fish, so far as the salmon industry is concerned.

I would ask the house to bear with me while I quote from page 3590 of Hansard, June 13, 1935:

Navigation of Columbia River

Mr. Reid: "According to a treaty entered into in 1846 between the United States of America and Her Majesty on behalf of Canada for the settlement of the Oregon boundary, in clause 2 thereof, it was expressly agreed that the Columbia river and its branches were to be kept open for the free use and navigation of all British subjects from the 49th parallel of north latitude to the Pacific ocean,—

1. Is the government aware that the provisions of this clause have been violated?

2. If so, what steps have been taken to protect the interests of the Canadian people so as to keep inviolate the provisions of the treaty and particularly clause 2 of the agreement?

3. If not, will steps be taken to see that the terms of the treaty are lived up to in every particular?"

Mr. Bennett: The question does not quite correctly state the terms of the treaty of 1846 for the settlement of the Oregon boundary. The second clause of the treaty reads as follows:

"From the point at which the 49th parallel of north latitude shall be found to intersect the great northern branch of the Columbia river, the navigation of the said branch shall be free and open to the Hudson's Bay Company, and to all British subjects trading with the same, to the point where the said branch meets the main stream of the Columbia, and thence down the said main stream to the ocean, with free access into and through the said river or rivers; it being understood, that all the usual portages along the line thus described, shall in like manner be free and open."

The government is fully aware of the development which is taking place in the lower Columbia river, in the United States of America, and of the possible relation of that development to article II of the treaty. It would not be in accordance with public policy for the government to state at this stage whether or not they are of the opinion that the treaty has been violated or may be violated by the completion of the construction plans which are under way. The question will continue to receive the attention of the government.

Although Mr. Bennett replied in that manner at that time I do not think any one can find evidence that the Conservative government headed by Mr. Bennett of that day or the Liberal government since, has made any representations to the United States in respect to the violation of article II of the Oregon treaty and with respect to Canadian interests and rights.

The objections to the effects of the dam are two. There is interference with the salmon coming up to the upper reaches of the Columbia for spawning purposes, and there is interference with navigation to the sea. I realize that the direction of development has changed since early days, even since 1914, when there was considerable discussion concerning navigation on the Columbia; but I do not think that, in view of the fact that we surrendered a right which had been extended to us forever in article II of the Oregon treaty, the government of Canada should have attempted to protect our rights and to obtain some reasonable compensation.

I submit that all governments of Canada have failed to realize the immense developments that are possible in the Columbia river basin on the Canadian side of the boundary. In the past they have failed to give attention to the potential value of that rich and productive area. A satisfactory development of the Columbia river basin depends upon joint action by the governments of the United States and Canada. I am quite certain that if the government of this country approached the government of the United States our claims would receive reasonable consideration. I know personally that officials of certain departments of the United States government were quite surprised when no protest was made by the Canadian government about the violation of the Oregon treaty and the interference with fish coming up to the upper reaches of the Columbia.

This matter is important to the constituency which I represent, and to the surrounding constituencies, as well as to the people of British Columbia and the Canadian people generally. I submit that under the circumstances we are fully justified in making a claim for adequate compensation for the surrender of those rights.

The residents of my constituency are much concerned about the continuance and improvement of steamship service on the Arrow and Kootenay lakes. We realize that for many years the Canadian Pacific Railway operated a splendid service on these and other interior lakes, but since the building of the new lines traffic has lessened and the service has gone downhill because it is being operated at a considerable loss. In view of this situation with regard to the Oregon treaty, the loss of our right of navigation and other rights, I should like to make two or three suggestions.

I urge the government to bring this matter to the attention of the United States government where I am sure it will receive favourable consideration. If adequate compensation is obtained for the loss of the right granted to us forever in article II of the Oregon treaty, I suggest that it would be fitting indeed if that compensation were used to subsidize a further development of the steamship service on the Arrow and Kootenay lakes.

While it may be argued that I am somewhat local in my point of view, I think it must be admitted that this steamship service on the Arrow and Kootenay lakes and on other lakes in the interior of British Columbia constitutes a great tourist asset. As Canadians we would be making a great mistake if we permitted this service to lapse. Not only is it of value to the people there in making their living; it is of great value to the people of British Columbia and Canada generally as an unusual tourist attraction.

Finally, in order that the British Columbia point of view may be considered with complete knowledge and understanding as a result of direct contact with the people of British Columbia and a knowledge of British Columbia conditions, I urge again that the government consider appointing a qualified British Columbia resident to the joint international commission.

Mr. J. I. Hetland (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, being a new member I hope that you will bear with me if at times I get out of order. I am a westerner from Saskatchewan, one of those fourteen members, and as such I am greatly interested in agriculture. Before I go any further I should like to say that we in Saskatchewan were greatly concerned about the health of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). During the time he was in hospital I was amazed at the number of people who came to me from all parts of my constituency and expressed great concern about the minister's health. The agriculturists of this country know that they have a champion in the person of the minister. Before June 27 a number of people from the different parties came to me and said that they were quite satisfied with the way the Minister of Agriculture had handled our produce and our agreements in the years past. Because those views were held they voted for me accordingly and I am here today.

I am glad that I won and I think that is natural for any one who tries to win a race or any contest. I have always been interested in the east and I think the west should become better acquainted with it. We in the west certainly need the east and I think you in the east need the west. I think it would be a good thing if we could meet more often with people from the east. I have as deskmate the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Cauchon), and if the other eastern members are like him at all I think we shall get on very nicely.

We have made a study of your problems in the east, particularly those of Newfoundland and the maritimes, and I think you should also study our problems, because that is the only method by which they can be solved to our mutual advantage.

I do not live very far from Saskatoon. We have a forestry farm near there, and it is a beautiful little spot. Thousands of people visit it every year. It has been suggested that a paved road be constructed to that forestry farm in order to keep down the dust. There is nothing more discouraging to a superintendent than to see fine grey dust settling on his flowers, his lawns and his trees. It takes a lot of moisture to keep them in good shape. I should like to offer a suggestion. If we cannot get a paved road, which naturally costs quite a lot of money, there is a great deal of oil in the constituency of the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater), and I believe the government should consider oiling these gravel roads. The cost would be small. With a certain amount of money they could cover quite a large area. That would serve my purpose. I think we would attract more people by hundreds to that very beautiful spot.

It has also been suggested that little cards be printed for use when crossing the boundary. I happened to pass through Kingsgate about six weeks ago. I drove up to the customs office. A lady came out and said, "You will either have to eat those peaches or destroy them." Because of that, the ladies in my party ate too many peaches, and they were quite incensed. Therefore I believe the idea of printing little cards is a good one, telling about the danger of bringing in fruit diseases into this country.

I have been sitting in the house for the last week, and have been quite amused at the way some of the backbenchers get after the government. They remind me somewhat of backseat drivers. You know what that means. If a backseat driver keeps pushing and prodding the driver he can be almost a menace. When I say that, I refer to some members, not all. I should like to point out to those members that in the driver's seat we have a man quite capable of driving, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), a man who has good judgment. He will not break any speed laws. He will keep within the speed limit.

Mr. Knowles: He is not in that much of a hurry.

Mr. Hetland: We will get there safely and at the same time our car will be in good shape, which is very important.

Because I am a Liberal I believe in the Liberal government, and in the next four years I look forward to great things; I look forward to the future with pleasure and confidence.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had, and I should like to embrace it, to extend to you my very hearty and sincere congratulations on your election to the high office that you hold.

It is in no perfunctory sense that I likewise extend very cordial congratulations to the mover (Mr. Boisvert) and the seconder (Mr. Laing) of the address which is now under debate. The hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert), in moving the address, made certain remarks in which I took particular interest. At page 15 of Hansard he said:

> The French spoken in Quebec is not the fancy French spoken by the Parisian. It is the old French of the seventeenth century, which we jealously safeguard, knowing that from the standpoint of basic French it compares with Parisian speech.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I sometimes feel the urge to deliver speeches here in the French language. I do not know if the French I use is invariably the seventeenth century idiom as also spoken by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert).

As a matter of fact, in the course of his visit to my riding during the recent election campaign the representative for Quebec South (Mr. Power) referred to the French I use in this house as "the Sorbonne-Oxford brand of French spoken by the hon. member for Eglinton". I am not very sure but it is quite possible that my French is simply Toronto French.

Now, Mr. Speaker, every time I make a French speech in the house, I do so as evidence of my sympathy with my French-speaking fellow citizens. That is my modest personal contribution to national unity and to the mutual respect felt by the two great races that have built our beloved Canada.

(Text):

I should also like to extend a special and very warm expression of congratulations to the Prime Minister. One would not wish to subtract anything from his triumph, which has been fully recognized in all parts of this house. There is one aspect of that triumph to which I should like to make special reference because I think it is a matter of direct interest to all members of the house. It is certainly something that I am sure is of direct interest to all Canadians. In the political success which the Prime Minister has enjoyed, and which has been crowned so effectively by the Canadian electorate, I think the name of Madame St. Laurent is deserving of very special and grateful mention on the part of us all because of the very gracious and very great contribution which she has made to her husband's career. As one who counts himself honoured to be acquainted with the members of the Prime Minister's family, I want to say to him that in this country, whose greatness after all depends upon the strength of the Canadian home, his family has been a great credit to him, and as the head of that family he has been a model of the Canadian father and husband. It is worthy of mention also that the leader of the opposition and leaders of the other parties in this house can be congratulated upon the same score. I think that is a matter for pride on the part of the Canadian people and on the part of this Canadian House of Commons.

I do not propose today to discuss at length the terms of the speech from the throne. So far as it is indicated in that speech that measures are to be introduced at a later date, they can best be discusssd when the full measures are before us. I believe I shall make a contribution towards shortening the debate if I confine my remarks to several subjects on which direct action appears not to be contemplated and to one upon which action is contemplated in the speech from the throne.

In this country we congratulate ourselves, Mr. Speaker, on the improvement that has occurred in external relations during the past year. It is not quite a year ago that I had the privilege of traversing most of the countries of western Europe and of seeing there the beginning of the recession of communist influence. In a large measure this has been due to the show of united strength and determination on the part of the United Kingdom and the United States to stand up to Russian aggression. It has been due also to the generous assistance rendered by the United States to those countries west of the iron curtain. Marshall aid has performed an invaluable service in the recovery of those western nations and in their determination to resist any further westward march of communist aggression.

We have been taught one lesson, Mr. Speaker, and taught it clearly and emphatically. It is that those who direct communist aggression in the world today do respect strength. They respect determination; that has been abundantly shown. The Atlantic pact has already borne useful fruit. Now that it has been followed by the decision of the United States congress to aid in the rearmament of Europe we may look forward with a measure of confidence to the restoration of better conditions, and to the checking of further communist designs in the west. Unhappily the same cannot be said of conditions in the far east. At any rate, the determination of the western nations to mass their strength to resist aggression has borne fruit and we applaud the results of the Atlantic pact.

Since this increased security and peacefulness have been enjoyed in the western world, peace seems to have permeated the atmosphere in this chamber. Since the opening of the session all has been peace, all has been tranquil. It is difficult for those of us who sat in the last house to adjust ourselves to this placid atmosphere. It may be that, in the past, it has not been my part always to contribute to the placidity of the debates in the house, but at this point I wish to say that I do not wish to subtract anything from the high plane on which my leader opened the debate on Monday.

I turn to the subject of trade, which is recognized as one of vast importance to all Canadians. The average Canadian has a greater interest in international trade than the citizen of any other country in the world. We have been through a crisis, and it is still with us. It is a crisis in trade, Mr. Speaker. The timing of the crisis, I am afraid, was one of the things that may have guided the government in the selection of June 27 as the election date. I am not going to go back to review election issues, I want to make that clear. They are all water under the bridge now, but I do consider it the duty of members of this house to take cognizance of events that have transpired since the election.

The last reference to the subject of trade prior to dissolution in this house was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) on April 25 and is recorded at page 2520 of Hansard. In reply to a question he said this:

> The present state of our markets in the United Kingdom is quite normal.

He went on to say that his forthcoming trip to the United Kingdom was simply for the purpose of taking part in the opening of the British industries fair, not for any reason having to do with a changed situation in respect of British trade. We have his statement that trade with Britain was normal. You will realize with what surprise, then, just three weeks later in Toronto, I heard from the Right Hon. Harold Wilson, the president of the British board of trade, these words:

> We have reached a critical situation in Anglo-Canadian trade.

Those are the words of the opposite number of the Canadian Minister of Trade and Commerce just three weeks after the minister's remarks in this house. Of course, Mr. Wilson was right. There was a crisis in Anglo-Canadian trade but the crisis was not admitted by this government until after the fateful day of June 27.

Our exports to the United Kingdom last year as compared with the previous year dropped by $67 million. During the first seven months of this year our exports to the United Kingdom have undergone a further reduction. But reductions more grave than these in their portent were announced on July 14 by the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he stated that Britain had found it necessary to reduce her spending in United States and Canada by $400 million during the current fiscal year. Imports of tobacco, cotton, timber, paper and pulp, non-ferrous metals, steel, copper, raw materials, machinery, manufactured goods and sugar would be affected. An official of the Department of Trade and Commerce, speaking to the press in Ottawa, is quoted in the press on July 15 as saying this:

> He estimated on the basis of Sir Stafford Cripps' announcement in London cutting the United Kingdom's 1949 dollar purchases by 25 per cent, Canada would lose by sixty to eighty million dollars this year. "If the slashes continue, then next year—1950—will be the crucial year," the official said. A continued 25 per cent cut next year in Canadian exports to the United Kingdom would mean the loss of more than $100 million.

That is full of the gravest portent for Canada and particularly for the Canadian primary producer. The disastrous effects of that decision cannot be overestimated in this country.

We must remember to what extent ERP has continued to maintain our exports to Great Britain. Up to July 31 the United States had appropriated through ERP for the purchase of commodities in Canada $785 million. The $785 million allotted to Canada represented 38 per cent of the total offshore authorizations made by ERP. Shipments to the United Kingdom up to that time had amounted to $648 million.

The continuance of ERP means so much to the economy of this country. When the Canadian Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) went to the United States recently to participate in the Washington discussions, I am sure it was a matter of great satisfaction to all Canadians that he returned with a tentative assurance that the United States would be prepared to appropriate $175 million for the continued purchase by Great Britain of Canadian foodstuffs, particularly our wheat.

I do not wish to leave this subject without emphasizing this, that the events which have occurred since this house was last in session on April 30 have abundantly justified and vindicated what we in this part of the house said then in warning of an approaching crisis in Canadian trade.

Devaluation, Mr. Speaker, is not the whole answer to the problem. If Great Britain's purchases from Canada continue to be seriously reduced as is now threatened, regardless of whether devaluation had or had not occurred, we would still face a critical situation. However, devaluation has occurred and the purchasing power of the pound in the Canadian market has been reduced. The pound is now worth only $3.07 in the Canadian market whereas formerly it has been quoted at $4.03.

This afternoon I marvelled at the jaunty air of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) when asked a question about the effect of this reduction in the purchasing power of the pound in Canada on British purchases from Canada, particularly our foodstuffs and raw materials, when he shrugged it off and said that that is making an assumption, as much as to say: "Well, who can say that it does mean any reduction in British purchases in Canada?" Does any serious person think that the reduction in the purchasing power of the pound in the Canadian market will not be reflected in reduced purchases of Canadian goods?

Mr. McIlraith: That is not the assumption that was in the question.

Mr. Fleming: That is the implication that was in the question, if the hon. member will have regard to the question.

Mr. McIlraith: I have. I have read it carefully and accurately.

Mr. Fleming: Then I am sorry that the hon. member has not more intelligently interpreted the question, because the whole purpose of it was to invite the Minister of Trade and Commerce to indicate what steps, if any, the government might have in mind in view of the fact that we are being faced with a reduced purchasing power of the British pound in the Canadian market.

This matter of the ten cent devaluation of the Canadian dollar is no final solution of our problem here. It is only an incident and nothing more. As a matter of fact, our own Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), on arrival in England on July 19, was asked about the possibility of cuts in the value of the Canadian dollar. As reported in a Canadian press dispatch from London, he said:

> I do not think dollar cuts are a sure cure for anything. There has to be a positive solution.

Sir Stafford Cripps on June 7 made this statement at Blackpool:

> You cannot possibly find any solution to our present problems by juggling with money, incomes or finances or fiscal measures.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Those are words with which I think no one can take issue. This is not a solution. As a matter of fact, everything that was wrong before in our exchange relationships continues fundamentally, because the rigidity is there, as is the artificiality and the attempt by government to manage trading relationships. Those things are all there. We have made no step whatever toward the restoration of convertibility, and convertibility must be our goal. We may not be able to achieve that goal today or next week, but our efforts—and Canada has a mighty stake here—must be directed towards achieving the convertibility of exchange. We shall not achieve that end simply by trying to retain all this artificiality in our exchange relationships, all these attempts by government to master-mind the whole of our exchange relationships. We have seen that it just does not work. Britain tried it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has tried it and he has failed. Surely we have seen that nowhere in the world in any government are there minds big enough to be able to master-mind the trading and exchange relations of the world.

Before I leave this subject of devaluation, Mr. Speaker, may I say that it is quite apparent that we are to be faced with more restrictions on trade. We have had an intimation of that already from the Minister of Trade and Commerce in a statement he made on July 13 in which he indicated that more import restrictions on United States goods might be expected. We have had it also in a recent statement made by the Canadian high commissioner, Mr. Dana Wilgress, at the conference that is taking place at Annecy.

There are two matters that I just wish to mention before leaving this subject of devaluation. I wish that the government could take some account of the plight of the imperial pensioners in this country. They will suffer seriously as a result of the reduction in the purchasing power of the pound sterling. I wish that the government could also take account of the plight of those who have immigrated to Canada from the United Kingdom in recent years and who, under the United Kingdom exchange control regulations, are permitted to withdraw from the United Kingdom only 250 pounds per annum for the first four years of their residence in this country. This devaluation will mean a serious crimping of the means of those who have immigrated to this country from the United Kingdom since the war, and it will also probably have a discouraging effect on others who may be purposing immigration to this country, bringing with them needed skills.

I mention briefly the subject of gold because reference was made to that yesterday in the statement made by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Gibson). The gist of the statement he made is that, having regard to the fact that, in consequence of devaluation gold has increased by ten per cent or $3.50 per ounce, a corresponding reduction is to be made in the subsidy paid to producing gold mines under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, commencing January 1. I submit that this statement indicates that no adequate account has been taken by the government of the fact that the restoration of the ten per cent discount on the Canadian dollar has simply had the effect of restoring the price of gold which Canadian gold producers received up until the time of the devaluation in June, 1946. In that intervening period the costs of gold producers in Canada have increased at least thirty per cent. They are now given a restoration of the price that was reduced by ten per cent at that time, and now the government says: You must accept a corresponding reduction in the benefits that were promised to you under this three-year act.

As every hon. member of this house knows, the act gave assistance to the producing mines but it did not give assistance to development work carried on apart from the big gold producers. I am waiting for some members representing constituencies in northern Ontario and supporting the government to rise in this house and make some plea for assistance to the gold mining industry. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, it is not just a question of assisting the stockbrokers in Toronto. I am not making any plea for the Toronto Stock Exchange. I am making a plea for the recognition of the difficulties of an industry which means a great deal to the economy of this country and which contributed substantially to pulling this country through the depression of the thirties.

A great and well-informed Canadian recently had something to say about the failure of members of parliament to recognize what the gold mining industry has contributed to Canada. I refer to Dr. Charles Camsell, former deputy minister of mines and resources. In a prepared address that was delivered at Oxford on July 14 last, he is quoted as saying this to the fourth Empire Mining and Metallurgical Congress:

> Many of Canada's legislators do not appreciate to what extent gold has been responsible for the development of Canada . . . "The influence of gold on our Canadian economy has been vastly greater than mere production statistics would indicate." A casual trip through the belt extending through northern Ontario and Quebec revealed the influence of gold deposits in developing the country and making it possible for permanent industry or agriculture to "live and thrive." Canada today needed strong mining industry more than ever before, particularly for strategic reasons.

Then going on to speak of the northwest territories, Dr. Camsell said:

> I know of nothing that will take any considerable body of population into that country except the lure of gold or some other mineral such as uranium.

When he spoke in northern Ontario in the election campaign, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), gave certain assurances to the gold mining industry as to the extension of the benefits of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. I take it that these assurances are to be given legislative effect, notwithstanding what was said yesterday by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Gibson). It may be that these assurances were what he was referring to in the concluding paragraph of his statement, although, sir, it is not altogether clear.

I should like to turn briefly to the subject of housing to make preliminary and passing comment upon the statement made in the house yesterday by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters). It is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker, that we must wait for the legislation which he indicated in his statement, before being able to make a completely considered statement upon the policy that the government announced. The statement, while timely, was perhaps inevitably vague, and I do not propose to make detailed comment upon it until I see the legislation.

There are one or two features of it which the house will receive with pleasure. The first is that, at last, the government is recognizing we have not in this country been keeping pace with the housing problem. The minister said as much in his statement yesterday. Statements have been made by responsible officials before this. Last April we had a statement by the assistant general manager, Major-General Young, of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, when he said that Canada's housing situation is getting worse instead of better. At last, Mr. Speaker, we can apparently expect an end to these airy statements which we used to hear so often from the government about the improvement in housing conditions, and the worst being over, and our having passed the hump—statements that bore no relationship to reality. At last we have an admission of the fact that the problem has been growing bigger. The fact that at last we have that admission is encouraging.

The second thing I should like to say about the statement is this. The dominion government has accepted, in terms clearer than we have heard hitherto, at least a measure of responsibility in connection with housing. We have heard so many denials of responsibility, so many statements to the effect that it was the responsibility of the provinces, that this indication of some proposed limited assumption of responsibility on the part of the dominion in respect to housing conditions in Canada is indeed welcome.

In the third place, if the statement is to be considered as going the full way and justifying the interpretation that has been put upon it in some quarters, that the government is willing to assist in providing for subsidized housing, then the government has gone a long way since October 27, 1947, when the Prime Minister said, "No government of which I am a part will ever pass legislation for subsidized housing". The statement made yesterday represents an advance and I am sure the house will welcome it.

In the fourth place, I would like to comment on the fact the statement does recognize that this country must look to private enterprise to provide in principal measure the answer to the problem of the lack of housing.

I wish to make a special observation, sir, on the proposal to assist in the purchase of new houses by contributing an additional mortgage advance of one-sixth of the building loans provided for under the National Housing Act so as to help to bridge the gap between the present loan under the National Housing Act and the purchase price of a house. The house will welcome this, but the house will regret that the government has been so long in doing something that it obviously ought to have done long ago. The need was there. The need was debated in this house. I well remember hearing the then hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, the distinguished Mr. C. C. I. Merritt, whose absence from this house today I deplore very greatly, more than once pointing out to the government the great deficiency which was being created in our housing measures by the fact that the government, through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, was giving a very rigid and unsympathetic interpretation of the provisions of the housing act. In section 4 the National Housing Act deals with the extent of the loans which are permissible under part I. It bases this upon the percentage of lending value, but the lending value as administered by the government agency did not bear a close relationship to the cost of construction. In that way, by writing down the lending value of the house, the government agency created that big spread between the price of the house to the home owner and the amount available to him by way of loan under the National Housing Act.

The province of Ontario took action two years ago to fill that gap in dominion legislation, a gap which this parliament and this government, which are responsible for dominion participation in redress of our housing problem, should not have permitted to continue. But now at last the government invites us to believe that a new day is dawning simply because it is moving now to copy the example which the government of Ontario gave two years ago when my leader was premier of that province. Yes; it was this government and its agency which largely nullified the intent of parliament and the National Housing Act, necessitating this additional provision of dominion assistance, which this house will welcome, although it will be regarded as too late.

More will be said on this subject when the house has the bill before it, and there will be an opportunity of reviewing what the government's proposals, are, if any, to assist in slum clearance, to assist in the provision, in greater supply, of needed building materials, and precisely what they propose to do in the statement they have made in regard to assisted rentals, always bearing in mind, sir, that just as important as legislation will be the spirit behind the administration. If there is drive and determination behind the administration of this legislation we can look for some improvement. If there is to be lackadaisical administration, if the government is to countenance, as it has done at times in the past, the nullification in part of measures that parliament has approved, simply because it has not put drive behind those measures, then I think the house will expect to call the government to account.

I shall mention just one other subject because my time is passing quickly. I refer to communism. In the speech from the throne there is only one reference to the subject of communism, and it is in these words:

> The menace of communist totalitarianism continues to threaten the aspirations of men of good will.

The measures which the government has in contemplation with respect to this menace of communism apparently are external only. There is no suggestion in the speech from the throne about any measures which may be taken within the four corners of Canada to combat this menace of communism. We congratulate organized labour in this country on the determined steps which it has taken in recent days to expel communism from its ranks, to combat this evil menace. Their example might well inspire this parliament. I recall that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) had this to say in his speech at Montreal on July 19, as recorded in the press. He told the Montreal Rotary Club:

> The domestic threat of communism must be met "by strengthening, if necessary, our criminal code against actions which threaten the security of the state."

I scanned with interest the speech from the throne to find any indication that we were to strengthen the Criminal Code against actions which threaten the security of the state, on the part of these communist enemies of Canada who are working within our midst.

I found no such indication, however, and when he returns to his place in the house from the important duties he is discharging elsewhere I hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will have something to say in support of legislation to strengthen the Criminal Code, the necessity of which he admitted in the speech he made in Montreal on July 19.

Sir, failing that there will be, I trust, further opportunity at this session to raise that question. Because, believe me, resolute action within this country—by democratic methods, yes—must accompany our efforts in the external field to combat the ravages of aggression by communist totalitarianism.

I do not need to repeat what has been said in the house about the responsibility of the opposition. The vast government majority puts a heavy responsibility upon those of us who sit in this part of the house. We will not be daunted by the fact that government supporters not only fill the side of the house to your right, Mr. Speaker, but overflow to this side in numbers greater even than the official opposition.

Those of us who sit here have Liberals in front of us, Liberals to the right of us and Liberals in a hurry to the left of us. We are surrounded by Liberals, and Liberals in a hurry. But, sir, we have no intention of being daunted; we have no intention of being turned aside from performing that duty which the Canadian people expect of us. Whether they are numbered among the 1,742,000 electors who honoured us with their support, or whether they voted for other candidates, nevertheless they appreciate and will insist upon the importance of the duty laid upon His Majesty's loyal opposition under our parliamentary system.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has commented upon the tranquil atmosphere which has descended upon the House of Commons. For a moment or two I thought he was going to break that atmosphere of tranquillity. Now there are certain dangers in an atmosphere such as that, because a legislative body can become embalmed in tranquillity. In some ways this government has already reached that stage.

Today I am going to speak on certain matters of policy about which the government can feel no tranquillity at all. First of all I should like to refer to the statement made respecting housing by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters). I shall comment upon this at some length. I think we know from his statement just what the government's policy is, and what its intentions are. My only hope is that the policy will show improvement by the time the legislation is brought before us.

I listened carefully to his statement. In common with many others I have read it even more carefully. As I read it and thought it over it became obvious to me that although the mountain had groaned in the pangs of birth something considerably less than a mouse had been born.

For some weeks the minister travelled across the country from city to city. On the one hand he may have been a peripatetic record of "his master's voice." On the other hand he may have been trying to find out some of the facts of life about housing in this country. But what he displayed to us yesterday in the way of policy certainly was not very encouraging. In almost every city he went to he delivered an address which dealt with the fact that he was proud of the record of his government. I am not surprised at that pride, because I have found so many Liberals who worship the very ground their heads are buried in.

Even during the election campaign we were told how proud the government was of the fact that 81,000 new housing units had been constructed in this country. They kept careful silence about the other fact that there were 90,000 new families in Canada, families created either by the marriage of Canadians, or through immigration to this country. And there was even greater silence over the fact that the average cost of those homes in this country must have been in the neighbourhood of $7,000—and I think that is a rather conservative estimate. In my constituency the average wage is between $37 and $38 a week. I fail to see how a man earning that sum, with prices as they are, and with the cost of living as it is today, could possibly hope to buy a house—even with the reduced down payment—costing at least $7,000. And until the government tackles that problem it is merely toying with the housing situation as it exists in Canada today.

In the minister's statement I detected certain changes of mind—at least I hope they were such. For instance, I recall one of the lengthy debates we had in this chamber in 1946 on the subject of housing. At page 3686 of Hansard for July 22, 1946, the then minister of reconstruction and supply said this, concerning housing:

> This government, as a matter of policy, is not prepared to introduce subsidies either in the form of a grant towards capital cost or subsequent contributions to a rent reduction fund.

I would be the last to say that the government is eating its own words; but at least it would seem that it is starting to nibble at them. And I should hope that there would be some further enlightenment upon this matter of subsidies when legislation is brought before the house.

A year after that was said the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is now Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), speaking at a meeting at McMaster university on November 4, 1947, said this:

> I am against subsidized housing because it would be available to a few privileged ones.

There I say the right hon. gentleman showed a complete lack of appreciation of the housing problem, and how it can be handled in this country. Then he went on to say—and with a horrible reflection upon some of his colleagues—

> It would be risking temptation to put into the hands of politicians a few thousand houses which could be given to certain persons. It would be a temptation to buy votes.

As I say, the right hon. gentleman knows his colleagues much better than I do; but I am certain of this, that with any adequate housing scheme in this country certainly members of parliament would not have the responsibility of allotting a few thousand houses to individuals here and there. If the job is to be done properly it must be done at the municipal level, and all that parliament can do will be to authorize funds and supervise expenditures.

The report of the speech of the then Secretary of State for External Affairs goes on to say:

> He emphasized he felt it unwise to build and provide housing units at less than cost, repeating, "I'm against subsidized housing."

Apparently he has changed his mind—and the change, indeed, is a very welcome one. But there is another area in which there has been no change. At page 3688 of Hansard for July 22, 1946, the then Minister of Reconstruction and Supply said:

> Slum clearance, however, is considered to be inopportune at the present time. The requirement for shelter is so great that the government cannot afford to permit the destruction of livable shelter of any kind. Slum clearance will come later when the pressing need for the occupation of every housing unit is lessened.

How late is "later"? When is a "pressing need" pressing? In my constituency I have seen people living in chicken coops, garages, basements, shacks, garrets and shanties. When is "later"? I say we are entitled to know that.

Yet the present Minister of Reconstruction and Supply takes roughly the same attitude by stating that the time is not opportune to take the people out of the slums; the time is not opportune to give the people that dignity about which the Liberal party spoke so glibly during the campaign. One of the planks in their platform—an admirable one indeed—was their belief in the dignity of man. There is no dignity in man when you compel him to live in a slum. There can be no dignity when you compel people to live in poverty. By the inaction of this government thousands of people must continue to live under these conditions. Does the government think that people like to live in slums? Does the government think that people prefer squalor, that they want to bring their children up under these wretched conditions rather than in decent homes? If so, it had better change its mind because such is not the case.

Yet the minister tells us that in 1949 although 100,000 new houses would be built in this country we would be barely keeping up with current needs and would be making no inroads into the backlog. In other words, the minister has condemned these people to live in slums and to continue to live in slums knowing that there is no method by which they can get out of them. If that is the policy of the government then it is time it was changed. The government has an unprecedented mandate to do the job: it has the power to do the job and there can be no excuse for not doing it.

I should like to give the minister a few facts about the situation in my own constituency of Winnipeg North. I am sure that the condition which prevails there is not unique to that city but can be duplicated in every city in this country. In one area, Point Douglas, 44 per cent of the houses have more than one person per room. When you have that situation you have overcrowding and, when you have overcrowding, if you have not a slum already you are starting to build one. But what is worse is the fact that in these overcrowded slum areas there is an obvious and serious increase in juvenile delinquency. As yet the only answer our society has for juvenile delinquency is to punish the delinquents. Those who should be punished are those who are responsible for creating the slum conditions which lead to juvenile delinquency. The answer is not to send these youngsters to prison; the answer is not to punish them; the answer is the awakening of the conscience of the community to the point where its responsibility is realized. We in this parliament of Canada are the voice of the communities of Canada and we cannot ignore our responsibilities.

Slum areas all across Canada are creating social casualties. Every time there is a social casualty who cannot be rehabilitated the responsibility must be laid squarely on the doorstep of this parliament, and especially of this government which has the power to help. In this one area of Winnipeg fifty infants out of every thousand born will be dead at the end of the first year. Statistical records show that the infant mortality rate for Winnipeg as whole is 35. Therefore, because of the slum conditions and poverty in this one area, we are condemning fifteen infants to death. Yet we still prattle about our concern over human dignity and human life.

It is scandalous that a society should allow its human resources to be wasted in such a way. I can assure the government that the families of the poor have as much affection for their children as do the families making up any other group in this country. They suffer as much sorrow and heartbreak at the avoidable death of an infant as would any one in this chamber. And yet in this area in Winnipeg, as in other areas throughout the country, we have these slums and this increase in infant mortality which, as I said, is a shocking, scandalous and unforgivable waste of human life.

It has been said that statistics show that the slum population is moving. In my area the population is moving out of the slum areas, but what they are doing is simply to move from one overcrowded area to another. The population is moving but it is still doubling up and sharing accommodation with others. It is moving from one overcrowded area but is crowding another area and is spreading the wretched disease of overcrowding and potential slums further throughout the city.

I do not know whether the minister saw some of these slum conditions when he was in Winnipeg. If he had got in touch with me I should have been happy to have taken him around. I make to him the same offer that I made to his predecessor three years ago, and I shall willingly subsidize the minister. I suggest that he come to my constituency and live in a room in one of these slums. To make sure that he suffers adequately I shall give him $10 per week, which is what an old age pensioner gets. Let him live in that room amidst filth and vermin and dirt and then at the end of the week let him come back here and tell us that he adheres to the same policies.

According to the last report I have received, in Winnipeg there is not one vacant apartment; there is not one vacant suite; there are 22 vacant houses, eight of which are unfit for human habitation and 14 of which are for sale. Yet I have here a report of 56 families made up of 22 adults and 58 children, 80 souls in all who have to live in stores, garages, sheds, shacks and cellars; but we are told that the time is not opportune to remove slums.

On other occasions I have told this House of Commons of the conditions under which some of our people live. I have here the report of Mr. Austin, chief inspector of the sanitation and housing division in Winnipeg. He reports one two-and-a-half storey house containing eighteen rooms in which 17 family units live. There are two water closets, one bath, one wash basin and three sinks to take care of those 17 families. The comment of the inspector is very brief, as follows:

> Cooking and sleeping in every room. Unvented gas ranges.

Any one who has been in rooms like these knows what an unvented gas range can do to an infant lying in a cot or to a youngster who is brought up in that poisonous atmosphere. Here is another house of two and a half storeys containing 16 rooms in which reside nine family units totalling 30 people. There are three water closets, one bathroom, no wash bowls and five sinks. The comment is that the house is in very dilapidated condition, with defective plumbing and then there is the tremendous understatement that it is overcrowded and verminous.

There is another one-storey house of three rooms containing two family units made up of five men, six women and five children, 16 human beings in all. We are again reminded that there is gross overcrowding.

The next is a terrace of eight houses—88 rooms in all—in which reside 57 family units totalling 140 human beings. This terrace is reported to be in an advanced degree of dilapidation, continually in the city's hands for plumbing defects and so on. One could go on giving description after description of these houses in which people have to live against their wills. As I said, I have yet to meet a man or woman who wants to live in a slum out of choice and I repeat that this situation is not unique to Winnipeg.

The Curtis report which was published a few years ago should have warned, and indeed did warn, the minister of the situation. It said that for the next decade after 1946 there would require to be built in Canada 731,000 homes and that 543,000 homes would require substantial repairs in that time. According to the last statistical information in 1941 there were 650,000 farms that had no bathing facilities. Almost as many are dependent on outhouses for toilet purposes. In twenty-seven cities there were 281,000 houses with either no flush toilets or shared flush toilets. There are 428,000 houses with no baths, or baths which are shared. The housing shortage is not something new. The need for it has been evident for years, and yet the government apparently does not recognize its responsibility. It still depends upon private enterprise, and yet private enterprise cannot be expected under any circumstances to provide the type of housing which is needed for the underprivileged third of the Canadian people who are earning less than $1,600 a year.

If these people are going to be housed adequately, then housing has to be subsidized; and since the financial power in Canada is in the hands of the federal government then the federal government must take the responsibility for the subsidizing of these homes. We know that the Canadian housing industry is one of the most inadequate and incompetent industries there is. It is still in the horse and buggy age. Therefore there should be some impetus on the part of the government towards improving the methods of building, and when the legislation comes before the house perhaps the minister will be able to tell us what has been done by way of research.

Mr. Ferrie: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Speaker: With his permission.

Mr. Ferrie: May I ask a question?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Surely.

Mr. Ferrie: Do you want all the material in the cities? You are talking about housing. Do you want to have all the material in the cities?

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I certainly do not want all the material in the cities. If the hon. member had been listening he would know that I was dealing with the situation about which I have firsthand information. I have some knowledge of the situation in rural areas, but any firsthand knowledge which I possess is of the cities. I said that the situation which exists in Winnipeg can be duplicated in other cities, and I also pointed out the lamentable lack of facilities on the farms. Certainly there are slum homes on farms as well as in the cities, and I want to see slum homes on the farms eradicated just as quickly as possible.

One of the things which I noticed in visiting some of these houses in the city was the prevalence of old age pensioners in slum homes. They had no desire to be there, but with the present pension of $40 a month they have hardly any other alternative. Furthermore, many of them in Manitoba were paying as much as $20 a month for rent which left them $20 a month, if they were lucky, to subsist on for the rest of the month. I am convinced that the government will yet adopt another measure which we have advocated for so long and increase the pension to $50 because the need is desperate. I am just as convinced that, despite the fact that the other night the government would not vote for the removal of the means test, and our amendment was defeated, they will yet be compelled to remove the means test. The government will also be compelled by force of public opinion to lower the age at which the pension is payable to sixty-five. I know many instances of men who have worked on the railroads, and who are retired compulsorily at the age of sixty-five, very often with a small pension of $25 to $30 a month. They have to live between the ages of sixty-five and seventy on that miserable pittance, and it is impossible to make ends meet. In their old age they are compelled to go out and seek further employment. That is not right. I do not think it is humane to expect our aged to go out to work for their living after they have reached the age of sixty-five.

Speaking of pensioners there is one other matter which has been brought up in the house on many occasions, and which I now bring up again, a matter in which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and I have been interested. I refer to the men who went out on strike from the C.P.R. shops in 1919. Many of them had many years of employment with the Canadian Pacific Railway. In 1904 that company had instituted a non-contributory pension scheme. When there were wage negotiations between the men and the company, the company frequently informed the men that it was building up this pension plan, and that the men should accept payments into the fund by the company as an increase in wages. Very often wage increases which were well merited were not given.

In 1919 came the strike, and the men who went out on strike were rehired afterwards with complete loss of all pension benefits. I point out that the Canadian Pacific Railway is the only organization in Canada which has continued to discriminate against its employees in this manner. Representations were made repeatedly to the C.P.R., and in 1939 Mr. Coleman, then vice-president, said:

> We have kept in close touch with this matter for a considerable period of time, always encouraged by the hope that sufficient improvement might take place in the financial condition of the company as to enable us to realize a firm conviction which we have always held that, in such improved conditions at least, some relief might be forthcoming.

Heaven knows I can read a balance sheet, and the position of the C.P.R. has improved appreciably over the years. Yet there has been no alleviation whatsoever forthcoming.

As a result of the representations which were made to the government, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) appointed an investigator, Mr. Johnstone, who in his report came to the conclusion that a royal commission should be appointed to investigate the matter, but that was the end of it. The report of the investigator has been filed away. The Canadian Pacific Railway apparently is quite prepared to carry on without paying these men what is their moral right, and the government is doing nothing about it. The Minister of Labour is not in his place today. Therefore I shall not give certain opinions which I possess, but I think there is a moral responsibility on the part of the company to pay these men that which is their due and legitimate right.

There is one other matter which interests me, and which has been mentioned already by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). A year or two ago the houses of parliament appointed a special joint committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms. I was a member of that committee, and I formed the opinion that it had been conceived in confusion, born in doubt, and unquestionably died of paralysis. Many of us had hoped that out of it there would come some lead towards giving the Canadian people a bill of rights, but we were wrong. I am only going to deal with one rather narrow aspect of the rights of the citizens of Canada at this time, but I should like to remind the house that under our constitution as it stands the government has the right to deport a Canadian citizen who was born in this country. Under the constitution as it stands there is the right to deny the vote to citizens of Canada because of race or colour. Under the constitution as it stands trade unions can be forbidden to affiliate with other bodies outside the province in which the unions are situated. Under the constitution as it stands individual Canadian citizens can be denied the right to work because of their ethnic origin, religious beliefs or colour. Under the constitution as it stands Canadian citizens can be denied the right to enter restaurants or resorts, again because of their creed or their colour.

That is a lamentable situation in a country such as ours, a country which is a nation of minorities. There is no one majority in Canada. We are all minorities, and where one minority is hurt obviously the rights of all are in danger. The rights of minorities have been gravely endangered in the past. Therefore to protect them it is essential that we have a bill of rights in Canada. On the committee on which I sat there was a very obvious conflict of opinion. There were those who argued that human rights came under the property and civil rights sections of the British North America Act. There were others like myself who argued that the human rights of the nation were the responsibility of the nation to safeguard, and the only way they could be adequately safeguarded was by the parliament of Canada.

I am indebted to Professor Frank Scott of McGill university, an expert on constitutional law, for much of what follows.

The house will remember that there was a universal declaration of human rights proclaimed by the general assembly of the United Nations on December 10, 1948. I am informed there is not much in this universal declaration upon which this parliament cannot take a stand.

Some have argued, so far as a bill of rights is concerned, that an amendment to the constitution is necessary. I was one of those who wanted an amendment to the constitution. Now I am willing to compromise on legislation because I think legislation would be better than nothing. It may be argued, "Well, legislation can be revoked by another parliament or by the same parliament". That is true. I think we ought to remember, however, that in the British House of Commons Magna Carta, habeas corpus and the bill of rights can be repealed by a single majority of the British house. That legislation has never been repealed. Indeed, it has proven to be of enduring value. Perhaps we may follow that example.

The aspect of human rights with which I wish to deal now deals with discrimination against minorities because of their race, creed or colour. I think there is one simple and quite elementary way of partially solving that problem. It is to make it a criminal offence to discriminate against Canadian citizens because of race, creed or colour. This would bring the whole question within the purview of parliament.

I should like to quote a page from an article by Professor Scott which is published in the "Canadian Bar Review" for May, 1949. He said:

> Where the criminal law power is but little used today, and where it might be better used for the protection of freedoms, is in regard to the creation of new crimes against freedom itself. It is a crime to disturb a religious ceremony, but it is not a crime, or at least as precisely defined a crime, to disturb a public meeting or to prevent the distribution of literature. It is a crime for employers to discharge an employee for trade union activities, but it is not a crime for them to use labour spies. It is a crime to libel an individual but not a crime to libel a group or race. It is a crime to hit any man over the head with a stick but it is not a crime to refuse to serve him a meal in a public restaurant or to refuse him a room in a hotel because of his race or religion. It is a crime for any public official, whether federal or provincial, to take a bribe, but not a crime for him to discriminate against races or creeds in granting licences or franchises. It would be wrong to imagine that freedom can be created merely by adding new crimes to the criminal code, but this is not to say that certain practices which violate human rights ought not to be made criminal where now they give rise only to a personal action in damages if there be an action at all. The law can buttress moral principles, and make the path of the wicked more difficult. Thus there seems to be good sense in the suggestion of Mr. Varcoe to the joint committee of parliament, that a new section be added to the criminal code setting forth new prohibitions against interference with human rights.

I believe Professor Scott's ideas are worthy of consideration. I hope that, if not at this session then most certainly at the session coming, the government will once again set up a special joint committee on human rights, designed this time not to bring forth the frustration which was experienced but some practical solution to these problems of human rights which confront us. I should like to see that committee set up to consider ways and means whereby we could combat the terrible social consequences of religious intolerance and racial prejudice.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure on rising to address the twenty-first parliament of Canada for the first time to be able to congratulate you upon your selection as Speaker of this honourable assembly; in the first place because of our long personal friendship extending from the time when we came into the house together in 1935; and in the second place because of your activities in the intervening years, more particularly one activity of which the new members will not have heard. That was when from 1935 to 1945 you acted as the president, chairman and general dictator—and a most kindly dictator, may I say—of the veteran members of parliament and of the press gallery.

In that capacity you had no rules of order to help you conduct the meetings. If you had a sergeant-at-arms he was usually against you. Yet the meetings of that group of veterans of the house and of the gallery were the finest and friendliest gatherings there have been since I came here in 1935. Those of us who remain of that group are more than delighted that you are now the Speaker of this assembly. We know that you will show not only fairness and dignity but also a deep human understanding and great kindliness. I am quite sure that your name will go down in history as that of one of the great Speakers of the House of Commons of Canada.

Then too there is something inspiring in having in this parliament members from Newfoundland. As I listened yesterday to the remarks of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) I thought that he brought to this chamber a breath of fresh air, an idealism, an oratorical type of speaking and a broad outlook which will contribute greatly to the deliberations of this assembly. I have no doubt that the other members from Newfoundland will be of the same calibre. But speaking as a member who comes from the other remote part of Canada, the other part of Canada which is thousands of miles away from Ottawa, I should like to give them a tip, and it is this. When you have some problem facing Newfoundland upon which you need action here in Ottawa, be sure to "gang up" on whatever government may be in power. We in British Columbia have found that procedure pays good dividends when there is a problem that has to be handled. I see my old friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) is here, and I would remind him of Ripple Rock. The removal of Ripple Rock is a good example, although he has not got it removed yet.

Mr. Howe: That is a bad example.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is the worst example.

Mr. Green: When a question affecting Newfoundland arises, I suggest to hon. members from there that they will get much better results if they all stick together, regardless of party. I think I can promise them that all the members from British Columbia will be glad to support them.

Mr. St. Laurent: If they are ganging up on the government.

Mr. Green: In this house, Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to represent one of the new ridings, namely the riding of Vancouver-Quadra, which has been carved out of the old ridings of Vancouver East and Vancouver South. The riding is composed of a strip across the centre of the residential portion of Vancouver, extending almost from the eastern boundary of the city right out to the university of British Columbia at the tip of Point Grey.

There is something extremely significant in that name of Quadra. I am going to take a few minutes to explain to the house just why it means a great deal to us on the Pacific slope. Quadra was a famous Spaniard on our coast. In 1775, when a young naval lieutenant serving at the Spanish base down in California, he went on a voyage of exploration up the west coast, finally reaching a point as far distant as Alaska. His ship was a small schooner called the Sonora, a vessel thirty-six feet in length, with a twelve-foot beam and a draft of eight feet. There were twenty in the crew. By the time they arrived off what is now the coast of British Columbia, many of the crew had scurvy. At one time there were only two of them able to carry on, Quadra and one of his men. Two ships started on this voyage, but the other one turned back. Quadra went on. He got up to what is now Alaska and finally arrived back in California, having made a great name for himself as an explorer. Then in 1792 we find him back again on the coast of British Columbia, this time as the governor of Nootka, in command of a Spanish post at Nootka on the west coast of Vancouver island.

Between the times of these two expeditions the British had established a post at Nootka and then the Spaniards had seized it. There had been a threat of war, but finally a treaty of peace was signed under the terms of which envoys from Great Britain and Spain were to meet at Nootka to try to decide upon who should hold what territory. Captain Vancouver was sent out as the British envoy.

On his way to Nootka he explored our present harbour of Vancouver, which he named Burrard inlet. In the course of his explorations in the vicinity of the present city of Vancouver he met two ships from Quadra's squadron just off the tip of Point Grey, which of course is just off the present riding of Quadra. They did some exploring together for Vancouver refused to interrupt his explorations in order to sail over to Nootka to meet Quadra. He explored the waters between the present Vancouver island and the mainland, right up around the tip of Vancouver island and finally reached Nootka on the west coast, which is in the present riding of Comox-Alberni. There he and Quadra tried to settle this territorial dispute but were unable to agree; however, they became fast friends. Captain Vancouver named the island which is now Vancouver island, calling it "Vancouver's and Quadra's Island"; later he visited Quadra in California and was warmly welcomed by this friendly Spaniard.

So you see the name of Quadra has great significance for us on the Pacific coast, and I hope that fact will always be remembered by the person who represents the riding of Vancouver-Quadra in this house. We face the Pacific. While the people of British Columbia are practically all from the east, either from eastern Canada, from Europe or from the United States, we face the Pacific. Our problems are primarily the problems of the Pacific. We are Canada on the Pacific; and I think it is the responsibility of members from that province to see that the other members of this house are kept informed on Pacific problems which are of interest to Canadians.

At this time there are problems which are of deep concern to us. First of all, there is the problem of trade. Our greatest industry is the lumber industry. About 25 per cent of our timber production must be sold abroad if that industry is to be prosperous. In fact, if the province is to carry on without having a great deal of unemployment we must sell at least 25 per cent of our lumber abroad. We must also sell a large proportion of our canned salmon abroad, of our apples and of our metals. Therefore we are greatly concerned over the loss of the markets in Great Britain and Europe, in Australia, in New Zealand and in the Orient. The devaluation of the pound and the Canadian dollar will make it more difficult for us to sell these commodities to Great Britain and to the other parts of the commonwealth, in fact in practically all countries overseas, although I think it is bound to give us some advantage over the United States in those markets because of the 10 per cent reduction. But no one as yet knows on balance what the result will be. I am afraid that our position will not be greatly improved by the devaluation.

I do suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that there are some steps that can be taken. He mentioned this afternoon that there is a committee or a council meeting now in Ottawa to discuss the promotion of trade between Great Britain and Canada. That is all to the good. I suggest that some such arrangement be made with regard to trade between Canada, Australia and New Zealand. At one time Australia was Canada's third best customer and New Zealand was a good customer also. Now they are both a long way down the list. It might even be worth while for the minister himself, or his deputy, to go to the Antipodes after the end of the session just to see whether some way cannot be found by which the trade between Canada and those two sister nations could be increased. It will be easier now for them to buy goods here than in the United States. There may be an opportunity to switch some of the trade which has been going to the United States.

With regard to China, there is a real danger that that country will be cut off for many years. Always one of our great hopes on the Pacific coast has been that there would some day be a huge trade between Canada and China. Today of course the communists have swept over a large part of that country, and they may even attack Hong Kong. The city of Hong Kong is the port through which a good deal of the trade from other parts of the world enters China, and it is of the utmost importance to Canada that Hong Kong remain intact in British hands. Should Hong Kong be taken over by the communists the results for Canada would be very serious. We certainly have a stake in the protection of Hong Kong. That was put clearly by the Vancouver Sun in an editorial on August 17, just a little over a month ago. It is headed, "Hong Kong Emergency." The final paragraph of the editorial reads:

> As for Canada, the loss of Hong Kong by the British might not be of immediate moment so far as defence is concerned but Canada is a Pacific country, as we on the west coast are well aware—and as we were painfully aware after Pearl Harbor. Ultimately we, too, are concerned with the unchecked expansion of soviet power in the regions across the Pacific bowl.

That brings me to the next question which is of concern to us on the Pacific coast. We believe that there should be a Pacific pact similar to the North Atlantic treaty, a pact designed to hold communism in the Pacific. The president of the Philippine republic spoke to the United States senate about six weeks ago. In the course of advocating some such pact he used these words:

> Asia, with more than half the population of the world, and with "incalculable resources," must not be lost to communism by default.

Not only are the Philippines anxious for the pact but also Korea, Australia and New Zealand. I believe that the Canadian government should take a stand in favour of a Pacific pact before it is too late. I hope that some such step will be taken by the government.

A third subject about which we are concerned is that of shipbuilding and shipping. During the war we built a great many merchant ships, more than any other part of Canada. We also built many naval vessels, but since the war the Canadian shipbuilding industry has been gradually fading away. On our coast the work now is largely repair work. There is some naval construction promised and for that we are grateful. No attempt has yet been made to build fast cargo vessels. Canada still has many of the old slow vessels which were built during the war, but they are quite unable to compete with the fast modern vessels being built by other countries. Unless some building program is started, and started very quickly, I am afraid that the Canadian merchant marine will be a thing of the past, and that would be a tragedy for a country which has such a long maritime history as Canada, and a country to which the exporting of goods is so important.

The devaluations which have taken place during the last few days are going to make it much more difficult for the Canadian merchant marine to carry on, just that much harder for them to compete with the ships of Britain, Norway, Sweden and all other countries who have devalued to a greater degree than we have. There is an announcement in the speech from the throne that some measure is to be brought in to aid shipbuilding and shipping. It should have been taken this spring when a similar promise was made in the speech from the throne. The Canadian maritime commission, set up two years ago, was supposed to give a lead in working out these policies, although personally I think the obligation has always rested and still rests with the government rather than with the commission. I do hope that at this session the government will announce a definite and broad policy for promoting shipbuilding and shipping in Canada.

Another word about shipping; I have been appalled by the disaster in Toronto. It is almost unbelievable that in 1949 a great passenger vessel lying in a berth in a port, the second largest city in Canada, could be destroyed with a loss of over a hundred lives. I think it calls for drastic action. If the regulations under the Canada Shipping Act are proper regulations then somebody has been criminally negligent and should be prosecuted. On the other hand, if the regulations are not sufficient, and I suspect that that is the position, then it is the responsibility of parliament to see that proper regulations are enacted at this very session, because Canada cannot afford to have another disaster such as the burning of the Noronic.

The responsibility for safety at sea rests with the Canadian parliament, certainly with the Canadian government. We have had the same problem in a smaller degree on the west coast. There an attempt has been made to whittle down expenditures a bit, and to save a little money, by taking radio operators off full-time and letting them act as freight clerks, or do some other odd jobs. They are taken away from their apparatus, just on the chance that nothing is going to happen. That has been protested against in the house by other members from British Columbia. It serves to illustrate just how careful we must be all the time to see that we have proper safety regulations, and then that those regulations are enforced.

We believe that on each coast there should be a Canadian coastguard. May I suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that it is humiliating when, time after time, with vessels in distress along our coasts, the United States coastguard service has to come to their rescue. Just on August 17 last a Vancouver press dispatch stated:

> Fishermen protest rescue by U.S. Declare navy vessel, not U.S. coastguard, should have saved the B.C. ship.

This was an instance when a Canadian naval vessel started out and was then recalled. The United States coastguard vessel came all the way from Astoria, Oregon, and without hesitation. It came up to help this Canadian ship and that United States coastguard vessel was fourteen hours further away from the scene of the accident than the Canadian vessel.

There is no reason at all for that sort of thing. The other afternoon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was saying that Canada is a nation—and I agree that she is. I do not agree with everything else he said—because certainly he spoke a good deal of "eyewash," if he will pardon my saying so. Certainly there is no reason why this nation of Canada should not have a coastguard service on the west and east coasts, and I hope there will be no further delay in getting it.

In British Columbia we are also particularly interested in two broad groups of subjects, the first being that of veterans affairs and the second general welfare measures. We have a larger percentage of veterans than any other province in Canada. They have come there in large numbers since the war and, as hon. members are aware, we had very heavy enlistments. Furthermore the people of our province have always been social-security minded, taking great interest in welfare measures.

With regard to veterans affairs, may I suggest once more to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) that there should be a standing committee of the house on veterans' problems. We have pressed for that time and again, but without result. Problems of the veterans, in my experience, have been adequately dealt with only when a special committee on veterans affairs has been set up. I say there should be a standing committee.

Last spring an increase in the war veterans allowance was provided, not by way of an amendment to the act but by a vote. That means that such votes will have to be passed each year. It does not provide for a definite increase. The way it is working out is that if a veteran can pass a second means test he can perhaps get help by way of getting money for a new suit of clothes, or something of that kind. I believe the war veterans allowance should be increased as a matter of right to $50 for the single man, without a second means test at all, and that there should be a corresponding increase for the married man. I suggest also that imperial veterans, some of whom have been in Canada now for nearly thirty years, should be made eligible for the war veterans allowance. I say the men of the merchant navy should be treated as though they had served in the fighting forces. They are not now treated in that way. For example, while they have been given certain vocational training benefits and given those only after the utmost pressure had been exerted in the House of Commons they have been refused vocational training as from the end of June this year. They could not qualify unless they were under thirty years of age at the time of application. Those restrictions should be removed. They should be made eligible for university benefits, and should have a broader eligibility for pensions. I have known many sad cases where men of the merchant navy have incurred different disabilities, particularly by way of disease, and yet it has been impossible for them to get pension. They receive no consideration in connection with veterans housing projects, and they are not eligible for the civil service preference. All these defects should be remedied, and remedied quickly; and I am afraid it can be done only if a committee on veterans affairs is set up.

Then, with respect to general welfare measures, we in British Columbia believe—at least during the election campaign every candidate believed it, no matter to which party he or she belonged; and I must assume they meant what they said and published—that there should be a general plan of social security on a contributory basis. I do not believe our welfare troubles in Canada will ever be solved until we have a general contributory pension plan under which people will contribute as they work, and then will receive adequate benefits as of right without having to go through any means tests. That is the Canadian way of settling this problem of social security. I am disappointed to see nothing on that subject in the speech from the throne. It is perhaps the most important question which could be dealt with by parliament at this time—and yet we see no word of it in the speech from the throne.

Then, a very serious defect requires remedy in connection with old age pensions. At the spring session of the House of Commons an increase of $10 a month was granted. The rate was raised by $10. That, too, was done only after great pressure. However, while the rate was raised by $10 the ceiling was not lifted, so that if a person is earning a small income over and above the amount of pension, he receives no benefit whatever through the increase of $10 because the ceiling on general income was not raised. I am amazed that that is not being remedied at this session. I have here articles from two of the Vancouver papers, including the Vancouver Sun, which is a strong supporter of the government, pointing out this injustice and appealing to parliament to raise the ceiling at this session. I hope the government will change its plan and bring in a measure amending the Old Age Pensions Act by raising the ceiling to correspond with the increase in the pension itself.

Finally, I hope consideration will be given at this session to means of furthering certain promising developments in this nation. I have in mind, first of all, atomic energy. Canada is fortunate in being a producer of uranium, and being one of the big three in the development of atomic energy. I believe that atomic energy is just as important today as was the development of the steam engine over one hundred years ago; I think it can mean just as much to the world. It may be the one thing that will put Canada in the forefront of the nations.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has just returned today from a meeting in Washington at which there were discussions concerning a new agreement between Canada, Great Britain and the United States on atomic energy. A few weeks ago reference was made in the press to the giving out of information concerning atomic energy, the question raised being how far the United States should go in disclosing information to Great Britain and Canada.

I submit that the Minister of Trade and Commerce should make a full report to this house concerning the situation on atomic energy. I have here a press dispatch of July 28, 1949, headed, "Congress authority on A-bomb granted. Release of secrets outside President's right." The first paragraph reads:

> Washington—President Truman has conceded the right of congress to pass upon the release of atomic bomb secrets to Great Britain and Canada, according to word sent to Capitol Hill through State secretary Acheson.

In the press reports of yesterday we find that during the negotiations which took place this week the President made it clear that he is committed not to enter into any atomic agreement without consultation with congress. Right from the start, back in 1946, the United States set up a committee composed of members of the senate and house of representatives to advise on atomic questions, a watchdog committee. I urged on behalf of the official opposition that Canada should have a similar committee. The Minister of Trade and Commerce—I forget what minister he was then because he has been so many in the meantime—refused to have a committee set up. In subsequent years he has softened a bit. Last year when I suggested that there should be a similar committee in Canada he said it was a good idea and we could have it. But week after week went by and no committee was set up. Then there was an election, which perhaps some of you have heard about. In any event no committee was set up, but what do we find? I quote from a dispatch dated August 22 as follows:

> U.S. atomic energy officers study Chalk River layout.
> The external affairs department today disclosed that five U.S. atomic officials spent the last two days at nearby Chalk River talking over the administration of the atomic pile there with Canadian officers.

Two of those five officials were members of the congressional committee, Senator W. F. Knowland of California and Representative H. M. Jackson of Washington. They came up here and were told what Canada is doing, yet the Canadian House of Commons knows nothing about it. President Truman goes to congress to consult them after this conference and the Minister of Trade and Commerce comes back to Canada and consults himself as the member for Port Arthur. That is the ridiculous situation existing in Canada today. I repeat that there should be a committee of this house to go into the whole question of atomic energy.

Another promising development is that in connection with oil. There have been great oil discoveries in Alberta. Last year we passed a pipe lines bill providing for the establishment of pipe lines to carry this oil. When the bill was sent to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines I was surprised to learn from the representatives of Imperial Oil Limited that perhaps that pipe line would go through the United States. We now find that such is to be the case. This pipe line is to go from Alberta to Regina and then, instead of going to Winnipeg and the head of the lakes through Canada, it is to by-pass Winnipeg, go down into the United States and end up at Superior, Wisconsin, from which place the oil will be carried by ships to Sarnia.

Surely it is in the national interest, regardless of cost, that the main pipe line carrying Canadian oil should be laid in Canadian soil. Think of the difference in employment in Winnipeg, Fort William and Port Arthur. Think of the potentialities for development. I see by the press that it would cost more to run the pipe line that way. I have no objection to a branch line going to the United States or to our selling to that country oil we do not need, but I do suggest that the main pipe line carrying Canadian oil should be laid in Canadian soil. I regret that that is not to happen in this case. I think this is a great mistake in national policy. I suspect one reason it is being done is that Imperial Oil want to sell oil in the United States.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am sorry to disagree with a member of my own party, but I do.

Mr. Green: I think the plan is to sell a great deal of oil in the United States.

Mr. Howe: Is there anything wrong with that?

Mr. Green: If we have surplus oil that is quite all right, but as a matter of national policy the main pipe line carrying Canadian oil should be laid in Canadian soil.

Mr. Howe: It is a good thing the United States does not take that view.

Mr. Green: The right hon. minister can make his speech in due time, and I hope he will explain the whole subject.

Mr. Howe: It will not be as foolish as this one.

Mr. Green: That is the usual reply by the minister, to accuse the other person of being a fool. But in a great many instances it has been proved in due course that the fool was on the government side of the house.

This brings up the question of coal. I shall not go into this matter except to say that because of devaluation coal is going to cost more in central Canada. This is the time to develop a national coal policy so that Alberta and Nova Scotia coal may be brought into the markets of Quebec and Ontario to a much greater extent.

The next promising development I should like to refer to is iron. There have been tremendous discoveries of iron in northern Quebec and Labrador. I ask hon. members of this house to make sure that that iron ore is used in Canada to the largest possible degree and not simply shipped to the United States for smelting and then brought back here in the form of finished products. If that ore were made into steel in Cape Breton it might alter the whole picture in the maritimes; certainly that would be a wonderful thing for that part of Canada. If it were smelted in Quebec, where they have vast water power, that would mean a great deal to that province. I repeat: Let us in this house see to it that that iron ore is used to the greatest degree in our own country. It should be our policy to develop all these resources and use them in Canada to the greatest possible extent.

In conclusion let me say that my vision of Canada is that she should be a great nation with a population of fifty or seventy-five million; one of the great nations of the world. I think that is possible. Because of the various changes that are taking place in the world today, and the developments within Canada, this twenty-first parliament will have a great deal to do with the future of the nation. We have a great responsibility, perhaps greater than any other parliament of Canada for many years. If we do our work well, then I believe we can help Canada to attain the destiny I have pictured. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that looking around the house I believe the members are here with great earnestness of purpose. I think this parliament is going to do a fine job for Canada. I hope that, when the four or five years have expired, during which this parliament will last, the people of Canada will be able to say of us that we have done our work well.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, following the eloquence of the hon. members who have spoken today, and the broad scope of their addresses, I feel somewhat diffident in speaking to you tonight on matters chiefly concerning my own province. Nevertheless, as our problems in Newfoundland are now the problems of all of Canada, I feel it only fitting that you should acquire all the knowledge you can of our particular worries and fears.

In speaking on the address I should like to join my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), in expressing thanks to all those members on both sides of the house with whom I have come in contact for their many courtesies to me and I am sure to all other Newfoundlanders in this house. I wish to offer my congratulations to you, Mr. Speaker, on your elevation to the high position which is now yours.

I should also like to compliment the mover (Mr. Boisvert) and the seconder (Mr. Laing) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne on the real excellence of their addresses. I should like to offer my congratulations to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on the results of the election. Whilst the ridings of St. John's West and St. John's East did not follow the other ridings of Newfoundland in supporting the party which he has the honour to lead, nevertheless I can assure him of a very warm welcome when, as I hope he will, he returns to visit us again in Newfoundland. I may add that we are eagerly looking forward to a return visit from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). As you might well expect, he created a most favourable impression on his visit to our province.

I am afraid I must apologize to the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) for the somewhat unusual lack of warmth displayed to him on his visit to St. John's; but speaking for my own riding, which was the only riding contested by his party, I should like him to know that there was nothing personal in the lack of warmth, but merely that he had no opportunity to explain properly the doctrines of his party to our people. I can assure him that he will receive a warm welcome when and if, as I hope he will, he decides to come and see us again.

The leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) did not visit us, but if he decides to do so I can assure him also that he will be very welcome. I suggest to him, however—and I hope he will not take it amiss—that before doing so he should learn to pronounce the word "Newfoundland", because some of us regard its pronunciation as being quite important. I suggest not only to the leader of that party but also to many hon. members of the house that the simplest way to remember how to pronounce it is if you use it in the context, "you must understand new found land". I think you will find it somewhat easier that way. I do not object, I may say, to "newfundland" provided there is a possibility of our acquiring some new fund that we have not any knowledge of as yet. I can assure you it will be very welcome. I particularly stress that because of the financial gale we are going to have to weather very shortly. A new fund will have to be provided from some kindly people somewhere. Possibly the members of the government may feel inclined that way.

It was stated in the speech from the throne that, with the admission of Newfoundland, the Canadian nation attained the geographical limits planned for it by the fathers of confederation. I am very happy to know that Newfoundland made this contribution, that as a result Canada is now a complete and full nation, and I presume has no further territorial ambitions. As to the new province I have a few pertinent remarks to make, which I hope will not be misconstrued. First and foremost, let me say that the confederation of our country with the other provinces of the great dominion has now been accepted generally even by those of us who were not in favour of it. I say that quite frankly. I was one of those who fought confederation as hard as I could and right to the bitter end. My presence here is ample proof of what I say, that it has now been accepted generally by the people all over Newfoundland.

A number of my fellow Newfoundlanders were not in favour of confederation, and I may add that the number was not inconsiderable. The voting at the referendum showed that 71,334 people voted for the restoration of responsible government, and 78,323 for confederation. The chief reason among the great number of the people of Newfoundland who were opposed was that the financial terms of the confederation agreement were not adequate. As the Prime Minister will recall, during the meetings of the delegation from the national convention with the special committee of the cabinet in 1947 I raised this particular point. Subsequently on the visit of the second delegation, following the acceptance by vote of confederation, the financial terms were somewhat increased, but they are still inadequate, and are not sufficient to enable us as a province to pay our own way in respect to government services.

Now, this fact has been borne out by the record of revenues for the months of April to August of the present year. I speak of the official record issued by the Department of Finance. The total revenue, including federal grants and income tax payments for the year 1948—of course the income tax payments are non-recurring—amounts to $15,556,997. Of this sum $8,450,270 was for income tax payments for that year. As I said before, they are non-recurring. The proposed tax rental agreement to be signed by our province and the government will give us approximately $6,800,000 per year, possibly a little more, but that is as close as I can come to it at the present time.

The total expenditure for the same period under review, namely, April to August, amounted to $10,735,780. Deducting the amount received from income taxes from the total receipts, it leaves an amount of $7,106,727. This leaves a debit balance of $3,629,053 for a period of five months, or a debit of some $725,000 per month. If the debit continues for twelve months at the same rate it will amount to approximately $9 million. As I said before, we shall receive from the tax rental agreement approximately $6,800,000. This will leave us with a debit, based on present expenditures for the first year of confederation, of something over $2 million. Remember this is only with present expenditures. The additional cost of our health services and the maintenance of our new sanatorium at Corner Brook will have to be added. This sanatorium is as modern as any on this side of the water. Apart from that maintenance and the original capital cost of the other planned extensions in our health services, there is also to be considered the cost of highroads.

In this connection, I trust that the recent statement made by the premier of Newfoundland, the Hon. Mr. Smallwood, will not be carried into effect. Mr. Smallwood stated that he proposed using the pick and shovel for the building of the highroads. That may be a perfectly good way to distribute relief, but to me it appears to be going back to the old days in road making.

The cost of providing relief in Newfoundland during the winter will also be high. It has been estimated for me that for the full year we shall very likely have an over-all deficit of approximately $5,000,000, so it will be necessary for new taxes to be imposed by the provincial government. As you can well realize, this is going to be an extremely difficult matter during the coming year, since we are already beginning to feel what our United States friends call a recession. I should like to point out to you also that this debit balance has been incurred at a time of the year when we have comparatively little in the way of relief payments to make. In today's press I noticed an item to the effect that the price of liquor in Newfoundland has been increased by 50 cents a bottle. It is terrible. I trust some of my friends who buy a liquor known as "screech", who formerly paid $2.50 for their bottle of "screech", when they come to pay $3 for it—

An hon. Member: They will screech.

Mr. Higgins: Screech is quite right.

Now, Mr. Speaker, deficits of this size may seem very small to you who are accustomed to dealing in large sums. I would imagine that a deficit of $5 million is merely chicken feed to many of the provinces up here. I can assure you, however, that a $5 million deficit for the province of Newfoundland—if that is what it amounts to and I sincerely hope it does not—is something frightening.

During the negotiations with the second delegation from Newfoundland in 1948 a memorandum was issued by the government in which it was stated that an effort would be made to make the amount of surplus sterling held by Newfoundland available to Newfoundland in dollars within one year after the date of union. This was money that had been on deposit in England and, so far as we were concerned, was blocked sterling. We were rather doubtful of obtaining it. Quite recently I was informed that the government of Canada has made this blocked sterling available to the province. I sincerely hope that is true, because we shall certainly need all the money we can get this year to enable us to carry on and handle our unemployment problem. Only today I was informed that the United States bases in Newfoundland have paid off 600 people. Those 600 people are now on the list of unemployed. Again, the number may seem small to hon. members but it is by no means small to us.

I should like you to understand that, as a result of confederation, our secondary industries have been hit very hard. It is problematical whether our clothing factories, our breweries, foundries, tobacco factory, paint factory and the rope manufacturing plant will be able to withstand the competition from the mainland. If that happens, Mr. Speaker, it will have serious repercussions not only in the districts represented by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) and myself, but in the entire country. I hope that, in accordance with the terms of the agreement, some form of assistance will be rendered to the secondary industries by some government intervention. I do not know how it can be done, but if it can be done it will be a wonderful thing for industry. Now, Mr. Speaker and hon. members, do not for a minute think that we Newfoundlanders are coming to you with our hat in our hand begging you for assistance. That is not so. I merely wish to point out to you that at some future date the federal government will be faced with the problem of making additional grants available to Newfoundland, so that she will be able to maintain her place as a member in equal standing with the other provinces of this great dominion. By the terms of confederation we have given to Canada full value, and in the future still greater value will be obtained from the assets we have turned over. I may add that I am not at all unmindful of the splendid services that have come to Newfoundland and of the cost of those services to Canada. But bearing all that in mind, I still say that we have given good value and will continue to do so.

For the benefit of some hon. members who may not be fully aware of what Newfoundland turned over to Canada in real property, I am just going to go through the list quickly for you so that you will have a slight idea of what you obtained for your money and what you will continue to get. First, there is the Newfoundland railway, including rights of way, wharves, dry docks and other real property, rolling stock, equipment, ships, and other property. That means that the whole railway system together with all our ships have been turned over to the federal government. A great many jokes have been made about our railway, many funny stories have been told about it and many funny verses have been sung; but I can assure hon. members that, as far as we in Newfoundland are concerned, our railway system is still first-class. At the time of our pre-confederation talks that item alone was valued by the officials of the railway at $70 million. You have also obtained—and I may say that this is not an auction sale; I am merely repeating the things we have sold—the Newfoundland airport at Gander, including buildings and equipment, together with any other property used for the operation of the airport; the Newfoundland hotel; public harbours, wharves, breakwaters and aids to navigation; bait depots and the motor vessel Malakoff; military and naval property, stores and equipment; public dredges; the public telecommunication system, including rights of way, land lines, cables, telephones, radio stations; real and personal property of the Broadcasting Corporation of Newfoundland; and customs houses and post offices. In actual property value, all that represents an extremely large sum of money. It has been suggested that you are taking over dead property, but that is far from the case. I will not give you any real value because I cannot do so, but you can be quite sure that it is in the hundreds of millions of dollars. I put it to you that if Newfoundland went into confederation as a province and these services were not there, they would have to be provided by Canada. You are now taking over or have taken over a going concern. All we ask is that it be kept going.

In the speech from the throne, reference was made to the new air agreements between Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States. I believe those agreements have been concluded. That is my understanding from the contents of the speech from the throne. I hope it is so. I understand that additional traffic stops in the United States and in the United Kingdom have been provided for Trans-Canada Air Lines. I speak without full knowledge of the facts, but from the information I have gathered the chief factor in the making of those agreements was the fact that Canada now controls Gander airport and Goose airport—Gander especially—which enabled Canada to bargain with the United Kingdom and with the United States and get the wonderful advantages she has obtained for our Trans-Canada Air Lines. When I speak of the value of Gander in this way I am speaking simply of the commercial value. But do not ever forget the strategic value in time of war of that great airport at Gander, of that great airport at Goose, of that other airport at Harmon field and of that other airport at Torbay; and do not ever forget that the beginning of the winning of the battle of the Atlantic took place right from our little island of Newfoundland.

There are seven major international air lines operating from Gander at the present time, namely Pan American Airways, Trans-World Airways, American Overseas Air Lines, British Overseas Airways, KOM of Holland and Sabena of Belgium, the Scandinavian Air Line System and of course Trans-Canada Air Lines. I believe there are also some five or six non-scheduled carriers operating out of Gander as well. This has meant regular employment for a considerable number of my fellow countrymen, and I sincerely hope that nothing will be allowed to interfere with the operations at Gander, as was stated recently by the chairman of the air transport board prior to the conclusion of these air agreements. If these United States air lines are refused permission to land at Gander or if their operations are in any way interfered with, it will be an extremely serious matter for a great number of Newfoundlanders employed there.

[Mr. Higgins.]

In addition, to further increase the earning power of this dominion we bring you our great fisheries, which, added to your own, will probably increase their value by one-third. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) will probably remember the figure. Incidentally, for the benefit of hon. members from Cape Breton, I should like to quote to you an extract I read in a book issued by the food and agricultural organization of the United Nations entitled "Salted Cod and Related Species". The quotation is as follows:

> The east coast fisheries of Canada, which are the only Canadian fisheries of importance to the salted fish trade, began in the early days, when Cabot voyaged to Newfoundland in 1497 and Jacques Cartier to Canada in 1534.

I presume the hon. members from Cape Breton are still interested in the landfall of Cabot. If so, that should settle the issue for all time. But, Mr. Speaker, the chief value of our fisheries in the present money crisis is in the fish that we ship to the United States. The great bulk of our fresh-frozen fish goes to the United States and of course payment is made in United States currency.

In connection with the fisheries, by the terms of union our fishery laws and our Newfoundland fisheries board are to continue for a period of five years. That is five years certain, and thereafter until changed by the parliament of Canada. I would like you to understand that the fisheries board is doing excellent work, and has since its inception, and I sincerely hope that no change will be made in its constitution in the future. I know that the chairman of the board, Mr. Raymond Gushue, has the full confidence of all the people of our country, and I understand that he is just as highly regarded by the chief officials of the fisheries department at Ottawa.

Included also in the assets which we bring to you are our pulp and paper industries, our two great mills situated at Corner Brook and Grand Falls. In Corner Brook some 7,500 permanent and seasonal workmen are employed and the annual pay roll approximates $14 million. The annual productive capacity of the mills at Corner Brook is 300,000 tons of newsprint and 54 thousand tons of sulphite pulp. I have not the figures for the mills at Grand Falls but I understand they are somewhat lower. However, the annual turnout for both mills in 1948 was 382,000 tons, Newfoundland being the third in the list of countries producing newsprint, being exceeded only by the United States and by Canada herself. The largest percentage of our newsprint is being sold to the United States and of course being paid for in United States currency. This is another fine asset that we bring to you.

I should also like to draw to your attention the great possibilities of our territory of Labrador. We have down there iron ore, forests and one of the greatest waterfalls in the world. No accurate estimate of the timber resources of Labrador has been prepared as yet to my knowledge, but from what knowledge I have been able to gather it would appear that there is a considerable quantity of first-class standing timber in Labrador at the present time, and quite ample in amount to operate another pulp and paper mill. Labrador is also the location of Grand falls, which has been estimated to make possible a hydroelectric development of better than a million horsepower. Our iron ore in Labrador is of extremely high quality, and all reports to date indicate a very large body. As hon. members know, plans are being made now to put a railway in from the Quebec side to connect with the Quebec body of ore and to operate that body and the body in Labrador at the same time, I believe.

The issue of the Financial Post of September 17 makes reference to Labrador iron, and the paper states that Republic Steel, Armco, Inland and Wheeling Steel, U.S. Steel and Bethlehem Steel are classed as being interested. The paper states also that production is thought to be five years away, but it is said to be no longer a guess that United States steel companies will be taking a share of it. Those of you who follow iron ore must know that the Mesabi range is very closely approaching the exhaustion point, so you can see the value of these deposits of iron ore in northern Quebec and Labrador and the great value it should be to all of the dominion in the years to come. I shall make a further reference to a particular aspect of Labrador in connection with the supreme court bill which is to come up again shortly.

Apart from the Labrador possibilities we have three other mines in operation. We have an iron mine situated at Bell Island in my own constituency, which has been in operation since I believe the beginning of the century. It is owned by Dosco, and the great bulk of the iron ore is now being used at Sydney. Prior to the war a great deal of it used to be shipped to Germany. In fact, before both world wars Germany received a considerable quantity of that ore. There is also our very valuable lead, zinc, copper mine situated at Buchans. This mine is being operated by a subsidiary of American Smelters and possesses a very high grade ore. The only other mine in active operation at the present time is a fluorspar mine at St. Lawrence, which is also being operated by another United States company. We have also other great possibilities for various industries in the future because, Mr. Speaker, we have a country that is as yet unspoiled, a country that we say will be a mecca for tourists. All that we need is proper tourist facilities and of course adequate means by which tourists may get into the country in the cheapest possible manner and with the least inconvenience to themselves, and that of course is by road. But we have to cross that little narrow neck from Sydney to Port aux Basques. We hope and trust that as soon as a trans-insular road is completed a proper ship will be put on the gulf so that a tourist can drive in with his car in comfort and drive out in equal comfort when he gets to our little island. The provision of a suitable ship is part of the terms of confederation. I am merely reminding hon. members and the government so that they will not forget.

These are some of the assets that we bring to you. These are the visible assets. The asset of which we are most proud, the asset of which I am sure all Newfoundland members in this house are most proud, is that we bring to you provinces and to you representatives of the provinces of this great dominion 328,000 people who are the salt of the earth, people who are independent, people who are going to make first-class Canadians.

I went into this matter somewhat in detail to show you that we did not come to you with empty hands. We are still a poor country, and poorer in the thing known as money—but in everything else we are wealthy. In money we are poor, and we are not able to enjoy the standards of living which you in the rest of Canada can enjoy at the present time. I would therefore ask all hon. members from all parts of the house when the time arrives, as it must, when a request is made that the financial terms of confederation with Newfoundland be revised upward, that you will all give it your favourable consideration.

I should like to refer to the terms of union which deal with this subject. Section 29 states that:

> In view of the difficulty of predicting with sufficient accuracy the financial consequences to Newfoundland of becoming a province of Canada, the government of Canada will appoint a royal commission within eight years from the date of union to review the financial position of the province of Newfoundland and to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, that may be required by the government of the province of Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union, without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprising the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island.

All I can say is that if we in Newfoundland have to wait for eight years before the terms of this agreement are going to be considered, then the best illustration I can give you is to tell an old political story which has been told in Newfoundland for many years. A member of the government was addressing his constituents, and said to them, "When this government came into power you were groaning under taxation. How are you now?" A voice came from the back of the hall, "We are too 'wake' to groan." I hope this will not be let go so long that we in Newfoundland will be too weak to groan about having a revision of this union of our province with Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has spoken forty minutes. He may continue only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Higgins: Thank you; I appreciate that. Then, turning to that part of the speech from the throne which deals with the amendment to the Supreme Court Act, let me say I hope it is not the intention that in abolishing appeals to the privy council former decisions of that body will not be followed. I have reason to believe that a prominent member of the judiciary in Canada made a statement this year indicating that it might be so. I hope it is not so, because that very important and historic case, the Labrador boundary case, in which a decision was given respecting the boundary between Quebec and the present province of Newfoundland, is most important to us. The issue of that case was the ownership of Labrador. As hon. members recall, the decision of the privy council gave the great part of Labrador to Newfoundland.

In view of the statement made this year by the premier of Quebec that he intends to reopen the decision in that particular case, it is most important that some provision be secured in the bill whereby the rights of the province of Newfoundland to Labrador will be secured. I shall not say anything further on that matter at this time.

In the speech from the throne notice is given of a proposed bill respecting assistance to the shipbuilding industry and merchant shipping. In this connection I would draw the attention of hon. members to the unfortunate situation of Newfoundland seamen who served in Newfoundland ships during the war. As you may be aware, Canadian merchant seamen serving in the war years were paid a bonus of 10 per cent of their wages at the end of their period of service. Our merchant seamen who went through the same risk—and you will recall the torpedoing of the Caribou between North Sydney and Port aux Basques, and the consequent great loss of life—are refused that payment on the ground that they were not members of the manning pool. Well, that is perfectly in order; but—and I speak now as president of the Newfoundland seamen's association—if I have to go back to the members of the union of which I have the honour to be president and tell them that because they were not members of the manning pool the government will not pay them these moneys, it is going to be extremely difficult to explain it to them.

I notice, too, the proposed legislation with respect to the trans-Canada highway. I hope and trust that Newfoundland will be able to participate in that. I hope also that the contribution by the provinces will not be based upon a flat rate but rather on the work to be done and on the ability of a province to make a contribution. Otherwise, if we are all going to have to pay a flat rate, I am afraid the contribution from Newfoundland will be more than we can meet.

With these few remarks I shall close, thanking the house for its patience and courtesy in listening to me.

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, since the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne gives members of the house the opportunity of making themselves heard for the first time, I wish to avail myself of this privilege while craving the indulgence of which I am in such great need.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in the language of the majority of the hon. members of this house. I do not expect that my congratulations will add greatly to the unanimous tribute which greeted you when you were elected the Speaker of this house, but I merely point out that this universal approval shows beyond doubt that you are the right man in the right place.

I suppose you have noticed that my first words in this house were spoken in the language which my mother taught me. I should like hon. members to understand that if I do not speak fluent English it is not because of any lack of consideration for one of our official languages. As a humble country doctor I have devoted my time to my profession and to the social problems of my community and I was not in position to retain all that I had learned in my youth.

However, to prove my good will in this connection I should like to relate something personal. I have seven children and as they grow up I send one of them to an English-speaking part of the country so that he or she can learn the English language and use it later with greater ease and advantage. Two years ago I sent my oldest daughter to Moncton, New Brunswick. Last year I sent my oldest son to Ottawa. During the present year my second daughter is in Toronto.

We all wish for peace, harmony and bonne entente in this wonderful country of ours, but this can be obtained only through mutual understanding, which can be achieved only through a common language. I do not hesitate to say that not only is it the duty of French Canadians to endeavour to learn the language of the majority; English-speaking Canadians should endeavour also to learn something of the language of the minority. This afternoon I was glad to hear the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) deliver a speech in the finest French an English-speaking man could use.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I wish to carry on for a few minutes in French. The throne speech contains some extremely interesting pronouncements of great import. Among these must be numbered the abolishment of appeals to the privy council, a step which should have been taken long since. We see no reason why Canadians should not have confidence in the fairness of their own supreme court, whatever the racial origin or the past political allegiance of the members of the judiciary. In fact, a decision of the privy council, epoch-making in the province of Quebec, sanctions this attitude, I believe, on the part of the people of Quebec. Would it have been better to consult the provinces? Bearing this proviso in mind, Mr. Speaker, I think I can say that this will be an excellent piece of legislation, even though it comes very late.

We are informed in the speech from the throne that the government will endeavour to obtain for our country the right to amend its own constitution "in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces". I believe this to be acceptable, although I realize that perhaps the door will remain open to acrimonious differences of opinion between the federal and provincial governments, as to whether a particular matter does or does not come within the exclusive purview of the federal government.

I believe, and this is my humble opinion, that in all circumstances the provinces should first be consulted.

I shall now pass on to another subject and if I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a suggestion to the government. I believe that special aid should be provided to the crippled, to those who suffer from chronic physical or mental ailments, to those who are handicapped by some infirmity for the rest of their lives. Others have made this same suggestion in the house since the beginning of the session. I am referring, of course, to those people who are bereft of the necessities of life.

The state of mental depression in which these people find themselves all too often may be ascribed not so much to their physical handicap as to the fact that others around them are so much better off. There is nothing socialistic about helping these people. On the contrary, that would only be a Christian and humanitarian attitude.

I would also like to suggest to the government that the family allowances be raised somewhat; shall we say up to ten dollars per child?

While practising out in the country I have had an opportunity to see at first hand, so to speak, the way in which this allowance money is spent. Time and time again mothers would bring their little ones of all ages to me to be examined, even though they did not consider them to be sick, but just to find out if anything could be done to improve their health. After their children have been examined and prescribed for, when necessary, these mothers are very proud to bring their allowance cheque out of their handbags, saying: "This is how we can take good care of our children."

I know for a certainty that the same thing happens when these little children must be clothed, fed and, in short, supplied with all they need for their normal development in order that they may become sturdy Canadian citizens.

I believe that increased family allowances would help to raise the standard of living of the small children in our large families.

There is more and more talk in this country about social welfare; there is even talk about state medicine. I realize that it is a ticklish subject. I am perfectly aware that a large number, I might say the majority, of the political groups in this house are in favour of state medicine. I do not say all the groups because I have just seen one of our colleagues—a doctor—make a sign in protest. Naturally this does not include every one but I may say that there is a heavy demand for state medicine. I believe that increased family allowances would greatly help the welfare of our people and would undoubtedly postpone the advent of state medicine to some extent. In fact this delay might give the Canadian government and the people a chance to see what happens in other countries. We could thus profit by the experience of other countries and avoid the many mistakes made by these countries.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I would be breaking the rules of the house if I referred to what is done in another country, but I understand that the United States, our neighbour, is marching rapidly toward state medicine. We might be well advised to wait until we have seen what happens there. The neighbouring country, immensely rich, perhaps feels the need of going into costly experiences, but as regards Canada, which is far from being as wealthy, would it not be preferable to wait and let others indulge in that luxury, in order to profit by their experience.

I feel that the increase of family allowances would be far more advantageous; it would enable us to avoid the errors which may be made in organizing state medicine.

However it may be, I make bold to say this: we shall have to be most prudent if some day strong pressure develops and that system of state medicine is organized in this country. We shall have to proceed with the utmost prudence, as I said, so that state medicine may not destroy plain medicine in this country.

Mr. Speaker, there is in the province of Quebec a great and broad riding called Beauce. I have no illusions! I know that all the ridings in this country are great and of wide extent. I know that each and every member of this house thinks—which is quite all right—that his riding is the greatest and the largest. And it is because we all consider our electoral districts so great and wide and interesting that each one of us can earnestly devote his activities to the welfare of his riding and its population. Nevertheless, Beauce is a great and broad county. Its people, who are intelligent, industrious, thrifty and proud and who have large families, have asked me to represent them here and it is among these people and nowhere else, believe me, that I got the ideas I have endeavoured to convey to this house tonight.

This same population, in the near future, will be asking the government, through my humble self, for no special privileges but for benefits it normally considers itself entitled to.

I trust the government will not be cool towards our good population for not having elected a member of the Liberal party.

Incidentally, may I congratulate the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and the leaders of the other parties who have been re-elected. The fact that these hon. members have been re-elected, in spite of the great Liberal sweep, is sufficient proof to me that they are men of great worth, men who are ready to serve not only their constituents but the country at large.

As for the sweep, I do not hesitate to say it was launched and sustained mostly by the personality of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

During the recent electoral campaign, the Prime Minister honoured Beauce by paying us a visit. He was even so kind as to spend with us the last twenty-four hours of the campaign. He was extremely courteous and gracious. In return, the people of Beauce gave him a royal welcome. They received him like a prince. That was only normal and to be expected. I am indeed pleased to add that I represent that fine constituency where the distinguished wife of our Prime Minister was born.

Those are some of the reasons, Mr. Speaker, why the people of Beauce were so happy to welcome that great Canadian and his gracious lady, who has proven to be such a worthy wife and mother. That is why we outdid ourselves.

The Prime Minister did not go so far as to ask the electors to vote for me; on the contrary, however, I can now assure him that if the majority of the people of Beauce did not support his official candidate, it was not because they were opposed to the Prime Minister, of whom they are very fond, but rather because they preferred your humble servant.

I can assure you that among those who supported me in the recent election a few thousand must have done violence to their feelings when they voted for a candidate who was persona non grata.

I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that for having been so outspoken, so loyal and so plucky, the good people of Beauce can count on generous treatment from the government.

Mr. Henri Courtemanche (Labelle): May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to follow the example of the hon. Leader of the Opposition in congratulating the hon. Prime Minister on his electoral victory. I wonder whether the result would have been the same had it not been for his personal prestige in the province of Quebec. As a group, the Liberal party had much to be forgiven, and its recent victory must not be considered as an incentive to carry on its erring policy but rather to correct its political inspirations.

Not being sentimental, my constituency was logical and fair in voting for Mr. Drew and the party which he leads with such distinction and sincerity.

I have the honour of representing a large constituency which is mainly agricultural. The constituency of Labelle, like so many others, did not secure from this government all it was entitled to expect. I am not blaming anyone but my presence in this house proves beyond the shadow of a doubt that the people in that section of Quebec wanted to protest most emphatically against the repudiation of principles stated often but rejected on every occasion.

Representing as I do an historic constituency, I do not want to omit mentioning the man who has brought such renown to it, that is to say the eminent patriot and great statesman Henri Bourassa.

Many of those who sit here have known him well and they recall the battles he waged in defence of our rights, our language and our religion.

Unfortunately, he retired from active political life at a time when his eloquence and his experience would have been so helpful to us. However, if this outstanding orator can no longer be admired on the political scene, his ideas have gone forward and no one should be surprised today if the electors of Labelle have shown a reaction and proved that the people are still capable of thinking and passing judgment.

Above political parties must stand the Canadian motherland, which is still sacred to all well-born men and which must be the supreme guide of all honest citizens. There is nothing wrong in supporting one party or another, but we should not sacrifice everything to political parties. Before voting Liberal or Conservative the people should vote in accordance with the common weal and the general interest.

One of the measures of great interest to the members and the population of Quebec was the statement concerning Canada's constitutional future. We are told that the Liberal government intends to ask the house to approve "measures designed to facilitate the attainment of the constitutional limits of our nationhood". It was with a surge of pride and some astonishment that we heard about this welcome piece of news. Nations, no less than individuals, aspire to maturity, to majority. Canada came of age one hundred years ago. Therefore, that measure is not premature; on the contrary. We have only praise for the government concerning that inspired move. Common sense and judicial sense are not the prerogative of any one nation. Our jurists are just as competent as those of other nations, even those of Great Britain. It is very good and even beneficial to build up a legal structure.

In principle, any true Canadian will consider it antiquated that a so-called autonomous country should have to take its cases to a foreign court. By abolishing appeals to the privy council we would affirm our sovereignty. The principle of the law is excellent. However, when there is evidence of subtlety and tactics in disputes between federal and provincial governments, we may wonder whether the rights of minorities will eventually be well protected. Once the supreme court becomes the last court of appeal, will it be a complaint instrument in the hands of the government?

Another matter, Mr. Speaker, of great importance, is that of the amendment to the constitution of 1867. The matter has been brought up before.

Building our confederation took years of labour by jurists and patriots. Then again, in principle, the amendment is a good thing but in practice we must proceed with care, with vision, lest we infringe the letter and the spirit of the pact of 1867.

Present evils are blamed on the constitution, which is claimed to have become a strait-jacket, not only delaying but impeding Canada's development. That is only a smoke-screen.

The great principles set forth in 1867 must be respected, especially as far as the rights of minorities are concerned. The constitution can only be amended after careful and honest scrutiny of the people's sovereign rights. Was that not the intention of the fathers of confederation? One of them, Macdonald, who became prime minister of Canada, asserted that there were "neither victors nor vanquished".

The aim of the constitution was to enable the two main ethnical groups of Canada, the French and English-speaking elements, to co-operate in the achievement of Canada's destiny.

In Canada, peace and happiness on the one hand, or internal division, discontent and impediments on the other hand, will depend on the wisdom and the fairness with which these measures are implemented.

I sincerely hope that this epoch-making session will enable our country to attain a degree of development truly in keeping with the wealth of its soil, the sterling qualities of its people, and the exceptional geographic and economic advantages that are Canada's heritage.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I may say without exaggeration that, on the international scene, Canada's destiny is at hand.

(Text):

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, may I add my congratulations to those that have gone before on your elevation to your present high office. As a new member representing Saskatchewan, I appreciate the great honour, I am sure, of addressing you in this house. I should like to compliment my good friend and colleague the member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) on his address in reply to the speech from the throne. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr.

Laing), who gave such a masterly address, also deserves commendation. These were two outstanding examples of fluency in our two official languages. I do not think I have heard anything better at any time. Of course, many great speeches have been given in this house.

I understand that one member who has been here for many years but who, unfortunately, is not at his desk this evening, the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), displays a great ability in the art of oratory. He was once able, while sitting on the opposition benches, to secure a railroad station for his town. However, I believe the two new members I have mentioned did a great honour to all the new members generally, and I was surprised that the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) should mention the fact that not many of the new members had spoken. Three or four years from now, possibly, he will be more concerned if one of those gentlemen descends into his riding.

I should like to thank the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Cavers) for his gift of peaches. I wonder, however, whether he is setting a precedent; we may arrive some morning to find a wet tuna on our desk, a present of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Winters); from the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank)—nuts. I was pleased with one part of the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver South. I thought he made a nice gesture to the minister from his own province, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew). Coming, as I do, from Saskatchewan, where we have raised some very prominent ministers of agriculture, we make no apologies for the minister we have at the head of the Saskatchewan delegation. I think you will agree with me that of the great ministers of agriculture which Saskatchewan has usually produced, the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), in the most trying of times, has proved himself to be the greatest that Canada has ever had.

I should like to compliment the members of this house. Many of them, I am sure, have given up more remunerative positions in order to serve their country. We have never had a greater example of this in Canada than that of our present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). Last night I had a bad dream in which I thought the leader of the Liberal forces in the other place made some remarks of that kind. Although I had them written down previously, I thought that possibly he was stealing my thunder.

As a new member from Saskatchewan, I have watched with much interest and have listened attentively to the impressive procedures of this house. On every hand I have been confronted with the contribution of those Canadians who use the French language as their mother tongue; and on every hand, and especially in this house, they add to the decor and dignity of our surroundings. It is fitting that an English-speaking member from the west should pay this just and true tribute to those of French descent in the east. We have here in these two great races the basis of a culture and a unity which no one can match. Indeed, it is already manifest in the unparalleled growth of Canada to recognized fame as a world power. Oddly enough, we ourselves have been the last to recognize this growth. The first official stirrings are seen in Bill No. 2 now before the house. We would never have achieved this place among the nations without the leaders of vision in both our great races who held before them one goal and one goal only, namely unity. I refer of course to those great leaders, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I trust that this house, in all its deliberations, will make Canadian unity pre-eminent above all other considerations.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I do not speak French correctly but I have a great deal of respect for the gallant race that has contributed to Canada's greatness.

Out of consideration for this language, one of the two officially recognized in the country, and for the French-speaking electors of my constituency, I wish to assure my colleagues in the house that my foremost aim will be to foster the still greater improvement of the relations which now exist between our two races in order that Canada may become strong and united.

(Text):

The riding I have the honour to represent, Mr. Speaker, a new riding formed under the last redistribution, is the riding of Meadow Lake, which is a rather large one in the northwest corner of Saskatchewan, stretching along the Alberta boundary for some 450 miles north to the Northwest Territories, and it is about 125 miles in width. Travel by plane is required in order to cover the northern part of it. As the constituency is of such great length, there is a great diversity of effort among its people. In the south end we have a grain belt; in the centre we have mining, fishing and some production of timber; and, in the far north, I think time will show that we have one of the greatest deposits of uranium to be found on this continent.

From some of our Saskatchewan members you have heard a rather doleful story, especially from some of the southern Saskatchewan members. My good colleague the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) told you a rather sad story with regard to his part of the country. He said quite rightly that he did not know of any good reason why he should stay there. But he is an example of the kind of stock from which these people come. I just wish to correlate this incident with something I noticed in the discussion of the estimates, and this is what I am trying to get at. There was some discussion about the cost of experimental farms. Speaking to you for people who have had some benefit from them, I want to say that the expenditures on those farms have contributed more to this country than possibly any other expenditure that ever was made. That is what the hon. member for Maple Creek was getting at when he said that they were going to stay there, regardless. Those experimental stations have developed techniques that are from day to day improving and are enabling us to raise crops, by various methods other than those we have usually used, on land that we had previously found to be unproductive. I do not blame the hon. member for staying where he is. I know that these experimental farms will find the answer to productivity in that part of the country in any year. The farmers there have produced in many years, even with present methods.

However, it is not a doleful story that we hear all over Saskatchewan. I happen to have the honour to represent the riding of Meadow Lake, which has always produced. There are parts to the south of it that are sometimes hit by drought also. But there is no more fertile land in the whole Dominion of Canada than that around Meadow Lake itself. Just to give you an idea of what is produced there, I should like to give a few figures. In 1943 just out of the town of Meadow Lake itself we shipped 100 cars of northern lake fish, 512 cars of livestock, 900 cars of grain, 120,000 railroad ties, 10 million feet of lumber and 100,000 pounds of wild blueberries. The fish and the lumber are no longer turned out of Meadow Lake owing in most part to the socialist policies of the government we have in Saskatchewan. Grain production, however, has greatly increased. In 1948 1,500,000 bushels were delivered to the elevators in the town of Meadow Lake. This year, with crops ranging as high as 138 bushels of oats to the acre and 78 bushels of wheat to the acre, there will be delivered to those elevators in the neighbourhood of 3 million bushels of grain. I do not believe there is on the whole North American continent another delivery point of that size. Last year there was delivered to the town of Meadow Lake $1,500,000 worth of various hay seeds, mostly alfalfa. I should like to point out to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) that these mostly go over the border and provide much-needed United States dollars. Our uranium deposits as they are developed in the north will naturally contribute also toward that end.

For some time Meadow Lake has been represented in the house severally by Mrs. Nielsen, who represented North Battleford, and Mr. Townley-Smith, who was a member of the C.C.F. party. We take our politics fairly seriously in that constituency, but not too seriously. During the campaign just finished I was on good terms with the C.C.F. candidate. We were personal friends and very likely will always continue to be. During the election campaign the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) was in my riding.

Mr. Graydon: I am afraid I elected you.

Mr. Harrison: Thank you. I might say that many of his compatriots of good substance found it fitting to support either me or the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent)—I would not know which for sure.

There is one crying need in the riding which I represent and which I place on the highest priority. Some years ago, just when the drought was settling in the west, an attempt was made to grade a piece of railroad from St. Walburg through to Beaver Crossing, which is a distance of some ninety miles. At that time there was not a great deal of agricultural land broken up in that area, and now there is and that is where this alfalfa and all of this grain is being produced. The grade is in but some of it has deteriorated in the meantime. We had not only the depression of the thirties, but the ensuing war conditions and so on, when people realized that they could not have this railroad completed at that time; but they do not see any particular objection to having it completed at this time. I can assure you that along parts of that line double the acreage is now under cultivation as compared with a year ago, and that breaking is going ahead quite rapidly. There is also a short strip that needs completion, which is known as the Heinsburg gap between Heinsburg and St. Walburg. I trust that the minister will take note of these and see if he can give us some action on the railroads mentioned.

May I refer to another priority? We have a good deal of fishing in my constituency and it is centred at a place that is known as Buffalo Narrows, which is the centre of the great waterways running to the north. It has been fished pretty well most of the year. Our experience in the west has been—and I think that is true of everywhere else—that you cannot continually reap a crop without sowing some seed. I should like to point out to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) that a fish hatchery is much needed at that point. Fishing supports the Metis in that part of the country.

An Indian tuberculosis wing is also required on the hospital at Ile a la Crosse. During my travels I found that a number of Indians, especially younger children, are sent to Prince Albert, which is a very good institution for treating tuberculosis, but unfortunately the makeup of the Indian child is such that it more or less pines away when it is away from its parents. In spite of the best of care in Prince Albert, these children do not respond to treatment as they would if they were at home where their parents could visit them from time to time.

I have taken great pleasure in informing you about the constituency of Meadow Lake. As I said, it is a large one to cover. I covered it three times during the campaign, twice before the election and once afterwards to thank the people for the way they had treated me. I took Mrs. Harrison along with me and one of our daughters. We flew through to the north side of lake Athabasca to the gold fields area and to the mining development going on up there. I speak of my constituency firsthand, and I am able to tell you that I am the first representative from that constituency who has been able to speak firsthand of it, because none ever travelled up in that northern area before.

Before I conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to compliment the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I have never had an opportunity to meet him personally, but I have been impressed with his attitude, and I might say his contribution to decorum, in this house. I appreciate that to the fullest extent. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) was kind enough to come over and say hello to a new member when we came in. I have not had an opportunity to meet the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), but he was in my riding. He is a very able man and I do not doubt that we shall get along very well even though we are on opposite sides of the house.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I assure you that in spite of certain reverberations which have come from behind me I am on my feet; I also assure you at the outset, sir, that I shall not continue very long. But I do want to bring to the attention of yourself and the house two matters which I regard as somewhat important, one probably local and the other somewhat general. Before doing so I wish to add my congratulations first, sir, to you and then to the chairman of the committee of the whole, to the clerk and to the clerk assistant, and to the mover and seconder of the address. I must say with respect to the seconder, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing), that it has been my business for more years than I care to remember to listen to speeches. I do not mean those made in this house which of course are of the very highest order at all times. One can say things here with his tongue in his cheek and under our rules nobody can dispute him. I must say about the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver South—I speak seriously—that as a matter of sheer eloquence it was in my judgment just about the finest thing that I have heard in the five years, this being the sixth, that I have been here. It was eloquent not merely in phrase-making. It was the eloquence of a man who must write, I am sure, because it had a solid foundation of ideas behind the wonderful expressions which he used.

I am going to speak briefly on only two matters. May I assure you, sir, with respect, that I have been tempted many times but I am not going to try to shoot for a minute and a half into French—which I am sure will please you and all other hon. members. We have it suggested that many new committees be set up. I think that a committee should be set up among the French members who would censor the French pronunciation of those persons to whom French is not the mother tongue. We might even include the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) because he looks to me so differently at times. When he changes language he changes personality, but may I say to him in compliment that with each change he gets better and better all the time.

I am going to make a request of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), and I hope I shall be making it of the proper minister. It is this. In view of the change in the value of our currency it is time that he, or those charged with the responsibility, should make a re-examination of the problem of coal to these middle Canadian provinces. It seems to me that this 10 per cent must be to them a heavy factor. I refer to the price that they are paying right here in Ottawa. I noticed in yesterday's paper that the minimum price of what is called furnace coal, right here in Ottawa—and in brackets were the words "American coal"—was $24.35 a ton.

Perhaps I am the one member, apart from the then minister of mines and resources, who read carefully from cover to cover the report of the coal commission. While there were a lot of words in that report, we now have a problem of great importance to those people out there, and to the people in this portion of Canada where, in view of the dollar situation, a great contribution might be made to ourselves, while at the same time assisting our railway people and all others who would be engaged in the transportation of that product. I know we have certain subventions in railway rates.

I pay great compliment to my old friend Frank Neate who, I believe, knows more about coal matters in Canada than anyone else in Canada. I would mention, too, Dr. Camsell, whom I met in the elevator only yesterday. But it does seem to me there is a real opportunity for reconsideration and restudy of this whole problem.

We are told—and I am sure it is true—that our No. 1 currency difficulty is in connection with the securing of American dollars for the purchase of coal in the United States. I make these observations, not in any critical sense at all, but merely as a suggestion to those who are responsible, and would urge my view that this is an excellent time to re-examine the whole problem. The benefits to Canada as a whole are certainly large; the prize is worth while. It is worth examination and striving for to bring about unity in our country—and I mean unity in the economy of our country. Perhaps it would bring us together and do all of us a great deal of good if we were to examine that problem.

I apologize to you, sir, and to my old personal friend and political colleague for having interrupted him a moment ago when he referred to the transportation of oil. Let me say that the increase in the production of oil in Alberta is nothing less than phenomenal. I do not think anyone can laugh off 65,000 barrels a day. That can be greatly increased, of course, the moment we are able to bring it to market. It seems to me the only solution of this whole problem is that our oil from Alberta should find outlets in the United States, and that oil from the United States on an exchange basis should enter eastern Canada, thereby making our dollar situation infinitely easier and giving us a tremendous shield by way of markets.

I am sure we would find that our American cousins would agree with that, because we know that in so far as new discoveries are concerned in the United States, they are not beginning to keep up with the consumption of the product in that country. May I, to my good friends from Saskatchewan, and particularly my hon. friend the member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Harrison), who spoke a moment ago, give a little bit of good news—theoretical as it may be. Some weeks ago I spent an evening with an old friend who, I believe, is the outstanding geologist in that country, and who has had longer experience there than anyone else. I refer to my friend Dr. Ted Tink, who was with the Imperial Oil Company, but who is now retired and acts as a consultant. He showed me a map showing what is called the sedimentary basin—because it is admitted now by all geologists that oil comes from the dissolution of marine life in sediment.

So we have this sedimentary basin; and there is a trifle more of it in Saskatchewan than there is in Alberta. From a geological standpoint, that sedimentary basin in those two provinces is larger than any or all similar basins in the United States—Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, Michigan, Illinois, and all those states where oil is found.

I mention this to put before the house not the certainty, probably not the probability, but certainly the possibility in that tremendous prairie area of an oil field greater than this world has ever known. We need not speak of the economic possibilities of that; do not let us confine it to its equivalent in American dollars. Let us think of it on the basis that perhaps—and God forbid—we may be in another war. Everyone knows now that wars are fought on gasoline. With the exception of a small amount of oil from the Roumanian fields, the Germans fought the last several years of the last war on synthetic gasoline made from coal. Here we are in this country with amazing coal deposits. Scientists have not changed the volume. It is still 14 per cent of the world's known coal deposits.

I have mentioned these things because they are problems for study, and may throw some light on our future. I am sick and tired of listening to people who point out to me the difficulty we are in and the certainty of depressions—and even collapse—next year or the year after. I am thoroughly fed up with all those people who tell us about the housing difficulties—and there are difficulties—and about the small amounts of money that some of our people earn.

These things are true. Then they blame it all on the system known as the free enterprise system, individual enterprise—call it what you like. But, admitting there are many things wrong, I think it is just about time to say that the people who do all this complaining would not be here if it were not for that same system. Let us never forget that, while there are things wrong with it, you don't throw the baby out with the bath water. You try to improve the system, if you have a nickel's worth of brains in your head; and you do not try to destroy the thing and start all over again from nothing.

You will remind yourself, Mr. Speaker,—and you are younger than I am—that in your time we got the telephone and the electric light. Where I lived we got indoor plumbing. We did not complain about things. Why? All this is comparative. In Regina, where I was born, everybody was broke and because everybody was broke we did not know we were broke. So we all had a splendid time.

I speak with some experience of that country. My people drove into Regina in 1882 ahead of the C.P.R. from Indian Head and got there in February 1883. At that time I was not even a twinkle in my father's eye, as I was not born until 1886. But my mother has told me of the first winter when they lived in a tent on frozen potatoes and buffalo meat. Were they unhappy? Certainly not. We were a splendid people. Many of us have survived and some of us have achieved something. But we did not bite at everything and blame the government for it. We did not live that way.

At that time we had the old government of the Northwest Territories. I remember going up there as a high school youngster. I was about to say that I went upon my bicycle but I remember that bicycles were not even invented. I ran up there and I watched Sir Frederick Haultain take the hide off an old friend of mine, Viscount Bennett as he later became and who now is gone. As you know, Sir Frederick died in Montreal only a short time ago. I have been politically minded ever since, but I had to wait until 1945 when the weakness of my political enemies put me down here—and I got back again in 1949. But I claim no right to be a statesman or anything of that kind.

I am glad the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) is here and I am sorry the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is not. I should like at this time to make a special plea which may be somewhat out of place. In your absence I made a speech the other night about football during the agricultural estimates and no great harm was done to anyone at that time. The matter I wish to bring up was not mentioned in the speech from the throne. I make a plea on behalf of the older superannuated mounted police.

These men have been to a number of governments but they have not got anywhere. I appreciate the difficulty of this government and of the government between 1935 and 1940 when faced with this problem. I appreciate that the minute you alter the superannuation pay for any government servants you probably open up a subject which may be too large and too difficult to deal with at one time. That is the answer these men have always been given.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

I speak of these men with more than sympathy; I speak of them with enthusiasm. I was born in the place which was the headquarters of that force. I saw them go off to the South African war. I saw them go off to the Klondike trail. In fact my only successful business transaction, outside of the money I make from reading the law books on the walls of my office, was made at that time. I stole a hockey stick from my father's store. That was the beginning. I traded it to a lad by the name of Cameron Bennett for a dog and I sold the dog to the mounted police for $4. As I say, that is the only successful business transaction I have ever had. I am sorry it had to begin with a theft, but after all my father had a lot of hockey sticks in his store.

Many of the men I am speaking about are alive today and perhaps that is all you can say for them. The answer that has been given to these men by both Tory and Liberal governments—I make no distinction—is that this is a civil service matter. It seems to me that that answer is completely wrong because in a sense these men were not civil servants. They were men of the army. They were under discipline. They did not have an eight hour, a nine hour, or whatever it may be, day; they were on duty—not actively it is true but on call—for twenty-four hours in the day.

Their numbers have been cut down by violence. As a youngster I heard of the famous case involving an Indian by the name of Almighty Horse who killed Sergeant Colbrook. We lost half a dozen policemen trying to capture him up near where the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) comes from. I remember the facts of that case. Colbrook was told to bring in this fellow and he and a young half-breed interpreter went out for him. They met up with this Indian buck. He told Colbrook, "Come one step further and you are a dead man." Colbrook had been told to bring him in alive; he took that other step and was shot right between the eyes. That is not civil service; that is the case of a man going out in defence of decency.

I can remember the first time we had trouble with the Doukhobors. Thank goodness they have left us and gone to join our friends in British Columbia. They say they find themselves more at home there, and now they are burning up schoolhouses, shooting at one another and that sort of thing. I can remember an old police sergeant who was there when they first went on one of their nude parades in the vicinity of Yorkton. The police went out and brought them in and they were quartered in what we called the riding school. You have nicer names for those buildings now, you call them armouries and all that sort of thing, but we called it the riding school. They lived upstairs but they were not very good residents. For one thing, they would not take a bath. If you had a rope with two pails attached they would walk along and perhaps splash it over themselves, but beyond that they just would not take a bath. We kids used to go up and watch them eating grass. They would roll it up into little balls, push it in their mouths and eat it. But they refused to bathe.

You can imagine the condition of things. They were not exactly as sanitary as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) tells us they should be. The police brought them down to Wascana creek, which the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will remember quite well. At that time we did not have the beautiful lake there is there now; there was just a little dam which made a swimming hole for us. I have no doubt the minister has been there many times.

They took them down there and there was one chap who called himself John the Baptist. He was a most recalcitrant creature. They asked John the Baptist if he would go in and take a bath and he said he would not. Four mounties picked him up and—one, two, three, four, and in went John. The weeds in that creek were something. Talk about the sedimentary basin in Alberta! We certainly had one there. Out came John the Baptist and he said that he would not walk back; they would have to carry him. It was then as a youngster that I learned for the first time what a frog march really was. The way they did it was this: There was one on each arm and one on each leg and they marched him with his stomach toward the front. Then as they went along and when John least expected it the fifth man came in with an awful push in the middle of his back and John walked. That is neither here nor there.

What am I seeking for these men? I have their consent to say what I am saying inasmuch as they have their own veterans organization. I had hoped to have the parliamentary assistant from Coast-Capilano to help me, but I know I have his sympathy. All I am asking at the present time is that these old men who are ill and crippled, and who have retired on these pensions granted long ago, which we all know are not sufficient to maintain life itself, let alone a living in decency, be allowed hospitalization on the basis of military service.

I say, Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect to everyone here, that is not asking a great deal. I realize that it requires the co-operation of two or probably three departments. There are not many of them left. They are pretty well all gone now. It seems to me that the cost would be small and would not violate any principle except to convince ourselves that those men were keepers of the peace who did not leave their jobs at five o'clock. I am not criticizing people who do; do not misunderstand me. In the old days, and I think it is still true, a mounted policeman who lost a prisoner after five days on account of lack of sleep was put in the clink. That was true then.

I remember a poor chap who brought one down to Battleford. There was no railway through Battleford in those days. I know that, because in 1903 I walked from Lloydminster to Battleford and from Battleford to Saskatoon on the top of the railway dump, and it is 100 miles in each lap. I do know that I never enjoyed a walk more in my life, just a couple of hundred miles before breakfast.

I know of one man who is still confined in one of our mental institutions. He is a very old man now. He had a prisoner and he travelled for five and a half days with him. The only thing he could do was to handcuff him to himself. He arrived in Battleford. That was before North Battleford was ever heard of. In those days Battleford was a police post. I could give you instance after instance of which I have personal knowledge.

I know that the heads of the proper departments will be sympathetic, but I ask them not to treat it as a difficulty which cannot be overcome because of interference in some larger plan. It is not a part of a larger plan if we regard these men as having given not civil but military service to our country, which they have been giving from the days of the Riel rebellion. You can take the whole history of this country, and their major service has been that of maintaining law and order. The country was not as civilized then as it is now when every time a person puts out his hand and does a nickel's worth of work for himself he asks for ten cents from the government. Many of us are getting into that habit. Thanks very much; I will accept a retainer at any moment from any member of the government.

I do say with the greatest respect and deference that those of these men who are still alive, and who are in the Belcher hospital in Calgary or some place like that, should be allowed to live out their last days in comfort and, having eaten a sausage for breakfast, not worry whether they should or should not have saved half of it for their dinner that night.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, after the marvellous stories of western Canada with which we have been regaled during the past forty minutes, the house might be willing to have the debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Fulton the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: As provided by the terms of the motion adopted on the first day, we will proceed with government business tomorrow. The first order of business will be the second reading of the bill to amend the Supreme Court Act, and, after that is disposed of, estimates.

Mr. Knowles: What department?

Mr. St. Laurent: The Department of Agriculture has not been completed. If it is completed, I understand that the Minister of Justice is prepared to proceed with his estimates.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, September 23, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

ATOMIC ENERGY

EXPLOSION IN U.S.S.R.—INTERNATIONAL CONTROL, AND USE FOR PEACEFUL PURPOSES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I felt that my first public reference to the subject matter of the statements issued this morning by the President of the United States of America and by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom should be in this house.

In the course of Mr. Truman's statement he said:

> We have evidence that within recent weeks an atomic explosion occurred in the U.S.S.R.
>
> Ever since atomic energy was first released by man, the eventual development of this new force by other nations was to be expected. This probability has always been taken into account by us.
>
> Nearly four years ago I pointed out that "scientific opinion appears to be practically unanimous that the essential theoretical knowledge upon which the discovery is based is already widely known. There is also substantial agreement that foreign research can come abreast of our present theoretical knowledge in time." And, in the three-nation declaration of the President of the United States and the prime ministers of the United Kingdom and of Canada, dated November 15, 1945, it was emphasized that no single nation could in fact have a monopoly of atomic weapons.
> This recent development emphasizes once again, if indeed such emphasis were needed, the necessity for that truly effective enforceable international control of atomic energy which my government and the large majority of the members of the United Nations support.

On this occasion I would only say that the government of Canada associates itself fully with these observations, as it had done with the decision to make public the information contained in these statements.

May I express the hope that with new knowledge may come a new sense of a shared responsibility for and an equal interest in agreeing on an effective enforceable international control of atomic energy so that this new force can be used solely for peaceful purposes.

FREIGHT RATES

JUDGMENT OF TRANSPORT BOARD—QUESTION AS TO DELAYING ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Does section 52 of the Railway Act give the government the power to rescind or vary a decision of the judgment of the board of transport commissioners? If so, in view of the discriminatory structure of Canadian railway and express rates, will the government exercise its authority to delay the coming into effect of the board's decision until the house has had an opportunity of discussing the royal commission's report on the present rate structure of the railways?

Mr. St. Laurent: The Minister of Transport is prepared to answer the question.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The answer to the first question is that the powers of the governor in council under section 52 of the Railway Act are judicial in nature and have to my knowledge never been exercised since confederation with perhaps one exception in 1917, in the case of the McAdoo award.

The answer to the second question is that after giving consideration to the position, and without prejudice to appeal, the government does not intend to interfere with the judgment.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

DEVALUATION OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—EXPORT PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Does he think the devaluation of the Canadian dollar will cause Canadian exporters to cut their prices in foreign markets? What would be the effect of such cuts upon our receipts of foreign exchange?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The hon. member has given notice of this question, and I should like to answer it in this way. I would hope that Canadian exporters would not cut their prices unnecessarily. Canadian export prices have been competitive, and are relatively low compared with those in most other countries. If the prices at which our goods are sold abroad in terms of foreign currencies are reduced beyond what the competitive position requires, we shall get less foreign exchange. As I said the other day we need to receive all the foreign exchange we can get in order to enable us to pay for our imports and to keep our over-all trading account on the right side.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): May I ask this supplementary question? If this course is followed, does it mean United States importers of Canadian products such as lumber and newsprint will be paying the same price in their currency as they formerly paid?

Mr. Abbott: Yes; that is right.

FISHERIES

PINK SALMON FISHING ON THE FRASER RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Fisheries, based upon a telegram received today from Vancouver. Is it the intention of the department to close area 17 on the Fraser river to pink salmon fishing? If curtailment of fishing is necessary for conservation, could it not be met by extending the weekly escape period, so that the hundreds of small gill net fishermen could get their fair share of the catch?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): The department has already replied to a similar telegram received from the United Fishermen's Co-operative Association in Vancouver, pointing out that the situation is at present under review.

Under the Fisheries Act we are responsible for conserving the fisheries. This year the run of pink salmon up the Fraser river appears to be smaller than the parent run of two years ago. Up to the moment the number of fish which have been caught in the river itself is small, and escapement to the breeding grounds has been negligible. At present the gill netters are allowed to fish four days a week, with a closed period of seventy-two hours. During the current closure the department has all its available local staff on the river, and estimates are being made of escapement. No decision has yet been made to close the Fraser river next week. Any decision made then by our chief supervisor, who is on the river, will be based upon the views of an experienced staff, in consultation with fishermen and others interested.

Mr. Green: I was going to ask the same question. It does not pay to be too polite around this chamber. Is the minister taking into consideration the fact that seine-fishing boats have already been able to catch a great many of the fish which would have been going up the Fraser river, and would otherwise be available to the small gill netters? The suggestion in the telegram I received is that the small man has not been treated fairly as compared with the big fellow who has an expensive seine boat.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Mayhew: Fishing by seines has been closed for some time—since the twentieth, I believe. The only gill-netters in the Fraser river are now fishing in area 17, or up the Fraser river. The amount of fish caught by seines has been large because of the great amount caught this year in the strait. This year the weather was favourable for fishing in that area, and therefore the seine nets did get quite a fair quantity of fish. The situation of the gill netters is one which is being considered.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Has the minister any information about the quality of the gill net fish which are being caught in the far reaches of the Fraser river?

Mr. Mayhew: The quality of pink salmon caught in the Fraser river as a rule is not as high as the quality caught farther out in the sound, or in the strait of Juan de Fuca.

PANDIT JAWAHARLAL NEHRU

QUESTION AS TO VISIT TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. During the summer it was believed that Canada might expect an official visit from Prime Minister Nehru of India. Is the Prime Minister in a position to indicate to the house whether or not Canada will be favoured by a visit from him this fall?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The answer is yes. I could not give the house the tentative dates which have been set for the visit; I should not like to give them from memory. At another sitting I shall indicate the dates which have been tentatively set.

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIR LINES

CRASH OF AIRCRAFT—CONSIDERATION BY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Has he any statement to make in connection with the destruction of a Canadian Pacific air liner a short time ago in the vicinity of Quebec? I think the minister will know that I ask this because of persistent rumours which have been heard.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I am aware that certain rumours have been circulated in connection with the air crash, but I am unable to make a statement until the investigating board appointed for the purpose of investigating the crash has reported. My officials informed me this morning that the committee is still considering the facts.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Has it been found that there was an explosion before the crash?

Mr. Chevrier: The preliminary report so indicates.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION OF GERMAN NATIONALS TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources. Has the government given consideration to relaxing the immigration laws in order to let into this country German nationals who have relatives in Canada?

Hon. Colin Gibson (Minister of Mines and Resources): I did not receive notice of his question from the hon. member, but I shall be glad to look into the matter and make a statement later.

SUPREME COURT ACT

VARIOUS AMENDMENTS—ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL

The house resumed, from Tuesday, September 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the bill now before the house, one must consider not only the broad principles involved but also the extent to which the bill meets or falls short of the requirements of the subject under consideration.

With the statements made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) as to Canada's sovereignty, there will be little or no disagreement. Our full national stature was recognized without any reservation when Canada signed the treaty of Versailles in June, 1919. If there had been any doubt before, it was removed by the signature of Canada to that document, as a full and sovereign nation, and also by the statements which accompanied that act. Since then, of course, there have been a number of events which have emphasized the constitutional stature of Canada as a nation, and every Canadian shares a feeling of pride in the place which this country occupies in that respect. Every Canadian shares the pride that is felt in the great achievements of a nation of 13,500,000 people, which today occupies a position in the world out of all proportion to its population. About these things there can be no disagreement.

Because of the recent union of Newfoundland, Canada comprises the whole northern half of this great continent. Whatever other changes there may be at any time in Canada's external associations, there would appear to be no doubt that, as one of the hon. members from Newfoundland put it yesterday, Canada's territorial ambitions on the North American continent have been realized. We now occupy that great area, from sea to sea, which was envisaged as an entity by those who prior to 1867 met, first at Charlottetown and later at Quebec, to join in drafting what amounted to a basic constitution under which this federation has grown great and strong throughout the years, upon the very principle of partnership and division of responsibility which was set out in that constitution.

We are all conscious of the part that the constitution of Canada played throughout the years in the achievement of national unity, national growth and national understanding. We are not only proud of Canada's historic past in the sense of the achievements that can be measured in statistical terms; we are proud of it when it is measured in terms of increasing understanding among people who, of different races and different backgrounds, live in widely separated parts of this great land.

Geographical conditions, and the association of two great races, made it inevitable that Canada would adopt a federal constitution. In considering any aspect of this subject we must remember that there never could have been one united Canada as we know it today had there not been full acceptance of the principles incorporated in our federal constitution and set forth in simple terms in the British North America Act, 1867. For that reason it is extremely important that in looking to the immense possibilities of development of this country in the years ahead we should at no time forget that the very strength of this nation has rested upon the respect for that basic constitution which means so much to the people of every part of Canada.

There are some who, overpowered by the dramatic events of the past few years, are inclined to say: "Well, what does the constitution matter anyway? What difference does it make where the division of authority rests? What difference does it make who has the responsibility of particular acts of government or administration? Today we have had emphasized in this chamber the significance of dramatic changes throughout the world, of a kind which make people believe that everything has relationship to these terrifying advances of science which increase the power of destruction.

This is only natural. When we are told that Russia has discovered the secret of atomic power, and has actually carried that knowledge to the point of creating atomic explosions, there is a tendency to reduce all our thinking to the importance of these overpowering events. The fact is that man has gone through the centuries hearing of new dangers, learning of new means of destruction which seemed to be so terrifying that it did not appear worth while to carry on ordinary day by day occupations. Going back to the time when gunpowder was discovered, one can read almost as ominous predictions as one reads today in relation to what may happen as a result of nuclear fission. Recalling these various stages in the history of man's struggle we recognize how each new development brought new concern for the future. In the first world war the launching of the gas attack in April, 1915, caused people to wonder whether it would be possible to meet the terrible consequences of these discoveries of science. But with each of these developments men and women throughout the world are challenged to use, to a greater extent than ever, their intelligence and their powers of co-operation and association for high purposes. No matter what dramatic international events may occur, each nation should be extremely careful to retain the strength of its own internal structure. And when these powerful forces are associated with the danger of aggression against our free system, we should be doubly conscious of the need of strengthening that system to the utmost extent of our intelligence and ability, and in the light of a full understanding of the history of our own country.

Therefore no matter what occurs beyond the boundaries of Canada, a great contribution to the combined strength of the free nations, as well as to our own domestic stability and happiness, will be to remember the lessons of the past and to take no step which might reduce the safeguards we have set up for the preservation of the free system which has been developed and matured under our basic constitution.

No matter to what extent we may agree with the general purposes of the bill in its present form, it is extremely important that every member should examine carefully all its provisions. As was pointed out by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) when he moved second reading of the bill, section 3, the effect of which is to terminate further appeals to the privy council, is the key provision of the proposed legislation.

[Mr. Drew.]

This is not the first time that the House of Commons has been called upon to discuss the abolition of appeals, or a limitation of the right of appeal, to the privy council. It is a long time since Sir John A. Macdonald was responsible for the introduction of legislation which limited the right of appeal to the privy council so far as criminal actions were concerned. I suggest that the history of that legislation in itself offers the strongest reasons why we should be most careful in dealing with this subject, no matter what our views may be as to the object of the bill now before us.

It will be recalled that there was an act of the parliament of Canada in 1887 which was found to be inadequate for the purposes intended. It was followed by another act in 1888, and it was many years afterwards before it was determined that there was any inadequacy in that statute. The history of that earlier legislation, for which Sir John A. Macdonald was responsible, suggests to us that in dealing with a matter which has been the subject of consideration since pre-confederation days we may well examine the full effect of any proposed legislation in this regard, no matter how strong our desire may be to carry out the object of this bill.

The bill does not affect only the right of appeal to the privy council by individuals and corporations in civil matters. If that alone were the effect, there might be little occasion to emphasize some of the considerations we should have in mind today. The effect of the bill would not only be to terminate the ordinary civil appeal to the privy council. It would also terminate the role of the privy council as the body which acts as the referee, if you will, between the different governments of Canada in determining their constitutional rights and responsibilities and the division of authority under the British North America Act. These two aspects of the position of the privy council are of great importance.

The Minister of Justice has pointed out that with the passing of this bill individuals or corporations who are litigants will not be confronted with the possibility of having to carry their litigation beyond Canada itself. But apart from the function of the privy council as an appeal tribunal in civic matters, affecting individuals or corporations, there is the immensely important place occupied by the privy council as an independent tribunal interpreting our constitution in cases where there is a difference of opinion between the dominion and provincial governments as to the effect of the constitution and as to some aspects of their rights and responsibilities or the respective fields of their administrative duties.

The purpose of and the result which would flow from the passing of this bill must be taken into consideration along with the statements which are made in the speech from the throne about proposals to take certain steps in regard to the amendment of the constitution. I should like to read two paragraphs from the speech from the throne which, it seems to me, have a direct bearing on a proper consideration of the full effect of the bill which is now before us. I quote:

> You will also be asked to approve addresses praying the parliament of the United Kingdom to vest in the parliament of Canada the right to amend the constitution of Canada in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces nor affecting the constitutional rights and privileges of the provinces or existing rights and privileges with respect to education or the use of the English and French languages.
> My ministers will seek to arrange for early consultation with the provincial governments with a view to agreeing upon an appropriate procedure for making within Canada such other amendments to the constitution as may from time to time be required.

As I said in my remarks in the debate on the address in reply, it is not easy to say exactly what those words mean until we have before us the resolution which is forecast in those two paragraphs. But from the wording of the second paragraph it would appear that this parliament is to be asked to draw a distinction between federal and provincial responsibilities and jurisdictions. May I qualify that statement by saying that when the resolution is introduced, it may, as sometimes happens, present a different picture from that which would seem to be indicated by the wording of the speech from the throne. I do not suggest that there is any intention that these words should not convey a completely accurate impression, but they are of necessity brief; and the resolutions which carry forward the intention stated in the speech from the throne may go much further than is here suggested. But if the wording of the second paragraph I have quoted means what it seems to mean, it would appear that the provincial governments are to be consulted only in regard to matters which in the opinion of the dominion government—with, of course, the support of parliament—do not fall within the federal jurisdiction.

The very fact that it is so difficult to determine what these words mean is in itself a reason why this whole subject should be approached with great caution, and, in the desire to carry out the object stated by the Minister of Justice, undue haste should not create any situation which might in itself defeat the purpose he has in mind. After all, the whole record of decisions of the privy council in constitutional matters since 1867 is almost entirely an interpretation of the rights or responsibilities of the various governments of Canada, and from time to time there was a different point of view as to where the boundary line between the rights and the responsibilities should be drawn. That being so, it would be unwise for the government or this parliament to seek to deliver the judgment of Solomon without calling in the parties concerned and at least trying to find out which one of them thinks it really owns any particular child that may be under consideration at the moment. After all, this is something that has been under consideration for a long time, and there are still many points of difference as to where that boundary line actually is.

This is not the first time this matter has been spoken of. It is not the first time it has been considered elsewhere. It was considered by a body which has, of course, no official authority to guide the course of any member of this house, which deals with the business of the people of Canada. But in view of the fact that this is largely a legal problem, some attention might well be paid to the views expressed by the lawyers of Canada at their annual meeting, in the same way that in a matter affecting the health of the people it might be wise to consider the opinions expressed by medical experts, or, in the case of some important construction program, the opinion of engineers through their organization. A resolution of the Canadian Bar Association has no higher authority than that of any other similar body, but at least it represents the considered opinion of a profession which is trained to deal with constitutional matters and with legal problems arising out of constitutional questions.

For this reason, and because of the importance of the subject, I should like to read into the record a resolution which was passed, I understand unanimously, by the Canadian Bar Association and—on the very day, if I am not misinformed, that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was honoured by being chosen a life president of that important organization.

The resolution is headed, "Abolition of appeals to the privy council". It reads as follows:

> Whereas the government of Canada has announced its intention to introduce legislation, at the next session of the parliament of Canada, providing for the abolition of appeals to the privy council, and making the Supreme Court of Canada our final court of appeal in all matters;
> Be it resolved that the Canadian Bar Association, without expressing any view as to the wisdom or otherwise of the proposed abolition, is of the opinion:
> 1. That any bill for the abolition of the privy council appeal should contain the necessary provisions as to the organization and jurisdiction of the supreme court of the system by which its judges will be appointed. That sufficient time be given before the statute is enacted to permit the public to give consideration, both as to the question whether the abolition of the appeal to the privy council should take place and to the constitution and powers of the court that may replace it, and also to the effect which the abolition may have upon provincial and minority rights.

2. If, as and when the appeal should be abolished, it is the opinion of this association as at present advised:

(a) That the supreme court should consist of nine judges.

(b) That a quorum of the court should be five judges.

(c) That it should sit always with an odd number of judges present.

(d) That there should be no change in the present practice of the court, under which each member is free to give reasons for his judgment.

(e) That the court should continue to sit at Ottawa only.

(f) That the salaries of the judges of the court should be substantially increased so as to make such salaries commensurate with the responsibilities of the office, with an appropriate additional amount to the chief justice.

(g) That the rule of stare decisis ought to continue to be applied with respect to past decisions of the court, as well as with respect to past decisions of the judicial committee.

This is the resolution which was adopted by the Canadian Bar Association. I point out again that it is no more than the resolution of an association made up of members of a profession of which, of course, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice are members. Many of the members of this organization are called upon to deal with constitutional and legal problems.

Some of the points put forward in this recommendation are incorporated in this bill, such as the number of judges, and matters of the kind. I believe the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice will agree that those present at the meeting of the Canadian Bar Association were highly qualified Canadian lawyers, many of them top-ranking experts in constitutional law. It will be seen that they placed emphasis on two things. The first is that sufficient time be given before the bill is enacted to permit the public to give consideration to the question whether abolition of appeals to the privy council should take place, and—I should like to emphasize these words—"to the constitution and powers of the court that may replace it, and also to the effect which the abolition may have upon provincial and minority rights".

In the last subparagraph of paragraph 2 there is the recommendation that the rule of stare decisis ought to continue to be applied with respect to past decisions of the court as well as with respect to past decisions of the judicial committee. The recommendation of this annual meeting of senior members of the legal profession is not something new; it is not something that has been stated for the first time. Similar views have been expressed in this chamber at various times when the subject of amendment of our constitution and related matters were under consideration.

Yesterday we listened to an illuminating exposition of some of the problems presented by this part of the speech from the throne. It was pointed out that the problems related to amendment of the constitution had been under consideration here, and it was one subject upon which Mr. King and Mr. Bennett were in agreement at a time when they sat on opposite sides of this house. In discussing amendments to the constitution, Mr. Bennett used these words—I quote from Hansard of 1937, page 2595:

—we can accomplish it more quickly, and more in accordance with our democratic institutions, if we hold a convention representing the provinces and the dominion and all shades of political opinion. There could then be presented to this parliament a petition which could be passed through the Commons and the Senate after the legislatures of the provinces have dealt with it.

It was about that very proposal that Mr. King indicated that he thought this would be the ideal procedure. It may be suggested that the subject under discussion then did not cover as wide a field as that now under review. That is correct, but the fact that we have under consideration, as a result of the statements in the speech from the throne, a much wider field, seems to me to be all the greater reason why we should take steps which would avoid any conflicts or misunderstandings which in the future might weaken the feeling of confidence and mutual good will which has been the great achievement of this constitution during the eighty-two years since confederation.

Something more is involved than the question of appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada. Before the provincial governments are told how their constitutional position will be interpreted it would seem highly desirable that they be consulted as to the procedure by which this will be done, as to the kind of tribunal which would meet their desires, and as to the authority of that tribunal to interpret the constitution.

In the very last subparagraph of paragraph 2 the Canadian Bar Association refers to a matter which is giving a great deal of concern to those who are thinking about this proposal. We must recognize that this is not a subject which can be fully understood without some knowledge of our constitutional structure and the constitutional problem. One question of great importance is this: What is to happen to the decisions which have been made during the past eighty-two years by the privy council and by the Supreme Court of Canada in interpreting our constitution? This is not something which affects only lawyers or persons who are interested in constitutional niceties; it affects the daily life of all our people.

If we look at the duties which are carried out by the dominion and the provincial governments through all their different departments, we find that many of these departments, if not most of them, are not even mentioned by name—or the subject is not mentioned by name—in the constitution. Whether these responsibilities and administrative duties fall within the jurisdiction of the dominion or of the province was in most cases determined by the result of an appeal to the courts to decide where the dividing line really lay between the fields of rights, responsibilities and duties of the different governments.

If the decisions in the past of the Supreme Court of Canada and of the privy council were to be swept aside, there would be endless confusion, and the whole structure of government would to some extent lose its defined form. Therefore great importance should be attached to the recommendation of the Canadian Bar Association that, when this matter is dealt with, there be no doubt as to the extent to which judgments refining and defining our constitution, either by the Supreme Court of Canada or by the judicial committee of the privy council, shall have their continuing effect in the ordinary way as precedents to be recognized in future interpretations of that statute, except to such a degree as it may be amended.

At the moment we are not in a position to say how far these past decisions would be binding. We are not in a position to say exactly where the boundary line is to be, and what the things are in regard to which the members of the dominion government are to consult the provincial governments. Granted, it says in the speech from the throne that this consultation will be in regard to those other matters; but that implies that there is to be a decision as to what falls within the jurisdiction of the dominion government.

It may be said that it would be extremely difficult to get complete agreement, but the desirability of agreement and of consultation is asserted in the speech from the throne. If it is desirable that the provincial governments be consulted in regard to the way in which the amendments in respect to matters which are strictly provincial are to be made, it is equally important, if not more important, that there be consultation before any attempt is made to divide those fields, because there may be wide disagreement as to where the boundary line actually is. Until some statement is made as to how that definition will be worked out, it is difficult for the provincial governments to know what the basis of consultation will be, or where the borderline will be.

What this really means is that we are splitting our constitution in two, and that in regard to a single constitution which has been the very framework of our nation, all of that structure might be changed without an opportunity to secure the opinion of those who carry on the other part of the combined business of government in this country.

Undoubtedly there are many who sincerely believe that it would be infinitely better if the powers of the provincial governments were limited, and that this country could be more efficiently governed if there were one single government having full authority over the whole of Canada. Those who hold this view are no doubt quite sincere in their expression of that opinion. There are others who do not hold that view, but who nevertheless seem to be unaware of the extent to which that division of authority can be whittled down by apparently innocent extensions of central authority which, step by step, might produce a fully centralized government, in fact if not in name.

There are many who regard the assertion of provincial rights as a relic of the past, as an attempt to play up the importance of provincial authority. But it goes far beyond that. In their wisdom the fathers of the Canadian confederation obtained from the parliament at Westminster a constitution which respected the traditions of our people in different parts of Canada, respected the rights of the people in different geographical areas, and established the rights of those who joined to make this one nation. And it is not enough to assert in mere words the retention of those rights. It is not enough to assert in mere words the retention of that local administrative authority. It must be a reality.

Suppose the dominion government further encroaches upon provincial fields of taxation, which might come from amendments which could be made by this parliament; how much meaning has an assertion of the right of the province to administer education or other local matters, if the province is not to have independent authority to raise the revenues to carry out its responsibilities in that field? The right and the power to obtain such revenue as is required for a particular purpose is the very power of government itself. Any government can be clothed with apparent authority and can be given apparent jurisdiction which has little or no meaning if that government must come to some other government and ask for a sum of money to carry it out.

This is not a theoretical problem. These problems have arisen in other countries. The federal system has broken down in other countries where a division of real responsibility, of real taxing power, of real authority did not go hand in hand under a constitution which could be clearly interpreted and could be invoked through some recognized tribunal just as effectively by one government as by another.

This matter has been given extended consideration by other countries than Canada. It has been considered, for instance, by the United States and by Australia, which countries, with a number of differences, have a somewhat similar federal structure. Just a few years ago Mr. Franklin Roosevelt, discussing this whole subject of state rights—which corresponds to our problem of provincial rights—said something which it seemed to me has application to what we are considering here today. These are his words:

> The preservation of this home rule by the states is not a cry of jealous commonwealths seeking their own aggrandizement at the expense of sister states. It is a fundamental necessity if we are to remain a truly united country. The whole success of our democracy has not been that it is a democracy wherein the will of a bare majority of the total inhabitants is imposed upon the minority, but because it has been a democracy where through a dividing of government into units called states the rights and interests of the minority have been respected and have always been given a voice in the control of our affairs.

This whole question of the importance of a constitution to divide authority and of the interpretation of that constitution was put forward extremely well by a great Australian constitutional expert, Mr. R. C. Teece, from whose analysis of the subject I should like to quote one paragraph:

> The federal system requires a supreme law—known as the constitution—which will embody the above-mentioned principles, whose provisions can only be amended by some authority above and beyond the ordinary legislative bodies, whether central or provincial. The necessity for such a supreme law can be easily deduced from the other features of federalism. This dual system of government involves, as we have shown, an elaborate distribution of powers between the states and the nation, and the delimitation of the powers granted to each. If the national government were able to extend the powers vested in it, the component states would have no guarantee for the continuance of that amount of independence reserved to them when they entered the federation. If the legislature of state or province could extend its powers, the authority of the central government would be illusory. The very nature of federalism, then, demands that there should be a supreme law defining the powers of the central and state governments, and declaring illegal and invalid any law that they might pass in excess of those powers. For the same reason it follows that it must be beyond the competence of both central and provincial legislatures to alter that supreme law. The authority to do that must be vested in some body in which the legal sovereignty of the federation will thus reside.

In that discussion and in the discussion which has taken place here in Canada there has been the repeated suggestion that if, as and when appeals to the privy council are ended in respect to constitutional matters, appeals in constitutional matters should not go to the Supreme Court of Canada as such but should go to some special constitutional tribunal. This may or may not be an acceptable suggestion but reasons have been put forward for its being considered desirable.

It has been pointed out that in the United States their constitution is interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States. It has been pointed out also that the Supreme Court of the United States operates within a much more rigid framework than the Supreme Court of Canada; not only is it part of the constitution, but the constitution is a rigid one which can be changed only by a system of general amendment supported by the people of the United States. Nevertheless, as you know, sir, questions have been raised as to the interpretation of constitutional matters by the Supreme Court of the United States, and it has been suggested there that it has not been wise in every case to place upon the Supreme Court of the United States the onus of actually writing the constitution. Because of that very fact the Supreme Court of the United States has in certain cases become the centre of political controversy. I should hope that, by every device within the wisdom of this parliament in both its houses, the respect for the Supreme Court of Canada will be preserved by keeping it aloof from anything that might savour of controversy.

It may be said that these are not matters affecting the provinces, and that past history shows that it may be difficult to get agreement by the provinces. Our constitution is one constitution; it is not something that is broken down through the middle. If it is to be changed and a new tribunal set up to determine the rights, responsibilities and administrative duties under it, then I earnestly urge upon the government a recognition of the fact that such constitution as we have in the future will operate best to the advantage of every Canadian if suggestions and proposals are obtained in advance in regard to every aspect of this problem instead of dealing with it piecemeal as is now proposed.

The question of appeal in constitutional matters is part and parcel of our whole constitutional structure. It cannot be separated. As Mr. Teece points out, the constitution itself is the supreme law. But along with that goes the tribunal that will interpret the law, and there must be acceptance of that tribunal; there must be understanding that the tribunal will protect and preserve the rights of all parties and all governments and of the people themselves who live under the guidance and jurisdiction of those governments.

It has been said by the Minister of Justice that there should be no delay in dealing with this matter. But it has not been made clear just why a matter of days or weeks is vital in connection with something that has been continued for eighty-two years.

The minister says that this decision should not be postponed an instant longer. I hope that when he was referring to the smallness of mind and the meanness of spirit of any who might question the desirability of acting immediately in this matter he was not referring to the members of the Canadian Bar Association, who have strongly recommended delay so that there may be full opportunity to examine this matter. I know that the matter was discussed with him when he was at Banff attending the meetings of the Canadian Bar Association, and of course he would be the first to recognize the sincerity of purpose of the men who drafted that resolution.

This question is related to the whole constitutional problem. I am speaking now about the constitutional aspect of it, not about the ordinary civil appeals. I am referring to the appeals that will determine the constitutional position of this country in the future and the kind of federal system we shall have. I know that assurance has been given by the Prime Minister that the rights of the provinces will not be whittled down, but I cannot imagine what injury will follow by holding this back until there can be full consultation in regard to the whole question. I strongly urge that this matter be held back, along with others affecting the constitution, until the whole constitution and its interpretation and the system by which its terms will be interpreted can be discussed fully by the representatives of the dominion government and the provinces.

I am not arguing today for any status quo in regard to the constitution. On the contrary I believe that our constitution can in many respects simplify the procedure and avoid the duplication that now exists between governments. I am not going to go over the many things that have been said, but I want to emphasize that I have not changed my belief in a strong central government dealing with matters that are of national concern, and defined as being of national concern, and in strong provincial governments dealing with matters of provincial concern. But we shall cut down the cost of government if we clearly define the fields of responsibility and avoid much of the duplication which now exists, and if there is general agreement as to the kind of tribunal which will interpret the constitution of our country.

I think there is a good case for the setting up of a special committee to deal with this whole matter, to examine the problems involved and to give advice. This would be accompanied by the setting up of a constitutional convention fully representative of the people of Canada, both in the dominion and in the provincial sphere. In this way we would be making a more progressive move, not merely taking a partial step, the effects of which cannot be fully known until the remainder of the picture is fully understood and is fully seen.

I would urge the setting up of a committee to deal with this whole constitutional question. Similar committees have been set up in the past to deal with this very subject. There are within this chamber many men whose special knowledge would greatly advance the sound development of our constitution and the procedure by which it will be interpreted. Having regard to the view I have expressed that there should be opportunity for consultation in regard to the whole constitutional question, I intend to move an amendment. This is not a formal amendment but it does give the opportunity to do the thing I have urged. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon):

That the word "now" be left out and the words "this day six months" added at the end of the question.

I present this amendment, Mr. Speaker, in the hope that it will be accepted as the means by which an opportunity can be afforded to carry out an inquiry and discussion of the kind suggested by the Canadian Bar Association and others interested in this subject. That, I believe, would not only preserve for the future the advantages we have derived from the great constitution we have known in the past, but would also develop, as the foundation of an even greater Canada in the years ahead, one of the most effective, most workable, and most easily understood constitutions in the world.

Mr. Coldwell: Does the Prime Minister wish to say something?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and even thank him for much of the constructive material in the interesting speech he has just delivered. Of course I must at once disappoint his hopes that the government would accept this amendment for a six months' hoist of this bill. There are some portions of the last part of his speech with which I cannot agree, but may I say at once that I think we are all pursuing the same objective and have the same goal. We wish to maintain in Canada a federal system that will promote the further development of the Canadian nation.

The leader of the opposition has suggested that at this time there might be set up a constitutional committee to go into the question. I think he himself provided the answer to that suggestion because he said it had been done many times before and had got us nowhere.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt, but I did not say it got us nowhere. I said it had been done many times before.

Mr. St. Laurent: It had been done many times, and, knowing the record, I add that it got us nowhere. The leader of the opposition says that whenever there has to be any kind of amendment whatsoever to any part of the constitution there should be consultation with the provinces. That is an opinion that is very frequently voiced, but it is one which we cannot accept. It would imply that the British North America Act is a contract, and that every clause thereof has the effect of a contract between the Canada that did not then exist and the provinces that did not then exist, but which would affect Canada as it now exists and as it came into being when the act was proclaimed, and the provinces which came into being at that time.

With that theory we are in diametric disagreement. We think the British North America Act is a statute which had the effect of distributing the sovereign powers of this young and growing nation between the central authority as to one part of them and the provincial authorities as to the other. We think that the central authority has no right whatsoever to deal with anything which was allocated to the provincial authorities; and on the other hand that the provincial authorities, legislatures and governments, in respect of matters which by the constitution were allocated to the federal parliament and the federal government, do not represent the people who inhabit their provinces. With respect to those matters allocated to the federal parliament and the federal government, the people inhabiting the provinces are represented by the members they elect to sit and vote for them in this House of Commons.

That is not only our theory. That has been the theory followed in practice since the earliest days of confederation. Not less than ten times from 1871 to 1949, amendments to the constitution have been proposed and made without consultation with the provincial governments or the members of the provincial legislatures. That has been the practice, and in the responsible position we occupy we feel that we have no right to recognize that the provincial legislatures or provincial governments have any control whatsoever over those matters of public interest and national sovereignty allocated to the federal authority.

I do not wish to anticipate the debate which will arise when we propose the address respecting the amendment of the constitution foreshadowed in the speech from the throne, but in an effort to allay any anxieties which may exist in anyone's mind, that we are going to attempt to say where the dividing line is between federal and provincial jurisdiction, may I say that I tried to point out the other day, as reported at page 35 of Hansard, that that would be a function the legislative body would not undertake. The legislative body would merely use language which would leave it to the courts to say where the line of demarcation was drawn. The principle would be established that this parliament could deal with matters that had been allocated to it by the constitution, and could not deal with matters that had been allocated to the provinces, or with rights or privileges guaranteed to the provinces, or with rights or privileges in respect of schools, or in respect of the use of the English and French languages, as guaranteed by the constitution.

The language to be used would be language which would have to be construed by the courts in each individual case when a particular amendment was challenged. The courts would have to decide whether there had been an attempt to deal with a subject matter here which did not come within the class of subjects allocated to the federal authority. That is why I agree fully with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that the role, whether it be that of the privy council if this bill is not adopted, or that of the Supreme Court of Canada if it becomes the final tribunal for the decision of Canadian cases, will be a most important one. When there is a contest the Supreme Court of Canada will have the function of deciding which contestant is in the right and which contestant is in the wrong, not by creating new law but by applying the law as it exists.

That makes it extremely important to have the right kind of a court of justice to make that pronouncement, and the only purpose and effect of this bill is to assert that we can organize and have that kind of court in Canada. If there are hon. members, lawyers or laymen, who doubt that the Canadian nation can provide the kind of court that will be worthy of the respect of the nation, they should oppose this bill. But those of us who feel that this nation can and should at this time provide the kind of great national institution that will be able to perform the important function of determining, whenever there is any clash of interest, on which side is the right and on which side is the wrong, will I believe support the move that is now made to have that kind of court created and to have it function here in Canada.

There seems to be a suggestion that it would be something extraordinary to talk of any kind of amendment that could affect the constitutional organization of the central power. But hon. members know that from the origin of the act the provincial legislatures have had that right, as expressed in subsection 1 of section 92 of the act:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—
> 1. The amendment from time to time, notwithstanding anything in this act, of the constitution of the province, except as regards the office of lieutenant governor.

From time to time modifications have been made in provincial constitutions by those who had the authority and were concerned about them, and no one else was consulted or had to be consulted. What is forecast in the speech from the throne is that there will be an application to the parliament at Westminster to say that such amendments to the Canadian constitution as do not affect the jurisdiction of the provinces, or the rights or privileges secured to the provinces, or the minority rights I referred to previously, can be made here in this parliament instead of being made in the parliament at Westminster on motions or addresses adopted by this parliament. That is the only purpose and effect of the measure forecast in the speech from the throne. But that measure would leave to the courts the responsibility and the burden of deciding what is within provincial jurisdiction or constitutes a provincial right and what is of concern only to the federal authority and their decisions will be binding as they have been in the past.

As to the resolution adopted by the Canadian Bar Association, I think it is worthy of great respect because I believe that all those who attend such a meeting, as do those who attend meetings of other professional bodies, attempt to act objectively and to give their fellow citizens the benefit of the best kind of opinion and advice they can tender. I think perhaps the most important provision of this resolution is that when the appeal to the privy council is abolished, provision should be made that the court consist of nine judges; and there are various organizational provisions that are contained in the legislation now submitted to this house. But subparagraph (g) of the resolution reads as follows:

> That the rule of stare decisis ought to continue to be applied with respect to past decisions of the court, as well as with respect to past decisions of the judicial committee.

That is something with which I entirely agree. I think it is a part of the system of the administration of justice in British countries that the decisions are regarded as binding upon themselves and upon all courts of lower jurisdiction, until they are modified or set aside by legislative action. I think that forms part of the duties which a lawyer promoted to the bench promises on his oath to carry out. On his oath he promises to apply the law until such time, if any, as a legislature interferes with it. I would imagine that Canadian judges, sworn to apply and uphold the law, would be as faithful to their oaths of office as are hon. gentlemen called to sit as members of the judicial committee of the privy council in London. I believe that to be the case. If I did not, I would be opposed to this bill. But because I believe it to be the case, I have as firm confidence in a judicial body set up and operated in Canada and composed of my fellow Canadian citizens as I would have in a similar body set up and operating in any other country in the world.

Some suggestion has been made that constitutional cases should not go to the court of last resort. Why? It has been suggested that there should not be political controversy around the decisions of the courts. There should not be political controversies around the decisions of a court of last resort because such controversies would be quite futile unless, as might happen in some cases, they are directed to the obtaining of a legislative amendment of what has been declared by the judgment to be the existing law. But there is no other way to get a judicial pronouncement—and that is what is wanted in cases of dispute—than to have it made by a court of justice.

When our constitution was enacted, it was provided in express terms by section 96 of the British North America Act that:

> The governor general shall appoint the judges of the superior, district, and county courts in each province, except those of the courts of probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Then section 101 provides:

> The parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this act, from time to time, provide for the constitution, maintenance, and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada.

That system has been operating for something over eighty years. I do not think there is any country in the world in which there is greater respect for the courts of justice, and greater reason for respect, than here in Canada. I would hope that state of affairs would continue. I would hope that the courts of Canada, whether exercising first, intermediate or final jurisdiction, would continue to deserve and to have the respect which the courts of justice in Canada have had since the first day of confederation. If the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) were sitting on this side of the house I do not think he would feel that he could, in justice to future generations of Canadians, abandon that part of the responsibility placed by the British North America Act on the governor in council acting for the general Canadian public. I do not think he would accept the responsibility of substituting for the system provided for by the constitution, and which has operated in so eminently satisfactory a manner, some other system that might be regarded as choosing arbitrators with an umpire to decide constitutional questions.

The hon. gentleman and I have had some experience in practice at the bar. We know that in these arbitrations the arbitrator selected by a party generally feels he is in duty bound to find for his party, and that he would be unfaithful to his party if he did otherwise. Courts of justice have to be strictly objective and cannot regard themselves as the arbitrators of any party, but as the authority to decide between contending parties. That is the only sort of judicial body that can have the responsibility that has been exercised and discharged by the privy council.

There were times when there was a conflict of interest between a colony or a dominion and the home authorities, as they used to be called. The gentlemen who had to determine where the right lay were the gentlemen appointed by His Majesty the King in his capacity as King of the United Kingdom. I do not think it ever occurred to anyone that because they were appointed by His Majesty they would not observe the requirements of their oaths of office. Now, the situation will be identical here. I believe it will be desirable to have this, the most responsible and respected office in the public service of Canada, in its judicial branch, and I also believe that the gentlemen who will have the responsibility of discharging the functions of that court will discharge that responsibility to the best of their ability, conscious of their obligation to carry out the oaths they will have taken.

I believe that is the only question before us at this time. Notwithstanding the great respect I have for all of those before whom I ever appeared in the judicial committee of the privy council, I believe it is possible for us to find and develop in this country as great jurists as they happen to be. I know of the high regard in which one of our Canadian jurists, who participated from time to time in the deliberations of that body, was held by his colleagues in the privy council. To my mind, that is a demonstration of the fact that the ability and integrity required can be produced in our own country.

The Canadian Bar Association has suggested that there should be sufficient time before the statute is enacted to permit the public to give consideration, both as to the question whether there should be abolition of appeals and as to the effect which the abolition may have upon provincial and minority rights. There has been consideration over a long period. During the last election campaign there was consideration by the electorate. It was the announced policy of the party it was my honour to lead to abolish appeals to the privy council. I may be mistaken, but I take it that we received from the electorate of Canada a mandate to carry out that policy.

The bar association is concerned also about the effect this action may have on provincial and minority rights. Quite frankly, I am unable to see that it could have any effect upon provincial or minority rights. It is the substitution of one body of men for another body of men to pronounce upon conflicts which may arise in connection with provincial or minority rights. I cannot see how it could have any effect unless one takes the view that the body of men we intend to substitute are not as reliable as the body of men for whom they are being substituted. I am of the opinion that the body of men we intend to substitute will not be inferior in ability, in integrity or in learning to the body of men for whom they are substituted.

It seems to have been the opinion of many editorial writers throughout the country that the method we have suggested of providing for amendments to the constitution does provide a way of breaking the deadlock which has existed for a long time. We will refer in general terms to those things which are allocated to the central authority. We will not attempt to define what they are, but when we come to deal with any particular one that we believe is among that class of subjects, if anyone feels that is not so our conduct can be challenged before the courts. We shall have to abide by the decision the courts render. It might be more convenient to have all possibility of conflict in that regard removed, but in the past many attempts have been made to remove all possibility of conflict and they have not been successful. Because we have not been able to eliminate the possibility of conflict, let us not say we can do nothing. We will get a system here which will work.

I believe it will be approached in good faith by all concerned. If, perchance, it should be approached by the federal authorities in any particular instance in a manner that the provincial authorities of any province felt was unwarranted, then the courts could be called upon to say whether or not it was unwarranted. If it is found to be unwarranted, there will be no power to deal with it here. If it is found that the apprehension of the provinces was not well founded, then the federal jurisdiction will be confirmed. When the system has been in operation for even a short time, I believe my fellow members of the Canadian Bar will feel we have added something to that family to which we feel we belong, that family of persons connected with the administration of the law in this nation.

We lawyers feel a special concern about the courts. It is my belief that we shall find we have added something of substantial value to the profession of law in leaving to Canadian lawyers, elevated in due course to the high office of His Majesty's judges of his Supreme Court of Canada, the responsibility for final decision on Canadian cases.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): During the years that I have been a member of the House of Commons, there have been discussions of matters similar to the subject which has been under consideration this afternoon. On every occasion the debates have been of a very high order. Those of us who are not lawyers have followed them with keen interest and have learned a great deal, not only about the judiciary of our own country but about its constitution and the application of that constitution both provincially and federally. The speeches which have been made on this occasion by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), have been of a very high order, and have given both this house and the country a great deal of information, and elucidated many of the arguments pro and con in relation to this important matter of appeals to the privy council.

Of course, the bill before us now is not new to those of us who have been in the house for some time. This bill is similar in terms to that which was introduced by the Minister of Justice last January. It is similar to a bill which was introduced in two sessions of the last parliament by the then hon. member for Kindersley, Mr. Jaenicke, K.C., who brought his bill before the house in a very able manner. I think everyone who was here appreciated what he did in that regard. While the fortunes of the election have removed him from the house, nevertheless, some of us remember the contribution that he made. Incidentally, in discussing this today I wish to say that to some extent at least I am relying upon the research work which he did in connection with this matter.

No matter what one's particular views are, one is always a little sorry when old traditions are broken and old ways to some extent set aside. One does not have to be of a conservative nature to feel that. When I see Mr. Speaker enter the chamber, or when I hear the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod knock on the door seeking admission, or when I see the mace lifted and placed on the table or removed from it, I am reminded that these gestures go deep down into our history and are a part of our traditions, of our parliamentary institution, and of our race. But the world moves forward and we have to cope with new conditions in new ways.

The privy council is one of those very interesting institutions which seem to have arisen without any conscious direction in the long history of our parliament and of our judiciary. William the Norman, who became King of England, ruled the Channel islands, and a method had to be found for him, as such, to deal with legal matters that arose in another part of his domain. From this through the years there gradually developed appeals to a committee of the king's privy council.

In volume 1 of the Dominion Law Reports of 1947 hon. members can read, as I have read with a great deal of interest, the judgment delivered by the judicial committee of the privy council by Lord Jowitt, the Lord Chancellor, on the appeal taken to the privy council on this parliament's right to deal with this matter. It was opposed by some provinces, supported by other provinces, and initiated by the government of Canada. On page 814 his lordship made two very important pronouncements which confirmed the view often expressed by members in this house who supported the idea of abolition of appeals to the privy council.

Speaking of this party, I may say that in our initial manifesto, adopted in Regina in July 1933, we included the suggestion that appeals to the privy council should be abolished. In his pronouncement at pages 814 and 815 Lord Jowitt refers to the changed circumstances which resulted from the passage of the Statute of Westminster, the spirit of which, he concluded, must confer the widest possible power on the Canadian parliament. Let me quote what Lord Jowitt said in that judgment:

> It is in fact a prime element in the self-government of the dominion that it should be able to secure through its own courts of justice that the law should be one and the same for all its citizens.

He went on:

> This result is attainable only if section 101 of the British North America Act now authorizes the establishment of a court with final and exclusive appellate jurisdiction.

As a layman it seems to me that that simply means that there could be no restriction on legislation adopted by a fully sovereign state, such as Canada now is, having of course, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) have pointed out this afternoon, regard to the rights of the provinces which are set out in the British North America Act. As the Prime Minister pointed out this afternoon, in section 92 of the British North America Act the rights of the provinces are set out. With the judgment of the privy council on the question initiated by Canada before us, surely there can be no question as to the right of this parliament to pass the legislation which has been moved for second reading by the Minister of Justice.

Over the years I have listened, as I have already said, to long constitutional arguments in this house on the question whether we could or could not deal with this matter. As I remember, eminent lawyers including Hon. C. H. Cahan who, I believe, occupied the very seat from which the leader of the opposition spoke today, Mr. Justice Thorson of the Exchequer Court of Canada, then the member for Selkirk, and of course the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe discussed the question at some length. It seems to me that with the judgment now before us the topic then under discussion is no longer necessary.

A moment ago I referred to Mr. Jaenicke's contributions. The other day I looked up what he had to say in certain particulars. At page 2948 of Hansard of May 9, 1947, he said that there can be no argument that the abolition of appeals to the privy council would take away the age-old prerogative of the king of hearing appeals of his subjects.

There can be no argument that that is being done. He correctly stated that His Majesty never hears appeals personally but depends on his judges. He then went on to say:

> In making the Supreme Court of Canada the final court of appeal we simply substitute His Majesty's Canadian judges as the final arbiters upon any grievances brought before him by his subjects in Canada.

It seems to me that that is the whole point of this legislation at the present time; that we make our own courts, our own judiciary, an arm of our government, the sole, the final arbiters of any matter that a citizen or a province wishes to be dealt with by a court.

There is a very interesting book that I would recommend to hon. members who have not seen it, particularly if they are new members. I suggest that they get a copy of it and study it in relation to these matters and the rights, privileges and powers of our federal parliament. It is a book written by Mr. Maurice Ollivier, one of the outstanding legal advisers of this parliament. It is entitled "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty". Mr. Ollivier has a very interesting quotation along the same lines as that which I was giving a moment ago. It is a quotation from Lord Haldane. He quotes him as follows:

> The prerogative of the crown is a vague expression . . . Since Lord Coke vindicated the powers of parliament in the days of James I, it has been clear that the sovereign can only administer justice in courts recognized by parliament, and that he cannot interfere with the judges who preside in these courts.

And later on, in the same book, Mr. Ollivier, at page 345, points out that if the judgment of the privy council is merely an order in council passed on the advice of a group of imperial advisers, to give effect to the report of the judicial committee of the privy council, it is high time that the right of appeal to a United Kingdom committee should be abolished. And the king, in his capacity as King of Canada, should act on the advice of his Canadian ministers. For, as stated in the report of the imperial conference of 1926, it is the right of the government of each dominion to advise the crown in all matters relating to its own affairs.

If we adopt this bill—and I have no doubt parliament will adopt it, because I can see no purpose in the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition except, of course, to kill the measure during this session of parliament—what we are actually doing, it seems to me, is to take for Canada the attributes of sovereignty which a self-governing nation should and must assume. Surely it does not break any valuable link with the commonwealth of nations. Indeed, in my opinion it removes what perhaps might become, and in some instances in the past has become, a somewhat fruitful cause of friction and of discontent.

Nor can I see that it jeopardizes in any particular the rights of Canadians, or their privileges as free citizens of this country. Surely one of the rights and privileges of free citizenship is the right of self-government; and to my mind this measure is a step in the direction of self-government for the Canadian people.

In support of my statement a moment ago, that this might at times become a cause of friction, let me quote the late Mr. Cahan in that memorable speech to which I listened in the House of Commons, which I am sure those of us who were then here will not forget, and which some of us have from time to time read. His speech was delivered in April, 1939, and in part he said:

> The more free the people of Canada are from the officious intervention in our domestic affairs by the government of the United Kingdom, the more readily will our people assume and fulfil the duties and responsibilities which are implied in our continued membership in the British commonwealth.

This was said, may I observe, by a leading member of the Conservative party in the House of Commons. I may be wrong, but I believe that the Hon. C. H. Cahan was the only member of the house at that time who had had personal contact and acquaintance with many of the fathers of confederation. There may have been others who knew one or two of them, but Mr. Cahan had known many.

The privy council up to now has had the power to declare ultra vires laws passed by this parliament. That being so, since it has that power, it is an integral part of the government of Canada. That is to say, it is a judicial arm of this country. Its composition and its procedure, however, are entirely beyond the control of Canada and of Canadians. And so long as these appeals remain, the nationhood of this country is restricted and denied.

As Chief Justice the Right Hon. Sir Lyman Duff said, and I believe it was to him the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was referring this afternoon, though he did not name him:

> No legislature in Canada has, of course, anything to say about the constitution of the judicial committee or about its organization. Provision for all such matters is, as I have said, made by the legislature of the United Kingdom, and orders in council pursuant to authority derived therefrom.

In other words, as I have said, Canada is not fully self-governing so long as appeals to the privy council remain.

Sometimes, as the Prime Minister noted this afternoon, a Canadian judge has sat during deliberations of the privy council, but only at its invitation and not as of right. This, however, is seldom done. Indeed, when it is done it makes no real difference because the majority of the judges are non-Canadians who, as their judgments have shown, know very little about Canada and less about a federal system of government. That, of course, is quite natural; I do not criticize them for that, because they are familiar with a unitary form of government in which parliament is supreme, and where there is no division of powers between a central government and the provinces.

Let me say that Canada's action in abolishing appeals to the privy council is not without some, though perhaps incomplete, precedent within our commonwealth. The constitution of Australia, I believe, limits the scope of such appeals. And while the right remains in New Zealand and South Africa they very seldom use it because, like the United Kingdom, they are unitary nations with one government for all the country.

Then there is this consideration which has been brought before the House of Commons and emphasized particularly by the late Mr. Cahan and by Mr. J. T. Thorson in years gone by. I refer to results of appeals to the privy council. I believe what they said in the house regarding this matter is also the consensus among our own constitutional authorities, namely that our federal system as visualized by the fathers of confederation has been seriously impaired and the powers of this parliament greatly reduced by the decisions of the privy council from time to time.

When we deal with the constitutional matter implicit in proposals in the speech from the throne I have no doubt some of these aspects will be discussed. A reading of the debates leading up to confederation, and of the acts of this parliament after confederation, indicates that Sir John A. Macdonald and others among the fathers of confederation expected that the powers of this parliament might at least remain as they were intended to be. Sir John A. Macdonald expected that they might even be expanded, as time went by. So even if some people believe—and I do not think there are any in this House of Commons who do—that the privy council might be more trustworthy than our supreme court, that would not justify our refusal to accept the responsibility of judicial self-government. Indeed, until we accept all the obligations of political maturity we cannot in my opinion expect to develop truly responsible citizenship in our country. I must say that I find it rather difficult to follow or to understand the position of some provinces that are opposing this parliament's right to deal with the abolition of appeals to the privy council. I find it very difficult to understand why they should oppose a bill of this description.

In preparation for this debate and to get the background, I was reading the other day the interesting debates which took place at the time our supreme court was set up in 1875. In those days we did not have a Hansard as we have today, but very complete reports were kept in the third person of what the various people had to say. I noticed particularly the opinion of members of this house at that time from the province of Quebec. For example, Mr. Taschereau doubted the right to discontinue appeals to the privy council under the legislation that then existed, but he had this to say, and I quote from page 739 of the debates of 1875:

> True, the appeal to the privy council had often proved fatal to suitors who had succeeded in all their courts, and sometimes by the unanimous voice of all their judges in Lower Canada.
> True, some of the decisions of the privy council had been rendered contrary to the plainest principles of their civil law, but this evil had been and is, a necessary and inevitable one.

Why did he say that it was necessary and inevitable? He pointed out that the system of law in that province was vastly different in some respects from the laws of England which they were called upon to interpret. Mr. Langlois said, as reported on page 932, that there was a growing feeling in the province of Quebec in favour of abolishing appeals to the privy council and that one factor was the expense involved which militated against a poor litigant.

How true that is. That is one reason why we have so warmly supported the abolition of appeals to the privy council. Only people of wealth or corporations and provinces with great resources can carry through an appeal to the privy council. In other words, the poor litigant is denied recourse to the final court of appeal under the procedure we have had in our country for some generations. Then Mr. Laflamme is reported on page 935 as follows:

> As to the allegation that the court would be perfectly useless so far as the province of Quebec was concerned, its peculiar institutions were undoubtedly threatened with danger when cases were decided by a tribunal most of whom were ignorant of the laws of Lower Canada, and he would oppose the bill if he were not convinced that its passage would have the effect of abolishing appeals to the privy council.

I could go on to quote a number of statements along the same line. One interesting record in connection with that debate is that Mr. Irving moved on third reading for the abolition of appeals to the privy council. A vote was taken and his motion was carried by people who were close to confederation, not after consultation with the provinces, by 112 to 40. A vast majority of the members of the house who were close to confederation, who understood all the considerations behind the constitutional agreements that had been achieved, were in favour, not only of setting up a supreme court but of making it the final court and abolishing appeals to the privy council. Subsequently the decision was changed.

But nations move slowly. I could not quite follow the leader of the opposition this afternoon when he said that there was no reason for haste, that we should move more slowly. As the records of parliament show, this matter has been discussed for the last 75 years. I hope that we do not move as slowly in improving our social and economic conditions in the next 75 years as we have been in bringing a measure of this description before the House of Commons for decision in 1949.

We support this proposal. If a vote is taken on the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition, of course we shall vote against it. We believe the time has arrived when this measure should be adopted. The constitutional discussions foreshadowed in the speech from the throne must go on, but it seems to me that this is a matter separate from those discussions. This bill gives a court already set up the power to decide, to the ultimate end, cases arising in Canada.

Because we believe that this is the proper step, recognized by the law lords of the judicial committee of the privy council themselves as the right thing for Canada to do, we support it. Since I have been a member of parliament I have followed the British Hansard, on the several occasions when at Canada's request constitutional changes have been made, to see what happens in the British house. I find that they are moved and carried with a few perfunctory remarks.

When a Conservative member of the British house was visiting Canada a few years ago I asked him what the House of Commons in Great Britain would do in regard to any constitutional change that Canada might ask for and he said, "We would pass it without any question and largely without any discussion." Consequently I think the time has surely arrived when we should take unto ourselves the attributes of nationhood, and one of those attributes is that we should have our own judiciary interpret our own laws and our own constitution. That is why we should have our own Canadian court of last resort.

Because we are of this opinion we shall support the second reading of this bill.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay the house because I think the subject before us has been discussed quite thoroughly, but I feel sure the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) would welcome a statement as to our position on this important measure. The government proposes by Bill No. 2 to abolish appeals to the judicial committee of the privy council. I notice that the bill provides that the judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada as it will be constituted shall be final and conclusive in civil, criminal and constitutional cases.

The whole question of privy council appeal has been under consideration and study more or less intensively for a good many years. Therefore it seems to me that we must make a final decision in the matter some time. Perhaps now is just as good a time as any to do the job. Surely it cannot be argued that Canada has not reached the age of responsibility. If we have not, then I doubt very much whether we ever shall.

That being the case, I feel that the bill should not be hoisted, but that a final decision should be reached by logical reasoning after debate, and after every argument that can be adduced before this assembly has been brought forward and considered.

Many good reasons can be cited to support the contention that appeals from the Canadian courts to the judicial committee of the privy council should be abolished now. Indeed, I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) listed a number of them in his speech when he introduced the bill. I cannot find myself in disagreement with any that he put before the house. I can think of no really important reasons why the step should not be taken at least within a matter of the next few months. If the passage of Bill No. 2 becomes the first step towards the early adoption of a suitable procedure for constitutional amendment within Canada, a procedure that is acceptable to the provinces as well as to the dominion, then we of the Social Credit party welcome the bill.

A clear-cut formula for constitutional amendment would certainly remove a great deal of confusion as well as a number of causes of friction between the federal and provincial governments. Nevertheless, I believe that the bill could have been introduced by the government at a more propitious time, a time better calculated to inspire confidence and good will between the various governments of the country. I do not mean to imply by that statement that I believe the bill should be hoisted, as suggested in the amendment.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has already consulted the premiers of the various provinces as to a dominion-provincial conference. That conference is to consider ways and means of deciding on a procedure for constitutional amendment, and for the allocation of responsibilities between the provincial and dominion governments. That being the case, it seems to me that the provinces would have felt much more confident had the conference been held first, the procedure arrived at, and then the bill brought in. Then they certainly would have had something definite and tangible to take the place of what exists now.

That is my only criticism. Perhaps the Minister of Justice or the Prime Minister may have something to say at a later time which will relieve the fears of at least some of the provinces that they might possibly be left without a definite procedure in which they could have complete confidence, a procedure for the amendment of the constitution when that becomes necessary as the result of dispute on any point. Apart from that, I cannot think of any cogent reason why the bill should not pass now, and I propose to support it.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, may I say that if I had known one of my colleagues was going away I would have given way to him very gladly, but I did not know anything about it. I may say that a private bill, somewhat similar, was introduced in the sessions of the house in the past four years, and I occupied some time of the house discussing the matter because I did not believe in the principle of the bill.

As to the bill now before the house, the procedure on second reading of a bill, according to the British and Canadian practice, is laid down in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, page 228, section 656, which reads as follows:

> The second reading of a bill is that stage when it is proper to enter into a discussion and propose a motion relative to the principle of the measure.

Section 657 states:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees...

And so on. Therefore under the rules of this house and under British practice the proper place to discuss the question of the principle of a bill is on second reading. The following is stated in the thirteenth edition of May's Parliamentary Practice, at page 709:

> The second reading of a private bill corresponds with the same stage in other bills, and in agreeing to it the house affirms the general principle, or expediency, of the measure.

I believe that is our practice, and that if we approve of the principle we automatically approve of the bill. There are two classes of appeals to the privy council. They may be described as (a) appeals by statutory right, and (b) appeals as a matter of grace.

It is most important to remember this and to find the key to the solution of this great national problem. For that reason, on the first reading I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) to explain (a) what are statutory rights and (b) what are appeals as a matter of grace, and to clarify it to the house, because the proposed amendments to the Supreme Court Act do not even mention it.

It is the first time since I have been in the house that a minister of the crown has not answered a civil and proper question, and has refused to give me information about a bill.

I am not surprised at the present minister bringing in a bill such as the one before the house. It is altogether different from the various private bills which have been introduced in the past. One of them was brought in for four years in a row by the former member for Kindersley, Mr. Jaenicke. He was a member of the C.C.F. The present bill goes much further than his, which was a private bill introduced by a private member. The government is now attempting to do something about this matter. I may say that I look upon the bill as very largely a political bill. The minister has even failed to say who is asking for it.

I once described the House of Commons, when I first entered it, as a gentlemen's social club. That is what it is intended to be. As individual members we cannot all think alike, because we are different by temperament and training, environment and education, and in many other ways. I am strongly opposed to the bill. These are my own honest views after many years' study of the problem. If you look at the matter more closely and examine the context of the bill you will see that it is different from the bills introduced on the same subject by private members. This bill is mentioned in the speech from the throne with a great flourish of trumpets. They indicate what they are going to do. I look on all these matters as secondary. They want to propose a change in the office of the governor general. We have one of the greatest soldiers of all times as our governor general now. He is the greatest soldier in the history of the world. They want a change in the flag, in the text of the anthem, in the name of Dominion day; they want to end appeals to the privy council, and to do many similar things.

In my opinion those matters are only secondary when people have not houses in which to live, and should be allowed to stand over. At its meeting at Calgary the Canadian Bar Association asked that this bill should stand over. The bar is against it. In Ontario and Quebec the bill is not worth the paper it is written on at the present time, because a contract was made at confederation and it cannot be overriden here. As I say, these matters are only secondary; they are not primary.

Let us now look at this bill that was forecast in the speech from the throne and see what it actually means. What are appeals by statutory right? My answer is that they are based on some statute, either provincial or dominion. In Ontario and Quebec there is the right of appeal on certain matters. This bill extinguishes that right. In the case of Ontario and Quebec this right is based on a contract made at confederation and before. In the other provinces the situation is somewhat the same, but it may vary in the maritimes.

I should like to quote what the Hon. Howard Ferguson, who was then premier of Ontario, said when he dealt with this matter. This is in a textbook on the Statute of Westminster. I think it is one of the most learned textbooks I have ever read. It is written by a great teacher in England, a great student and a great professor. At page 183 of his book, "The Statute of Westminster and Dominion Status", Mr. K. C. Wheare, the author, says:

> The report of the O.D.L. conference—

He is referring to a committee that met here when my former leader was Prime Minister.

> —was unanimously approved by the Canadian House of Commons in May, 1930 . . . At the general election of July, 1930, the Conservative party, under the leadership of Mr. R. B. Bennett, was returned to power. Before Mr. Bennett left for the imperial conference of 1930 he received from the premier of Ontario, Mr. Howard Ferguson, also a Conservative, a memorandum in which the terms of the proposed statute were severely examined.

In a footnote the author states:

> The following statement of the course of events is based upon Mr. Bennett's survey of negotiations in his speech, introducing the resolution requesting the passing of the statute, in the Canadian House of Commons in 1931.

Then at the bottom of page 183 the quotation continues:

> In particular the two clauses quoted above were criticised as vague and inconclusive, and it was asserted "that no restatement of the procedure for amending the constitution of Canada can be accepted by the province of Ontario that does not fully and frankly acknowledge the right of all the provinces to be consulted and to become parties to the decision arrived at." Quebec and all the other provinces proved to be in agreement with these views. In consequence it was necessary for the Canadian delegation at the imperial conference of 1930 to ask that, in effect, the whole question of the repeal of the Colonial Laws Validity Act, in its application to Canada, should be left in suspense until the views of the provinces on the matter could be obtained. The reference to the Dominion of Canada and to the provinces of Canada was therefore deleted from the proposed clause, and it appeared in the schedule drawn up by the conference with a specific reference to Australia and New Zealand only. It was stated that "a section dealing exclusively with the Canadian position will be inserted after the representations of the provinces have received consideration."

What happened in New Zealand and in Australia? This so-called Statute of Westminster was one of the most mischievous statutes I think we have ever had in the history of the British empire because it caused a divided situation. Hon. members will notice that clauses 6 to 13 of the Statute of Westminster were the reason that Australia and New Zealand had nothing to do with it; and they refused to do so until recently when they thought that, owing to the dollar and pound situation, they might consent to it. Those two dominions of Australia and New Zealand were excepted by clauses 6 to 13 of the Statute of Westminster, this statute which has caused so much trouble in the dominions and has divided the empire accordingly.

If we look at this bill more closely, what do we find? The right of appeal has existed in Canada since 1791, under the Constitutional Act by which we adopted so much of British law as was applicable or adapted to our circumstances. The bill does not allow an appeal in every case but only in a few. It is limited. The exact text and provisions of the statute and the restrictions on it are secured. Section 92 of the British North America Act, subsection 13, dealing with property and civil rights in the provinces, deals with matters of local import, and section 91 deals with federal rights. Provincial rights may or may not be protected accordingly.

First we have what is known as the Toronto Electric Commissioners v. Snider case. I myself was on that case. In the lower courts in Canada they had been beaten, both on injunction and on appeal to the court of appeal. At the assizes they were beaten, and they appealed to the privy council and won it over there. As I say, and as I have contended all along, in the Metropolitan case on Yonge street, where the Metropolitan railway had the right to run freight cars right down Yonge street from lake Simcoe, and then sought to make a connection with the C.P.R. and get running rights, had they been successful it would have destroyed municipal institutions and we would never have been able to take over the street railway. We appealed to the privy council in those two cases and the privy council gave a favourable decision. In my opinion the privy council is one court where the litigant can get substantial justice. I do not say that justice cannot be obtained in all of the courts, but decisions of the lower courts are appealable, and until the final decision is given you have not a pronouncement on the law as it is contained in the textbooks.

I have now and always have had every confidence in the Canadian courts because I myself am a member of the bar. I have always had a great respect and admiration for the way in which the magistrates, the county court judges, the high court judges and the others carry out their exceedingly laborious and difficult duties in Canada.

I may say that the bill that is proposed does not mention or consider some of these things at all. Most of the provinces' appeals to the privy council are by special leave. This class of appeal is in the exercise of the king's prerogative right. The bill now proposed by the minister is unlike some private bills that preceded it; it goes much further. The Supreme Court Act is now and always has been as contained in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, chapter 35, section 54. If that stands by itself, judgments established by it are final and conclusive.

When the Supreme Court Act was passed in 1875, it would have been competent for the parliament of Canada to provide for a statutory right of appeal to the privy council as it long had existed in the two old provinces of Canada, Ontario and Quebec, and I think it is also in the maritimes act. But in the act creating the Supreme Court of Canada the federal parliament not only omitted to include any statutory right of appeal from the decisions of that court, but also in express terms negatived that right of appeal. Some years ago, in other attempts at abolition of appeals to the privy council, all were not unanimous and the situation was only partly covered by limiting appeals to cases where the Supreme Court of Canada had not been unanimous. But none of these methods of appeal ever affected the prerogative right to appeal as a matter of grace. Notwithstanding this bill now before the house and the other federal bills of private members, none of them can sanction the taking away, by any statute whatever, of the prerogative right of the sovereign king in appeals of grace. Is it not a blessing we have had that language? Any British subject, whether in Britain, in the dominions or in any other place in the empire, has a right to petition His Majesty on the throne, and it will be a sorry day for this country when that right is taken away. The prerogative rights of the king are matters of empire policy, and no parliament in Britain or the empire can lessen or take away that right of grace.

We have some examples of this in Scripture, especially in the story about the Apostle St. Paul. The Acts of the Apostles was written by St. Luke. In that book we have the story of how the Apostle Paul appealed first to Governor Festus. He said, "I appeal unto Caesar." Then he was brought before King Agrippa, and the king was almost persuaded to be a Christian. Finally, when the Apostle Paul said he appealed to Caesar, something happened and he was sent to Rome.

Statutory appeals were provided for those who had a claim against either the federal or the provincial government, and this right of appeal to the privy council is now being revoked. The king cannot be brought into court without his consent, but his consent is given through the attorney general of Canada or the attorney general of the province. These appeals are to the foot of the throne. It is merely an application to the attorney general, who represents the public, that the king give his consent to the claim being tried. The attorney general of Canada has many of these applications and usually passes them as a matter of form. Sir Allen Aylesworth said that during the time he was Minister of Justice he had forty-five such applications.

If this bill passes it can only affect certain classes of federal cases, but it cannot affect provincial cases since the provinces of Ontario and Quebec claim provincial consent is necessary. The bill before the house only seeks to restrict that prerogative; it cannot take away the right to present a petition as a matter of grace. This bill seeks to make the prerogative right a matter of statute, but appeals of grace are the result of government by monarchy.

The fact that the king was head of the state led to the doctrine that "the king is the source and fountain of justice". This was not always so under the Norman and early Plantagenet kings, during which time there were no judges and no courts except the court of the king. As the work of the king increased he delegated the administration of justice to others; thus law courts were constituted. In matters of grace, the king is still the source and fountain of justice. These are simply appeals to the king as head of the state.

There is no difference in principle between appeals from British courts and appeals from dominion courts. In both cases the appeal is to the House of Lords because London is the central place in the empire. These appeals go to the judicial committee of the privy council. Some of the members of this body are not members of the House of Lords, as Sir Charles Fitzpatrick and Sir William Mulock were, and Sir Lyman Duff now is. Sir Lyman is a member of the judicial committee of the privy council—as the two others I have mentioned were—because he was a member of the imperial privy council.

Three important ministers of justice opposed this principle. The first was the minister of justice who took part in the Bering Sea arbitration, Sir Allen Aylesworth. He made a statement on this subject in an important debate in the Senate on June 18, 1936, which can be found at page 552 of the Senate debates, if members wish to see it. The next gentleman to whom I wish to refer is Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, who was Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, and a very great lawyer. He was one of those retained to defend Louis Riel in Regina in 1885. As one of the great lawyers of that day, he was opposed to the abolition of appeals to the privy council. Mr. Conant, one-time attorney general of Ontario, was of the same opinion.

May I quote a few words from Sir Charles Fitzpatrick:

> In no part of the King's dominions has greater service been rendered by the judicial committee than in Canada, particularly since confederation.
> Since 1867, the judicial committee has been called upon in scores of cases to trace out the line of demarcation between federal and provincial jurisdiction, and it must be truthfully said that the result has been eminently satisfactory. Removed, as the majority of judges are, from all local strifes, desirous as they are to distribute the most impartial justice, it is not surprising that the right of appeal to the King in his privy council is one of the privileges most highly prized by the people of the dominion. I do not mean to say that there has not been exception taken to the freedom with which appeals may be carried to the privy council in ordinary civil matters, but whatever view may obtain in other parts of the empire, so far as Canada is concerned, I think I may safely say that, amongst lawyers and judges competent to speak on the subject, there is but one opinion, that where constitutional questions are concerned an appeal to the judicial committee must always be retained.
> I am offering that opinion to balance to some extent the opposite opinions which have been offered. I rather think the judicial committee of the privy council has rendered a real service to Canada. Their decisions have been one judgment, no dissenting judgments.

At one time Attorney General Conant, one of the most respected attorneys general, directed public attention to the contentious question of abolishing appeals to the privy council. At that time the proposal had been introduced by the Hon. C. H. Cahan. Then, as always, opinion was found to be strongly divided, and the bill was held over when the minister of justice suggested that it was too important a matter for summary decision.

It is important, vitally important, to the future of Canada and the commonwealth. The considered opinion of Ontario's attorney general should be a valuable guide to the House of Commons. His opinion is based on both domestic and imperial considerations, none of which can or should be left out of unbiased deliberation. He said that he had the greatest respect for the appeal court and all other Canadian courts, but was inclined to the view that in matters involving constitutional questions, particularly in issues between the dominion and a province, or provinces, the right of appeal to the privy council should be continued.

This, emphatically, is not the view of some who are, perhaps, quite as competent to judge.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, is it understood that the member for Broadview has adjourned the debate?

Mr. Knowles: No, the member for Temiscouata.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand the member for Broadview has not completed his remarks?

Mr. Church: I have not finished.

Mr. Speaker: I understood the member for Broadview was still speaking when I interrupted him to say it was six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Experimental farms services—
14. Central experimental farm, $1,330,560.

Mr. Knowles: The other evening when this item was before the committee the hon. member for Winnipeg North asked the minister certain questions about the experimental farm here at Ottawa. The questions had to do with the additional acreage purchased in recent years and the price paid for it. Has the minister the answer to these questions?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I shall have the answers as soon as my officials are here with them. They were all prepared. I left them to be brought in. Probably the officials did not think we would get to this item quite so soon. I suggest that we let this item stand for the time being and return to it later.

Item stands.

15. Branch farms and stations and illustration stations, $3,819,403.

Mr. Gardiner: I suggest that this item stand also.

Item stands.

Production service—health of animals—
17. Administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $2,863,297.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I have to rise again for about the third time in three sessions to bring to the minister's attention a matter which is of paramount importance to those who are directly affected. Perhaps I should wait until item 18 is called, but I shall continue on item 17 and what I have to say will apply to item 18.

In connection with inspection for tuberculosis in certain areas in Ontario, and it applies as well to a certain case in Nova Scotia, in former years the question of compensation for those reactors which went down under the T.B. test was a matter of acute concern because there were two special cases: one, that of a man near Stayner, by the name of McIntyre, and the other, that of a man in Nova Scotia whose name I am not able to recall at the moment. In the McIntyre case, which I raised in the house in previous sessions and do not hesitate to raise again because of the principle involved, the herd had been tested for T.B. for years before. In 1946, if my memory serves me correctly—I did not bring my notes down with me, but the minister will know of it because it has been brought up before—a further test was made, and of 44 cattle in his herd 43 went down. At that particular time the vaccine or the serum had been changed. Those who are acquainted with veterinary science and are more familiar with it than I am will bear me out when I say that, when there is a change in the vaccine, very often strange reactions occur in the test and sometimes herds which are normally regarded as completely free from tuberculosis go down and are taken to the abattoirs. The farmers lose their first-class, registered producing stock and they are sold at the slaughter price. It is true there is compensation; but, as the minister knows, it does not come anywhere near meeting the loss that the farmer sustains in losing as large a number as that.

When the vaccine was changed these cattle all reacted. As the minister knows, a check is always made in the abattoirs to see whether or not there are signs of T.B. in the meat which comes from the slaughtered reactors. If my memory serves me correctly, in this case only one of the 43 cattle was found at the abattoir to show any sign whatever of tuberculosis. One of them showed some signs of having had pneumonia at one time, but that fell somewhat short of tuberculosis. Naturally the farmer was much concerned about it. It practically put him out of business. Time after time urgent representations were made to the government but nothing whatever was done. He has had to suffer because of that. In addition, when I brought the matter up in the house two or three years ago for the first time a man in Nova Scotia wrote to me saying that he had had a similar experience. It is not widespread. If it were, perhaps the government might conceivably be somewhat influenced by the question of financial outlay which would be involved. So far as I know, there are very few cases of that kind. Because there are few cases it constitutes discrimination against those farmers who are affected.

I know it is difficult to prove that it was the vaccine, but nevertheless a change of vaccine was made at that time. It seems to me that if the government are to change the vaccine, which means the very basis of the test of the cattle, and that change of vaccine means that the farmer's herd goes down when normally it would not react unfavourably, the government and not the individual farmer himself ought to bear the difference in the loss.

As I say, I regret having to raise the question again because I had hoped that before now some adjustment would have been made in connection with it. I have not been in touch with either of the parties for some considerable time but my understanding is that the government has not done anything about it. I would be glad to hear the minister say that something has been done. I do hope he will take into consideration the representations which I have now made. Neither of these people happened to be in my riding so I hope the minister will understand that I am putting forward something that is not of personal interest but rather a matter of general and public concern. For that reason I hope that the department will give consideration to it.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Chairman, last spring I referred to an item somewhat similar to that which has just been mentioned by the hon. member for Peel. I do not think the department is satisfied yet as to what caused that outbreak. Those cattle were tested about eleven months before, but the whole herd went down.

I raised certain points at that time. I have inquired into the matter deeply, and I felt at that time and I still feel that the feeding of dairy ration might have had something to do with it. However, I shall ask a question about that later. In the county of Lanark we are proud of our herds. It seems to me, however, that the better they get in developing blood lines, or perhaps it may be through inbreeding, the less resistance they seem to have to brucellosis, and particularly to tuberculosis.

Grade herds are passing all right. But every once in a while one of these good herds is seriously affected with tuberculosis, which wipes out the whole herd. Many of these herds are built from the ground up and represent the lifework of farmers. The compensation given does not begin to cover the loss suffered by the farmers. If a cow is worth a thousand dollars and the farmer receives the ordinary compensation from the government it does not begin to cover his loss incurred in building up a herd of that type.

The three chief diseases affecting those cattle are mastoiditis, tuberculosis and brucellosis—and I have talked about brucellosis in this chamber for the last four years. These diseases make the raising of purebred stock a hazardous occupation, so far as a farmer's finances are concerned.

I would appeal to the minister to have something done to help out these farmers. I saw an excellent propaganda film last spring dealing with mastoiditis. This film was put out by the government, and I am wondering if the Department of Agriculture could not make some arrangement whereby farmers might obtain some of the sulpha drugs at drug stores simply by signing for them. They could be given instructions how to give early treatment to these cattle. They could be instructed in the use of penicillin.

The situation in regard to brucellosis or Bang's disease has not changed. For four years I have advocated that something further be done by way of vaccination to help these people. Tuberculosis is another hazard—and a big one when we find farmers whose purebred herds are wiped out. There is no redress, except the minor compensation given by the Department of Agriculture. I realize the department could not possibly pay a thousand dollars for every cow destroyed but I am wondering if it could foster some form of insurance. It appears that the better the strains of cattle we get the more diminished is the immunity against these diseases.

As I have said, the grade cattle seem to get along all right, but when the blood line is developed, and possibly because of some inbreeding, it becomes apparent that the cattle are more susceptible to these diseases. I leave these suggestions with the minister. Something has to be done; otherwise it would not pay a young man to spend his life developing a herd of cattle. I realize that the government could not be expected to pay the true value of these cattle, but something could be done to help out the farmers so that they would get higher compensation for animals destroyed.

Mr. Gardiner: As the hon. member for Peel pointed out, after he got under way, he was really discussing item 18, rather than item 17. We have not yet called item 18, and have had no discussion on item 17. Item 16 has been passed, and I am wondering if we might revert to item 14 so that we may discuss items 14 and 15. I have the information here now, and if there is nothing further to be said on item 17 I would suggest that we go to item 14.

Item stands.

14. Central experimental farm, $1,330,560.

Mr. Gardiner: The other evening the hon. member for Winnipeg North asked a question with regard to the Ottawa central experimental farm, and questions were also asked by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton. The first question was as to the size of the central experimental farm at Ottawa. I am informed that the size of the farm is 1194·4 acres, made up in the following way: The old original farm, 468 acres; the Caldwell farm of 300 acres, purchased some time ago and added to it; the Scott farm of 65 acres; and the Booth farm of 361·4 acres, making a total of 1194·4 acres.

Then, with respect to the land added to the central farm in the last two or three years, I would point out that the Caldwell farm of 300 acres was added in 1947 at a total cost of $75,000, averaging $250 per acre. In 1949 the Scott farm of 65 acres was added at a total cost of $56,000, at an average of $861.50 per acre. I might add that this last purchase comprises a piece of land lying close to the city between the experimental farm and Dow's lake. On that land we have located some of the equipment necessary to naval wireless control, affecting radio and different matters of that kind. In order to prevent buildings being placed upon that land in the immediate vicinity of this equipment, if the equipment was going to remain there, it was found necessary to have that land secure against such buildings being placed there. We had the land rented for experimental farm purposes, and on the suggestion of the department concerned we purchased it, rather than have it subject to that kind of development at this time. We were satisfied to pay that price per acre because it is estimated that if that equipment is placed elsewhere at some future time this property can be easily sold. The purchase was made of farm lands for experimental farm purposes only because of the necessity of having it under government control for the time being.

Mr. Knowles: What is the figure for the Booth farm?

Mr. Gardiner: The average cost per acre for the two parcels of land I have mentioned is approximately $365, as compared with the decision handed down by the exchequer court in connection with the expropriation of the Booth farm in 1929. That is an old matter which had to do with a decision made before I came to the department, and I believe before most hon. members were in the house. They disagreed on price, and it was expropriated in the legal manner. The 361.4 acres cost an average of $838 per acre, which is about the same as or a little less than the price we paid for this special land during the last year. The total price paid for all that land was $302,500.

A question asked by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton had to do with the operating costs of the Fredericton experimental station. The total cost was $163,765.62, broken down as follows:

Main farm	$107,965.69
Construction of warehouse and cold storage	44,490.00
Completion of three cottages	6,000.00
Construction of reservoir	499.95
Overhauling obsolete electrical wiring	4,810.00

Those are the figures for 1948-49.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Is there any reason for continuing this farm so close to the city, except that it adds to the amenities of the neighbourhood?

Mr. Gardiner: There have been discussions from time to time of the advisability of retaining the farm in such close proximity to the city of Ottawa. It is argued by some that the property could be converted to other uses and thereby bring a considerable return to the government, and the farm could be moved farther away. I presume that some time that may be done, but the argument up to date has always been that it is a real asset to the city, to the eastern part of Canada, and to a very considerable extent to the people of Canada as a whole. When people, particularly from agricultural areas, come to the capital they can go out and see the latest experiments that are being carried on at a place close to the city. If it were ten or fifteen miles away many people would not go near it or would not be able to find the opportunity to go. Most people who come from the outlying sections of Canada look upon the farm as being one of the sights that they want to see while in Ottawa and I have no doubt that many of them carry away beneficial ideas in connection with agriculture that otherwise they would not get.

Mr. Fair: Regardless of any profit or benefit that might accrue from the sale of the central experimental farm, I submit that it is the duty of the government in the interests of Canadian agriculture not only to see that that farm is kept there but that the experiments are extended. There are many people who do not give sufficient credit to the agricultural industry of this country. I say again that if we have an agricultural industry that is prosperous, then all Canada is prosperous. The only way to make that industry prosperous is to continue the experiments that make for progress in the production of a wide range of agricultural products.

During the past years that I have been in the house our scrap with the government at all times has been to have more money spent on experimental work. My own feelings and the feelings of those who sent me here—I believe I can speak for the farming industry generally—is that the work of the central experimental farm should be kept up at the highest degree of perfection.

Mr. Graydon: I fancy that every hon. member of the committee will agree with much of what has been said with respect to the experimental farm. I should like to make a suggestion to the minister and to the chairman of the agriculture committee which may be set up, that a visit to the central experimental farm should be made an annual event so that hon. members could examine the splendid work being done there. I remember that in previous years we used to go out to the farm, and I think we all received benefit from that visit.

When the agriculture committee is set up I think it might hold a meeting out there once in a while, because they have not been so good at that in the past. The members of that committee could then make a thorough study of the experiments being carried on.

Mr. Gardiner: As the hon. member for Peel has said, prior to the war the members of the agriculture committee and any other hon. members who cared to go along were taken out to the farm and shown the developments there. I am sure that that can be arranged again if it is the wish of the committee and other hon. members. I shall take it up with the deputy minister and see if arrangements cannot be made to that end.

A question was asked the other night by the hon. member for Calgary East with regard to the capital cost of the science service laboratory at Lethbridge. The figures are as follows:

1947-48	112,255.54
1948-49	148,436.79
Total	$281,311.78

As I said the other day, the official opening of the finally completed plant is taking place today.

Mr. Harkness: What work is being carried on at that plant in Lethbridge?

Mr. Gardiner: It deals mainly with the diseases of cattle. Previously the laboratory was located some distance from Lethbridge and from our farm. This laboratory was put up in the early days at the request of the ranchers to investigate certain diseases from which cattle were suffering. The year before last it was decided that in order to make the results more readily available to a greater number of people this plant should be moved closer to the experimental farm and the town of Lethbridge, and in addition that the work should be extended somewhat. Therefore, the expenditures I have referred to have been made. In addition, some work is being carried on in connection with plant diseases.

Mr. Harkness: The expenditures which the minister has given are those for 1946-49 inclusive, but yesterday I asked what part of the $517,000 to be appropriated under the item we were dealing with for new construction was to be apportioned to that particular project. We have not yet obtained that information.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand the question now put to be: What part of the total amount of over $500,000 spent last year was spent at Lethbridge? That is the last figure which I read. The amount spent in 1948-49 was $148,436.79.

Mr. Harkness: These estimates are for 1949-50. They are not for 1948-49.

Mr. Gardiner: Of course that money was in the estimates for this year. It is being voted just now. I would have to make further inquiries in order to make sure how much of this money came out of that vote. On second thought, none of it could come out of that vote.

Mr. Harkness: It could not.

Mr. Gardiner: The amount of money is in the estimates of 1949-50, and possibly the amount which has been spent on this project up to date will not yet appear in our accounts because much of it could not be paid. The money is not yet voted. During the last session we made provision for expenditures which would carry us over six months, but I am not certain that the expenditure from those amounts which were to carry us over six months would cover all of the costs of the work which would be done there, or whether some of it still has to be voted. I think it is pretty well assured that the estimates as brought down will be passed, but there is just a possibility that on work of that kind six months' supply would cover it, because all of these buildings are pretty well completed in the summertime. We are getting close to the end of the summer now, and we still have a short part of the six months' period to be covered. It is just possible that the total amount which was set aside for that building has been spent.

Mr. Harkness: Surely this procedure is a little loose as far as financing is concerned. To begin with, the minister said that the item for 1948-49, which he gave me as $148,436.79, was included in this amount, and then he decided that it could not be. Now he says he does not know how much of that is spent or how much is not spent. But surely when the estimate was made there must have been a certain definite amount estimated for this particular project. Actually that is what I asked for in the first place three days ago.

Mr. Gardiner: There was $117,000 set aside for that particular work, but the fact that the plant is just being opened today would suggest to me that as to any ordinary transactions in connection with it the contractors may not be all paid. I have not the figures here as to what is paid, but I would expect they are not all paid. Until that comes in we do not know what the exact figure is, but the estimate is $117,000.

Mr. Harkness: Was that the estimate to complete this building or was it partly for the experimental work which is to be carried on there?

Mr. Gardiner: That was the estimate for the building itself for this year. I am not sure whether that estimate will completely cover it, or whether it more than covers it, but it is $117,000.

Mr. Harkness: What will be the total cost of the building?

Mr. Gardiner: It will be what I have already given you plus whatever we spend this year.

Mr. Harkness: As I said before, that is somewhat loose as far as financing is concerned. Taking what the minister has already given me, the figures come roughly to $270,000 plus $117,000. Is that the cost of the building?

Mr. Gardiner: $281,000 plus possibly $117,000.

Mr. Hansell: I do not know whether I can throw any light on this particular item, but I will say that evidently a part of the money that was to be appropriated for this new venture at the Lethbridge experimental farm, or adjacent to it, was for the housing of a staff. The minister can correct me if I am not right. Additional staff was put there and they had nowhere to live. Some construction was started in order to house that staff and suddenly it stopped. The consensus among some who were there was, "We were only voted so much supply and we suppose the money has run out and building has stopped." The minister will not recall it, but I wrote a letter to him. It was during the election campaign and he was busy. I found time to write him a letter. Perhaps I was not as busy as he was. I got a reply from one of his officials—it may have been his private secretary—to the effect that that was not the reason that any building was stopped, and as far as they knew the building program was still going ahead. I did not pursue the matter any further, but from that it would appear to me that perhaps the limited supply we voted for six months had run out. There was something mysterious about the stopping of that work.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member is absolutely correct. These plants are not all made up of one building. There are also there some buildings which are necessary to the operation of the plant. The whole plant consists of the laboratory plus six suites in two buildings. I presume that is for a staff. Then there are four barns and two garages. Of course, the barns will be for the housing of the stock that is being used in connection with the laboratory study of diseases. It is these buildings plus the other that necessitate the whole expenditure. I have no information before me as to why some contractor may have stopped the building of any one of those buildings and been held up for a time. It may have been on account of lack of materials; it may have been any of a dozen and one different reasons; but my understanding is that the plant is so nearly complete now that they thought this was a good day to have the official opening, and they are having the official opening today.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder if I might ask a question about the item we are supposed to be discussing, namely, item 14, the central experimental farm here at Ottawa. The last questions seem to have run over into the next item.

In the session earlier this year I asked the minister some questions with regard to employees at the central experimental farm. My questions are found in Hansard at pages 377 and 378. The date those questions were answered was February 9, 1949. One of my questions was:

> What are the minimum and maximum wages per hour paid to labourers at the central experimental farm, Ottawa?

The answer to that question was:

> Forty-five to seventy cents per hour.

Those are pretty low rates of wage under today's conditions.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): With or without board?

Mr. Knowles: I understand without board. These are people who live in Ottawa. My next question had to do with the wages paid to blacksmiths, carpenters, painters and other artisans at the central experimental farm. The answer is a long list. I will not read all of the figures, but here are some of them:

Farm mechanic, 69 cents per hour; teamster, 66 cents per hour; truck driver, 67 cents per hour; and night watchman, 59 cents per hour. I then asked what the hours of work per week were for these various people, and the figures vary. Some of the artisans are on a 44-hour week. The blacksmiths work 50 hours the year round.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Fifty hours per year?

Mr. Knowles: Fifty hours a week the year round in some cases and 55 hours—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On Sunday.

Mr. Knowles: I find that my friend the hon. member for Calgary West is even more helpful now that we are a little farther apart in the chamber than he was last session. May I try that again?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You had better.

Mr. Knowles: Some of the artisans work 44 hours per week the year round but the unskilled labourers, according to these answers, work 50 hours per week in the winter and 55 hours per week in the summer. The other questions that I asked had to do with the arrangements for superannuation or retirement fund, and the information given was a bit puzzling. It indicated that the amount deducted was in some cases 5½ per cent and in others 6 per cent, and that these deductions were based on a certain number of hours per year, whether or not the employees worked those hours. The complaint made to me was that in some cases the employees had to pay a deduction from their wages for hours that they did not work.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is a wonderful scheme, is it not, if you can deduct for some hours that you did not work?

Mr. Knowles: The figures indicate that in some cases unskilled labourers who were working 50 or 55 hours per week are deducted, for purposes of superannuation, at the rate of 60 hours per week. I do not wonder that the hon. member for Calgary West gets confused over the situation. Can the minister say whether there has been any improvement in respect to these matters since these answers were made on February 9 of this year? If perchance he can give a specific answer showing that improvements have been made, I should be glad if he would do so.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that there has been an increase of 5 cents an hour since that time. I would have to go back over the entire list in order to make certain that it applies to all the persons that have been spoken of in what the hon. member has said.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: Pardon me for interrupting, but the answer that was placed on Hansard in reply to my question on February 9 of this year, which was placed there under the name of the minister's parliamentary assistant, concludes with this sentence:

> The above wage rates include a flat increase of 5 cents per hour, which is being made effective as from October 1, 1948.

Has there been another five-cent-an-hour increase since then? One five-cent-an-hour increase was included in the figures I have given.

Mr. Gardiner: The only five cent increase that has actually been applied up to now is the one that my hon. friend speaks of. There is another five cents that is involved, but I am not in a position to make an announcement about it one way or another at the moment. General consideration is now being given to the whole question as applied to all such employees in all the services in the government. It is not my place to make any announcement with regard to it, and I do not intend to undertake to do so tonight. I would say that the question is asked just with regard to the central experimental farm at Ottawa. But we have allowed both these items to stand because generally our discussion runs out of one into the other. For a long time, at all experimental farms, we have been paying for that kind of labour what are known as prevailing rates. That is, we pay in accordance with the payments which are being made in that locality. Our farms are in many different localities across Canada and in many different types of locality. Out in farming communities where the experimental farm is surrounded by operations being carried on by other farmers we have sometimes had complaints if we boosted wages in those areas by paying more than the prevailing rates in those areas for similar work. The same thing is true in another way in connection with operations when we are close to cities or towns. We must make our wages more or less in accordance with the prevailing rates in those localities. That is something which has been discussed widely with labour organizations and others and has been fairly well agreed upon. I should not like simply to state any particular rate as prevailing on all of our experimental farms. I think probably the highest rates that are being paid in Canada are being paid on the Ottawa farm, but I would not be too sure of that without going into all the records and finding out what the rates are, say, at the Agassiz farm in British Columbia. There may be some reason why wages there are higher than they are at some other place. But one would have to search into the conditions surrounding these farms in order to give a general statement with regard to all of them. But as to the farm here, the rates which are paid upon these farms are related to what is being paid for similar work by those who are engaged in similar employment in the locality right around here. That is, a carpenter is paid something that has some relationship to what is being paid in the city.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to complete the picture. The minister suggested quite correctly that I had quoted some of the lower rates and not the higher ones. May I give the two highest figures that were included in the information given last February. A carpenter is listed as getting 96 cents an hour and a foreman carpenter gets the top rate of $1.03 an hour. I do not know what carpenters' rates are in this city, but I know that they are higher than that in the city from which I come, and I imagine they are higher than that here in Ottawa. If the minister is going to say that this is the prevailing rate, I would ask him to bear in mind the fact that these people live in Ottawa, which he will agree is a rather expensive city to live in. I hope serious consideration is being given to adjusting these matters.

Mr. Gardiner: Of course there is a reason why a carpenter might be paid more in the city of Winnipeg than these men are being paid, and there is a reason why a carpenter who is employed in the city here might get more, if you just figure the days he works and the payment he gets per day. These men are continuously employed. As to the carpenter in Winnipeg, on most of the jobs I have seen conducted in that city there are many days in the wintertime when he is not employed and certainly not fully employed. On days when it is 40 below zero or more there is not much outside work being done in that area. In the work we have there, these carpenters are available. We have inside work available for them and they are carrying on right through the year. Any work that has to be done on the inside is done in the wintertime. So their wages might not be as great as those some groups might be drawing under union pay in Winnipeg for a shorter period of time.

Mr. Knowles: That is hardly a satisfactory answer.

Mr. Harkness: I am still not at all satisfied about these buildings at Lethbridge. The minister has now told us that they cost in the neighbourhood of $400,000. I do not for a minute think they cost that much. Quite frankly, I think the minister is mixed up in his figures and is a little bit confused on the subject.

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of fact, I think the minister does not know any more about it than does the hon. member who is speaking. I have the figures which are given to me by the persons who are presumed to know, and I can only give the hon. member the answers they give me.

Mr. Harkness: If the minister will give us a breakdown of those figures, I think we shall find that some of the money he indicated is for the building is actually for the cost of carrying on experimental work and so on. I do not think that the cost of the building was the $400,000 approximately which the minister gave. If it cost that much, I certainly have a few more questions to ask about it, but I do not think it did.

Mr. Gardiner: My information is that it is all for capital expenditures in connection with the building. It might not be all for the building—

Mr. Harkness: It may be for equipment, for I do not think it is for the building.

Mr. Gardiner: It does include equipment; it will include plumbing and a lot of other things. It may include digging some ditches in order to get the water to where the plumbing is. It will not necessarily be just for the building itself, but everything associated with the building. There will be the building of roads through the grounds and everything else associated with it.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, we are still going around in circles. I still have not the information for which I asked the day before yesterday. I wonder whether the minister could bring in a breakdown of the building costs so that we shall know where we stand. After all, $400,000 is not "hay", as we say in my part of the country.

Mr. Gardiner: What the hon. gentleman asked for was the cost of this plant. He got the cost of the plant. If he wants something different, then he can put a question on the order paper indicating exactly what he wants to know and I will give him some figures within forty-eight hours. The figures are given to him exactly as he asked for them: he asked for the cost of that plant and he has the cost of the plant. In spite of what he says, I say it is the cost of the plant. If he has any way of proving it is not, then we shall have to get him some other figure.

Mr. Harkness: The Minister of Agriculture is now suggesting a most unusual procedure so far as this house is concerned; that is, that instead of getting the information on the estimates item by item, I should put a question on the order paper. If there is any time during the course of this session when

I should be able to get the information for which I asked, it is when the estimates for this particular item are before us. The suggestion by the minister that I should put a question on the order paper is, I think, the most ridiculous and most contemptuous of parliament that I have heard him make. He should be ashamed to make such a suggestion.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, I asked this question the day before yesterday. The minister has had forty-eight hours in which to get this information. He comes here and, practically speaking, by the manner in which he has been talking and the lack of information we have received, has admitted he does not know what the answer is. He has failed to give the information and then he tells me to put the question on the order paper. Before this item is passed I think the minister should give a detailed breakdown of the expenditures without any further delay.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I am accustomed to hearing that kind of speech made by the hon. member for Calgary East. He has been making them now for about four or five years. He never comes here with any information to back up any statement he makes, but merely makes general statements.

Mr. Harkness: Look at Hansard for the last four years, and you will see something different.

Mr. Gardiner: The question asked by the hon. member for Calgary East was as to the amount spent on the buildings for scientific services at Lethbridge, Alberta. The answer to that question, the same answer he would get if he were to put it on the order paper, is given in the figures I have supplied to him. This is the money actually expended. After he gets those figures, he says "Well, what was spent this year?" I informed him of our estimate of what it will cost for the work done this year, which amounts to $117,000 in addition to those figures. At the moment no one can tell him to the exact cent what that cost is going to be. The estimated cost is $117,000.

Now, that is the total cost of these buildings, and that is the information for which he asked. What I am going to say now is that, even if I were to say I will let the item stand and bring it down again, I have no reason to believe the figure would be any different from the figure he has. If the hon. member can stand up in his place in this house and, on his responsibility as a member, say that those are not the figures, then I am quite prepared to try to obtain what he has proven to be the figures. Those are the figures as they are given to me by the only people in Canada, of whom I am aware, who have the figures.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I asked for the cost of these experimental buildings. As a result of a question asked a few moments ago by the member for Macleod, the minister admitted that part of the cost was for barns, for suites in which people live, for roads and drains and various other things along that line. I believe we should have a detailed breakdown.

Item agreed to.

15. Branch farms and stations and illustration stations, $3,819,403.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I believe it was the minister himself who said he was coming back to this item 15 about which I wanted to ask a question. Is the minister in a position at this time to tell us whether any of this money has been spent in Newfoundland this summer or whether he proposes to spend any this year?

Mr. Gardiner: There is nothing provided in this vote for expenditure in Newfoundland. There is, however, a supplementary which comes up later. At the moment I am not prepared to say whether there is anything in that for agriculture. There may not be, but when we are dealing with the supplementary I shall be in a position to state whether there is or not. I have written to the premier and I discussed the matter with him when he was here a few days ago. He has been requested to advise me as to the needs of the new province of Newfoundland as soon as he returns to St. John's. I have suggested that any requests for expenditures will be investigated in order to put the province in relationship with the other provinces and put us in a position to proceed with that just as early as possible.

Mr. McLure: With regard to vote 15, is it the intention of the Department of Agriculture to eliminate these illustration farms throughout the province of Prince Edward Island? My reason for mentioning this is that there was a very fine illustration farm at South Rustico in Queens county. I understand that this is being closed. Probably the department knows something about it. I might say it was an excellent station run by Mr. John C. Clark. It was as important to the farmers in that locality as the central station, because a great deal of information was received from this farm. I should like to know what is being spent on it and whether it is being closed, because there was not enough money being spent on that station.

Mr. Gardiner: To answer the first part of the question, there has been no change in policy which would result in the closing of any experimental station in Prince Edward Island. My memory is that there are ten in that province. The general practice is to continue those experimental stations at any particular location so long as it is necessary to conduct the investigations and distribute the information which they were set up to do.

It does happen from time to time that that work is completed in that locality and the station may be closed, or the work may be taken up by another station some distance away. The thing which most commonly happens is that the individual owning the land does not wish to have it carried on any longer or the land changes hands and the individual who purchases the land is not anxious to continue or is not the type of person who likes to do that sort of experimental work, which necessitates people being on his land from time to time to receive instructions. Then we have to change the location. These are the chief reasons for changing at any time, but there has been no change whatsoever in policy.

Mr. McLure: I just wish to say that this station was not closed because the man was incapable or anything like that. I understand that he could not afford to continue on the small amount he was receiving from the department. I know that his work as an experimental station farmer has been excellent, and the community was very proud of him and of the experimental station or farm that he had there.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I hold in my hand a copy of the supplementary estimates. There are only three items in them, none of which refers to Newfoundland. Newfoundland came into confederation on April 1, which is six months ago. The minister has now informed the committee that he does not know whether anything has been spent down there or whether anything is to be spent there.

Mr. Gardiner: I might say for my hon. friend's information that these supplementaries are expenditures of the last year. The supplementaries for the coming period are not yet in. They are not yet passed.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It says:

To initiate the extension of normal dominion government services to the province of Newfoundland for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the year we are half through. No expenditures have been put in so far as the estimates which are before us now are concerned, and so far as I can remember there are none in for agriculture for Newfoundland. That is what I said at the beginning, but we have made inquiries down there. As a matter of fact, when the bringing in of the new province was under discussion I raised that question myself, and my understanding is that up to that time claims in connection with it had not been clarified, and therefore were not included. I imagine that will be corrected. As a matter of fact, I have asked to have it corrected just as soon as possible.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I point out that there is in the cabinet a learned man from Newfoundland who should be able to give the minister any information he requires about that province. I should like to know if he would be good enough to inform me whether it is a fact that in the past six months not one cent of the vote for agriculture has been spent in Newfoundland.

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of fact, the vote dealing with compensation for animals that have been destroyed is not divided up by provinces. It is one vote for doing a job, and the law with regard to that now applies to Newfoundland the same as to any other province, and any payments which are required to be made there will be made. The same thing is true with regard to the amounts for freight which are paid on grain which is being shipped to the eastern part of Canada from the west. I understand that up to date there is $250,000 in that item alone. Anything that is provided by legislation or legalized by legislation must be done in the new province just the same as in the other provinces.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Perhaps the minister was not expecting these questions tonight. I wonder whether he can give any further information, or is there any other information?

Mr. Lennard: The item had better stand.

Mr. Stick: I take it that when we deal with the supplementary estimates the information will be forthcoming. We are not dealing with the supplementaries tonight.

Mr. Gardiner: I now have the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950, and they read:

AGRICULTURE

Science service—

666. Plant protection—further amount required, $9,325.

Demobilization and reconversion—

667. Freight assistance on western feed grains—further amount required, $250,000.

668. Agricultural lime assistance—further amount required, $25,000.

I understand that these further amounts are required because these expenditures are to be made in Newfoundland. In the general estimates we do not divide it up by provinces, and we do not divide it up in the supplementaries either. The fact is that our department is making a request for more money.

Some hon. Members: Yes, you do.

Mr. Gardiner: You can get the particulars of the amounts which have been expended from year to year in the different provinces, but we vote a lump sum of money, as I expect we shall do in a few minutes under the item that was being discussed just before we reverted to this one, and we shall go on making expenditures in Newfoundland on that basis. What I am concerned about in this item is that I have not got, whatever others may have, and I do not think the department has, full information on where experimental stations ought to be established in the province of Newfoundland in accordance with the same principles we have applied to the other provinces. I can assure the hon. member that in due course we shall have them established there.

Mr. George: I should like to ask a question on item 15. It has to do with the rehabilitation of the marshlands. In view of the work which has been done experimentally at Nappan, will the minister consider the establishment of illustration stations in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to investigate the soil fertility of the marshlands?

Mr. Gardiner: I presume the questions which were handed to me are the questions which are in the hon. member's mind at the moment.

Mr. George: No, sir. My question has to do with the establishment of illustration stations rather than marsh rehabilitation. I was wondering whether the government had considered the advisability of establishing illustration stations throughout New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in connection with the dike lands.

Mr. Gardiner: There are 14 illustration stations in New Brunswick and 14 in Nova Scotia, similar to those which are established in the other provinces. The answer I have to the direct question which was asked is that there is no money taken out of the vote which was set aside for the reconditioning of the marshlands for the setting up of these stations. I presume that if we do set them up there they will be an enlargement of the principle that we have now for general purposes. If I were to examine the map carefully I might find that some of the stations we already have are in these areas, perhaps not on the marshlands. The only one that I am certain is there on the marshlands is an addition that was made to the farm at Nappan. I have been there two or three times myself. I mentioned here the other night the excellent work which has been done there in demonstrating that three times as much alfalfa or three times as much hay of any kind can be grown on these lands when they are properly cared for and treated as can be grown when they are allowed to go along in the state in which much of them has been in recent years.

Mr. Cruickshank: Can the minister tell me how many illustration stations there are in British Columbia?

Mr. Gardiner: Seventeen.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I am in agreement with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Westmorland. The advisability, I would say the necessity, of establishing certain areas, under the control of the experimental farm detached from the present experimental farm, on areas of marshlands which are being reclaimed and drained was placed before the committee and before the minister last year. It was suggested that different blocks of 100 acres, or more, which could now be purchased at a nominal price should be acquired. I agree with the hon. member for Westmorland that it is most essential to give encouragement and instruction to the farmers who in recent years have suffered so much in these areas. Under the policy of reclamation, different qualities of marshlands will be reclaimed by the government. Certain areas should be taken over and set aside for pasture, and certain areas for a high quality of timothy and clover hay, such as they now produce at the experimental farm at Nappan, where they produce three tons per acre.

The land now produces only a small tonnage per acre. Not only that, but the hay produced is of a most inferior quality. The hay produced at the Nappan farm is of high quality, while the growth on the land being reclaimed is an inferior grade not worth half as much per ton as that produced at the experimental farm.

I am in complete agreement with what has been said by my colleague from Westmorland county, in which constituency there is the greatest acreage of marshlands to be found anywhere in eastern Canada. It is very essential that the government take over such areas as quickly as possible and bring them to the highest state of production in order to demonstrate to the private marsh owners and the people generally the benefits under proper treatment of the land to be reclaimed.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I cannot allow this item to pass without expressing the special appreciation of my farmer constituents for the excellent work done throughout the years by the staff at the experimental station at Summerland, particularly in connection with the analysis of food products, fungicides and soils, and in the matter of soil conservation and fertilizers. We appreciate the advisory service they have rendered generally to the farming people of my constituency.

While that experimental station renders us a great service it cannot, owing to its location, render us service in every respect, so far as the average farmer is concerned. In the west we have the Summerland experimental station and in the east the Windermere experimental station, both of which operate under conditions somewhat different from ours. Their rainfall is lighter. They operate under drier conditions. Many of my farming constituents have asked me to suggest to the minister that in the Kootenays there is a place for the establishment of an illustration station.

In the Kootenays both climatic and soil conditions vary greatly in short distances. For instance, I happen to own two properties within six miles of each other in the Arrow lakes district. Over a period of forty years the winter temperature of one property has averaged 10 degrees higher than that of the other. This indicates that tests and experiments conducted at Summerland or Windermere cannot always be satisfactorily used in our district. Therefore I would suggest that the minister give consideration to the establishment of an illustration station in the Kootenays. In the first instance it would deal with the proper application of fertilizers to our very different and changing soils. I am of the opinion that a considerable amount of money is wasted by farmers in the wrong application of fertilizers, particularly in certain districts of the constituency I have the honour to represent.

The same would apply to potato varieties, vegetable varieties, seed-growing, and the development of tree fruits. In that connection I would mention, to illustrate my point, that thirty miles south of where I live they can grow satisfactorily the Delicious apple, whereas within thirty miles of that growing area the same apple cannot be produced satisfactorily on a commercial basis.

I therefore urge that the minister give consideration to the establishment of an illustration station in the Kootenay area, which is so different from the other districts covered by the experimental stations in British Columbia. Our conditions are different from those on the coastal area and from those in the dry belt area. Actually we live in a district which comes in between the damp coastal area and the dry belt as exemplified in the Okanagan and in the Invermere districts.

Mr. Jones: I should like to join in the remarks of my colleague from Kootenay West in paying a compliment to the farm at Summerland. In my opinion the work it has done is excellent. They have a splendid staff, and are really doing good work.

May I draw the attention of the minister to a condition arising from the floods adjacent to the farms, where some of the land was lost through erosion. I understand that in the last year some work was done to prevent further flooding, and I would ask the minister how much money, if any, is set aside in this item for the Summerland area, to remove the flood danger which was apparent last year. Is there a special fund, or some other means of raising funds to assist in this work?

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, may I bring to the attention of the minister the fact that in my riding we have the finest experimental farm in Canada, administered by Mr. Harold Hicks, the finest possible superintendent. We appreciate the assistance given to these junior ridings, which are following in our footsteps and copying the Agassiz experimental farm.

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps I might answer the question of the hon. member for Yale. My understanding is that he was talking about a small diking project on which the government spent a thousand dollars, and the municipality, or those concerned—I am not certain which put up the money—put up a proportionate amount. Each put up an amount proportionate to the amount the government was offering.

Item agreed to.

Production service—

17. Health of animals—Administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $2,868,297.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I should like to say a few words with respect to this item which has to do with the administration of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. During the last two decades we have noticed this item creeping up from a personnel of 100 to 400, and to the present 500. Inasmuch as we are an exporting country, that is all to the good. Over the past few years I have seen those of Australia, those of New Zealand and those of Canada and Canada still has some distance to go before she can reach the uniformity of quality and appearance of the exports of New Zealand. I think perhaps we are on a par with Australia, but there is room for improvement in other directions.

With the amount of exporting that we do and with an inspection staff of close to 500 we ought to improve our position very much and very soon. I think the minister should try to inculcate into the minds of these 500 personnel that they have other things to do besides draw their breath and their pay. They are supposed to provide inspection services in connection with meats, canned foods and other matters coming under the administration of this particular act. Not only that; a little more encouragement should be given to the little producers instead of leaving everything in the hands of the big three.

You know and I know quite well whom I mean when I talk about the big three. The smaller slaughterers and producers in Canada should be given an opportunity to develop trade under federal inspection, and in this connection I am going to register a complaint on behalf of a small producer. This man handles only some thirty cattle per day, never more than one hundred. His plant contained a lavatory and washroom facilities and there was on duty one inspector, and occasionally two, but he was told that he must install a shower bath for the inspector who was there to watch entrails and the odd piece go through to see whether they were healthy.

I can quite understand that in a large abattoir where they are slaughtering a thousand cattle a day it might be desirable that the inspector should have a shower bath, but where a small producer is handling no more than thirty a day I do not think he should be put to the expense of providing the same facilities. These veterinary inspectors work probably two or three hours a day and yet they must have an individual shower bath.

I examined these premises and found that they had a washroom which was tiled to the height of four feet six inches; there were toilet facilities, and splendid office space was available. But they did not happen to have a shower bath and therefore federal inspection of their products was to be withheld. In April they were given six months in which to provide these facilities, and those six months are about up. This plant employs only thirty or forty men and the manager offered his own bathroom facilities in the office building for the use of the inspector, but, no, they want their own.

I ask the minister and the department to see that the inspection services give reasonable encouragement to smaller producers and exporters who want federal inspection. They should be permitted to get on with their job. They should not be hampered with too many strings and requirements based on an organization made up of 500 personnel, when perhaps only one or two out of that 500 find their vocation for a few hours a day within the confines of a particular federally inspected institution.

These smaller organizations across Canada should not be discouraged. They should not be driven more and more into the hands of the big three. These younger organizations are trying to get established in this particular line of business. To my mind the deputies of the minister are inclined to be a little arbitrary. They are inclined to follow the letter of the law. I am not going to make a charge, but I say that that law has been developed by individuals who have found their job in Ottawa to be that of lobbying all departments of government on behalf of the big three. They have managed to have the regulations worded in such language as to sometimes make it most difficult for the little fellow to comply with them. These regulations emanate from discussions which these lobbyists have with deputies who in turn advise the minister. That is not a charge; that is just a suggestion that we should be a little more careful and a little more considerate of what is known by some people as the little fellow who is trying to get along, the underdog.

Tonight we are voting $3 million for these 500 personnel, when a few years ago they asked for only $1 million. Let them be a little more broadminded and not expect all the facilities that are to be found in the abattoirs of the big three. Those things should not be expected of the small producer who is doing only perhaps one-tenth of the business.

If these 500 personnel are receiving more consideration from the big three than they are from the little fellows the solution might be to alternate their services. Let them spend a few months with the big fellows and a month or two with the little fellows. But they should not demand of these small firms who are struggling to get along that they provide the same facilities furnished by the big three who are doing twenty, thirty, forty or fifty times as much business.

Mr. Cruickshank: While it is desirable that the people of Ontario take a bath, I do not think it should be made compulsory.

Mr. Gardiner: I was just wondering whether I should say anything in reply, but I do not think I should let the last two or three statements go by without anything being said. There are in Canada hundreds of slaughter houses—

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Not under federal inspection.

Mr. Gardiner: —that are operating without any restrictions and over which we have no authority. There may be thousands; I have not counted them, but I know they run into hundreds. The suggestion is made that we interfere with the small plants.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Gardiner: I will get the figures if my hon. friend will permit me. I did not interrupt him when he was speaking. I do not agree with most of what he said. An attempt has been made to create the impression that all of these regulations, and everything having to do with them, are for the benefit of the big three. As I understand it the big three have only about twenty-five plants in Canada. Our inspectors are in 140 plants. In other words, there are 115 plants that belong to people who are much smaller than the big three. We have no inspection in any plant unless that plant is doing either interprovincial or international business, unless they are trading into another province outside the one where the plant is situated, or into another country.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): That is what I am referring to.

Mr. Gardiner: We have inspectors in 140 plants. There are other plants that are pleading with us to put inspectors in them. They say that they want to get into this business too, and we are quite prepared to put inspectors into their plants when they put in the necessary equipment in order to make it possible for us to pass the product that comes out out of the plant as meeting the food laws of the areas into which these products are going. We are not accepting responsibility for saying that we know that all of the food laws associated with the production of food that is to be sent to some other country, or from one province into another province, are being met, unless we have inspectors there. We are not prepared to put inspectors there unless the facilities that are necessary in order to turn out the food as the regulations require are placed in these plants.

I have not heard a great deal of complaint, except what I have heard here, about what is required of those who are meeting the requirements. I have heard some suggestion from others that maybe they ought to be able to have inspection, but when they tell me that they are only killing thirty hogs, or they are only killing thirty cattle, it is obvious that these people are not in the business in a big enough way to be able to stand the expense of putting out the product in the manner which is required if it is going to be shipped into another province or into another country.

If they are only supplying the surrounding community, or supplying areas within their own province, then they are subject to the health laws of that province and to any regulations in connection therewith. As a matter of fact, I sometimes find that what we are being blamed for and accused of is not being done at all under our laws. I had quite a file of correspondence last year with a man living in Guelph about the prosecution of a certain gentleman who was selling meat. When the correspondence started I was under the impression that the man was under our regulations because our inspector had inspected his plant, and I thought he was being prosecuted as a result of those inspections. Finally I got a letter from an ardent supporter in that district, and he said, "Why does the dominion government employ the crown prosecutor appointed by the Ontario government in connection with this case?" Then I twigged there was something wrong somewhere.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You would never do that.

Mr. Gardiner: I checked into it and found that our inspector, as is the practice, had been appointed by the Ontario government as their inspector in connection with this particular activity. He had performed inspection work not under our pay at all but under the pay of the Ontario government. He had made his report to the Ontario government, and the prosecution was started from Toronto and not from here.

I only tell you that in order to emphasize what I was saying a moment ago, that all of the regulations and laws that have to do with the operation of these hundreds of plants all over the Dominion of Canada, which are operated to supply meat to local communities or to communities that do not extend outside the province, are regulations of the provinces. I must say that the provinces have good health laws in these matters. They enforce their laws and their regulations just as strenuously as we do.

I wanted to say that in order to clear up the impression that might be given that we insist on everyone operating a plant of this kind doing the things that people are required to do who are shipping outside their own province, either to other provinces or to other parts of the world.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to discuss with the minister a matter which has been taken up with the officials of his department by correspondence. I refer to the question of conducting brucellosis tests. That is a word I am not familiar with, but I understand that it means Bang's disease. That is the description used in the language of the cattlemen. I understand that if any cattle are to be exported to the United States they require this test to be made.

The British Columbia Beef Cattle Producers Association has requested that the tests be carried out at Kamloops instead of at Vancouver, where they have to be carried out at the present time. The reason for that request is that apparently the veterinarians of the department take samples from the cattle that are to be shipped, and they have to send their samples to the laboratory. That involves sending them by express to Vancouver, transporting them from there to the agricultural department laboratory at the university, making the test, and then sending a letter with the report back to the shipper. In some cases that has involved up to ten days for reasons which, though they have been investigated, are not very easy to understand.

One of the reasons for the extra delay is that apparently they are very complicated tests and the reports involve a large number of figures and serial letters. They used to send out the report by telegram, but it was found that it was too easy to transpose a number or a letter in the process of sending the wire. Therefore that practice has had to be discontinued, and in consequence the reports have had to come by letter. That means there is bound to be some delay in getting the report back.

Furthermore, owing to the fact that it takes some time to get the sample there, apparently in very hot weather or very cold weather some chemical change takes place in the blood in the test tube, and frequently the sample is of no use when it arrives at the laboratory. Then they have to send word to send in another sample. All of this involves a delay of a week or up to ten days, which, in dealing with cattle where markets may be fluctuating daily, is of course likely to prejudice the seller very considerably.

Furthermore, I am told that the United States buyers do not like these delays, and that it has a pretty serious effect on our cattle sales from British Columbia to the United States. The Department of Agriculture maintains several institutions at Kamloops. They have veterinarians in and around there, but the laboratory for doing this test work is in Vancouver. The Department of National Health and Welfare has in Kamloops quite an extensive laboratory which carries on experiments and research with regard to the diseases carried by animals. I am told that the personnel there are qualified to carry out brucellosis tests on cattle. There appears to be some reluctance to have the Department of National Health and Welfare laboratory at Kamloops used for this purpose.

I am also told that, while it would involve some extra work on their part, they could do it with their present staff. I am told that, if they merely had one qualified veterinarian to be there full time and one assistant, the work could be done with no strain at all. Under these circumstances, although the matter has been the subject of considerable correspondence, and various explanations have been given, the cattle growers association feels that the explanations and reasons are not adequate. They would be glad of further consideration, and they hope that eventually the Department of Agriculture will set up accommodation and equipment in Kamloops to carry out brucellosis tests either themselves or else in conjunction with the Department of National Health and Welfare.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Gardiner: There are special reasons why it is not considered wise to do that at Kamloops. As has been suggested by the hon. member, there is a plant there which is doing work that has to do with human diseases. I understand that one of the important experiments being carried on there has to do with the prevention of the spread of what in the old days was known as bubonic plague, which can be carried by rats. That kind of experimental work is being done there, and it is considered by some inadvisable to have persons going in and out or to have traffic in and out of a place of that kind, a condition which would be necessary if the other work were to be done at that point. That is the position taken by some of our officials who are located there and who are doing that particular work. As my hon. friend knows, in addition to that, the numbers of cattle involved in that area, as compared with some other areas in Canada, are not great. In spite of that fact, I think nearly all of the kind of inspection that is referred to, namely the sending in of blood tests and getting reports back on them, in the prairie area, for example, is done in Lethbridge and Saskatoon. The area involved in miles or distance is much greater than the distance that has been referred to between Kamloops and Vancouver. Then too the number of stock involved is out of all proportion. So there can be some argument to the effect that, apart from the special reasons that they are not doing it, it might be difficult to get a plant established there in any case. In other words, I am not going to say tonight that the only reason why the plant is not there and why the work is not being done there is the special one. We would have to check on what we would be required to do elsewhere if we were going to give the same service all over Canada to the same number of persons, and involving the same number of cattle, and the distance that the samples are now being shipped in other areas as compared with that area. There is good train service between Kamloops and Vancouver and samples can go down on one train and come back on the next. There are many places in Canada where it is not as easy to have the samples forwarded as it is there. I should not like to have it understood therefore that I am suggesting that, even if the other work were dropped, we might be in a position right away to establish such a plant. But I will give consideration to what the hon. member has said and will have my officials do likewise, and see if there is anything that can be done there.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad of the assurance given, but in answer to the first of the points the minister raised, with regard to the distance from Kamloops to Vancouver and the train service, I should like to say this. If that were the only consideration involved I would entirely agree with him. A large part of the difficulty is in the nature of the area served. Kamloops is roughly the centre of the cattle-producing area of British Columbia. From there to Cariboo, or down from the Cariboo to Vancouver where the samples have to go, it is difficult to send them by rail because they have to go down the P.G.E. to Squamish, by boat to Vancouver, back to the normal mail channels and out to the university. Shipment from the Cariboo to Vancouver is slow and laborious whereas from the Cariboo to Kamloops it is much quicker. So it is not just a question of from Kamloops to Vancouver which is adequately served by mail. That is the first thing.

Then as to the other point, there are other areas on the prairies from which they have to ship samples further. The minister said that if he set up a service in Kamloops it might be a precedent for other areas asking for extra services as well. I think the answer to that suggestion is this. While there are not as many cattle in British Columbia as there are in the prairies, there are very few beef cattle produced in the Vancouver area. The whole beef cattle producing area in the province is roughly centred in Kamloops. If you are going to carry out these tests in British Columbia, it seems to me that Kamloops is logically the place to carry them out, for that reason, and because from the outlying districts communications into Kamloops are much quicker than they are into Vancouver.

Mr. Quelch: The farmers in the Morrin district, which is a tuberculosis-free area, are glad to see that the work of testing cattle is to be started once again. I think the situation in that area is probably similar to that in other districts. When that area was set up—

Mr. Gardiner: Can we declare item 17 carried if we are going on with item 18?

Mr. Quelch: Does not item 17 deal with T.B.?

Mr. Gardiner: Item 18 deals with pay and compensation.

Mr. Quelch: I am not going to talk about that.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, all right.

Mr. Quelch: As I was saying, when this area was set up some years ago, it was understood that additional areas would be set up in the surrounding country. But unfortunately, owing to the difficulty of securing the services of veterinaries the government had to discontinue that service. Consequently, as the minister can readily understand, a most unsatisfactory situation has developed there. I am sure the minister understands what I am referring to, so I will not say anything more about it.

The question I want to ask the minister is this. In districts where there is already a veterinary established, in which there is a T.B.-free area, will it be the policy of the government to utilize the services of that veterinary in carrying out the tests? I think the minister realizes only too well that many of these veterinaries in the country are not having any too easy time in making a living. They are performing a valuable service, and it certainly would help them to make a living if the government could give this work to them where they are qualified to do it.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. We have now about 550 men on that work; 300 of them are part-time men and about 250 are full-time. Whenever a district is set up and there is a veterinary established there, we give him all the work that he can do.

Mr. Hansell: I should like to ask the minister a question with respect to the vaccination of horses that are transferred from one province to another. I do not know whether the necessity of vaccination in that case is a regulation proposed by this government or whether it would be a regulation proposed by the provincial government. The particular case I have in mind, and which was brought to my attention, was that of a man in Macleod who sold a team of horses to be transported to British Columbia. The man who purchased the horses wanted them for his work on farms, particularly for the haying season. That necessitated the vaccination of the horse, but this man could find no veterinary who would do the job. There was not one in the district. He phoned to Cardston about thirty or forty miles away. The veterinary said that he could not do it then and would not be able to do it for two weeks and advised the man to get in touch with Lethbridge. He did so and the veterinary there said that he could not do it then. He was going out of town, or something, for two weeks. He then got in touch with the Lethbridge veterinary. He was there and said, yes, bring the horses over. It would cost the man $25 to transport those horses to Lethbridge to have the vaccinating done. Then he would have to have it done again in about a week or ten days' time, which would cost another $25. Eventually, the man heard from the purchaser of the animals to the effect that he wanted the team for haying, not for snow removal. Now, perhaps that is a provincial regulation. I am quite in sympathy with the minister or whoever is responsible. We have heard the member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) say veterinarians find it very difficult to get along since the farms have been mechanized. Perhaps that is the case in this particular district.

I should like to ask whether any encouragement is given the veterinaries or someone who would do such a job as the vaccination of horses. I do not know, but I am told it is not a particularly difficult task. Perhaps some individual with even a smattering of knowledge of that sort of thing could vaccinate horses or cattle. These men who have a smattering of knowledge are not prepared to do it because they cannot get a licence, or something of that kind. The minister knows more about it than I do, but I should like an expression from him about what farmers or others who trade horses can do in such cases. Is the regulation a provincial or dominion regulation?

Mr. Gardiner: In connection with such diseases as glanders, for example, we have a regulation to the effect that those animals must be quarantined and eradicated.

Mr. Hansell: I do not think there was anything wrong with the horses.

Mr. Gardiner: I am saying that is what the dominion does, that is the type of work we do. Many of these other diseases, which are not as readily communicable as some of those with which we deal, are the subject of special provincial regulations. I understand the province of British Columbia has regulations in connection with certain diseases with which they have had some trouble. It is their desire to keep out those diseases which are not covered by any of our regulations. In this particular case, I presume it was one of those diseases that they were fighting. In that case we had nothing to do with it; it is a provincial regulation. From the story which has been related, I would judge it to be one of those cases. If it came within the group with which the dominion deals, we would handle it in just the same way as we handle glanders or other diseases.

Mr. Hansell: Is this licence, which is given a man to practise as a veterinary, granted by the dominion government or by the province?

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. Gardiner: It is granted by a provincial association under provincial law, as in the medical profession.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): There are two or three questions I should like to direct to the minister concerning items 17 and 18. Two days ago I asked him about compensation for those cattle that farmers had lost through the T.B. test. I wanted to know whether the payments would be increased. After reading the reply I am of the opinion that the minister's intention is to increase it in due time. I hope that is right.

In looking over the estimates I find that, in the year 1948-49, $1,007,845 was spent in compensation, while in the year 1949-50, the estimates we are now discussing, the amount allotted is $1,042,500. This would indicate to me that no provision has been made in these estimates to take care of increased compensation that might be contemplated.

Yesterday I journeyed to Toronto to see slaughtered a herd of 44 cattle from my constituency that had reacted to the T.B. test. I mention this case only because many other farmers, not only in Middlesex, but in Oxford and many other counties of western Ontario, are finding themselves in a similar situation. The problem is not only the loss of the cattle; for if the farmer is going to continue in business he has to replace those animals. He has an investment in buildings. He has his crops stored and is now without income. When he comes to replace those cattle he finds the money he has received for the reactors is far from adequate. I have noticed that it seems easy for the government to put through an order in council when other departments want to spend money, but they have been hesitating about this for some time. Could it be because the farmers are not too well organized or that there is only a limited number affected and the government believes it can get by on promises?

The federation of agriculture of the county of Middlesex made representations to the minister about this matter during the last session. They were given assurance that action would be forthcoming. Farmers are wondering just what is likely to happen. I am asking these questions of the minister so that in his reply he can cover the whole matter.

One of the questions in which I was interested concerns the number of cattle in the province of Newfoundland that have been tested for T.B. since Newfoundland became the tenth province. Has the minister that information? How many cattle have been tested in East Middlesex and how many have been tested in West Middlesex during the past year? Is the increased compensation going to take effect from the date the regulation becomes effective or will it be retroactive? During the war there was a period when the testing of cattle for T.B. was practically at a standstill because so many of the men who were capable of doing that work were in the army. During that same period the price of cattle increased, particularly good dairy cows, to such an extent that the compensation paid prior to that time is not adequate. I should like to have the minister bring us up to date on this whole question.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, the answer today is the same as it was a year ago. About ten per cent of the cattle that are reactors go into the tank. The increased price of cattle does not hurt the man who is being paid compensation unless there is a large proportion of the animal infected because it is only then that it goes into the tank. If an animal is worth $200 this year and it was worth only $50 ten years ago the compensation is on the same basis, but the remainder of the animal is sold and the individual gets the return. If his return is based on the $200 price he may get the greater part of the $200 and he gets the compensation as well. It is not correct to say that because the price has gone up on cattle the compensation ought to go up. The compensation is not the whole thing.

A year ago there was considerable discussion, and I think properly so, of the fact that ten per cent of the cattle did go into the tank, and that compensation was not high enough for these animals when we simply paid the amount that we were required by law to pay. We brought in a bill to change the law. I think I introduced it into the house but it did not get any further than the introduction by the time the house was dissolved. In answer to a question the other day, I said that as far as I knew the same bill would come back again, and I have had assurance since that time that the legislation which did get to that stage last year, which passed council, was agreed to and reported to this house, is coming back. Only today I signed the bill and sent it on its regular course by which it will get into this house. That bill does provide that we pay the full compensation on animals which have gone into the tank. It is made retroactive to April 1, 1947. That is the way the bill was drawn last session, and it was drawn after full discussion with different areas concerned. The bill will be brought down in the same form. I do not think it will be changed in any word or letter. I presume it will go through the house. As soon as it does, money will be made available. Supplementary estimates will be brought down in order to take care of the expenditure in addition to what is in these regular estimates. The reason the estimates are not greatly increased in relation to that problem is that the amount of money necessary to deal with it is not yet before the house because the legislation has not been passed by the house.

May I now deal with the question as to how many were slaughtered in Middlesex. I hold in my hand the information with regard to Middlesex. There are four headings which read as follows. The first heading is "Herds." The second heading is "Cattle." The third heading is "Reactors." The fourth heading is "Infected Herds", and the last column is "Amount of money paid in compensation." As applied to Middlesex the first figure is 2,931; the second figure, which is the one the hon. member is interested in, is 54,523. The number of reactors is 8,619. The number of herds affected is 1,274; and the amount of compensation paid is $317,905. That is the full total with regard to Middlesex.

Mr. Blair: Will the minister give the figures for Lanark in the last test, based on the Middlesex figures?

Mr. Gardiner: There is a difference between Lanark and Middlesex, in that three tests have been made in Lanark and only one in Middlesex, which would make the figures not comparable as between the two areas. The first figure in Lanark in the third general test is 1,776, but the important fact is that there were 35,219 cattle tested and 106 reactors from 39 herds. The total amount paid is quite small as compared with the other, only $3,695. They had been cleaned up pretty well in the first two tests and the number that reacted in the third test was quite small.

Mr. Blair: There were 106 reactors in 39 herds. The minister has not the figures for the 1,776 herds?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. That is the total out of 1,776 herds. Those were the reactors in the 39 herds in the third test. I think that is as it should be if the test is working. Clean up most of them the first time, clean up more the second, and there are not so many left the third time.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The minister has just mentioned that in the second test a much smaller number of cattle are found as reactors. The reason I journeyed to Toronto yesterday was to see this herd slaughtered. On the first test only three were found to be reactors. On the second test 44 were found to be reactors. That led to some doubt in the minds of people in my constituency as to just what was going on. But I want to say to the minister and to others that I saw 33 of the carcasses butchered yesterday and I am satisfied that on that test no mistake was made so far as these cattle were concerned, but I do not see how they missed them the first time.

Mr. Gardiner: Of course, there is the possibility that the three which were found in the beginning left sufficient infection around for the others to become infected in the meantime. I know that happened once in my own herd.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Have any T.B. tests been made in Newfoundland?

Mr. Gardiner: No general tests have been made by this government. Whether one has been made by the other government, I do not know. Perhaps the Secretary of State can inform us.

Mr. Bradley: No.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand not.

Mr. Blair: Will the minister give consideration to the insurance scheme I suggested for the higher grades of purebred cattle?

Mr. Gardiner: After the hon. member spoke I tried to get some information as to the extent to which high-priced cattle can be insured. I imagine there is a possibility of insuring such cattle, which have been properly inspected and tested.

Mr. Blair: With commercial companies?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, by commercial companies. However, I do not know that the government would want to consider going into the insurance business in that way.

Mr. Fair: What progress is being made in stamping out Bang's disease?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know that I can suggest that great progress is being made, but I believe I can say that fairly satisfactory progress is being made. I have here some figures showing the total number of herds under examination and control of our inspection staffs, and the number of herds declared clear. These headings mean that the herds are still under supervision, and to get the total number of herds the figures should be added together. The information I have here is as follows:

	Herds under examination and control of inspection staffs	Herds declared clear
Prince Edward Island	37	10
Nova Scotia	1,228	90
New Brunswick	20	9
Quebec	294	200
Ontario	1,975	1,432
Manitoba	9	4
Saskatchewan	18	12
Alberta	11	2
British Columbia	29	18

In all Canada there are 3,621 herds under supervision and 1,777 declared clear.

[Mr. White (Middlesex East).]

Mr. Fair: What method is being used? Is there a process of vaccination while the calves are young, or at some other time?

Mr. Gardiner: Calf vaccine is being used by owners. Many of them tested these herds in order to render their cattle exempt from Bang's disease. This has proven successful in the United States. For a time we did not advocate its use here, but in more recent years we have accepted the proof given that it has been used successfully in the United States. We are now encouraging its use here, and many farmers are using it. In addition to that, there have been the ordinary tests which have been made, and animals condemned.

Mr. Fair: What happened to the Koch treatment of some seven years ago?

Mr. Gardiner: It has never been thought by the department to be satisfactory, and has never been encouraged by them.

Mr. Fair: But some experiments have taken place in connection with it?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand the department has tried to investigate everything that has been proposed at one time or another. This was one of the treatments they did not consider sufficiently satisfactory to warrant its recommendation.

Mr. Johnston: It was three or four years ago that Dr. Arnott of London, Ontario, had something to do with this Koch treatment. There was an extensive investigation, and I am wondering whether a report has been made with respect to it.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, a report was made. He came here and discussed the matter with me and with others. I sent him to the officials, of course, and a full investigation was made into the treatment. The report was that the department was not prepared to recommend it.

Mr. Johnston: Would the minister make a copy of the report available? When Dr. Arnott was here he came to my office on several occasions to discuss this matter, and told us about the methods being employed and the manner in which the department was handling it. We were quite concerned at that time, because there did seem to be some hope that the treatment might have substantial results. If it is possible for the minister to submit the report to the committee, it would be of great service to us.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not sure whether the report was tabled in a previous year or not. I do know, however, that I have had considerable correspondence with regard to it, and I believe I sent the report to those who were interested in it. I am sure it is available to members of the house. I believe we could supply the hon. member or any other hon. members with copies of it.

Mr. Johnston: Would the minister send us a copy? It would be appreciated.

Mr. MacNaught: In connection with tuberculosis, I understand Prince Edward Island was one of the first provinces in which experiments were carried out. Tests were made this year. Has the minister any information as to the incidence?

Mr. Gardiner: I believe there were about 100,000 cattle, or something in that neighbourhood, and only about a dozen reactors in the whole group. In other words, the island is pretty well cleared up.

When I came here about fifteen years ago the maritime provinces were entirely covered by inspectors, and I think they were the only ones. One province at that time was strongly opposed to having any inspections, and no area in that province had been inspected. Today a considerable portion of it has been covered. Farmers right across Canada today are all agreed, and all agitate strongly that we come to check their cattle. However, up until fifteen or twenty years ago there was as much opposition to it as support of it. Now everyone wants it.

Mr. Stanfield: Are all the counties of Nova Scotia tuberculosis-tested areas today?

Mr. Gardiner: They are all restricted areas. I should not like to say they are all fully tested and clear to the extent that that obtains in Prince Edward Island.

Item agreed to.

18. Production service—Compensation for animals slaughtered, $1,042,500.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): The minister will recall that at the last session I requested that some of the moneys provided under this item be used for the purpose of research to check on swine fever, owing to the fact that, with the present large volume of soap being used, and the garbage-fed hogs being offered, the alkalinity and the acidity had had some effect on the increase in swine fever. I asked that some research be done and I ask now whether any research has been done, or shall we have to wait a little longer?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that nothing new has been done since the discussion of last session, but that may be due partly to the fact that we were busy on other things in the meantime. As most hon. members know, I have just got back to the department within the last week. I shall see that consideration is given to the representations made.

Mr. Graydon: I do not think the minister should be denied an opportunity of answering my question.

Mr. Gardiner: As the hon. member for Peel suggested, we have had this matter up at least twice or perhaps three times in the house. This claim is being made by Mr. McIntyre and I believe one other person for compensation because of a special condition that developed. I am not enough of a specialist to know what proportion of cattle slaughtered will show definite proof of T.B. when they have been tested previously and found to be reactors. I am quite satisfied that a considerable percentage would not give any indication in the meat itself. This indication might be apparent in some of the organs that are thrown away and not utilized for meat purposes.

I imagine that the officials who were responsible for the test used exactly the same test as had been used on cattle all across Canada and it is difficult to understand how under those circumstances some forty odd cattle should be tested and then when slaughtered show no trace of the disease. I do not remember all the details and unfortunately I have not got them here, because it is so long ago. However, I do recall that our people investigated the matter on more than one occasion and came to the conclusion that there were no grounds on which special payment could be made.

If the legislation that is now being brought down had been made retroactive for a year longer, and if the cattle had gone into the tank, then there would be provision for special payment. But the opposite occurred in this case. There was no reason to send the animals into the tank and apparently the meat was all usable. That would mean that he would get the full value of the cattle at that time, but not as high a value as they would bring now.

I understand that these were breeding stock of a grade which would bring a much higher price than beef cattle. I have no doubt that Mr. McIntyre and the other gentleman feel aggrieved but I doubt very much if there is any legislation under which we could make payment. There may be a question as to whether we should have legislation and whether it should be made retroactive. I do not know the extent to which it would involve us.

This work is being carried on because the government has been pressed to carry it on. It is quite true that in the early years we had to sell the idea, but in recent years farmers all over the country have been pressing us to carry out these tests. Most of them accept the result. Some of them may feel that they have lost money, but I think most of them feel that over the long period they are really being helped.

But when a man takes some forty-odd cattle to be slaughtered, and then on examination no disease condition is found, there may be something special that we should do about it. All I can say is that I shall have the officials have another look at it to see if we cannot find some reason to take care of the situation.

Mr. Graydon: I thank the minister for his consideration. Perhaps he will just remind his officials that there were three factors involved which perhaps ought to be taken into consideration. The first was that the herd had not reacted for many years. There were no reactors in the tests that were made.

Mr. Gardiner: They were tested every year.

Mr. Graydon: That is right. The second is that the serum used had been changed at that particular time. I would not want to give this as authentic information, but I understand that the serum was so severe that it had to be withdrawn afterward and another used. Mr. McIntyre's tests seemed to be in that particular period when the serum was so severe.

Mr. Gardiner: My memory is that that is correct.

Mr. Graydon: The third was that no evidence was found in the carcasses. I hate to be bringing up this matter so often, but it does seem to me that this is a case that should receive consideration. I know that the minister will do his best to see that this man gets justice. If he is not entitled to anything, that is all right; but it seems to me that he is, and that is the only reason I plead his case.

Production service—

21. Grants to fairs and exhibitions, under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council and subject to allocation by the treasury board, $475,900.

Mr. Wright: The details on page 109 indicate that $120,000 is to be paid to agricultural exhibition associations under order in council 2294 of June 6, 1947. I should like to know the subject matter of that order in council.

Mr. Gardiner: We have what are known as regular grants to fairs. There is a grant of $1,800 per year to B fairs and $2,500 to A fairs. At the time these grants were set up it was realized that they would not cover all the requirements of these associations, particularly in view of the fact that in many cases buildings had been used during the war for training purposes and had to be remodelled, while in some cases the fair association had to move from their own buildings to other grounds or buildings. Then in other cases buildings had been burned down and all that sort of thing. We provided that if they would agree that the $1,800 should be capitalized over ten years they would be given what amounted to a loan for the time being of $18,000 or a sum which would be in the neighbourhood of $18,000 when interest charges were included. That is paid back by paying $1,800 during each year of the ten years in order to take care of the amount. In other words, they can go ahead and spend $18,000 this year, and the amount is paid over the ten years of the grant. For the class A fairs it is $2,500, and on the same basis it gets you $25,000 to spend at one time.

There is one other which I may as well recite at the moment. We make special grants of a much larger amount which are negotiated with the fair board, and which are usually three-way payments. The province puts up an amount similar to what we put up, and the fair board itself secures a similar amount either from the city in which the fair is located, or from the association. The three amounts are utilized in order to put up special buildings. That is being done now in the city of Ottawa. It is being done at present in the city of London and was done in the city of Vancouver. It was done on quite a number of occasions before the war, and is being repeated in Toronto as to certain sums in connection with both the winter and summer fairs. Grants of that kind are being made across Canada, and they are in very much larger sums.

Mr. Wright: Can the class B fairs obtain these larger grants?

Mr. Gardiner: No. So far as the class B fairs are concerned, it is the $1,800 grant which can be capitalized over ten years in order to make a larger expenditure at the moment.

Mr. McLure: I should like to ask the minister—

The Chairman: Order; the hon. member for Prince.

Mr. MacNaught: I notice in the details that there are grants for exhibitions or fairs in every province in Canada with the exception of Prince Edward Island. I understand that some years ago a grant was made to the Charlottetown exhibition. At Charlottetown we have one of the best annual fairs in Canada. I understand that they are contemplating some additional construction, and I would ask the minister to take under consideration the possibility of making a grant to that fair next year.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that Charlottetown is a class A fair, and of course they have all the opportunities that any other class A fairs have to make an application. They get their regular $2,500 grant, and that can be utilized to build up a larger fund. We will hold back payments over ten years in order to permit them to spend a larger amount now. Depending on how large a building they want to put up, as a class A fair they are in a position where it would be possible for them to come here and discuss a grant of a larger amount. I cannot say they would obtain it. It would depend on the circumstances.

Mr. McLure: When you shouted me down, Mr. Chairman, I got such a fright that I forgot my question. However, it was my fault. How many class A fairs are there? Will the minister read the list to us, also the class B fairs, and also the amount of the grant to each? Sometimes a class B fair becomes a class A fair, and sometimes they go the other way.

Mr. Gardiner: There are seventeen class A fairs in Canada. There is one in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island. There are no class A fairs in Nova Scotia. There are none in New Brunswick. The class A fairs in Quebec are at Lachute, St. Hyacinthe, Sherbrooke and Three Rivers. In Ontario they are at Galt, Lindsay, London, Ottawa, Peterborough and Toronto. In Manitoba there is a class A fair at Brandon. In Saskatchewan there are class A fairs at Regina and Saskatoon. In Alberta there are class A fairs at Calgary and Edmonton. In British Columbia there is a class A fair at Vancouver.

The returns are not in for most of the fairs for this year, but I can give the figures for 1948-49. The amount for Vancouver was $14,500; Calgary, $3,500. At Edmonton we have one of those agreements which extend over the years so that the grant that was actually paid for the year was only $500. At Regina the amount was $4,000, and at Saskatoon $4,000. They are both the same. At Brandon, Manitoba, the amount was $4,000. Taking Ontario, the amount for Galt was $4,000, Lindsay, $3,500; London, $4,000; Ottawa, $4,500; Peterborough, $4,000; and Toronto, $4,000. Those are made up of the regular grants plus the possibility of two five hundreds. Some get one and some get two. In Quebec the amount for Lachute was $3,612; St. Hyacinthe, $4,000; Sherbrooke, $4,500; and Three Rivers, $4,000. The amount for Charlottetown was $3,500.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): In Cumberland county we have two fairs. One, the regular county fair, is held at Oxford, and is probably the best of its kind in Nova Scotia. It has been carried on and built up over the years by the wholehearted co-operation of the citizens of that community. In the town of Amherst we have the maritime winter fair which has been in existence for about fifty years, and is now the senior winter fair in Canada. It is agreed by stock raisers all over the maritime provinces that it has done more to build up the standard of stock of all kinds than any other agency in the maritime provinces. The grant appears to be only $5,500. There is also assistance from the province of Nova Scotia, the province of New Brunswick, and the province of Prince Edward Island, but in view of the increasing cost of carrying on the work, and the high standard that the fair has reached, the grant is not sufficient. The grant made to the royal agricultural winter fair in Toronto is $50,000. The maritime winter fair at Amherst is second to the royal agricultural winter fair, and the amount granted to it by the federal government is entirely inadequate today.

One member of this house, the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie, has gone down there from year to year. As he is a member of the house, we are glad to see him there judging the horses, with his silk hat, tuxedo, his cane, his gloves and so on. He is popular in Amherst; and if he were here tonight he would corroborate what I am saying and tell the members of the committee what a splendid exhibition has been built up there. We have been disappointed that the minister has not found it convenient to attend oftener. Over the years the other ministers of agriculture, from the days of Hon. Sydney Fisher, made it a practice of attending our show. I am not saying that the present minister has never been there, but he has not always come when he has been invited. Last year, when he was in Nova Scotia, the senior member for Halifax inveigled him away to another meeting of a different character. It did not have anything to do with agriculture. Anyway, on behalf of the people of the maritimes, and especially on behalf of the people of Amherst, I extend to the minister a special invitation to attend this year. Last year we were favoured by having the leader of the opposition make a personal visit, and when it was found that he was interested he received a special invitation. The large arena, the construction of which has been contributed to by both the federal government and the provincial government, was packed. Mr. Drew examined the exhibits and stated that he was amazed at the quality of the stock and the quantity shown at the maritime winter fair.

I make two appeals to the minister tonight: first, to attend our fair this year; and, secondly, to examine into the requirements and see if the grant being made to the maritime winter fair cannot be materially increased in order to give further encouragement in the splendid work that has been done over the years—about fifty, in all—by the citizens of Amherst and the stock raisers in the maritime provinces.

Mr. George: I should like to associate myself with the hon. member for Cumberland in asking the Minister of Agriculture to attend the maritime winter fair this fall. While it is probably the smallest among the fairs he has attended, it is one of the best fairs we know of. I am sure he will see that this money is being well expended and that we have use for more. This fair is one of the best attended fairs in eastern Canada and the buildings are crowded. The facilities are not large enough to hold the crowd around the exhibits. As a member of the board of directors for the past year, although I am not a member now, and especially as a member of one of the committees of the fair, I appreciate their difficulties; and I would recommend to the minister that he consider visiting that fair this fall and seeing what we really have.

Mr. Fair: Will the minister be good enough to give us the list of B fairs in 1948-49 and the grants that were paid?

Mr. Gardiner: The list is a rather long one. There are Bridgewater, Oxford, Sydney and Truro in Nova Scotia. Amherst is a winter fair. That is the one that has been spoken of. I think the second fair I visited after I became minister was the Amherst fair. The first one was Sherbrooke, I think, and the second one was Amherst. I have not got around to all of them yet. Probably I shall get back there some time. To return to the B fairs, in New Brunswick there is Fredericton; in Quebec: Ayer's Cliff, Brome, Cookshire, Quebec, Rimouski, Roberval, Ste. Scholastique, Shawville, Victoriaville and Waterloo; provincial fairs, Ormstown and Quebec; winter fairs, Sherbrooke. Then in Ontario: Barrie, Belleville, Brampton, Fort William, Kingston, Leamington, Markham, Owen Sound, Renfrew, Richmond, Simcoe, Stratford, Strathroy, Teeswater, Welland and Woodstock; winter fairs, Ottawa and Toronto. Then in Manitoba: Carman, Dauphin and Portage la Prairie, with a winter fair at Brandon. In Saskatchewan: Estevan, Lloydminster, Melfort, Moose Jaw, North Battleford, Prince Albert, Weyburn and Yorkton, with winter fairs at Regina and Saskatoon. In Alberta: Camrose, Lethbridge, Red Deer, Vegreville and Vermilion, with winter fairs at Calgary and Edmonton. In British Columbia: Armstrong, Chilliwack and Kamloops. That is the list.

[Mr. Black (Cumberland).]

Mr. Fair: Can the minister give us some idea of the amount of the grants to fairs in those western provinces?

Mr. Gardiner: The grants are about $2,500. I notice that at Lethbridge the grant is $2,500; at Red Deer it is $2,500; and at Vegreville it is $2,093.07. I do not know just why they got the seven cents. At Vermilion it is $2,500.

Mr. Drew: I just want to add a word to what has been said by the hon. member for Cumberland in regard to the maritime winter fair. I had a special interest in that fair because the royal winter fair, which was originally in Guelph before it went to Toronto, always had some argument as to which was the senior winter fair. However, I do not think there is any doubt about Amherst's properly claiming that right. It is a magnificent fair of the maritime provinces. It does tremendous work in advancing the quality of the stock and of the agricultural production generally. But at that fair there are not some of the opportunities for raising outside revenue that there are at the royal winter fair, for instance. I would join in what the hon. member for Cumberland has already said about considering the propriety of substantially increasing the grant to that fair.

Mr. Harkness: Out of this building grant of $120,000 for this year and $80,000 which was spent last year, can the minister tell me how much, if any, was allocated to the Calgary and Edmonton fairs respectively?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not think there is any special grant being made to Calgary, because they got their total amount last year of $3,500. Edmonton received only $500, which would suggest that we did make an agreement there. I am speaking from memory now, but I am quite certain that, owing to the construction of a grandstand, there was a special grant arranged for Edmonton, which results in our taking the money out of the regular grant from year to year in order to make up the larger amount which was required.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to follow this up. I was asked by one of the directors of the Calgary Stampede why Edmonton was able to get a building grant for its exhibition while Calgary could not get one. It is for that reason I asked the question. The minister says that Edmonton has about $500 this year, but I understood the amount was in the neighbourhood of ten or fifteen thousand dollars.

Mr. Gardiner: There is no reason why Calgary cannot get it if Calgary comes here as Edmonton did and puts forward special reasons for erecting a building. If they are prepared to capitalize the grant over a term of years, it can be done. In the case of Edmonton, instead of getting $3,500 they will receive $500. The $500 is a grant which covers boys' and girls' clubs, and is never taken into an arrangement of that kind. We believe it is important that these boys' and girls' clubs be continued and the amount is paid for that purpose.

When a board comes along and says that, so far as the regular grant is concerned, they understand they are to receive $3,000 or $2,500—

Mr. Harkness: What do you mean by "regular grant" in that case?

Mr. Gardiner: The grant which is based on the fact the fair has a prize list and is a class A or B fair. It is permissible for such a fair to put up a building and utilize all the money they would receive over five years—it may be five but not more than ten years. This would mean that if they were entitled to a regular grant of $3,000, they could get $30,000. If they wanted half that amount, they could take half the amount from that particular fund or enter into a five-year arrangement. Edmonton has made such an arrangement but Calgary has not, so far as I know.

Mr. Harkness: The arrangement made was the one the minister suggests, a borrowing into the future; it was not one of the other types of grant he mentioned about an hour ago, which also came under this item?

Mr. Gardiner: Except that when I was dealing with it a while ago I did cover this type of grant as well as the larger grant which is made to fairs such as Toronto, Ottawa, London, and Vancouver.

Mr. Cruickshank: In Chilliwack we have a class B fair and we are perfectly satisfied with the fair treatment we have received in the past from the government. Over $100,000 of our own money was spent on a building for the Chilliwack fair. This money was contributed by the farmers and businessmen of the district. Unfortunately, we find we are in no position to complete the building. There are only two class B fairs in the province of British Columbia. I should like to ask the minister whether his department will consider giving us a grant or a loan—we would prefer a grant—to enable us to complete our building.

Mr. Gardiner: These arrangements are made by grant, that is, a grant of so much money to a class B fair. These grants go as high as $2,500, $1,800 of which is the ordinary grant; $200 is to provide for judges and $500 for boys' and girls' clubs. The only part of this grant about which we undertake to enter into an agreement is the $1,800. According to our legislation, the time limit is ten years. In the case of the Chilliwack fair, they could negotiate for the full amount or any part of the full amount of approximately $18,000 to be paid this year. If such an agreement were made, however, there would be no annual grant beyond the $200 and the $500. If only half of that amount were needed, arrangements could be made to charge it over a five year period or half of it over ten years.

Mr. Cruickshank: Perhaps I did not make myself clear. We are not in a position to complete our building after having invested $100,000 of our own money. We frankly admit it. There is a roof over the building, but we owe for the steel in the roof. This is a recreational centre as well as a building used for fair purposes. Is it not possible for the government to consider making a grant to us, or a loan at a reasonable rate of interest to complete this building?

Mr. Gardiner: By agreement, you can get $18,000 from the government for that purpose if that will complete the building. If that will not complete the building, then you can secure the money by means of a three-way agreement such as we have entered into with other fairs, whereby the province gives a similar amount. If your people can count what they have done as their share, then we would put up the $18,000.

Mr. Wright: Could the minister give the committee some idea of the qualifications that are necessary for the establishment of a class B fair? Is the number of class B fairs restricted in each province? If that is so, then until such time as one of the present class B fairs drops its charter, could another class B fair be operated in that province? Could the minister inform us as to the method of organization for having a class B fair established in an area where there is a class C fair now?

Mr. Gardiner: A class B fair is established when a fair has paid prizes amounting to $3,000 for three years. In order to prove that has been done, the evidence is submitted to us by the province which has control over these smaller fairs. When the point is reached where $3,000 in prizes has been paid for three years, then it can be classified as a class B fair.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday, Mr. Speaker, we will resume the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, September 26, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

FRUITS AND VEGETABLES

SUSPENSION OF RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTATIONS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about the importation of fresh fruits and vegetables.

Hon. members will recall that when the shortage of United States dollars made it necessary to impose import restrictions in November, 1947, the importation of oranges and other citrus fruits, apples, potatoes, onions and fruit juices, was placed on a quota basis and the importation of many other fresh fruits and vegetables was prohibited.

As I said on several occasions in this house during the debate on the Emergency Exchange Conservation bill, these import restrictions on fresh fruits and vegetables like the other restrictions were intended to be temporary. They were put on as a necessary measure to conserve exchange and it has been our declared policy to relax and remove them as soon as the exchange position permitted.

Accordingly from time to time, as our reserves of gold and United States dollars improved, we relaxed the restrictions, by increases in the quota and by allowing the importation of staple vegetables and some fruits under open general permit—that is, without restriction.

In December, 1948, when the restrictions were substantially relaxed, I said that it was the government's intention to remove all remaining restrictions under the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act on fresh fruits and vegetables by the following July—that is, July 1949. This intention was confirmed in the budget speech of March 22 of this year.

It is hardly necessary for me to enlarge upon the grave uncertainties which confronted the government in July of this year arising out of the British exchange crisis. Under the circumstances the government considered that any further action at that time which might in any way adversely affect our exchange position should be postponed pending the outcome of the conferences and discussions then under way.

The government has now reviewed the position in the light of the Washington discussions, the subsequent realignment of exchange rates and the domestic supply situation and has come to the conclusion that it should now proceed to carry out its declared intention to remove all remaining restrictions under the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act on the import of fresh fruits and vegetables. I am hopeful that in due course other import restrictions can be relaxed and removed. But that will depend upon future developments in our exchange position.

Accordingly the government has decided to suspend the present import restrictions on all kinds of fresh fruits and vegetables in their natural state, and also on fruit juices, effective next Saturday, October 1.

No change is being made at present in the restrictions on canned or frozen or otherwise processed fruits and vegetables.

MEAT PACKING INDUSTRY

WORKS AND UNDERTAKINGS DECLARED TO BE FOR THE GENERAL ADVANTAGE OF CANADA

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to declare the meat packing industry works for the general advantage of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to make that part of the meat packing industry which carries on operations in two or more provinces subject to section 53(g) of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. In matters of collective bargaining the industry will then be able to negotiate on a national basis, and the government of Canada will have the authority to deal with disputes in an industry whose smooth functioning is essential to the national economy.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

PROVISION FOR FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (for the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to encourage and assist in the construction of a trans-Canada highway and to provide for this purpose that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply may enter into agreements with any provinces providing for the payment by Canada to those provinces of contributions in respect of the cost of a trans-Canada highway; with provision also for the employment of temporary engineers, technical officers and other employees for the purpose of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA FORESTRY ACT

FOREST PROTECTION AND EXPERIMENT, CONTROL AND MANAGEMENT

Hon. Colin Gibson (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to authorize the governor in council to establish as a national forest or as a forest experimental area lands belonging to His Majesty in the right of Canada and to exercise control and management thereof and construct works therein; to establish and maintain forest research laboratories; to assist provinces or owners of forests and to enter into agreements respecting the protection and development of forest lands. The Minister of Mines and Resources is authorized to appoint temporary officers and employees for the carrying out of the provisions of the act.

Expenditures incurred are payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION ACT

CORPORATION TO TAKE OVER PROPERTY AND EQUIPMENT OF MARCONI AND CABLE AND WIRELESS, LIMITED

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to establish under the direction of the Minister of Transport a corporation to be called Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation to take over the property and equipment of Canadian Marconi Company, Limited, and Cable and Wireless, Limited, used in connection with the external communication services. These communication services to be operated by the corporation and co-ordinated with the services of other parts of the commonwealth.

The Minister of Finance with the approval of the governor in council to be authorized to pay to the corporation out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund an amount not exceeding in the aggregate four and one-half million dollars and in addition thereto such moneys as may be appropriated by parliament for the capital purposes of the corporation.

The Minister of Finance with the approval of the governor in council to be authorized to lend, from time to time, moneys to the corporation out of unappropriated moneys of the consolidated revenue fund, for temporary purposes, the aggregate outstanding at any time not to exceed $100,000.

The amount of losses suffered by the corporation in any year to be paid to the corporation from moneys appropriated by parliament for that purpose.

The amount of the profits realized by the corporation in any year to be paid to the Receiver General of Canada.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN ACT

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION AT THE PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I should like to ask the Minister of Mines and Resources whether the government intends to introduce legislation at this session to amend the Indian Act.

Hon. Colin Gibson (Minister of Mines and Resources): A draft bill to amend the Indian Act is in the hands of the Department of Justice, but I am not able to say when it will be available for consideration by the house.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): We were told last session that the bill to amend the Indian Act was before the Department of Justice. When does the minister expect it will come to the surface? It has been there a long time now.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): I am afraid the hon. member will have to address that question to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Will the minister convey it to him? He is not sitting more than a mile and a half away.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION OF GERMAN NATIONALS TO CANADA

Hon. Colin Gibson (Minister of Mines and Resources): I should like to reply to a question asked on Friday last by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). The question was:

Has the government given consideration to relaxing the immigration laws in order to let into this country German nationals who have relatives in Canada?

I want to apologize to the hon. member for stating at that time that I had not received notice of his question. I found later that notice had been sent to my office, but unfortunately I did not receive it.

In reply to the question I can say that the matter has received the consideration of the government, but that no change has been made in the existing regulations. However, there has been some modification in the enforcement of the regulations, in that the government is now prepared to consider applications for the admission from Germany of first degree relatives of legal residents of Canada, provided that suitable settlement arrangements have been made, and they have been passed as acceptable in respect to health and character. Such applications, if approved, will be dealt with by special order in council.

Those eligible for consideration are: (a) the wife and unmarried children under eighteen years of age of a legal resident of Canada; (b) the husband of a legal resident of Canada; (c) the parents, age sixty-five years and over, of legal residents of Canada.

Mr. Fleming: Is consideration being given to the admission of German fiancés of resident Canadians, having regard to the immigration regulations affecting German nationals?

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): That matter has been under consideration. It is not felt that we should make any general regulation as to fiancés because it is too easy for persons to claim that he or she is a fiancé. However, I can tell the hon. member that when a case is made out that seems to be a reasonable one, the matter will receive consideration.

Mr. Wright: I should like to ask whether the lifting of the regulations will apply to Germans living in the Russian zone as well as to those living in the other zones.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): There has been no lifting of the regulations. It is merely that special cases, particularly those of hardship involving various families, are receiving attention, and, instead of a complete prohibition, the government is prepared to deal with individual cases by special order in council where it deems the conditions justify such action.

PANDIT JAWAHARLAL NEHRU

ANSWER TO QUESTION AS TO VISIT TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): May I supplement the answer I gave the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) on Friday last when he inquired whether or not arrangements had been made for a visit to Canada of Prime Minister Nehru. Mr. Nehru has accepted the invitation of the government to visit Canada this fall. It is expected that he will arrive in Ottawa on Sunday, October 23, and remain until October 26. Mr. Nehru will be the guest of Their Excellencies the Governor General and Lady Alexander at Government House. Following the visit to Ottawa Mr. Nehru will go to the United States, but he will return to Canada for a brief visit to Vancouver on November 2 and 3 to meet the local Indian community.

Mr. Green: May I ask whether or not arrangements will be made to have Mr. Nehru address the members of the House of Commons?

Mr. St. Laurent: That question has been taken up with Mr. Nehru, and we hope, and I think I can say rather confidently, that he will consent to address the members of the houses of parliament.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

PROCEDURE IN AMENDMENT—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Prime Minister if he has yet received replies to the letters he wrote on September 15 to the provincial premiers concerning amendments to the British North America Act, and, if he has, would he consider tabling them so that they may be printed in an appendix to Hansard?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have received provisional answers from three of the provincial premiers. It is the intention of the government to table the answers as soon as they have all been received. It was felt that it might be preferable to wait a few days and table them all at once rather than have them come forward piecemeal.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, September 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Boisvert for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): This afternoon I should like to say a few words on the subjects of foreign exchange, Canada's foreign trade, and the devaluation of the dollar. Before doing so, Mr. Speaker, may I humbly extend to you my congratulations upon your election to the office which you now hold. As one who is still a junior member of this house I realize that I must express my congratulations with deference, and I do so, but although I am perhaps ill qualified to express my happiness at that choice, nevertheless the sincerity of my remarks is not to be measured by the humility of my address.

I should like to say a word or two about the constituency which I represent. In some respects I am making my maiden speech, because the constituency which I now represent, owing to certain changes brought about by the last administration for reasons best known to themselves, is a very different one from the constituency which I represented in the house in 1945. It differs mainly in that it has been enlarged by the addition of approximately half the area it previously had. Therefore I now feel that I have all the best of the interior of the province of British Columbia. I am delighted to have the opportunity to represent that section, but I think I should point out that the task of representing it adequately, owing to its tremendous size, diversity of interests, and the difficulty of communication, is greatly increased because of the change which was made.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): You can handle it.

Mr. Fulton: It seems like it. Somebody tried to take it away from me, but without success.

There are certain matters having to do with that new area which I think I should bring to the attention of the house and the government. I refer particularly to the part which is known as the Cariboo. Although there is a constituency known as Cariboo, I am referring to what is generally called the Cariboo in terms of the ranching country, the country behind that up the middle reaches of the Fraser river valley and in behind Lillooet. It is still a pioneer country, although it was first settled over a hundred years ago, and although in the 1850's it was subject to tremendous expansion owing to the great gold rush of those days. As a matter of fact in a recent publication I saw that at that time the city of Barkerville was the second largest on the Pacific coast. Therefore you can see that the area is one with a long history.

In spite of this long history, in many respects it is still a pioneer country so far as what we call the amenities of civilization—the telephone, postal service, electrification, and so on—are concerned. It is as hard as it was when it was first settled. As a matter of fact the mail service is no better today in many portions of that area than it was twenty-five years ago. In some ways the mail service is worse, because in the old historical days of the Cariboo stage coach they had a daily mail service up and down the Cariboo highway. After the Pacific Great Eastern Railway was built the P.G.E. got the mail contract. During the winter it runs twice a week, and during the summer three times a week. Recently they put on a daily service for two months of the year. But the normal mail service of these people is twice weekly. It is a great hardship. I see no reason why there should not be a daily mail service for that area. They have a daily bus service.

I have discussed this matter with the predecessor of the present Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret). Investigations have been promised, and investigations have been made, but the investigations have not been equalled by the progress. It seems to me that if Canada can afford to have what we call all-up air mail service, the cost of which is contributed to by the people in the area I am describing —they pay the postal rate—then the people of the Cariboo district should at least have a daily mail service by bus. Furthermore, it seems to me that it is our pioneer districts which should now receive some consideration. After all, the people of our great cities, such as Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal, and Halifax, were already adequately served with respect to mail delivery, by train and bus. I am not against general improvement in the mail service, but I certainly believe that the people in the pioneer areas, who contribute to the cost of the all-up service, are entitled to have their service brought up to a reasonable standard before other services which are already adequate are given a super standard.

The same remarks apply to the question of telephone service. In that district the telephone service is provided by the federal government, and is now under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). Although it is supposed to be a public service, it seems to me that it is approached from the standpoint that before any improvement is made in the service it has to be shown there will be sufficient revenue to justify it. That is all very well in the case of a commercial company. That is what they look to first; they could not continue to operate unless they operated at a profit. But where the conditions are such that a commercial company will not go in there—because obviously it is not profitable—and it is undertaken by the government as a community service, I certainly believe they should change the criterion which at the present time is: Will the revenue to be obtained justify the expenditure? It seems to me that is quite a wrong approach to the question of improving service in these areas.

Hon. members know, without my going into detail, the hardships which some of these people undergo, particularly in wintertime when roads are blocked, and in the spring when rivers flood and bridges are washed out and they are left with absolutely no means of communication with the outside world except by telephone. Their needs are obvious, but I submit that in past years they have not been given proper sympathetic treatment by the government. I am not blaming any particular government; I use the word generally. In past years they have not been given the consideration which their condition and their contribution to the welfare of this country would demand.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I turn back to the problems immediately before the house. In doing so I should like, if my colleagues will bear with me, to say a word or two in French.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is fitting that I should express as I did at the beginning of the last parliament, feelings of gratitude and thankfulness to my fellow citizens of the province of Quebec for the courtesy and friendship they have always shown me. I also wish to tell a great many of them how glad I am of the opportunity to greet them in this house.

Those ties of warm and enduring friendship with my French-speaking compatriots were formed during the last world war, on the battlefields and on the general staff, when we fought side by side for a common cause, for our country, Canada. Friendly relations established under such circumstances cannot but last for a long time.

I would ask my French-speaking fellow citizens to kindly excuse me if I do not express myself as ably in their language as they do in mine. It is by striving to understand and talk another tongue that one succeeds, to a large extent, in getting the point of view of those who speak it. That also adds to the mutual feeling of confidence and good will, of which we find a striking example in this country and which, let us hope, will ever deepen.

For that reason, I am especially happy to welcome two new Progressive Conservative members from the province of Quebec. Perhaps it is not a good thing for a province to be nearly entirely represented by only one party. It is therefore very encouraging to see two spokesmen from the province of Quebec sitting on our side of the house. Their reputation, their past record, together with the speeches they have already uttered in this house reveal their qualifications and show how valuable their help will be to us. We English-speaking Canadians from the other parts of the country cannot, despite our good will and our keen desire to co-operate, express the point of view of the province of Quebec as easily and accurately as those who live in that province.

These two members will therefore make known the views of the province of Quebec on our national problems, enabling us to solve them in that spirit of mutual confidence and co-operation which is so essential to national unity.

(Text):

May I now turn to a subject which I think is one of the most important that will be brought before the house this session, or indeed in many succeeding sessions. I refer to the matter of exchange control and currency devaluation. There is no more important topic than this at the present time, having regard to Canada's trade position, the recent devaluation of the pound sterling and the subsequent devaluation of the dollar, and the mass of inconsistencies and contradictions in government policy and in recent statements by ministers dealing with this question.

First I should like to review briefly Canada's trade position. It goes almost without saying that to Canada, more than to most countries, foreign trade is vital. It is generally agreed that of those gainfully employed in this country, in the neighbourhood of one-third derive their income directly from our export trade, with the other two-thirds directly or indirectly dependent for their prosperity upon the prosperity of the first third. Furthermore, Canada is far from being a self-sufficient nation. We must import a great variety of the things we need in our daily living; and in order to do that we must keep up a substantial volume of exports. In recent months we have been losing our foreign markets. Our favourable trade balance has been dropping at an alarming rate. The figures given in the latest Bank of Canada statistical summary show that our favourable balance has shrunk from an average of $42 million per month in 1948 to only $6·3 million in the months of 1949 for which figures are available, and the most disturbing aspect of the situation is that we are losing our markets in the sterling countries.

It is with the sterling countries that Canada's trade is vital, principally because in the past our exports to those countries have consisted of commodities having a high labour content. It has been estimated by economists that approximately seventy-five per cent of the commodities we export to the sterling areas have a high labour content, whereas our exports to the United States in general consist of such things as pulp and paper products, raw minerals and commodities with a relatively low labour content. Therefore it is vital, from the point of view of trade and employment in Canada, that we should retain the sterling market; but this is the market that we have been losing at an alarming rate. Again, the figures of the Bank of Canada show that in the twelve-month period ending in July, 1949, our exports to the sterling market had dropped by $100 million as compared with the figures for 1947.

In its recent business letter the Bank of Nova Scotia analysed the situation. That letter in turn has been analysed in the September 20 issue of Saturday Night; and since the picture given there sets out very clearly the difficulties in which the country now finds itself, I should like to read some extracts from page 34 of that issue:

> Presumably every Canadian who can read now knows that Britain is in financial trouble that so far has proved too much for even her well known courage, doggedness and experience. But few seem to understand that Canada is in trouble too. Our trouble, like Britain's, is one of markets and means of payment. If we don't solve it—and no solution is now in sight—we could have a very unpleasant contraction in employment.

I pause, Mr. Speaker, to observe that I believe the writer is softening the blow. I do not think it is a case in which we "could have" a very unpleasant contraction in employment—referring to something that might happen in the future; I think we are faced with it right now.

After describing the measures taken to increase our exports to the United States, the article continues as follows:

> The volume of exports to other areas has been decreasing; exports to Britain are now smaller than pre-war, and exports to the dominions and the British colonies and to western Europe have fallen substantially from the early post-war peak.
> While the United States has provided an alternative market for a substantial part of the wood, paper and mineral exports which formerly went overseas, it is not providing any real substitute for the exports of the kind of manufactured goods which have been going to the dominions and colonies and Latin America. Nor does it offer any significant alternative for the products of the prairie grain fields.

This serves to confirm my statement, based on the Bank of Canada figures, that the volume of our exports to Britain is shrinking substantially. The article says that apart from exports of wheat and flour, which have been much larger than pre-war exports, and of eggs, wood pulp, pit props, plywood, aluminum and ferrous alloys, most Canadian exports to Britain are down substantially from the pre-war level. What I have read, and the figures which have been cited from the Bank of Canada summary, show that we are faced with a serious problem in the contracting sterling area markets. It is no exaggeration to say that the employment and income of the majority of the Canadian people are being threatened by the loss of these markets.

The reasons for this loss, Mr. Speaker, are fourfold: first, the currency restrictions which we have imposed as part of our foreign exchange control policy; second, the inability of the sterling area to acquire dollars; third, and bound up with these two, the non-convertibility of currencies. This means there are no free exchange markets; all exchanges are now controlled. Finally there is Canada's own exchange control policy, especially the parity policy which until recently was pursued by this government.

In order to understand this, I think it is necessary for us to analyse what has been taking place in Canada during the last eighteen months or so. As a convenient starting point one should perhaps refer to the statement made in this house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on September 19. When one analyses that statement, one is struck by the realization that within a space of six months the minister could so cheerfully, apparently blissfully unconscious of what he was doing, completely reverse his position.

We recall his arguments against devaluation last March, and his denials of our suggestions that Canada herself could do anything to restore any measure of convertibility. When we remember the loud and oft-repeated statements that the parity price was a realistic level in the best interests of Canada's economy, and compare them with the arguments now advanced to support devaluation, we realize just how empty and ill-advised were the statements then made. A sense of realism has been forced on the minister by the march of events. He is now compelled to do what should have been done a year or more ago, and, in doing so, to advance and defend theories which six months ago he was denouncing and ridiculing.

It is true that surrounding circumstances have changed. The pound sterling has been drastically devalued. We must make all due allowances for that. But even so, if we compare the statements of last March with the statement of this September we see in the minister's statement on the later occasion not only a recognition that devaluation on our part is doubly necessary as a result of the British action, but also a repudiation of the arguments and theories upon which Canadian devaluation was previously refused. Reading the words used this September, Mr. Speaker, some of us are confirmed in the view which we held at the time of the minister's earlier pronouncements, namely, that on the one hand their lack of real soundness or good sense and, on the other, their harmful influence on the Canadian economy, were matched only by the loud voice in which they were delivered and the frequency with which they were repeated.

I am making this comparison between what was said this September and what was said last March for a very definite purpose, a purpose quite removed from what would be a natural desire to show that the minister was wrong on the former occasion. I believe our exchange control policy is still wrong. It is still hampering and harming the restoration of convertibility and the free flow of trade. It is therefore important for us to examine what has been said and done to see how wrong it was, in order that we may ascertain what can be done to put it right.

Two things must be borne in mind, Mr. Speaker. First, in considering the earlier statements and actions, may I ask you to bear in mind that it was not so much the relation of the Canadian dollar to the pound which was being discussed as the fixing of the dollar at parity with the United States dollar. It was our contention that that was an improper move. Second, I am not saying the dollar should have been kept at parity. I am not opposing the devaluation to ninety cents within the limitations imposed by the confines of the government's own crippled and reluctant thinking in terms of foreign exchange control. I am saying that their whole exchange control program is confused and contradictory. The government are not qualified to make a guess at where our dollar should be fixed—and they have just guessed at ninety cents. I say the price of the dollar in international exchange should not be fixed by the government at all.

Let us consider what has happened under this control policy. It is certain that one of the obstacles to trade is the lack of convertibility of exchange. In 1946 the government fixed our dollar at par, a rise in price of ten cents, not domestically, but for foreign countries wishing to buy our goods. It is certain also that we cannot buy from foreign countries unless they buy from us. To fix our dollar at a price higher than people have previously paid, and higher than many are willing or able to pay, can hardly be other than a further blow to convertibility. Shortly thereafter Canada lost a billion dollars of her exchange reserves. We found that we were buying far more from the United States than they were buying from us. The austerity program was inaugurated in November, 1947. Together with the continuation of parity, that was supposed to fix everything. Indeed, last March the minister said it had practically fixed everything. There is the first contradiction.

On March 17, 1949, the minister said that, as a result of the various government measures, our position was much better and was improving all the time. These remarks will be found at pages 1564 and 1565 of Hansard of that date. He admitted that Canada was not yet in the clear, but he stated that things were vastly improved, and claimed that the credit for this was partly due to the parity rate, so he refused to alter it. Six months later, this September, the minister admits that when he spoke in March he knew things were getting worse, not better. On page 57 of Hansard of September 19, the minister is reported as saying:

> However, at the beginning of 1949 it was clear that the worsening world dollar situation and our rising imports from the United States would result in a sharp reduction in our current account surplus. The current account surplus in our balance of payments has in fact been declining and it is now estimated that, for the year as a whole, it will in any case be very small.

A little further on in the same speech, he said:

> In these circumstances, it is highly desirable to pursue policies which would help to prevent a deficit in our trading position.

These words show that the deterioration was known to the minister at the time he made his earlier statement in March of this year. But the astounding and disconcerting fact remains that he painted that contrary picture in March, and he used what he then stated as the facts of our trade and exchange picture to justify the continuance of parity fixation; whereas he now uses the so-called facts of our trade and exchange picture, quite apart from the pound devaluation, to justify a devaluation of our dollar in terms of the United States dollar.

In view of an apparently deliberate inconsistency of this sort, the minister can hardly expect us to have confidence in his qualifications to control and set the exchange value of our dollar. Indeed, contradiction follows hard upon contradiction. In the speech of last March the minister went on to say how favourable our trade position was becoming, not only with the United States but indeed with the whole world. After painting this glowing picture he used these words on March 17, to be found at page 1569 of Hansard:

> Now, Mr. Speaker, in the light of our export position and our over-all balance of payments position, are my hon. friends—

Referring to the members of the official opposition.

> —really prepared to maintain that the present official quotation of the Canadian dollar is not realistic? These factors would seem to me to lead to the conclusion, if anything, that the present exchange rate of our currency is too low, and that the Canadian dollar should be appreciated.

That is what the minister said last March. Now in September, only six months later, he says that he knew at that very time that the situation was getting worse, because he used the words I have already quoted from his statement last Monday night, that at the beginning of 1949 it was clear that the worsening world dollar situation and our rising imports from the United States would result in a sharp reduction in our current account surplus. The very facts—if anything the minister says is fact—of Canada's balance of payments position which in March he used to justify his belief in appreciating the dollar, he uses to justify depreciation in September, quite apart from the question of any alteration in the value of the pound.

Again in March, 1949, he rejected devaluation of our dollar because, he said, it would make it harder for the British to export to us, and they need dollars. I think that position can be appreciated. Then he said—and I am quoting from page 1570 of Hansard of March 17 last:

> . . . far from helping the situation, the action—

By that he meant devaluation.

> —some hon. members opposite appear to have in their mind would, as I have said before, aggravate it and worsen the lot of these exporters.

That is, of the British exporters. Then in September, 1949, when Britain, desperate to get dollars, has devalued so as to help herself sell to us, he devalues too, which action, according to his own previous argument, would at least partly undo any good Britain had done herself and make it harder again for her to export to us. What are we to think of this when the same minister once more contradicts himself in the course of the very same speech on Monday, and, having praised the efforts and steps taken by the United Kingdom in devaluing, said, as reported at page 56 of Hansard:

> The dollar countries on the other hand would have to follow policies which would enable that expansion in dollar earnings to take place;—

He was referring to the dollar earnings of sterling area countries. Then he went on to say:

> —and wherever possible undertake the removal of obstacles which stand in the way.

Then he turns right around and devalues, which action he earlier said would impose an obstacle in the way of British exports to us.

One could go on for some time, Mr. Speaker, pointing out further inconsistencies between the two statements, the one made in March of this year—when, as we now find, he had full knowledge of the deteriorating situation —and the statement made just a week ago tonight. We could recall the minister's earlier scornful references to what he termed "currency manipulation". It was a bad thing in March. Apparently it is a good thing in September. One could recall his contention that those who desired to see a reduction of our dollar in terms of the United States dollar wanted to offer it at "bargain basement prices". That is the expression he used to discourage a reduction to a ninety-cent dollar. One can only ask oneself now whether the minister has in fact sold out.

I have said enough to show that there is neither consistency nor intelligence in the government's handling of this matter, as revealed by the statements of the Minister of Finance. In spite of all the government's boasting about Canada's position of importance in international relations and in the realm of trade, a position which we on this side fully recognize, the minister's earlier refusal to act, and his stubborn contention that Canada could do nothing of her own volition, have once more left our country in the position of merely tagging along behind others.

My contention is that devaluation and fixing the dollar at ninety cents is but a stop-gap and is insufficient. We must go further and find the means of restoring convertibility, of enabling the sterling area to buy from us. In this connection may I refer you, Mr. Speaker, to a statement made by Mr. Harold Wilson, president of the British board of trade. I do this to show that Britain is desperately anxious to buy from us but is desperately unable to do so. The article appeared in the Montreal Gazette of September 22. It reports that Harold Wilson said on September 21 that Britain must continue to depend on Canada, and continues:

> In a four-minute talk which he recorded today for broadcast in Manitoba and Saskatchewan next week, Wilson replied obliquely to reports that Britain is turning to other sources for her wheat.
> "We are dead keen on your produce," he said. "Seventy-five per cent of our wheat comes from your prairie provinces, and we should have great difficulty in getting it anywhere else."

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think I should indicate what is needed. In my opinion what is needed is that the government and their experts must get away from their closed-mind type of thinking on this subject of foreign exchange. We need a change from the policy of tying up the dollar, of putting fences around it, which now makes it impossible for sterling countries to acquire dollars to buy from us. We must keep the sterling market. To do this we must enable them to buy from us. As I see it, this means that we must either accept sterling and have the Bank of Canada convert it into dollars, or find some other means of freeing the dollar so that it and the pound are freely convertible. In detail, here are some recommendations that I should like to lay before the house and the government:

1. We must buy from those who buy from us. And the people who buy more from us than they sell to us, the people who are our best customers now and have been traditionally, are the people in the sterling areas.

2. We must accept sterling in payment until sterling countries are able to pay in dollars; and the Bank of Canada should convert sterling, if necessary, into Canadian dollars until the pound and the dollar are freely convertible.

3. We must stop thinking of the artificial setting of exchange rates. Exchange is both the medium and the measure of foreign trade. That is all it is or should be. It should be allowed to function as such. Let currencies find their proper levels in the exchange field. We are talking about foreign exchange, not domestic levels. Let them find their proper levels in the exchange field as measured by foreign trade. If this works temporary hardship, then take other measures through the means now open, through official control of credit and currency—that is, through the Bank of Canada and the international monetary fund—to relieve hardship and to soften any violent fluctuation.

4. We must approach sterling countries along these lines and work out a program whereby they will agree to remove their restrictions on purchases in Canada by their residents, so that trade can in fact begin to flow freely. And in my view we should even be prepared to contemplate some form of commonwealth clearing house to adjust the initial disproportion which would undoubtedly exist between the demand for Canadian dollars and the demand for sterling.

It must be admitted that these measures call for international co-operation. But, to go back to the point I made at the beginning of my observations, the welfare, employment and income of nearly every Canadian depends upon finding a solution to this problem. No longer, merely because it is a problem international in scope, can we allow our official attitude to be, as has been said by the ministry in the past, that Canada can do nothing. Canada's trade and employment are at stake, and Canada must act to protect them.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to speak in the debate on the address in reply. Occasion has changed events, however; and after listening to the excellent address delivered the other day by my good friend the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), I felt that perhaps the other eighty-nine new members might have felt, as I have, the symptom so well described by the hon. member. Consequently at this time I take the occasion to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, upon your elevation to the high office you now hold. I congratulate collectively all those who have thus far participated in the debate, and again I add my voice to that of those who have so far extended congratulations.

May I in my introductory remarks speak with respect to the riding it is my honour to represent in the House of Commons. No doubt hon. members are now conscious of the fact that there is one riding in British Columbia which is pre-eminently superlative in all Canada. Let me say, however, that there is another riding which equals the beauty, the magnitude and the importance of that of my good friend who represents the constituency of Vancouver South (Mr. Laing); I refer to my beloved riding of Vancouver-Burrard.

As we enter the portals of this parliament building we see inscribed above the doors these words:

> The wholesome sea is at her gates,
> Her gates both east and west.

That applies to my riding only unilaterally. I am sure, however, that whoever was responsible for this inscription must first have seen the riding of Vancouver-Burrard.

I know I speak individually and collectively for the membership of this House of Commons when I say that in all the congratulatory messages delivered since the opening of this twenty-first parliament there is one which up to now has not been included, one group which has not been sufficiently recognized. I refer to the group who, by the grace of God, have placed us where we are today. I refer to our parents, who would have been proud indeed if they had lived to see us here. Whatever we may have, whatever we have done or may do, we owe in large measure to the example set by them, to the knowledge we gained at our mothers' knees. I believe all will agree that anything good within us, anything worthy of our country and of the esteem of our electorate, is largely traceable to our inheritance, both by example and by blood.

Burrard, in particular, is similar to other constituencies in Canada so far as its basic composition is concerned. By this I mean that the electorate in all constituencies offer one of the most interesting studies in human nature. They are a cross-section of Canadians from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the people whom you and I, sir, are permitted to represent in this august assembly.

Before I deal in more general terms with the dominion, and those basic principles which have brought about the humanitarian policies of the government, may I humbly beseech and pray that the government, as quickly as humanly possible, may evolve legislation to bring about compulsory contributory retirement pensions for all, without a means test. When I make this plea I believe I speak not only for myself but for all Liberal members, and in all probability for many other members from British Columbia.

We on the Pacific coast feel that in some of our industries which are more affected by the winter weather than others we suffer from a degree of unemployment which is peculiar not only to British Columbia but, in some ways, to various other provinces throughout the length and breadth of Canada. We urge that in its wisdom the government may soon be able to evolve some improvement in the Unemployment Insurance Act. Having regard to human nature, and to the attitude which may be taken by many hon. members, particularly the new ones, I believe it might be wise and prudent to review some of the highlights in the history of the human race. We have come far from the days of the garden of Eden. Yet in a measure the troubles, the foibles and the heart-breaks of that ancient time have been handed down from one generation to another.

In the few moments I shall speak I shall do so with the realization that democracy is still the best kind of government for any free people. It is a method of true expression, through the members of this house, of the views of the electorate who are responsible for our presence here today. Therefore it has occurred to me that in discussing human nature it would be well to look back at our ancestral tree to see if we can possibly get closer to human nature as exemplified in the past. Undoubtedly, as the twig is bent, so is the tree inclined. Therefore we cannot hope to register all the foibles and follies and many of the heart-breaks that are part of the history of the human family, but we can refer shortly to some.

I know that I speak with understanding of all agriculturists when I say that Adam was an agriculturist, because in my family bedroom as a boy I saw a picture of Adam tilling the soil. That is truth enough for me. There he was on his primeval farm, living in the lap of luxury, his ways cast in pleasant places, tilling the fine alluvial soil tax free and also free of mortgage. Yet was he not satisfied. There was shown one of the first aspects of human nature which has been handed down to posterity—dissatisfaction.

However, Adam is not the only one whose mental facilities slipped at a crucial moment in history. History is replete with the names of those whose fame and fortune have turned to ashes or Dead Sea fruit through an ill-timed word or an unfortunate gesture that by the grace of God I hope to avoid today. Lot's wife wanted a second look. Nero took his music lesson at a most inauspicious time. Esau sold his birthright for a mess of pottage. Peter the apostle played with the truth. Judas Iscariot sold his Master for thirty pieces of silver.

In more recent days we have other rare examples. There is Mr. Asquith's policy of "wait and see." We have Count von Bethmann-Hollweg's "scrap of paper." There have been many examples, and the plot thickens with respect to human nature. The family is the backbone of this country today, and always will be.

It was not long before Adam and Eve found that they were not in complete possession of the garden of Eden. For was it not ordained that there was certain fruit of which they should not eat? This they did, however; and here enters stark tragedy in the form of expulsion and foreclosure. The things we have not and cannot get are still in this day the things that mankind desires most.

We pass on and come to Cain and Abel. Cain was an agriculturist, Abel the shepherd. Why do we stand aghast in the world today when one nation flies at the throat of another, as a result in many instances, no doubt, of overcrowding and lack of commercial trade expansion, when at the very beginning of time we witnessed this sorry spectacle of fratricide, arising out of petty jealousy because Abel's offering was more acceptable than that of his brother Cain?

The storm centre of civilization now shifts from the valley of the Euphrates and the Tigris to Asia Minor, and we find what remains of our illustrious ancestors perched high on Mount Ararat. We cannot follow, in the short space of time allowed to us, all the vicissitudes of the human family of that day, but we shall endeavour to catch a few highlights in the revolving sphere of human endeavour and human relations.

First there was Moses, the great teacher, the author of the Mosaic promulgations which are still adhered to by millions of people throughout the world. His teachings still stand the light of criticism, and suffer not at all in comparison with any other.

Then came the intellectual giants, Socrates, Pericles, Plato and Aristotle. These were men of overwhelming capabilities and mental activity. I know most hon. members will recognize what used to appear in the early school readers when I quote:

By Nebo's lonely mountain,
On this side Jordan's wave.
In a vale in the land of Moab,
There lies a lonely grave.

And no man knows that sepulchre,
And no man saw it e'er,
For the angels of God upturned the sod,
And laid the dead man there.

These intellectual giants seem to come in groups. When they depart the earth is desolate, but sooner or later another group appears and once more intellect blooms like the rose of Sharon. Whether the intellectual giants produce the golden age or the golden age produces the intellectual giants is debatable. However, during the Socratic period we had a stellar aggregation of intellects which caused Byron to write:

Of the three hundred grant but three,
To make a new Thermopylae.

Then let us move the clock forward another thousand years or so to the glory that was Rome. Standing head and shoulders above his contemporaries was the mighty Michelangelo. His first great work in Rome was the Pieta, which depicted Mary the Mother supporting in her arms the body of Christ just after it has been removed from the cross. It created a tremendous sensation; thousands have flocked to admire it. His next great work was in the chapel of the church in Florence, which is so well known. While speaking of Michelangelo we cannot forget his work in the Sistine chapel, which stands as a memorial to his great achievements, skill and capacity, a monument to the true principles of Christian philosophy and Christian belief.

Such is a kaleidoscopic review of a few of the famous men of history. In making a critical analysis of their lives one fails in many instances to discern the chief element in their makeup which has marked them for fame.

I return now to the reference I originally made to an address delivered a few days ago by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). Who knows but amongst the members of the house, whether new or old, we may be sitting with, co-operating with, or fighting with some potential genius of the next five, ten or fifteen years? Therefore I bring those instances to the attention of the house because I believe there is something dynamic in the past that points the way to the future, and that if we are really cognizant of humanity's foibles, from which it has recuperated in the past, and its triumphs, we can go forward with greater courage and with a greater sense that we are going to be able to contribute something to the welfare of the individual and collective membership of the house, not only on the government side but in all groups represented in the first session of the twenty-first parliament of Canada.

It is with these ideas, Mr. Speaker, that I leave the thought with you that, whether or not we come down here determined that we are going to turn democracy upside down overnight, we have to be cognizant of the lessons of history. From the time of Adam down to the present there have been outstanding examples of men who have risen above any potential discouragement, any inhibiting factors in their way that might in any way have barred, hindered or impeded their progress toward greater things. I close on this note. I believe that, in spite of any minor frustrations that we may face either individually or collectively, we, like those who have gone before, will be able to rise triumphantly above them and contribute something to the greater development of the Dominion of Canada for all the people of Canada, for all electors, whether they have sent members to the government side or in support of the opposition. Through our endeavours we will leave our mark in and contribution to the future progress of those yet unborn in this vast dominion, from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my first words are very pleasant ones to me, as they are words of congratulation to you on your elevation to your very honourable position. I have known the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Macdonald) since he came here in 1935. I have always had a high regard for his fairness, reasonableness, and modesty in dealing with the matters that came before the house. I hope he will enjoy his position, and I rather think, from what has happened earlier in this debate, and the sweet reasonableness of the official opposition, that he is going to have a very easy time of it. I hope, however—and there are signs that my hopes will be realized—that not all sections of the opposition will lessen any of the normal activities of opposition members just because the electorate, perhaps in a fit of aberration, elected the government with a very large majority.

It is a fact that the government has a large majority, and as a believer in the principles of democracy I accept the verdict of the people; but I only accept it in so far as the government has been elected with the rights and responsibilities of government. What I want to point out, not only to the opposition, but also to the members on the government side of the house, and those members of the government on the opposition side of the house, is this. All that the election settled was the majority that the government received. All the problems that were facing us when we left here on the 30th of April last are still present with us and still have to be solved.

Let me point out that the cost of living, which has been one of the important subjects of debate in the house for two or three sessions, is still going up, and is now at an all-time high. That means that many of our people are sinking deeper and deeper into poverty at a time when the country is wealthier than it ever was before. The housing situation, which has been Canada's No. 1 headache since the end of the war, is worse than ever. I have before me a report of the housing association of my own city of Vancouver dealing with housing conditions in the city in 1949. This is what it says in part:

> At the beginning of 1949, the housing situation in Vancouver was worse than it had ever been. As a result of the continued influx of population (22,000 into the city alone in 1948) and in spite of the high rate of building, the city was 5,000 dwellings shorter of its requirements than it was at the end of the war.

That is a problem that the election did not solve, and while it remains the opposition must not remain inarticulate.

Then there is the question of unemployment, which is increasing and adding to the hardships of an ever-growing number of workers. As to the social services of the country, there is an inadequacy which is becoming ever more glaring. It is becoming increasingly more difficult for people past middle age to find employment, and there is nothing in the speech from the throne to meet that situation, or to ameliorate their distress. Then I would mention one other item, foreign trade, which was discussed this afternoon by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). There our position is daily becoming more precarious.

These are only some of the problems which were with us during the whole of the last parliament and which the election did nothing to solve. It is very doubtful that the huge majority now enjoyed by the Liberal party will do anything to spur the government to greater activity. It has never worked that way before. It is far more likely that the large majority will lead to complacency and that the "social journey" will become an extended stop-over, at least until shortly before the next election. This, then, is no occasion for an excess of sweet reasonableness on the part of the opposition. As far as the party with which I am associated is concerned we shall always, Mr. Speaker, be reasonable, but you may not always find us sweet.

Now I want to deal with some of the questions which I said were not solved, questions which in an aggravated form affect the constituency I represent. Mine is one of the constituencies of the city of Vancouver. I am not going to say anything about its beauties, though it has its points. I will say that it is one of the most useful constituencies in Vancouver, because the great majority of its population are the people who do the useful work of the community.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I too was born there.

Mr. MacInnis: One thing I like about the constituency is that the hon. member did not stay there. Now a word about housing. This question will be before the house shortly in more definite form, and I shall merely touch upon it on this occasion. A few days ago the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) made a statement on the government's housing policy; but if that is the only policy the government has got I must say it falls far short of what the situation demands. It is not a new policy, as the minister was careful to point out in the concluding paragraph of his statement at page 121 of Hansard, where he said:

> The policy as enunciated by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply in 1946 is the keystone of our present policy; that is, the creation of conditions favourable to a large housing program by private individuals and companies.

I think I have shown that as far as Vancouver is concerned, at least, that policy is simply not working. We are now 5,000 family units shorter than we were in 1945; and if the policy is working more effectively in other parts of the dominion I have yet to hear of it. In addition there is less house building going on. For the city of Vancouver itself the decrease is forty per cent and for greater Vancouver thirty-four per cent, as compared with 1948.

If anything has been made clear beyond the possibility of a doubt during the past four years, it is that private enterprise will not and perhaps cannot provide homes for that section of the population which needs them most; that is, the people with low and moderate incomes, who generally have the largest families and who make up a majority of the population of our cities. The government guardedly admits that low-rental housing is necessary, yet its housing policy is principally designed to help those in the upper third of the income bracket, who can afford to buy houses. Until that policy is reversed and we set out upon a program of low-rental housing for those who cannot buy homes at almost any price, we are not going to solve our housing problem.

That is not only my assertion. Every authority on housing and every organization that has investigated the housing situation has been emphatic in stating that the only solution to the problem is an extensive program of low-rental housing. I could bring authority after authority to substantiate that statement, but I shall leave that for another occasion. Private enterprise has never provided and never will provide homes for the poorer sections of the population. The slums that have existed in every city since industrialization began are proof of that fact. That is not only the case in Canada; it is so all over the world. In no country has proper housing been provided for a large section of the working class until the government went into the housing business. No less a supporter of free enterprise than Senator Robert Taft of the United States said in the Senate of that country not so long ago:

> While I am a great believer in free enterprise, housing happens to be in a field where it has failed. . . . There is no alternative to public housing to provide homes for those with low incomes . . . Under private enterprise the slum condition has continued without improvement . . . Those opposed to public housing have done their own industry a disservice by their indiscriminate and unreasoning opposition.

That is the statement of one of the high priests of private enterprise on this continent. As I said before, I shall have more to say on this subject when the amendments to the National Housing Act are before us, so I shall leave it at that for the present.

The next point I wish to make concerns old age pensions. It is a subject which I have discussed many times in this house, as many other members have. On a number of occasions I have moved resolutions concerning it, and yet it is one of the problems the election did not solve. Speaking the other day, the member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) expressed regret that, when the amendment was made to the Old Age Pensions Act last session, the amount of outside income was not increased. I should like to point out to the house that the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and I tried to have this point recognized at that time. I have Hansard for April 27 before me and it shows that after a series of interruptions by several members of the official opposition, we got the opportunity to show the minister that the ten dollar increase to old age pensioners would not be of much value if the amount of outside income was not increased at the same time. May I say that the member for Vancouver-Quadra was not one of the interrupters. I am glad to see that the validity of our contention is now admitted.

Prior to the increase an old age pensioner was permitted an outside income of $240 before the amount of his pension was reduced. With the increased pension, the amount the pensioner receives will be reduced if he has outside income of more than $120. As a matter of fact, it means that the old age pensioner must be indigent before any pension is received. In my opinion, this shows that we should take another step forward and eliminate the means test.

May I bring to the attention of the house another point in connection with old age pensions which I have brought before this house again and again? There should be some allowance for the wife of a pensioner when her husband receives a pension but she is not of an age to be eligible for one. If that is not done, what is happening now will continue. If there is no other income, and there can be very little, the husband and wife must exist on $480 annually. Everyone must agree that is not an income on which a couple can live in Canada with the cost of living as high as it is today. On the first of August the cost of living index reached the all-time high of 162·8; that is, the general index. On the first of July, the food index reached 207·2. The increase in the price of food caused the increase in the general index, and I believe it is somewhat higher than that now.

I should like to impress upon the members of this house that every increase in the cost of living lowers the living standard of all low-income groups; that is, of all who are not in a position, by their own efforts, to raise their level of income. It means that, every time the cost of living goes up a point, the standard of living of our old age pensioners goes down a point. Now that the government has this huge majority, that is something for them to consider and act upon.

The high cost of living is a question that has been before this house ever since the war ended. A parliamentary committee investigated it, and so did a royal commission. The reports of these bodies have been before the house and the cost of living is still rising, even though the market is becoming oversupplied with goods. Unemployment is on the increase. This proves that those who were telling us the law of supply and demand would take care of the high cost of living have been wrong in their calculations. The law of supply and demand no longer operates, as has been demonstrated by the investigations of the combines investigation commissioner. In certain important industries prices are set arbitrarily, and every effort is made to see that all members charge the same prices. The law of supply and demand does not operate freely in our economic life.

There is one other point upon which I should like to say a word. I refer to the question of trade, which, whether one agrees with his conclusions or not, was ably discussed this afternoon by the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). I did agree with his concluding remarks to the effect that there would have to be co-operation among the nations in this regard. I made my notes before I heard the hon. member this afternoon, and that was my conclusion. I believe it must be the conclusion of anyone who realistically studies the crises in world trade.

A few weeks before this session of parliament opened, the representatives of Canada, Britain and the United States met in Washington to discuss what was supposed to be Britain's dollar crisis. I said "what was supposed to be," because I think it has been admitted since the conference was held that that crisis is not one which affects Britain alone. It affects all the nations in the sterling bloc and Canada as well. It has become increasingly clear that the immediate crisis was not caused by anything which happened in Britain, but by what happened in the United States.

I have before me a copy of Foreign Affairs, a United States publication, October, 1949. The article to which I wish to direct attention is written by Professor John H. Williams, a professor at Harvard university. I would recommend his article to members of the house. It is worth reading. I do not agree with all of his conclusions, but on page 9, referring to the present depression in the United States, he says this:

> Our present depression is not large, by comparison with depressions of the past, and for us it will probably prove salutary. Yet—whatever the other considerations—it is certainly the main immediate cause of the present British crisis. It has depressed not only Britain's direct exports to us, but even more importantly the exports to us of primary products from the other sterling area countries the dollar earnings of which go to build up Britain's reserve. This in turn reacts on British exports to those countries; and it will be surprising if it does not also affect continental exports round the whole circle.

It should be noted in this country, and I think it was, that since the depression in the United States where a few weeks ago there were, if there are not now, some four million unemployed, as soon as unemployment began there was a curtailment of the buying of certain goods, mostly luxury goods, in the markets there. This of course resulted in a diminution in Britain's dollar reserves, and in turn Britain had to reduce her buying in the United States. The result of the Washington discussions was the devaluation of currency in the sterling area and a ten per cent devaluation in Canada. Personally, I do not agree that this is any solution to the problem. Devaluation will help those countries which devalue first. It will enable them to get an advantage in the market. But as long as our trade is based upon competition, each country in turn will attempt to get the better of its competitors, either by devaluing its currency or by some other means: hence the advantage gained by the first country will in time disappear.

About the same time as the Canadian-British-United States talks on the dollar crisis were taking place, another meeting was held in Washington. That was a meeting of the nations that signed the Atlantic pact. They met there for the purpose of co-ordinating their military defences or, shall I say, our military defences. In military matters we have already come down to the realization that co-operation is our only salvation. I now submit this thought to the house. If co-operation is necessary in military affairs—and I agree that as long as we have to build up our military defences, and we have to do that at this time, co-operation is necessary—how much more necessary is co-operation in our economic affairs. That is why I agree with the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), who said there would have to be co-operation in trade affairs. As a matter of fact, our trade difficulties are fundamentally due to the world's economic development. They are not due to what is done by this country or that country. What is done by the various countries to gain a trade advantage is a result not a cause.

Trade means the exchange of the things we have in surplus for the things we need. As a matter of fact, trade is more important to the country that must buy than it is to the country that must sell. That is why trade is much more important to Britain, who must buy her food, than it is to the United States, who would like to sell some of her surplus products. Trade is therefore important not only because we want to sell. It is twice important, because we must also buy. Trade is important to Canada because, if we cannot exchange our surpluses, our standard of living will fall materially. I repeat that trade difficulties are not fundamentally due to something that one country or another has done; they are due to the general economic development of our world. The fundamental obstacle to trade is the fact that too many nations are producing the same things and are trying to exchange them in a world in which there is no longer a market for them.

In conclusion, I should just like to say that we shall have to remember that the world does move, and that any attempt to go back to the old trading forms that have disappeared is an attempt to turn back the clock. And it will fail just as every attempt to turn back the clock in any other field has failed. Whether we like it or not, there is therefore nothing left for us but co-operation in economic as well as in military affairs.

(Translation):

Mr. H. A. Gosselin (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have the privilege of speaking in this house, and I do so with great pride.

My first duty is to join with those who have already congratulated you on your appointment to the speakership of the house; my second, to tell you that the constituency I have the honour to represent here is located on the United States boundary and adjoins the eastern townships.

My constituency is above all deeply concerned with industry and agriculture, as also with all the great principles on which the progress of the country is based.

Brome-Missisquoi county is made up of French - speaking and English - speaking Canadians. I am the spokesman of both, undiscriminatingly. For years, we have quite successfully maintained friendly relations between these two elements. Unity exists among them; we are convinced that a country's greatness is based upon mutual understanding. We feel that proof of this was furnished during the last electoral campaign, for the honour and welfare of Canada.

The success obtained by our soldiers overseas is due to mutual understanding and devotion to those great principles that go to make up unity. The extent of Canada's effort was shown by the quality of her military personnel and the untiring labour of those who remained behind to produce weapons for our men overseas.

Mr. Speaker, in my constituency may be found all that tourists may wish for in the way of mountains, valleys or wide open spaces. The main highway takes them through mountains and plains where dairy farming is the main pursuit, coming immediately before agriculture. Our green fields, great orchards and vast sugar bushes remain forever impressed on their memory, so much so that their one wish afterwards is to return to us.

I am proud to tell the members of this house that I am a farmer. Having been in the employ of the Canadian Pacific Railway for several years, I may say however that Canada has a railway transportation system, for freight and passengers, which offers advantages and resources that can only help to make Canada a great country. I might say that Canada has the best transportation system in the world, considering the population of the country.

Our agricultural class is definitely well developed. Western Canada grows wheat but in eastern Canada the dairying industry is foremost. Those two branches of agriculture are for us a guarantee. In fact, the farming population is the fundamental basis of a country's prosperity. It is a financial guarantee and a protection for the people since it provides all their needs. I believe it is my duty to request the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to carry on his useful work on behalf of our farming population and to provide the required incentive so that our young men may be interested in remaining on the land of their forefathers; otherwise our young people will be driven to the cities, which will spell disaster. It is imperative, as I said, that the Minister of Agriculture should continue his admirable work, so that the farmers will not be neglected and that they may have every possible inducement. It will be the only means of keeping our young people on the land. Failing that, they will migrate to cities, abandoning the family farms. I am happy to say that the farming community is made up of proud people, ready to ensure the plentiful production on which depends our survival as a people.

If every possible help is given to them, the farmers will be able to produce much more, and sell a much larger quantity of products, which will enable them better to balance their family budgets.

I have often been told, Mr. Speaker, that the agricultural class are not prosperous. I do not share that opinion. On the contrary, being myself a farmer, I note that they are prosperous. However, they will continue to be prosperous in so far as they are ensured and guaranteed a reasonable remuneration for their work. Otherwise the agricultural class will disappear, which will spell great disaster. May I say again that we have to give that class some guarantee by granting subsidies, building warehouses where our products can be stored, and sparing it from excessive taxation. We also have to guarantee the farmer prices at least equal to his production costs.

I know that the Minister of Agriculture has taken the necessary steps to build these warehouses all over the country. On behalf of the constituency I have the honour to represent, I also wish to congratulate and thank him for having undertaken various projects in the east.

In our farming district of eastern Canada, various people connected with the sale of dairy produce are sacrificing our goods to the canning industry. I know that the minister is investigating the sale of these products in order that our farmers may face a brighter future.

There is a disease which is proving most harmful to cattle in every province. The number of animals that have died of Bang's disease has greatly increased. Our exports have therefore been reduced. We must at all costs curb this evil.

I hope that the minister is already taking steps to prevent that disease, for instance by having our young cattle vaccinated, as is done for the control of tuberculosis.

Before concluding my remarks in French, I wish to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture on the excellent results of the method inaugurated since he took over the administration of that department. He has taken a keen interest in the farming population and I am delighted to note that he is doing everything in his power to protect our farmers.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to speak for the riding of Brome-Missisquoi, which is situated in the province of Quebec, and in doing so I believe it my duty to express my congratulations to Your Honour upon your elevation to the chief office of this assembly.

My next duty is to refer briefly to the riding which I have the honour to represent. The riding of Brome-Missisquoi is situated on the state borders of Vermont and New York, and it also borders the eastern townships. As other hon. members have said of their ridings, I submit that Brome-Missisquoi is the most beautiful riding in the Dominion of Canada.

The beautiful lakes of this district are a great attraction to tourists. A large percentage of the population is engaged in agriculture and there is also a considerable industrial population. The Green mountains of Vermont extend up into Brome-Missisquoi. On the slopes of these hills are to be found many flourishing apple orchards, and I think we can compare their product with those of any other province.

We want the products from Quebec to be as well known in all markets as those from other provinces. We must strive to produce products which grade No. 1, in order that they will be in demand in the European and other markets. The only way that we can induce foreign countries to buy from us is to produce No. 1 grade.

I was most interested in following the speech from the throne. The speech indicates that it is the duty of all hon. members, regardless of politics, to play the game with sincerity so that Canada will continue to prosper and grow. We have a beautiful country with immense natural resources. We have all that is required to make Canada one of the largest and best known countries in the world. We are able to produce sufficient for our own needs, with a surplus for export.

It is the duty of every one of us to consider the future generations. If we default in applying our full energies we shall be lacking in our duty to those who come after us. They will say, "Our fathers neglected to benefit by that which Providence put before them for the good of future generations."

Our men fought gallantly during the last war and the one before. They fought with all their energy and confidence in the belief that they were making possible, in Canada and the other countries which were allied with us, the practice of those principles of liberty and unity which are the only guarantees for the future and the only principles that will ensure prosperity for everyone in Canada. There is the principal basis of the speech from the throne delivered by the governor general. He has asked the house to consider these matters with all our sincerity and all our energy in order to safeguard the welfare of our population in the future, so that Canada may continue to grow and increase in the understanding which, if I may repeat, is the present guarantee for the future.

During the war our soldiers demonstrated the unity of Canada, and in that unity lies the assurance and guarantee for any commercial enterprise. In the speech from the throne the governor general asks us to consider ways and means of maintaining this guarantee for our future. As everyone knows, we have advanced a century as a result of developments arising from the energy and spirit of our war effort. I have no doubt that all hon. members will give to every measure that comes before parliament the most careful consideration, without regard to politics. We are not here to talk politics; there are appropriate occasions for such discussions. We are here to discuss principles and to submit ways and means of carrying out those principles, so that we may prove to the world that Canada is still growing, and, with its energy, its devoutness, and its prosperous younger element, will continue to grow.

I should now like to state what I believe are the fundamental bases of the prosperity of our country. I will not attempt to deal with financial matters. I have followed with pleasure what other hon. members have had to say on that subject, and I congratulate them. Many members have stated their views on the financial situation, foreign exchange, and so on, but I will not attempt to follow them.

I believe it is my duty as a farmer, and also as one who was a railroad man, to congratulate our transportation companies on their own efficiency and the efficiency of their equipment. Comparing other countries with Canada and its small population, I believe that our transportation facilities and equipment are far above those of any other country in the world. Our transportation companies are doing their best to provide rapid freight and passenger service and to furnish passengers with every comfort. I feel that we can depend upon them.

Speaking as a farmer, I believe that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and former ministers, have recognized that in that industry is the basis of financial security in every nation of the world. Under all governments, farming is the guarantee of finance. We often hear it said that the farmer is the king of the land. As a farmer, I assure hon. members that, though we may feel like kings, we are kings who must be on the job if we want to be successful. The farmer works twenty-four hours a day. He is tied to his duties all the time if he wants to be successful. As farming is recognized as the basis of success, I believe it is the duty of the government to give farmers all the protection that is necessary in the disposal of their products, and create markets in different countries, so that surpluses may be sold. The government should see that a proper refrigerating system is provided for the products of the farmer, and should also protect him in every possible way so that he may improve production.

I have listened with great interest to hon. members who have talked about the farming situation in the west. If I understand them correctly, the western provinces have applied to the government for protection for their grain. I believe that is their duty, and I congratulate them; but I also believe that in the east, where farming is carried on on quite a large scale, the products of the farms should be protected. The people of the east and the people of the west must work together on the principle that unity is essential to success in Canada. We must produce as much as possible in order that our quality products may find their place in the markets of the world. Quality is necessary in order to meet competition. We know that in the European markets our products are regarded as of superior quality, but we must preserve that quality. This applies as well to other products which we sell in European markets. All Canadians wish to continue that policy.

In the east our land is depreciating gradually. The Department of Agriculture should provide the necessary chemicals at reduced prices so that every farmer who is interested in the future of the soil may obtain the best results from the work that he and his family do on the land, and may be encouraged to remain on the soil. I know that the Minister of Agriculture has already studied ways and means of improving the production of dairy commodities and of giving further assistance.

We in the east who are interested in dairying have found that Bang's disease is increasing among our cattle; and I believe this condition exists also in certain parts of the west. This has affected me personally, along with many other farmers, because the United States will not permit the importation of animals suffering from this disease, animals which in French are known as contaminés.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time. He may continue if he has the unanimous consent of hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Gosselin: I have just a few more words, if hon. members will permit me. I believe everything possible should be done by all those concerned to control and eventually wipe out this disease, which is affecting the revenues of our farmers and also causing them a great deal of discouragement.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have every confidence that all members of this house will co-operate to make this session of parliament one of unity and good understanding, adopting principles which will promote the welfare of both the present and future generations.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, my first desire is to join with those others who have expressed to you their congratulations upon being elevated to the position of first commoner in this dominion. My pleasure at your appointment is enhanced by my recollection of the gallant service you rendered with the Canadian expeditionary force in the first world war.

Today I wish to offer a few comments on the paragraphs in the speech from the throne dealing with national defence. I am sure hon. members of this house and indeed everyone in this dominion will realize with profound regret that it was necessary for a grave warning to be given in the speech from the throne that the hopes for peace and security held out some four years ago have not yet been realized, and that the menace of communism remains with us. However, there will be some measure of reassurance in the promise that this government will pay special attention to the development of research, and that it is the intention of the government to provide the forces with the most modern equipment suitable for present requirements. Members of this party have always endeavoured to adopt a realistic point of view on this question of national defence, and I can assure the government that we shall support every effort that is made to supply the forces with that modern equipment the possession of which is so essential to the fulfilment of their great tasks.

Our needs in connection with defence, both as a separate nation and as a signatory to the North Atlantic treaty, have been called to the attention of the house. There is also reference in the speech from the throne to the unification of the services that has taken place already. Rather glowing terms have been used to describe the progress that has been made in this respect. It is a step in the right direction, but so far only the first step has been taken. Old prejudices die hard; and while unification is taking place in regard to the young entries into the services at such points as Royal Roads and Royal Military college, still there is room for much further development along these lines. There has been some unification among the administrative services; yet in the higher ranks, in the realm of command and in organization, we still have three distinct services.

Events which have transpired since the speech from the throne was read have emphasized, if anything, the importance of national defence at the present time. I refer, of course, to the meeting of the North Atlantic council at which representatives of Canada were present, and also to the statement in this house last week by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in connection with the announcement by the President of the United States that an atomic explosion had taken place in the U.S.S.R. It would be interesting to learn whether any of the scientific instruments in our observatories and other scientific centres across the land were able to pick up any echoes of that explosion. I do not think it is beyond the realm of possibility that some of those faint earth tremors recorded last summer may in fact have been the actual results of the explosion which took place in Russia. We have no indication of the date of that explosion, but it is hardly likely that it was a very recent occurrence. There is no reason why scientific instruments could not be developed, if indeed they have not been developed already, which would be able to detect such explosions.

As far as the North Atlantic council is concerned, there is no doubt that soon they will be able to determine the roles the various member nations must play within the broad framework of the defence pattern they are drawing up. According to that pattern it would seem that our contribution might consist in the provision of a strong anti-submarine fleet on both oceans; a limited number of fighter and transport squadrons of the R.C.A.F.; and the maintenance of an airborne brigade of our active army, backed up by a limited number, perhaps four or five divisions, of the reserve army.

As I mentioned, there is a reference in the speech from the throne to the defence needs of Canada as a separate nation. The changes which have taken place within the last few years in the realm of national defence have made it quite clear that, in the event of a third world war, Canada might become a theatre of operations. In recent months considerable attention has been paid to the northern approaches to our country. We have heard descriptions of the extended network of radio and wireless stations which have been established in co-operation with the United States along our northern frontiers.

During the latter months of this summer Exercise Eagle was carried out in the northwest part of our country. This provided an opportunity to study counter-attack methods which might be employed if an enemy made a lodgement on one of our airfields in that part of our territory. In the far west there is a scattered chain of airfields which link Alaska with Canada. The great airfield at Whitehorse is by far the most important link in that chain. The distance from Whitehorse to the Pacific ocean, from which aircraft might be launched from some carrier or even from the fringes of Siberia, is not very much greater than the distance between that airfield and the city of Vancouver or the city of Winnipeg. The distance can be flown within a comparatively few hours.

Exercise Eagle was carried out with a very realistic background. It is possible for an enemy to land airborne troops in that great airfield of Whitehorse if it is not defended. So far as I know there is no ground defence for that airfield today. It is available to any aircraft that may arrive at Whitehorse. During the war it was considered desirable to establish special air defence units consisting of a small highly trained group of men who would be capable of dealing with any parachutists arriving at that field. There were anti-aircraft guns which would have acted as a deterrent to hostile aircraft that might be tempted to land. No such provision is made today. There are no anti-aircraft guns or airdrome defence units at Whitehorse. In this case an ounce of prevention would be worth a pound of cure, as the old adage says.

The country was shocked by the reports which were published by experienced war correspondents who had witnessed Exercise Eagle. They described how the attacking force was able to hold off the counter-attacking troops, known as Can. Force, which were supposed to represent our troops sent to restore the situation. I do not become unduly alarmed because an exercise discloses certain weaknesses. These exercises have always been so arranged that lessons may be drawn from them. These experiences show whether the equipment provided is adequate, or the training of the troops is such as will meet the particular situation depicted in the narrative leading up to the exercise. There would be no point in having these exercises if there were no lessons to be drawn from them.

As I say, the country has been disturbed by these reports. I hope the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) will take the first opportunity of reassuring this house and the country that any errors which were disclosed or deficiencies which were noticed are being corrected and will not be continued in the future. In particular, I would ask him to assure us that the training of the whole airborne brigade will now be accelerated. This was the first battalion exercise carried out by the one battalion of that brigade which has had any serious training in airborne tactics. Will he give assurance also that the shortages in equipment which were reported, the shortage of parachutes, the shortage of jumping suits are being remedied? Will he assure us also that the right type of aircraft is now being provided both for the fighter squadrons that might accompany such a counter-attacking expedition as was visualized in this exercise and for the transport equipment with the special provisions required for efficient parachute jumping?

There is the additional question of radar sets. I was pleased to note in a report tabled by Canadian Arsenals Limited the other day that developments are taking place in the No. 268 marine set. I hope a similar adaptation is being made so that that set or some other set may co-operate with these mobile forces upon which Canada will depend so much should a raid be made upon our northern frontiers. I come from the Pacific coast, and I may say that we are anxious about the western approaches to our dominion.

Many of the forts which have been established to protect our harbours now have their guns dismantled. The old fifth British Columbia coast regiment of artillery has been changed into a heavy anti-aircraft regiment. I believe that consideration is being given to the reorganization of that regiment. I hope that reorganization will be proceeded with so that there will be personnel from the reserve army available to man those forts should they be needed again. Our aerodromes and airfields are few and far between, having regard to the extent of our territory. We are anxious about those approaches. Those approaches must be watched. I think it is therefore high time that a special plea should be put in now for the stationing on the Pacific coast of the second aircraft carrier, a sister ship to H.M.C.S. Magnificent, which is stationed mainly on the Atlantic seaboard. Such a vessel would be able to co-operate with the anti-aircraft school of artillery located at Esquimalt. It may be comparatively easy to borrow a submarine, but it will not be so easy at a moment's notice to borrow an aircraft carrier.

This summer I had the opportunity of inspecting one of the United States coastguard cutters which was visiting our harbour of Nanaimo. Those United States ships are used mainly for watching the approaches. They are stationed from five hundred miles to one thousand miles out in the Pacific off the coast of Oregon but a gap exists between those ships stationed off the coast of Oregon and the Aleutian islands in the north. The vessel I inspected was a magnificent one, fully equipped with the latest radar and radio apparatus. One of its functions in peacetime is to plot the route of all aircraft passing within range of its instruments. By that method it was able to report, to an aircraft which might have lost its direction, its exact location. It had the means of assisting in air rescue work at sea. Amidships of that vessel was a huge compartment in which the weather balloons could be blown up and from which they could be released, enabling reports to be made upon weather conditions in the Pacific. Those meteorological reports of course have great value in peace or in war. I say a gap exists between those watchers of the approaches from the Pacific off the Oregon coast and the Aleutian islands. The time has come when we can no longer depend solely upon the United States, not only to provide the information which they send in with regard to the weather and planes which pass over them, but also for the services they continually render in saving lives and saving our ships at sea.

In this gap there is also a shortage of aircraft to report upon the approach lines. It is beyond my comprehension why there are such great delays in authorizing the auxiliary squadron of the R.C.A.F. at Victoria. For years now, representations have been made from the southern portion of Vancouver island from young men of the finest possible type who wish to serve voluntarily in such an auxiliary squadron. Years are going by and these men are beginning to lose heart. They are wondering whether a squadron will ever be authorized.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned for the dinner recess I was speaking about the lack of support which had been given to the formation of the auxiliary R.C.A.F. squadron at Victoria. These auxiliary or reserve units were in previous years the medium by which the miracle was worked whereby great masses of citizens from Canada were welded into military formations and were able to make so grand a contribution to the successful conduct of the first and second world wars.

It was the willingness of innumerable Canadian citizens to give up their spare time, their holidays, and their evenings in order to learn voluntarily the rudiments of military science, and something by way of a smattering of the art of leadership, that enabled them in the hour of crisis to develop those great masses of Canadian citizens who came forward into, as I said a moment ago, a really effective fighting force.

I feel the time still continues when every possible encouragement should be given to our non-permanent sailors, soldiers and airmen; and I regret it has not been possible for the government to encourage those young men from the southern part of Vancouver island, who are anxious to continue their service in the auxiliary arm of the R.C.A.F.

The government has given greater encouragement to the reserve army units than was ever given before. I say it is imperative upon the government to see that the policies which they have enunciated regarding the effective training of the officers and non-commissioned officers of those units are carried out to the letter. Before the last war, and for a number of years, the non-permanent units of this country were kept alive through the work done by the corps of officers and non-commissioned officers in those units. It is important that every encouragement be given to them to train along up-to-date lines. I believe encouragement is being given, but in some cases there is a tendency to emphasize the importance of recruiting, administration and keeping alive the traditions of the various units rather than going ahead with effective and up-to-date training.

In connection with the anxiety felt on the Pacific coast regarding the state of our defences there, as may be felt in other parts of the country as well, it was only a couple of years ago that Major General Worthington was appointed director and organizer of the civil defence of this country. If, as I claimed earlier in my remarks, Canada is in a position where it might become an active theatre of war, if war broke out again, then the importance of civil defence is such as has never been experienced in this land before. Some two years have elapsed since that appointment was made. I hope the minister will be able to tell us what progress has been made along these lines.

I have heard some talk about the importance of standardizing fire-fighting equipment. Unfortunately the fire departments of the various cities find their equipment is not co-ordinated. The result is that frequently when a fire occurs the fire brigades from neighbouring towns are unable to assist because their hose reels are not of the same standard or same make or size as those in the town where the fire has occurred. That is one direction in which it is imperative that some action be taken.

Also I would suggest that, in so far as the training of medical service is concerned, thought might be given to the type of casualties and injuries which might occur should this country be subjected to some modern form of attack.

I believe that in the majority of reserve units recruiting is going reasonably well. I would put forward one suggestion, however, namely that as a result of the extension of the franchise at the last general election many new groups of Canadians have now been brought within the realm of full Canadian citizenship. I feel those new groups should be encouraged to assume their responsibilities in every branch of citizenship.

On the Pacific coast we have thousands of young men of East Indian origin, their forebears having come from India, or from what is now called Pakistan. They come from martial races. These young men, born in Canada, have inherited those qualities of loyalty and courage which were so marked among the Hindus and Sikhs in the various units of the Indian and British armies. I hope a definite effort will be made to encourage these new Canadians to join with our defence forces. I know of no means whereby communism among the ranks of those men could better be combated than by having them assume the full responsibility of citizenship.

Only a few days ago I was advised that the Royal Humane Society in Canada had seen fit to recognize a young Hindu boy who had been responsible for saving the lives of two other boys in lake Cowichan. He is the son of Bal Singh, an East Indian resident of Vancouver island, who served during the first world war, and is now an active member of our branch of the Legion.

I mention that only to show that these Canadian-born East Indians have inherited the qualities of courage and valour and loyalty which made their sires so famous in the annals of the military history of the British empire.

In closing, I should like to say one word with regard to the veterans of this land, the old soldiers. Since the opening of the session we have heard that the pound has been devalued. I was pleased to hear the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) say that those veterans who are drawing an imperial pension, and at the same time have that pension brought up to Canadian standards by a supplementary Canadian pension, will have that supplementary pension increased so that they will not suffer from the devaluation of the pound.

Of course there are still hundreds, perhaps thousands, of imperial ex-servicemen in this land who are not qualified for that supplementary Canadian pension. If they are drawing a pension from the British ministry of pensions, that pension is pitifully small now. I believe I am correct in saying that a widow's pension is 45 shillings a week, which, before devaluation of the pound, would have been somewhere in the neighbourhood of $9 a week. Now it is less than $7. It is pretty hard for a hundred per cent disabled pensioner, or the widow of a service man, to exist with a reasonable standard of living on that small pension. I do hope that something will be worked out, either by an extension of the War Veterans Allowance Act or by agreement between this government and the government of Great Britain, whereby our comrades who served with forces other than Canadian forces will be able to maintain themselves and their families in a position which is not infinitely inferior to that in which this government permits Canadian ex-servicemen to maintain themselves. Of course I am referring only to those veterans of the imperial forces who have lived for a long period in this country.

Mr. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all congratulate you upon your election as Speaker. Your knowledge of parliamentary law, your distinction and your dignity designate you for the high office to which you have been elected. The applause which marked your acceptance of your position demonstrated the unanimity of satisfaction which existed in the hearts of all of us.

(Translation):

I wish also to pay tribute to the mover (Mr. Boisvert) and the seconder (Mr. Laing) of the address in reply. Their reputation had preceded them in the house. Living up, from the very start, to such a reputation, which was quite definitely to their credit, is always a risky job.

They have discharged to the general satisfaction the responsibility devolved upon them by the government. I am sure those two very eloquent speeches are but a foretaste of their active and intelligent participation in the debates of the house.

I am well acquainted with the member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert). After hearing him, I felt proud and happy to be a fellow citizen of his and his colleague at the Quebec bar.

I also wish to pay tribute to the head of the government who undoubtedly has won the most brilliant personal victory any head of government has ever won in this country.

The right hon. Prime Minister outlined his platform in the remotest areas of the country. He made himself known to all Canadians and advocated a doctrine of Canadian patriotism and national unity.

I also wish to pay my respects to his charming and gracious wife, a charming and distinguished first lady, who accompanied him. He won the heart of every Canadian and rallied nearly everyone to his policies. He can now vigorously lead the Canadian people to an even brighter future.

May I be allowed at this point to raise a question which I would have preferred to bring up in the absence of the Prime Minister, but which I wish nevertheless to discuss. If heretofore, because of special circumstances, an official residence for the Prime Minister was considered unessential, surely the situation is now such that this lack should be remedied without further delay.

When Canada receives distinguished visitors, the Prime Minister as such has no home in which to welcome them, while ambassadors have all they need to honour not only foreign visitors but Canadians also. Abroad, in every capital city of the world, Canada is in an excellent position to entertain these guests. We should therefore provide our first citizen and his distinguished lady with what is needed to enhance the prestige of the name Canada and of the Canadian capital. It would, of course, be easy to appeal to the generosity of the public; I have no doubt that the funds required for the purchase of a suitable residence would immediately be forthcoming. I feel, however, that every Canadian should participate in the offer of a house which our Prime Minister would occupy in his official capacity, and which would then be at the disposal of all future Canadian prime ministers.

As we shall see, Canada is well on the way to self-government. National pride therefore makes it imperative that we provide the Prime Minister and his wife with an official home where, henceforward, they may entertain important guests.

With the hearty commendation of the house, I therefore beg the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) to include without further delay, in the supplementary estimates that will be brought down this autumn, the sum required for the purpose I have just outlined.

Mr. Speaker, extremely interesting proposals, from the constitutional and legal viewpoints, are to be found in the speech from the throne. Last Friday, those proposals were explained from a constitutional point of view by the Prime Minister in the following words, and I quote from page 197 of Hansard:

> From time to time modifications have been made in provincial constitutions by those who had the authority and were concerned about them, and no one else was consulted or had to be consulted. What is forecast in the speech from the throne is that there will be an application to the parliament at Westminster to say that such amendments to the Canadian constitution as do not affect the jurisdiction of the provinces, or the rights or privileges secured to the provinces, or the minority rights I referred to previously, can be made here in this parliament instead of being made in the parliament at Westminster on motions or addresses adopted by this parliament. That is the only purpose and effect of the measure forecast in the speech from the throne. But that measure would leave to the courts the responsibility and the burden of deciding what is within provincial jurisdiction or constitutes a provincial right and what is of concern only to the federal authority and their decisions will be binding as they have been in the past.

The right hon. the Prime Minister mentioned in his speech that since confederation, on ten separate occasions, addresses have been forwarded to the parliament in London by this parliament, with a view to amending our constitution. Never did the parliament at Westminster refuse to accept these addresses and to amend the Canadian constitution. Yet the provinces were never consulted in any one of these cases and the British parliament simply approved the proposed amendments in the manner of a formality. Experience has shown that it will refuse none of this parliament's requests for amendments to the constitution. Who would dare suggest that this can change now?

This situation has come about in practice as Canada acquires in the world an ever-increasing importance, not only in the economic field, but on the international scene. That is why, as a matter of fact, the Prime Minister, a year or two ago, expressed the fear that the parliament at Westminster could, in the manner of a formality, approve an address from this parliament requesting, for instance—that is the example he chose—that section 133 of the British North America Act be abolished.

In practice, the present position is that the federal parliament, I repeat, may ask for and obtain any amendment whatsoever to the constitution. But the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, suggests that we, ourselves, limit the powers granted the Canadian parliament through constant practice. In fact, this approval by the British parliament has become a mere formality. The Prime Minister has suggested that in the future the law should take precedence over practice and absolutely guarantee the rights of the provinces and of the minorities. The law would state that the federal government shall be free to amend the constitution within the realm of its exclusive jurisdiction and that each of the provinces is free within the realm of its exclusive jurisdiction. But the federal government may not now amend the constitution in matters pertaining to the rights of minorities and the rights of the provinces, in matters concerning only the provinces or in questions of mixed jurisdiction.

Thus, for instance, the field of direct taxation is a field of mixed jurisdiction where both the central authority and the provincial legislatures can operate. The prime minister of the province of Quebec expressed certain fears on that subject. Now, Mr. Speaker, parliament will not be able to amend the constitution with respect to that field, and Mr. Duplessis will certainly have the chance to discuss the question and to assert the needs of the provinces at the conference he has been invited to attend by the Prime Minister of Canada, in order precisely to come to an understanding on the possible means of amending the constitution, in a way satisfactory to all parties, in fields of mixed jurisdiction, such as direct taxation.

Therefore, the law will henceforth tell the parliament at Ottawa that it can amend the constitution only in matters coming under its sole jurisdiction. And as that will be written into our statutes, the party that deems itself injured will be able to appeal to the tribunals, whereas up to now a province which believed its rights had been encroached upon could not appeal to the tribunals as long as the proposed amendments had been ratified by the British parliament. Thus the provinces gain an additional right.

All things considered, far from being an encroachment upon provincial and minority rights, such a reform constitutes a further double guarantee, based on law and justice. Indeed, the written law will replace a constitutional practice fraught with danger for the minorities and the provinces. Efficient legal remedy will be afforded to minorities and provinces if they believe that their rights have been infringed upon.

It is perhaps on account of that new remedy that most objections have been and are still voiced against the abolition of appeals to the privy council. Last year, during the discussion on a bill introduced by Mr. Jaenicke, I went fully into that matter. I maintained that the privy council was a political court, that its members were politicians and that they had not the independence which our supreme court judges enjoy. I claimed that the members of the privy council are not familiar with our customs and that, in the last analysis, the members of the supreme court are more qualified to mete out justice and equity to Canadians than are the members of a court which sits outside this country. I also went at length into the jurisprudence of the supreme court and the privy council on constitutional cases, and I came to the conclusion that past experience proves, beyond any doubt, that the supreme court affords more safeguards than the privy council as regards the protection of minorities and the defence of provincial rights.

Moreover, let us not forget that, through the bill which is now before the house, the supreme court will now be composed of nine judges, three of which will be from the province of Quebec. That constitutes an extremely important additional guarantee for the rights of minorities. But after all what counts most is that, thanks be to God, my country's courts are second to none, as far as the judges' integrity is concerned. Breaches against justice, and when I say justice I mean justice, have perhaps brought many Canadian citizens to believe that such a virtue tends to disappear. Claims held in totalitarian countries to the effect that might is right have perhaps shaken faith in justice. But I can assure my fellow citizens that our magistrates have that virtue of justice engraved in their hearts and wish to give everyone his due, whether individuals, corporations, municipalities, provinces or central government are concerned. They are fully aware of their responsibility in the accomplishment of the most important function the state has delegated to them as one of its foremost prerogatives.

According to Aristotle, the prince is the keeper of justice. Justice is an outgrowth of the essential attribute of the state. It is one of the three functions, of the three powers of a sovereign country, namely the executive, the legislative and the judicial powers. We shall not be autonomous so long as we are unable to amend our own constitution. We are not in full possession of our legislative powers and we do not enjoy complete judicial independence. We only enjoy one power, the executive power, and this on account of the legal friction pertaining to the divisibility of the crown. We do not enjoy the two other powers, namely full legislative and judicial powers. Mr. Speaker, over twenty years ago, when I was only sixteen, I took part in my first public debate, together with my good friend, who is now my colleague, the member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard). We did not consult each other, because I was in Quebec and he was in Montreal, but we both discussed the following subject: "Canada among nations". Both of us, without consulting each other, claimed for Canada all the attributes of sovereignty. That was prior to 1931, before the enactment of the Statute of Westminster.

At the time, we may have been looked upon as dreamers. I am not sure whether this speech I had written when so young had inspired me with a particular feeling of national pride or not, but later on, whenever I addressed the public, I felt it my duty to claim the attributes of sovereignty for my country. At every step Canada took towards autonomy, whether in the international or in the national field, I felt deeply moved, my patriotism fired me with enthusiasm. When I heard the Prime Minister outline his constitutional platform over the radio, which has been stated in the speech from the throne, I was deeply moved and proud of my country, after the years I had spent claiming its autonomy, after I had asked my electors for a mandate in order that I may claim here my country's sovereignty. I was indeed very happy.

When the Prime Minister outlined his program to my electors at Montmagny, on May 22 last, I was proud to be a Canadian and a fellow citizen of our leader. That is why I asked my constituents to give him an unequivocal mandate.

He obtained that unequivocal mandate not only from the electors of Montmagny-L'Islet, not only from the whole of the province of Quebec, but from the constituents of nearly every electoral district throughout Canada. It is therefore with an unequivocal mandate that he now comes before parliament to ask both houses for their approval of the program which has already been sanctioned by the people who sent us here when they voted for us last June.

Some people would like to see these measures postponed. No good ever comes of delaying too long, Mr. Speaker. In the past, important problems were submitted to a dominion-provincial conference. Without censuring anyone, I point out that unfortunately certain interests availed themselves of that occasion to boost their political capital and gain the confidence of the electors. Why did that happen? Because the subject under consideration at those conferences was so broad that the delegates could go off at a tangent. On the other hand, we have held many dominion-provincial conferences quietly, smoothly and without fanfare, at which federal and provincial authorities were in agreement. For that reason, I feel that in recommending that the debate on amendments to the constitution be restricted to problems involving joint jurisdiction or relating to minorities, the Prime Minister has made an excellent proposal.

I fail to see why we should require the assent of the provinces when dealing with matters that concern only the dominion any more than they would need the concurrence of the federal parliament in spheres entirely under their control.

If a federal-provincial conference is being planned to deal with so broad a matter, I feel sure that, after our experience of the past, it will lead to no practical results. Inevitably, passions will be aroused, the issue will be dodged and this, finally, can only lead to the failure of such a conference, whereas by concentrating on a given question, the Prime Minister has already laid the groundwork of an almost certain success. After all, a spirit of co-operation, of tolerance and of justice, is all that can be required of those attending such a conference.

I would not want anyone and especially those who represent the minority, of which I am a part, to concede a single one of the rights guaranteed by the letter of confederation and which are today, I insist, threatened because of a constitutional practice which has forced itself upon us since 1837. Not for any consideration would I want one single shred of minority or provincial rights to be transferred to this parliament. I am confident that the autonomy of the provinces will be safeguarded, but I also hope that, in order to ensure Canada's continued growth, those fields which were given to the federal government by the fathers of confederation will also be protected. After all, if the provinces are entitled to their autonomy, we are also entitled to ours. The parliament of Canada must be free to act in those fields which are its sole responsibility and on no account should those who represent the central authorities be willing to abandon even one single shred of its rights. But each delegate, while prepared to defend the rights of those whom he represents, should come to this conference in a spirit of tolerance, co-operation and Canadian patriotism. Thus, we may be sure that this conference will meet with success.

If agreement is reached on the manner in which our constitution can be amended in all fields, only one additional step will be required to make it truly Canadian, one to be written in the statutes of this parliament and in those of the various provinces of Canada. Then we shall have achieved complete sovereignty, a dream that has been with us for so long.

(Text):

Mr. T. G. W. Ashbourne (Grand Falls-White Bay): Mr. Speaker, I should like my first remarks in this house to be words of thanks to the electors of the riding of Grand Falls-White Bay in Newfoundland, which riding consists of the electoral districts of Grand Falls, Green Bay, White Bay and Labrador, the last named including an area of some 113,000 square miles. I want to thank the electors for the confidence they have expressed in sending me to this historic House of Commons, and I am very happy to be here.

To you, sir, I should like to add my congratulations to those already expressed by other hon. members on your election as Speaker of this house. There is an air of permanence about this august chamber. I trust that you will long be spared to fulfil the duties of your exalted position which, I hope, will prove a delight to you and of benefit to us. I am delighted to congratulate our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the leader of the great Liberal party, on the success of our party in the election of June 27. His outstanding qualities of leadership played an important role in the magnitude of this great victory.

I should like to offer my congratulations also to the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) on the excellent speeches they delivered as mover and seconder of the motion which is now under discussion. As yet it has not been my privilege to visit Vancouver, but after listening with rapt attention to the address of the member for Vancouver South, I feel that, as soon as I can conveniently do so, I should like to visit that part of Canada.

The visit of His Excellency the Governor General and Viscountess Alexander to Newfoundland was greatly appreciated by our people. This visit afforded many of them an opportunity of meeting the representative of His Majesty the King, whose health we trust will continue to improve. I sincerely hope that the welcome accorded to the governor general, and the repeated desire expressed by the people of Newfoundland for a return visit by His Excellency and his good lady, will promote an early return so that the places not yet visited by them may have an opportunity of greeting them.

We were honoured by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who, practically speaking, ended his election campaign tour in Newfoundland. I feel sure that the remembrance of the deep interest displayed by the right hon. gentleman in the province of Newfoundland, and his constant efforts to bring the union of Newfoundland and Canada to a satisfactory consummation, was in the minds of the people of Canada.

Since I had the honour of being elected by the people of Newfoundland to be a member of the national convention which met in St. John's on September 11, 1946, I can speak with a certain degree of personal knowledge about the work of that convention. It happens that I was also a member of the delegation elected by the national convention to come to Ottawa in the summer of 1947 to confer with representatives of the Canadian government about the possible terms of union. I want to pay tribute to the ex-Prime Minister, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, who welcomed us at that time, as well as to the Prime Minister, the Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent, who acted as chairman of the meetings that were held at that time.

We arrived in this city on the 24th day of June, the day on which the people of Newfoundland were celebrating the four hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the landing of John Cabot upon the shores of that province. The delegation remained here for a period of three months, during which time meetings were held, concluding on September 29, 1947. One month from that day the Prime Minister of Canada wrote to His Excellency Sir Gordon, now Lord Macdonald, the Governor of Newfoundland, enclosing a statement of terms believed to constitute a fair and equitable basis for union with Canada. Those terms were discussed at length by the members of the national convention and were before the people in the referenda which followed.

The national convention had been elected by the people of Newfoundland to examine the financial and economic condition of the country and to make recommendations to the British government as to the forms of government to be submitted to the people in a national referendum. The first referendum was held on June 3, 1948, the results of which are as follows: for continuation of commission of government for a five-year period, 22,311; for confederation with Canada, 64,066; for restoration of responsible government, 69,400. As no form of government had received a majority of the votes cast, a second referendum was held on July 22, 1948. This resulted in confederation with Canada receiving 78,323 votes as against 71,334 votes for responsible government.

I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Hon. F. G. Bradley, the Secretary of State for Canada, was the chairman of the delegation that came to Ottawa in the summer of 1947. When we returned to the convention in Newfoundland both of us, in common with fourteen other members of the convention, felt that the people of Newfoundland should be afforded an opportunity of voting upon the matter of confederation with Canada. I can assure you we were very glad when the British government decided to place it upon the ballot paper. Confederation, I am happy to say, is now a fait accompli. On the 15th day of September, 1949, when this twenty-first parliament assembled, we saw the representatives of Newfoundland seated in this chamber with the representatives of the other nine provinces.

We are proud and happy to take our places in this great land, and delighted that at long last the representations, discussions, conferences and negotiations have borne fruit. As a result of the choice of the people, on whose judgment we can safely rely, I am happy that we are now part and parcel of this great dominion which is, if I may be allowed to say so, greater now that the resources of Newfoundland have been pooled with those of Canada. We can appreciate the fact that the majority of the people are never far wrong when their voice can be heard or when an opportunity is given them to express their considered will on issues concerning their future and their welfare. As time goes on, and as the needs of Newfoundland become more apparent, I have faith and confidence that from the people of Canada, and from their representatives in this parliament and other assemblies, we shall receive the utmost consideration commensurate with the ability of this dominion to satisfy the needs of Newfoundland as they may arise.

I wish to voice my warm appreciation of the words of welcome contained in the speech from the throne with regard to the advent of Newfoundlanders in this parliament, and to place on record my own high regard for that spirit of friendliness, harmony and good will so pleasantly manifested since the beginning of this session. We in Newfoundland have not been unaccustomed to the storms which have swept our province as well as other provinces represented here. We have felt the tremor of the earthquake. We have been shaken, as it were, by convulsions. Yet, undaunted, we have carried on as well as we could. When the great depressions struck our economic structure we were unfortunately not able, unaided, to carry on alone. For a time we were governed by the commission of government, which I believe did a good job as a whole in Newfoundland. But it was not a democratic form of government; while at the time it seemed to be a good expedient, it was only to be expected that the people of Newfoundland would want responsible government. Today we have responsible government, not on our own but backed up with the resources of the great Dominion of Canada.

Newfoundland is a country of proverbial beauty. We have our majestic headlands, some of them rising in sheer grandeur hundreds of feet, and down the steep slopes come tumbling the waterfalls. I have not yet had the privilege of viewing the Grand Falls of Labrador. I have not yet visited Labrador although I have the honour to represent that great area. But it will be my duty and privilege some day to visit that great country. We know something of the tremendous assets to be found in Labrador, of the rich mines and of the virgin forests which are hers. In imagination we look back to the sight which must have met the eyes of John Cabot when, on the far-away day, coming to the shores of Newfoundland, he and his fellow voyageurs exclaimed, "Buena vista!" I may say that the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) resides in Bonavista and represents that historic district as well as the district of Twillingate.

I believe there is a widespread belief that Newfoundland is a land of fogs and ice, but that is not correct. Because of the Arctic current, which flows from the north down toward the gulf stream, a certain amount of fog is naturally generated. But I can assure hon. members that the climate of Newfoundland as a whole is exceptionally good. I might say that right here in this House of Commons I should like to feel some of those sea breezes that I have felt in the past. I mention the climate of Newfoundland because I realize what a tremendous asset it is to us. To those people who want to get away from the sweltering heat of the city in the summertime I would extend an invitation to come down and enjoy the climate of Newfoundland. We have our beautiful days of sunshine and nights that are cool, so that one can lie down and have a decent rest. We in Newfoundland realize that in our climate we have an attraction which I hope will bring many tourists to our shores.

We have as well the salmon fishing about which a good many hon. members know. My good friend the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) will be able to tell you more about that attraction. I have never yet had the thrill of catching a salmon. Now that I am a member of the House of Commons I do not know whether I shall have the time to go salmon fishing. Up to the present time my life has been so crowded that I have not been able to indulge in that sport. I mention it, however, because there may be some who would like to come down and enjoy the salmon fishing in Newfoundland.

It is true that we have some fog, particularly at certain periods of the year, especially in the spring. Later on I shall be making requisitions to the government for some fog alarms and also for some lighthouses, which are most necessary for the people residing in the districts I have the honour to represent. As they go north in quest of the harvests of the deep, these fishermen are oftentimes impeded by fog in the spring of the year. I feel sure that my request for a certain number of fog alarms and lighthouses will not fall on deaf ears, and that the people of Canada will see that these are provided for our fishermen. We know these men who are seeking to provide food for the people of the world will be helped in their endeavours, and I can assure the house that it will be highly appreciated by them.

Newfoundland's strategic position, being so to speak the Gibraltar of the North American continent, is well known. I am happy that our lot is now cast with the rest of the people of Canada, and that this dominion is now rounded out by the inclusion of Newfoundland. We are primarily a fishing country. The prolific cod fisheries of Newfoundland have meant bread and butter to our people. We have also our salmon fisheries, our lobster fisheries and our herring fisheries.

I was greatly taken with the desire of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) to give aid to the fishermen. In Newfoundland the fisheries have been our chief mainstay and, as I said before, they offer much by way of food to the people of the world. For example, let us consider the herring fishery. The herring is one of the most important of food fishes, and they are found in our bays and along the Labrador coast. We realize that at the present time, on account of the devaluation of the dollar, if we are to keep up consumption in the export markets we may have to reduce our fish prices. On the other hand we sell a considerable quantity of codfish to Puerto Rico. There we shall receive American dollars which, I trust, will offset some of the loss which may be incurred by the devaluation of other currencies.

In Newfoundland we have an organization called NAFEL. This is the Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters, Limited, which organization handles the sales of codfish for the exporters of Newfoundland. We have learned from experience the evils of consigning fish to markets without receiving payment beforehand. We have also learned to our sorrow of the cutthroat competition when, in order to make a sale in a market, one exporter might be inclined to undercut another. I am happy to say we now have NAFEL, which is looking after the exporting of our codfish.

I should like briefly to refer to a few of the matters included in the speech from the throne. In my opinion this was a good speech, forecasting as it did important legislation, some of which has already been placed before the house. It is my hope that the dominion-provincial conference, which in my opinion is a worthy project, may result in profitable progress, and may achieve the desired end, with each participant actively motivated toward a common goal. By that method I am sure the best possible results will flow for the people and the nation.

The right to amend our own constitution should surely be our own prerogative. It seems to me we must continue to strive with determination and in the spirit of co-operation not merely to find temporary solutions for our problems, but adequate and lasting ones, in all the matters which we undertake. I am pleased to see the increasing interest taken in national health, which primarily, I understand, is a provincial matter.

May I say that in my first speech in the house I realize that I have much to learn. I am only a beginner here, and there are many directions in which I shall have to make progress slowly. It is not easy to change quickly from one course of procedure to another. The amount of $30 million voted at the last session of parliament to be divided among the provinces was, in my opinion, a proper step. I am afraid, however, Newfoundland may be unable to participate in all the various grants.

For example, I am not sure that we shall be able to take up the amount of money which was voted for cancer research. It would be, I think, a great pity for any amounts that we could not possibly take for the different sections for which the votes were granted to go into a dropped balance. I trust that if there are any such amounts which cannot be used for grants as indicated, they may be credited to Newfoundland, and given to us for certain other medical and health purposes. For instance, I have in mind hospital construction. We have in Newfoundland a health problem. Those grants in toto could be used for various purposes in Newfoundland to which we could profitably put them. We have several cottage hospitals, as well as private hospitals. We have the hospitals in the north operated by the International Grenfell Association, which operates a large hospital at St. Anthony, and also on the coast of Labrador. We have at my home town of Twillingate a memorial hospital built as a memorial to the men in world war I who laid down their lives in that great conflict.

On August 17 last we celebrated the 25th anniversary of the opening of the Notre Dame Memorial hospital. Newfoundland being an island, our main means of transportation is by boat, and in Newfoundland the people are scattered among the various outports around the coasts. I was talking to Dr. Olds, the superintendent of the hospital in Twillingate, just shortly before I left. It might be interesting to note that he is a graduate of the Johns Hopkins university. He has been at Twillingate for quite a period. He is the missionary type of doctor and at one time during the war he practically carried on single-handed at this 130-bed hospital. He was telling me how much he would like to have an aeroplane in order that cases might be brought to the hospital more quickly. We were delighted to hear that the United States government has donated a large sum of money for the building of a hospital at St. Lawrence on the southwest coast of Newfoundland.

We in Newfoundland are looking forward to the building of the trans-Canada highway and we hope that a highway will also be built across Newfoundland and Labrador. We understand that a ferry service across Cabot strait will be instituted in time and this would permit many people to come from the mainland to visit our beauty spots and enjoy the fishing and hunting available in Newfoundland. There are herds of moose and caribou on the island which are increasing all the time, but I think we shall have to bring in some deer from the mainland, which would add greatly to the attractions of our hunting.

We have heard much said about the premium on gold, but may I suggest that a premium on food would not be out of order. In the final analysis, is not food of greater value than gold? We in Newfoundland have helped to feed the people of the world. Our climate is such that we are able to dry the salt cod which we have exported, not only to the Mediterranean, to the West Indies and to Puerto Rico, but to Brazil.

While we look forward to a further development of the fresh fish industry we realize that there is a great demand for the salted product. I hope and trust that Europe will still be able to take large quantities of our codfish. Unfortunately we have not been able to sell any cod in Spain for two years. There may be a necessary curtailment in our exports of fish owing to lack of currency, but it would be a great thing if we could once more sell our products to Spain. I remember one time being told by a fish merchant there that if we could produce a certain quality of fish it would sell in that market no matter what other cargoes might be offering. This question of exchange has hampered our exports to the extent, as I have stated, that we have not been able to make any sales of fish in Spain for quite some time.

Shipbuilding is mentioned in the speech from the throne. This is a most important industry, a most essential industry to Newfoundland. Being an insular and maritime country we must depend upon shipping. If it is the intention of the government to foster the shipbuilding industry I hope they will also consider the matter of repairs to existing hulls. It is a well-known fact that the bottom of a vessel will outlast two top structures. Not having a great deal of hardwood in Newfoundland, we must use the softer varieties, and we find that the topsides give out first. The bottom of the vessel, being in contact with salt water, is quite often perfectly sound when the upper part must be condemned. If repairs, under supervision of course, could be carried on I know that the fishermen would be delighted and I think provisions for such repair work might well be coupled with the measure proposed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired but he may continue with the unanimous consent of the house.

[Mr. Ashbourne.]

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Ashbourne: I wish to thank hon. members of the house for their indulgence. Mining is a great asset to Newfoundland. The mines at Buchans provide considerable employment and we are looking forward to the development of the mineral resources in Labrador.

The production of newsprint at Grand Falls and Corner Brook has been a means of reducing unemployment throughout the island and also of obtaining United States dollars.

Then a word with regard to the air agreements. No doubt the acquisition by Canada of Gander airport, which is in my riding, strengthened the hands of the government in the finalization of these agreements. If further details have not yet been decided upon, or remain to be ironed out, I trust that in the final analysis no undue friction will develop, but that the result will be expanded services and greater employment with a consequent need for additional Newfoundland personnel. The large airport at Gander, the centre of international air travel, the crossroads of the world, will, I believe, play a most important role in the development of our country.

The matter of forest conservation is most essential. Fire, that great menace, has been a constant threat. The change-over from coal to oil burning locomotives in Newfoundland has resulted already in fewer fires. Newfoundland, if denuded of her forests, would become in time a bald rock. Then our fisheries would disappear and storms would likely sweep over her.

I sincerely say "amen" to the prayer that Divine Providence may bless our deliberations on behalf of this great Dominion of Canada.

Mr. W. D. Wylie (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, while I intend to be very brief in my remarks, I want to discuss certain matters of particular importance to my constituency, and to Canada as a whole. One of those subjects is irrigation.

Before discussing it may I take this opportunity to congratulate the Speaker of the house and also you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on being elevated to your high offices. May I congratulate the mover (Mr. Boisvert) and the seconder (Mr. Laing) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I regret that I was unable to follow the speech of the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska owing to my meagre knowledge of the French language, but I certainly enjoyed the address of the hon. member for Vancouver South. I think he did a wonderful job, and I am sure that we are going to hear more good speeches from the same hon. member.

Coming over to this side of the house, may I offer my congratulations to another member from the other end of Canada, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins). I enjoyed listening to his speech, and I am sure everyone else did. I believe that he is another hon. member who will certainly be heard from in the future. I am sure that we will take pleasure in the contributions that he will make to the debates of the house.

The subject of irrigation is one that is certainly not new to most hon. members, and it is one that is not new within the walls of this chamber. I hope that the word "irrigation" will ring through this chamber until our wish to see our western plains well supplied with water has been fulfilled. During the past week we have had several celebrations in Lethbridge in connection with irrigation. The Lethbridge chamber of commerce was celebrating their seventy-fifth anniversary, and at the same time they had a celebration in connection with irrigation, a subject in which they have taken an interest ever since they were first organized. They have done a wonderful job in promoting irrigation, not only in the Lethbridge area but also in the Medicine Hat area, and other areas as well.

I might mention in passing that Mr. John Fisher, the noted C.B.C. commentator, covered the celebration last week. I am sure that many hon. members of the house must have heard Mr. Fisher either on Saturday afternoon or yesterday when he gave Canada the story of irrigation, and what irrigation has done for the Lethbridge community. I find that many members of the staff of the house also listened to him. I am reminded that he told a little story, and I think it is worth while repeating it because we do have chinooks out there, and we have quite a variation in temperature. Mr. Fisher told a story of a couple driving into Lethbridge one day during a chinook. It was in the middle of winter and the front end of the sleigh was on snow and the back runners were on bare ground. Many hon. members may not believe that situation exists. I agree that it is not quite that bad, but we have changes in temperature of 60 degrees in about two hours, and the unfortunate part of it is that it does not occur only in the wintertime. We have the same thing in the summer. When we get the dry chinook winds in the summertime it is just as hot at night as it is during the day, and no crop can stand up under those conditions unless we have water for the soil.

There was another meeting in Lethbridge last Thursday, a meeting of the Western Canada Reclamation Association. It is an organization made up mostly of Medicine Hat residents who spend their time promoting irrigation. There was also another very large meeting in Medicine Hat last Tuesday night which was addressed by a former member of this house, Mr. John R. MacNicol, a man who has spent years studying irrigation, and the benefits that can be derived by supplying water to the land. We were very glad to have Mr. MacNicol in Medicine Hat at this time of the year, especially just after an election in which many promises were made as to irrigation. Mr. MacNicol addressed an audience of 650 irrigation enthusiasts who filled the Empress theatre. They must have been enthusiasts to have attended a meeting at this time of year. They were people who had the interests of the district at heart. Mr. MacNicol also spoke in Lethbridge; and while he is not now a member of this house I wish him all the success in the world in promoting irrigation in western Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while I do not wish to rehash election promises, in view of developments that have taken place since the election I find it necessary to refer to a few matters and a few promises that were made to the residents of my constituency before the election. We had plenty of promises. As I said, irrigation is not a new subject in this house. I am going to go back to September 18, 1945, and read a very short editorial from the Medicine Hat News of that date under the heading "A necessity":

> Last week Senators F. W. Gershaw and W. A. Buchanan stressed the need of an early start upon the irrigation projects in southern Alberta.
> At the week end the local trades and labour council voiced a strong protest against the delay in commencing work on the Redcliff-Ronalane project. These representations are the latest in a steadily growing volume of protest against the apparent inability of Ottawa to recognize the emergency which is developing in southern Alberta as a result of drought conditions. The memory of the dry thirties is still vivid in this part of the country where its people are anxious to avoid having to undergo another heart-breaking experience of that kind, especially as it can be averted to a great extent by placing water on the land.

In that editorial I went back to 1945, but I could go back to 1920. The necessity of having water on the land was recognized at that time; the issue has been fought in every election campaign since, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that as long as I am able to do so I shall continue to fight it in every election campaign until these irrigation projects are completed.

Mr. Gardiner: And this Liberal government, through the Minister of Agriculture, has done more about it in the last few years than was done in all the other years you have been talking about.

Mr. Wylie: Yes, since I have been elected; not before. In our part of the country every year is a dry year; we have never known a wet year. The only difference is that one year may be a little drier than another, and this happens to be one of the driest years we have ever had. This year in that area thousands of acres will not be harvested; there is nothing on them to cut. Thousands of acres are averaging only from two to four bushels to the acre. Many farmers sowed 250 to 400 acres of wheat and did not thresh one bushel of grain. Those are the conditions that actually exist. The people of that district know we have the solution if only we will adopt it, but apparently those in charge are not so anxious to see some of our natural resources used or to have water put on our land. I was quite proud and happy to have the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in my constituency three times before the election—

Mr. Gardiner: And I shall be back three times more now that it is over.

Mr. Wylie: I assure the minister we shall be very glad to have him there at any time, as long as he leaves his promises at home, but we do want some action. Now I am going to read some short articles that appeared in the newspapers. Here is one dated May 2, from the Calgary Albertan, under the heading "Land purchase money in bank." It goes on to say:

The Liberal candidate for the Medicine Hat riding revealed Friday that $2,350,000 is in the bank for purchase of Canada Land and Irrigation Company holdings.

The price includes a 200-mile canal system and an estimated 160,000 acres of company lands. The Liberal candidate said that if the price was accepted he had agriculture minister J. G. Gardiner's assurance that the Bow river irrigation scheme would be undertaken immediately and made available to farmers at $10 per acre.

Then I have another short extract from the Calgary Albertan of May 9 under the heading "Irrigation company agrees to sell out." My only purpose in bringing these articles to the attention of the house at the present time is to show that these promises were made before the election on June 27 and nothing further has been heard of them since.

An hon. Member: Were you surprised?

Mr. Wylie: Not a bit. This is what the article states:

The Canada Land and Irrigation Company, owner of a large irrigation system south of the Bow river and between Calgary and Medicine Hat, has agreed to sell out to the dominion government, according to Right Hon. James G. Gardiner, federal Minister of Agriculture. Mr. Gardiner made the statement in a long distance telephone conversation with Harry Veiner of Brooks, Liberal candidate. He asked Mr. Veiner to arrange an appointment for him May 17 with D. W. Hays, general manager of the company.

[Mr. Wylie.]

Acceptance has been made in principle, while negotiations are needed to work out details of the agreement, said Mr. Gardiner.

Mr. Gardiner: No promise in that; it is just a statement of fact.

Mr. Wylie: Now I come to June 13 and something out of our local paper, getting right back home. The heading is "Gardiner backs irrigation deal," and the article states:

The audit and engineering investigation of Canada Land and Irrigation Company's assets and holdings on the Bow river extension has been completed, said agriculture minister James G. Gardiner here today.

"I have the copies of the report now," added Mr. Gardiner, in Medicine Hat to make two campaign addresses, one in Bow Island this afternoon, the other in the city tonight, in the interests of the Liberal candidate.

"The advisory committee of the PFRA viewed the project recently and is recommending it to the government. I am prepared to recommend it and back it."

Those are the minister's words.

The government, through Mr. Gardiner, offered to buy the company outright early in May. The offer was accepted by company directors and a written undertaking given that the company would sell. The Canadian cabinet has endorsed the agriculture minister's proposals.

Now that was on June 13, some time before the election. We are still waiting to hear what has happened.

Mr. Gardiner: Will you be surprised if it goes through?

Mr. Wylie: I shall be glad; I hope it does.

Mr. Quelch: Will the minister be surprised?

Mr. Wylie: Probably he would.

This article continues as follows:

Plans are developed for a big political rally in the city tonight, starting with what has been called a Gardiner-Veiner victory parade. This will move off from a point by Cory Implements, south of Railway street, at 7 p.m., and will cover all downtown streets, ending at the Empress theatre at eight o'clock.

The parade will feature some of the Dailey Bros. circus menagerie, in the city today, and the sixteen-horse hitch circus calliope. There will be floats, decorated cars and decorated bicycles.

May I say this, Mr. Speaker, that there was no parade with any part of the circus and the people of Medicine Hat were disappointed that evening, as the minister will recall. This parade was advertised over the radio for a week. That night the ladies rushed through doing the dishes and got the children ready to go down to see this circus parade. What happened? When they arrived on the scene they found the only parade was the right hon. the Minister of Agriculture and the Liberal candidate riding in the first car, with a few of their friends in two or three cars behind them. The people returned home disgusted and I do not blame them.

Mr. Gardiner: Most of them came to the meeting.

Mr. Wylie: The minister says "Most of them came to the meeting." He had a meeting that afternoon in Bow Island and while the newspapers reported the theatre was packed, actually there were forty-one people at the meeting.

Mr. Gardiner: Better than that; it was not packed, but I was running opposition to a circus, you know.

Mr. Wylie: May I say this, Mr. Speaker, that we are proud of our city. If 600 people is all we can get to a parade in Medicine Hat, we are bitterly disappointed. There were not that many at the minister's meeting.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, yes.

Mr. Wylie: I shall read you what the Moose Jaw Times-Herald of June 28, 1949, says. This is the day after the election. The article is headed, "Jimmy and the Circus".

> Never before have we heard of a politician sharing a night billing with a circus. That is what happened to Hon. Jimmy Gardiner at Medicine Hat.
> Of late years the circus managements have shunned parades, but whether it was the persuasive ability of the Medicine Hat Liberals or the fear of competition from Mr. Gardiner, there was a circus parade through the streets of Medicine Hat prior to the night performances of both. The elephants, lions, tigers, camels, riding horses and the circus band took part in the "Gardiner-Veiner victory parade," tracing a figure eight through the business section of the Alberta city. The Liberal committee organized the victory parade which was comprised of floats and decorated cars and bicycles, with "Veiner balloons" distributed en route. Mr. Gardiner and the Liberal candidate Veiner shared the honours with the beasts of the jungle and the polar bears from the far north.

You will observe from this that you cannot always believe what you read in the newspaper. There was no parade.

Mr. Gardiner: You have not read it all yet.

Mr. Wylie: I can read some more if you wish. I might read also, Mr. Speaker, what a Liberal newspaper said the day after the election. This editorial is headed, "Irrigation gets a Setback". This will show you whether they were playing politics. The editorial reads:

> The cheering is over, the laments are known, and the people have spoken. Re-election of William D. Wylie, Social Credit, by an overwhelming majority in the Medicine Hat constituency was a confirmation of faith in Alberta doctrines by the common people. Across the country it was a predictable win for the Liberal government but few can claim to have foreseen such a decisive sweep. It was an unprecedented steamroller victory in nine of the ten provinces, Alberta being the only exception to a trend which was early established after the closing of polls.
> More than national affairs were at stake in this constituency and the flaunting of the proposal made by agricultural minister Gardiner for the purchase of Canada Land and Irrigation Company Limited to complete the Bow river extension raises a big question over the future course of developments.
> The election was fought locally on irrigation, although some minor issues were raised during the hard-fought campaign. Gardiner said he would recommend, and back in cabinet caucus, purchase of the company at a price of $2,250,000. In addition, it would have cost the federal treasury some $3 million to complete its portion of the engineering development. The fate of this program is now problematical. We do not make this statement in any spirit of mischievousness but in the full knowledge of how practical politics are played.

According to that article the irrigation program will not be considered unless a Liberal is elected.

I have another article to which I wish to refer, as I believe it is worth while. This one is dated July 14 and is an editorial which appeared in the Medicine Hat News. It is headed "Irrigation and Politics".

Mr. Gardiner: From what other paper were you quoting?

Mr. Wylie: That was the Medicine Hat News of Tuesday, June 28.

Mr. Gardiner: Is that a Liberal paper?

Mr. Wylie: It is still a Liberal paper. This is what that newspaper said in an editorial on July 14 which is headed "Irrigation and Politics".

Mr. Gardiner: It is not a Social Credit newspaper, but that does not mean it is Liberal.

Mr. Wylie: This editorial reads:

> If the Liberals are to claim any right to honest government at all, they will decide the irrigation issue on its merits. Either the irrigation of southern Alberta is a good thing for the country as a whole or it isn't. If it is, then politics ought not to enter into it at all; if it isn't, then why was Mr. Gardiner so keen on the idea before June 27?

Mr. Low: Let him answer that.

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend wishes to have an answer to that question, I can tell him that his organization wrote me a letter challenging me to go out there and discuss the question.

Mr. Wylie: I did not hear what the minister said.

Mr. Gardiner: I said the hon. gentleman's organization, the Social Credit organization for that area, challenged me to go out there and discuss the question with the people. I went out and discussed it.

Mr. Wylie: Mr. Speaker, any time an organization has a candidate in the field, there is an implication that there is an invitation for any minister to enter that constituency and debate any subject.

Mr. Gardiner: They wrote and asked me to come.

Mr. Wylie: I am glad they did, and where did we get when we did get you out there?

Mr. Gardiner: You do not know yet what you are going to get.

Mr. Wylie: We shall wait and see.

Mr. Gardiner: I would say this, though, to my hon. friend, on the question of what they get by voting. In recent years Medicine Hat has elected more Liberals than anything else. They did not get irrigation for electing Liberals and they will not be refused irrigation because they elected somebody else.

Mr. Wylie: I am glad to hear the minister make that statement.

Mr. Gardiner: It is the same statement I made when I was out there.

Mr. Lennard: Make your own speech.

Mr. Wylie: We have believed that of the minister, but his organizers in Alberta do not believe that, and the papers supporting the minister talked differently. I think it is time they got behind the minister instead of opposing him, and gave him a hand to get our irrigation.

Mr. Gardiner: They are doing that all the time.

Mr. Wylie: They may be saying that all the time; but just the same, what we want is irrigation. I am going to go a little further and read an article that was in the Brooks Bulletin in order to show that irrigation is being discussed farther afield than in this country. I shall read from a recent issue of that bulletin, the one of September 15, 1949. The heading is "Planning increased irrigated acreage" and the article reads as follows:

New projects will increase the Canadian irrigated farm acreage from about 1 million to more than 3 million acres said Gordon MacKenzie, addressing a United Nations conference in Lake Success, New York.

No doubt the minister knows who Gordon MacKenzie is.

"Canada will in the near future triple her present irrigated acreage and thus be able to contribute her share to the world's population and food requirements," said Mr. MacKenzie.

He stated Canada's irrigation development will be limited only by the available water supply. The suitable land is almost unlimited.

Mr. MacKenzie spoke before the water-development section of the U.N. scientific conference on the conservation and utilization of resources where 535 scientists from 49 countries are exchanging ideas and experiences on how to boost world living standards.

He was commenting on a paper concerning recent developments in irrigation, presented by Michael W. Straus, commissioner of the United States bureau of reclamation.

Straus said it is an old human practice to pray for rain, but the country where the farmer can order his "rainfall" via the irrigation ditch is the one whose people will eat. Only recently had the responsibility of national governments in development of water and related resources received national recognition.

Commenting on this point, Mr. MacKenzie said this responsibility has been recognized in Canada since 1935.

There is a man who is entirely out of this country and who is making a speech of that kind. We in the southern part of the province want to see these irrigation projects completed as soon as possible. No one realizes the hardship that these farmers are putting up with until he goes out and sees some of the crops that have been put in and has watched them burn up.

An hon. Member: And the dust blow in.

Mr. Wylie: And the dust blow in, as my hon. friend says. I know a young chap who put in two hundred and fifty acres of wheat. He got three loads of feed off that two hundred and fifty acres. He is milking thirteen cows at the present time and is supplying badly-needed milk to our city and other parts. This winter he must dispose of his cattle. It is impossible for him to ship in feed with alfalfa at $28 a ton; and that is what he would have to pay. This man is settled right in the land that will be in the irrigation district. He is in the Sevenpersons creek area. The land has been surveyed. We know where the water will be. That is only one case and we have dozens of them. When you go out and see a man putting a $4,000 combine over a field and then getting only three to four bushels an acre, you wonder why he is doing it. But he must.

Before I go further may I say that the P.F.A. Act has assisted the farmers in that area; it has assisted all the farmers in all the drought areas. For many of them it is their only means of living. If it were not for the P.F.A. payments they would be on relief today. I notice that the P.F.A. Act is coming before the house for amendment. I hope the payments can be increased to the farmers in those areas where they have suffered a complete loss.

In closing, may I say to the minister and to the government that we have just about reached the end of our patience with playtime talk about what should be done with respect to irrigation projects. Water is the key to prairie industry and prairie prosperity. Who cares who gets what credit for what, as long as we get action on irrigation? Let us have that action with the least possible delay.

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker and hon. members, in rising in the house this evening to make my first speech I want to say that from the beginning of the session I have been all eyes and ears, and I assure you that this evening I have no intention of being all mouth.

I want to take this opportunity to congratulate the Speaker and other members of this house upon their election to the high positions they hold. I want to congratulate the Prime Minister upon his great victory on June 27. A small part of that victory brings me to this house to represent the constituency of Moose Mountain as a member of the government party. Being a new member, I have had many "wonders"; and one that is still with me is this. I wonder when some hon. members will get through licking their election wounds.

Much has been said about the results of the general election. I intend to speak for myself and for a good many of my colleagues from Saskatchewan. We out there ran our campaign fairly well on the past policies of the Liberal government. My colleagues and I were elected to this house under the policies of the Department of Agriculture. Much also has been said in this chamber about election promises. I cannot speak for all of Canada but I think I can speak for myself and also for a large number of my colleagues from my province. We in Saskatchewan made few if any promises because we knew that, if we promised the moon, our opposition out there would promise something bigger.

Much has been said about the government's majority in the House of Commons. As a new member I do not know a great deal about majorities or strong oppositions. I do believe however that a large majority is not something which need go amiss, because it gives hon. members supporting the government an opportunity to criticize that government, and to question it freely. I would suggest that criticism from that source would be just as beneficial as if it were to come from the opposition benches.

Much has been said about housing. I shall not linger long on that subject, but there are some brief observations I should like to make. I believe all hon. members will agree that the housing situation in Canada is not in as satisfactory a condition as we would like to see it. However, some of the speeches which have been made have pictured a backlog in housing which, in my view, is not as grim as it has been described.

I believe I can speak for a large section of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and for cities in those provinces. True, there is a backlog in housing; but if we were to consider the situation in Winnipeg, which all will agree is a large city in which more than half the population of Manitoba lives, we would find that we could drive down street after street, avenue after avenue and see on each street or avenue new houses, either already completed or in process of being built. Any man in Winnipeg who can carry a saw or drive a nail can get full employment in the building program. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) has said that there were less houses built under the federal housing program than there were marriages. Perhaps the hon. member is correct, but I know of scores of young people who have been married and who have built their own homes. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation had nothing to do with it.

In the rural areas of Manitoba and Saskatchewan we are having a vast program in the building of new houses. These are being built by people who during the forties enjoyed good prices for their crops—when they had them. These people are either rebuilding their own homes or building new ones. As time goes on I am convinced we will catch up on the backlog in housing.

One other matter I shall mention only briefly. I expect soon to have friends from the United States, a few friends from overseas and possibly some relatives visiting me in this city. It will be my opportunity and honour to show them around these parliament buildings, and to show them those facilities with which we have provided ourselves in order that we may have government.

I trust however that I shall not be asked that most embarrassing question, as to what facilities we have for the residence of our first citizen. In my opinion we have a disgraceful situation when our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has no official residence. I trust that before long this error will be corrected. Our Prime Minister is a family man and I suggest that we in Canada should at least provide him with a place in which to live.

May I now turn to a discussion of agriculture. I represent an agricultural constituency located in the southeastern part of Saskatchewan. My constituency is agricultural, with the exception of the coal fields at Estevan, which take up a small area. However, since coming east I have come to realize that not only am I a new member but that I am a new person in the east. I have heard much about eastern Canada, because my mother came from Quebec and my father from Ontario. During the last two week ends I have visited farms in this district. Last week end I visited a farm in Carleton county about thirty-five miles northwest of Ottawa. This fall it is my intention to plow some soil on one of those farms.

Yesterday morning I had the pleasure of helping to milk a dairy herd, and to deliver the milk to the cheese factory. This was all new and interesting to me. Those of us who come from western Canada have an advantage over members from eastern Canada because we have this opportunity to come east and to get acquainted with the people in this part of the country. We visit the rural areas, the towns and the cities, and in that way obtain a better understanding of the problems in this part of the country.

I admit it would be impossible to hold a session in western Canada, because we have not the facilities. However, if it were possible to come to the west, hon. members from the east would enjoy these same advantages. They would visit our rural areas, our towns and our cities and would learn about our problems.

Let me refer briefly to the agricultural set-up in western Canada. It is true that western Canada is new. But it will not always be new. I believe we could take a page out of the book of the eastern farmers. We will have to do as they are doing, namely reseed our lands to grass. I am told that right here in the Ottawa valley, where there is great fertility and plenty of rain, the farmers cannot grow crops continually. Occasionally they have to sow their lands to legumes and grasses. Sooner or later we in western Canada have to follow a similar course.

It is true that some farmers in the west are beginning to follow that procedure. However, if we are going to keep our land young we will have to sow grass. We have suffered from drought, insects and soil erosion. I believe that, thus far, we have succeeded in coping with the situation. However, the agricultural set-up of our dominion, whether it be east or west, is important. I believe it is said that for each member of the world's population we have two agricultural acres. Let us keep in mind that people must eat.

Much has been said about decreases in farm prices. Some of those prices have gone down; but the average for the first three months of 1949 showed an all-time high. We are still enjoying prices which are two and a half times higher than in the pre-war period.

It is my belief however that prices are bound to come down. In my view that is essential, because it will be agreed that when prices get too high they are bound to react to a point where they are too low. We know that, under the world wheat agreement, from year to year we are going to take less for our wheat. I do not think there is a wheat grower in Canada who, if he gave the matter serious consideration, would not admit that that is a satisfactory set-up. What we want is stability. We do not want a high price one time and a low price the next time.

Much has been said about oil production in Canada. The oil experts tell us that there are over 36 million acres of land in Saskatchewan, mostly farm land, where there are good possibilities of finding oil. This year I leased 640 acres to Imperial Oil Limited for oil research.

I think this is about all I want to say this evening. There are a few other comments I wanted to make but I shall make them later on.

Mr. F. H. Larson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my congratulations to those offered by hon. members to the gentlemen who have been newly appointed and elevated to various positions. Other hon. members probably know these gentlemen much better than I do and therefore their congratulations may be more heartfelt. However, I am looking forward to working with these hon. gentlemen and I am sure that everything will go quite nicely.

I understand that in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne it is the prerogative of a member to say something about the part of the country from which he comes. I represent the rural constituency of Kindersley, which contains some of the best grain-growing land in Saskatchewan and probably in all western Canada. It also includes land on which people were settled years ago and which perhaps was the wrong type of land for that purpose. By the policies carried on under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has created community pastures in these areas, and where at one time the people were in serious difficulties in trying to grow wheat, at the present time they are carrying on a profitable cattle industry and the country is being rehabilitated.

The Minister of Agriculture under this same prairie farm assistance has been able to take care of certain people living in areas where it has been impossible to grow grain or raise cattle, and it is to be hoped that in the not too distant future it will be possible to provide in the province land to which these people may be moved where they will be able to be self-supporting and lead happy lives without any economic worries.

Another reason for my speaking on this motion is to correct some impressions. Driving from my constituency of Kindersley to Ottawa, I feel after driving for about three days that I am never going to get here. When I get here I realize that when I am at home I am over a thousand miles from the west coast and when I am here I am still another thousand or more miles from the new province of Newfoundland, which I wish to welcome at this time. I then realize how impossible it is for the people of this country to get to know one another intimately.

There are two great land barriers and one fairly extensive water barrier between the various parts of the country. The only way people can get to know one another is through impressions that are created. How do I, coming from the west, impress people who come from the far east or from central Canada?

During the last session the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and one other supporter of the government from Saskatchewan helped to implement sound agricultural policies which had the approval of all the people in western Canada, for whom I shall speak until I conclude. On the other hand, there was another group in this house which, as far as I could see, did absolutely nothing except criticize the policies of the Minister of Agriculture and the government. Down through the years the Minister of Agriculture has represented the west, indeed all of Canada, in this house. He has implemented policies which have received the wholehearted approval of the farmers throughout the west and those of Saskatchewan particularly, as is evidenced by the seating arrangement in this house. Every rural constituency in that province with the exception of two, and one urban constituency, indicated that they endorsed the policies of the government and were behind the Minister of Agriculture. We must conclude that those are policies that the people of the west, particularly those of Saskatchewan, want.

The government headed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) received a mandate from the people of Canada. The Prime Minister is to be congratulated because he did not look to any particular part of the country or any particular group of the people and say that he was going to further their particular interest. He looked at Canada as a whole. He realized that if Canada was to continue to play the part she has played in the past we must work together as a unit.

The western provinces, which are not so large in population or so well developed as those of central Canada, were inspired by that attitude. Instead of always wanting something more, they desire to pull their weight and add to the development of Canada rather than to continually criticize the government and complain that it is not doing enough for them.

The riches of the vast plains of western Canada can fulfil a destiny which is nation-wide if not world-wide in its implications. It has been said in many quarters that the population of Great Britain is too large. From my travels across this country it would appear that if Canada is going to absorb large numbers of suitable immigrants from the old country they must come, generally speaking, to the vast plains of western Canada.

We have heard a good deal in this house about the over-production of wheat, but I think that if the world food situation is reviewed it will be found that there will be plenty of mouths to consume even the maximum food production of this country, provided the mechanics of international trade can be adjusted in order to permit that food to be sent where it is needed. I have every confidence that this government will in the future, as in the past, find means to distribute this food throughout the world, thereby doing a great service to humanity. We have just come through one terrible war and we abhor the thought of another. I believe students of international affairs will agree with me that people who are well fed and have room to live in and expand are hard to stir up to that point of dissatisfaction where they can be recruited into large armies of aggression.

As I have said before, western Canada has the space and is anxious to take its place in the development of the whole country. There is one important factor, however, which has to be taken into consideration before these vast spaces can be utilized to their fullest extent. To put it in simple words, the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta in the main have too small an annual rainfall to permit intensive cultivation in small acreages. While nature has not endowed the west with rainfall, she has endowed it with facilities so that man can create, and is creating, under the leadership of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), conditions whereby small acreages of land can be intensively farmed, thus making many homes for people who are still awaiting the day when they can leave their crowded mother country and come to this great dominion.

These conditions are provided by the water development projects that either have been completed or are under construction on the prairies at the present time. Some hon. members are fully aware of the increased production of various kinds of crops on small acreages which has been going on in Alberta for some time. These projects were started by private companies, but through experience it has been found that this type of development lends itself more to government than to private operation. Consequently the prairie farm rehabilitation organization has taken over most of the Alberta projects at the present time. There is a large area of ideal country in Saskatchewan which will lend itself to irrigation if the final investigations prove the area as promising as the preliminary investigations have done. This area of land can be brought under irrigation by the construction of a dam on the south Saskatchewan river. A good many hon. members have already heard of this project and will probably hear more of it in the future. The attitude of the present representation from Saskatchewan, and indeed the whole of western Canada, is not one of being down and out and wanting the dominion government to be continually spending money on them, as a good many members who came down here in the past few years would apparently have had you believe.

The taxpayers of Saskatchewan realize that, whatever money is spent, they have to pay their share of it. Consequently we are not asking for anything where we do not see a return. What the people of the west are asking is that the dominion government continue to provide the capital cost of various projects so that we can better equip ourselves to meet the problem of the lack of rainfall, and thus provide a place where new Canadians can come and build their homes in the land they have chosen. In this way we can help Canada to fulfil its destiny by helping to provide space for new Canadians, and also help Canada to fulfil its destiny as the provider of adequate food to people who live in overcrowded countries where they cannot adequately provide their own.

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to tell you how thrilled I am at this moment to have the honour and the privilege of making my maiden speech in this house. The distinguished members who have preceded me were much more eloquent than I shall be, and those who follow will surely outdo me in this regard. I crave the forbearance of hon. members, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I shall make my remarks as brief as possible.

(Text):

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, not because I wish to do so as a formality but because I think it is my duty to pay my respects to the Speaker of this honourable assembly, I congratulate you on the very high honour which was bestowed upon you when you were elected to that office. The duties of one who must preside over the debates of so imposing a gathering are numerous, sometimes difficult, and very often it is a thankless task. Your great tact and the experience you have acquired in the past are the guarantee that our deliberations are in very able hands.

(Translation):

I also wish to congratulate my leader, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), for his personal victory of June 27 last. Another pleasant duty of mine, Mr. Speaker, is to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply, the hon. members for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) and Vancouver South (Mr. Laing).

I am happy to start my parliamentary career with the advent of Newfoundland as a tenth province of our great and beautiful country. I am pleased to greet my hon. colleagues, our friends from Newfoundland, who are here to speak on behalf of their electors.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay a tribute to the memory of the late member for Pontiac, Mr. Wally McDonald. No doubt if he were here now he would be pleased to see that my hon. friend from the new riding of Pontiac-Timiskaming (Mr. Proudfoot) and myself have brought back the old Pontiac county into the fold, and on the right side of the house.

(Text):

I think it is appropriate to acquaint hon. members of the house with the new constituency which I have the honour to represent. It came into being in 1947 by virtue of an act of parliament. The name is familiar to all hon. members. It was named after the late Cardinal Villeneuve, a prominent clergyman, a great Canadian, and a prince of the Catholic church, who went out of his way to preach Canadian unity. The new constituency is composed of the northern part of the old riding of Pontiac and includes the whole of the provincial riding of Rouyn-Noranda, part of the riding of Abitibi East, and part of Abitibi West. It is 100 miles in length and its greatest width is 60 miles. In it are to be found the following cities and towns: Rouyn, Noranda, Duparquet, Cadillac, Malartic, Val d'Or, Bourlamaque, Sullivan, and Perron. There are also numerous villages. When one hears those names one realizes that the riding of Villeneuve must have within its boundaries most of the gold and base metal mines of northwestern Quebec. Of twenty-four operating mines, twenty-two are in the constituency of Villeneuve. Twenty-five years ago, within the territory now included in that constituency, there were not more than 1,500 to 2,000 people. Today that area has a population of approximately 60,000. The main industries in my constituency are mining, agriculture and lumbering.

The speech from the throne deals with very important legislation which is to be enacted by this parliament, but it is not my intention to analyse that speech. The mover and seconder of the address, the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing), the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and many other distinguished members have reviewed that legislation, and I only wish to say a few words about two or three items. No doubt you have guessed that I would like to say a few words on the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. Since His Excellency opened the first session of the 21st parliament many countries, including Canada, have devalued their currencies. The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Gibson) gave a statement concerning the continuation of aid under that emergency act, in which he said that the legislation would be amended at the end of the calendar year 1949 and would be abandoned at the end of 1950.

I want to point out to hon. members that the mining industry is very important and should not be permitted to decline; that nothing should be left undone to encourage the discovery of new mines. Prospecting has been on the decline for the last three years or so, owing to the fact that the real prospector, the artisan, the man who may discover a new mine, has not been able to go into the field because of lack of funds and also because of a lack of support on the part of the public. We hope that a revival of public interest will provide prospectors with the necessary money to continue their work and find new mines. I do not believe most people realize that base metal mines are found when the prospector is looking for gold mines. We do not know the exact reason for that, but it is a fact, especially in northwestern Quebec and I believe also in northern Ontario, that all the base metal mines have been found by prospectors looking for gold. We have a good example in the Noranda mine, which was found by a prospector looking for gold. Similarly the Waite Amulet mine, the Golden Manitou, and recently the East Sullivan mine, all were found when prospectors were looking for gold. So it is important that we encourage prospecting.

During the last two or three years many mines in process of development have had to close because of increased costs in wages and materials, and also because the price of their final product was too low. Most important of all, but for the aid given under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act many other producing mines would have been forced to close. Fortunately, however, our government came to their aid.

The bonus given by the government under this emergency legislation may be wrongly interpreted by some hon. members, but I would like them to understand that this industry is very important in my constituency and those surrounding it. Many cities depend upon the gold mines, as well as many towns and villages, so you will realize the importance of keeping them in operation. I hope they will also realize that some day these mines will be a great asset to the country, because mining has become an integral part of the Canadian economy, on which it has an important stabilizing influence.

Immediately following mention of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act in the speech from the throne we see, "Prairie Farm Assistance Act." I wish I might also find mention of a clay belt farm assistance act. I would not want to paint the position of our farmers in black, but I would like to explain to the best of my ability the situation that exists in my constituency and in others along the clay belt which extends from Senneterre in Quebec to Hearst in Ontario. In the riding of Villeneuve farming is a relatively new industry, having been established only some twenty-five years ago. Now many of our farmers are at a stage where they need help and guidance! They need help in connection with their livestock, and in connection with the classification, storage and distribution of their products. Studies of these various problems are now being made by local organizations, but it is only with the help of duly qualified technicians and financial aid from the government that a program of such breadth can be carried out. We have the markets. There are over forty thousand people in the cities and towns I have mentioned. Carloads of such commodities as meat, vegetables, dairy products and poultry come from outside the district and are distributed by many merchants in the different localities. In such a situation you would think the local products would find an outlet. I believe hon. members are aware of the fact, however, that a grocer cannot buy products that are not classified. If he is not assured of a steady flow of products from these farmers, he cannot buy from them.

Our farmers need a distribution centre in which they can find facilities such as slaughter houses, cold storage and good management for the distribution of their products. These facilities are lacking, so the flow of products is not steady. This is partly due to a lack of guidance in distribution. Further progress could be made by a livestock improvement program, jointly operated with a program for the development of grasses. This would enable the farmers of the district to continue the production of livestock on a sustained basis. This applies to other areas along the clay belt as well as to the grey wooded soils of western Canada.

I should like to say a few words about forest conservation, Mr. Speaker. In our district there are many areas of waste land which are called muskegs. These muskegs could be drained and some time in the future covered with a lovely forest. When roads were built and ditches dug through these muskegs, it was found that the water ran away and trees started to grow. In a few years extensive changes were noted in such areas. If studies were made and experiments were undertaken in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, as well as the many other portions of Canada in which we have such waste land, I believe it could be made productive. It is something that should be done.

(Translation):

I do not wish to try the patience of my hon. colleagues. We all have problems, but I intend to emphasize ours because they also happen to be yours.

It is said that the future belongs to Canada. I contend that Canada's future lies north of the 48th parallel. Our fabulous mining resources are as yet virtually untapped. We have huge forests, of incalculable wealth. Agriculture is doing well; with a little assistance, at least of a temporary nature, that part of the country will boast farms second to none.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to thank you for your kindness.

(Text):

Mr. W. R. Kent (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, as another of the elected representatives of the new province of Newfoundland, I trust you will think it not inappropriate if I crave the indulgence of the house while I say a few words on the occasion of my being admitted to the fellowship of this house. I say "fellowship" advisedly because of the warm reception I have received from all hon. members I have met since coming to Ottawa. I wish to thank them for the many kind offices that have been performed for me. I may say that I am quickly getting to feel that I am not a new member, but an old member. I wish to thank all those who have given me such a warm reception and to say that I feel the welcome to me is not only a personal welcome, but a welcome to Newfoundland as well.

May I be permitted to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on your elevation to the high position you now hold? I should like also to congratulate the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing), the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Not making any claims to being a speaker myself, I can well appreciate the eloquence and the delivery exhibited by these speakers in the excellent addresses they presented.

May I also place on the record my congratulations to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on the splendid victory which he achieved on June 27. I can assure him that the radio reports were enthusiastically received in Newfoundland.

I think it a thrilling and splendid thing that the dream of the fathers of confederation has at last been realized. Newfoundland is now a part of Canada and Newfoundlanders can join hands with the peoples of the other provinces from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Vancouver island as a united Canada, truly from ocean to ocean, and play their part with them as fellow Canadians.

During the war years when members of the Canadian forces were part of the visiting forces in Newfoundland, strong individual friendships were formed between men and women of the armed forces of Canada and Newfoundlanders wherever in that country those forces were stationed, and although some time has elapsed since then, these warm friendships still exist and will continue to do so and serve further to strengthen in a personal way the ties of our political and economic union. Yet another bond is that forged in war between the men and women of Newfoundland who served side by side with Canadians in the armed forces of Canada.

At this time, perhaps I may be permitted to say something of the facts which led up to the union of Newfoundland with Canada. As all hon. members no doubt know, before the union with Canada Newfoundland was governed by a form of government known as a commission of government. This government took office in 1934 when the letters patent of Newfoundland were suspended by act of the United Kingdom parliament and a commission of government was set up under new letters patent. It was never contemplated that commission of government should be a permanent form of government in Newfoundland. On or about December 11, 1945, Prime Minister Attlee announced that, to enable the people of the island to come to a free and informed decision as to their future form of government, a national convention would be elected to inquire into the financial and economic position of the island and to make recommendations to His Majesty's government with regard to possible future forms of government for submission to the people in a national referendum. Accordingly in 1946 the national convention was set up in Newfoundland. The act setting up the national convention was Act No. 16 of 1946. Section 3 of that act reads:

> It shall be the duty and function of the convention to consider and discuss among themselves as elected representatives of the people of Newfoundland the changes that have taken place in the financial and economic situation of the island since 1934, and, bearing in mind the extent to which the high revenues of recent years have been due to wartime conditions, to examine the position of the country and to make recommendations to His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom as to possible forms of future government to be put before the people at a national referendum.

The national convention was then set up and its deliberations began. During the course of those deliberations a delegation was sent to Ottawa to discuss the possible terms of confederation.

On motion of Mr. Kent the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

Business of the House

He said: On the order paper tomorrow will appear a bill to amend the Criminal Code. This is a bill coming from the senate. The purpose of these amendments is to adapt the Criminal Code to Newfoundland. I understand that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) has consulted the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and the leaders of the other parties, and that tomorrow he will ask for the unanimous consent of the house to proceed with the various stages of this bill. I understand there is some urgency for the passing of this measure. We shall then take up the debate on the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Supreme Court Act, and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Drew. Later we shall move to go into supply, bringing in three or four new departments, and shall proceed with the estimates of the departments of Agriculture and Justice.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.57 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, September 27, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT

POLLUTION—CONTROL OF INDUSTRIAL PLANTS AND OIL REFINERIES

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to amend and enlarge sections 19, 26 and 28 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. When the act was originally passed it prohibited the pollution of navigable waters by saw mills. Section 19 of the original act prohibited the discharging of sawdust or other waste wood products into navigable waters or waters running into them. The proposed amendment enlarges the list of materials which may not be thrown or discharged into navigable waters, so that it will include oil or oil sludge, chemical wastes or other noxious substances likely to pollute the waters and adjacent shore line.

The second clause of this section deals with the discharging of raw sewage into navigable waters. It prohibits any municipality with a population greater than 3,000 from discharging such material.

Section 26 is amended to provide that the Minister of Transport may, if he deems it advisable, appoint inspectors at any plant situated on or near navigable waters, and these inspectors shall have the power to regulate the operation of the plant in this regard, the cost of such inspection to be borne by the plant in question.

The reasons for the amendments to this act are that during the summer of 1949 pollution by oil and the formation of oil slicks created such a hazard to the residents along the shore of lake Ontario that the medical officers of health in Toronto and many other municipalities had to ban the use of the beaches. Thus, in the Toronto area alone, a million people were denied the use of lake Ontario beaches because of the existence of industrial pollution. Whether this was caused by carelessness or otherwise is not important now; the fact remains that large sections of the shore of lake Ontario were made completely unusable. The loss to wild life was considerable, and the damage to shallow-draft and other shipping was extensive. Furthermore the fire danger, particularly in the congested Toronto harbour area, was increased. Three of the beaches in my own riding of York West were put out of commission for considerable periods, including the beach at New Toronto, where the world champion swimmer, Cliff Lumsden, who subsequently won the marathon swim at the Toronto exhibition, had trained. This destruction of swimming and recreational facilities, particularly, as in this case, during one of the worst heat waves in our history, cannot be tolerated.

I believe it is within the competence of parliament to enact legislation which will safeguard the rights of people who wish to use the waters of our great lakes. The provisions of the bill are directed toward that end.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

CONTROL OF SMOKE AND SOOT FROM ROUNDHOUSES

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7, to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. Chevrier: I think the hon. member should explain the bill.

Mr. Adamson: The purpose of the bill is similar to that of the bill I introduced at the last session of parliament. It differs, however, in this way from the previous one: it requires permanent installations of the railway companies to comply with the smoke by-laws of the municipalities in which they are situated. The residual power is still vested in the board of transport commissioners, thus preventing any discrimination against railway companies. It is felt that where a municipality has enacted and enforced an anti-smoke bylaw in order to safeguard the well-being of the people within its boundaries, the railway companies, as well as other industrial plants, should comply with the local regulations. The present act, and the regulations, which were drafted in 1908, allow the emission of smoke and soot into the atmosphere in quantities which are certainly prejudicial to the neighbourhood in which any roundhouse is situated.

Evidence is being collected in York township and the adjacent area of the city of Toronto, and I hope that when the bill comes up for second reading the government will allow it to go to the railway committee so that all the facts can be brought out, with a view to adopting this or a similar amendment in order to prevent the present great annoyance.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Does it apply to the city of Ottawa, for example?

Mr. Speaker: I should like to point out to hon. members that when a bill is introduced a short explanation may be given, but the bill should not be discussed. See Beauchesne, second edition, reference 738.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISION FOR ADAPTATION TO NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 4 (from the Senate) to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: With the permission of the house I should like to set forth the reasons why it is advisable, if it meets with the approval of hon. members, to have this legislation pass through its three readings today. To this end I spoke yesterday to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), and to the leaders of the other parties, or their representatives.

At the last session a Criminal Code amendment bill was brought in covering a large number of sections, some of them contentious. It was not passed. Later this session it is our intention to bring down a further amendment to the Criminal Code containing these contentious sections, but we have taken out from the contentious sections those dealing with the two matters which are covered by this bill from the Senate.

Item No. 1 deals with the amendments necessary in order to adapt the Canadian Criminal Code to Newfoundland, and which are to be passed in consequence of the admission of that province into confederation.

Item No. 2 is an amendment to defer the coming into force of a new part XVI of the Criminal Code. This new part XVI of the Criminal Code was enacted by a previous parliament in legislation passed some time ago. It enacts that there should be substituted for the existing part XVI a new part dealing with the summary trial of indictable offences by police magistrates. That legislation was to come into effect on October 1, 1949, but we have received from the provincial authorities of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario, British Columbia, and my own province of Manitoba, information that their magistrates' courts are not yet organized to administer part XVI in its proposed new form. They have asked that we, by means of section 8 of the Senate bill now before us, should bring new part XVI into operation, not on October 1, as was originally provided, but by proclamation of the governor general in council. The idea is that they will let us know in due course when they are ready to enforce the new part XVI and then we will put it into effect.

Since these consequential amendments which are introduced in order that the Criminal Code may be brought into effect in Newfoundland, as well as the other matter referred to, are both non-controversial, it was thought there would be no objection on the part of hon. members to having the bill given its three readings today, so that it may be assented to by the governor general and take effect by October 1 next.

Mr. Drew: I should like to mention just two minor points. Section 3 of the bill contains a provision that the Criminal Code shall be amended to read "in the province of Newfoundland, any judge of a district court," etc. The bills introduced to make the Criminal Code applicable to Alberta and Saskatchewan read "a judge of any district court". Is there any significance in that change?

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I think I anticipate the hon. member's point of order.

Mr. Knowles: Standing order 71.

Mr. Speaker: Of course no debate is permitted on first reading of a bill, but I understood that the Minister of Justice was setting forth why he would like the bill to be given all three readings today. Would it meet with the approval of hon. members if we now give the bill first reading and then go on to the motion for second reading?

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Garson: I now move second reading of the bill. Before the motion is dealt with, however, I should like to reply to the question raised by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would remind hon. members that on second reading it is not customary to discuss the clauses of a bill. That is done when the house goes into committee. The only question that may be discussed on second reading is the principle of the bill, and each hon. member is allowed to speak only once in that debate. The minister who has introduced the bill has the right of a reply.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Justice has introduced a bill and has asked for unanimous consent to have it proceeded with. Certainly at some point the minister should answer minor questions which would have a bearing on the consent which may be given. I do not think there is any substantial objection to his suggestion, but this would seem to be an appropriate time for the minister to explain two minor matters, after which there may be no further comment on the measure. I suggest it might be done more appropriately now than in committee, because we are being asked to agree that this bill be given all readings today. I am sure there will be general agreement, but first we should satisfy ourselves as to these minor matters.

Mr. Speaker: I should think that would be generally acceptable to the house. The minister might like to know what questions are being raised, in order that he may answer them. Perhaps the leader of the opposition would ask his questions now.

Mr. Drew: The other point is in regard to the procedure under which the first seven sections of this bill will become operative. I understand that a step will have to be taken under the terms of agreement with Newfoundland in order to make these amendments applicable. I should think it would be of interest to hon. members from Newfoundland to know what steps will be taken outside of this bill to bring about that result.

Mr. Garson: That was the second question?

Mr. Drew: Yes; those are the two points.

Mr. Garson: So far as the first question is concerned, I do not think there is any substantial difference in meaning between subsection (iva) as contained in section 3 of the Senate bill, where it says "any judge of a district court", and the language to which the hon. gentleman referred, "a judge of any district court", as used in connection with another province. I might add that the question of the district court judges is still in the course of negotiation, even with regard to their number. Many of them have yet to be appointed, so it may turn on that point; but I do not think there is any difference in substance at all.

With regard to the question of bringing this bill into effect, as I indicated on a previous occasion,—to which I suppose I am not permitted to refer—in dealing with amendments to our statute law consequent upon Newfoundland's entering into confederation, from the beginning there has been the closest co-operation and consultation between the law officers of the Department of Justice and the law officers of Newfoundland, and that will be continued in connection with the application of the Criminal Code. In connection with part XVI, for instance, it is necessary that the Criminal Code should be put into effect as soon as possible, but not until the provincial authorities are ready to administer it. In the meantime, of course, the criminal law of Newfoundland remains as it is.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I want to refer to just a few matters on the second reading of this bill, which has come to us from another place. I believe this is the same bill that was before us a short time ago, relating to Newfoundland. At that time, when we were assembled here before Easter, I suggested to the Attorney General (Mr. Garson) that we should have in this house a legal committee to consider this and other similar bills. Some two years ago I asked the hon. gentleman's predecessor, in connection with this very matter of Newfoundland, whether he would consider setting up what they have in the various provinces—a legal committee which would properly consider bills of this kind, of which we have a large number. Some originate in this house; some come from "another place", which is the term they are now applying to the other house of parliament. There were some twenty of these bills during the last session. The provinces have found it a good thing to have such a committee. It goes over these bills; it has the law officers of the crown in attendance; it hears deputations of various kinds representing people interested in these matters.

It must be remembered that large numbers of people are concerned with these legal bills. Look at the fatalities resulting from the fact that we do not have such a committee. Look at the accidents on the highways and level crossings. I understood the minister's predecessor to say he would consider setting up such a committee. Then, as I said, I asked the present minister, who is also the Attorney General of Canada, whether he would consider it, and I thought he said he would. In my opinion such a committee would be a great help to the minister.

I cannot find any record of this bill having been sent to any committee in the other place, but it had summary discussion by three or four members of that chamber, and finally it was passed and sent to this house.

There are two or three things I should like to point out about Newfoundland. Newfoundland has become the tenth province of confederation. At the time, that province was under the jurisdiction of the British parliament and had a commission form of government which governed Labrador as well. Two years ago there was a discussion in this house about Labrador's natural resources—I was on the committee. Until recently Newfoundland had no parliamentary form of government. What is it proposed to give to the tenth province through this bill? It is supposed to be dealing with amendments to the Criminal Code, but it deals also with a large number of other matters.

I point out what has been said in the British parliament by Right Hon. Sir Hartley Shawcross. Mr. Churchill asked for law reform, and referred to the fact that of the 40,000 orders in council which had been passed, only three or four had reached finality in the privy council. You have been a great lawyer, Mr. Speaker, and, occupying the high office you do, you must appreciate the fact that no one knows the law contained in those 40,000 orders in council until it is finally decided in the court of last resort. Nearly 80,000 orders in council were passed here during the war.

The Attorney General of the United Kingdom was asked by the leader of the opposition, Mr. Churchill, about the state of the law. He said law reform was needed. Surely Newfoundland is entitled to some law reform. Years ago Canada was granted the right to abolish criminal appeals to the privy council. In the British House of Commons there was a discussion on means of securing finality on law reform. Law reform has been talked about in this country, but we have had no semblance of it. A private member can raise these questions in the house, but that is the end of it. As I said before, there were some 40,000 orders in council passed by the British House of Commons, but no one knew the exact state of the law. No one can be sure of the law until there has been a final determination by the privy council.

This is the sort of law you are giving to Newfoundland. Automatically Newfoundland is being given the laws to which she has been objecting. That is the point to which I am objecting in relation to this bill. I believe the bill should be re-introduced in this house, and a legal committee should be set up to consider it. I want to help the government, and I am giving them a constructive suggestion, namely, to beware of the law that is passed on to the tenth province. It is my understanding that this province has one small jail, and only a small percentage of the population has ever occupied it. I am told that a number of prisons in Great Britain have been closed. What means was used to do this? An opportunity was given offenders to delay the payment of fines.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Sections 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

[Mr. Church.]

On section 5—Absolute jurisdiction in certain cases.

Mr. Fraser: May I ask the purpose of setting out the cities of Saint John, Fredericton and Moncton in the province of New Brunswick? Have they laws which permit of a different arrangement?

Mr. Garson: I am not sure that I heard the whole of my hon. friend's question; if I misinterpret it, I hope he will correct me. The purpose of this amendment, as is stated in the explanatory notes, is to extend to Newfoundland the provisions of paragraph (c) of subsection 1 of section 777, whereby magistrates are given absolute jurisdiction, without the consent of the accused, to try certain indictable offences. Such jurisdiction is not as a rule given to magistrates in small centres in certain provinces. It is for this reason that those cities are set forth in subsection (c) of clause 5 of the bill.

Mr. Fraser: There is that difference in New Brunswick, whereby only certain ones are selected?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Church: How many magistrates are there in Newfoundland now, and how many is it proposed to have? Powers are given to magistrates which, with all due respect, I believe should not be given. The jurisdiction granted by this section is rather wide; it permits a magistrate to try grave offences. In England I believe the maximum sentence a magistrate can give is thirty days.

By this bill you are giving a magistrate all the powers of a county court judge. According to the marginal notes, the purpose of the amendment is to extend to Newfoundland the provisions of paragraph (c) of subsection (1) of section 777, whereby magistrates are given absolute jurisdiction, without the consent of the accused, to try certain indictable offences. It is my belief that magistrates in Ontario should not have this jurisdiction. Some grave cases are brought before magistrates, most of whom are not like the late Colonel Denison, who was senior magistrate, and the late Judge Morson, who presided over the first and tenth division courts. There are four or five county court judges doing the work Judge Morson used to do in the first and tenth division court. I object to conferring this jurisdiction upon magistrates in Newfoundland. It will necessitate the maintenance of a huge system which that province does not need. A county court judge could do this work.

I object to the system that is now operated in the city of Toronto, whereby magistrates, instead of trying a case and rendering a decision, merely remand the accused into custody for a week. There is no place to put the accused. The Don jail and the isolation hospital are located in my constituency. For many years attempts have been made to have them removed. The city of Toronto built two jail farms, one for men and one for women, and at that time it was never intended they should be handed over to anyone else. When I was in charge of the affairs of the city, these two farms were built and the old jail was to be torn down, but it is still there, as hon. members know. I should like the minister to see it. About 400 people are in there; some of them are youths, and some are older. Under the system followed by some of the magistrates, where they remand a man for a week or two weeks, they allow him to get a taste of what the jail is like over there. It was built shortly after confederation. It was condemned when I was a controller. Dr. Hastings, a former health officer, said it was not fit for human beings. It has cell accommodation which is no larger than about the width of this table. It is equipped to handle only about 180 persons, and there are three or four hundred there now. I am objecting to that situation. When Mr. Hepburn was premier of the province he would not allow us to qualify for the fund which was in existence in your province, Mr. Chairman, under which the dominion gave a grant for public buildings. Three Rivers obtained a courthouse. We did not get anything. I ask the minister to consider carefully before he fastens this system on the people of Newfoundland—who have always been law-abiding—without their consent.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Is it the idea held by the law officers that there will be what we call travelling stipendiaries, or something of the kind? I am speaking of the quality of the people who will be giving judgment.

Mr. Garson: Yes. Newfoundland had a system of magistrates prior to coming into confederation. At the request of the attorney general of Newfoundland we at this moment have an officer of the Department of Justice conferring with the attorney general's department in Newfoundland with regard to the judicial system by means of which the Criminal Code will be administered in that province. While it has not yet definitely taken shape, and the purpose of this consultation is to determine its main outlines, it is thought that it will take the form in part of magistrates who will be located at various central points and travel out from these points to hear cases.

As I have no doubt they have been in the past, these will be men of good judgment and discretion, well qualified to exercise jurisdiction under section 777. This section, as the hon. member for Calgary West knows, deals with indictable offences such as theft, attempted theft, aggravated assault and indecent assault which, in larger centres only in some provinces, in the whole province in others, and not at all in other provinces, can be tried by the magistrates without the consent of the accused. This law has been applicable, in varying degrees, in all the provinces of Canada up until the present time. The only significance and the only purpose of this present amendment is simply to apply to Newfoundland this same law that has always been in force in the rest of Canada; it is not to make any alteration in the law. Magistrates or other judicial officers who are not competent to deal with cases of this kind will not be appointed.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I agree entirely with what the minister has in mind. From the little I know about the settlement of Newfoundland, it is largely along the seacoast. The thought occurred to me that perhaps travelling stipendiaries might be appointed. They have them in Saskatchewan, I know.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I thought perhaps we could expect that that would be done.

Having regard to what is probably in the mind of the hon. member for Broadview, I was wondering about the limitation there might be on giving what is really very wide authority to a magistrate—because tremendous authority is given in this section. As I remember it, a magistrate is defined in the code as having the power of two justices of the peace, and I think there is a further definition which in certain cases does not permit those two justices of the peace to act, but rather a paid magistrate so to speak, who is generally a man with legal training; only to him would go cases of the kind we are now referring to. It would be a desperate thing, it seems to me, if we clothed an incompetent, or, to use a less unkind word, untrained person with the tremendous authority which is given there.

As will be observed, wounding is one of the offences dealt with, or assault occasioning actual bodily harm—one or the other. I know there is a distinction between the two, and I do not remember which one is within the offences dealt with; but serious offences come to them for hearing. It seems to me, in view of the spirit of comity which no doubt exists between the dominion justice officers and those of the provinces, consideration might be given to having travelling stipendiaries; otherwise you must take the prisoner all over the country, adding to the difficulties, to say nothing of the expense. I hope that is what is contemplated here, so that inconvenience may not be caused to many people other than the accused—and he is probably entitled to be discommoded at times.

Mr. Garson: I am in a rather embarrassing position to forecast what will happen because this whole matter is now under consideration. I believe there is an excellent prospect, shall I say, of appointment being made of the kind of magistrate that the hon. member for Calgary West has in mind. He will see in the bill the definition of magistrate for the purpose of part XVI of the code; it is at the top of page 2. It reads:

In the province of Newfoundland a magistrate means and includes any judge of a district court,—

I am sure he would agree that any judge of a district court would be competent to try these cases.

—any stipendiary magistrate, any two justices sitting together, and any functionary or tribunal having the powers of two justices.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): It is the last part of it that I was a little bit afraid of.

Mr. Carroll: I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Justice the fact that there seems to be a drastic change, so far as Newfoundland is concerned, in the matter of persons charged with crime and wishing to have a speedy trial. I understand that in the province of Newfoundland all supreme court judges are located at and live in the capital, St. John's. If a person is charged with a crime at a place five or six hundred miles from St. John's where there is a district court judge—I do not know their locations down there, but I know there are some in the country—it would take a long time, I should think, for that person to come in to St. John's in order to get a speedy trial. I should like the Minister of Justice to give some consideration to this matter. The suggestion would come better from the lawyers of Newfoundland than from me, but it is just a thought. I am fairly well acquainted with the situation in Newfoundland. It will be inconvenient for criminals—not that we are here to make it convenient for them, but we are here at least to give them speedy trial—it will be inconvenient for those away beyond the bounds of the capital city to get a speedy trial if they can get it only by going before a supreme court judge in St. John's.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The accused is probably in the only jail there is, which is in St. John's.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

Mr. Garson: That is one of the most important questions which the representative of the justice department and the representatives of the attorney general's department of Newfoundland are studying at the present time. They are considering how many supreme court and district court judges will be required, and whether they should go on circuit for the purpose of conducting speedy trials. It is a matter which requires careful consideration, to balance, on the one hand, the convenience of the accused, and, on the other, in a province where there are great distances, the efficient carrying out, at not too great expense, of the administration of justice.

Mr. Coldwell: In Canada a great deal of confusion exists through the use of the term "supreme court." I believe one or two of the provinces have named their courts differently. In order to avoid this confusion, could some arrangement not be made with the provinces to reserve the name "supreme court" for the court of last resort in Canada? Some who speak of the supreme court mean the Supreme Court of Canada, and others mean the supreme court of one of the provinces. We should try to have separate names for the provincial courts.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid that would be infringing on provincial rights, and for that reason we may not be able to comply with the hon. member's request. Under the British North America Act, the setting up of provincial courts comes within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. Coldwell: I said by arrangement or agreement.

Sections 6 and 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Coming into force.

Mr. MacInnis: Early this year I received a copy of a letter from the city council of Vancouver which had been sent by the deputy attorney general of British Columbia to the deputy minister of justice asking for the postponement of this legislation. I would not take the time of the committee to make the point now except for the fact that, by this amendment, the amendment to part XVI is to come into effect by proclamation. This may be a neat way of deferring the provision so that it will never come into effect. The Minister of Justice shakes his head. I take it that that is not what he has in mind. One of the important reasons put forward by the deputy attorney general of British Columbia—and it was also emphasized by the city council of Vancouver—was that if this amendment went into effect it would result in the loss of revenue to the municipality.

When I received the letter from the city council, with the enclosures, including a copy of the letter to the deputy minister of justice, I did as I always do. Not being learned in the law, I wanted to know what the Minister of Justice said when he introduced the amending legislation in 1948. I have high regard for the then minister of justice, and I would require strong arguments before I would disagree with his conclusions on a matter of this kind. What he said on that occasion was brief, and I made it a part of my letter to the city authorities in Vancouver. He said as reported at page 5193 of Hansard of June 14, 1948:

> In part XVI, at the present time magistrates in towns of over 2,500 population have jurisdiction that magistrates in towns under 2,500 do not have. Then there are some provisions for cities over 25,000. At the present time the provisions are very complicated indeed. Continual complaints are made about the necessity to ascertain population of a town or a city, and complaints about magistrates having jurisdiction in certain municipalities. The important change is that under Part XVI at the present time there are indictable offences for which an accused person may be tried by a magistrate, whether he consents or not. He does not have the option of trial by jury. If this amendment is passed, then he could not be tried by a magistrate without his consent. That is an important change.

That is what Mr. Ilsley said in explaining the purpose of this amendment when the bill came before the house. If, as the deputy attorney general of British Columbia maintains, this would mean a loss of revenue to the municipality, surely it is neither here nor there. The important thing is that the accused should have an opportunity of saying how he shall be tried; we should not make our courts the means of raising revenue for the municipality. I said this categorically to the city of Vancouver. As I have watched the imposing of sentences in the courts I have come to the conclusion that when a fine is levied, and it cannot be paid, a prison sentence is imposed, so that really in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred when a person is fined, or given the option of a jail sentence, he is jailed not for the crime but because he is unable to pay the fine. In other words he is jailed for being poor and not for having committed a crime. I urge upon the minister that he see that if this section of the bill is passed it be not used as a convenient way of killing the legislation. If justice is to be meted out, the accused must be taken into consideration, not the revenue that may be gained or lost to the city.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask whether, if this section passes, the governor in council will have to wait until all the provinces want to have the act proclaimed, or will it be possible to proclaim it for such provinces as are ready for it?

Mr. Garson: I think I should preface my answer to that question by saying that the new part XVI was introduced with the intention that it would come into effect in the ordinary course of events and be the law of the country, and it has been so received by those other provinces. I am told, and I believe, that they have made the best efforts they can to get their house in order so that they can do a good job of administering the new part XVI. Our hope is that with what they have already done they will finally achieve competence to administer the new part XVI. We would not wish to discommode anyone by delay in proclaiming the new part XVI. We are keeping in contact with the provinces and we intend to encourage any provinces that seem to be hanging back in preparing to take over the administration of that part.

Section agreed to.

Mr. Riley: With the permission of the Minister of Justice I should like to revert to section 5, where reference is made to "the cities of St. John, Fredericton and Moncton in the province of New Brunswick". If my memory serves me correctly, the corporate name of the city of Saint John does not permit any abbreviation such as appears in the subsection. We are jealous of the spelling of the name of our city. In addition, there might be grounds for taking a technical objection. Although a rose by any other name might smell as sweet, we should like to maintain the proper spelling of the name of our city.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Substitute "fish" for "rose" and you have it.

Mr. Riley: I do not know who was representing my city when the original subsection was passed, but there would seem to be definite evidence of a progressive conservation of print.

Mr. Garson: I think the hon. member's point is well taken. I would move that the word "St." be struck out and the word "Saint" substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LONG BRANCH RIFLE RANGES—COMPLAINTS AS TO SMOKE, EXPLOSIONS, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I wish to ask the Minister of National Defence a question, of which I have given him notice. Last night and today urgent communications have been coming in to me by telephone and telegram from people who live in Lakeview, Ontario, a heavily populated area in which the Long Branch rifle ranges are located, protesting against the military operations carried out yesterday at the ranges. Heavy explosions are said to have occurred which shook the buildings over a wide section of the area, and dense smoke covered the district. Planes swept low over schools and homes as well. Will the minister make inquiries with a view to protecting the residents of this locality against future occurrences of this kind and give further consideration to changing the location of the ranges to a less populated area?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I received notice of this question at quarter to three, not having been in my office when it was delivered. In the time since, I have been able to communicate with two senior officers of the army and air force, as well as a senior civilian official, who were present yesterday when this demonstration took place. Based on those inquiries, which represent the information available to me at this time, I may say it appears that five 3-inch and five 4·2-inch mortar shells were fired in this demonstration. In the opinion of these officials they landed at least three-quarters of a mile from the nearest house.

There seems to be some justification for the complaint concerning smoke, which, it was said, was about equal to what would result from a neighbourhood grass fire. Some Lancaster, Vampire and Mustang planes participated in this demonstration. The reports of low flying probably refer to a Lancaster which was demonstrating on the beach of lake Ontario the dropping of Lindholme life-saving gear, and were flying close to the water.

I asked these officers and this civilian if they had any cause for alarm or concern about what they saw, and they said they had not. Viewing the demonstration were some three hundred representatives of industry who were members of the Canadian Industrial Preparedness Association, and none of them appeared to see any reason for making comment or indicating any cause for concern. However, the fact of the hon. member's bringing this to my attention emphasizes the need for the utmost care not to disturb the population in centres of this kind, and I shall see that instructions go out accordingly.

With regard to that part of his question as to the possibility of moving the Long Branch rifle ranges, I may say that this matter has been brought up on a number of occasions in the past. The department and myself have indicated that we should be very glad to recommend to the government the removal of the Long Branch rifle ranges to some other suitable location that would be equally accessible and equally serviced, if that could be done without cost to the government.

LOTTERIES

QUESTION AS TO PROPOSED PROVINCIAL ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Is the government taking notice of the declared intention of one of the provincial governments to defy the Criminal Code in the matter of lotteries? What stand is the federal government taking in this matter?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I have no information other than that set out in newspaper reports, and under the circumstances I consider it inappropriate to make any comments.

INCOME TAX

QUESTION AS TO ALLOWANCE OF TRADE UNION DUES AS DEDUCTION FROM TAXABLE INCOME

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has served to remind me that on September 16 he addressed a question to the Minister of National Revenue and myself in the following terms:

> In view of the recent favourable decision by the exchequer court, what action will the government take to provide for the allowing of trade union dues as a deduction from taxable income for income tax purposes?

In reply to the part of the question which applies to my department, may I say that the exchequer court decision referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was in connection with a claim by a taxpayer that, in computing his 1945 income tax, union dues should be properly deductible in computing his income. The exchequer court upheld the claim, just as in two previous cases they had upheld the claim that fees paid to professional organizations were deductible by lawyers, even though they were receiving salary income.

The hon. member may recall that following these previous decisions in the Bond and Rutherford cases the Income War Tax Act was amended in 1948 to bring it into line with the previous general interpretation of the law, namely, that wages and salaries were net income for tax purposes. The law as amended in 1948 to conform with previous practice was carried forward into the new act.

My colleague the Minister of National Revenue will answer the question in so far as it relates to years prior to 1948.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The judgment of the exchequer court in the case of Cooper v. the Minister of National Revenue was in respect of the 1945 taxation year. In respect of claims by taxpayers for that year, and for the years 1946 and 1947, which are not statute barred, the department will make adjustments in accordance with the exchequer court decision.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, since it is not possible to pursue this matter on the orders of the day, I will do so on another occasion.

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY

APPLICATION FOR RATE INCREASE IN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the Bell Telephone Company applied to the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada for an increase in rates in Ontario and Quebec? If so, can the minister tell the house the status of the application?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The answer to the first question is no. The answer to the second question is: Answered by the answer to the first question.

Mr. Knowles: Something's fishy.

INQUIRY OF MINISTRY

REFERENCE TO "TRAIN OF TOMORROW"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the Canadian government or the Canadian National Railways considering the purchase of a "Train of Tomorrow" for the benefit of the Ontario and Quebec members? It is urgent, because they will need it on Thursday.

SUPREME COURT ACT

VARIOUS AMENDMENTS—ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL

The house resumed, from Friday, September 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): I wish to continue what I was saying the other day and address the house on this measure. In the few minutes left at my disposal I desire to reassert some of the prineiples which I hold as to this particular bill. In the first place I wish to state that I was not offering any criticism of my leader the other day when I said to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), who introduced the bill, that it was a strange proceeding. It was a very strange proceeding. I could not get a copy of the English version of the bill until some time after its introduction. The French version was not printed. In many respects the situation was similar to that which existed as to the Bell Telephone bill of 1947 in the other place. That bill was not printed in English and French. They only had a typewritten copy and they gave second reading to it. If we are to have rules, let us abide by them in this house and in the other place.

I should like to refer to what the minister said on the second reading of the bill on the 20th of September. I want to ask him if now is the proper time to introduce such a measure. It is nothing but a political bill. It is a coercion bill. Sir Wilfrid Laurier never introduced such a bill. It simply is a bill to coerce the two central provinces to accept something in which they do not believe. I can tell you that I have been opposed to such bills from the beginning, from the time when Mr. Cahan was in the house. I wish to point out to the house that we should have a legal committee to consider these bills word by word. Nobody knows what the language is. The other day I referred to what they did in England where, out of 40,000 orders in council, only four ever came before the court of last resort. In Canada only three or four out of 120,000 orders in council passed during the war have come before the Supreme Court of Canada. How can anybody know the law? There is no finality to it.

I object to the bill on the ground that the matters involved are only secondary. I named them on Friday. They are secondary matters which can be easily delayed. We should have a legal committee to go over such bills clause by clause and examine them word by word. We should have a proper committee to consider them. It is in the interests of the minister to have one. I do not know why he does not have such a committee. The matters involved are only secondary until such time as the primary matters are dealt with. For that reason I moved the six months hoist for the four bills that were introduced in the last four sessions by a private member of the house.

A much wider bill has now been introduced by a minister of the crown. I should like to ask him if this is the method that Canada should adopt in order to be free? Is it the life, the truth and the way for a young nation of only eleven million people at this time? Is the method proposed by the government the only way? My answer to that is that it is not the only way. It is neither the time nor the life nor the truth nor the way, and this young nation should not follow such a course.

There are going to be nine judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. The United States, with a population of 138 million people, has only that number. Canada, with a population of a little over eleven million, is going to put on the airs and manners of a great nation and deal with status, autonomy and sovereignty. "Sovereignty" is the new word that is used. Away back in 1891 Sir John A. Macdonald said, "We govern ourselves as we please".

Canada is independent of the mother country. They have never tried to interfere with us. Sir John A. Macdonald said:

> For a century and a half this country has grown and flourished under the protecting aegis of the British crown. Under the broad folds of the union jack, we enjoy the most ample liberty, we govern ourselves as we please, and at the same time we participate in the advantages which flow from association with the mightiest empire the world has ever seen.

He goes on to refer to the matter in that way. On the 30th of June, 1942, I said in the house, referring to the visit of the king and queen to Canada in 1939:

> The visit in May, 1939, three months before the war, showed the great popularity of the king and queen in their visit here, but the decline and decay of our parliamentary institutions had already set in, because of the fact that we had surrendered our rights and privileges and functions to bureaucratic boards of all kinds and to the executive, especially under the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley).

I pointed out that was a serious mistake. Sir John A. Macdonald dealt with that question, and very properly so. As I said during the debate on the Cahan bill, we want a British North America Act for the living and not for the dead, a British North America Act brought up to date to meet changed conditions. The only way to do that is by a conference with all the provinces, as they seem to have had a pact or contract when they came into confederation. Especially do we need this now in 1949. After two long wars the subjects of education and public health should be written into the original B.N.A. Act. Until recently Canada had only a skeleton health department, although it did good work particularly with reference to immigrants. I support the motion of my leader for the six months hoist. I moved such a motion against similar proposals when privy council bills were introduced by private members. At that time I wanted a legal committee of the two houses of parliament to consider such measures, or a legal committee of the House of Commons. We should have had one long ago in the house. When Mr. Ilsley was Minister of Justice he said he would consider my proposals, and I understood the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) to say that he would do so too.

There are certain economic truths in connection with this measure, and I believe they should be applied here. We should have the maintenance of internal law and order so that men may reap what they sow. We should have impartial justice administered by the judiciary, freedom from interference and oppression on the part of the executive. You should not be afraid to tell the people you made a mistake, because these days the people do not expect their rulers to be gods. Always tell the people the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. You can ask them to make sacrifices, without fear; but you cannot ask them to accept the sort of things that are in this bill.

This seems to be a conflict of lawyers. Sir Allen Aylesworth did not believe in this procedure. He was Minister of Justice in this house, probably the most able man we ever had. He used to appear before the court of appeal when I was a law student; and he was a great friend of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). At times he would have the whole docket to himself. He had a great sense of humour, which is a wonderful thing for any man to have. About a quarter to five in the afternoon he would say, "Now, my lords, we have been sitting since ten o'clock this morning, and there are certain places that close at five o'clock in the afternoon." I do not know what those places were; they may have been department stores or other places but the appeal judges would all laugh at this act. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick was also minister of justice and attorney general of Canada and later lieutenant governor of Quebec. He was Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, a great lawyer; and he disagreed with the present government on this matter. So did my right hon. friend the Prime Minister when he was president of the bar association, and there have been many others, including Sir Lomer Gouin, former minister of justice and former premier of Quebec. Here is what the Lord said about lawyers in Luke 11, verses 43 to 47:

> 43 Woe unto you, Pharisees! for ye love the uppermost seats in the synagogues, and greetings in the markets.
> 44 Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye are as graves which appear not, and the men that walk over them are not aware of them.
> 45 Then answered one of the lawyers, and said unto him, Master, thus saying thou reproachest us also.
> 46 And he said, Woe unto you also, ye lawyers! for ye lade men with burdens grievous to be borne, and ye yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers.

47 Woe unto you! for ye build the sepulchres of the prophets, and your fathers killed them.

Then later:

52 Woe unto you, lawyers! for ye have taken away the key of knowledge: ye entered not in yourselves, and them that were entering in ye hindered.

53 And as he said these things unto them, the scribes and the Pharisees began to urge him vehemently, and to provoke him to speak of many things:

54 Laying wait for him, and seeking to catch something out of his mouth, that they might accuse him.

Then in chapter 12, in regard to hypocrisy:

25 And which of you with taking thought can add to his stature one cubit?

27 Consider the lilies how they grow: they toil not, they spin not; and yet I say unto you, that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.

34 For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also.

Those are the words of scripture, which were quoted in the other house by Sir Allen Aylesworth, who also quoted the Acts of the Apostles, which were written by the great prophet St. Luke. Here we have a division of lawyers. Fortunately, perhaps, this is not going to be dealt with by lawyers alone. When similar bills were introduced by hon. members to my left I moved the six months hoist. Many years ago, when Mr. Cahan introduced similar legislation, I also opposed it. At that time I said the Supreme Court of Canada was constituted by parliament under certain provisions contained in the act, which I read the other day and need not repeat at this time.

They had a situation like this in Quebec, and even away down in Louisiana. We all remember what happened down there, when Mr. Roosevelt was the great president of the United States and Huey Long was a supporter of his. As you will remember, Mr. Speaker, Louisiana was purchased by the United States from another country; but when Huey Long came into power he simply wiped out the treaty and everything else. The same thing would have happened in Quebec but for the privy council, which has always been the protector of the rights of the provinces and the municipalities. The other day in this house I was referring to the case of the Toronto Electric Commissioners v. Snider. First it was dealt with by a learned county court judge of the county of Wentworth, a great lawyer. He gave a decision, following which an application was made to Mr. Justice Mowat for a mandatory injunction, which was refused. Then the parties went to the Toronto assizes, where there was a trial and again the plaintiff lost. After that the matter was taken to the court of appeal, where the appeal was dismissed. That was the third defeat for the city. After that they did not bother to come here to this famous court; they asked for leave to appeal to the privy council, and leave was given. Following that appeal Lord Haldane gave an important decision, which helped the whole country. It was a declaration in regard to property and civil rights in the provinces. That judgment declared that the provinces were supreme; that matters between employers and employees came directly under the provinces, under section 92 of the British North America Act; and by that judgment the Lemieux act was upset.

The legislation before us today is directly opposed to that principle. I say it is also against the principles of Liberalism. It would be far better if we had a legal committee. It would be better if the minister would accept the suggestion of the leader of the opposition that we should have a joint committee of both houses to rewrite this statute. Certainly that would keep this government and the minister out of trouble, because the country is not ready for this yet. Our people are not going to make a scrap of paper out of the British North America Act. Why should we do that at the present time? We want an act for the living, not for the dead. How can the private members of this house, many of whom have come here from municipal councils, support a bill like this? I can tell you this, that although the government desires the passing of this bill, I do not believe it will ever be passed because this is not the proper moment for it.

There are one or two other matters I should like to mention. I agree entirely with the stand taken by Premier Duplessis in a speech he made the other day at the opening of a bridge. He said that although there are ten provinces there is only one province with a minority and that is the province of Quebec. The premier of Quebec says he is going to guard against any encroachment on provincial rights.

I quote from a newspaper report of the speech by Premier Duplessis:

In his speech, Premier Duplessis recalled the memory of the St. Eustache patriots, who, in 1837, fought to obtain responsible government, also events of 1841, when Quebec and Ontario were united, only to fail to come to reach accord on major national questions. In 1867, he said, representatives of the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, had agreed on a confederative pact, handing over to a central government powers to deal with national problems, but retaining unto themselves the full authority to deal with matters pertaining to the protection of their rights and privileges. It was a pact, a contract, not a statute, as suggested by Prime Minister St. Laurent, a pact that could not be changed without the full consent of the parties concerned, signatories to the pact.

Mr. Ferguson, when he was premier of Ontario, was opposed to the passing of any measure such as this. I have always opposed these changes, and I believe that this is simply a coercion bill.

In 1896 the Laurier government came into office as a result of the general election which was held in June of that year. It so happened that education was not a federal burden but a matter expressly for the province. The Greenway government in Manitoba abolished separate schools in that province, and it was decided that Ottawa could disallow any provincial statute. Section 93 of the British North America Act says that the province can make laws exclusively on education. If it is the desire of the government to write a new British North America Act, then let it be done in the same manner as it was accomplished in the first place. The inclusion of the tenth province should be a fine opportunity. I do not believe in this way of doing business. The privy council has rendered decisions on sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act, and some such independent body is needed to pass judgment in cases of this type. I do not believe there is any Canadian body that could give such decisions.

There are Canadians who are members of the imperial privy council. The meetings of this body are held in a private room and gowns are not worn. It has been stated that its central location is the only reason the privy council meets in London. In conclusion, may I say that I do not believe in this manner of doing business. The government will be sorry they ever touched this matter. I represent a large body of public opinion in this country that believes this is not the time, during the dollar-pound crisis, to give the mother country a black eye. This seems to be a separatist movement.

During the first war a million men went from this country, and what was good enough for them is good enough for those of us who stayed at home. I do believe the moment is not opportune for the passing of such a bill and this house would be well advised to let the matter stand for a year.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Témiscouata): I am sorry to have to disagree with the member for Broadview (Mr. Church). He has such a positive mind, I cannot understand how he could support a negative amendment such as the one sponsored by his leader. Perhaps he has forgotten that seventy-four years ago, when the supreme court bill was adopted, the then minister of justice drew the attention of the house to the fact that the privy council was no longer a court of prerogative. An English statute had changed it into a court of judicature.

[Mr. Church.]

Seventy-four years ago, the minister of justice said he hoped that before long appeals to the privy council would be abolished. At that time, Mr. Speaker, an amendment to that effect was moved by Mr. Irving, who was a British-born reformer. It is exactly the same language as section 54 of the Supreme Court Act, which reads as follows:

> The judgment of the court shall, in all cases, be final and conclusive, and no appeal shall be brought from any judgment or order of the court to any court of appeal established by the parliament of Great Britain and Ireland by which appeals or petitions to His Majesty in council may be ordered to be heard, saving any right which His Majesty may be graciously pleased to exercise by virtue of his royal prerogative.

The only change was that in the amendment moved by Mr. Irving seventy-four years ago "His Majesty" was "Her Majesty". The obvious reason for the last part of this amendment, which is now section 54 of the act—> —saving any right which His Majesty may be graciously pleased to exercise by virtue of his royal prerogative.

—is that the imperial act, which had been passed in 1874 and was supposed to come into effect in the autumn of that year, was postponed until late in 1875. The Supreme Court Act was sanctioned on April 8, 1875, and the imperial statute changing the court of prerogative into a court of judicature in England came into force several months later. It was entirely due to that interval of time that the reservation was made in the last line of section 54 of the act, which was section 47 of the original act, 38 Victoria, chapter 11.

If the leader of the opposition had read the reports of the debate of 1875 concerning the establishment of the supreme court he would have enjoyed reading the following remarks by the then minister of justice, as they appear at page 286 of Hansard of 1875.

> In view of the law recently passed in England, which was intended to have come into effect on the 1st November, 1874, but the operation of which had been postponed up to 1st November next, establishing a supreme court of judicature, he thought the realization of his desire in respect to this matter was likely to be fulfilled. Under this law the jurisdiction of the judicial committee of the privy council would be transferred to the Supreme Court of Judicature sitting in London. He did not think the right of appeal would not then be prized so much as it was now, because the new court in London would be a court of law, and not as the privy council is, a court of prerogative. He would like very well to see a clause introduced declaring that this right of appeal to the privy council existed no longer. There were very strong reasons in favour of the right of appeal to the privy council, but the reasons against it were still stronger. The right of appeal had been rather extensively used, and he might add, considerably abused in the province of Quebec, by wealthy men and wealthy corporations to force suiters to compromise in cases in which they had succeeded in all the tribunals of the country. However, as he had already said, he had made no mention of the matter in the bill now before the house, but left it to be disposed of at some future time.

He had preserved in the bill some provisions which had been put there by Sir John A. Macdonald, who was then the member for Kingston. This happened on February 23, 1875. I shall read further at page 755, from the remarks of the then minister of justice. But before I do so hon. members might be interested to have me point out—and it may surprise the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew)—that everything was said in the third person. The word "I" was ignored. When the then minister of justice was speaking, he was speaking in the third person of the singular, of course. At page 755 we find the following:

He foresaw that at a day not distant, the appeal to the privy council would end, and he would not be so anxious to have this measure passed. After January next, instead of an appeal to the foot of the throne, as it was termed, we could only appeal to a statutory court in England.

Something which has been done for seventy-four years. I find it more interesting to read the debate on the Supreme Court Act than to quote any excerpt from Mr. Teece or Elliott Roosevelt about the change in the law.

I shall not speak for long, but I shall give two reasons why I favour this bill. The first is that the judges of the privy council in England are political judges. As they belong to the House of Lords, they are lawmakers and therefore they belong to various parties. Few of them are Liberals. Some are Conservatives. In England we see something that is almost unbelievable. We see some Labour lords. I find it to be a paradox, but it happens just the same over there. Each of the judges who sit in the privy council is a born politician; he is a politician first and a judge afterwards. I have seen articles about politicians being appointed to the bench. I do not see how the same party that condemns the practice of the Liberal party in appointing Liberals to the bench should advocate the continuance of appeals to the privy council or to judges who live far from here and who are politicians before being members of the bench. In fact, if they were not appointed to the House of Lords, they would not sit on that bench. Their appointment is their qualification to sit there. One may not be surprised that they afterwards render political judgments.

In our country the situation is entirely different, because no judge has the right to vote. All judges that are appointed by the dominion government are deprived of the right to vote in federal elections. This means that all those judges, even though they have been in politics previously, can no longer be imbued with any partisan spirit.

The first reason why I support this bill is that with the cancellation and the abrogation of appeals to the privy council we shall no longer have anything to do with a tribunal in London which is composed of political judges. The second reason why I support it is for the sake of economy. We have enough appeals from one court to another; they must stop in some tribunal in this country. It is as true today as it was seventy-four years ago, when the supreme court was instituted, that few people have the means with which to carry a case to the privy council. That is a procedure for people who are well off, and for big concerns. They are the ones who are able to carry their cases there, appealing sometimes directly from the provincial supreme court, from the court of appeal or the court of king's bench in the province of Quebec, to frighten the parties who have not the same means from continuing the legal debate overseas.

In my opinion the time has come to put aside all prejudices. When Mr. Irving, who was a good Englishman and a good Liberal, moved that provision which I have just read and referred to, he was acting as a good Canadian. The time has come when we should consider every matter objectively, without any sentiment.

I cannot understand the amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) to give the bill the six months hoist. What is it? As I said before, it is a negative proposal. I am anxious that the bill should go before the committee of the whole. Then we shall have the opportunity of seeing whether the leader of the opposition has any constructive suggestion to make about the constitutional powers of the supreme court. He will then have an opportunity to make any amendment that he thinks will protect the provinces and will protect the minority. Will he do that? He may. I am so anxious to hear him speak on this matter that I will say no more at this time. I shall look forward to hearing his constructive amendments when we are in committee of the whole.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Once again, Mr. Speaker, I find myself on a different side from my good friend the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). There is only one compensation about being in that position, namely, that once more it proves I must be right.

I propose to speak for a few moments this afternoon in support of the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), which was to the effect that consideration of the abolition of appeals to the privy council should be postponed for a period of six months. I intend to give several reasons for my support of the amendment.

In the first place, in British Columbia, we place a very high value on the ability and the decisions of the privy council. We should like to see the right of appeal to that court retained. We have had the right for almost seventy-five years. In many cases the appeals have been taken direct from the court of appeal of British Columbia to the privy council. That has been a common practice. I was amazed to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), when he spoke in the debate on the speech from the throne at the beginning of last session, express resentment against that practice in British Columbia. Hon. members will find the statement on page 65 of Hansard of January 28, 1949. The Prime Minister was giving the figures of the appeals that had been carried to the privy council, and I asked him how many appeals there had been from the court of appeal of British Columbia to the privy council. This was his reply:

> I have long deplored this apparent tendency of the litigants of British Columbia to take their disputes to the privy council instead of taking them to the supreme court at Ottawa.

I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that the people of British Columbia have taken their appeals direct to the privy council because they wished to do so, and because they have had satisfaction from that court. Therefore, I repeat, the right of appeal is highly prized in my province, and that is one reason why I am speaking in favour of this amendment.

In the course of his speech in introducing this bill the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) tried to make quite a point of the argument that the privy council is only a rich man's court. That is truer of the Supreme Court of Canada than it is of the privy council, and I can give the house an example. A few years ago I was a junior member of a certain firm which had a case against the British Columbia Electric Railway Company Limited. The plaintiff was a widow who had no resources at all. She had fallen in getting off a street car and in the supreme court of British Columbia we were able to prove that she fell because there was a defective plate on the step. We obtained a judgment for $5,000 and costs. We held that judgment in the court of appeal, and then the British Columbia Electric Railway Company Limited appealed to the privy council on the ground that the action had been commenced at a later date than six months from the time of the accident. By the way, that delay was not a delay of our firm. The plaintiff had not come to us until the six months had expired. Under the provincial act which incorporated the company the limitation period was six months. Under the Railway Act of Canada it is a year, and the point as to whether or not a claimant had six months or one year had never been decided. Therefore the company appealed to the privy council on that point and won. We were able to retain a young Canadian who had been a Rhodes scholar and who had been called to the bar in Great Britain. Before the privy council gave judgment they apparently decided that this widow should not be deprived of the amount of her claim. They took the position that they were sure that the counsel for the company would not ask that the widow be deprived of the $5,000 because the company had won its point. If anybody has any doubt of that, may I say that I hold in my hand the report of the case. It is "British Columbia Electric Railway Company Limited versus Pribble, 1926 Appeal Cases". At page 481 we find the words used by the honourable lords in bringing about this result:

> Their lordships are further informed that in consideration of her injuries and of the fact that the general aspect of the matter concerns themselves alone, the appellants have voluntarily arranged with the respondent not to ask for the repayment of any sums already paid to her in consequence of the judgments below, a liberal proceeding to the spirit and justice of which their lordships think effect should now be given by making no order as to costs of this appeal.

The result was that the widow got her judgment. She got her costs in the supreme court of British Columbia and in the court of appeal. I have no doubt that the solicitor for the British Columbia Electric Railway Company Limited in Vancouver has ever since been a firm believer in abolishing appeals to the privy council. That was one case in which a poor woman got a benefit that she would not have received in the Supreme Court of Canada. Other cases are the carrying of appeals to the privy council in formâ pauperis. There has been a case in British Columbia which has been carried twice to the privy council in that manner within the last two or three years. Let us not believe we are conferring a great benefit upon the poor man by the abolition of these appeals.

Another point made by the Minister of Justice was that Canada had never been represented on the privy council. I thought he spoke quite bitterly, as though this court had been set up by a foreign country and we were made subject to it and had nothing whatever to say as to who served on the court. The fact is, and the Minister of Justice knows it very well, that chief justices of Canada have served on the privy council. The late Chief Justice Anglin served on many occasions. Chief Justice Sir Lyman Duff, who is a hero to all the young lawyers of British Columbia, served on the privy council time and again, and his judgments carried great weight all over the commonwealth. The present chief justice, Chief Justice Rinfret, has also served on the privy council. Canada could have been more fully represented at any time if its government had cared to ask for such representation.

Another reason I am in favour of this amendment is that I believe the abolition of the appeals is premature, particularly in the case of appeals on constitutional questions. It is perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker, that we should first work out a method of amending our constitution in Canada. I know that that is going to be a difficult job, but it is a field for the display of real courage and leadership by the government of Canada. There is a field in which there should be real leadership but by the measures which are promised in the speech from the throne the government is making no real attempt to solve that problem.

The government has said in the speech from the throne that it will arrange consultations with the provinces concerning the amendment of our constitution where there is a difference of opinion in regard to certain points. Obviously that is the first move. Once that move has been made and agreement reached as to the amendments to the constitution that should be made there could be far less objection to the bill we are considering today.

But instead of holding that consultation first the government is bringing in this bill to abolish appeals and is then giving notice that it will ask the parliament of the United Kingdom for the right to amend the constitution of Canada in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces nor affecting the constitutional rights and privileges of the provinces or existing rights and privileges with respect to education or the use of the English and French languages.

The only real difficulties in connection with our constitution concern the respective rights of the dominion and the provinces. That is the only question to be solved. Let us see what will happen if the government course is followed. Appeals to the privy council will be abolished and the right to amend the constitution in connection with dominion matters will be given. As the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said the other day, the Supreme Court of Canada is to be the arbiter. If there is any question as to whether the amendments deal with provincial rights, then the supreme court will make the decision. That will probably mean a whole series of new lawsuits having to do with our constitution and whether or not particular amendments affect the rights of provinces.

I wonder whether the government is proceeding in this way in order to tie the hands of the provinces, in order to present to the provinces a fait accompli. If they will not agree to the amendments made by the dominion they will have to go to the Supreme Court of Canada. I wonder if the idea behind all this is not that the provinces, rather than face that necessity, will yield to the wishes of the dominion? It looks as though the dominion government were putting a gun to the heads of the provincial governments, and I suggest that that is a very high-handed procedure to follow. That is my second reason for supporting the amendment that the bill be considered six months hence.

My third reason is the resolution passed by the Canadian Bar Association at Banff a few weeks ago. That body is composed of leading lawyers from all over the country who belong to all different parties. Their deliberations are non-political and thoroughly objective. If any group in Canada should understand this particular question it is this group. I would point out to hon. members that included in the membership of the committee which recommended the resolution passed by the Canadian Bar Association were such outstanding supporters of the government as Senator J. W. de B. Farris, K.C., of Vancouver and Senator G. P. Campbell of Toronto. These men hold a high place in the public life of Canada.

I should like to quote from a statement made by Mr. Steer, the chairman of the committee. I do not know his politics, but I certainly have never heard of him as an active Progressive Conservative. He may be a Liberal, but as a matter of fact I do not think there was any political angle in the consideration of this question by the association. Here is what he said:

> There is little doubt that the Privy Council is the most powerful court in the world. I suggest we should think very carefully before we throw away the right of appeal to such a court. There is no question of sovereignty involved. Sovereignty of Canada has been conclusively established.

I should like to quote from the resolution as follows:

> Be it resolved that the Canadian Bar Association, without expressing any view as to the wisdom or otherwise of the proposed abolition, is of the opinion:
>
> (i) That any bill for the abolition of the privy council appeal should contain the necessary provisions as to the organization and jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the system by which its judges will be appointed.

Here is the portion of the resolution I wish to stress:

> That sufficient time be given before the statute is enacted to permit the public to give consideration, both as to the question whether the abolition of the appeal to the privy council should take place and to the constitution and powers of the court that may replace it and also to the effect which the abolition may have upon provincial and minority rights.

The resolution then went on to make certain suggestions as to what should be done if the appeal were abolished, among which was the following:

(g) that the rule of stare decisis ought to continue to be applied with respect to past decisions of the court, as well as with respect to past decisions of the judicial committee.

In other words, that there be some provision that previous decisions of the privy council and the Supreme Court of Canada should be binding on the Supreme Court of Canada after this bill is passed. During his speech the Prime Minister professed great respect for the opinion of the Canadian Bar Association, but he then went on to wave aside their suggestion that the bill should be allowed to stand in order that it might be given further consideration. In effect he took the position that he knew what was best and that the Canadian Bar Association could just run along and play marbles or forget about the matter.

The other day he refused to insert a provision in the bill making previous decisions binding. The excuse given was that all the justices of the supreme court took an oath of office when appointed and therefore they were bound to follow previous decisions. It is not quite as simple as that. I do not question for one moment that the justices of the supreme court will carry out their oaths of office, but they may have different views of just what that oath implies. I have here a press dispatch which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of June 2 of this year, just a few weeks ago, which reads:

Not Bound by Privy Council says Rinfret

Jurisprudence laid down by the privy council does not necessarily bind Canadian courts, it was intimated by Chief Justice Thibaudeau Rinfret in the Supreme Court of Canada today.

The report continues:

"Why should we in Canada," queried His Lordship, "accept something that has been said 4,000 miles from here, where they have not the same mentality?"

And then again:

"You might say," His Lordship told counsel, "that the Supreme Court of Canada is the final court of the land and hence is not bound by judgments of the privy council."

"No, my Lord," replied Mr. Stein, "I don't believe I would care to go that far."

"Oh, don't hesitate," urged the chief justice.

Mr. Stein was counsel for the appellant.

There is the position with which we are faced in Canada today. I suggest that because of that stand, if for no other reason, a provision should be written into the bill that the decisions made in the past by the Supreme Court of Canada and the privy council are to be binding. Otherwise we start interpreting our Canadian constitution all over again in the year 1949, and I do not think anybody in Canada wants that to happen.

A fourth reason why I am supporting the amendment is that by abolition of appeals to the privy council Canada will sever one of the links which hold the British commonwealth together. Such action may lead to similar or far more drastic action on the part of other nations of the commonwealth at a time when Britain has her back to the wall as she has never had it since 1940. Some of our ministers have been getting up in the house this week to sympathize with her in her present plight, and yet by abolishing appeals to the privy council at this time the government may be adding to the burdens of the already overburdened United Kingdom government. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) may laugh. He is much better at laughing than he is at propounding a sound argument on this particular subject.

Just as certainly as night follows day such action is sure to be interpreted in every capital of the world as a weakening of the British commonwealth, particularly in the capitals behind the iron curtain, when all democratic countries are rightly worried about the Soviet union having discovered the secret of the atom bomb. This step is taken precisely at the time when a strong commonwealth is necessary for world peace. I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that one of the reasons why the world is in so perilous a position today is the fact that it is divided into two camps, the United States camp and the Russian camp. If the British commonwealth had been kept as strong as it was during the war, if we had a third camp between the other two, we would not have the whole civilized world apparently rushing into a third world war. That the situation is simply unbelievable, everyone in the house agrees. It is unbelievable when we reflect that fighting ceased only about four years ago. But such is the state of the world today.

It is only nine years ago that the British commonwealth stood alone, except for aid from gallant little Greece, and saved civilization. It is less than five years ago that sons of the commonwealth were plunging to their death together in flaming planes, and men of the other parts of the commonwealth were serving with Canadians in the first Canadian army.

I am incapable of expressing my regret that such a step should be taken by the Canadian government at this time, just as I regretted the refusal of the Canadian government in 1938 to allow Great Britain to send her young airmen here to take their training.

That action might very well have meant the destruction of civilization. It is only nine years ago that a few young commonwealth airmen saved civilization. We learn now that at that time the very last squadron was in the air. If there had not been enough of those airmen to save civilization, the responsibility for the consequences that might have ensued would have rested in large part on the Canadian government of that day.

Canada is now a senior partner in the commonwealth. No longer are we in the position of trying to get something from Great Britain; and since we are a senior partner our influence and our responsibility are great. We should be doing everything in our power to strengthen the commonwealth, and the abolition of appeals to the privy council certainly does not strengthen the commonwealth.

My fifth reason for supporting the amendment arises out of the argument put forward by the Minister of Justice when he opened the debate on the bill. He asked support for the measure on the ground that the government was now achieving nationhood and autonomy for Canada. He even went so far as to say in conclusion that there must not be one instant's delay. That very statement was enough to convince one of the weakness of his arguments. He made a straight appeal to the isolationist and republican sentiment in Canada. I think the house should be told who it was that won nationhood for Canada, and when it was won. Nationhood was won for Canada in the first great war from 1914 to 1918. It was won by the young men and the nursing sisters, God bless them, who went over from this land and played so splendid a part in that war. The names of those who won nationhood for Canada are inscribed in the Book of Remembrance in the Memorial Chamber of this building. It ill behooves any minister of the crown to rise in the House of Commons, in the year 1949, and make the claim that he is now winning nationhood for Canada.

Since 1919 Canada has been completely free to do as she wished. Neither the United Kingdom nor any other nation has stood in her way. Canada has been free to do as she wished. As my authority for that statement, I quote the Right Hon. Vincent Massey.

Mr. Garson: Since what date?

Mr. Green: The Right Hon. Vincent Massey, who has been our ambassador at Washington and London. He is the Canadian who has had the greatest experience as an ambassador. I do not think anyone questions Mr. Massey's ability or his right to speak on questions of this kind. I have his book entitled, "On Being Canadian," published in 1948. On page 9 we find this statement:

> We know that our sovereign independence is real, final and complete. If there remain vestiges of subordinate status, we ourselves are responsible and no one else. If, for instance, today we can alter our constitution only by appealing to the British parliament, it is because we apparently still wish to have it so, embarrassing as the arrangement is to the legislators at Westminster who naturally regard such matters as no concern of theirs.

All the talk of winning autonomy for Canada is faking the issue. If there is an autonomy problem before the Canadian people today it has nothing whatever to do with Canada's relationship with the British commonwealth, but with the United States of America. Mr. Massey elaborates that view on the same page. This is what he says:

> There is truth in what was said not long ago: "It is hardly too much to say that in some quarters there is a surviving colonialism which cannot forget that the British connection once involved colonial subordination, and would willingly demonstrate independence of Britain by avowing dependence upon the United States." Such "new colonialism" is as damaging to national growth as was the old.

There is the real problem; and it is not imposed upon us by our fine friends the Americans. It arises out of world events. The real problem is how to avoid becoming subservient to the United States. I want to cite a few instances to show how this government has allowed Canada to become subservient to the United States. First I refer to a clipping under date of July 28, 1947, headed "Canada assures U.S. no Jap treaty 'bloc'." At that time the members of the commonwealth were to have a conference in Australia concerning a peace treaty with Japan, and the Canadian ambassador in Washington was instructed to go to the secretary of state there to assure him that there was no intention of setting up an empire bloc. Here is what the Canadian ambassador said:

> I told Mr. Armour what I am sure he already knew, that this conference does not and could not mean the formation of a common British front at the peace conference.

That statement is also dealt with by Mr. Massey in his book, where we find this comment at page 105:

> When it was reported in the press in 1947 that we had assured the United States government that the forthcoming commonwealth conference on the peace treaty with Japan did not foreshadow the formation of a British "common front," these representations seemed both unnecessary and undignified.

A second instance occurred in 1947, when the government was trying to save United States funds and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) brought in his austerity program. The prohibitions did not apply only to the United States but to all the members of the commonwealth, in fact to the whole world. When in this house the minister was challenged to say why he had done that, he replied that it was because the Americans did not like to be discriminated against, in other words because the Americans wanted it that way. We saw the same thing happen yesterday, when the minister rose in his place and announced that the ban on the importation of fruits from the United States was to be lifted. Today we see a Canadian Press dispatch which reads:

A government official said lifting of the controls resulted from pressure brought on U.S. government quarters by California fruit growers.

The inference, of course, is that the United States government brought pressure to bear on the government of Canada. Another dispatch which confirms what I have said appeared on July 30 of this year, written by one of the leading members of our press gallery, a man of great experience and in a very responsible post, who wrote:

The dependence of Ottawa upon Washington becomes more apparent every day. A colleague put it to me this way: "This subservience to Washington is far worse than it ever was to London. Ottawa used to stand up pretty firmly to the dominions office in London."

Another example may be found in the military exercises which took place along the Alaska highway a few weeks ago. The first reaction of the government at Ottawa was contained in a dispatch dated August 10, 1949, and headed "Canada to get American aid if invaded". It states:

Continental defence plans call for immediate United States armed intervention if any sizeable enemy force strikes Canada, informed sources say.

This is part of the official reaction to press reports on exercise Eagle, Canada's biggest peacetime land-air maneouvres, which were critical of the state of national preparedness it bared.

It is a pretty dangerous frame of mind to get into when you expect somebody else's sons to protect your country. I might mention other instances of this type, such as the attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) in connection with atomic energy. He has had United States congressmen come up here to investigate our efforts, but has refused to set up a committee of the Canadian house to consider that very matter.

These things have an effect on the thinking of the Canadian people. We can never make Canada a great nation unless we change our ways in this regard. Furthermore, that is no way to maintain the respect of our American cousins. Mr. Massey deals with that point at page 101 of his book, where he quotes with approval the statement of a prominent American, Mr. Lawrence Hunt, to a Canadian audience. Mr. Hunt said:

The self-respecting friendship of a loyal member of the British commonwealth is vastly more important to the United States than the sly subservience of a satellite. We Americans don't want any satellites. We want friends who can differ with us without fear and can agree with us without servility.

Later, at page 121 of his book, Mr. Massey sums up the situation very well by saying:

This, however, does not relieve us from the duty of making our views known and protecting our interests in all matters which concern both countries.

He is referring to the United States.

Someone has said that "it is the merest common sense, when one lives in the same house with a giant, to attempt to keep on good terms with him." This is no doubt true, but the United States is a very friendly giant who will respect us all the more if we do not take for granted that it is our duty to yield automatically when there are differences of opinion, and will appreciate our speaking with frankness and candour.

Those are my six reasons for supporting the amendment postponing consideration of this bill for six months. I urge that this be done. For these reasons, if for no others, I believe that should be the course followed by the government.

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I expected many reasons to be invoked by the opposition in favour of either postponing or killing the bill in one way or another, but I never thought the development of the atomic bomb by Russia would be suggested as a reason for maintaining appeals to the privy council. I have a great deal of respect for the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). He is a hardworking member, whom I like personally, but I do not like the argument he has advanced this afternoon. Before entering upon the body of my own remarks I shall try to deal with a few of the points he brought forward.

The fourth reason advanced by the hon. gentleman for supporting the amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) was that abolishing appeals to the privy council would give a bad example to other parts of the commonwealth and create a bad impression in London, or cause the British government some trouble. I see the trend of thought of the Conservative party has not changed much since the days of Sir John A. Macdonald. I did as the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) did; I consulted the debates of 1875, and found this statement by Macdonald at page 981:

Great as would be the benefit of a supreme court to the dominion, it would not compensate for...the feeling of uncertainty it would excite in England as to whether there was not an impatience in this country of even the semblance of imperial authority.

On the same day, he said:

This amendment is the first step towards the severance of the dominion from the mother country.

At the time he was speaking about the abolition of appeals to the privy council, proposed in an amendment to the bill establishing the supreme court. He expressed concern about the feeling of uncertainty it would initiate in England. Today we heard my hon. friend bringing forward the same argument, that it might be wrongly interpreted in England if Canadians were to decide they have legal minds in their own country, men of integrity and ability who can interpret the terms of the constitution as well as any who are not so familiar with our institutions or so conversant with our body of legislation.

My friend talked about the question of autonomy, Mr. Speaker, and stated there was no question of autonomy involved in abolishing the appeal to the privy council. Does he forget that one of the elements of sovereignty is the establishment of courts within the country designed to interpret the constitution of that country? The fact that we are still taking appeals to the privy council is one badge of colonial status. The other badges are the fact that the constitution is not a Canadian constitution, but an act of the British parliament, and the fact that we have no flag. The removal of two of these badges at least is mentioned in the speech from the throne.

My friend says the country is not ready for such a move. The Prime Minister has gone from one end of this country to the other and has had the courage to speak about the matter and the answer of the people should be convincing. A moment ago we were told that, amongst the members present at the Canadian bar convention, there were some Liberals who helped draft that resolution. Certainly, there must have been Liberals there. The election results showed there were so many Liberals throughout the dominion there must have been some at the convention.

It has been stated that in British Columbia the decisions of the privy council are considered of great value. If the hon. member had represented Rockland avenue or the Uplands section of Victoria, such a statement would have been easier to understand. At any rate, I respect anyone who feels the privy council gave him better protection. I believe a majority of the people in Canada have reached a stage where they consider it necessary for Canada to have the power to amend its constitution, and to have a supreme court to interpret our institutions. A statement has been made to the effect that the abolition of appeals was premature, especially in so far as constitutional rights were concerned. We have been waiting seventy-five years for this.

The member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) quoted an amendment to the bill to establish the supreme court. This amendment was proposed by Mr. Irving and it carried by 112 to 40. That took place seventy-five years ago. During the course of my remarks I shall deal with the reason why this amendment has remained inoperative and who was responsible for it. This question has been before the Canadian public and this parliament for many years. Does my friend believe we should wait another seventy-five years before the people of the country will be certain we should establish a supreme court to interpret our own constitution?

My friend says we should start with the constitution. It is well known that any constitutional convention will sit for five or six years before any definite agreement is reached. It took a little less time, but not much less, for the fathers of confederation to come to a conclusion and at that time there was no particular political animosity brought into the discussion. Today, in some parts of the country, there are people who make political capital of such a question. Does anyone believe that a convention established this year could, within the normal course of six months or a year, bring forth a result that would enable the country to establish a new constitution? I venture to predict that any constitutional convention will have to sit for a number of years before reaching a conclusion.

This government did not want to wait for all this to happen. This government believes that the people of Canada are ready to do as the other countries have done, to establish a federal supreme court charged with the duty of interpreting the law. The government believed also that the moment had arrived to consult the provinces as to the first steps to be taken to summon constitional convention. This would take some time, but I believe the time has arrived for the country to take the step proposed in the bill now before us.

My hon. friend ended his long speecn, interesting in many respects but out of touch with the question of abolishing appeals, by speaking about our subservience to the United States. Mention was made of the military manœuvres in western Canada and the joint continental defence. I feel no more satisfied with that than he does, but if there were trouble in Canada tomorrow, could we rely any more upon help from Great Britain than we could upon help from our neighbours to the south? Could we expect more people from Britain to come here to join our army in the defence of our northwest, than would come from the United States? The time has come for the people of Canada to think in terms of practicability rather than in terms of sentiment.

I was surprised that the hon. gentleman brought forth so many points in his attempt to show the subservience of our country to the United States. He stated that at one time Mr. Massey, the Canadian minister to Washington, had stated there would not be a common British front on international matters. Perhaps today, perhaps tomorrow, the interests of Canada might be much more in harmony with the interests of the United States than with the interests of Great Britain. I do not especially rejoice over that fact, but we have to face the facts as they are. My friend comes here talking about oranges and grapefruit in his attempt to show that Canada is subservient to the United States. I do not imagine that it was the fruit growers of California who influenced the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in lifting the ban on imports. If the minister was influenced by anyone, he was influenced by the people of Canada who felt their babies ought to have citrus fruits.

The measure now before us, Mr. Speaker, is intended to abolish appeals to the privy council. The adoption of the amendment by the leader of the opposition would have the effect of preventing this measure from being passed at this session of parliament. I readily admit that after the brilliant presentation of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the unequivocal declaration of the Prime Minister, there remains but little that can be said as to the advisability or timeliness of the bill.

I am prompted, however, to delve into the matter because of the pleasure I feel in being given the opportunity to contribute to the freeing of our country from one more of its colonial links, even if it be in the humble way of casting my vote for this measure. I also feel I must speak on this question for somewhat sentimental reasons. I have, as no doubt all members have, a great fondness for my constituency and an interest in its history. This interest extends to the doings of my predecessors, the members for Bellechasse. It was the second gentleman after confederation who occupied the seat for Bellechasse in this house, the Hon. Telesphore Fournier, who sat from 1870 to 1875 who, as minister of justice in the Mackenzie cabinet, introduced the bill to establish a supreme court and a court of exchequer for the Dominion of Canada.

As the intent of any legislative measures can oftentimes be foreseen in the speech from the throne—although it is not always so, it sometimes is—it is not without interest to note that the bill had been described in the speech from the throne in 1875 as "essential to our system of jurisprudence and to the settlement of constitutional questions". It can be readily established thereby that from the very day of its inception the court was rightly intended to study and settle constitutional questions arising in the country, whether brought to the court by private citizens or by the constituted government, whether federal or provincial.

When considering a constitutional question such as that of the supreme court and that of amendments to the constitution, I have made it a practice to consult the documents of the past and to look into the reports of the discussions that took place among the fathers of confederation. The debates of 1875—and my friend the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) ably dealt with that point but I shall touch on it again—provide us with an enlightening outlook on the feeling of the house at the time. Prior to the introduction of that bill by the Hon. Telesphore Fournier, the former Prime Minister Sir John A. Macdonald had twice introduced—in 1869 and 1870—and later withdrawn bills for the establishment of a Supreme Court of Canada. When presenting his bill, Fournier—as my friend the hon. member for Temiscouata pointed out—went as far as asking for an amendment that might bring about the abolition of appeals to the privy council, but he outlined one of the aims of the new court as being that of arbiter.

> . . . which would settle the extent of the powers of local legislatures when these powers were in dispute.

He also stated:

> The bill has for its sole object the harmonious workings of our young constitution.

Fournier was less fearful in 1875 than some people in my province pretend to be in 1949 as to the fitness of a Canadian court of last appeal to settle the extent of the powers of local legislatures, and he was right then as we are right now in taking the same stand.

When proposing his amendment the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) stressed the fact that there was no urgency for this bill, just as my hon. friend said, with reference to the atom bomb, that we should wait for another period of time. The Canadian people have considered the question long enough, and I think the time has come for us to cast a vote in favour of ending what Sir John A. Macdonald described as one of the last golden links of colonialism.

In 1870 Sir John A. Macdonald, when proposing the establishment of a supreme court, stated that he was in favour of keeping appeals to the privy council. It was the trend of the Conservative party then as it is today. Then Sir George Cartier felt the same way. Those who now bring forward Cartier's shadow in order to try to impress us with the idea that abolition of appeals to the privy council will mean the end of provincial rights stress that Cartier was against the abolition but they do not say that he was expressing his feelings as a political man. He was acting as a Conservative and it was his right for him to act that way. But today it is the right of good, thinking citizens of this country to believe that the time is ripe to abolish the appeals and that the time has come for us to think that, as the Prime Minister himself stated, there can be in this country men whose integrity and ability are high enough for us to trust them properly to interpret the principles included in the pact of confederation. Sir John A. Macdonald also said at the time, and I am surprised that my friend did not quote this:

> We have no power to deprive a British subject of going to the foot of the throne for redress.

That question was ably treated a year or so ago by a gentleman who sat on the opposite side of the house and represented the constituency of Kindersley. I refer to Mr. Jaenicke who twice proposed a resolution leading to a bill such as the one we are considering now. To my mind, while he was here he made a considerable contribution to the work of this house, and I esteemed him highly. At the time he pointed out that the sovereign himself does not consider grievances, that it is through the judges that he does so, and that judges appointed by the sovereign government of Canada in the name of the king are the same advisers or constitute the same way of advising the sovereign as to which grievances should be heard. Mr. Jaenicke stated as reported at page 2498 of Hansard of 1947:

> In making the Supreme Court of Canada the final court of appeal we simply substitute His Majesty's Canadian judges as the final arbiters upon any grievances brought before him by his subjects in Canada.

I can well understand Sir John A. Macdonald's trend of thought; he was speaking in the colonial period. I am less able to understand those who take the same attitude seventy-five years later. While my hon. friends like to boast of the position that Canada has reached, and of what her sons have done to make her a nation, they refuse to recognize one of the elements of sovereignty and try to postpone study of this bill in order to kill it. Mr. Speaker, this has been admitted as the Conservative view at all times. The Liberal view was somewhat opposite, even in 1875. As my friend the hon. member for Temiscouata pointed out, Fournier himself when presenting the bill invited an amendment, and the amendment brought forward by the then hon. member for Hamilton was carried, as I said only a moment ago, by 112 to 40. It would be interesting to see why this amendment, although included in the bill when it was passed in 1875, was never operative. The bill creating the supreme court introduced by the then member for Bellechasse was passed on April 8, 1875, and the amendment was included in it as clause 47. How is it that this clause was never operative and that seventy-five years afterwards we are still discussing whether the time has come to repeal this right of appeals to the privy council? Frank MacKinnon, in a remarkable study entitled "The Supreme Court of Canada", gives a good account of what then followed:

> The government was informed through Lord Carnarvon, the colonial secretary, that disallowance was almost inevitable in view of the strenuous objection of the lord chancellor and the law officers of the crown to the principle involved in the appeals clause.

And he goes on:

> Mackenzie and Blake, the latter having replaced Fournier as Minister of Justice, argued the matter with the imperial authorities both by correspondence and by personal visits to England.

Blake's attitude throughout this controversy was truly consistent with the Liberal policy of upholding the full autonomy of Canada.

A careful study of the correspondence exchanged between Blake and the colonial office should convince anybody from my province who might still have any hesitancy as to which attitude is consistent with Canada's dignity and autonomy. I shall say a few words about this correspondence. I shall outline only two or three of the numerous arguments brought forward by Carnarvon, the colonial secretary, and Blake, the Canadian minister of justice, in order that my remarks may not be unduly lengthened. The first concerns the actual decision of cases, and that would interest some of the people especially in my province. Carnarvon thought that British residents—and I do not mean especially those living in British Columbia—"who held rights, investments or property in Canada should be protected by the right of appeal to the privy council". That was the attitude of Carnarvon in the exchange of notes I just mentioned.

To this Blake replied:

> This practically presumes that British subjects and foreigners would not receive justice at the hands of Canadian judges while it affirms that the Canadians would receive justice at the hands of the British court.

Blake thus considered this objection as an insult.

Secondly, the argument that an outside tribunal might judge more impartially than a Canadian one the questions arising between the federal government and the provincial legislatures was put forward. This is in line with the attitude of some people in my province, less and less numerous, fortunately. It is in line with the trend of thought that has prevailed in certain quarters up to a few years ago, but fortunately this tendency has given way in the last ten or fifteen years to a more logical attitude. To this Blake answered directly, and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the other day was consistent with the Liberal tradition when he kept somewhat the same dignified language on Friday last.

Blake said then:

> I cannot conceive anything calculated more deeply to wound the feelings of Canadians than an insinuation that impartial decisions are not to be expected from their judges.

With reference, said he, to the alleged values of the decisions of a court not included in the confederation:

> I would observe that with the practical operation of the federal constitution of Canada, with the customs and systems which may have grown out of its working . . . a court composed of English judges cannot be thoroughly acquainted.

A few years later, in 1879, Blake again touched on the same question. In the course of his speech he declared that the Canadian constitution would be unworkable without a national court to settle problems which would inevitably be arising thereunder. He indicated that it was an anomaly for persons to declare that, while Canadians had the right to make their own laws, there could not be found in Canada men capable of judging by what laws she should be governed. He emphasized the fact that the experience and modes of thought of the British judges were not conducive to the proper interpretations of Canadian conditions and legislation which had their roots in an entirely constitutional system. He concluded with the following words:

> Now, a constitution like ours, complicated and delicate in its adjustments, requires for its interpretation that measure of learning, experience and practice which those who live under it, who work it, and who are practically engaged in its operation are all their lives acquiring. I deny that it can be well expounded by men whose whole lives have been passed, not merely in another but in an opposite sphere of practice; and these men must come to the consideration of these topics at the greatest disadvantage and from the wrong point of view.

Blake's words are as true today as they were seventy-five years ago, and it is the anomaly existing over that period of time that this measure now proposes to abolish. For the edification of the timid souls in my province who may not yet have seen the light let us revert to the controversy of 1875. MacKinnon says:

> The biggest issue involved in the question of appeals concerned the material connection, or, more specifically, the principle of enhancing Canada's status by the removal of appeals to an English tribunal. This principle was in line with Blake's policy of keeping the colonial office reminded of responsible government and of diminishing the appearance of colonial governance by making the Governor General responsible to his ministers rather than to himself or the British government.

Lord Carnarvon questioned the expediency of permitting through such means as clause 47 any doubts as to the stability of Canada's ties to the mother country, the same trend of thought that is prevalent amongst the Conservatives but not so openly mentioned today. Blake answered at the time:

> The Parliament of Canada, which is composed of the Queen, the Senate, and the House of Commons has power to abolish any prerogative of the crown affecting the Canadian people within the range of subjects on which parliament is authorized to legislate. After all the Canadian judges are Her Majesty's judges just as much as her judicial officers who reside in England.

The British institutions have proven their greatness by their adaptability, and the empire and commonwealth have survived so long owing to the ability of its statesmen to find harmonious solutions to seemingly insoluble problems. The same was true on that occasion. The Supreme Court Act was not disavowed. An arrangement was arrived at in 1876 and clause 47 was considered inoperative, as it was finally agreed that it did not affect the appeals to the judicial committee of the privy council because the clause had read that there was to be no appeal to a court of appeal established by the parliament of Great Britain. The judicial committee was not a court established by the parliament of Great Britain, so clause 47 was inoperative, and did not apply here.

I have brought the debates of 1875 and the controversy as to the abolition of appeals to the attention of the house to illustrate the continuity and the attitudes of the Liberal leaders and to point out to the few remaining hesitant persons in my province the fallacy of their arguments, already refuted seventy-five years ago, as well as the true purpose of the insistence of certain people upon the maintaining of appeals.

One of the objections raised by certain provinces to the principle of this bill,

Mr. Speaker, is that a federal court could not be an impartial judge in conflicts of jurisdiction between the central government and the governments of the provinces.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PISTOLS, AIR GUNS, MOTOR VEHICLES, LEVEL CROSSINGS AND PAYMENT OF FINES

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Criminal Code (pistols, air guns, motor vehicles, level crossings and the payment of fines).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill contains a number of amendments to the Criminal Code. On the motion for second reading a member is permitted to deal only with the principle of a bill. Two sessions ago the former minister of justice called attention to the fact that a similar bill dealt with many different subjects and was therefore different from most other bills.

The loss of life from motor accidents is appalling. The pages of the newspapers in our cities and towns are filled with details of these accidents. Just today a lady who was visiting this city was accidentally killed when trying to save her grandchildren from being run down. She had just as much right to live as has the person who killed her. This loss of life is one of Canada's greatest scandals.

Just last week end nearly as many people were killed by motor accidents in the Toronto district as were killed on our side at the battle of Queenston Heights. No one knows who is going to be next. Anyone is apt to be called into eternity in the twinkling of an eye by the mad race for speed against the laws of God and man. This is Bill No. 3 and hon. members will find it on their files underneath their desks. I do not intend to speak very long on this bill because I made some remarks when introducing it.

One section of the bill deals with the use of pistols by bandits, burglars and others. Men of this kind are liable to break into your home or into your hotel room when fully armed because it is so easy to buy a pistol. I called the attention of a former minister of justice to the fact that I could walk into a store on lower Spadina avenue and buy a gun or pistol that had been manufactured in Connecticut and imported into Canada. There are about twenty different types of pistols that these bandits or burglars can obtain.

There should be a prohibition against the manufacture of these guns and pistols and their sale should also be prohibited as well as their importation into the Dominion of Canada. No one knows who may be the next victim from motorcars on our roads.

The loss of life in the United States, England and other countries through the means I have indicated totals more than the casualties in the first great war and nearly as many as the casualties in the second great war. Human life is the most valuable thing there is.

It is the duty of the government to protect the health, wealth, happiness and prosperity of the people. Unfortunately, we have overgovernment and overtaxation in this country. Section 92 of the British North America Act was adopted for political and not economic purposes. They do not have provincial legislatures in Great Britain and yet they have a population of 47,000,000 people. They did not have such provincial legislatures in New Zealand and Australia until just recently and from what I hear they would like to get rid of them.

The loss of life is appalling. I can remember when the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, a former minister of justice, escaped being hit by a motorcar by only a few inches when walking over from the Rideau club. You cannot go down some of our streets without facing the possibility of being hit or killed. Now one can drive as fast as one likes in our cities and towns.

I do not want to speak too long because several other hon. members would like to pass opinions on these matters. The marginal note to section 3 reads:

> The appalling fatal accidents and injuries from highway traffic and level crossings in Canada is mounting steadily and has become a public scandal as almost every highway is coloured red with the slaughter. Nothing is done to avert these accidents as the mad race for speed goes on. Casualties from such accidents are almost as numerous as those from the second world war in persons so killed or injured.

The purpose of this amendment is to set a penalty where a driver is convicted of failing to stop after an accident. I have seen children knocked down on Danforth avenue in the riding which I represent at the present time and have seen the little white coffins in which they were buried. Some of them were on their way to school and that was the last that was seen of them. I think the hit-and-run driver is the most cowardly type of murderer there is. Parents are not given any notice. The father comes home from work and he finds the baby in a coffin, or the school child turned over to the undertaker the next day. The slaughter of these innocent children has aroused the sympathy of the people of the Toronto district. It has been going on for years. It is the most cowardly form of murder, the hit-and-run, I know of. They are left all alone on the highway and our Lord and the community take care of them. They have as much right to live as some of the reckless drivers, and I believe far more. There was an instance yesterday. If you pick up today's paper you will read about an elderly lady who came to town from Gananoque to see her grandchildren, walked across the road, and was killed. She will not see her grandchildren any more. She has been sent into the next world without a moment's notice. Clergymen, labour organizations, and many other people have been complaining. Then there is the deplorable economic loss involved in the death of workmen. It runs into millions of dollars for this small country alone.

Turning to one of the other sections, let me deal with driving while under the influence of alcohol. Nearly everyone is a driver of a car. I am not myself because I am too shortsighted. I do not drive any more, and it is fortunate I do not because I would not be here very long. I believe that we should change this section of the Criminal Code. I am not a teetotaler. I have a permit for this year but there is not an entry on it yet. I believe that the drunken driver is a pest on the highway. Most of you who drive cars know that to be true. The situation is becoming appalling on the Queen Elizabeth highway. The wider the highways the more accidents there are. The loss of life is deplorable, and so is the economic loss.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) wants to take part in this debate. He took part in the debate of 1935 when he first entered the house. There are so many sections of the bill that I will just pass on. The bill deals with hit-and-run drivers. Then there is a section dealing with failure to stop at level crossings. Last year in the Toronto district educated teachers and others were killed. I proposed a bill last year that would have required motor vehicles to stop in the same way that buses stop. Let us suppose that the carpet between the desks is a railway track. Under the Highway Traffic Act, before a motorbus enters upon a railway track it must stop and open the front door. There are nearly 40,000 level crossings in Canada and this country cannot afford adequate protection for every one of them. In the house last year and the year before I proposed an amendment to the Criminal Code, that the driver of a car who did not stop, look and listen should be fined up to $50 for not doing so before entering upon the right-of-way of the railway. In a country of eleven million people it is impossible to eliminate all level crossings. I think this amendment would be good legislation. I knew some of the teachers that were killed. The number of lives that were lost in the Toronto district last summer is deplorable. Educated teachers and others were killed at the level crossings of the country. It takes two people to cause an accident. Until such time as it is possible to protect all crossings properly I think it would be wise by a Criminal Code amendment to put the onus on two people.

There is also a section of the bill having to do with causing death in a culpably negligent manner. Then there is a section dealing with the trial of young offenders. I think that the parents should be notified when teen-age people get into trouble. These young persons should be represented by counsel. There is no reason why they should not be represented by counsel. Some of them have been tried and convicted without representation by counsel, and I believe it would be a good thing when these people get into trouble. We did not have such a provision after the first great war, but the Addington administration faced the problem in 1801 after the peace of Amiens. The younger Pitt faced it in the years when he was prime minister. These conditions arise after every war, not only divorce but all these other things that grow out of war and involve people who go to war and come back. I believe it would be a good thing if the parents could be notified. If you pick up any newspaper you will read about these cases in the police courts. I referred this afternoon to the Don jail which was built to accommodate a little over one hundred people. The city of Toronto built two jail farms, one on Yonge street for men and one at Concord for women; and should have closed up the old Don jail. There are 400 people there at week ends and it is not fit for 125 or 140.

Mr. Pouliot: The Don jail is a dungeon.

Mr. Church: I will soon be finished. You will notice on page 5 of the bill there is a provision for juries to decide whether an accused is guilty or not guilty. The explanatory note on the opposite page reads:

> On the trial with a jury of persons who cause death or serious injury, it is desirable that the functions of the jury should not be curtailed or abolished.

Sometimes the judge takes the case away from the jury. The duty of the judge is merely to tell the jury what the law is supposed to be and to add any comments he wishes to make, but leaving questions of fact for the jury to decide. Otherwise the jury system might just as well be abolished. Jurors are required to take the law from the judge, but in many cases trial by jury is negatived by the judge taking the case away from the jury. There are so many loopholes, and many people who are guilty of negligence get off. The increased number of accidents requires that the law be brought up to date to meet changing conditions, but preserving the liberty of the subject.

In Great Britain they have what is known as the Summary Offenders Act. It would be a good thing if we had it in Canada because the figures I have show that half the jails in the old country after its adoption have been closed. People were charged under orders in council and other such regulations that were passed during the war, and there would not have been any chargeable offence if it were not for the war. The war is over but we still have the same system being continued. I believe we should have such a law in Canada made applicable and only adapted to our circumstances. It would enable such people to walk into the police station and pay their fines to the sergeant by instalments. I believe it would be a blessing to the people of Canada, especially the working classes, if we had such a law adapted and applicable to our circumstances.

I think that is about all I have to say. The power is given to the police to collect these fines. Many of these people never have been in trouble in their lives. Fines are pretty heavy in the Toronto district. I think there should be a graded scale of fines. I see no reason why people in the city of Toronto should be fined $1,000 and in some other place $5. A jeweler in Montreal was fined $5 for giving away two thousand pounds of butter contrary to the prices board rules as an inducement to sell his goods. He was fined only $5. If such an offence had taken place in Toronto he would have been fined anywhere from $1,000 up to $5,000.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has been very popular in our city. He came there to open our winter fair. I remember asking him last spring if we could not have two or three hours to discuss the deplorable loss of life by fires in homes. He said that at that time the government had so much work ahead of it that he would have to name a time when a discussion might take place; but then we had an election and nothing could be done. I do hope that this year, however, the necessary time will be provided; and I would ask the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) to second the motion, if he will.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to second the motion of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) that this bill be now read the second time. As hon. members who were in the last house well know, the hon. gentleman has brought up these amendments on other occasions. All have been carefully thought out; all arise from a close and deep understanding of the things that are worrying the people out in the constituencies. I do not suppose any member of this house is more closely in touch with the thoughts, the wishes and the worries of his constituents than the hon. member for Broadview. In addition he has had long experience in municipal work in Toronto, and understands what goes on there in the courts, so I do hope the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) will give careful consideration to the proposals contained in this bill for the amendment of the Criminal Code. We all realize, of course, that in the ordinary course amendments to the Criminal Code are submitted by the attorneys general of the provinces. That has not been done in this case. Here we have submissions prepared by a member of the house who has taken the trouble to draft amendments which he believes will meet situations we all know exist.

I have no wish to take up further time; I do not want to be responsible for talking out the bill. However, I do hope the minister will give these matters consideration and that he may find it possible to go a long way toward meeting the suggestions advanced by the hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, it is a happy occasion when I am not bound to disagree with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). The sponsor of this bill is a great humanitarian. I have known him for a number of years. He has always been interested in the humble man, the man on the street. He has done a great deal for his fellow citizens, and has found his reward in the popularity he enjoys in the Queen city and, indeed, throughout the country as a whole.

This bill is another indication of his interest in his fellowmen. I commend the hon. member who has supported the motion on the kind words he has used with respect to its sponsor, who certainly deserves them. So many accidents are occurring everywhere. The newspapers are full of pictures of automobile accidents on highways and at railway crossings, and it is time we did something in an endeavour to reduce the number of accidents. The words of the hon. member for Broadview and the timely remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will be broadcast throughout this country, and will serve as a lesson to all those who would take advantage of the fact that the law has not been clearly defined. I am sure this bill will serve a good purpose, and I hope the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) will give it favourable consideration.

There are one or two matters, however, on which the hon. gentleman might be more precise. For instance, it is provided that anyone who drives a motor vehicle while under the influence of liquor or narcotics will be guilty of an offence. What does it mean to be under the influence of liquor or narcotics? That should be well defined in the bill; otherwise a man who has taken a glass of beer will be unable to drive his car. In the summer when it is hot there is some excuse for a man taking a glass of beer, and he is not necessarily drunk or under the influence of liquor because he has done so. It is a relative matter; the effect of beer is not the same on every individual. This part of the law should be interpreted with wisdom by the judges who may have to decide upon it.

To summarize my remarks, again I congratulate both hon. members, who spoke very well. I hope the press will give the widest possible publicity to the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview, so that what has been said tonight may not be ignored and in future the number of accidents may be reduced as much as possible.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I want to add my congratulations to those which have been extended already to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) on the excellent effort he has made, as a layman, to deal with one of the most complicated branches of the law.

Some hon. Members: He is not a layman.

Mr. Fleming: Thomas L. Church, K.C.

Mr. Graydon: As one layman to another.

Mr. Garson: Quite so. We have given very careful consideration to the provisions of this bill, and the law officers of the department are of the opinion that in its practical application a number of difficulties would arise which would greatly detract from its serviceability. Having regard to the fact that we now have an excellent committee actually at work revising the whole Criminal Code, I am wondering whether my hon. friend would consider having us submit the substance of this bill to that committee, in order that the points in it which commend themselves to their judgment may be incorporated in the revision they are now preparing.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

I am afraid that in my capacity as Minister of Justice I could not recommend any other disposition, because I do not think we in the department could take the responsibility of recommending to hon. members that the bill should be passed in its present form. I would prefer not to go into detail in this regard, because if I were to do so I am afraid I might be accused of talking out the bill, but I might point out one of two examples of what I mean.

For example, clauses 1 and 2 now make it an offence, first, to point an imitation pistol at any person without lawful cause; second, to have upon the person an imitation pistol while committing a criminal offence; third, to sell or give an imitation pistol to a minor under the age of fourteen years who is not the holder of a permit in form 76F. The purpose of the proposed amendment seems to be, first, to say that anyone who feigns the use of a lethal weapon is to be regarded as equally culpable with the person who actually employs one, for there have been many cases in which holdups have been effected or attempted by the use of an imitation pistol. The second objective seems to be to prevent traffic in imitation pistols that might possibly be used for such criminal purposes.

Now, the first point, and this is the type of practical point that could be considered by the committee revising the Criminal Code, seems to be that the substance of these two clauses of the hon. member's amendment is now already covered by section 446 as amended by section 15, chapter 55 of the statutes of 1947. This section, which is now in force, makes liable for imprisonment for life, and to be whipped, any person who, being armed with an offensive weapon or instrument or imitation thereof, robs or assaults with intent to rob any person. In other words, we would be seeking to superimpose upon an amendment passed in 1947 another amendment which, if not co-ordinated with the 1947 amendment, would leave the law on these points in a state of confusion.

As regards section 126, which deals with selling or giving of an imitation pistol to a minor, the proposed amendment would have some effects upon section 126 which I am sure the hon. member did not intend. Johnny, aged 13, could not buy a toy pistol without a permit in form 76F, although he may only want it to play cowboys and Indians. Johnny's dad, who wants a toy pistol for staging a holdup, could buy one without any permit at all. Furthermore, Johnny might be liable to prosecution for pointing his toy pistol during the course of his game.

If I might take another example, just taking them in their order, clause 3 of the amendment would increase the penalty for leaving the scene of a motor accident without reporting it. I am told by those who have the responsibility of enforcing these provisions that in the criminal law, as in economics, you encounter the law of diminishing returns. A heavy increase in penalty does not necessarily result in stricter enforcement. At the present time the punishment for this offence is a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding twelve months. According to the experience of the enforcement officers, to increase that penalty would simply increase the difficulty of securing convictions. In any borderline cases, the judge or jury cannot help but be influenced by the heavy penalty when deciding the guilt or innocence of the accused. The trend of opinion in connection with all these matters has been in favour of allowing a greater latitude to the court in the matter of the penalty that is imposed and has been away from the idea of increasing, as this clause seeks to do, the minimum penalty.

To take another example, clause 7 provides new sections which the members will see at the top of page 4, with regard to causing deaths in a culpable and negligent manner. I am informed by the responsible officers that this would add nothing but confusion to a branch of the criminal law that is already complicated. The criminal law in this branch is covered now by manslaughter, negligence and reckless driving sections. It is quite true that the jurisprudence bearing upon the punishment for causing death by the blameworthy operation of a motor vehicle leaves much to be desired. It is to be hoped that the persons now engaged in the revision of the Criminal Code will be able to put it into better shape; but I am perfectly certain, Mr. Speaker, that the passage of this particular clause would not have any effect except to make the relatively small amount of confusion we now have worse confounded.

There are a number of other cases in which I believe the proper course would be to consult the provinces. Some of these matters could be handled much more efficiently under provincial jurisdiction and by provincial officers who are charged with the enforcement of the law. For example, clause 5 is a clause which is submitted by the hon. member in a very praiseworthy attempt to increase the penalty and make more strict the law with regard to the failure to stop at level railway crossings. The advice I receive from my officers about this clause is that it is not capable of enforcement in its present form. There is no general opinion that the time has as yet arrived to take it out of the field of highway regulations by the provinces and put it into the field of criminal law by the section of the dominion. We believe it would be a much wiser move to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend and send it back to the law enforcement officers of the provinces with the suggestion that they might consider whether, from their close experience with the matter, it should be put into effect.

I could continue to go into detail about the rest of the bill, but there is no purpose in my doing so. I do not think the Department of Justice, or I as its head, could take the responsibility of urging upon the members of the house the enactment of this bill. By that, I do not mean to imply there is not a great deal of merit in the hon. gentleman's bill or that many of the points he has incorporated in it, unfortunately with some accompanying disabilities, could not be carefully considered by the committee set up to revise the criminal laws. If my hon. friend has no objection, I believe that is the course we should like to follow in any event. In its present form, however, we could not recommend the passage of this bill to the members of the house.

Mr. Church: As mover of the bill, Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the right to reply. I want to thank the minister for the extremely courteous reception he has given to this bill, but there are some matters which I should like to point out to him. I think we should have a legal committee to consider bills of this description. The House of Commons has never had a chance to revise the Criminal Code, except once, and that was when the code was first passed.

Mr. Fauteux: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry to interrupt my hon. friend, but I understand that he has already spoken and that on the second reading of a bill a member is not supposed to speak twice.

Mr. Church: I was just referring to the fact—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Order. I believe that the hon. member for Broadview asked for the opportunity to make a few further remarks following those which have just been made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). When he rose in his place, the hon. member mentioned the fact that he was merely taking the floor again in order to reply to the remarks made by the Minister of Justice.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Therefore I believe the hon. member should be permitted to take that attitude and have the floor.

Mr. Church: May I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that I was ready to close the debate. I wish to offer some constructive suggestions to the government. I do not wish to disobey any of the rules of the house; far from it.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the minister that the rules with regard to the motorcar—and I refer simply to the provincial part of it—have been only to the effect that buses are required to open their doors. The constructive suggestion I had was this. If a penalty or fine of $50 were put into the code—because it takes two to make an accident—then the average person would have to stop before he entered the highway.

With regard to the appointment of a committee, I think that is a wise thing. I appreciate that fact. Its members are all fine lawyers and judges and all that kind of thing. They know more about the matter than do ordinary laymen. I have no objection whatever to the appointment of the committee. That is the only right and proper thing for the justice department to do. On it are some of the ablest men at the bar that we have in this country.

I want to point out to the minister that I really believe the time is coming when we should have a legal committee of the two houses of parliament to go over all these suggestions, as has been proposed by my leader. When the committee makes its report, I hope it will include some provision covering fires in homes and people who leave infants two years of age unattended in them. There should be some proviso. I hope the committee considering amendments to the Criminal Code will bring in some clause imposing a penalty on those who violate the law, resulting in the death of little children who have been left unattended in houses that have burned. I think that would be a wise proviso.

When the committee bring in their bill, I know they will probably have some suggestions to make. I hope that the house and the country will get some real law reform out of their efforts. I think one of the most important suggestions in this bill for law reform is with regard to the Summary Offenders Act. Over in England half the prisons have been closed as a result of it, and the expense lessened accordingly. The working classes—and there are a great number of them in the industrial ridings in our district in Toronto—have no opportunity to pay fines. They are too poor. As a result, only the wives and children are penalized. When the suggestions of the committee come down, I hope they will show that some improvement has been made along these lines.

I want to thank the minister for the courteous reception he gave the bill, and I hope and believe that we shall have a better Criminal Code.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I should like to say a word about this matter, Mr. Speaker, and it will be brief. I am saying it as a suggestion to the committee that are now studying this subject.

Mr. Church: I have not withdrawn the bill.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I may say to every one of them that I think you have a splendid committee engaged in this matter at the moment. But before we get through, I think we should get rid of an anomaly that exists. I am following up with respect to what we call motor manslaughter. Manslaughter by a person driving a motorcar is when you kill someone and you are guilty of negligence in that killing. The law has always been that you are guilty of manslaughter if it arises out of that negligence. But some years ago we made a change in the code and permitted a jury to find a person not guilty of manslaughter but guilty of reckless driving. But reckless driving is the sort of negligence that makes a man guilty of manslaughter. I know the courts all disagree with me, and they have worked the matter out in an ingenious way. But, as far as I am concerned, if manslaughter is the killing of a person as a result of negligence, then there is no foundation for what, in all our provinces, all our courts have done in permitting a jury to find a man guilty of reckless driving. Reckless driving is of course negligence. If the man is dead, it is manslaughter. But in all the provinces I think all our decisions are the other way.

That situation arose through sympathy in juries who did not want to find a person guilty of what he was guilty of, namely manslaughter. So they took the easy way out—and I speak, sir, both from the prosecution side and the defence side. It was sympathy that prompted them to take the easy way out and to find reckless driving where the penalty was less. I have often thought that our great difficulty in the whole business was in our terminology. To say that a man is guilty of manslaughter is to do something which shocks the conscience. It disturbs everybody terribly. I think we are using the worst name we can possibly use. For that reason, juries being composed of sympathetic people—they have been when they agreed with me, in any event—they are frightened by that word "manslaughter" and so is the whole public. The jury gets together. I am not supposed to know what takes place in the jury room; but as is well known, there is an infiltration to the ears of counsel on odd occasions. The jury are all frightened by this terrible word "manslaughter" where, if a man is found guilty, he may be imprisoned for life. This "life" is a tremendous thing in the eyes of the public and in the eyes of jurors. It seems to me that if we could eliminate a couple of words it would have a beneficial effect. One of them is "life", because we know that nobody sentenced to "life" ever serves "life" unless he dies before a certain number of years have passed. We know that this word "manslaughter" is a terrific thing. You think of slaughter houses and hitting an old bull, like one of those raised by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), on the head with a blunt axe or something. It terrifies everybody, and properly so.

Mr. Abbott: That would not be manslaughter.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I did not hear what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said. However, I think his kind of bull is different from the kind raised by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. If we could eliminate some awfully terrifying words from our Criminal Code we would find less difficulty—perhaps I should not call it difficulty —we would find less facetiousness in some of the verdicts of this country.

Once more I want to compliment you, sir, and this government on the personnel of this committee which I saw working for at least two weeks during the time that we were not members of parliament. They are working hard and I think will come up with something which will satisfy the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church).

I commend him for introducing this bill, because he has put has finger on some very serious difficulties in connection with the administration of our criminal law.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): I understand the hon. member for Broadview has indicated his wish to withdraw the bill.

Mr. Church: I would consent to the minister's suggestion and have my bill sent to the committee to be considered.

Mr. Garson: Yes, we will send it to the committee considering criminal law.

Mr. Church: Send the bill over there.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Has the hon. member permission to withdraw his bill?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Garson: On a point of order, perhaps I should make it clear that the committee I referred to is not a committee of this house. Therefore after second reading of the bill there is no way by which we can send it to that committee. My suggestion to the hon. member was that the government or the Department of Justice could not recommend the bill to the house but we would be glad to submit it in its present form, with particular emphasis on the substance of it, to the committee which has been set up to revise the Criminal Code, to which the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) referred.

Mr. Church: What would they do, consider the bill?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): I understand that the hon. member is withdrawing his bill.

Mr. Graydon: Subject to the undertaking of the minister.

Bill withdrawn.

SUPREME COURT ACT

VARIOUS AMENDMENTS—ABOLITION OF APPEALS TO PRIVY COUNCIL

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Garson for the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying just before the house took recess, one of the objections raised by certain provincialists to the principle of this bill is that a federal court could not be an impartial judge in conflicts of jurisdiction between the central government and the governments of the provinces. This is an argument that is based on wrong premises and was refuted on Friday last by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he said, as reported at page 198 of Hansard:

> Courts of justice have to be strictly objective and cannot regard themselves as the arbitrators of any party, but as the authority to decide between contending parties. That is the only sort of judicial body that can have the responsibility that has been exercised and discharged by the privy council.

The Prime Minister then rightly concluded that the present measure had as its object the:

> . . . . substitution of one body of men for another body of men to pronounce upon conflicts which may arise in connection with provincial or minority rights. I cannot see how it could have any effect unless one takes the view that the body of men we intend to substitute are not as reliable as the body of men for whom they are being substituted. I am of the opinion that the body of men we intend to substitute will not be inferior in ability, in integrity or in learning to the body of men for whom they are substituted.

On this point, Mr. Speaker, it is to be noted that Canada is not the only confederation where jurisdictional disputes between states or provinces and the federal authority may exist; yet no other nation in the world is in Canada's position of having to go outside the country to a court of another state for the interpretation of its constitution. The United States, Switzerland and Australia are the three countries where the settling of jurisdictional disputes between constitutional authorities can be more suitably compared to our problems.

When presenting his amendment the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said, as reported at page 194 of Hansard:

> Questions have been raised as to the interpretation of constitutional matters by the Supreme Court of the United States, and it has been suggested there that it has not been wise in every case to place upon the Supreme Court of the United States the onus of actually writing the constitution. Because of that very fact the Supreme Court of the United States has in certain cases become the centre of political controversy. I should hope that, by every device within the wisdom of this parliament in both its houses, the respect for the Supreme Court of Canada will be preserved by keeping it aloof from anything that might savour of controversy.

I think, Mr. Speaker, it should be first admitted that the controversies which arose in the United States were more as between the executive and the judicial than as between the states and the federal authority. Every strong-minded president has had fights with the supreme court, because of its disallowance of federal laws. The question of states' rights was seldom referred to the courts by the states themselves, but rather by private interests trying to evade the consequences of federal legislation. Robert H. Jackson, who is now sitting on the supreme court, says in his book, "The Struggle for Judicial Supremacy": "States' rights have tended to become a vested private interest in federal impotency rather than a positive privilege of the states themselves."

It is generally admitted that the supreme court in the United States has seen its power considerably expanded and has become through its own interpretations a supreme arbiter between states and federal rights, although no such authority is mentioned in article III, sections 1 and 2 of the constitution of the United States, defining its duties. Section 2 reads:

> The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more states; between a state and citizens of another state; between citizens of different states; between citizens of the same state claiming lands under grants of different states; and between a state, or the citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens or subjects.

As Jackson says:

> The exercise of a reviewing authority over state legislation, especially when supplemented by similar view of congressional enactments, made the court the arbitrator of those most persistent and difficult of our intergovernmental conflicts, those between state and nation. This has come about—

He confirms what I just said by reading the constitution. I repeat:

> This has come about although there is no express grant of jurisdiction over controversies between state and nation as there is over those between two states.

Yet it was found necessary through the development of the states for the supreme court to become the arbiter between the states and the federal government. What objection is there to our supreme court becoming the same arbiter between provincial and federal rights? Be that as it may, the United States in 1787 did not find it necessary to keep the appeals to the courts of their former mother country to decide their jurisdictional disputes. That country has had the benefit of a great national juridical institution that has nobly filled its part in the orderly development of United States governmental institutions.

The Swiss faced the same situation and it took them some time to reach a workable system of jurisdictional interpretation. Their difficulties were more in the nature of conflicts between the laws affecting the interests of private individuals of different cantons than disputes between the states and the central authority. I think that the first constitution of Switzerland that may be of interest to us as a point of comparison with our own situation is the constitution of 1848 which represented a compromise between federalism and centralization. No matter how much of an improvement it made over the period preceding, that constitution did not prove perfectly suitable. But it did promote unity in the country, equality between its citizens, and a reasonable degree of uniformity in the laws of the different states or cantons.

That constitution did establish a federal court but it had had jurisdiction over disputes between cantons or between the federal government and a canton only in matters which did not concern public law. The general task of watching over the observance of the constitution, the federal laws and the concordats was entrusted to the chief executive organ known as the federal council; jurisdiction over constitutional disputes between cantons was reserved to the federal legislature.

However, this procedure was found to be impracticable and cumbersome and was changed in 1874 when a new constitution was enacted, which constitution has remained in force until now. It has succeeded in doing away, as much as could be expected, with conflicts of law as between the different cantons. At the same time the federal court was granted wider jurisdiction by the constitution of 1874 so that it then became really the supreme court of the land. The judges were appointed by the federal government and not by the states, as some people may want to do in our country. You never can tell, but we may be faced in this house with the proposal that while the principle is all right, the judges should be appointed partly by the provinces. In none of the confederations of which I have studied the institutions does the constitution provide for that procedure.

The federal parliament or the central authority appoints the judges to the high court or supreme court of the country. Nor do the statutes of any of these three confederations outside of Canada provide that a certain unanimity shall be asked from the judges who sit on that court on matters considered by the court. This may come before us and I think we should now settle in our minds that that would be a false premise to follow. We should continue with the supreme court that we have now, to be amended by the present bill.

The Swiss found a way to adjust their jurisdictional disputes through the medium of a federal supreme court and nobody has ever doubted the integrity and ability of those federal judges to interpret the constitution and to decide as between state and federal rights.

In Australia a federal high court was established by an article of the constitution and its jurisdiction is either conferred by the constitution or derived from parliament. The court has original jurisdiction by the constitution in all matters arising under any treaty; affecting consuls or other representatives of other countries, in which the commonwealth or a person suing or being sued on behalf of the commonwealth is a party; between states, or between residents of different states, or between a state and a resident of another state; in which a writ of mandamus or prohibition or an injunction is sought against an officer of the commonwealth.

Their parliament may also confer original jurisdiction upon their high court in any matter arising under the constitution or involving its interpretation arising under any laws made by the parliament, and so on. In that country the high court is supreme in connection with questions of jurisdiction as between state and federal rights.

It would be a sad state of affairs if we in Canada could not express the same confidence in the integrity and competence of those who may be called to sit as members of our highest tribunal. The time has arrived for Canada to assume all the attributes of nationhood. Let us rejoice that we are privileged to sit in a parliament that will take the necessary steps to emancipate us definitely. Let us rejoice that a Canadian statesman, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), has had the courage to take the matter openly to the Canadian people in the course of an election campaign. Let us rejoice that our people had reached sufficient maturity and had enough pride in their nationhood to give such an overwhelming mandate to the man who spoke to them so frankly.

Before I take my seat may I remind the house that the Liberal party has been first and foremost in the emancipation of Canada. History recognizes that Laurier carried this country from its status of a colony to that of a dominion. It will also bear out that Mackenzie King raised it from the status of a dominion to that of a sovereign nation. Today, after consulting the people of Canada, the present Prime Minister is taking steps to erase the last vestiges of colonialism from our institutions. Strange as it may seem to my hon. friends opposite, the people of Canada seem to like it because they gave Laurier fifteen years of office, they kept at the helm Mackenzie King for the longest period any commonwealth or empire Prime Minister ever enjoyed the confidence of his people, and exactly three months ago today they returned the present Prime Minister with the largest majority in Canadian history.

Let us carry on the will of the people. Let us tonight, on this anniversary of that unequivocal expression of popular will, pass this measure with a sense of pride and satisfaction at having taken Canada one more step toward its glorious destiny as a sovereign nation.

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it is with a certain amount of temerity that I rise to take part in this debate, realizing as I do that I follow distinguished legal luminaries and will be followed by other gentlemen who are noted in that field. At the outset may I say that as a Canadian I feel that I can support the general principles of this bill. However, there is one feature on which I should like to have some enlightenment which I am sure some of the distinguished legal gentlemen on the government benches will be able to supply.

It seems to me that in this particular case we are to some degree setting Quebec apart from the other provinces of the dominion. I hasten to assure you that I understand that the civil code of that province is different from the laws applying to the other nine provinces of Canada, but I still feel that there must be some way of overcoming this difference. Since coming down here in 1945 it has been my privilege to become the friend of a great number of members of parliament from Quebec. It seems to me that we give less than full measure of credit to their generosity, their tolerance, and their confidence in the rest of Canada, when we provide by statute that they should have some special protection. From my knowledge of my colleagues from the province of Quebec, I must say that I trust them sincerely, and I hope that I enjoy their confidence as they have always led me to believe that I do.

This is the twenty-first parliament. Canada has come of age. She is twenty-one parliaments old, and, if it ever existed, I think it is time we should forget the fact that there is a minority in Canada. I myself am the product of Scotch, Irish and English ancestors and a Protestant. I think in numbers that particular combination may be a minority in Canada. I have the feeling, however, that my French-speaking compatriots are the same Canadians that I am. In dealing with this particular measure in the twenty-first parliament of Canada, it would be a wonderful thing if we could say that we trust those Canadians who speak French, and that those Canadians who speak French trust us.

The people of Canada from coast to coast have just elected as Prime Minister an eminent barrister from the province of Quebec. Every province but one has given him its complete confidence. We have said to him in effect that he can appoint nine members of the supreme court. We have said to him that we trust him because we know he will be fair. I should like to believe that all the people of the province of Quebec share the same confidence in their Prime Minister that the rest of the provinces of Canada do. I am quite sure from the representation that the province of Quebec has sent to this house that the people of Quebec feel the same as we do in British Columbia and the other provinces. I do not think that Canadian public opinion would tolerate anything less than a complete measure of fairness to any minority. I am not willing to concede that French-speaking Canadians are a minority in Canada. As I said before, like myself they are Canadians.

I do not think the Canadian parliament has to demonstrate by a rigid statute that we will be fair to any section of our population. I do not intend to move an amendment to the bill when it reaches the committee stage. I think it would be a most difficult thing for any hon. member of the house either to vote to delete that clause or to retain it. I think it would be most difficult to define our feelings in that regard, but I hope that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and the Prime Minister will give consideration to removing it if it is possible, and at the same time retain that measure of confidence on the part of the people of Quebec that we all desire so much.

[Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni).]

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): In rising to speak on this matter, may I say at the beginning that I believe it is one which should certainly be approached, as far as one can do so, entirely free from prejudice, whether political or personal, and passion. I am going to endeavour to carry out that belief in the remarks I am about to make, but I feel that there are considerations which should be put before the house again in support of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that the bill be deferred for six months.

There have been three main points advanced by speakers on the government side in support of the bill, one by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and two by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I should like to deal with those points briefly before going on to advance some contrary reasons why the six months hoist should be approved. The first point, made by the Minister of Justice, was made, I believe, in the first paragraph of his speech when he said that Canada suffers under two badges of colonialism, one of which is, as he put it, the fact that we have not a court of final jurisdiction in that we still have appeals to the privy council.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker—and I say this with deference—unfortunately that is an appeal to prejudice. I felt that it destroyed the validity of much that the minister said subsequently because it is so easy to make a general statement such as, it is a badge of colonialism, and thus to arouse all the feelings of nationalism, and to oppose the argument of those who do not favour the measure, by the suggestion that those who disagree are colonially minded. If you go on doing that, you soon get away from intelligent discussion, and the discussion proceeds on the basis of prejudice. I feel that something should be said about the question whether it is a badge of colonialism. Surely the proper definition of a badge of colonialism is that the country suffers under some disability. If it is unable to exercise its full sovereignty, then certainly I would agree that would be a badge of colonialism. But that is not the case here. We have had the right for eighteen or nineteen years, ever since the Statute of Westminster, to abolish appeals to the privy council. We have not yet chosen to do so, but the mere fact that we can do so at any time that it pleases us to do so seems to me to make it—again with deference to the minister—a ridiculous suggestion to say that our failure to do so is a badge of colonialism.

I would remind the house that the Statute of Westminster was passed while a Conservative was Prime Minister, the late Lord Bennett. As a free nation, a full nation, and a sovereign nation, as we are and as we have been since the Statute of Wesminster, if we choose to say, "No, we find that there are certain advantages in keeping our right to appeal to the privy council and of our own accord we are going to keep that right," then I suggest that is the mark of a fully grown, mature nation. I suggest that it would be the mark of a childish nation to allow our feelings to be swayed by the unfounded statement that it is a badge of colonialism and, as it were, to throw out our chest and say, "Now I am a man, away with all the former trappings; we will have no more appeals to the privy council."

I think there is a great deal to be said for the more sane and sober approach, that this matter should be viewed on the basis of the question: Where do Canada's best interests lie? Will our interests be served by maintaining the right of appeal to the privy council? I believe we should approach the problem from that point of view, and that point of view alone. As I say, to my mind the minister's speech, based as it was on the first assertion that the retention of appeals was a badge of colonialism, loses what would otherwise have been a good deal of its validity.

The second point was made by the Prime Minister, in the course of his reply to the leader of the opposition, when he used words to this effect: If you believe that in Canada we are capable of setting up a court and finding men capable of being judges so that we can erect a court of final jurisdiction which will be a credit to Canada, then you will vote for the bill; but if you believe that we are not capable of doing that in Canada, then you will vote against the bill. I feel that that argument, Mr. Speaker, must also be rejected as an appeal to prejudice.

We are not arguing that the bill should be delayed because we cannot find or cannot build up in Canada a court competent to be a court of final jurisdiction. We are saying the bill should be delayed because there are considerations which should be borne in mind, which should be discussed and perhaps acted upon in order to make that a competent court of final jurisdiction, and that those things should be done before the bill passes. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) certainly was not accurate in his argument; and I think he was not accurate because in this respect he is a partisan. I use that word in its proper meaning; he is a partisan of the point of view that the Supreme Court of Canada must be made the final court right now, and that appeals to the privy council must be abolished right now. That is his view. From a reading of his speeches and his statements I gather that this has been his view for some time. He is a partisan of that point of view, and that has led him to make that statement. As a result of his partisanship he sees in the mind of everyone opposed to his views some suggestion that we in Canada are not capable of building up a supreme court which can be a court of final jurisdiction. That is not the case at all. We have other grounds for opposing the passage of this bill at this time, and those grounds I shall advance in a few moments.

The third point to be made in support of the position of the government, and quite a strong point, is that only recently they received a mandate from the people to carry through this project and abolish appeals to the privy council. As I say, to me that seems a very strong point, but I do not think it is unanswerable when put forward as an argument in favour of passing this bill right now in its present form. After all, Mr. Speaker, the mandate received by the Prime Minister was to abolish appeals to the privy council. As I read his statements made at that time, nothing much was said about the details of the constitutional changes which might be presumed to accompany that step. Now we find the proposal to abolish appeals to the privy council brought into the house and being pressed through without any detailed indication of what other constitutional changes are to accompany it or follow it.

It may be that the provinces will have views as to what provisions should be enacted in reference to this question of amending the constitution in Canada. I do not know, and no hon. member of this house knows, what their views will be; but I do say they should be given an opportunity to meet at that constitutional conference and put forward their views, if they wish to do so, before this bill becomes law. In effect this bill is an amendment to the constitution, both directly and indirectly. I believe that statement can be made for the reason that while the Supreme Court of Canada at the present time is set up under a statute of the federal parliament, and what we are doing here is amending that statute, nevertheless if this bill becomes law our supreme court will become the court of final jurisdiction with respect to constitutional appeals. So, from the day this bill becomes law, if a constitutional conflict arises it will be settled by the Supreme Court of Canada.

As I will show in a moment, there is nothing in the bill which even says the law in effect at the present time, by virtue of the various interpretations placed upon the constitution by the privy council, shall be carried forward into the future if this bill passes.

So we might find that in the very first case to come before the Supreme Court of Canada they would place an interpretation upon the constitution very different from the interpretations which have been placed upon it by the privy council. So almost directly, and certainly indirectly, we are providing machinery to amend the constitution. A moment ago I said I would make my address without appealing to prejudice, so I shall try to use reasoned words. I say it is unwise to proceed with this bill at the present time, before holding the conference forecast in the speech from the throne and giving the provinces an opportunity to put forward their views as to what should be the constitution of this court which we are making the court of final appeal, so it will have their confidence and the confidence of the people of Canada—as we on this side, as much as those on the other side, want it to have—as a court competent to have final jurisdiction in constitutional questions.

Some may say that I am drawing a long bow, that it is pretty far-fetched to suggest that, the day after this bill passed, the supreme court might place an altogether different interpretation upon the constitution. Well, here we are passing laws, and I think we have to examine all the possibilities if those laws go into effect. That is a possibility. Certainly that is so in view of the statement by the chief justice on June 2 of this year, to which reference has been made already in this debate, in which he is reported as having said that the supreme court is not now bound by the decisions of the privy council, and particularly that we should not be bound by the decisions of a court which, as he said, is four thousand miles from here, where they have not the same mentality. Certainly I think it is within the bounds of possibility that almost immediately a completely different interpretation will begin to be placed upon the constitution, once this law becomes effective, unless the legislation contains some safeguard against that possibility.

Another reason for saying that this is a constitutional change which should not be proceeded with at the present time, or until the other constitutional procedures have been worked out with the provinces, is that surely it is desirable to avoid anything which might destroy confidence in the court. The Supreme Court of Canada is the creation of the federal parliament alone. That being so, its constitution can be altered at will by a simple majority vote of this house. In the history of this country, as in other countries, majority votes have been taken as the result of appeals to prejudice and passion. I believe it is correct to say that in some instances those who have taken part in these majority votes have perhaps regretted their action, or it has shown that the action was unwise or taken in haste. That could happen again.

I repeat that our Supreme Court of Canada is the creation of the federal parliament. It is not a part of the constitution, as is the case with the Supreme Court of the United States. In that country the supreme court is provided for in the constitution, and a change in the framework of the supreme court there involves a constitutional amendment, with a two-thirds vote of the states and a two-thirds vote of both houses of congress. So a change in the composition of the Supreme Court of the United States is very difficult to achieve; yet it has taken place within our own generation, and the change has been made for purposes which cannot be said to be other than political. One does not wish to cast aspersions on the United States, but the simple fact is, as we recall, that the Supreme Court of the United States has been packed by the addition of judges in the hope that those judges would hold the same political views as the administration of the day and therefore would give decisions favourable to that administration. That has happened in the country to the south of us, although the change in the constitution of their court is so difficult. How much easier it would be, how much more possible for the same sort of thing to happen here, where the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada is not provided for in the constitution but in an act of the federal parliament.

If we look at it from that point of view, Mr. Speaker, we can see what we are being asked to do by the passage of this bill. We are being asked to set up a new framework within which our constitution can be amended. In the speech from the throne we find a further indication that amendments to the constitution will be suggested with respect to those things which are under federal jurisdiction, and that a conference will be called to discuss the means of amending the constitution with respect to those things which are not entirely the subject of federal jurisdiction. This certainly suggests that the government feels that it is quite proper that it should decide which fields of legislation are federal and which are provincial. If the government feels a certain thing is within the federal field, then it will amend the constitution by an act of the federal house. I believe that is the position taken by the Prime Minister.

We have a court which, by this bill, we are making the court of final jurisdiction; yet the constitution of this court can be amended by a vote of this house. What tremendous possibilities are open to the federal government to say something is a matter of federal jurisdiction and pass a law accordingly, then if any conflict arises sub- of the Supreme Court of the United States made the final court, and ask them to say whether they are right or wrong. What a tremendous field is opened up by such a situation! Hon. members may feel I am painting a far-fetched picture and that no responsible government would attempt to circumvent the constitution by such an obvious ruse. I only remind you again, Mr. Speaker, that a similar attempt was made in the United States in our own generation, and it succeeded even though the alteration of the constitution of the Supreme Court of the United States is much more difficult than the alteration of the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada.

It is not that we are opposed to the idea of making the supreme court the court of final jurisdiction, but for these reasons we feel it would be more statesmanlike, more conducive to national unity in Canada if, before proceeding with this bill with its far-reaching possibilities, the government were to summon the conference to deal with the constitution and receive the views of the provinces, the other parties to confederation. With those views in mind, the government could arrive at a method of amending the constitution, including a constitution for the supreme court which would be acceptable to, and would have the confidence of, all parties in Canada. I believe I can speak for this party when I say that, if that approach were made, it would certainly have the confidence of this party and, I presume, of the party opposite.

I believe I speak for this party also when I say that to hurry this bill through the house, with all the potentialities I have described, before calling that other conference could not do otherwise than inspire a lack of confidence in the motives and procedure being followed by the government.

Up to the present time I have been dealing with the points advanced by the government in favour of considering this bill tonight, and also in support of the resolution for a six months hoist. I realize that the six months hoist sounds ominous. I know how often it is used with the intention of killing a bill. We are at the beginning of a parliament, however. No one on this side is questioning the fact that the government has received a mandate to carry out these changes. Supposing it is alleged that is our motive in suggesting a six months hoist, what good would be accomplished? There will be another session next year, another session the year after, and one the following year. The government majority is not going to shrink too quickly. In looking at the faces of the members opposite, I may say they all appear reasonably healthy. I see no reason to suppose that, during the life of this parliament, the government majority will vanish overnight. There will be plenty of opportunity to implement this legislation. It is not necessary to push it through as the first business of the first session. I believe there are very compelling reasons why it should be delayed until a constitutional conference can be held.

Government speakers have made reference to prominent Canadian statesmen and jurists who felt Canada should abolish appeals to the privy council. I should like to refer to one prominent Liberal statesman, who I believe was minister of justice at one time and who did hold that view while he was a cabinet minister in Canada. Upon further reflection, he changed his opinion. Edward Blake, the minister to whom I refer, spent years advocating the abolition of appeals to the privy council. Later, he went to England and spoke in the House of Commons, of which he had become a member. In referring to this matter in the British House of Commons in 1900 he used these words, which are reported in an article in the Canadian Historical Review, volume 27, at page 267:

> I speak from experience; because I know in the country whence I come, while a different set of circumstances obtains and there are different provisions, there is yet a written federal constitution; and it was found with us that where bitter controversies had been excited, where political passions had been engendered, where considerable disputations had prevailed, where men eminent in power and politics ranged themselves on opposite sides, it was no disadvantage but a great advantage to have an opportunity of appealing to an external tribunal such as the judicial committee, for the interpretation of the constitution on such matters.

I believe the remarks of Blake on that occasion are applicable to the controversies which have been raging in Canada within the last few years. Unfortunately, all the circumstances which he described have occurred and the feelings to which he referred have been aroused. In my view that is a statesmanlike utterance. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but I believe it represents the true state of the facts. In such a circumstance, it is no disadvantage but a very great advantage to have an opportunity of submitting your differences to a judicial body quite removed from the heat, passion and prejudice of the discussion which has taken place.

Let me make this quite clear, too, that in taking the position we have in advocating this six months hoist we reject absolutely the suggestion that has been made—without hesitation, I say improperly made, whether it be made by the Prime Minister or anyone else —that we do not believe the Supreme Court of Canada is capable of being the court of final jurisdiction. We have no such feeling.

We have the utmost confidence in the supreme court. We have the utmost confidence in the men who sit on the supreme court. We have the utmost confidence that other great and qualified men, capable of being judges of such a court, can be found in succeeding years. Our lack of confidence is in the ability of government—and, Mr. Speaker, I am not referring to this particular government. Our lack of confidence arises because we know that governments or those who form them are politicians and as such are subject to political prejudices and passions as human beings. We know that governments have been known to interfere with the constitution and with the composition of the courts.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member is talking nonsense now.

Mr. Fulton: What we want to do, in so far as is possible in this country, is to see to it that the court which is set up in Canada as the court of final jurisdiction is a court which cannot be interfered with in that manner. That is our reason for moving the six months hoist.

There is another matter to which I wish to refer, and perhaps it is more a matter of detail than anything else, Mr. Speaker; it is the omission from this bill of any provision which would preserve the principle of stare decisis. This principle has been referred to before. It is not a legal matter of interest only to lawyers but is a matter of interest to every one of us as Canadians, because that principle means simply this. It means that law is a settled thing and that the circumstances under which a man finds himself today—that is, his rights, privileges and duties—shall be the same tomorrow, and that we cannot change the law overnight, as it were, so that we suddenly find ourselves with a different set of obligations, rights and duties. That is the basis of the principle of stare decisis. It means that you follow a set of consistent laws; it means that if one court has decided so-and-so, then the same court with perhaps different judges will be bound by that decision and cannot start off at a tangent. It affects every one of us in our daily lives, and I think it is a matter of great regret that the government has not seen fit to embody that principle firmly in this bill.

I have referred to the statement of the chief justice. It is only a newspaper report; and while I am not suggesting that he has been inaccurately reported, it may be that the reporter did not quite appreciate what the chief justice was saying. But it certainly gives rise to misgivings to find that the chief justice is reported as saying that we are not bound by decisions of the privy council, when we all thought that we were bound by them because of that principle of stare decisis. If there is no such principle embodied in this act, then on the day after the act becomes law, it is possible that the court can say: We are not bound by those former decisions and we are going to decide quite differently.

There are plenty of precedents for the embodiment of that principle in legislation when constitutions are set up or changed. My own province of British Columbia has it in the Laws Declaratory Act. I believe every new province of Canada which was created subsequent to confederation had a similar statute, the effect of which was that the law as interpreted by the courts, as in effect at the date that the constitution of the province was established, shall continue to be the law in effect from that day forward.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is that British Columbia's idea now?

Mr. Fulton: That is the statute of the province of British Columbia as found in the revised statutes of the province issued last year. I have it here before me. It is on the basis of that statute that I am making my statement.

As I say, there are plenty of precedents for it, and all it means is that it gives us a guarantee that the law as it exists today will be the law for tomorrow, without the possibility of a sudden overnight change. One recognizes, of course, that as time goes on the courts place different interpretations on the previous decisions. But one of the reasons that they modify the laws only gradually is that they regard themselves as bound by that principle of stare decisis. It is in our laws at the present time. If that principle were not incorporated in the act, the court would be free to launch out on any new tangent that it might choose to follow and change all the precedents overnight. I certainly believe that no restriction would be imposed upon the court and that a great deal of certainty would be engendered if such a provision were inserted in this bill.

I think the words I have put forward are all I have to say in this respect, Mr. Speaker. In conclusion I repeat that there is no suggestion of colonialism in a free and fully sovereign country saying of its own accord, if it wishes to do so, that we will preserve to ourselves the right or the opportunity, if we wish it, to submit disputes on questions between ourselves, where we know that passion and prejudice may be aroused, to a body not open and subject to that passion and those prejudices. We have had the right to end that for nearly twenty years. The fact that we do not exercise that right of our own accord cannot be said to be a badge of colonialism.

Finally I just want to emphasize again the fact that in voting for the six months hoist, as I intend to when the vote is called, there is no suggestion of lack of confidence in the present supreme court within the realm of the duties for which they have been appointed; nor is there any suggestion of lack of confidence in our ability to set up a supreme court which may be a court of final jurisdiction. But I believe that there is a lack of confidence in various quarters of Canada or lack of certainty that the court as now constituted,—and I refer not to the personnel of the court but to the constitution of the court as such,—will, without anything further, command that confidence which we all want to see it command, when it is created, as it should be, a court of final jurisdiction.

Mr. Cruickshank: I did not want to interrupt the hon. member when he was speaking but I should like to ask him a question.

The Acting Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am only asking a question. It is this. Can the hon. member who has just spoken tell me one municipality or one city which agrees that we should not abolish the appeal to the privy council? He brought the municipalities into it. I would ask him to tell me one municipality.

Mr. Fulton: I do not believe I mentioned any cities or towns. I do not know of any that expressed an opinion.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member mentioned municipalities and he mentioned British Columbia.

Mr. Fulton: I do not believe they have been consulted.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I should like to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to make a few brief comments. To those of us who were born in the old land and got our start there, breaking the tie with the old land causes us to think. I do not think lightly in any way of the great benefits that have come to Canada from the people of Great Britain. I would say that the tie that binds us to the old land is stronger than a legal tie. It is the tie of the home, and the affection of a mother.

I must admit, as I sat on the other side of the house ten or twelve years ago listening to the Hon. C. H. Cahan, a former cabinet minister and an outstanding legal gentleman, I heard him say with great enthusiasm that Canada's connection with the privy council of Great Britain should be abolished. At that time I was rooming with a bright legal mind and we talked this thing over. During those years I came to my own conclusion. I am not a lawyer but on many occasions I have been thankful for the advice that these bright minds have been able to give to me and keep me out of difficulties.

The reasons why I am going to support the motion are three. They are very plain and they are clear to me. The first is, as was stated by some others, it would cost too much. I know an hon. member from Toronto said that he had a case appealed to the privy council. Well, that was all right if the city of Toronto was paying the bill. But suppose it was a farmer who had a car of cattle. He sold the cattle to a packing house and something went wrong, and he had to go to court. Suppose the case was appealed to the privy council. What farmer in Canada or anywhere else could pay a corporation lawyer's fee to go over to England to fight his case? He simply could not do it; it would cost too much. That is the first thing that the common people of Canada think a good deal about.

The second thing is, it is too slow to take a case to the privy council. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) the history of some of those cases. They do not take three months or six months but several years, and the costs pile up all the time. We in Canada like to have a thing done. We like to get through it, win or lose, get back and settle down to business. Therefore I say that one of the outstanding arguments against appeals to the privy council from our Canadian courts is that they are too slow. We want action.

My third argument is this. Those of us who took quite a while to get through our courses know that our universities are thorough. They give a thorough training. I do not know much about our law schools except from the men who have come through them. I know that our law schools have been pretty thorough in training our young lawyers, and we have outstanding examples of that on all sides of the house. We know that the men are well trained. I have reason to think that the jurists of Canada need not take second place to the jurists of any country in the world, even Great Britain. Therefore I say that it is a slight to our jurists of Canada to have to send our cases across to the privy council. Our jurists understand Canadian life and are more familiar with it than the British jurists, who perhaps have never been out of the old land in their lives. We have a peculiar life in Canada. It is all our own. It is a blending of all the nationalities of the world, you might say, and we think we are the cream of the world and we are the best in the world. Therefore I say that it is a mistake to send our appeals to the privy council. These three reasons stand out, Mr.

Speaker. I support this legislation because it costs too much to send appeals to the privy council, it is too slow, and our jurists are the equal of any in the world.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I propose to speak in favour of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I should like to advise hon. members that I do not intend to reiterate all of the arguments used by hon. members who spoke in favour of it, but I entirely agree with anything they have said. It is my intention to ask you, sir, to direct your attention to one point only, namely, that in this bill should be written a clause whereby the former decisions of the privy council would be followed.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that of all the decisions of the privy council in the past eighty-two years, the most important one, so far as we of the province of Newfoundland are concerned, is that one which is popularly known to us at least as the Labrador boundary decision. I do not want to be thought entirely provincial in speaking this evening, but this matter is of such importance to us that I cannot help referring to it particularly. I may add that the decision of the privy council of March 1927, or a reference to it, was incorporated in the terms of union between what is now the province of Newfoundland and the Dominion of Canada.

Paragraph 2 of the terms of union states:

> The province of Newfoundland shall comprise the same territory as at the date of union, that is to say, the island of Newfoundland and the islands adjacent thereto, the coast of Labrador as delimited in the report delivered by the judicial committee of His Majesty's privy council on the first day of March, 1927, and approved by His Majesty in his privy council on the twenty-second day of March, 1927, and the islands adjacent to the said coast of Labrador.

That particular provision was inserted in the terms of union for one specific purpose, namely, to allay the fears of the people of my province—and I am sure hon. members of the province of Quebec will excuse me when I say this—of the aspirations of the province of Quebec toward our territory of Labrador. When speaking a few days ago I said that so far as we of Newfoundland are concerned this decision is of paramount importance. A great body of iron has been discovered in Labrador, and the great body of ore which has been discovered in Quebec is, practically speaking, a continuation of the same body. Our ore body lies immediately adjacent to what is presumed to be the line of demarcation between the province of Quebec and our territory of Labrador. As hon. members know, the paragraph in the terms of union which I read says:

> The coast of Labrador as delimited in the report delivered by the judicial committee of His Majesty's privy council.

But the joker in that particular wording is this: It has been delimited but it has never been specifically marked out. I understand that that demarcation is taking place at the present time, but it is not final as yet, and no final decision as to the boundary is in existence at the present time. You can understand how that might bring about a reconsideration of the decision in this matter.

I am informed that some time in 1947 a survey was made by the Quebec authorities from which a supposedly official map was drawn. I saw that map myself and it takes in approximately 100 miles of our territory in Labrador containing a valuable part of the iron ore concession. I remarked the other evening that the premier of Quebec stated last year that he intends to reopen the decision of the privy council in this particular matter. If that is done, then greater importance must be given to the statement by the Chief Justice of Canada as quoted by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). I assume that the chief justice was correctly reported because no objection has been raised in the intervening time. If what he says is true then Newfoundland may be in for a little trouble. I am sure you will bear with me when I repeat what the chief justice is reported to have said. He is reported to have said: Why should we in Canada accept something that has been said four thousand miles away? Then the chief justice went on to say that the Supreme Court of Canada is the final court of the land and hence is not bound by judgments of the privy council.

If that opinion is the correct one then it may well be that we in Newfoundland who have surrendered our sovereignty by joining this great dominion may now be placed in the position where we will lose a valuable part of our territory to another province. Is it fair that at this early stage of our becoming one of you we should be in fear of such a thing happening? Let me assure hon. members from Quebec that I have nothing but the kindliest feelings for them and for all the people of Quebec, but this matter is much too serious as far as Newfoundland is concerned not to be referred to in the way I have.

I should like to quote from Hansard and from the resolution passed by the Canadian Bar Association. I do not need to read all that resolution because I think hon. members are quite familiar with it, but I should like to direct particular attention to one part of the resolution which was referred to by the Prime Minister when he was replying to the leader of the opposition. The Prime Minister is reported on page 197 of Hansard of September 23, 1949, as follows:

> As to the resolution adopted by the Canadian Bar Association, I think it is worthy of great respect because I believe that all those who attend such a meeting, as do those who attend meetings of other professional bodies, attempt to act objectively and to give their fellow citizens the benefit of the best kind of opinion and advice they can tender. I think perhaps the most important provision of this resolution is that when the appeal to the privy council is abolished, provision should be made that the court consist of nine judges; and there are various organizational provisions that are contained in the legislation now submitted to this house. But subparagraph (g) of the resolution reads as follows:
> That the rule of stare decisis ought to continue to be applied with respect to past decisions of the court, as well as with respect to past decisions of the judicial committee.
> That is something with which I entirely agree.

I presume the Prime Minister was speaking on behalf of the government. If he agrees with that part of the resolution, then why not have it written into this bill? The Prime Minister went on to say:

> I think it is a part of the system of the administration of justice in British countries that the decisions are regarded as binding upon themselves and upon all courts of lower jurisdiction, until they are modified or set aside by legislative action.

Was there any modification or was there any setting aside by legislative action before the comments attributed to the Chief Justice of Canada were uttered? Certainly no such action was taken.

The previous speaker seems to have a good opinion of lawyers, or at least of some lawyers, and he seems to value the Canadian Bar Association highly. If you are going to build a house or make alterations in a house, what do you do? You call in an architect and obtain his opinion. But what has happened in this particular case? We are planning here to make alterations in our legal house and we have received the advice of the finest architects in the country. Judging from some of those that I have met, I would say that they are possibly the finest legal architects in the world. I am referring to the Canadian Bar Association.

These architects of the Canadian Bar Association have made definite recommendations with respect to the alterations proposed in this legal house of ours. Are you going to be wise and follow the recommendations of those architects whose business it is to give wise advice, or are you going to follow your own ideas? This matter is in our hands.

In so far as disputes between private individuals are concerned, I can see that there would be justification for such a bill, but when there are disputes between provinces to be settled it seems to me that we should have an independent tribunal to adjudicate the matter. If anyone can present a sensible argument against that contention I shall be glad to hear it. As Lord Hewart has stated, it is necessary not only that justice be done, but that it should seem to be done. In conclusion may I say that, in view of the proposed early consultation with the provinces, in view of the recommendation of the Canadian Bar Association, and in view of there being no logical reason for haste in the passing of this bill, the only sensible thing to do is to vote for the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. R. E. Anderson (Norfolk): I should like to speak for a short time in support of the bill and against the amendment. I am a new member of the house, and being a farmer I do not know the finer points of law. From a practical standpoint, however, the bill seems to me to be reasonable and sensible. My forefathers came from Great Britain, and no man here could owe greater allegiance to Great Britain or be more patriotic. That allegiance is exceeded only by what I owe the Canada that gave me birth and a stake in this grand dominion.

I live with my family and my grandchildren in the county of Norfolk. I believe I shall have to apologize to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) for what I am about to say because I may seem to be quoting him, but I had no opportunity to revise my remarks. I refuse to admit that there are in any country in the world men of greater ability, greater knowledge of legal affairs, more sensible, or better able to legislate for Canada than Canadians. Six months will make little difference in their qualifications. We are proud of our pioneers, we are proud of our soldiers, we are proud of our statesmen, we are proud of our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the government. Let us be proud of our judges and show our faith in them. I follow the leadership of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) who is sponsoring the bill.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): I wish to speak very briefly on this subject as a layman. We have heard a great many speeches by lawyers about the abolition of appeals to the privy council. I should like to give the point of view of one who has not been trained in the profession of law. May I say that in many ways I wish I had been trained in the profession of law because I have a very great admiration for lawyers, and I believe anybody who belittles the legal profession does so for reasons of jealousy or otherwise.

Twenty-two years ago this month the late Hon. Hugh Guthrie was discussing in this house a similar proposition. He set forth the difficulty of explaining the federal system, under which we have our constitution, to the privy council. At that time it was his opinion, expressed both in and out of the house, that there would be difficulty in having the constitutional difficulties of a federal system properly appreciated by a body of men who trained under a central government parliament, learned though they might be in the law. I think that has been demonstrated to be correct. I think that the history of the last quarter of a century has shown that decisions have been made by the privy council which indicated that possibly they did not appreciate the peculiar system of the Canadian federal constitution. That being so, there is strong reason for some revision in the status of the court of final appeal, but there are also great difficulties involved.

As I see it, the danger is not that of colonialism, but it is the danger, if, as and when we establish a court of final and absolute appeal, of the imposition of a one-party state. Hon. members may think that is perhaps remote, but I should like to remind them that there is grave danger of that happening during the life of the twenty-first parliament of Canada. If I were Minister of Justice one of the reasons why I would proceed slowly with this measure would be because of the overwhelming majority of the present administration. When there is an overwhelming majority it is a very simple and short step to a feeling of omnipotence. We have an indication of that on this continent in the example of what happened in the United States supreme court. You may say that the impact of the United States system has nothing to do with us because the constitution of the United States is not the same as the constitution of Canada. That is so, but nevertheless it is a federal constitution and its impact upon Canada, both economically and politically, is great.

Speaking as a layman, there is a great danger of the court of last resort being appointed by one political party. There is also the danger of the changing position of government in the state. There is also the danger and the possibility of a party being elected to power whose ideology is not that in which the vast majority of the members of the present house believe. That leads to the possibility, not now but should such a change take place in the composition of this house, of the appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada of politically sympathetic justices. You may say that cannot happen. It certainly has happened in the United States, and in that connection I want to quote just one paragraph from the United States News:

> Supreme court is expected to shift sharply to the right in decisions to be made during the approaching term.
> Justice Tom Clark is likely to add his weight to the non-radical contingent of justices on the nation's highest bench.
>
> Radical bloc of four promises to be reduced to a minority of two active justices at the session that begins in October.

Mr. Cruickshank: What are you quoting from?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: He has to say what he is quoting from.

Mr. Adamson: If the hon. member were able to listen as well as he is able to interrupt—though perhaps at the moment whether or not he can hear is something only he can determine—he would have heard me say that I was quoting from the United States News.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, having seen what has happened in the United States, where we see a court that admittedly swings to the left or to the right, while we are operating under the federal system there is the danger that some time in the future we may face the same problems and difficulties that have arisen in the United States. I do not say there would ever be a packed court, but I do say there is the danger in future of having a court representing the political views of the administration in power rather than administering the laws as this supreme court of parliament wrote them. That was thought to be impossible in the United States, but it happened. All the Roosevelt appointees have contributed to a revision of constitutional law which shifts the protection of constitutional guarantees, speaking broadly, from the individual entrepreneur to organized collectivist associations. This has resulted in the enlargement of the discretion of legislative assemblies and more particularly of administrative agencies. Thus the trend toward the eclipse of the due process of law in the economic field, the alteration of the federal system by commercial and taxing powers, the decline of judicial review and the growth of absolutism have been fostered.

If this did not so closely fit the apparent over-all direction of the central government in Canada it would not be so alarming. Unfortunately, however, it quite accurately describes what the apparent policy of our government is and has been for some time. For this reason I believe in caution in dealing with this irrevocable matter. The law must be administered objectively. That is why I am supporting the amendment.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, may I assure you and the house and the minister that I shall not speak long enough to delay a decision this evening.

Mr. Cruickshank: At least you will know what you are talking about, which is more than can be said for the last speaker.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): In reply to that remark I wish I could say there were two of us, but I am afraid I cannot make that statement at the moment.

If we were to take the opinion of the so-called man in the street, who after all is the man who sent us all down here, I am sure we would find that opinion overwhelmingly in favour of the abolition of appeals to the privy council, to put it in one short sentence. And if the minister had brought in a bill couched in that simple language I believe it would have received a tremendous amount of support from the people of Canada. But the matter is not quite that simple; and because that sentiment is so prevalent throughout Canada it seems to me that we who are here, who have to agree on the terms of legislation, who, if you will, seek to carry out the general will of the people, have imposed upon us perhaps a special duty to examine this legislation with the utmost care, first to see that their will is carried out, and second to see that in altering a status which has existed for scores of years we do not run into some pitfalls which would cause those people holding that point of view to criticize us for having failed to properly achieve their main objective.

Speaking personally, I have heard many discussions of this matter throughout the years. I have given it considerable thought and I say publicly now that broadly speaking I have been and am now in favour of the abolition of appeals to the privy council. I have taken that position for a great many years, and I still take it.

An hon. Member: Will you vote accordingly?

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Someone says, "and vote accordingly". When I have finished perhaps that hon. gentleman will not care to make the same remark. Together with that view, however, I have also held the reservation that somehow or other I wished to find a referee or umpire in connection with jurisdictional matters as between the provinces and the dominion. If we play games we try to have them on neutral ground, and we always try to have referees who do not live in either of the contesting towns. That is a natural human instinct. We do not say we do not trust our opponents to provide good referees; we simply say we will see that they do not have a chance to do anything else. So I have thought—I must say I am weakening to some extent—that we should not do the great big sweep all at once. In 1931, I believe it was, we eliminated appeals in criminal matters. I think now we certainly should eliminate appeals in civil matters; and to a great extent I agree with the statement of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) that the question of cost is a very serious matter. It is a just criticism that appeals to the privy council cost money. Many people have not the money to carry the appeal to the ultimate court. I agree with that, so that is one of the many reasons which impel me to say I believe those appeals should be abolished. After all, that is merely a matter of dollars or of property, and that is about the only remaining appealable matter between person and person. I am therefore heartily in favour of the abolition of those appeals.

I shall not repeat many of the arguments which have been made with respect to jurisdiction as between the provinces and the dominion. I do not want someone to recklessly throw the statement at me that I am being political if I say what I have in mind. May I immediately add, sir, a compliment to you, the minister and the members of this house for the very high plane upon which this debate has been conducted. Listening to this debate, I have not heard a political word from either side of this house.

It does seem to me, however, that we have heard the constitution discussed. What is our constitution? Originally, it was the British North America Act of 1867, with such amendments as have been passed and such separate statutes as have been passed as, for example, the statute doing away with colonial laws validity, and the Statute of Westminster. We have not only that act, with its statutory amendments, but the interpretation of the act by our own Supreme Court of Canada and the privy council. This now forms a part of that same constitution. In a sense, it is an approach to what we call the constitution of the United Kingdom. There is not a word written, but it is a growth from precedent to precedent and is now as plain as can be. It seems to me that, in the light of that experience, the judicial interpretation has now become part and parcel of our constitution. We should do nothing to destroy that position.

I am not saying this bill does destroy it, but I realize that if we are to have a final court of appeal in Canada we cannot hamstring that court. We dare not do that. The fact is, however, that unless we have some qualifying restriction it is open to that court to throw out all the decisions of the privy council which are today a part of our constitution and, in that way, permit that court to write a constitution which should be written in this House of Commons.

When the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were created, about 1905, there was a clause written in to the effect that the law of the provinces should be the law as it was on July 1, 1870 or 1871. That simple provision has never been found to hamper our courts in any way. At the moment I am inclined to think that a simple declaration of that character should be inserted in this court statute. This could be done easily without hurting anyone's feelings, and yet this simple provision would ensure that our constitution would not be changed by a court. The constitution would remain the same as it was on the day the statute came into effect. If there is anything wrong with that, I hope the minister will tell me about it in his reply. My examination, sir, leaves me in a position where I cannot find much wrong with it.

I turn now to one other feature, and with that I shall conclude. A few weeks ago I was in Banff with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). We were all old members, perhaps too old, of the Canadian Bar Association. I am happy to remember that when the convention was held in Calgary some time during the thirties I had the honour of entertaining the president of the bar association in my home, the president being the Prime Minister of Canada at the moment. We have been very close to this question for a long time. It never received the attention it should have received from that body until recently. As we all remember, a private bill covering the matter was introduced by Mr. Jaenicke, who was then with us. I am inclined to think it was not introduced with sufficient consideration. I do not think there was any discussion on the matter in this house prior to the introduction of the bill by the late Mr. Cahan. I observe that the bill before us is practically in the same language as that used by Mr. Cahan.

At the moment, I am pleading for deliberation. I know the resolution of the Canadian Bar Association was brought forth because that organization felt it owed to the public a duty which had not yet been discharged—whether it be because of lack of opportunity or for any other reason does not matter. The bar association had not given the matter sufficient study. I look at the situation now and I say to myself, "Why is the matter so urgent?" At the moment, I am aware of no appeals extant to the privy council concerning jurisdiction. There is one, I recall, carried by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture with respect to something called margarine. By the way, I had some margarine the other day in my home and I did not know it was margarine. This is the only outstanding case of which I am aware.

This parliament is going to meet next year. The Canadian Bar Association has a large council and, if I remember correctly—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—that council was to give further study to the matter. The council meets half-yearly. I realize that this six months hoist is attached to an effort to kill something. It is regarded by many of us in this room, and by a large section of the public, as a smart political trick in killing legislation one does not like.

Now, having said what I have as to my views, and I will at least be here for a year or two barring an act of God, because it would take an act of God to put me out of Calgary West as the minister knows, it will be seen that I am generally in favour of abolition. I am not satisfied, however, but I am open to conviction if you like, on this question of jurisdictional appeals, involving as it does the interpretation of our constitution.

Let me agree with many hon. members who have spoken. It is easy to say that we have just as good lawyers in Canada as there are anywhere in the world. We can get desk pounding without any trouble by assertions of that kind which are generalities and really mean nothing. But I think we have just as good lawyers in Canada as there are anywhere. I have no doubt that we have. But over there in England at the moment there is a court which has been creating precedents and dealing with these matters not only from the Dominion of Canada but from other dominions, colonies and dependencies throughout the British commonwealth; it is a court which has had much experience. Without casting any aspersions at all on our judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, I would say that they are human. I may appear there myself some day, and I know they are human enough that I should not say anything against them here, and I do not intend to do so. Let us have no doubt about that. But the judges in these courts are human beings.

This court is in a sense a dominion court. Its members live in Ottawa; they stay in Ottawa. While I will admit that they have all the attributes of Caesar's wife, they are nevertheless an Ottawa court. There is not any doubt about that. As we are all going to be here for quite a while, I am asking the minister in all sincerity why this matter cannot stand. The debate has not been a long one. We have been on it for a matter of only a couple of days. I would ask why we cannot just let this matter stand. To do what, I may be asked. I reply: First, in order to permit cloudy-minded members like me to make up their minds on that one important point. Second, to permit the bar association and its council to study the matter. As the minister well knows, they are not self-seeking people. They are people who are seeking in this manner to do the best they can for the Dominion of Canada. With the greatest respect and deference, Mr. Speaker, I am suggesting that the government do it in their own way. I say: Never mind the six months hoist. Do it your own way. You have the bill in your possession and have control of it. Get rid of all this criticism there might be if a six months hoist amendment passes. Let this thing stand. We have one hundred new members in this house; and, except for those who belong to this profession, I greatly doubt if any of them have ever before considered this matter in their lives. Why not let it go until next February, when we shall be back, in that way giving the Canadian bar a chance to make their views known? The government will lose nothing in prestige. I think we will solidify opinion along the way that I indicate, and that is along the way of abolition. But we will do it with practically a unanimous house. To me it seems a terrible thing that we who are so close together as we are, thinking together as we are, should come to an unfortunate disagreement or division, if you like. I think it would be a tragedy, because I credit every member of this House of Commons with the desire to do his best with this subject for the people who sent him here and for the people of the Dominion of Canada as a whole.

(Translation):

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few remarks to make and I shall be as brief as possible.

On June 6 last, at a memorable meeting held at St. Roch, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), speaking about the Canadian flag and the abolition of appeals to the privy council, stated the following:

> The more such actions we take to assert our national independence, the sooner we shall achieve this absolute independence which we desire.

Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, I entirely share this view of the Prime Minister and I shall be pleased to vote in favour of the principle expounded during the debate on the second reading of the bill now before the house. This being said, I think it is our duty as members of the House of Commons, representing the people and the views of our provinces and our constituencies, to give careful consideration to the circumstances to be determined when we shall establish the Supreme Court of Canada.

I recently read in the September 19 issue of a Quebec city newspaper, L'Evénement, the following comments on the bill introduced by the government:

> For that purpose, as everyone knows, the government will introduce a bill whereby the Supreme Court of Canada will become the final court in this country. The principle of that bill could hardly give rise to objections. Indeed no one can see why an outside court—the judicial committee of the privy council in London——should be called upon to solve the juridical problems of Canada. It all depends on the composition of the supreme court. Nowadays its members are appointed by the central authority. Without their scrupulous honesty being questioned in the least, it may be thought that they are naturally prone to decide in favour of federal arguments when these run counter to others. That is what Mr. Maurice Duplessis has already stated, and it must be admitted that his views are justified in that respect.

And that is an excerpt from a Liberal newspaper, published in Quebec city by a Liberal senator who is the owner.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it my duty to make a few suggestions to the government concerning this matter.

I note that section 4 of the bill reads as follows:

> The supreme court shall consist of a chief justice to be called the Chief Justice of Canada, and eight puisne judges, who shall be appointed by the governor in council by letters patent under the great seal.

I wonder if it would be possible to have four of those judges appointed by the Canadian government from a list submitted to it by the lieutenant governors of the provinces. I do not specifically mention the province of Quebec but the lieutenant governors of the provinces.

As we have not yet reached the stage where each section is examined, the object of that suggestion is not that the provinces may themselves appoint the supreme court judges. I understand the problem which exists and which is as follows: the lieutenant governors in council cannot appoint the judges of the supreme court. This authority is vested in the federal government. Any change in this would call for an amendment to the constitution, that is to the British North America Act, 1867, which provides specifically that the judges of the supreme court shall be appointed by the federal authority.

Indeed, section 96 of the imperial act specifically states that the governor general shall appoint the judges of the superior courts. Section 101 of the same act further stipulates that the parliament of Canada may, from time to time, provide for the institution and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada and for the maintenance thereof in order to ensure a better administration of the laws of Canada.

It is therefore in accordance with the latter clause that the present measure is enacted to organize our supreme court. We must not forget that our constitution is the result of a compromise and of an agreement between the various parts of the whole, especially between Upper and Lower Canada and the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. That agreement and the act which followed guaranteed not only the rights of the minorities but also those of the provinces. It is unfair to dissociate the rights of the minorities from those of the provinces, because a province would be unable to protect its minorities, its way of life, its philosophy and its traditions, were provincial rights--and especially those revenues which enable a province to provide for the maintenance of her institutions—constantly pared down.

I refer, in particular, to the subsections of section 92 which empower the provinces to legislate for the founding, the upkeep and the administration, within their boundaries, of hospitals, asylums, almshouses and sheltering homes intended for their citizens as well as for municipal institutions within these same geographical limits.

If the Supreme Court of Canada, a federal tribunal whose members are appointed by the central power, provides the final, the ultimate guarantee afforded a province in the event of a conflict arising between the said province and the federal authorities, would it not be fair that a province, and more particularly Quebec, the minority province, be pledged a minimum guarantee?

It may be argued that the government intends to appoint three judges from among the judges of the Court of King's Bench. These three appointees will be chosen by the dominion government. I do not object to this section. I feel, however, that the autonomy of the provinces as well as the rights and privileges they enjoy under the constitution should be safeguarded. This could be done by the appointment of four judges, of unimpeachable honesty and integrity, chosen from a list of candidates submitted by the lieutenant governors in council. Such a step would prove satisfactory to the provinces and, I believe, afford minimum security to the province of Quebec.

There is another proposal which I take the liberty of submitting to the government. Obviously, the suggestion need not be accepted.

I believe that the decisions of the supreme court on all constitutional matters should be unanimous.

Whenever an accused is tried before a jury for a capital offence, conviction can only be secured when the twelve jurymen bring in a unanimous verdict. That is the request I make on behalf of my province. If we are to be condemned to lose some of our rights to the federal government, I request that it be only after a unanimous decision—a decision from which there can be no appeal—by the court trying our case.

I believe that this amendment which I now propose to the Supreme Court Act is quite fair and reasonable and that none of the rights—and I do not say privileges—which were guaranteed to us in order to induce us to enter into confederation should be, I shall not say abolished, but even reduced without it being done by unanimous agreement and decision.

Otherwise the dissents of the judges would be such as to indicate to the people of my province that their rights were abolished by a majority decision of the supreme court.

I will not go so far as to ask that there be unanimity in camera, as in the privy council. On the contrary I would suggest that the government accept the principle of unanimity in the case of the supreme court, so that the provinces may be assured that the members of this court are at least agreed on matters of litigation, when dealing, of course, with legal or constitutional disputes.

These are suggestions which I intend to submit to the government and I also intend to suggest proper amendments when we are in committee on this bill.
(Text):

Some hon. Members: Question.

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? The question is on the amendment. Those in favour of the amendment will please say "Yea."

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed to the amendment will please say "Nay."

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it. I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Drew: On division.

Motion (Mr. Garson) agreed to, on division, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Progress reported.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Casselman: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. St. Laurent: As determined by the motion which was adopted the first day, tomorrow we shall resume the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne; if that is disposed of we shall take up the other matters which are on the order paper for private members' day.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, September 28, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1949-50

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting further supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1950, was presented by Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

CRIMINAL CODE

PORTRAYAL OF CRIMES BY PICTURES IN MAGAZINES, ETC., TENDING TO INDUCE VIOLENCE

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10, to amend the Criminal Code (portrayal of crimes).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Fulton: This bill is in exactly the same form as one introduced during the last session —which was then known as Bill No. 9—of the previous parliament. It is designed to amend the Criminal Code to cover those magazines and periodicals commonly known as crime comics, the publication of which is now legal but which it is widely felt tend to the lowering of morals and to the inducing of the commission of crimes by juveniles.

As I have said, the bill is in exactly the same form as that which was introduced last year, which there was not sufficient time to discuss. The form of the bill is suggested by a draft actually read to the house by a former minister of justice, now Mr. Justice Ilsley. The purpose is to deal with these publications not by imposing a direct censorship or by blanket prohibition, but rather by providing in general terms that the publication and distribution as defined in the act shall be illegal, thus leaving it for the court or jury, in accordance with the normal principles prevailing at a criminal trial, to determine whether or not the publication in question falls within the definition.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED

QUESTIONS AS TO ROUTING OF PROPOSED PIPE LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Has the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce been drawn to the reported offer made yesterday to civic officials in Fort William by Imperial Oil Limited to build its pipe line through Canadian territory to Port Arthur if government assistance is forthcoming? Will the government investigate the offer, with a view to reconsidering its former decision?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend suggests that the government has made a decision. So far as I know, the government has made no decision. A private project has been placed before it, and the appropriate branches of government acted upon that project as required by law. The government has received no proposal in the matter, and I doubt whether a proposal will be made to the government concerning a private project of this kind.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

JOINT PARLIAMENTARY DISTRIBUTION OFFICE— AIR CONDITIONING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Minister of Public Works if he will look into the matter of the air conditioning in the joint parliamentary distribution office down below?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): I shall call the attention of my officials to the request of my hon. friend, and let him know what can be done.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Now that the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne would appear to be drawing to a close, and the Minister of Finance has indicated that it is intended to proceed with the supplementary estimates, can the minister give any indication as to when it is intended to introduce the budget?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I cannot give any definite indication, but I should hope it would be not later than the middle of October. I would not want to be held too closely to that date, but that is my hope and expectation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ANSWERING OF QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): In case the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) may be too optimistic and the debate on the address should not be concluded shortly, will some provision be made to answer the questions now appearing on the order paper?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): If it is the desire of the house to have the questions answered tomorrow, I will ask my colleagues to be prepared to do so.

Mr. Coldwell: That will be satisfactory.

Mr. St. Laurent: Then the questions might be answered tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles: And notices of motion for the production of papers.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REMOVAL OF OPERATING HEADQUARTERS FROM WINNIPEG TO MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Can the Minister of Trade and Commerce add anything to his statement of September 19 in reply to my question regarding the transfer of Trans-Canada Air Lines personnel from Winnipeg to Montreal?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I expect the president of T.C.A., who has just returned from England, to be in my office this afternoon. I shall try to get the necessary information and give it to the house at an early date.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, September 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Boisvert for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. W. R. Kent (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, when this debate was adjourned last Monday evening I had reached the point where the national convention had sent a delegation to the government of Canada to discuss the possible terms of union of Newfoundland with Canada. The delegation returned and reported the terms obtained to the national convention, where they were discussed at length. From what I have previously stated, it will be seen that the national convention had no power to decide the future form of the government of Newfoundland, but merely had the power to recommend to His Majesty's government forms of government to be placed before the people in a referendum. By a vote of 29 to 16 the convention declined to recommend that confederation with Canada be included on the referendum ballot.

Because of the long discussion in the convention respecting confederation, and having regard to the number of members in the convention who had supported its inclusion on the ballot, His Majesty's government decided to place confederation on the ballot paper. In addition to this, some 50,000 Newfoundlanders, by personal letter or telegram, communicated to His Excellency the Governor their desire to have confederation placed on the ballot paper. The referendum was held, and the final result was a majority for confederation. It will be seen, therefore, that the procedure adopted to decide the future form of the government of Newfoundland was designed in a truly democratic manner to leave that decision to the people, and to the people alone. The vote was upon a clear-cut issue, and the people decided in favour of confederation with Canada. The results of the provincial and federal elections recently held in that province have placed the seal of approval on that decision.

I was, and still am, a strong believer in confederation. I have not found a solid argument against it. Those people in Newfoundland who supported confederation had good reason for supporting it. They believed that the economy of our province was linked with that of Canada, and that Newfoundland's best opportunity for future development was as a part of Canada. They saw the benefit in Canada's great social security program. Benefits to the people of Newfoundland have already accrued in the form of family allowances, increased old age pensions, the veterans' charter, unemployment insurance and others. On the other hand, Newfoundland brings to Canada her fisheries, pulp and paper and mining industries, her possibilities for water-power development, her airfields, and all her still undeveloped resources. One should consider also the value of this province from a strategic point of view in the scheme of hemisphere defence.

Perhaps I may be permitted to say a few words with reference to the riding of Humber-St. George's, which I have the privilege of representing. It is comprised of the three electoral districts of St. George's-Port au Port, Humber, and St. Barbe, and extends along the whole west coast of the island from cape Ray in the south to Boat harbour in the strait of Belle Isle in the north. The potentialities for development of the west coast of Newfoundland are very high. The lands comprising the fertile and beautiful valleys and those enclosing the broad estuaries of the Great and Little Codroy rivers, as well as the valleys of the other rivers in St. George's-Port au Port, the valleys of the rich and scenic upper and lower Humber river, in the district of Humber, provide fertile land for farming and cattle raising. Much of this land has been developed, but much more is still open for development.

At Corner Brook, in the district of Humber, is the large pulp and paper mill owned by Bowater's Newfoundland Pulp and Paper Mills Limited. If not the largest, it is one of the largest pulp and paper mills in the world. The sea along the coast and in the bays abounds with fish of many species, from cod and herring to salmon, halibut and tuna. But here again, in my opinion, the possibilities for development have not yet been realized. As to shellfish, St. George's-Port au Port has great possibilities in clams, scallops and mussels, and the whole coast in lobster fishing.

Large tracts of timber are found upon the island, and these are being utilized in the pulp and paper and lumbering industry generally. The foothills in St. Barbe district are covered with dense forests, which, in several places, extend through to White bay. There is natural grassland on the island which could carry herds of cattle. The awe-inspiring hills which enclose the broad estuaries of the Codroy rivers, the majestic Humber, bay of Islands with the many arms extending from it, Bonne bay, and the rugged coast line, provide scenic beauty to delight the heart of any tourist. The inland country, viewed from the hills, presents the appearance of a succession of green plains marbled with woods and lakes. For the tourist there are the salmon rivers, the lakes and streams filled with trout, and the plains upon which game of every description native to the country can be found. These attractions have brought many visitors to Newfoundland. With more roads and better facilities, more tourists can be attracted to the island to enjoy the scenery and sport that can be offered to them.

One of Newfoundland's greatest needs is roads. This would enable tourists, if better facilities for crossing Cabot strait were provided, to come to Newfoundland in numbers with their cars and enjoy the pastimes which our province can afford.

There is one thing further I must mention, and that is the possibility for water-power development which is so essential to industry. As I have stated, the potentialities are great; all that is required is someone to develop the resources with which our province is endowed. I have noted with pleasure the reference in the speech from the throne to the trans-Canada highway. If that highway were extended to the province of Newfoundland, a great step in her development would have been taken.

The province of Newfoundland brings to Canada a loyal people. For years many of them have fought the elements in pursuing their livelihood on the sea around her coast and on the oceans of the world. Seamen of sterling quality have been produced. I am sure, sir, that the people of Newfoundland are wholeheartedly behind the union of Newfoundland with Canada. They will take their places as citizens of this great country and do their part in developing its future.

I deem it a pleasure and a privilege, Mr. Speaker, to sit in this historic chamber on the occasion of the entry of our province into union with Canada. It is an honour to be one of the first elected representatives from that province. So far as I am concerned, sir, I shall never forget the warmth of the welcome accorded me upon my entrance into this house.

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): In rising to make a few observations in this debate Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity of complimenting you on the high position to which you have been called. This repetition may seem a bit monotonous, but I am sure there is no question about the sincerity of all of us in paying you this tribute. Your career in parliament over the last number of years and your conduct in the occupancy of the chair for the last number of days have certainly impressed all hon. members, particularly those who, like myself, are here for the first time. We feel that we can accept your guidance, and we know that your interpretation and application of the rules of the house will be fair and impartial.

I wish to join with others who have complimented the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The manner in which the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) acquitted themselves reflected credit upon themselves and brought honour to this house as well as to the constituencies which they represent.

In the course of this debate most hon. members made reference to the constituencies or districts from which they come. As one of the members from the west, I note with a great deal of satisfaction the pride that the members on the government side take in the members of the cabinet who come from the west. Those from Saskatchewan are proud of their Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), those from Manitoba of their Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), those from British Columbia of their Minister of Fisheries

(Mr. Mayhew), and we in Alberta are certainly proud of our Hon. James A. MacKinnon.

Those who know something about our province will certainly agree with me that Alberta is highly developed in agriculture and richly endowed with natural resources. It is sometimes referred to as a province of vast plains and towering mountains, as well as a province in which the politics are of a queer type which no one is able to understand. I was informed some time ago by Professor Irving of Toronto university that he is writing a book on social credit. Should this learned professor succeed in throwing at least some light on what social credit stands for and what it means, he would be doing a great service not only to the people of Alberta but also to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and his nine followers in this house.

I did not intend in this maiden speech of mine to refer to any political group. However, I was amused when, in the course of this debate, the hon. member for Peace River took to task the Montreal Star and the Lethbridge Herald when these two papers referred to the party that he is leading in this house as a splinter party. At page 41 of Hansard of September 19 he is reported as having made this statement:

> What the Liberals did to the Conservative and the C.C.F. parties in the election of last June, and what they did not do to the Social Credit party, led me to believe at the time these articles appeared that the expression "splinter parties" simply could not refer to us.

I am not going to argue the point with reference to "splinter parties" except to say that with regard to the Alberta Social Credit party I think the expression is most appropriate. But in view of the statement made by the hon. member for Peace River, I think hon. members of this house should be given some information, based on facts and figures, as to what actually happened in Alberta on June 27 last.

In the last parliament there were two Conservative representatives from Alberta in this house. There are two in this parliament, the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) and the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). They command a high respect in Alberta, and I only wish that they were on our side. However, we can conclude that the Conservative party were able to hold their own. The C.C.F. party did not have any representation from Alberta in this house in the last parliament, and they have none today. So we can conclude that this group in Alberta was also able to hold its own. What about the Social Credit party? There were two Liberal members from Alberta in this house in the last parliament. There are five of us here today. The increase has been made entirely at the expense of the Social Credit party. But what is more significant is the fact that the Liberal popular vote in that province was approximately 117,000 as compared with 131,000 for the Social Credit candidates. How is it that the Liberals have only five members from Alberta, whereas the Social Credit party have twice as many? The illustration I want to bring out now is an example of what happened in many constituencies. For instance, in the Peace River constituency the hon. member from that area received in 1945 a majority of over 3,200 votes.

Mr. Low: How many votes?

Mr. Decore: I do not know how many votes, but the majority is over 3,200 votes.

Mr. Low: Give the number of votes.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Decore: At this election on June 27 he received slightly over 300 of a majority.

We have been accused of making wild promises, but that is not so. We relied entirely on the policy of our party and the character and integrity of our leader.

An hon. Member: You did not swamp the province.

Mr. Decore: No, and we did not make promises to pay a $25 a month dividend.

The Vegreville federal constituency, adjoining the constituency of Edmonton West, contains in it the famous Redwater oil fields.

Mr. Low: The Liberals got that, did they not?

Mr. Decore: The Social Crediters are trying to take credit for it, I understand. This oil field is not only the largest one in Alberta; it is the largest in Canada. If we compare it with the Leduc field which is another major field in the Edmonton area, and the Turner valley field, we find that the Redwater field has recoverable reserves equal to the combined reserves of those other two fields to which I have referred. Recently the provincial government received as high as well over $3 million in cash for one section, and will in addition receive royalties from daily production which will become far more valuable than the cash bonus which they have already received.

A few days ago I had occasion to speak to Dr. Hume, who is the director of the mines branch of the Department of Mines and Resources, and this is what he had to say:

> The rock formation from which oil has been taken out in the Redwater area is reported to be a reef similar to a reef found in the Leduc field and the Golden Spike. The presence of reefs in Alberta, in the Edmonton area, is very significant, in the light of developments that have occurred in the West Texas Permian basin, where reef structures have given very prolific oil production.

The Norman Wells field in the Northwest Territories in the Mackenzie river valley is also a reef in the Devonian.

Dr. Hume expressed the hope that reef structures will be found to be very widespread, and that such a formation will continue from the Edmonton fields to the Mackenzie river valley. If such hope ever became a reality, the area I have made reference to may become the greatest centre of oil production in the world.

There is no question of the part that the Vegreville constituency will play in our Canadian economy, especially when we are trying to conserve United States dollars. It is unfortunate, however, that although some farmers in that constituency have mineral rights, many of them have not. Since this matter is entirely within the jurisdiction of the government of Alberta, it is hoped that that government will eventually see fit to give some recognition to farmers who have only surface rights.

I should also like to refer to the Elk island park, situated within my constituency. A few weeks ago the Minister of Mines and Resources had occasion to visit this park. It has become one of the most popular recreational centres in northern Alberta, but aside from its recreational features it has the distinction of being the largest fenced animal reserve in Canada. You will find roaming over its lush pastures over a thousand buffalo, and many moose, deer and elk. I refer to Elk island park because I understand that the government, for educational purposes, plans the construction of a museum in this park, tracing the historic development in northern Alberta of early settlers from the pioneer days. I hope that this museum will include a replica of a palisaded fort used as a trading post in early days in that area, as well as a typical structure of the pioneer homes used by the early settlers and the ingenious ways and means that they devised to construct these homes without the necessity of buying ready-made material.

Most of the population of Alberta is mainly engaged in agriculture, or is indirectly dependent on it. There are therefore problems pertaining to agriculture in that province which are peculiar to that part of Canada. Although it is not often that we have drought conditions in northern Alberta, this year in my constituency there was a considerable lack of rain, and the crops of the farmers are poor. It is hoped that the minister will introduce such amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act as will make it possible to reduce these large blocks, so that farmers in that area, especially in northern Alberta—and the same applies to northern Saskatchewan and northern Manitoba—will be eligible under the act.

The people of the rest of the western provinces, along with the people of Alberta, feel keenly about freight rates, and it is hoped that some adjustment will be made by which the distribution of such freights may be more equitable for western Canada. I might also add that there is a well represented farmers' organization in Alberta known as the Farmers' Union of Alberta. The leaders of this organization are well acquainted with farm problems, and it is my sincere wish that should any representations be made to this government by various delegates from this farmers' organization the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will receive them favourably, provided of course that such representations or requests are within reason and fair.

My attention is also drawn to the fact, by people living in my constituency along the Canadian National Railways from Edmonton by way of St. Paul to Heinsburg, that this line is not completed. There is a gap of some thirty-nine miles from Heinsburg, Alberta, to a point in Saskatchewan called Frenchman's Butte. Because this gap is not completed, the farmers are getting less for their produce. I might also add that along this same line is located the Redwater oilfield, and further along the line there is a salt mine. There is quite a demand for rail transportation, and it is my sincere hope that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) will enter into consultation with the directors of the Canadian National Railways and suggest to them the advisability of completing this gap of some thirty-nine miles.

The population of the Vegreville constituency is made up of various racial groups. In it you will find Canadians of different extractions, including Germans, Scandinavians, French, Polish, Roumanian, Scots, Anglo-Saxons and others. By far the largest group are Canadians of Ukrainian origin. These people originally migrated from Europe some fifty-five years ago, from a country where they knew nothing but suppression and obscurity. They came to Canada seeking better opportunities for themselves and for their children. Above all, they chose this land because they wanted freedom. It is almost impossible for me to describe the difficulties that these people had to surmount upon their arrival in Canada. Not only were they poor, but they had no knowledge of the English language, and they were not acquainted with Canadian institutions. They were allowed to settle on land which was considered the wilderness of the west. If you were to go through these communities today, Mr. Speaker, you would find that this wilderness has been transformed into the best developed agricultural area in western Canada. The fact that these people were able to maintain a cultural tradition is worthy of praise. I feel that Canadians of Polish, Roumanian, Ukrainian or any other minority group are better Canadians if they realize that the stock from which they come has a fine past, incorporated in literature, music, handicrafts and religious faith. It will certainly give them not only a pride of origin, but, at the same time, confidence in their own ability to accomplish things that are worth while.

The hon. member for Vancouver South said that in diversity lies our strength. Canada is not a country of one race of people. We are in fact a country of minorities. Whoever we may be, wherever we came from, or whence came our parents or ancestors, we as Canadians should be proud of our different racial origins, proud of our traditions and of our culture. We should be proud of the fact that these things can weld us together, to make us not only better Canadians and better men, but also to make Canada, this great country of ours, a better place in which to live.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, since the house opened on September 15 I have been sitting back in my little corner listening to the flow of oratory from both sides of the house. Because of that realization has come to me that I am among the best speakers available in the country; therefore I am rather hesitant about taking part in this debate.

I should like to add my voice to those of hon. members who have spoken earlier in welcoming the new members from Newfoundland. I speak with firsthand information, because I spent a good deal of time in Newfoundland during the last war. I found that the people of that new province are extremely hospitable, hardy and industrious. With this in mind I should like to say that in my view hon. members from Newfoundland will add greatly to the dignity of this chamber.

For a few moments this afternoon I should like to speak about my home constituency of Wetaskiwin. It is not as large or as barren as some of the constituencies thus far described. Neither does it produce an abundance of fruit, or, as has been brought to the attention of the house previously in respect of the constituency represented by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), nuts. My constituency, however, is a mixed farming area. The eastern half consists of rolling fertile hills, with an abundance of water. This makes it an unrivalled mixed farming area. My reference to water is not confined to rainfall. Sometimes we are a little short of that. I had reference more particularly to the lakes, streams, and sloughs which are so necessary to the raising of livestock. Also in the central part of the constituency one finds a chain of lakes which in their pure scenic beauty are unrivalled anywhere in Canada. Any hon. members who at one time or another may have done a little fishing around Pigeon lake or Buck lake will bear me out in this.

In the northwest section of my constituency one finds immense stands of timber around Breton and Winfield. During the last few years fires have depleted these natural stands, and I say it would be in the interests of all if reforestation in that area were implemented.

On February 13, 1947, the bombshell exploded. Imperial's Leduc No. 1 well was brought into production, twelve miles northwest of the village of Leduc and twenty miles southwest of Edmonton. The oil rush was on. Overnight small, sleepy, complacent farming towns became buzzing beehives of activity. Tin-hatted oil men were brushing shoulders with the farmers on their way to market.

In December of that year thirty-one wells were in production in that area alone, producing 99,750 barrels of oil. At the end of the first year a total of forty-seven wells had been drilled in the Leduc sector, and out of that number forty-two had proven to be productive.

Owing to the influx of oil workers, there was a great demand for accommodation. The Imperial Oil Company consulted the provincial planning commission and drew up plans for a boomtown. This town became the town of Devon. One might think that a town of this size or description would be only a group of tumble-down quickly-erected buildings, tents and shacks. This did not prove to be so, however. Devon is one of the most modern small towns to be found in Canada. The bungalows constructed for the use of the oil workers are trim and modern, and would do justice to the residential area of any city in Canada. The streets are landscaped for beauty, and all facilities for recreation and sports have been provided. They have a gymnasium, a skating rink, a curling rink, and recreation grounds.

It will be remembered that Atlantic No. 3 well ran wild for six months, and also resulted in the closing down during at least part of that time of this oil field. But during the six months in which the well ran wild it produced over a million barrels of oil. This fact in itself proves the immense potentialities of that oil field. During the past year a refinery has been built at South Edmonton to accommodate at least part of the oil flowing from this field. I understand that another refinery is being planned at the present time.

During the week ending August 1 last, the daily production of oil in Alberta was more than 2,000 barrels above the average of the previous week, and nearly double the average of the corresponding week last year. A total of 58,826 barrels were produced each day in the week of August 1, compared with 56,648 per day in the preceding week and 30,344 barrels in the week of August 2, 1948. Of this total the Leduc oil field gave 29,377 barrels daily as compared with 27,466 barrels in the previous week and 14,643 barrels in the week of August 2, 1948. I might add that the Redwater production for the same week was 13,408 barrels per day.

The number of operating oil wells was also increased. As of August 2 there were 890 wells in the province as compared with 876 operating wells in the previous week. Leduc went up from 289 to 294 wells, and Redwater jumped from 118 to 127. A total of fourteen wells went into production during that week.

I have before me a newspaper release issued by the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey.

The article reads:

Merrill Denison, a writer on Canadian economics and industry, says in the September issue of The Lamp, a company magazine:

Only a little more than two years ago Canada was importing 92 per cent of the petroleum she used. Today, with oil flowing from the new fields around Edmonton at the rate of 60,000 barrels a day, local production has already reached a level sufficient to take care of the needs of the prairie provinces; and it is more than likely that by 1958 oil from Canada's own ground will be sufficient to supply the rapidly mounting needs of the rest of the dominion as well.

Indeed the discovery of the new oil fields, if the bright promise is fulfilled, will prove more important to Canada's economy than almost any single event in her 452-year history. The promise is already tangible enough...For Canada, at long last, now is able to obtain in quantity from within her own boundaries the raw materials from which to fashion the implements of agriculture and industry, and the fuel with which to power them.

Proved reserves . . . stand today at one billion barrels. And as for the potential, it is believed that the surface has scarcely been scratched. Some idea of its scope may be gleaned from the significant fact that the promising territory is larger than that of the United States five leading oil-producing states—Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana, California and Kansas—combined. Ultimate discoveries from this vast area will probably exceed ten billion.

A question was raised in the house the other day as to the advisability of running a pipe line from Alberta through the United States rather than along the Canadian side of the great lakes. The following statement by the Hon. N. E. Tanner may throw a little light on the subject:

The Hon. N. E. Tanner indicated Monday last week that a petroleum exchange agreement may soon be signed with the United States allowing Alberta to export oil to that country. Under the agreement, the United States would buy oil at the lakehead; eastern United States producers in turn would sell oil to eastern Canada. Mr. Tanner said such an agreement would only be possible after the completion of a proposed pipe line from Regina to the great lakes.

Mr. Tanner said that if such a policy were not agreed to by the United States, Alberta oil could only be shipped to eastern Canada at a greater cost. "We don't feel this will be necessary," he said. "We think the United States will co-operate."

He said certain United States interests oppose the United States importing oil from Canada and have accused Canada of trying to invade the American market. An agreement along the lines outlined would do away with any such accusations, Mr. Tanner stated.

All this adds up to a constituency which is rich in natural resources—and Social Crediters believe that the real wealth of the nation is its natural resources. These riches, fostered and administered so completely by Hon. E. C. Manning and his Social Credit government, makes this indeed a district to view with pride.

I should like to refer briefly to the Department of Veterans Affairs. First I should like to congratulate the government on its magnificent legislation for veterans. I know that in my own personal experience the re-establishment credits and rehabilitation that I received assisted me greatly in setting myself up in business and in furnishing my house. Nevertheless there are some things with which I am not entirely in agreement. I should like to quote a couple of sections of the Veterans Business and Professional Loans Act. Section 3, subsection 1, clause (d) reads:

The minister shall, subject to the provisions of this act, pay to a bank the amount of loss sustained by it as a result of a loan made to a veteran in pursuance of an application by such veteran in any case where:

(a) the sum of the principal amount of loan, the amount of any loan applied for by the veteran and concurred in by the minister and the amount of any guaranteed loan previously made to the veteran as disclosed in the application of the veteran or of which the bank had other knowledge did not exceed the sum of three thousand dollars.

Then follows clause (e), which reads:

The principal amount of the loan did not exceed two-thirds of the proposed total expenditure by the veteran for the purpose stated in the application.

I take that to mean that the loan that the veteran may obtain cannot exceed $3,000, that the veteran must put up $1,500, and that the loan of $3,000 will have to be the final payment on the business he is proposing to purchase. Section 8 reads:

(1) Notwithstanding anything contained in the Bank Act or any other statute, if a bank makes a guaranteed loan in respect of which it is required by regulation to take security on real or immovable property, the bank may at the time of making such loan take as security for the repayment thereof and the payment of interest thereon,

(a) a mortgage or hypothec upon the real or immovable property in respect of which all or part of the proceeds of the guaranteed loan are to be expended;

(b) an assignment of the rights and interest of a purchaser under an agreement for sale of the real or immovable property in respect of which all or part of the proceeds of the guaranteed loan are to be expended.

(2) A bank shall have and may exercise, in respect of any mortgage, hypothec or assignment taken under this section and the real or immovable property affected thereby, all rights and powers that it would have or might exercise if such mortgage, hypothec or assignment had been taken by the bank by way of additional security under The Bank Act.

This would indicate that in order to obtain a loan the veteran has to give a mortgage to the bank. Coupled with the fact that through the Department of Veterans Affairs the government underwrites a certain percentage of the loss in the event that the veteran defaults, it would indicate that this section of the act does not afford any protection to the veteran. In my opinion it is simply designed to protect the banks from these horrible men, the veterans. I urge the minister to consider this matter very carefully so that a veteran desiring a loan to start up a business may use the loan as a down payment in making his purchase. This in itself may not sound like good business, but it was very poor business on the part of the men who gave up their associations here at home and went overseas in order that we might live and be in this House of Commons today. It is only fair that they should be considered not in a businesslike manner but in the light of the deeds they have done.

I am sure all hon. members have received a circular from the superannuated civil servants' association of Vancouver. I need not say very much about it, but these people find themselves in the same position as many others in Canada today. Many people are living on the verge of poverty, barely existing. They include those on old age pensions, blind pensions and disability pensions, as well as those living on the proceeds of various contributory pension schemes. I would urge the government to consider the position of these aged and incapacitated people, and see that they are enabled to live at least in comfort, if not in luxury.

(Translation):

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that my first words in this house should be spoken in French, the language of 90 per cent of my constituents. I therefore take pleasure in resorting to French to congratulate you, as well as Mr. Macdonald, on your election to your high positions. There is no doubt in my mind that you were both eminently worthy of the honour bestowed upon you by the house. Your tact and efficiency in the discharge of your duties are further proof of the fact that the choice of the house was indeed a happy one.

I also wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Boisvert) and the seconder (Mr. Laing) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Like all other members, I was impressed by the very interesting ideas embodied in their eloquent speeches. I have the honour of being acquainted with the mover of the address, but not with the seconder. I am delighted to tell the former that he has more than lived up to his friends' expectations.

My warmest congratulations also to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on his magnificent victory. It was a personal triumph due largely to his tireless devotion to duty and to the painstaking journey he undertook from one end of the country to the other. In the whole history of Canada, no other premier has ever campaigned in such a manner. May I pay my respects to Mrs. St. Laurent, our premier's gracious wife who travelled with him and gave Canada striking evidence of the characteristics which distinguish a great lady and French-Canadian mother.

I wish also to congratulate all those who have taken part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and especially our friends from the new province of Newfoundland. Together with those who have already done so, I wish to welcome them. I want to congratulate more particularly those hon. members from the new province who have delivered such interesting speeches.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall go on with my remarks in the language of the majority of the members of this house.

(Text):

I think it only fitting, Mr. Speaker, that at this, the first session of the House of Commons it is my privilege to attend as the member for the Magdalen islands, I should take part in this debate, since this is the first time since confederation that the Magdalen islands have had a federal member to represent them exclusively. Until the last redistribution they were part of the county of Gaspe, which was then ably represented by my colleague the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Langlois), who continues to represent that constituency in this parliament.

As you know, the Magdalen islands are situated in the gulf of St. Lawrence, about an equal distance from Newfoundland and the Gaspe coast. Thus they are more or less a link between the old part of Canada and the new province that has now joined us. In their early history they were visited by some of the greatest explorers of the North American continent—by Jacques Cartier in 1534 and again in 1608 by Samuel de Champlain who gave to Havre Aubert the name it still bears. At that time they were not inhabited. The first concession was made to a Mr. Francois Daublet in 1663. They were again conceded in 1719 to Lecompte de St. Pierre. During that period they were temporarily inhabited, and in 1763 there were ten families on the islands. By 1798 this number had increased to one hundred families, and now I am proud to say there are about twelve thousand people living on the Magdalen islands.

There are six inhabited islands in all, five of which are linked by sand bars. On some of the sand bars we have roads, and one may pass on the other sand bars at low tide; therefore the main islands, including Amherst island, Grindstone island, Alright island, Coffin island and Grosse isle, are connected; Entry island is separate. The principal industry is fishing, in which about eighty-five per cent of the inhabitants engage, and which lasts from May until October.

Up until a few years ago walrus were caught in quantity off these islands, but unfortunately this is no longer the case. They have been so depleted, they cannot be exploited on a commercial scale. The fishing industry also comprises lobster, mackerel, cod, and other species. The lobster fishing is important during the summer months. A considerable trade with the United States has been built up through the shipment of live lobster by air to Maine. Those that are not shipped are canned. These canning factories provide employment for a large number of the inhabitants of the island.

For about two weeks during the early part of June, mackerel are caught. They are known as the spring mackerel and are caught in nets. Later on in July there is another mackerel catch. These fish are caught on lines which are set out by the fishermen. Cod is the main catch. For a few months this fishing industry is the main source of income for the men. The fishermen find it difficult, however, as it is not a sufficient income for them to live on for the entire year. They are far from being well off.

The land on the islands, on the other hand, is really quite fertile. It is similar to that in Prince Edward Island. I believe if agriculture were encouraged as a second source of income for the islanders it would help improve their economic position. It is my intention to do what I can to encourage agriculture.

These islands are very beautiful. I picture them now as they were when I first saw them, lying in the gulf of St. Lawrence under a June sun. The red cliffs rising from the blue waters of the gulf were topped with a green carpet, and all three colours blended beautifully. I shall never forget that picture. I had never been to the islands before it was my honour to run as a member, and I have fallen in love with them. I am proud to represent them in this house.

One of the many difficulties facing the fishermen is the fact that they have to use relatively small boats. This restricts the area in which they can fish. It would be a great advantage to them if they could use the larger sailing vessels such as are used off the coast of New Brunswick. The federal government passed an order in council, P.C. 1919, which provided for subsidies to aid fishermen in constructing these larger vessels. The use of the larger vessels enables the fishermen to remain out several days at a time and thus make larger catches. I have received several inquiries from fishermen as to how application is made for these subsidies. After studying the order in council, I find it provides for loans to be made to fishermen through the fishermen's loan boards. These loan boards have to be set up by the provincial legislature. This has not been done in my province, but it has been done in several other provinces. I suggest it would be an excellent thing if my own province undertook to pass the legislation. The establishment of such a board would enable the fishermen to benefit from these subsidies which the federal government is willing to provide.

While I am dealing with this subject, may I say that a few years ago the control of fisheries was transferred from the federal government to the province of Quebec. Several fishermen in my county have complained about this, since they believe they received better treatment from the federal government. I suggest it might not be inappropriate to look into the matter with a view to ascertaining whether or not it would be proper to return the control of fisheries to the federal government. In many respects, the federal government is better equipped to take care of the needs of the fishermen, particularly those engaged in deep-sea fishing, as is the case around the Magdalen islands.

The fishermen of the Magdalen islands are organized into co-operative associations. These co-operatives are often short of funds. They own ships which ply between the islands and the maritime provinces and bring goods and merchandise to the islands not brought by other shipping lines. I have received several requests for subsidies and I intend to take up the matter with the competent authorities. In my view it would not be inappropriate for the federal government to devote a few thousand dollars to help these co-operative associations, composed of fishermen of the Magdalen islands, to make both ends meet.

Many references have been made to the abolition of appeals to the privy council and the establishment of the Supreme Court of Canada as the final court of appeal. I do not intend to spend much time on that this afternoon, since it has been fully covered. Little remains to be said, but may I join the hon. members who have preceded me in this debate, as well as in the debate on the Supreme Court Act, in saying that I have the utmost confidence in the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. The hon. members of the opposition who expressed misgivings at the idea of replacing the privy council with Canadian judges are expressing misgivings that are entirely unfounded and that do not do justice to Canadian judges, who are without peer in the world. Canadian judges are better able to administer our Canadian laws in the best interests of the Canadian people.

I should like to make one remark about the doctrine of stare decisis. I heard some expressions of opinion on it yesterday when it was suggested it should be incorporated in the Supreme Court Act. I wish to tell the house through you, Mr. Speaker, that in my humble opinion, and I think it is the opinion of all lawyers, such a doctrine cannot be incorporated in a statute. It is a doctrine of the common law that has developed over the years. We must count upon the judges for its application. I believe one hon. member said that, when the judges take their oath of office and swear to uphold the law as it is, by that very fact they are undertaking to apply the doctrine of stare decisis. It is part of our law although it is not written into any statute. We need have no misgivings on that score. The doctrine of stare decisis will be applied by the new Supreme Court of Canada just as it has been applied in the past. No one will suffer and there will be no encroachment upon individual or provincial rights through any lack of the application of that doctrine.

I wish to say a few words about the powers that the government of Canada is going to ask this house for, as has been foreshadowed in the speech from the throne. I refer to powers to amend the constitution of Canada by act of parliament passed in Canada. To those members of this house and those persons outside of it who have any misgivings as to provincial rights being encroached upon or that they are being placed in danger by such legislation, I wish to say that they are entirely in error. The wording of the speech from the throne shows clearly that it is not the intention of the government of Canada to do anything which might possibly encroach upon provincial rights. The relevant part of it reads as follows:

> You will also be asked to approve addresses praying the parliament of the United Kingdom to vest in the parliament of Canada the right to amend the constitution of Canada in relation to matters not coming within the jurisdiction of the legislatures of the provinces nor affecting the constitutional rights and privileges of the provinces or existing rights and privileges with respect to education or the use of the English and French languages.

Nothing could be clearer. This House of Commons and the Senate of Canada will ask the parliament of the United Kingdom to enable us to alter the constitution of Canada only in matters that do not come within provincial jurisdiction. After all, from a practical point of view, it is simply a change in method. It has never been contested that the parliament of Canada has the power to amend its constitution as it sees fit. As the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has already pointed out, the constitution has been amended several times; but in the past it has been done by both houses of parliament adopting an address to the parliament of the United Kingdom, asking them to amend the British North America Act. The United Kingdom parliament has always done what we have asked it to do. It is just a matter of procedure. What we want to do now is to continue to exercise the right to amend our constitution; but, instead of doing it by an address to the parliament of the United Kingdom, we wish to do it by an act of the parliament of Canada, which is the way in which it should be done.

As was pointed out yesterday by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), there are four federations which exist in the world today—the United States of America, Australia, Switzerland and Canada—but we are the only country with a federal system of government which has not the power to amend its own constitution. I think it is high time that we had this power.

May I also add this thought, Mr. Speaker. The evolution of the constitutional status of Canada, and the progress Canada has made toward nationhood during past years, have made it inevitable that, sooner or later, we should come to the point where it is necessary for us to take into our own hands the matter of amending our constitution and ask the parliament of the United Kingdom to give us these powers. I say that it is well for the minorities of this country, and particularly for the people of my home province, that that moment should have come when it is our great good fortune to have at the head of the government of Canada a man like our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on whom we can count to see that the powers that are taken by the federal government to amend the constitution do not encroach in any manner on the powers of the provinces as now granted by the constitution.

It is needless to say that, in order to attain nationhood, any sovereign nation exercises three basic powers: the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. If we are to exercise our legislative powers in their plenitude, it is essential that we be given the right to amend our own constitution, because it is the most important legislative power that any country can exercise. It is the fountain of the other two powers, the judicial and the executive. It is essential that we have the right to exercise our legislative powers, and I am sure that the whole of this great dominion of ours will join in thanking the government of Canada and this house for passing the legislation which has been announced in the speech from the throne and which will finally bring to us that fullness of power that we require in order to be a truly self-governing nation.

From a practical point of view, the powers of the provinces on constitutional questions will not be affected at all. As I have said before, we are only asking the parliament of the United Kingdom to give us the power to amend the constitution in purely federal matters. As to other matters, if there is need to amend our constitution, until we have made an agreement with the provinces, it will be amended as it has been amended in the past; that is to say, by an address to the parliament of the United Kingdom. If an amendment to the constitution is desired in any matter which clearly comes within the jurisdiction of the provinces, any such amendment would naturally be made by an address to the parliament of the United Kingdom, and the situation will not be changed as far as they are concerned.

Naturally, our opponents say that there may be a difference of opinion as to what are the powers belonging to the federal government and what are the powers belonging to the provincial governments. The answer to that is that the British North America Act will not be changed. It will remain as it is. We shall still have sections 91 and 92 which set out what those respective powers are. We shall still have the body of jurisprudence which has been built up and which has decided any difficulties that may have arisen as to the interpretation of that statute. If it should happen, though—and this is something which is not likely—that the federal government should introduce some legislation which, in the opinion of one or more of the provinces, encroaches upon provincial rights, the provinces could then ask the federal government to refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada—and it is extremely unlikely that the federal government would refuse to do so—for a decision as to whether the matter was a federal or a provincial one. But let us suppose for the moment that the federal government should refuse to do so. Even then, the provinces themselves would have the recourse of referring the matter to their respective courts of appeal; and from there the matter could be brought to the Supreme Court of Canada by way of an appeal. Then, as a last resort, they would also have the method of attacking the acts that would be carried out by the federal government as a result of the legislation. For instance, suppose the federal government decided to amend the British North America Act in such a way that a certain field of taxation would be federal and not provincial. If the two methods that I have already set forth failed to bring results, it would always be possible for someone to attack the constitutionality of the act, refuse to pay the tax, and thus bring the matter before the courts.

There is no doubt whatever that basically the rights of the provinces are perfectly safeguarded and it cannot be said in truth that these rights are affected in any way by the legislation that is being brought before the house.

I should also like to say to hon. members of the opposition, whom I have had the pleasure and honour of hearing in this house, that they do not need to fear that the government of Canada, as it is now led by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), will do anything to depart from the principles of democracy, or that he will take the bit between his teeth, to use an expression common among farmers in my county and others, and because of the great majority that he now has in this house, do things that he would not do otherwise. Those of us who know the Prime Minister can safely say without fear of being in error that the ship of state is safe in his hands, and that he will steer it on a fair and even course and will not take any flyers in one direction or the other.

Before closing my remarks I should like to say that it was brought to my attention recently by somebody that in Canada today, although the war has been over for four or five years, no fund has been set up to compensate those who have suffered personal or property loss as the result of the war. I understand that in the United Kingdom such a fund has been set up and compensation has been paid. That is true of the United States also. In our country that has not been done. I am told that there is a certain amount of German property which has been confiscated and is now in the hands of the custodian of alien property. This property could be sold and the proceeds used to constitute a fund to pay these war claims. I respectfully submit that it might be appropriate for the government to look into the matter and decide, having regard to the time which has elapsed since the close of the war, whether the time has not come to take some steps to see that these claims are paid.

May I return to the Magdalen islands. I have the honour to represent the smallest constituency in Canada from the point of view of its population, but from the point of view of its needs it is far from being the smallest in Canada. During the election campaign I said to the electors whom I have the honour to represent here today that there was not a county in Canada for which the federal government could do more than for the Magdalen islands. There they are, out in the middle of the gulf of St. Lawrence. The shifting sands fill in their harbours all the time. They need a lot of dredging; they need many public works; and, as the ministers have already begun to realize, I shall be visiting their offices often to obtain for my electors the help that they need from the federal government, and I am sure the federal government will give it.

Mr. G. M. Ferrie (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, first, I must congratulate you on attaining the position you now occupy in this house, which represents the most wonderful country in the world. I also wish to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for the help he has given in obtaining a majority of Liberals in this house. His trip was most helpful to the western members. The fine simple manner in which he and his wife spoke endeared them both to the people in a way never to be forgotten. He and his most gracious wife were kindness itself and we hope that they both will be spared to live to show the people of this country, and the world, that that which means the most to the country and to civilization is the home and all that surrounds it. I also want to thank him on behalf of my constituency of Mackenzie for his great contribution to peace and good will toward men.

May I join with those who have previously spoken to extend my sincere congratulations to the mover (Mr. Boisvert) and the seconder (Mr. Laing) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I also wish to add my congratulations to the seconder, whose eloquence and knowledge of the English language should surely, in the future, serve him in good stead, to the great advantage of this house and the country at large.

I congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on his address and the kind remarks he made regarding our leader, and I hope he will go out of his way to render the service to the country that His Majesty's loyal opposition is supposed to.

I was very much surprised—it may be my lack of knowledge—but to see all the Conservatives on my left voting with the C.C.F. on the amendment to the speech from the throne is beyond my comprehension.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) on his speech. I cannot say I am glad he is here, because he beat one of my best friends, and why the people of his constituency would vote for him—a city man and school teacher against a farmer, a cattleman, and a director of the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities—is beyond my comprehension. Mr. Noble knew all their troubles, and was well able to put them before any assembly. That outstanding man, Duff Noble, is also a real Liberal and believes in free enterprise, and if there is a body of farmers in western Canada who should believe in free enterprise it is those men of Rosetown-Biggar who live in a wheat factory.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the hon. members on my left who, ever since the house opened, have made speeches prophesying doom. The hon. member from Calgary West (Mr. Smith) is the only one on my left who has faith in the ability of our people and in their courage to conquer anything which befalls them.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) said that this session would go down in the history of Canada as a constitutional session, but I think it will go down in history as a whining session. The members of the C.C.F. party have whined and wailed all through the election. They should be ashamed of the record of their colleagues in Saskatchewan, who during their entire regime of five years have not put on the statute books of that province one piece of legislation of which they can be proud.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) on his housing scheme. But if he increases the number of houses to be built to 15,000 or 25,000 to satisfy the people in the cities, what will our farming population do for material? This year, in most of my constituency, we could not get one bag of Canadian cement under any circumstances. The only cement the farmer could get was United States cement. The farmers and dealers co-operated and shipped in carloads of cement from the United States which cost them from $2.10 to $2.60 per bag. I say the farming population of this country is entitled to some of the material to improve their places of abode.

I should like to bring to the attention of the house my views in regard to a subject about which nearly everyone who has spoken has said something, and that is the trans-Canada highway. I am one who is not very much concerned about the trans-Canada highway. I believe that this parliament should make provision for a minister of federal roads. We should have a system of federal roads, and the minister should appoint a commission to map out a road system that would be built, operated and maintained by the federal government. Hon. members will, no doubt, wonder why I am saying this. We people in Canada need this protection. If in April or May the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) had to move an army across Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, to protect us from the north, it would be bogged down before it had gone a hundred miles.

A modern war has never been fought in this country, but our great development in Alberta of this black gold, called oil, is the envy of the world. Wealth of this kind carries with it great responsibilities, and this system of federal roads, for our protection, is one of them.

The three agricultural provinces could never maintain let alone build a standard of roads to take care of any army. This is a responsibility of this parliament to the Canadian people.

There is another matter I should like to mention, and about which I shall go into greater detail at a later date. Youth, the greatest asset we have in Canada, is not represented in the House of Commons by a minister of the crown. There should be a minister of youth, to see that our youth are started off in the right direction. I will have more to say in regard to this at a future date.

Having been in the public life of the province of Saskatchewan for twenty-seven years, I will naturally have many suggestions to put before parliament in the near future.

Let me say to the two Newfoundland members who sit with the official opposition that they need have no fear of what will happen to them financially or in any other way, provided they have a legitimate case and do not begin asking for more than can be justifiably given. They have joined the greatest nation and the finest people on earth, and they can be justly proud. So I say to them: Have faith in your people and our people, the great Canadian people; have faith in our great leader and his government, as well as in the 184 men who stand behind him in unity and strength.

Our great leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), like some of the rest of us, went through trials and tribulations in the early days of this country. He does not want to go back to that, nor does he wish to see any part of the people have to do so.

I say to parliament and to the people of Canada: Have faith in this glorious country of ours, and stop this nonsense of talking depression. We have here a House of Commons of more than 250 members; and if this ugly monster of depression should rear its head, surely after the experience gained in the last one we should have enough brains and courage to help our government destroy it before it makes any headway.

In closing I should like to say something about our great little man from the west, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). His contribution to the country, particularly during the last war, will be recorded in history. His policy of storing moisture in the summer fallow and wheat in the granaries was a farsighted one. He knew that after the war the peoples of the world would need this great cereal called wheat. The process of summer-fallowing resulted in growing crops second to none in our history, with the result that overnight Canada became the bread basket of the world. To a great extent this was due to the foresight and the courage of our Minister of Agriculture.

On behalf of the people of my constituency I wish to thank the minister for the great work he has done for agriculture, especially as it is found in western Canada. I thank you.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): My first words in this debate, sir, will be to congratulate you upon your elevation to the high office of Deputy Speaker and chairman of committees. I was happy when I saw that your name was likely to be proposed for that office, one which I am sure you will occupy with dignity and with justice to all members and groups in the House of Commons.

At the same time, through you I should like to convey to Mr. Speaker my congratulations upon his election to that high office. So far as I am personally concerned, no more agreeable choice could have been made.

At least part of my time this afternoon I shall use to discuss a problem almost as old as confederation itself, one which is most complex, namely that of fair and equitable freight rates. I realize this is a problem that cannot be easily or speedily solved, having regard to the interests of all concerned.

However, while it may be a difficult problem, it is one of such importance that all possible steps should be taken toward its solution as quickly as possible.

Every section of the population wishes to have as cheap freight rates as possible, while at the same time I have no doubt the railway workers would like to have adequate wages. I believe that, because of the increased cost of living which has developed in recent months, they deserve some consideration by way of increased wages. I submit however that an increase in freight rates should not be given on the sole ground that increases in wages may take place, because that is a factor which no one can ascertain.

A continental country such as Canada certainly requires an efficient railway system. Particularly is that true in those areas of Canada which must depend almost entirely upon the railways for the transportation of raw and manufactured products into such areas. We do need an efficient service, and for that reason we would not wish to cripple the railways from a financial standpoint, and curtail their earnings to a point where efficient service could not be maintained. At the same time, however, we feel that the freight rate structure in all parts of Canada should be made equitable. That there has not been equity in the past in the freight rate structure was recognized by the cabinet in order in council P.C. 1487 of April 7, 1948. That order in council stated that a general inquiry into freight rates had not been held since 1925, and instructed the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada to make such a general inquiry. I wish to quote a part of that order in council:

> . . . it is therefore advisable that the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada be directed to make a thorough investigation of the rates structure of railways and railway companies which are under the jurisdiction of parliament, with a view to the establishment of a fair and reasonable rates structure which will, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, be equal in its application to all persons and localities so as to permit the freest possible interchange of commodities between the various provinces and territories of Canada, and the extension of Canadian trade both foreign and domestic, having due regard to the needs of agriculture and other basic industries.

Despite the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada having been directed to set freight rates that should be, as far as possible, equitable to all parts of Canada, we find that we are now faced with an increase in the existing freight rates which are already discriminatory, as we all know, between the various sections of the nation. I think too that now is a most inopportune time for an increase in freight rates. Daily in the press we see that the prices of many articles have been increased as a result of the devaluation of the Canadian dollar. We import many commodities from the United States—coal, oil, steel and machinery of all kinds. Many of these items have been increased approximately 10 per cent. Therefore, I say, while the cost of so many important articles is increasing there should not be added to that cost an increase in freight rates. The increase in freight rates does not apply only to the freight charged on the finished article for transportation from the factory to the ultimate consumer. An increase in freight cost will increase the cost of the raw products needed by manufacturers, will increase the cost of transporting the finished products to the distribution centres, and in addition will increase the cost of transporting those products from the distribution centres to the ultimate consumers.

I think we all agree that the devaluation of the British pound creates new problems for us in holding the British market. It will be more difficult now for the British people to buy from us the same quantity of goods that they have been buying. The cost of our commodities to the consumer in Great Britain will rise. That market is important for many farm products. It is true that to some extent we have a guaranteed price for wheat, and the devaluation of the British pound may not—and I hope will not—affect our market for wheat in Great Britain for the next few years, but it certainly cannot help affecting our market for cheese, eggs, meat and other products.

When the farmers of western Canada in particular are faced with a period of great difficulty in finding adequate markets, then I say that freight rates should not be increased, thus increasing the cost to the farmers of producing these commodities, an action that cannot help lowering their standard of living. We believe that the prairies, and for that matter all of the western provinces, have paid more than their share of freight rates in the past. For every dollar that the C.P.R. and C.N.R. have earned on railway lines east of Fort William they have earned more than $2 on railway lines west of Fort William. Therefore I contend that it is not fair or just to increase the rates in those regions where they are already too high.

As I view the freight rate situation, there is only one circumstance under which an increase in freight rates at this time might be justified: that is, if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which has always been considered the yardstick by which freight rates should be judged, were facing imminent financial peril. Then an increase in freight rates would be justifiable in order to maintain our railway services. Reading the annual report of the C.P.R. for 1948, I do not think anyone can say that they are in financial peril. The annual report of the C.P.R. for the year ending 1948 shows current assets to be $145,511,052 and current liabilities to be $47,795,364, a ratio of current assets to current liabilities of a little better than three to one. Certainly that is an enviable situation. On that basis the C.P.R. is not facing financial difficulty.

At the same time the liquid position of the C.P.R. is excellent. Cash and investments in government bonds total more than $61,435,313. Reserves and unadjusted credits were $91 million in 1939, and by 1948 had increased to over $492 million, an increase in reserves and unadjusted credits of more than $400 million in the short period of nine years. That proves to me that the financial position of the C.P.R. is good, and that a legitimate case could not have been made for an increase in freight rates at this time.

I should like to quote from the bottom of page 8 and the top of page 9 of the recent judgment of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada as follows:

> If the board accepts the railway's contention respecting depreciation—

That is a reference to the user rates of depreciation used by the C.P.R. in 1947.

> —it is, in fact, projecting into the future a fixed expense, which, in respect to the intensity of use of the equipment and property in the future, may well be inflated, and thereby setting a general level of freight rates, applicable to the future, which may be higher than warranted.

On page 11 of the judgment the board, after having refused to consider the C.P.R. rates of depreciation, had this to say:

> In the 21 per cent case the board reduced the $21,200,000 depreciation estimate of the railway by $4 million, leaving in effect a net charge to expenses of $17,200,000. The above calculations—

That refers to calculations on the previous page.

> —for the year 1947 indicate that the board could properly have reduced further the total depreciation item.

These calculations show that the board could have reduced the depreciation item by a total of $4,467,924. The board did not allow the user rates of depreciation claimed by the C.P.R. in 1947. I now quote from the annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway for 1948 in respect to depreciation:

> Pending the outcome of studies now under way, the user rates of depreciation were raised in order to take into account increases in investment in depreciable property which have become effective since the rates were first established. This resulted in increased depreciation charges of $6,164,075.

The board would not allow the user rates of depreciation established by the C.P.R. in 1947, and certainly they should not allow the increased user rates established in 1948, which resulted in the depreciation charge being increased by more than $6 million. Further on in the annual report I find that the net earnings from railway operations in 1948 were $18,419,166, a decrease of $4,473,023 as compared with 1947. I say the only logical thing for the board to do with the 1948 balance sheet, in order to properly compare it with the 1947 balance sheet, is to add to the net earnings for 1948 the increase in depreciation, amounting to $6,164,000. This would show the profit of the C.P.R. in 1948 from railway earnings at $24,583,000 as compared with a profit of $22,892,000 in 1947. So the true profits in 1948 were greater than those in 1947. Surely that does not indicate such financial need as would warrant an eight per cent horizontal increase in rates which are already discriminatory as between many parts of the country.

Then I think we would like to know the earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company apart from its net railway earnings. Here I quote from page 19 of the judgment:

> In the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway "other income", before providing for income tax thereon, amounted to $27,189,949 in the year 1948, an increase of $2,401,022 over the year 1947, $4,410,155 over 1946 and $12,082,992 over 1945.

So the earnings of the C.P.R. on the host of railway companies that it has leased, on its packing houses, hotels, steamship companies, telegraph companies and so on, have been going up year by year until in 1948 its earnings apart from net railway earnings were $12 million more than in 1945. I say this proves conclusively that the C.P.R. is in an excellent financial position. Railway earnings in 1948 were higher than in 1947. Its other earnings were at an all-time high. Does the board believe that the railway companies face a loss of revenue in future? I say they do not, and here again I quote from page 19 of the judgment:

> Since March 30, 1948, the revenue from the railway operations of the Canadian Pacific Railway has undergone, and is undergoing, many changes. Apart altogether from the increase in revenues resulting from the authorization in order 70425 of March 30, 1948, there have been other matters affecting the revenues of that company such as the removal of the mountain differential, increases in competitive international and special rates, increases in passenger fares, etc. More time will have to elapse in order to remove from the realm of conjecture the impact of these changes on the revenue position of the company.

The board says the future revenues of the C.P.R. are still in the realm of conjecture; in other words they may decrease or they may increase. I wonder, then, why the minister should think the railways need increased freight rates, when the judgment of the board says it is still in the realm of speculation or conjecture as to what the railway revenues may be in future. I should say it would have been much fairer and much more logical if the board had waited until some time had elapsed in order to find out what changes were taking place in railway revenues, and whether the railways in fact did need an increase in freight rates. Again, I quote from page 17 of the judgment:

> Under the existing legislation, as provided in the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933, this board is not empowered to consider what degree of co-operation, if any, has been achieved by virtue of that act. The respondents urged that a condition precedent to the granting of increases in freight rates should be proof by the railways that all economies contemplated by that act have been achieved. While I do not subscribe to any theory which would result in placing an impossible burden on the applicants in this regard, I have however great sympathy with much that the respondents urge. At the present time it is beyond the board's jurisdiction to inquire into that question, but I find again that one of the matters referred to the royal commission on transportation in P.C. 6033 is that it "review and report on the results achieved under the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933, and amendments thereto, making such recommendations as the present situation warrants."

In other words, the railways have not proved and have not attempted to prove that they have co-operated as provided by that act of 1933 in order to bring about savings in operating costs. The board of transport commissioners will not know whether or not the railways have made the savings they were to make under this act until the royal commission reports. I am therefore amazed that an increase in freight rates should be granted before the royal commission has reported as to whether or not the railways are co-operating in order to provide the most efficient service possible. In the judgment the board found that the 21 per cent increase was too great and that a 15 per cent increase would have been sufficient, but the application for an additional 20 per cent increase was based on the exhibits and arguments used in the 21 per cent case. In its judgment the board says this about the exhibits:

> I have already stated the extent to which the decision in that case—meaning the 21 per cent case—

> —must be revised. In the light of that revision this application will certainly require that the evidence and exhibits in its support be restated and if necessary be revised.

In other words, before the board of transport commissioners could ascertain whether or not the railways needed an increase in freight rates, the railways would have to provide a new set of exhibits and set out new arguments, because the arguments and exhibits used in the 21 per cent case were fallacious.

In regard to maintenance costs used by the Canadian Pacific Railway, the board says this, at page 18 of its judgment:

> On the hearing of this application the applicants restated and brought to date their evidence and exhibits with reference to maintenance costs. I think that these maintenance costs will require further study before any decision can be given, even assuming that the requirements of the Canadian Pacific Railway are to be accepted as the yardstick for a further increase in freight rates.

This means that the maintenance costs submitted by the Canadian Pacific Railway cannot be accepted and must be resubmitted.

The board has this to say about the deferred maintenance charges shown by the Canadian Pacific Railway in those exhibits:

> The Canadian Pacific Railway commenced deferred maintenance in the year 1941, and accumulated by way of deferred maintenance, $27,600,000. To date (the end of 1948) that fund has been drawn on only to the extent of $2,250,000. The evidence in support of this application indicates that the deferred maintenance fund would be drawn upon only in those years in which "normal" maintenance had been exceeded. It may very well be that a substantial balance of this deferred maintenance fund would be carried over for an indefinite period.

In other words a substantial part of the Canadian Pacific Railway's deferred maintenance fund should be used for the payment of fixed charges and dividends, and in providing for surplus. Perhaps a large part of that $27 million in the deferred maintenance fund should be considered as profit and, to that extent, the railway rates could be reduced. This proves to me that the Canadian Pacific is in an excellent financial position. It does not face imminent financial peril and, therefore, should not be given a horizontal increase in freight rates which discriminate against so many parts of Canada and against the agricultural industry in particular.

As I said at the outset, on April 7 the governor in council instructed the board of transport commissioners to review the freight rate structure in Canada with a view to the establishment of a fair and reasonable rate structure which would, under substantially similar circumstances, be fair to all persons and all regions. By order in council P.C. 4678 on October 12, the governor in council set out the various complaints of the provinces against the manner of handling the 21 per cent case. There were ten complaints in all, and the governor in council instructed the board of transport commissioners to consider those complaints as well as the initial instructions to the board to bring in equitable freight rates. I quote from the end of the order in council of that date:

> The committee therefore advise that the board be directed to consider, in the light of such changes in conditions of operations as have or will have taken place, the complaints set forth in the petition concurrently with the pending application for a further increase in freight rates, and that the disposition by the board of the matters set forth in the petition and any revision of order No. 70425 that may result from such consideration be made by the board in relation to its disposition of the said pending application.

The board of transport commissioners should consider the question of unjust and discriminatory freight rates, the apportionment of other income of the Canadian Pacific Railway, whether or not the depreciation charges were excessive and the other complaints of the provinces, concurrently with the application for an increase in freight rates. All those matters should be considered at the same time and a decision rendered. The board has failed to deal with the complaints of the various provinces, but the board did not fail to deal, to some extent at any rate, with the application of the railways for increased freight rates. The board granted an 8 per cent increase in freight rates without, at the same time, having dealt with all the objections raised by the provinces and particularly without having dealt with the discriminatory freight rate structure.

In view of all these facts, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) delay the coming into effect of the order granting an 8 per cent increase in rates. When the minister was speaking about this matter the other day he seemed rather confused. In one place he said that an order of the board had never been changed by the governor in council except, perhaps, in one instance. At another place in Hansard he is reported as having said that the governor in council had no right to interfere with an order of the board of transport commissioners.

I should like to quote section 52 of the Railway Act, which is found in the 1927 statutes.

> The governor in council may at any time, in his discretion, either upon petition of any party, person or company interested, or on his own motion, and without any petition or application, vary or rescind any order, decision, rule, or regulation of the board, whether such order or decision is made inter partes or otherwise and whether such regulation is general or limited in its scope and application; and any order which the governor in council may make with respect thereto shall be binding upon the board and upon all parties.

This demonstrates that the governor in council has the right and authority to change in any way at any time any order of the board of transport commissioners. Finally, I would plead with the Minister of Transport and with the cabinet, in the light of the facts that have been presented and in consideration that a royal commission is now examining the whole freight rate structure in Canada, to delay the 8 per cent increase until the royal commission has submitted its report, thus assisting the board of transport commissioners to at long last establish a fair and equitable freight rate structure throughout Canada.

Mr. A. F. Macdonald (Edmonton East): May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate you on your elevation to the position of Speaker of this house. As the member for Edmonton East in this parliament, I am greatly honoured but deeply conscious of my responsibility in representing an entirely urban constituency of the city of Edmonton, which is recognized as the most rapidly developing and expanding community, per capita of population, in Canada if not on the North American continent. The prestige of our leader and the record of his government gave good reason to the constituents of Edmonton East to send me here.

I must now pay tribute to the example given to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Prudham) and to me in the admirable record of the Hon. James A. MacKinnon, now a senator and minister without portfolio. He is held in the highest esteem by all residents of Edmonton and has served that city, his province and Canada with great distinction.

I should like to add my words of congratulation to the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) and the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing), who delivered excellent addresses in moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. When I listened to the speech from the throne I recognized that in this session we indeed were going to consider timely and necessary legislation.

Representing as I do an entirely urban riding, I shall be ever mindful of the social security needs of my constituents, the greatest needs at the present time being those outlined with particular reference to housing, pension plans and health measures.

Edmonton, capital city of Alberta and its largest, continues to show phenomenal and steady development of commercial enterprise and industrial activities. Although recent discovery of three major oil fields in the Edmonton area has stimulated the industrial growth of Edmonton to an enormous extent during the past two years, the city has for the past many years shown a steady and consistent growth reflected not only in bank clearings but in great population gains, with huge increases from year to year in building. The spectacular growth of Edmonton is due in large part to its unique geographical location, for not only is it the centre of one of the richest agricultural areas on the continent but it is also surrounded by one of nature's greatest storehouses of valuable natural resources such as natural gas, oil, coal, salt and many others so necessary to modern industry.

I should like to say that in the Ottawa Citizen of today, on the financial page, there is comment on the expansion of the mineral industry. To indicate the contribution that is being made from the territories surrounding Edmonton I should like to quote from the article in the Citizen, which stated that the petroleum industry swept upward in production from $11 million in 1947 to $389 million last year.

Building construction in Edmonton is almost unbelievable. Everywhere buildings under construction are to be seen, and the need is even greater than present facilities can meet. If you go out into the country surrounding Edmonton you will see, for mile upon mile, the spires of the oil wells—spires that are really comparable to the spires of these beautiful parliament buildings. The wealth that will be produced in the neighbourhood of Edmonton will help to solve the problems of our Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) with regard to the United States dollar shortage, and in a few years will make a great contribution to the reduction of the national debt.

The constituents of Edmonton East are of many racial origins; and I always like to think that in Edmonton East is developed a distinctive national consciousness which makes the constituents ever mindful of their unique position and their obligation to contribute their best efforts to the greatness of Canada.

In Edmonton industrial relations are excellent. Management and labour dispose of the problems that arise from time to time at a level of satisfaction that is most commendable. It is almost impossible to paint too bright a picture of the industrial future of Edmonton. A much greater development of industries allied to oil has already gained momentum. Coupled with this development is the vast agricultural revenue that flows into Edmonton from the rich farming areas surrounding the city. The constituents of Edmonton East know that as agriculture flourishes, so do the city dwellers prosper.

Edmonton, lying at the gateway of the north and its mining riches, is developing in a way never in the past conceived. Serving Edmonton are three excellently managed railways and many air lines. The city's huge airport, which is the busiest airport in Canada, handles more freight by air than any city in the world. So I can now say Edmonton, the oil centre, agriculture centre and aviation centre.

We in Edmonton East believe that a trans-Canada highway should pass through our constituency. At another time, probably quite soon, I shall have an opportunity to discourse on that subject in this house.

We in Edmonton are conscious that the residents are in complete accord with the policy of this government and its administration, and that they will at the first opportunity express through their democratic ballot a desire to select for Alberta a government in step provincially with the national administration.

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, along with others who have spoken I also should like to extend to you my congratulations. We who are new to this house cannot perhaps appreciate you as well as others who have known you longer. Your consideration to new members has endeared you to us, and I should like to convey to you my warm and sincere congratulations, and I wish you to accept them as such.

To the mover and seconder of the address I say, I have not had the honour of knowing you long but in the time I have known you I have learned to appreciate you and, young members that you are, I feel that in this party we have in you young men of promise. I offer you most heartily my congratulations on the way in which you presented your addresses.

I want to speak this afternoon on union; and, if I can, I want to rectify some of the impressions which hon. members have received on Newfoundland's entry into union. We have been received here with much kindness. We have received every consideration, and we appreciate that to the fullest. It has been suggested in this house that the people of Newfoundland voted for confederation because of the social benefits that we would receive. I do not wish to take anything away from the truth of that statement, but it is not the whole truth. I know that the economic side of union should have been surveyed and surveyed thoroughly, but there is more in union than economics. This afternoon I want to emphasize that if I can. I know that we are subject to economics from the cradle to the grave, but it is not the whole of life, and neither is it the full reason why we chose union instead of a policy of isolation. We chose it because we believed that in union there is strength, and that our future lay to the west of us, and that in adopting a policy of isolation we would be adopting a policy of disaster for our country.

As I have said, the economic side of union has been stressed in the press and on the radio, and we would do well, I think, to point out some of the aspects of union so that the whole Canadian people may have a full and complete idea as to why this union took place.

During recent years in Newfoundland we have had several forms of government. We had tried responsible government for many long years and it failed our people. It has been said that the financial crisis in which we found ourselves was brought about by the depression. It would be truer to say that the depression hastened the crisis. We found ourselves in a position where we could not meet our obligations, and with sorrow we had to give up freedom, democratic freedom as we know it on this side of the water. A royal commission came to our country to investigate our conditions. It recommended a form of government called commission of government. We accepted it, and we accepted it in good faith. Unfortunately we found that progress without freedom is not obtainable. During the time of government by commission our people suffered as they had never suffered before. I have been amongst the people and I have come from the people, and I know what they suffered. I say that I never want to see it again as long as I live. Our people remembered these things. Because we felt that union with the other provinces would give us a measure of security, which we could never get if we had stood alone, we chose union. That was the main reason why we chose union. I was one of those who fought for it from the very beginning. It was not an easy choice for some of us to make. To give up the proud position which we had held for 450-odd years was not easy; but in choosing that side and going out and fighting for union I believed I did so in the best interests of my people, and I believe I did it in the best interests of this dominion. And now that we have union—thank God we have it—it is our job to put it to work. On what we do in this parliament in the near future, how we treat the people of Newfoundland, will very largely depend the happiness of our people.

I have been much encouraged since coming here by the kindly consideration which has been given to Newfoundland and its problems. I am glad to state here that the faith which I had before I came is sustained now, and I shall be glad to go back and tell my people that they have a sympathetic ear in Ottawa, that our just claims will be met, and that in union we shall be able to provide for our people as we have never been able to provide for them before.

I want to bring to the attention of this house the geographical position which Newfoundland holds in relation to the rest of the dominion. During recent days it has been said here that we in Canada did not come in contact with the war at first hand. The hon. member who said that did not live in Newfoundland. We did come in contact with the war at first hand in Newfoundland, and thousands of our people saw ships, laden with iron ore, torpedoed, and sent to the bottom in the twinkling of an eye with a tremendous loss of life. We know what war means. We have experienced it at first hand. Many hundreds of ships have been torpedoed on our coasts, and the survivors have been landed at St. John's and cared for in our hospitals during the war. I mention these facts because I do not want Canada to make the mistake that the British Admiralty made in the period between the two wars when Great Britain concentrated her defences in Bermuda instead of in Newfoundland. That mistake cost us very dearly, and it very nearly cost us the battle of the Atlantic. If we had lost that battle we would have lost the war.

By this act of union Canada is now secure on her eastern border. If we had chosen otherwise I think that the party sponsoring economic union with the United States would have won. If that had happened, I believe that economic union would have taken place with that country, and this dominion would have been faced with the situation that she was faced with when Alaska was taken over by the United States. That great country to the south is a friendly country, it is true. But we wanted to keep Newfoundland British; we wanted to keep Newfoundland within the British commonwealth of nations; we wanted to link up with you, to make you stronger, so that your voice for peace raised in the future would be a strong and a united voice.

Some people have said that we should have had responsible government and that negotiation should have taken place as between governments. My reply to that is this: Economically speaking, we have gone through serious times before. The world situation in trade and commerce was none too secure, as we have had evidence of late. We believed that the only time we should come into the union was when we were in a financially strong position. That was the path of honour, and we chose that path. That is why we came in when we did—and I believe we did the right thing when we did it.

May I draw your attention to another point. At the very time when this great country was negotiating for the coming into being of the Atlantic treaty, my province entered into union with you. The fact is that we joined with you. Soon afterwards the Atlantic pact was signed, and this was followed by the lifting of the Berlin blockade, making the peace of the world more secure than ever before.

Those acts are related. Just at the very time when Canada's voice should have been united and strong, it was made that way by our act of union. And it may well be that, through this small act of ours, we may have played a big part in bringing about that alliance, which is the strongest force we have in the world today for peace. Big things come from small things. I believe those acts are related. If we have helped Canada in any way to preserve the peace of the world—even if only in a small way—we in Newfoundland will take pride in that fact.

The union of Newfoundland with Canada has been analysed from the standpoint of dollars and cents. Can anyone in this House of Commons analyse what I have said from a dollars-and-cents standpoint? It goes beyond that: it is the union of two peoples bound together by religion, by language, by geographical position and by the type of life we live. Many thousands of our people from Newfoundland have come to this country seeking their bread and butter; and they have made good here.

It has been said that we have unemployment in Newfoundland. It is sad to relate that, unfortunately, at just this time of the year, it is on the increase. But unemployment in Newfoundland is not the fault of union; we have had unemployment there for years. It is a problem which is not easy of solution; but we believe that under union we can solve it. With your sympathetic help and co-operation we believe we can do it.

My country is an old country, with 452 years of history. We are a proud and an hospitable people. Many hon. members have indicated their intention of coming to Newfoundland and viewing our country. May I give them a bit of advice? I have received advice since coming to Ottawa, and I should like to give some at this time. When you come to visit us remember two things: remember that we are an hospitable and proud people; and when you partake of our hospitality do not forget our pride. And when you come in contact with our pride, please think of our hospitality.

The time at my disposal is almost up, and I do not wish to delay the house unnecessarily. I do wish to say this in all sincerity, however, that as it has been our boast of old that we were Britain's most ancient and loyal colony, and as we are the cornerstone of empire, so do I believe that in the future it will be our proud boast that we are Canada's newest and most loyal province.

On motion of Mr. Pouliot the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we hope to complete this debate.

Mr. Knowles: Was there not some proposal for interim supply tomorrow?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh yes; at the outset the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will move to go into committee of supply for interim supply.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, September 29, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

ONTARIO APPLES

APPRECIATION OF GIFT OF MEMBER FOR LEEDS

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, out of the goodness of his heart someone occasionally provides a treat for members of this house; and today we have on our desks these beautiful apples. We thank the donor, but so far as I am concerned the apples would taste far sweeter if the gift were shared by all those in the house, including the page boys and others.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): May I say a word in appreciation of these apples which have been given to us by an hon. member from Ontario—in lively anticipation of the British Columbia apples we shall be given later, which will be of a much greater size.

Mr. G. T. Fulford (Leeds): These apples were presented to me on Monday, as I was leaving Brockville. They are McIntosh Reds, and were grown by a resident of the county of Leeds. I hope they prove that the apples of eastern Ontario will stand up against those grown anywhere else in Canada. As you know, Mr. Speaker, eastern Ontario is the home of the McIntosh Red.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND TIME FOR APPEAL TO SUPREME COURT, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 8 (from the Senate) to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE ACT

AMENDMENT TO MAKE DEPUTY MINISTER OF JUSTICE THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 9 (from the Senate) to amend the Department of Justice Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

S.S. "NORTHUMBERLAND"—DAMAGED BY FIRE

Mr. Church:

1. What has been done to replace the steamer Northumberland which was burnt at Port Dalhousie?

2. Was an inquiry held into the burning of the Northumberland?

3. If so, what was the nature of the inquiry?

4. How long had this ship been in use and what inspection was made of it?

5. Was this ship not already in commission when the accident happened?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. The Canadian National Railways advise that no plans are at present under consideration for the replacement of the steamer Northumberland.

2 and 3. The usual casualty report was made to the collector of customs as required by the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, and on the basis of this report it was considered that no further inquiry under the Canada Shipping Act was necessary.

4. The S.S. Northumberland was built in 1891. She had undergone the regular inspection as required by the Canada Shipping Act, 1934.

5. The S.S. Northumberland had not commenced her season's work when the fire occurred. Some of the crew were on board the ship, but her annual inspection had not yet been completed, and the inspection certificate which was necessary before she would be permitted to commence operation had not been issued.

IMPORTS OF POTATOES AND OTHER STARCHES

Mr. Hatfield:

1. What was the value and quantity of potato starch imported into Canada in the year 1949 to date?

2. What was the quantity of other starches, and value, imported into Canada during the same period?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Imports, "potato starch and potato flour", January 1 to July 31, 1949—766,980 lbs., valued at $49,948.

2. Imports, "starch, including corn starch, and all preparations having the quality of starch, n.o.p.", January 1 to July 31, 1949—1,947,752 lbs., valued at $117,806.

INCOME TAX—MEDICAL EXPENSES—AMBULANCE SERVICES

Mr. Hansell:

Are ambulance services considered to be part of medical expenses for the purpose of income taxes, and if not, in what way does the government consider them not to be?

Mr. Mayhew: Amounts paid for ambulance services are not included in the medical expenses set forth in subsection (b) of section 26 of the Income Tax Act.

Questions

LIFE-SAVING FACILITIES ON LAKES AND INLAND WATERWAYS

Mr. Church:

What has been done by the government since last session to provide a proper life-saving system for the lakes and inland waterways in the province of Ontario and all of Canada?

Mr. Chevrier: An interdepartmental committee has been appointed under the chairmanship of the Canadian maritime commission for the purpose of co-ordinating the functions of all government departments concerned in search and rescue work on the east coast, west coast and the great lakes.

MARITIME COMMISSION FOR ST. LAWRENCE AND GREAT LAKES—AIDS TO NAVIGATION

Mr. Church:

1. What has been done since last session to establish a maritime commission in the province of Ontario, for the river St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes?
2. What facilities and other aids to navigation have been considered by the government since last session and what action has been taken?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. The jurisdiction of the Canadian maritime commission extends to the great lakes and St. Lawrence river as well as to the east and west coasts.

2. Since last session ten lighthouses and six fog alarms have been improved and twenty-four unlighted buoys have been placed. One improved combined light and fog alarm station is now under construction. A new lifeboat for the east coast is under construction. At Montreal, Toronto, and Midland, equipment has been installed to provide radiophone communication service for shipping on very high frequency to supplement the service now being provided on medium frequency. Action has been taken to provide duplex terminal equipment for stations at Midland and Port Burwell, Ontario, and Father Point, Quebec, in order that persons on board radiophone-equipped ships may establish direct telephone contact with any telephone subscriber on shore; all other stations on the Great Lakes and at Montreal and Quebec already have been equipped for this service.

In addition the 1949 program involves the establishment of nine beacon lights, thirteen lighted buoys, and three radar reflectors and the installation of a radiophone at Parry Sound.

An answer furnished last year indicated the numerous aids to navigation already in operation and pointed out the requirements of the Canada Shipping Act with respect to the carrying of life-saving appliances and equipment on ships and the yearly inspection of hulls and equipment by steamship inspectors.

STEEL CONTROL

Mr. Isnor:

1. Is steel subject to any form of control?
2. If so (a) what form of control; (b) what was the date on which steel controls were brought into effect?
3. Is there any price control on steel scrap?
4. If so, what type of control is still in effect?
5. Does this apply to all provinces?

Mr. Belzile: In so far as the wartime prices and trade board is concerned:

1. Yes. There are price ceilings on all forms of basic mill steel products.

2. (a) Controls over distribution and quantity, which are relaxed or expanded when advisable, as well as controls over the export and import from various countries.

(b) June 24, 1940.

3. Yes.

4. Control over steel scrap remains mainly as a price control; there is also control as to grade and classification.

5. Yes.

WHEAT—SHIPMENTS THROUGH CHURCHILL

Mr. Wright:

1. Has the wheat board set a date for the stoppage of all shipments of wheat to Churchill?
2. If so, on what date and what are the reasons for stopping such shipments on this date?

4. Has the wheat board established a price for wheat at Churchill under the world wheat agreement?
5. If so, what is this price?
6. Will the wheat board use the storage space at Churchill this season?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. Yes.

2. September 8, 1949. Sufficient wheat in store Churchill or en route to meet requirements.

3. September 16, 1948.

4. No, but question was raised and matter is receiving attention.

5. Answered by No. 4.

6. For small quantities only.

LOAN TO U.S.S.R., 1942—REPAYMENT

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf):

1. Did the U.S.S.R. on September 8, 1947, pay the last instalment due to Canada on the $5,000,000 lent under the authority of order in council P.C. 7822, dated September 1, 1942?
2. If not, what valid reasons were given for non-payment?

Mr. Belzile:

1. The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics paid on September 8, 1947, the last instalment due to Canada on a credit of $10 million authorized by P.C. 7822, dated September 1, 1942.

2. Answered by No. 1.

STRAIT OF CANSO BRIDGE PROJECT

Mr. Isnor:

1. Have surveys been completed in respect to the strait of Canso bridge project?

2. Have plans and specifications been prepared in connection with the construction of the Canso bridge?

3. When will tenders be called?

4. What is the firm name and address of the engineers conducting surveys and drawing plans?

Mr. Chevrier:

1. No. Survey parties are still in the field. A contract let under tender to Foundation Maritime Limited on July 28, 1949, for boring to rock on the site of the proposed bridge piers, has just been completed. Marine cables at the bridge site have been moved to a new location.

Questions

2. No. Preparation of plans for the bridge piers are under way. Final design for these structures could not be completed until rock boring results were obtained.

3. Expected in 1950.

4. P. L. Pratley, D. Eng., M. Inst., C.E., consulting engineer, 909 Drummond building, St. Catherine street west, Montreal, P.Q.

TRADE WITH SPAIN

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf):

What was the value, in Canadian dollars, of our imports from Spain and our exports to that country for the year 1948?

* Clinical services to the health and occupation centres are supplied by such general practitioners and specialists employed on a half-day fee basis or medical officers in the district medical officers' pool as may be delegated by the district director of medicine. The two medical officers shown in Schedule "A" are employed as medical superintendents of York and George Derby, respectively; the medical superintendent of the other Centres is the superintendent of the general treatment hospital of the department in the locality, or the departmental district medical officer.

BUTTER—LOSS ON IMPORTS FROM VARIOUS COUNTRIES

Mr. Stanfield:

How much was the loss to the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation on the 15,000,000 pounds of Denmark, Australian, and New Zealand butter that were brought into Canada last year by the Canadian Commercial Corporation?

Mr. Belzile: In so far as the wartime prices and trade board is concerned: Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited, $857,337.50.

*CATTLE—COMPENSATION FOR T.B. REACTORS

Mr. Cardiff:

1. Has the government taken any action towards raising the compensation paid to farmers for cattle condemned under the T.B. testing program?
2. If so, what action has been taken?
3. Has compensation been raised?

Mr. Gardiner: If I may answer this question orally, a bill containing the answer which would be given to this question is now on its way to the house. Could this question either be withdrawn or allowed to stand until the bill is before the house? The answer is in the bill itself.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

JACQUES DE BERNONVILLE AND MICHEL LUCIEN SEIGNEUR

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

For a copy of all orders in council, correspondence, telegrams and other documents in the possession of the government, concerning Jacques de Bernonville and Michel Lucien Seigneur.

Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West): At the last session of parliament a similar question was asked by the hon. member and an order for return was passed with reference to one of these men, Michel Lucien Seigneur. The return was tabled on April 29, and is quite voluminous. It should be understood that the documents to be tabled under this order would be a continuation of the documents already filed.

Mr. Speaker: Carried, subject to the statement of the minister.

DOMINION ELECTION, 1949—REGINA CITY—SERVICE PERSONNEL

Mr. Knowles:

For a return showing the names and home addresses of all service personnel who voted as electors of the constituency of the electoral district of Regina city in the general election of June 27, 1949, under the provisions of the defence service voting regulations.

Mr. Bradley: I should like to point out to the house that the names and home addresses of defence service electors whose votes were attributed to the electoral district of Regina City at the general election of June 27, pursuant to the provisions of the Canadian defence service voting regulations were recorded only on the back of the outer envelope as prescribed in the regulations. Paragraph 92 of the regulations provides that these outer envelopes are "election documents or election papers" which cannot be inspected except under a rule or order of a court of justice issued under section 59(2) and 88(2) of the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

Mr. Knowles: May I be permitted to ask the Secretary of State one question? Can he say whether those names and addresses are in existence?

Mr. Bradley: I am unable to give any information as to what is in the possession of the chief electoral officer. I do not know.

Motion dropped.

NANTON, ALTA., POST OFFICE

Mr. Hansell:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other communications exchanged between the government or any officials thereof and any other person or persons during the past three years, respecting the building or alteration or remodelling or renting of suitable premises for the post office at Nanton, Alberta.

DOMINION ELECTIONS—1949—EXPENSES OF CANDIDATES

Mr. Knowles:

For a return showing the total amount of election expenses on behalf of every candidate in the general election of June 27, 1949, as indicated in the return respecting election expenses submitted by the official agent of each candidate, under the provisions of section 63 of the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.

AIR TRAFFIC AGREEMENT

CANADA-UNITED STATES—QUESTION AS TO EXTENSION—CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Press dispatches today indicate that Canada has granted to the United States an extension of thirty days to show good faith, as the report states, in connection with the bilateral air agreement. Can the minister make a statement, either today or tomorrow, with regard to this extension? At the same time will he table the notes which are indicated in the report as having passed between the two governments?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The hon. member telephoned notice of his question to my office about fifteen minutes ago, and I have not had time to go into it as fully as I should like to. I can, however, tell him this. The notes exchanged between the United States government and the Secretary of State for External Affairs I presume are privileged documents, and I would doubt whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs would wish to table them. That is, however, a matter for him to decide.

Inquiries of the Ministry

As to the agreement which has been signed between Canada and the United States covering air traffic rights, I can see no objection to its being tabled, and I shall ask my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs to have that done.

As to the extension of thirty days, to which my hon. friend referred, of certain air traffic rights which lines of the United States have at Gander, these rights have been extended following discussions with the United States authorities, who have assured us that they are doing everything they can to implement the agreement signed between Canada and the United States.

With regard to the air traffic agreement between the two countries and the rights derived thereunder, as well as the agreement signed between Canada and the United Kingdom, I propose to make a statement during the consideration of my estimates.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REMOVAL OF OPERATING HEADQUARTERS FROM WINNIPEG TO MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) on two occasions has asked me to make a statement on the plan for transferring the headquarters group of T.C.A. from Winnipeg to Montreal. I wish to do so now.

The plans for the transfer of headquarters group of the operations department of Trans-Canada Air Lines from Winnipeg to Montreal will have been fully implemented by Monday, October 3. Office accommodation has been completed on schedule in the international aviation building, Dorchester street, Montreal, even to the installation of telephones, so that the move should involve little interruption to the work of the air line.

MINISTERIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS

QUESTION AS TO PROCEDURE WHEN PARLIAMENT IN SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): A few days ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) intimated to the house some changes in the regulations with regard to the importation of fruit and vegetables. That seems to be the proper procedure when the house is sitting. I noticed this morning that a press release was issued yesterday by the Department of Trade and Commerce, announcing important changes in various tariff items, and in foreign exchange regulations affecting the steel industry. I am wondering why the announcement was made by a statement to the press, when the house is sitting, rather than to the house in the first instance so that members might have an opportunity of asking questions if they wished to do so.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I made a statement in the house with regard to fruit and vegetables. That was done because it is a matter in which there is wide public interest. As to changes in connection with the emergency exchange regulations, I may say that I do not make a statement in the house if they are of a more or less routine character. I felt, however, that the matter of fruit and vegetables was one of general interest.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Mr. Abbott moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $114,516,603.83, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, except items 43, 419 and 452, as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament; a sum not exceeding $2,613,651.00, being one-twelfth of the several items to be voted, as set out in the supplementary estimates (Newfoundland); a sum not exceeding $5,876,758.33, being one-twelfth of the several items to be voted as set out in the further supplementary estimates, and a sum not exceeding $468,750.00, being five-twelfths of item 907 to be voted as set out in the further supplementary estimates laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty on account for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950.

He said: Before you put the resolution, Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might give just a word of explanation as to the interim supply which I am asking for.

The bill which will be founded on this resolution will ask for an additional one-twelfth of all the items contained in the main estimates, one-twelfth of all the items in what are referred to as the Newfoundland supplementaries, one-twelfth of all the items in the further supplementaries which I tabled the day before yesterday, and five-twelfths of one item, item 907 in those other supplementaries, which relates to the additional work of the Fraser valley diking board. I am informed that the work is proceeding rapidly and that the amount asked for will be required.

Members of the committee who were here in the last parliament will recall that six months' interim supply was voted before parliament was dissolved in the latter part of April. Consequently that supply will run out on September 30, which is tomorrow. The form of the bill which will be placed before the house is exactly the same as the other supply bills which have been passed by the house from time to time. The passing of the bill will not result in the passing of the full amount of any item, and will not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize and discuss items in the estimates which will come up for consideration from time to time during the remainder of the session. Of course I give the usual undertaking that such rights and privileges will be respected, and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of the proposed measure.

Mr. Fraser: In asking for only one-twelfth of the total amount, does the minister believe that all the estimates will be through by the end of next month?

Mr. Abbott: Hope springs eternal. If we do not get them through by then, I shall have to come back before the end of October.

Mr. Church: Mr. Chairman, the committee will be only conducting a post mortem on these expenditures, as we understand it. The time is coming when there should be some reduction. I speak on behalf of the businessmen of the country. The government made that promise in the last election campaign. I fail to see why the House of Commons is sanctioning this interim supply for a period which will extend practically to the end of October, with the House of Commons simply holding a post mortem on these expenditures. I think we are going too far. What is the House of Commons for if not to check up on expenditures? It was on that principle, taxation without representation, that the American colonies seceded from the mother country. Yet here we are, a long time afterwards, adopting the same principle. I wish to protest against it, as I have done on other occasions.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the Minister of Finance what is the total amount that is being voted?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The amount is set forth in the resolution which the chairman will read in a moment. It is $114,516,603.83, plus $2,613,651, plus $5,876,758.33, plus $468,750.

Mr. Knowles: What does that add up to?

Mr. Abbott: The total of the item asked for by the hon. member for Eglinton is $123,475,763.16.

Mr. Graydon: Included in the figure which is being asked for by the Minister of Finance are several items coming under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State. Because the patent office of Canada comes under that department I want to raise a question which I could not very well raise on the orders of the day. I shall be brief, because the minister is new to the house.

First of all I wish to welcome the hon. gentleman—it is the first opportunity I have had to do so—and to wish him well in the work which lies ahead. At the same time I want to give him a word of caution. The question of the great arrears of work in the patent office is one of which he had better be made aware at the very first opportunity, and I think this is that opportunity.

As the Chairman knows, by a recommendation of a committee of this house the patent fees were raised from $15 to $25 on the original application and a similar amount when the patent is issued. That increase was decided on largely because the committee recommended that these patents be printed. I am told that for some considerable time the printing has been paid for with these additional fees, but the work is still far behind. In addition, the quarters, while more nearly adequate than they were before, still fall short of meeting the need which is evident all along the line.

Some few years ago it was said that there were some 30,000 patents still to be dealt with. I am informed that the patents are running somewhat behind, even in respect to current applications. The commissioner and his staff, inadequate as it is, are unable to handle the backlog because they cannot keep up with the current applications.

For the benefit of new members it ought to be said that the patent office is an open house for the public. In addition it has significance far beyond our domestic scene, because of international implications. From Canada's point of view it is not good business to have the patent office, which has international significance, so far behind in its work. As the minister will understand, I am not raising this question to criticize him or to criticize those who have been in charge of the patent office. I am merely indicating a concentrated drive ought to be made by the minister, backed by the government, to see to it that we get in line with the British patent office and with the United States patent office. Since the war quite a length of time has elapsed, and this country cannot afford to have anything but a good reputation when it is dealing with a matter of this kind.

The patent office of course has definitely a link with business generally in the country. I am quite sure that business will expect that a government department will at least keep abreast of the times. I am throwing this out only as a suggestion; perhaps it will not bear close scrutiny. In any event, in the United States and in Britain one finds the patent office under the jurisdiction of the department of commerce. It is closely related to trade and commerce. In the United Kingdom I understand it is under the board of trade, because of the fact that it is related to business and commerce. When I say this I am not reflecting upon the minister. Perhaps the government might give consideration to relating patent work with the department with which it is most closely allied, and following the precedent which has been established in those other two countries.

I have not given the matter much consideration; perhaps there are good reasons why the patent office should not come under the Department of Trade and Commerce. In any event my main reason for raising the question now is to impress upon the new minister and upon the government the necessity of seeing to it that a concentrated drive is made to bring the patent office up to date and to provide the facilities and the staff which are so urgently needed to do the job.

Mr. Coldwell: On the orders of the day I asked a question about announcements of policy by press releases when parliament is sitting. The answer given by the Minister of Finance was quite satisfactory as far as it went. I think that matters of small import to a community can be dealt with in that way. The reason I ask the question is that a press statement issued yesterday involved an important government decision and was of wide public interest. There may be a good reason why, in order to conserve foreign exchange, the policy announced in the press release should be approved. Hon. members might be interested in the list of the materials involved. They comprise pig iron, ingots, blooms, billets, bars, rods, plates, sheets and forgings. All these items will now be imported under permit to be issued under the foreign exchange regulations. In regard to an important group of items such as this it would be well to have the announcement made in the house in order that hon. members might have an opportunity of knowing what was being done in such an important matter. Sometimes press releases are tucked away in the corner of a newspaper and we do not see them. That was my reason for asking the question. I was making the suggestion that when an announcement touching very important imports of this description is made, at a time when the house is sitting, perhaps it would be well to have it made in the house rather than to have it made public by way of a press release.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I admit at once that the issuance of that statement was an error. It was a steel controller order made under wartime legislation, and it came to me for approval. It was not effective until October 1, and I fully intended to make the announcement in the house. I was as much surprised as the hon. member to read it in the press. However, since the mistake had been made, I saw no purpose in making the announcement in the house.

Mr. Fraser: Did the Minister of Finance indicate what proportion of the further supplementary estimates is included in the sum for which he is asking today?

Mr. Abbott: I am asking today for one-twelfth of the new supplementary estimates, along with the other items to which I referred.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, as there are funds in this resolution which come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, I should like to draw his attention to a question I raised in the house on September 20, when I asked him about the plight of certain imperial pensioners in Canada brought about by the devaluation of the pound.

At that time the minister did not know that the British government was giving consideration to the matter. Since then it has become obvious, through letters received by a number of members, and from comments in the press, that a large number of Canadian citizens are affected by the devaluation of the pound, and many people are taking an interest in it. Not only are those who are affected showing an interest, but it is obvious from press comments that a large number of their fellow Canadians are aware of the difficult circumstances faced by some people who have to exist in Canada today on imperial pensions.

Two general proposals have been made, the first being that the government should bring the plight of these people to the attention of the British government, explaining particularly the present circumstances, and the second, suggested by some veterans organizations, that the Canadian government should subsidize these imperial pensioners.

I am not going to discuss the soundness of this proposal, but I urge upon the minister that action be taken by the government at the earliest possible moment to bring to the attention of the British government the plight of certain imperial pensioners in Canada brought about by the recent devaluation of the pound.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, will the government move at this session to set up a special committee of the house on atomic energy? This suggestion has been made in different sessions, and I would point out to the ministry, particularly to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that the subject is now of even greater importance than it was in earlier years.

Only this morning we read in the press that yesterday in the United States the atomic energy commission held a joint meeting with a committee of congress. The announcement from that meeting was made by the chairman of the committee of congress. The same United States congressional committee sent two representatives to Canada only a few weeks ago to inspect our plant at Chalk River.

It seems to me perfectly clear that the house should set up a committee on atomic energy. This request has been supported in other years, not only by members of the official opposition but also by the leaders of the C.C.F. and Social Credit parties. I am sure they will support my suggestion today. This is now one of the most important questions to be faced by our nation and by the House of Commons. I would urge that the government move to set up such a special committee without further delay.

Mr. Coldwell: May I confirm what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, namely, that we have supported this suggestion in the past, and that we are happy to do so again today. This matter is one with which the House of Commons should be concerned. I do not suggest, of course, that any highly secret information should be imparted to such a committee, but I believe the house and country should know what Canada is doing in connection with the development and use of atomic energy.

In supporting a similar suggestion in past years I made the comment that this great scientific discovery could not be kept secret for any considerable length of time. The other afternoon the Prime Minister made the announcement that it was believed that the Soviet union had unlocked the secret of the atomic bomb. That had been anticipated by scientists, I believe, ever since the first bomb was dropped on Hiroshima in 1945.

In view of the necessity of having public opinion behind the government in its desire, as stated on more than one occasion before the United Nations, to bring atomic energy in all its phases under international control, I believe the time has now come when a committee should be established in order that parliament may be well informed and, in turn, in order that the people may have that information. Consequently I join with the hon. member in suggesting to the government that, in spite of all that has happened in the past, in view of the circumstances now surrounding this important discovery, and the dangers to the world flowing from it, if improperly used—and, on the other hand, the great benefits that might accrue to mankind if it is used properly and for the benefit of the human race—this house should know more about what Canada is doing, and the extent to which we are co-operating and have been permitted to co-operate with the United States, if I may put it that way. With reservations respecting highly secret matters, information should be given the house and the country on this important matter. In our opinion a committee on atomic matters should be set up by this house.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I should like to indicate my support of the request by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that a committee on atomic energy be set up at the earliest possible time. May I ask that the government give this matter its most earnest consideration at an early day.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I should like to support the suggestion just offered by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. I am sure hon. members could be most useful to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with this matter of atomic energy. The entire administration of our share of what is being done in the matter of atomic energy is a heavy responsibility for one man to carry. I feel sure that hon. members could be helpful to him, particularly in the matter of exploration for atomic minerals.

The government has established a price of $2.75 a pound for uranium oxide. It would be interesting to know if that price is sufficiently high, and to know the quantities being exported. I suggest that if the minister can see his way clear he permit the setting up of this committee, because I believe it would be most helpful to him.

Mr. Howe: Perhaps I can shorten the debate. At the last session of the last parliament I stated that the government would have no objection to a committee on atomic energy. The government is still of the same opinion, and will be glad to co-operate with other parties in the house in the setting up of a committee at the proper time during this session.

Mr. Fleming: I appreciate what the minister has just said. I hope this matter will be followed up and a committee set up at an early date.

I should like to broaden this discussion by urging upon the Prime Minister and the government the necessity for recasting the committee machinery of this house. The rules provide for about fifteen standing committees, which presumably will be appointed next week. Some of those committees will not meet for the duration of this session, while others will. The fact is that some committees have not met for years.

There are great areas of the public business that do not fall within the scope of any of the present standing committees. One has been mentioned this afternoon, this new subject of atomic energy. There is another field that is completely omitted from the scope of the present standing committees, something of which I have spoken before. I refer to the whole subject of social security, welfare, health and housing, which I think should be embraced within the scope of a committee. When the government is giving consideration to amending or revising the present committee structure I hope we shall not be satisfied with a mere partial job. I submit that the time has come when someone must take the responsibility for going over the whole committee structure and recasting and modernizing it. If necessary, certain committees might be eliminated, because we do not wish to have too many. The duties of certain committees might be enlarged, but there should be committees to cover those fields of public business which are not covered at the present time. I urge again most strongly that provision be made in our committee structure for a committee on social security, welfare, health and housing.

Mr. Hansell: Before we vote these several million dollars I should like to ask the minister a question. I had placed a question on the order paper which was answered today by the Minister of National Revenue, although only in part. My question was:

> Are ambulance services considered to be part of medical expenses for the purposes of income tax and, if not, in what way does the government consider them not to be?

The answer given by the minister was as follows:

> Amounts paid for ambulance services are not included in the medical expenses set forth in subsection (b) of section 26 of the Income Tax Act.

The last part of my question, which was not answered, reads as follows:

> If not, in what way does the government consider them not to be?

The fact that that last part of the question was not answered would imply that the government have no answer to it. I do not believe they have. If a man becomes ill and has to call for an ambulance, that is certainly part of his medical expenses. The particular case that was drawn to my attention was that of a man who had to call an ambulance to take him two hundred miles. The expense was considerable, yet he could not include that as part of his medical expenses in making out his income tax return.

I appreciate the fact that there is a difference between the duties of the Minister of Finance and those of the Minister of National Revenue. The one imposes the taxes; the other collects them. The Minister of Finance hits the taxpayer on the head; the Minister of National Revenue drags him out. Some of our citizens have to be dragged out anyway. I am going to ask the minister if he would care to express himself on this matter. He is asking for a lot of money which will have to come out of the taxpayer's pocket. I am quite sure we are willing to vote it, but it seems to me that consideration should be given to this particular phase of the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Abbott: I shall be glad to bring my hon. friend's question to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue. The position is that the act specifies—I have not the act before me—that medical expenses are deductible for income tax purposes. What constitutes medical expenses is a question for the Minister of National Revenue or his officials to determine. If the taxpayer is not satisfied, he can go to the courts for relief. I think that is as far as I can go in answering my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Fraser: If the doctor included the charge for the ambulance in his bill, that could be deducted, could it not?

Mr. Abbott: I am not the Minister of National Revenue; nor do I want to give free legal advice.

Mr. Fraser: I understand that where a physician administers insulin or penicillin and includes the costs of the drugs in his bill, that expense can be deducted.

Mr. Abbott: For what it may be worth, my understanding is that if the cost of the medicines is included in the doctor's bill, they can be deducted, and if a hospital charged for the ambulance in its bill, it could be deducted. However, I do not think that that should be taken as a firm ruling. It is a matter for the administrative branch of the department to determine. If the taxpayer is dissatisfied, a remedy is provided in the act by way of appeal.

Mr. Fraser: The trouble with the act is that there are different taxing officers across the country. A man in one section will give one ruling, and a man in another will give an entirely different ruling.

While I am on my feet I should like to bring something to the attention of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, who unfortunately is not in the house. There are thousands of people across Canada who are either renting or buying houses from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. These people are greatly inconvenienced by the fact that the offices of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are closed all day Saturday, although they are open from nine to five o'clock on week days. Many of the men who are renting or buying houses are working from early morning until five or after five o'clock at night, and the only time they could go to the office would be at noon hour, at which time the officers of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are home eating their own lunches. I suggest that their offices be kept open on Saturday morning, or at least every other Saturday, so that the man of the house can go there to transact his business instead of his wife having to do it. I have had many letters about this from my own riding and other parts of Canada. It is something that should be seriously considered.

Mr. Shaw: There is a matter of extreme urgency which I think it is my duty to place before the government. I refer to the charges being made for medical services and hospitalization provided for the Indians in the Rocky Mountain House section of Alberta. I say this is a matter of urgency, because tomorrow is the deadline so far as the medical men and the hospital authorities of Rocky Mountain House are concerned. Since 1948 the medical and hospital authorities at Rocky Mountain House in Alberta have been at loggerheads with the Indian affairs branch in connection with medical and hospital services for Indians. In the past it has been the policy of the medical men of the town of Rocky Mountain House to charge the minimum amounts set by the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons in connection with the various cases coming to their attention. Often the medical men have treated and hospitalized these Indians while having to postpone treatment of many of their regular patients because of lack of time and lack of hospital space.

These doctors have been submitting their bills to the Indian affairs branch at the minimum rates, and in almost every case those bills have been arbitrarily cut down by twenty to fifty per cent before being paid. The doctors urge that one of two things be done: either that they be paid a flat rate of $100 a month for treating the Indians—which incidentally was the amount recommended by the Alberta representative of the department—or that they work on the basis of the minimum rates established by the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons.

Ten months have elapsed since they began negotiations with the department. So far nothing has been done to reach any sort of agreement. Now the doctors have served notice that as and from tomorrow they will refuse to attend the Indians at less than the regular rates charged all other patients. This has become a very serious matter. Health conditions among the Indians in that area have not been good. The net result of what will happen after tomorrow, unless the department takes much-needed action, will be that the Indians will not receive this most essential service. The result will be deterioration not only of their own health, but also of the health of the white persons among whom these Indians move.

I know the Minister of Mines and Resources is not here today, but I urge that some other member of the government bring this matter to his attention. There is great urgency. Something must be done by tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to say a few words to the Minister of Finance about an item in his own estimates, namely that relating to the wartime prices and trade board. The minister may say this is a matter we can discuss more fully when we reach that item, but that may not be for some weeks yet; and the March 31, 1950, deadline is also drawing near. It seems to me, therefore, that a few facts should be drawn to the attention of the minister at this time.

As he knows, the step he was forced to take a few days ago in devaluing the Canadian dollar could result in upward pressure being exerted on the cost of living in this country. In fact many people feel that this is happening already, that the pressure to increase the cost of living is greater than the pressure coming from the devaluation of the pound which might have served to bring down that cost.

This whole question of the high cost of living was highlighted a few days ago by a publication prepared by the welfare council of greater Toronto, entitled "A guide to family spending in Toronto, Canada, 1949." Hon. members probably saw in the Globe and Mail of Monday, September 26, a good summary of the findings contained in that report, but I would recommend that in addition they write the welfare council of greater Toronto and send fifty cents for a copy of the report, in which an excellent job has been done. The report makes it clear that, for ordinary decent living at today's prices, in the city of Toronto a family of five must have $50 a week.

I have some other figures as well. I am referring now to the Labour Gazette for July, 1949, in which I find on page 920 a table showing the hours and earnings by industries in Canada up to as late as April of this year. According to this table the average weekly wage in the manufacturing industries reporting to the dominion bureau of statistics was only $42.08 in April of this year. That table includes some industries in which the workers would earn more than this average, but it also includes figures such as these: $30.86 a week for those working in leather products; $29.41 a week for those engaged in making garments and personal furnishings. Then as I go away down I find that the average weekly wage in highway construction was $33.92, while the average for those working in hotels and restaurants was $26.99. In this long column some are higher than the average of $42.08, but, as I have indicated, there are a great many away below that figure.

I think we in this House of Commons, who are fairly well fed—and who were given some very good apples today—must face the fact that it is exceedingly difficult for a great many Canadians to make both ends meet. If we put these figures side by side, those of the welfare council of greater Toronto showing that at today's prices a family of five must have $50 a week, and those of the Labour Gazette showing that there are thousands of people earning only $30, $35 and $40 a week, we can see that this is a very real problem.

I bring this matter to the attention of the minister now, because we all know what government policy as to price control has been since the end of the war. We know where the legislation stands in regard to the wartime prices and trade board; unless something is brought in the whole set-up will vanish on March 31, 1950. For my part I should like to point out to the minister that he should start right now to do something to prevent the cost of living from going higher—indeed, to try to bring it down; but I know his view, and I know how long I would have to argue with him on that point. But I am going to appeal to him—and I hope he will consider this favourably—to have the administration of the wartime prices and trade board examined to see if he has a set-up there, with sufficient staff, which could do something about this job if even in his view —as it is in my view right now—it should become a problem demanding attention.

A moment ago I made reference to the devaluation of the dollar, and in that reference I admitted that it was a step the minister was forced to take. There are conditions in the world today that can have the effect of still further increasing the cost of living in this country; and bearing in mind what we have so often said from this corner of the house as to the excellent job in the field of price control done by the government during the war, it seems to me just as important to try to help the people of this country make both ends meet in time of peace. By the time we reach the appropriate item in the estimates, nothing may be left of the wartime prices and trade board. Certainly unless the government makes up its mind to do something about it before March 31, 1950, that organization will disappear. I urge upon the government, therefore, the importance of this whole question of keeping down the cost of living, and I point out that it is something for which the government is responsible to the Canadian people.

Mr. Noseworthy: I should like to take advantage of this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to direct the attention of the house, and particularly the Minister of Veterans Affairs, to a matter I referred to in a speech delivered on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is recorded in Hansard of September 21, page 141. In it there is a reference to what I consider to be one of these silly regulations affecting veterans who are attending our universities.

Last year, at the university of Toronto, eighty-three of these young veterans took second class honours in their final year. Of the eighty-three there were fifteen whose credits expired while they were writing the examinations after they had finished their academic year. Because of that regulation, those fifteen were deprived of the advantage of another year at the university on funds provided by the department. I suggest, as I did on a previous occasion, that the men who framed those regulations, as well as the minister, are just as anxious as I am to see that each of these veterans has an opportunity to complete his education.

As the minister knows, these boys left high school with their education half completed. Some of them left the university and gave to this country the best educational years of their lives. After years away from school they have returned to us to begin where they left off. It is unfair that, because of a regulation which must be applied mechanically, deserving young veterans who have shown that they have the ability and the desire to continue their education should be deprived of it. I suggest to the minister that that regulation be modified to this extent: that the student's academic year end not when he writes his last examination, but when he writes his first. I would urge upon the minister that he take this into consideration.

There is one other change I believe should be made. There should be a small committee —including the minister, if you like, and the senior officers who have charge of education in his department, and possibly someone from the university—charged with the responsibility of reviewing specific cases in which ability has been shown but the student is deprived of assistance because of this regulation. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that these regulations may be applied hard and fast in the mechanical field, but where human beings are concerned there should be some sort of committee or referee with discretionary powers.

I shall cite one example. A year ago a student graduated in the arts course in the university of Toronto with an aggregate of approximately 800 marks on his final examinations. He was only two marks short of second-class honours. Because he was two marks short in an aggregate of 800, that student was deprived of any assistance during his post-graduate year at the college of education. He finally left college over $1,000 in debt because he had failed to secure another two marks. I marked examination papers for the department of education of Ontario for nearly twenty years. During his career I am sure the minister has marked enough examination papers to know that when you try to ascertain the difference in ability between a student who has 64 marks and one who has 66 marks, it is rather difficult. The marks received are largely determined by the attitude of the examiner at the time he marks the papers.

In cases of this kind I feel that these boys should be entitled to an appeal to some small committee with discretionary power to deal with the matter. I know the argument that will be raised against making any change in the regulations at this time. It is that some of those students who graduated during the past two or three years may want to take advantage of any change. I doubt whether many of them will. Most of those boys have secured jobs and are not likely to want to go back to the university. But suppose they do; suppose, as a result of this change, fifteen or twenty-five young veterans decide to return to university for post-graduate work. I would say, Mr. Chairman, and I am sure the minister is in agreement with me, that is in the best interests of this country. I am quite sure such a change would not be opposed on that ground. I realize that the minister cannot reply now, but I would ask him to give the matter his serious consideration.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Abbott moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service of the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1950, the following sums be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, namely:

1. The sum of $114,516,603.83, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the items, except items 43, 419, and 452, as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950;

2. The sum of $2,613,651.00, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the items as set forth in the supplementary estimates (Newfoundland) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950;

3. The sum of $5,876,758.33, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the items as set forth in the further supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950; and

4. The sum of $468,750.00, being five-twelfths of item 907 of the further supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1950.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 11 for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1950.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Abbott moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Before the bill is read the second time, I desire to protect the position of all members of the house with respect to asking questions on the general estimates and of full discussion when the estimates, upon which this fraction is founded, are before the house again. It is the usual undertaking that is given by the government, that we pass this bill without prejudice to the rights we may have.

Mr. Abbott: I gave that undertaking at the outset of this discussion.

Mr. Graydon: Not on the second reading.

Mr. Fraser: We want to make sure.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Graydon: I know there are certain distinctions between this bill and previous ones that have been passed, having regard to the amounts. Perhaps some of the subject is well covered, but may I ask the minister if there is any difference between the general framework of this bill and the usual interim supply bills that have been passed previously.

Mr. Abbott: No. Except for the amounts, the bill is identical in terms with the other four appropriation bills that have been passed.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, September 29, 1949

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Thursday, the 29th September, at six o'clock p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, September 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maurice Boisvert for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): It is my pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate you upon your elevation to the chair. You were fully qualified for that high office because of your legal training, legal experience, and the fairness that you have shown in this house while you were the deputy speaker, and have shown since you have become the first commoner. I was particularly pleased to listen to you when you spoke in French. I note that you are a bilingual Speaker, a fact which is a great credit to you. I am sure that all members will appreciate your fairness and will feel that when you are in the chair they are safe in saying anything. within the rules.

It is also my great pleasure to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply. I have known the mover of the address for a long time. He is one of the brilliant members of the Quebec bar and has attained pre-eminence before the courts. He acquitted himself well. The seconder also spoke ably, and both of them deserve congratulations. As one of the senior members of this house, I am pleased to see all the good faces of the members who have been returned again and of those who have been elected here for the first time. The House of Commons is a gentlemen's club, and the new members should realize that the senior members will miss no opportunity to help them, whenever the occasion arises, so that they will fulfil their duties in the most pleasant atmosphere.

The last election was well run and it was very successful. If the Liberal party achieved such success, it is due in the first place to the personal campaign of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who crossed the country from Newfoundland to Victoria, addressing countless audiences, mixing with the people and shaking hands with countless friends. He did wonderfully well. I was not accustomed to that, but I remember that on one occasion, a year before his death, Mr. Lapointe had to conduct a campaign personally. It was in the winter and he had to go across the country to preach the Liberal gospel. He did that successfully, but as a rule the people of Canada did not have the advantage of meeting the Prime Minister and the leader of the Liberal party personally. They had that privilege this year. What is to be admired in the Prime Minister is that he spoke the same language from coast to coast. Not only that, but he spoke without fear or favour. He spoke as a good Canadian. His language before English-speaking audiences was exactly the same as what he used in the province of Quebec: one language, one policy. The same things were said before audiences who spoke various languages. He was accompanied by his gracious wife, who also took pleasure in visiting all the constituencies of this country. The success of the election was to a large extent their personal reward. They took lots of trouble in campaigning all over the country and they were rewarded with the confidence of the people, who voted for the government after having heard the Prime Minister and after having met him and his wife.

In the elections previous to the last the general tenor of the speeches delivered by the Liberal speakers was that the other parties were worse than the Liberal party. This time the language used by Liberal speakers on the platform was entirely different. They did not say that other parties were worse than the Liberal party. They said that the Liberal party was better than opposition parties, and that it was the only party that could restore order in this country and bring welfare and prosperity from coast to coast—a great difference. It was of great importance and a great satisfaction to the Liberals who were denouncing only occasionally the Tories and the policies of the socialists and the Social Credit party. We told them what was going to be done for Canada by the Liberal party, for the welfare of Canada, for the future of our children, and the people liked it. They liked it so much that a tremendous number of people, who formerly were inclined to vote Conservative, socialist or Social Credit, decided to vote for the Liberal government headed by the present Prime Minister. They had real satisfaction when they voted. They knew that they were voting for a party that would fulfil its promises to them. If one travels anywhere in this country and says that he is a Liberal member of parliament he will be sure to have a good reception. That is why, sir, nobody should worry about the result of the eight by-elections which will take place next month. It is evident that the hurricane which has blown from Newfoundland to British Columbia inclusive will still carry the seats in the by-elections.

I have read the speech from the throne very carefully. There are many things in it, and most of them good. For instance, it is said that appeals to the privy council will be abolished—a very good thing. There are many other matters that I will not enumerate for the moment, but there is one of importance to which I draw the kind attention of the government and of all my fellow members. It is the amendment of the constitution. How can the parliament of Canada amend an imperial statute? Is it possible for the British parliament to delegate its power and authority to any other legislature in the commonwealth to amend its own statutes? I do not see how it could be done. Can we imagine that this parliament may amend any statute of the imperial parliament? It could not be done unless we made the statute of the imperial parliament, the British North America Act, our own by adopting exactly the same statute. If we did that, we might be able to amend the British North America Act after it had become an act of the parliament of Canada. But that would be very dangerous, and it would not work, because, when moving the second reading of the British North America Act in the House of Lords in 1867, Lord Carnarvon said:

> To those resolutions—

He was referring to the Quebec resolutions.

> —all the British provinces in North America, were, as I have said, consenting parties and the measure founded upon them must be accepted as a treaty of union.

That was the language of Lord Carnarvon, who was then Secretary of State for the Colonies in the British government.

He spoke also of the appointment of a governor general. The present incumbent is one of the great men of the world, and so long as he occupies his office with dignity that is outstanding I do not see how we can make a suggestion for the appointment of anyone else. We should wait until his term of office is about to expire before we suggest the appointment of anyone else. However, that is not in the speech from the throne. All I have to say for the time being is that we are privileged to have as our governor general a man such as Lord Alexander, who is not only a distinguished soldier but also a great man.

I hold in my hand the text of the speech delivered at Westminster by Lord Carnarvon, where he went on to say:

> Whilst the provisions regulating the constitution of the central parliament are in the nature of permanent enactments, those which govern the local legislatures will be subject to amendment by those bodies.

This deals with the question of amending the constitution. The provinces have the right to amend their own constitutions, and Ottawa has not. That is quite strange. On the other hand, the legislation passed by the legislatures can be disallowed by this parliament, and the enactment of this parliament can be disallowed by the British government. That, too, is strange. How can we call Canada a sovereign nation so long as our laws are disallowed or may be disallowed by the British government? When His Majesty came here in 1939, and in the Senate chamber sanctioned some legislation, even those acts His Majesty had personally sanctioned were subject to disallowance by the British government within a period of two years.

So long as those provisions remain in the British North America Act can we call ourselves a free and sovereign nation? That cannot be. Let me read further from the words of Lord Carnarvon:

> My lords, I now pass to that which is perhaps the most delicate and the most important part of this measure—the distribution of powers between the central parliament and the local authorities. In this is, I think, comprised the main theory and constitution of federal government; on this depends the practical working of the new system. And here we navigate a sea of difficulties. There are rocks on the right hand and on the left. If, on the one hand, the central government be too strong, then there is risk that it may absorb some of that local action, and that wholesome self-government by the provincial bodies, which it is a matter both of good faith and political expediency to maintain; if on the other hand, the central government is not strong enough, then arises a conflict of state rights and pretensions, cohesion is destroyed, and the effective vigour of the central authority is encroached upon. The real object which we have in view is to give the central government those high functions and almost sovereign powers by which general principles and uniformity of legislation may be secured in those questions that are of common import to all the provinces; and, at the same time, to retain for each province so ample a measure of municipal liberty and self-government as will allow and indeed compel them to exercise those local powers which they can exercise with great advantage to the community.

Then he goes on to say:

> As I have said, it is proposed that the provinces shall surrender to the central parliament all powers of raising revenue, except by direct taxation. In return for this concession the central government will remit to the local legislatures certain fixed sums and proportionate capitation payments, in order to enable them more conveniently to defray the costs of local administration.

This happened at the time of confederation, and the amounts are mentioned in the British North America Act. Lord Carnarvon continues:

> A legislative union is, under existing circumstances, impracticable.

I would suggest that my fellow colleagues read this speech by the then secretary for the colonies. I am sure they would find it illuminating, because it expresses the lawmakers' intent with respect to our constitution.

To summarize, it would be most delicate and dangerous to amend the constitution at the present time, because it was precisely drafted in such a way that it could not be amended. This is the source of the difficulties encountered by those who have thought of amending the constitution and who have not yet found a way to do it. We shall not ignore the fact that the imperial parliament and the Canadian parliament are two different bodies; and at the present time, owing to the fact that the constitution of Canada is an act of the imperial parliament, we have to go to them for any amendment requested by this country.

I should be greatly surprised if the British parliament surrendered to Canada the right to amend imperial legislation. It could be done in only one way, namely if the amendment were first granted by the British parliament. One or two amendments could be made at a time, the amendment having been passed first by the British parliament and then our having been given permission to repeat a similar procedure. We would on the second occasion do that which would have been done in the first place by the British parliament. If the British parliament did not first make the amendment, then I do not see how we could make it.

Therefore this presents a most difficult problem. It is not difficult from the legislative point of view but, as Lord Carnarvon has said, this constitution is a sort of treaty of union. This means that the consent of all interested parties should be called for; and I do not see how under such conditions anyone would surrender any right and give a blank cheque.

I urge the government to be careful in amending the constitution. Many people have referred to this as being an indication of progress, and it may be or not. I shall never say that the constitution does not need to be amended as there is much deadwood in the British North America Act after 82 years, but the manner of dealing with the respective jurisdictions should be thought over for a long time in order that the best possible results may be obtained. That is why it is not without a certain amount of concern that I have noticed that a change may be made in the respective and exclusive jurisdictions now provided by the British North America Act.

I do not say that it cannot be done, but it should be done with the utmost care in order to respect the rights of all those who were parties to the first "treaty of union", which is Lord Carnarvon's expression. I am not an imperialist, far from it, nor am I an isolationist; I am a Canadian. I think that all those who have been born in this country and all those who have made Canada their true country of adoption should think of the future and should put sentiment aside in order to find the best way to govern this country.

There is some colonialism still prevailing in some parts of this country. What is colonialism? An hon. member across the floor asked that question yesterday. Colonialism is simply an inferiority complex with regard to the seat of the empire, something that exists in the minds of some who do not live in the United Kingdom. An Englishman who lives or is domiciled in the United Kingdom has the right to be an imperialist; it is natural that he would want his country to be extended as far as possible; but for one who claims he is a Canadian, for one who is domiciled in Canada, to be an imperialist is sheer nonsense.

There are some hon. members who are still imbued with the spirit of colonialism; they still live in the darkness of ignorance, in the shade of the tree of death like the barbarians of olden times. I have quoted a great English statesman to that effect. How can anyone in Canada claim that he is an imperialist and a good Canadian at the same time? That is impossible. It is like trying to square the circle, which is an absurdity. I do not say that because I have no English friends; I simply regret that some who should be proud of their country have a feeling of colonialism in the year 1949.

Because a vast majority of Canadian people did not have that feeling of colonialism, for the first time in many years a leader of a great party was applauded throughout the land because he extolled the virtues and merits of pure Canadianism. The reason I am so happy to give my full support to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is that while he is the head of the government he is no despot. He takes hon. members into his confidence. He consults the members of parliament on every important issue and stands by them. It is only natural that hon. members stand by him and by the members of his cabinet.

My great grandfather voted for the resolution before the Act of Union. My grandfather voted for Blake and Alexander Mackenzie. My father was elected with Laurier in 1896. I am proud to support the Liberal government that we now have in this House of Commons.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, my first words shall be of personal congratulation to the gentleman who has been named Speaker of this house. There seems to be a spirit of unanimity in at least that one thing.

I think almost everyone is agreed that the government should be congratulated upon its choice. Congratulations seem to be in order this session, congratulations to the new government, to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), to the mover (Mr. Boisvert) and the seconder (Mr. Laing) of the address, to the new appointees, to new members of the house generally, and perhaps in particular to the new members from that new province, the name of which has been so consistently and variously mispronounced.

I wonder if the hon. members from that new province of Newfoundland are all orators? I was greatly delighted with their first speeches, particularly with the speech of a gentleman who has become my friend, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins). I envy him the purity of his language, the clarity of his enunciation, and his deep knowledge of the subject about which he spoke. May I at the outset join with other hon. members in their congratulations to all these gentlemen.

Perhaps I should reserve special congratulations for two of the new and younger members on the government side. May I say at once that I am sorry they were elected, because they replace two colleagues of my own party, two friends of mine who were formerly in this house. But since in a democracy the electors must be the final arbiters, and since these gentlemen have been elected, I wish them every success. I refer to the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson), whom I see not in his own but in someone else's seat, and the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Harrison), young men who for a short time were my pupils. Since the indoctrination of political views is not one of the functions of a teacher, I accept no responsibility for the error of their ways in matters political. Nevertheless, to me their success must be a matter of some personal gratification, for indeed already they may be said to have achieved success since they have been deemed worthy by their fellow men to represent them in this honourable house.

There seems to be an air of peace and quietness about the house this session to which we were not accustomed last session. I think that may be a change for the good. After the battle comes peace, at least temporarily. I believe I have observed a change in the attitude of certain of my hon. friends which may augur well for the speedy conduct of government business this session. The victory of the Liberal party at the polls was clear and decisive. No one has tried to deny that. It is to be hoped that the very greatness of that victory may not work against good government, that it may not result in an apathy bred of the consciousness of power. The power of this government is indeed great; and just as noblesse oblige, so has greatness its obligations. No longer can this government plead a narrow majority as an excuse for inaction in connection with the things the country needs. I hope we shall not have an example of one-party government in this country. This house has an overwhelming majority of Liberal members, though I should point out that they represent only 49·54 per cent of the voters of this country, according to the information contained in a handy little book published by the Canadian Press containing the results of the recent election. According to that same source, there must be in the province of Quebec 600,000 voters—and that figure is conservative—who voted against the policies of the government, but they are represented in this house by only five members, two Progressive Conservatives and three Independents. To me that is an unfortunate situation; the representation of those people certainly is not adequate.

So much for the House of Commons. When we turn to the Senate we find that it has 102 members, of whom all but 15 were appointed by a Liberal government. While I do not grant that other place sufficient importance to become a danger, nevertheless its membership, considered from the point of view of political representation, is extremely disproportionate to the population of the country. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) the other day went so far as to suggest that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) might very well appoint to that body a gentleman who belongs to an opposition political party, mentioning him by name. I shall not go that far, but I would go so far as to suggest to the Prime Minister that he might be sufficiently magnanimous to appoint, irrespective of their political views, men and women who deserve well of their country and who have served in spheres of life other than political, perhaps people prominent in business, agriculture, labour, professional life, literature or art. If the representation of the parties in the upper house were anywhere near equal, that might be too much to ask; but with the present enormous Liberal majority I think it is a reasonable request.

I have spoken of the House of Commons and of the other place. There remains the judiciary. In our province it is common talk that to become a judge one must first of all be a lawyer, next a Liberal, and third either a defeated candidate who ran in the interests of the Liberal party or at least a member and preferably the chairman of a Liberal party executive. An examination of appointments in that province, both recent and otherwise, might throw some light on that point, though I have not the information before me at the moment. Then there are the civil servants throughout the country. I do not know how they are appointed, but if the recommendations of members of parliament are taken into account I would suggest that probably those appointments are heavily loaded, with the balance on the Liberal side.

This whole situation, as I see it, constitutes a danger not only to this country but to the government which is in charge of our affairs. They have indeed great power. Let them see to it that their power is not abused. As a member of this party, smaller indeed since the recent election, for reasons I shall not broach here, may I say that we shall continue to act as the conscience of this government. We shall continue to create in the public mind a demand for those reforms and changes needed by the people of this country, and shall continue to press upon the government the need to put those reforms and changes into effect.

Legislation to effect one of those changes is now before the house, and here I touch upon the matter which was the subject of the speech by my hon. and genial friend from Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). At last we have reached the point where we are ready to show our maturity as a nation and take that final step, which we have not taken sooner for no other reason than timidity, perhaps natural in a nation making its independent debut in international affairs; one might say as a fledgling long nurtured and protected under its mother's wing. The abolition of appeals to the privy council is but a symbol of something which has long been an actual fact: that we are a great and independent nation. We can shake off that dependency perhaps more easily than we can shake off the inferiority complex of which the hon. member has spoken, a complex which has been engendered by that dependency, which carries over from the field of external affairs into other spheres. While we have a culture which is unique and worthy of perpetuation and preservation, we have been content to imitate. Particularly in the spheres of art and literature, I think, we have scoured foreign fields while neglecting the beauty and inspiration of our own. Consciousness of a new nationhood, it is to be hoped, will awaken us to a sufficient pride in the unique and piquant flavour of our own culture to ensure that we do not allow it to be watered down to a tasteless and insipid uniformity. To this end, we need certain conditions. I would say that the first condition we need is the assurance of a long period of peace. Living temporarily upon the crater of an extinct volcano is not conducive to the production of creative art. It is when the mind is free from fear and the body is free from want that men's minds turn to those things which lift mere existence into the realm of worth-while living.

Peace is the greatest need of the world today. We have been apt to assess our progress in terms of ability to produce gadgets, but our application of our inventive genius in the field of science may destroy us all, nay, will destroy us unless we can accompany it with the development of a moral sense. The material assets of which we are so proud could be wiped out overnight by any maniac with an atomic bomb. Even more potent instruments of mass death and destruction are now in existence.

We need peace and we need enlightenment. We need education. When I speak of education I am not thinking of some quick training, some technical course or some vocational training to enable one to earn a living, some intensive course in physics or ballistics which enables a young man to operate a machine gun or an aeroplane. I am thinking of education as a thing of the mind and spirit, a development of the personality, an appreciation of the finer things in life, the development of sound judgment and the ability to analyse things. Were we, as a nation, in possession of these qualities then there might be some justification for our cheek in boasting about our way of life and suggesting that other countries might well adopt it.

This government at Ottawa has some responsibility in this matter. I was pleased when the Prime Minister recognized that fact in the session earlier this year, and announced the appointment of a royal commission on cultural matters. I am glad such a commission is now operating. For some years I tried to persuade the Prime Minister, in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs, to set up in Canada a commission of the United Nations educational, scientific and cultural organization. He categorically refused to accede to my request. However, what's in a name? The important thing is that something is now being done. We hope that whatever advice is given to the government by that commission, it will be followed by the appropriate action. I remember that during the debate in the last session the Prime Minister promised, and it is recorded in Hansard, that this would not be just a hope commission, but a commission of action.

During the recent election campaign, the Prime Minister was reported as stating that Canadian universities should be supported in their work, or at least that it would be a pity if their work were to fall off owing to lack of support. I believe the dominion government must accept some responsibility for the rather backward state of education in some sections of our country because it has persistently refused to aid the provinces in this connection. The universities are short of funds. Great numbers of the veteran students are now graduating into the life of our nation, having been rehabilitated through education provided by D.V.A. At this moment I should like to congratulate the government on the success of that scheme. As I said, some universities are financially embarrassed, and some schools are indeed the poor relations of others.

Taxation for educational purposes must be put upon a broader base than a levy on real property. In that direction lies inequality of opportunity. At a later date, I hope to discuss this whole question; but at this time I point out that the idea that federal aid should be extended to education is becoming more and more generally accepted. It has been discovered by those who during the war accepted federal aid for technical and vocational education, and those who participated in dominion-provincial schemes of assistance to certain worthy students, that federal aid by no means involves federal interference. Many who witnessed the great educational venture of the dominion government in the rehabilitation of war veterans through education have reconsidered this question. My own view is that the fear of federal interference in the administration of education was largely due to a feeling of inferiority which had developed, and not only in the direction mentioned by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot).

I believe the aid I advocate is one positive approach to the problem of preserving the unique qualities of our culture and the promotion of enlightenment which I have mentioned as a desirable thing; nay, which I think is fundamental. During the war, we subsidized this and put a floor under that, but we allowed education to become one of the first casualties.

In attempting to weed out of our national life those things which are detrimental to our ideals of culture there is, of course, the negative approach. In this, too, we have a responsibility. I do not wish to say anything against the culture of our friends to the south, but I would point out that we have in our own land something unique, something which is typically Canadian. It is my belief we should not make a practice of copying others but we should develop something of our own.

During the course of the summer, I stopped at a tourist camp in Canada and noticed the place was decorated with United States flags. I went to the lady who was in charge and asked the reason for the display of these flags. She said, "Well, sir, we want to make our American friends feel at home." I believe hon. members in this house will recognize the fallacy of that argument. What our United States friends wanted to feel was that they were in Canada, not at home. It was largely for that reason they came to visit us.

Our young people spend approximately five hours a day in educational institutions and the remainder of their waking hours in what we might call their ordinary environment, the home, the street, or the playing field. Surely, this parliament has an interest and responsibility in the quality of that environment. I note the increase in juvenile delinquency, the increase in the number of divorce cases, and I ponder over the fact that our penitentiaries are filled with young men.

Let us look at some of the negative agencies in this environment. High on the list comes the cheap vulgarity of many commercial radio programs, some moving pictures, the "slick" magazines, the so-called "comic" books, the red and yellow novels which flood the counters of our news stands.

That compels me to face the question of censorship. I am not sure that I favour the censorship of reading material, although it is a matter to which I have given some study. Such censorship as is exercised through the Department of National Revenue is, in my opinion, inefficient and ineffective. I admit that censorship is a tremendously difficult task; because of that fact competent people should be in charge of it. In an investigation which I made during the last session into the censorship of books, I made several startling discoveries. For example, I found that the men who had the final decision on the censorship of books were not fitted either by background, education, experience or training for the task they had to perform. Books denied entry at one customs port were being admitted at others. Entry was being denied books which in my opinion should have been admitted. Books were being allowed in which should have been kept out. I am referring, of course, to books written and published outside of this country. The censorship of foreign-language books is quite inefficient. I have a good deal of material on my files on that point but I shall not weary the house with it because it is not the main subject of my discussion today. I shall content myself by saying that the censorship of foreign-language books and domestic books was particularly inadequate. No great distinction seemed to be made between books which evidenced a necessary realism in the treatment of the subjects with which they dealt, and those which were purely and deliberately pornographic and were made filthy for the sole purpose that they might become best sellers, with the resulting profit.

In this connection also there is the difficulty of protecting the young without restricting the liberties of the adult, the liberties of those whose character, such as it is, has already been formed. There is the difficulty of restricting the activities of some business people who will sell anything to anyone as long as there is money to be made, and unless there are definite protective laws against it.

The negative approach is admittedly difficult. The positive one is feasible, if inadequate. Tastes are formed through use. We must substitute the useful for the harmful, the good for the evil. In the matter of reading for young people, that procedure at the moment is difficult through lack of material. One does not travel far in other countries until one realizes that on this continent, and particularly in this country perhaps, there is a great dearth of suitable reading for boys and girls. We have for so long accepted the suggestion that the comic book is all that is necessary that we just say: Oh, he has the comics, hasn't he? For years we have accepted the suggestion that the comic book solves the problem. I would express the hope that perhaps with this new consciousness of nationhood, or this awakening of nationhood, we shall not so neglect our youth in the future.

I have, sir, made a plea for the preservation and encouragement of our Canadian culture as such. I have suggested that the government has some responsibility in that matter, and have put forward some suggestions as to how they might marshal that assistance. Finally, let me urge that we cast out this inferiority, that we cast out fear. Let us have confidence in ourselves and in our abilities. Let us beware of taking the shadow for the substance. Let us refuse the easy way, the temptation to adopt a juke-box civilization, all noise and glitter. Let us be originators, not imitators. In short, sir, let us be Canadians, strong in the faith that we too have something distinctive, something precious and unique, to contribute to the community of men.

We have a great country. We are the trustees of a great heritage. Let us keep alive the flame of Canadian culture. It may be dim at the moment but it may be brighter tomorrow. I am reminded of some words of John Buchan, a former governor general who, may I suggest in all humility, if he were to hear me today, would largely agree with what I have said. His words were these:

[Mr. Knight.]

> The spark, once transmitted, may smoulder for generations under ashes, but the appointed time will come, and it will flare up to warm the world.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): I should like first to congratulate you, sir, on your appointment as Deputy Speaker and through you to offer my congratulations to the Speaker on his election as first commoner. I am sure, as I know are all other members of this chamber, that you will both discharge your high and important functions with dignity and justice.

I should like to compliment the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and all of the other new members of this house who have so far taken part in this debate. Their speeches have been excellent and indicate that they all have something of importance to contribute to this house.

Today there are several matters on which I should like to make brief comment, the first of which is the revision of the Indian Act. This act has not had any main revision for something over fifty years. As a result, it is greatly out of date, a fact which makes it difficult for the officials of the Indian affairs branch to administer that department in the best way possible for the Indians of this country and in a way which is in conformity with the general advance in ideas that has taken place over that period of time. This fact was recognized, and in 1946 the following resolution was passed in this house:

> That a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to examine and consider the Indian Act, chapter 98, R.S.C., 1927, and amendments thereto and to suggest such amendments as they deem advisable, with authority to investigate and report upon Indian administration in general and, in particular, the following matters:

And the matters are listed. As a result of that resolution a committee was set up. This committee held long sessions throughout 1946, 1947 and 1948. It received evidence from several hundred witnesses. A great deal of work on the part of departmental officials was devoted to the committee and to the securing of information for it. As a result of the sittings of that committee a series of recommendations were made to this house. They were adopted, and as a result I think a considerable improvement took place in the administration of the Indian affairs branch. For one thing, a large number of day schools have been and are being built at the present time, to improve the educational facilities for our Indians.

Hospital and medical care have also improved considerably. However, the main purpose for which the committee was set up, namely, to amend the Indian Act, has not been carried to fruition. In spite of the urgings of myself and a considerable number of hon. members at the last session of the last parliament, the government did not see fit to introduce the suggested amendments to the act which had been made in previous years. Only a day or two ago the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) asked the government whether they intended to introduce at this session legislation to amend the Indian Act. The answer of the minister, as reported at page 232 of Hansard, was as follows:

A draft bill to amend the Indian Act is in the hands of the Department of Justice, but I am not able to say when it will be available for consideration by the house.

That was the situation in 1948. After the committee had spent this long period in debating the suggested amendments to the act the thing was put into the hands of the Department of Justice, and apparently it has remained there ever since. Surely the officials of the Department of Justice have had time to look into the matter and have it ready for presentation to the house. I strongly urge upon the government that a revised Indian Act be introduced into the house just as rapidly as possible. If the government is still not satisfied with the draft bill that was prepared by the committee and revised by the Justice department, then I would ask that the joint committee be reconstituted just as quickly as that can be done, so that the work can be gone on with. The Indians of the country, and a large number of other people who are interested in their welfare, hoped for great things from the setting up of the committee on Indian affairs and the revision of the act. The government has a moral duty to have this matter brought to completion just as soon as it can possibly do so.

I should now like to say something about a matter which was brought up by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), this afternoon, and earlier this week by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), namely, the difficult situation in which imperial veterans now find themselves as the result of the devaluation of the British pound. I hold in my hand a resolution which was forwarded to me by the Calgary branch of the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans Association, urging this action upon the government. The exact way in which this could be done I do not wish to suggest. One thing which would help considerably, as far as some of these men are concerned, is the extension of the war veterans allowance to them. Apart from that, some arrangement might be come to between this government and the British government in the matter of bringing these men's pensions back to the level at which they were before the pound was devalued or when the pound was at the normal rate of exchange; or, as suggested in this resolution, this government might supplement the British pensions in order to bring them back up to what the normal rate would make them.

Another matter along that line which I should like to mention is the plight of the superannuated civil servants. I have had several pitiable letters from ex-dominion civil servants who have been superannuated on extremely small pensions. I should like to bring them to the attention of the government and request that something be done particularly for those men who have pensions smaller than the old age pension paid. Quite a number of these people, although they worked for many long years for the Dominion of Canada, have pensions considerably smaller than that to which they would be entitled if they were able to draw old age pensions. In most cases these men are in the age bracket of from 65 to 70. Since there has been a great deal of talk and, as I remember, quite a few promises by the government that the old age pension age would be brought down to 65, they could very well start to redeem these promises by giving to these superannuated civil servants allowances at least sufficiently large to bring them up to the scale of the old age pension.

So far in this debate we have heard considerable talk about irrigation. There is one phase of that matter that I should like to say something about. In western Canada we are beginning to use the sprinkler system of irrigation, in which a pump and a system of pipes, and so on, are used to put water on the land rather than levelling it off and putting it on by means of ditches. It possesses many advantages over the levelling and ditching system. It means that a great deal of land, which could not have been irrigated otherwise, can be brought under irrigation. One of the difficulties in connection with it is that the machinery needed—the pump, the pipes, and so forth—is subject to duty and tax. I know of two farmers in the area east of Calgary who, being desperate because of the drought conditions there in the past summer, imported this machinery from the United States and they had to pay a tax of over $1,100. Their contention, which I think is perfectly justifiable, is that this type of equipment should be classed as farm machinery, and as such not subject to tariff and taxes. I would ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), who fortunately, I see, is sitting across from me, to bear this fact in mind when he is making up his budget resolutions. I may say that I took this matter up with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) and asked him whether it would be possible for his department to make a ruling that this type of machinery was indeed farm machinery, as it is, and thus not subject to duty and tax. His reply, however, was:

To permit of the duty free entry of such apparatus, a tariff change would be necessary. Amendments to the tariff do not come under my department, being rather the responsibility of the Department of Finance.

It seems to me this is a matter in which the Department of Finance could move immediately, and in doing so could bring aid in irrigation to considerable areas in western Canada where water is available and can be used by means of this sprinkler system.

I should now like to say something on the subject of defence. During past years we in the official opposition have made repeated efforts to secure information in regard to the state of the defences of this country. In many instances these efforts were far from successful. The information was denied to us. However, a general picture was always built up by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), both here and throughout the country at large, that our defence situation was excellent; that we had a small but mobile highly trained hard-hitting defence force, which was capable of dealing with any eventualities it was possible to foresee arising. It was well adapted to deal especially with the only thing that we could reasonably expect in this country, at the start of a war at any rate, namely, diversionary raids particularly on our northern airfields.

Well, during the past summer an exercise was held in the Peace river valley to test, apparently—at least that was what was given out in the newspapers—the ability of our defence forces to meet a diversionary raid of this nature. It was known as Exercise Eagle. The result has been rather unfortunate. The chief feature which strikes me in this connection is that the exercise showed a tragic lack of proper equipment on the part of our defence forces. This is the sort of thing which appeared in the newspapers all across this country—and I shall proceed to read a few extracts to show what these correspondents, most of whom were men who had seen service overseas, thought of the equipment of our defence forces.

The first of these is from the Vancouver Daily Province of August 8. This is an account by Ross Munro, stating—

The exercise clearly revealed some startling weaknesses in our defence picture.

The most alarming feature is the almost-complete inadequacy of the R.C.A.F. operational aircraft to meet attack. The combat planes are too old and too few.

Further on in the same article he speaks about the good performance put on by the P.P.C.L.I., an infantry regiment stationed at Calgary, which has now been trained as a parachutist regiment. Referring to that unit he says:

But even the P.P.C.L.I. need more equipment; for example, they had to borrow most of their parachutes from the joint air school at Rivers, Manitoba, for this scheme. They also borrowed 150 jump tunics.

And further on, referring to the aircraft used in the exercise, he states:

In regard to the types of planes, the most astonishing thing was that there wasn't a single jet fighter in the whole exercise.

They weren't put on "Eagle" because they had been worked hard during the two-week summer camp of the western reserve squadrons and maintenance problems were too tough for operating up here.

The most modern plane was the Mustang fighter and the R.C.A.F. even had to call on Rockcliffe and Trenton stations in Ontario to make up a nine-plane squadron.

But the bulk of the "fighters" were the old Harvard trainers. Then there were obsolete Mitchell bombers—six of them.

The majority of the pilots were civilian reserve officers and they showed they could do a job. But again they had so little to work with.

The air force staffs also executed their tasks of planning and directing extremely well.

The "tools" of war were lacking. The R.C.A.F. and exercise "Eagle" foundered on that point in its application to air force performance in an emergency at this time.

And here is an article by Paul St. Pierre which appeared in the Vancouver Sun of August 8:

Russia could play havoc in our northland today if she successfully launched an airborne attack of sacrifice troops. If any Canadian officer disagrees with this he is not among the dozen with whom I spoke.

And later in the same article he says:

But it was a distressing sight to see a young, enthusiastic paratrooper trotting about the battle scene with an alder stick with a tin can nailed on top. "That's a trench mortar," an officer explained.

There were many other newspaper accounts along the same line. In one of them, I remember, there was a complaint that the heavy machine guns used by the P.P.C.L.I. in this exercise—or at least some of them—were not equipped with sights. They did not have the sights for them.

What all this leads us to is the fact that during the past three years we have voted large sums of money for the defence forces. We in the official opposition have tried to find out the purposes for which the money was being used, if it was being properly spent, and if we were getting the efficient and effective fighting force to which the expenditures entitle us. We were denied that information and told that everything was fine. When an exercise of this sort takes place we find everything is not fine.

The accounts sent out by the correspondents who were there indicate that the men were all right. The P.P.C.L.I. put up a magnificent performance. Fighter pilots and other air crew did excellent work. The staff work was all right. The thing that was wrong and which caused the exercise to fail was the fact that proper equipment was not there. We did not have it in this country.

We have maintained right along that a defence committee of the House of Commons should be set up to which full information could be given respecting the state of our defence forces. The situation brought to light by Exercise Eagle reinforces that contention, and points up strongly the fact that the house needs a committee of that kind which could get more information about defence.

It is our duty to see that the moneys voted for defence purposes are properly spent. From what we can make out, they may have been properly spent, and they may not. At any rate we have not got what we paid for. We have not an effective fighting force. In theory we are supposed to have an airborne brigade which could stop any diversionary raid on this country. We are supposed to have an air force which would transport them to the place where they would be needed. This exercise demonstrated that we have not those things. We have not the equipment which would make it possible for our men to do the job.

In my view the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) should, in fact must, make a full explanation to the house as to exactly what did happen, what the situation was in this exercise, and just what the situation is at the present time, so far as defence preparations are concerned. In particular we should be told the situation from the standpoint of equipment, one feature in connection with which we appear to be especially weak.

There is one other phase of defence matters upon which I should like to touch briefly, namely passive defence measures against atomic warfare. I discussed this matter last February in the debate in reply to the speech from the throne, and at that time requested the minister to make a statement as to what passive defence measures this country had taken. I have not yet received an answer to that question.

I know that over a year ago the government appointed General Worthington, a most capable officer, to survey this situation. Whether his survey has been completed or not, or what he has recommended, has never been made public so far as I am aware. As for this country's being protected in the event of another war, I think perhaps it is more necessary to take proper measures of passive defence than to do anything else, including the building up of our actual defence forces.

The news which came last week, that the Russians now apparently have atomic bombs, makes this more urgent. It brings the matter into sharp focus and makes it imperative that steps be taken to protect the civilian population in the event of war breaking out. That is not so very unlikely, although we hope, trust and pray that it will not take place. In my opinion there is no question that long before this we should have been taking a considerable number of measures to protect the general public in the event of the dropping of atomic bombs. These would be measures planning for the evacuation of people from our larger centres of population.

I suggested last February that in considering its housing plans and various schemes to aid the construction of houses the government should make it possible for those who wanted to build houses in the smaller centres to obtain the same assistance given to those who were building in the more densely populated areas. It would seem that a reverse policy has been adopted. From what I can make out it is much easier to obtain help under the National Housing Act for the building of houses in the larger centres of population than it is for the building of houses in the smaller centres.

At that time I pointed out, and I still am strongly of the same opinion, that efforts should be made through the industrial development bank to bring about a dispersion of industry which would carry with it a dispersion of population because people will go where they can get work.

I shall come back to both aspects of this matter of defence to which I have referred when the estimates are before us, but in the meantime I ask the minister to be prepared, either during this debate or when his estimates are before us, to make a full statement and answer the questions which have been posed here.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

An act to amend the Criminal Code.
An act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1950.

At 6.15 p.m. the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

Mr. H. H. W. Beyerstein (Camrose): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the people of my constituency would want me to pay a tribute to my predecessor, Mr. James A. Marshall, who has so ably represented Camrose in this house over the past fourteen years. By keeping close contact with the people of the constituency he has won the esteem of all. It was with deep regret that they received his decision to resign.

I should also like to say a few words with regard to the wonderful agricultural constituency which I now have the honour to represent. In Camrose we have one of the finest mixed farming districts in Canada. We are proud to say that we have a greater number of registered seed growers than are to be found in any other part of Alberta. We cannot claim the honour of having the world's wheat king. He happens to live in the nearby constituency of Red Deer. We can, however, claim the honour of having the world's rye king. In addition, we have several other farmers who have won recognition in the field of agriculture. In the matter of purebred livestock, our herds are comparable to the best in Canada. In this field also it is not uncommon for one of our farmers to produce a champion.

In addition to a well-balanced mixed farming district we have several coal mines in the constituency. From those mines we export a considerable amount of coal each year. The oil industry in the Camrose constituency is as yet in its infancy. So far we have only one well; it is located at Stettler. We hope, however, that this is only the forerunner of a more prosperous field.

Generally speaking, the Camrose constituency is well blessed, but we have a few problems which I would bring to the attention of the government at this time. Those problems are not peculiar to this constituency alone. They would affect most other parts of Canada. In order to make a good agricultural district better we would suggest that the government should provide:

[Mr. Speaker.]

1. Low cost credit facilities through agencies especially acquainted with agricultural and marketing conditions.

2. Fair prices sufficient to cover the average production costs and to give primary producers a fair net return for their services based on parity.

3. The Canadian wheat board should be revised so that the board becomes an agency operating primarily for the benefit of the producer.

4. Stability of our basic industry through long-term international wheat agreements.

5. Permanent agricultural prices support legislation.

6. Producer representation on all boards and agencies having control over farm products.

If the government would consider these measures, it would tend to make farming, not only in our constituency but in the rest of Canada, much better for all concerned.

At this time I would also mention the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Farmers who have for many years been paying into this fund at the rate of one per cent on all grain sold suddenly find that in time of need they are unable to derive any benefit under the act simply because their farms happen to be on the wrong side of the township line. Surely there must be a more equitable manner in which this act could be administered. I understand that it is coming up for revision this session, and I would urge the government to consider this matter.

In our constituency, as in other parts of Canada, there are a number of senior citizens who are commonly known as old age pensioners. They were pleased to receive a $10 increase in their pension just before the last federal election. They would be more pleased, however, if the government could see fit also to raise the ceiling of their earning power. Many of our old age pensioners are bedridden. They are not considered to be bad enough to be hospitalized, but at the same time they are unable to care for themselves. In these cases the pension paid is not sufficient to take care of their needs. I think that is a matter which should be considered. Another nice gesture would be for the government to issue to each old age pensioner a radio licence which would be valid for the rest of his life.

I should also like to say a few words with regard to freight rates. Many rumours have been circulating with regard to a proposed increase in freight rates. At this moment I should like to say that the people of my constituency would be absolutely opposed to any change in the freight structure, especially the Crowsnest pass agreement, unless the change were in a downward direction.

Those are some of the problems which confront the people of my constituency. It might be argued that these proposals would take a considerable amount of financing. In reply, I would refer to Hansard of Tuesday, March 22, 1949. On page 5 of the appendix to the budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will be found a chart. This chart shows the gross national income and the gross national product for a period of eleven years, beginning with 1938 and going up to 1948. The interesting thing about this chart is that in every year, as will be noticed, the column which represents the gross national production is always greater than the column representing the gross national income.

In other words, the flow of prices is always greater than the flow of purchasing power. That is to say, at any given time we are never able to buy back the goods of our producers. Carrying this argument a little bit further, I refer to the Canada Year Book. At page 1089 of the 1948-49 edition it will be found that the net national income in 1947 was $10,981 million and that the net national production in 1947 was $13,375 million. In other words, in that year there was a shortage of $2,394 million; we were that much short of being able to buy back our production.

We could trade some of that surplus with other nations to our mutual advantage, and if we did so we would still have the same amount left on our shelves. Therefore, taking 1947 as an example, we would have $2,394 million worth of goods lying on the shelves. These goods represent real wealth. I suggest that the government should create a commission, which would be responsible to the people through parliament, to take these goods on the shelves and use them as a backing for the creation of new credit, and in this way we would be able to finance the proposals I have outlined today.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Normally, sir, I would hesitate before participating in the debate, especially when all indications are that we are rapidly approaching a vote. While certainly not desirous of prolonging discussion and thus deferring that vote, I do find it necessary to deal with some matters which have recently been injected into this debate. My participation at this time therefore might be regarded as a product of circumstances rather than a product of deliberate design.

Before proceeding to refer to some of these matters which I consider it necessary to deal with, I desire to extend to Mr. Speaker my very sincere congratulations upon his elevation to the high office which he now occupies. It is not done, sir, through any feeling that it is the right thing to do. It is done because of my sincere belief that I would not be fair to myself were I not to express to Mr. Speaker the warm feeling which I hold toward him and the hope which is within me that he shall enjoy all success in that high and responsible office. I can assure him that he will at all times have our wholehearted co-operation.

May I also, sir, join with previous participants in this debate to congratulate the mover (Mr. Boisvert) and the seconder (Mr. Laing) on the excellence of the addresses which they delivered in this house. In passing I might say that one need not necessarily agree with all that they said in order to be quite sincere in offering congratulations to the hon. members.

It is rather a pleasant experience for one to come into a new parliament and meet the many new members who have joined us as a consequence of the election. We wish them well in the arduous duties which we know that they will have to bear. We might at times have to differ with them on the floor of this house, but nevertheless we possess warm personal feelings toward them.

In the course of this debate last night reference was made by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) to a number of matters with which I shall have to deal upon this occasion. In some instances the story was left quite incomplete. In my estimation, an incomplete story can oftentimes be much worse than a story which is wholly false. I find it a duty, therefore, to complete and correct certain of these assertions. I should like to refer to Hansard of yesterday. At page 320 I find this:

> The Liberal popular vote in that province—

Referring to the province of Alberta.

> —was approximately 117,000 as compared with 131,000 for the Social Credit candidates. How is it that the Liberals have only five members from Alberta, whereas the Social Credit party have twice as many?

In passing I would say that that is not a section with which I wish to deal particularly, but I would say to the hon. member for Vegreville that obviously it is a problem of distribution, a problem which the federal government, both in this instance and more particularly as far as the economic angle is concerned, have found it impossible to solve. It is not surprising, therefore, that this should continue to constitute a serious problem as far as they are concerned. Let me continue with the next section of the statement. The hon. member illustrated what he meant by referring to the Peace River constituency, the constituency which my leader has represented well ever since 1945. He said:

> The illustration I want to bring out now is an example of what happened in many constituencies. For instance in the Peace River constituency the hon. member from that area received in 1945 a majority of over 3,200 votes.

Mr. Low: How many votes?

Mr. Decore: I do not know how many votes, but the majority is over 3,200 votes.

Mr. Low: Give the number of votes.

The hon. member did not have the information available. Since a wholly wrong impression was created there, I should like to refer to the results in Peace River. In 1945 the Social Credit candidate received 7,319 votes. In 1949 he increased that number of votes by 408, which puts quite a different complexion upon the hon. gentleman's statement. I emphasize it: the hon. member for Peace River increased his vote in the Peace River riding. It is true that the Liberal candidate also increased his vote, but the inference that he did it at the expense of the hon. member for Peace River is wholly incorrect. On the other hand, my friend of the C.C.F. lost 460; the Conservatives lost 1,184; and there were 2,062 new voters. I do not want to take any credit away from the Liberal candidate in that constituency, but certainly to leave the impression that the hon. member for Peace River suffered, as it was suggested he suffered, is wholly incorrect; it is a wholly erroneous conclusion to draw, and a false impression results.

Mr. Decore: The hon. member did not know the results until four days after the election.

Mr. Shaw: I am surprised that in giving the illustration the hon. member for Vegreville did not use his own constituency. I am going to do that. In Vegreville in 1945 the Liberal candidate received 4,806; the Social Credit candidate received 7,146; the Communist candidate received 3,272; and the C.C.F. candidate received 1,668.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Shaw: I anticipated that; I am pleased to have received that applause. The Social Credit candidate in 1949 received 7,115, or 31 votes less than he did in 1945. May I say to the hon. member for Vegreville that my story will be complete, if he will only listen.

In 1949 the Liberal candidate gained 4,066 votes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Shaw: I had indicated applause in my notes at this point, because I knew there would be applause. This increase of 4,066 votes may be cause for great rejoicing on the part of the Liberal party, and particularly the Liberal member from Vegreville.

But I ask them this question: Can the 4,066 votes be called Liberal votes? The answer is no, definitely no. Do those 4,066 votes represent an increase in Liberal strength in that constituency or in Alberta? The answer is definitely no.

So that we may better understand the former member for Vegreville, it is necessary to go back a bit. Between 1940 and 1949, the Vegreville constituency was efficiently and effectively represented in the House of Commons by Mr. Hlynka. Mr. Hlynka was an ardent supporter of the British commonwealth —and I am sure all those who are here will agree with that statement. Mr. Hlynka was an outstanding champion of Canada, of a free Canada and of free Canadians. He believed in democracy—the best form of democracy—and in democracy all the time.

Mr. Low: That is why the communists turned against him and joined the Liberals.

Mr. Shaw: He was a staunch supporter of the Canadian people. And he supported in all his fervour the implementation of policies designed in the first place to make Canada stronger, policies which would provide a much greater opportunity for security for Canadians, a policy which would guarantee a higher degree of individual freedom for all Canadians.

He was an arch foe of communism; he was an arch foe of totalitarianism, and of regimentation in any and all forms. Hon. members who were in the house during those years will know that he exposed and opposed communism both in the house and out of it at every opportunity. Two years ago it became obvious to us that the communists would stop at nothing to put him out of his seat, to remove him from the Canadian House of Commons where his voice could be heard, as it had been heard during those nine and a half years.

Mr. Low: They went the limit this time.

Mr. Shaw: What occurred? Prior to the election of June last it was agreed by the communists that they would not run a candidate in the Vegreville constituency where they had polled 3,272 votes in 1945. For some reason or another they were able to persuade the C.C.F. to refrain from nominating—

Mr. Bryce: No, they did not.

Mr. Shaw: That may have been a false deduction on my part, and I apologize. The C.C.F. were persuaded by someone—

Mr. Low: That is right.

Mr. Shaw: —to refrain from putting a candidate in the field.

An hon. Member: What about the Progressive Conservatives?

Mr. Shaw: There may be a few there, but I have not heard of them. They did not have a candidate in 1945—at least I do not think they did; and they did not have one in 1949.

It was concluded by the communists in that riding that the most effective method to be employed in removing Mr. Hlynka from his seat was to vote Liberal. They were influenced in making that decision by the reported assertion of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when, either at or nearing Regina, he said that Liberalism was nothing but C.C.F.-ism in a hurry, and the communists—

An hon. Member: The other way around.

Mr. Knowles: Point of order.

Mr. Shaw: It occurred, and after all, that is the important thing. Nomination day came and passed, and there were but two candidates in the field. Then came forth that tirade of printed abuse which only the communists seem capable of concocting, or low enough to concoct. Their policy was: Get rid of Hlynka at any price and at any cost. They called him a fascist tool, a nazi—and when I say that, I wonder how long we in Canada are going to permit the dissemination through the mails of material of that kind. All hon. members know that Mr. Hlynka was as bitterly opposed to fascism and communism as anyone who sits in this House of Commons.

They also attacked him because he had arranged to bring from Europe certain displaced persons who had suffered agonies as a consequence of war. They claimed that he had brought the scum of Europe. That, of course, is a charge against the government, and it is not true. He brought to this country many of the finest people ever brought here from any country. They said, "Do not vote for him; vote for anyone else when you go to the polls. But do not vote for him"—which, of course, could lead to only one conclusion, namely that they were to vote Liberal.

And so we find this very interesting situation, that while the Liberal candidates did pick up 4,066 votes, there were among those 3,272 communist votes—if one can be proud of them—and I presume a portion of the C.C.F. votes. It certainly cannot be argued that the thirty some odd votes lost by the former member for Vegreville caused his defeat; because, if he had polled the same vote that he polled before, these communist votes would still have made possible the election of a Liberal.

I am not in the habit of issuing challenges in the House of Commons, but on this occasion I do challenge the present member for Vegreville to take the same stand with the same vigour against communism on the floor of the House of Commons as did the former member for Vegreville. In order to equal his predecessor's record that fight will have to be made effectively, vigorously and certainly continuously. That is all I wish to say about that matter. It is unfortunate that one has even to refer to it but, on occasion, some things do become necessary.

I should like to make one more reference to Hansard, probably to make a correction, and quote the concluding paragraph of the speech made by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald), whom I have met and who I think is a very fine gentleman. But I think he stuck out his neck when he said this, as reported on page 334 of Hansard:

> We in Edmonton—

I would be the first to agree that Edmonton is a wonderful city.

> —are conscious that the residents are in complete accord with the policy of this government and its administration, and that they will at the first opportunity express through their democratic ballot a desire to select for Alberta a government in step provincially with the national administration.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Shaw: I had an indication of applause at that point. It can hardly be said that the residents—the word is used in an all-inclusive sense—are in accord with the policy of the government when the two government candidates received 25,255 votes against opposing votes totalling 36,548. They represent considerably less than half the residents of that fair city. In fact, in Edmonton East there were enough Social Credit votes cast to win the seat, but of course it was a divided vote and we lost. The latter part of the remarks of the hon. member indicates a rather forlorn hope when he says that before long Alberta will elect a government in step provincially with the national administration. That is about as remote a possibility as to sell bathing suits in wholesale quantity to the Eskimos. There are two reasons for my making that statement. The first is that the great majority of the people of Alberta have not forgotten that dismal, that bleak period we are all constantly trying to forget in the province of Alberta, the period from 1905 to 1921 when we had a Liberal administration in the province.

I have in my hand a Bank of Canada report for 1937 which contains the result of a survey made by the Bank of Canada into the finances and related matters in connection with Alberta. After reading this today I assume I shall have a nightmare tonight. Referring to that period it states that the roots of most of the problems that existed in Alberta in 1937 were attributable to the period 1905-21. They characterize that period by using such words and phrases as waste, loose administration and the incur-rence of debt which could not be justified even by the optimistic spirit of the times.

Mr. Fair: That was those awful Liberals.

Mr. Shaw: It goes on to point out the threat to our cash position in Alberta, that our solvency was likely to be questioned. We are told in the report that the policies pursued resulted in the accumulation of a deadweight debt burden and that no effort had been made by the government to put the province on a self-supporting basis in spite of the opportunity provided by the favourable conditions of the times.

Mr. Blackmore: That was the Liberal government.

Mr. Shaw: That was the Liberal government of Alberta, the only one we ever had. Is it any wonder that we do not want any more? Then there is a second reason, a mighty good reason, a reason which has been referred to by some Liberals from Alberta who have spoken already. This is the wonderful position in which our good province finds itself today. I realize that we have passed through times that have been somewhat different from those that existed during the early depression years, but other provinces passed through similar times.

The great majority of the people of our province know that we have an administration that is efficient and honest. Through the pursuance of wise policies that government has brought that province to the forefront of the Canadian provinces.

An hon. Member: I suppose you put the oil there?

Mr. Shaw: Some hon. member interjects to ask if we put the oil there. I can remember how the Liberals sat on that oil for a long time without doing anything about it. The Social Credit government has encouraged the development of resources in the province when there was no comparable development over the border.

Mr. Low: The Liberals frightened all the capital away.

Mr. Shaw: Some people even tried putting traps at the border in order to keep capital in, but under the Liberal administration it still got out. As I said, the great majority of the people of our province know that through the determined application and pursuance of policies that were wise and progressive we are in such a sound financial position in the province today that if it were admitted it would be said that we are the envy of all Canada. Through similarly wise policies we have made outstanding progress in the fields of agriculture, education, public health and so forth right down the line. I can back up what I say by a simple reference to what has been said already during this session. When the legislature assembles in Alberta, if you look long enough and close enough you will find two Liberals. They are both from urban centres where they got in by mistake because we have a peculiar system of voting in the cities and they could not be kept out even if they were not wanted.

An hon. Member: If it were not for that they would not be in.

Mr. Blackmore: They are a splinter group.

Mr. Shaw: If the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) would put some of that wisdom in his speech instead of interjecting into mine what he thinks is wisdom he would make some headway.

An hon. Member: Yours needs it.

Mr. Shaw: That is quite conceivable. I realize that it is hard to squarely face the facts and still say, "No". As I say, I have two reasons for knowing that the hope expressed by the hon. member for Edmonton East is a futile, forlorn hope. For the benefit of the hon. member from Vegreville, let me say that in the last election on June 27 we increased our popular vote in the province by over 17,000. If that vote had been properly distributed it might have kept the hon. member at home.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to depart from that branch of my remarks. I hear someone say, "Good." I have more; I can expand it even further, but I should like to refer to other matters. One of them has been referred to already by my colleague from Camrose (Mr. Beyerstein) whose name, incidentally, I have heard mispronounced several times in the house, and I have noticed spelled incorrectly on the seating plan. He referred to the P.F.A.A. His constituency is very similar to mine except that, as he pointed out, in my constituency I have the world wheat king. I need say nothing more to indicate the nature of the fine agricultural constituency I have the honour to represent. The farmers of Red Deer, together with those of Camrose and other constituencies, have been making a forced contribution of one per cent under the P.F.A.A. With the exception of a very small part of my riding, out near the constituency of Acadia, we have not had to think in terms of P.F.A.A. benefits, but that is not the case this year. I do not know whether it was due to the presence of so many Liberal politicians in the province—

Mr. Johnston: We certainly had a lot of hot air.

Mr. Shaw: Yes, which dried out a good part of my constituency. We had the driest year we have known for forty-five years.

Mr. Mitchell: That may account for the dry speech.

Mr. Shaw: I hear the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) make some reference to a dry speech. Perhaps he will get up and give us his definition of money again.

Mr. Mitchell: I was going to ask my hon. friend when he was going to switch to phony money.

Mr. Shaw: Since the minister has been a member of the Liberal government for so long, and has been associated during that time with the financial policies pursued by the Liberal government, I can tell him nothing about phony money. To return to the subject of the P.F.A.A., however, some sections of my constituency should be permitted to claim benefits under that legislation this year. We hope this may be the one and only time that will be necessary; as I said a moment ago, it was the driest summer in the last forty-five years. But under the terms of the P.F.A.A. as presently constituted I fear that the farmers in my constituency who require assistance because of this calamity will not be able to qualify. That seems most unfair, in view of all the money they have put into that scheme since its inception. As the hon. member for Camrose has said already, I believe that when the P.F.A.A. is under revision we should see that the regulations permit farmers such as those in my constituency who now require assistance to qualify.

I wish to say a word about the matter of proof of age under the Old Age Pensions Act. In my constituency, as elsewhere, there are many pioneer citizens who have made a great contribution toward the development of Canada. Many have spent from forty to fifty years within the borders of our country. Now they are reaching the age of seventy or over, and unfortunately many cannot provide any acceptable evidence at all as proof of age. In many cases their births were never registered, and there may be no entries in the family bibles. Owing to the fact that many of them lived in sparsely populated sections of the country, sometimes in our country and in other cases in the United States, they are not even listed in the census records. Today those people, many of them from seventy to eighty years of age, are suffering severe hardship. I understand, and here I am expressing an opinion based on something I have been told, that there are ways by which medical men can ascertain the approximate age of a person. One such way, I believe, is by examination of the skin texture. I may be wrong; that may be entirely out of the question, but there may be other methods. In many of these cases all you have to do is look at the man. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, some leniency should and must be shown in this connection. No less than four such cases have been brought to my attention during the past summer. There may not be so many, but let us remember that one case is enough to warrant action.

I repeat that I had not anticipated participating in this debate. However, I am rather pleased that the opportunity to do so presented itself.

Mr. George Prudham (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak for the first time in this house in this debate on the speech from the throne, I should like first to compliment you upon your election to the high office you hold, and on the fair and equitable way in which you discharge your duties. I should like also to add my commendations to those already extended by previous speakers to the mover and seconder of the speech from the throne, who made excellent addresses.

I am from Edmonton West, which was so ably represented for many years by Senator James A. MacKinnon. If I should ever attain the dignity and the respect and confidence of my constituents and of the people of Canada at large that he has, my presence in this house will have been well justified. Edmonton West is both rural and urban. It extends westward from the city limits for about seven miles and northward for about twenty miles. Within the boundaries of the constituency the oil drillers are busy. The riding is bounded on the south by the Leduc oil field, on the west by the Woodbend oil field and on the north by the Redwater oil field. My colleagues from Vegreville (Mr. Decore) and Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) have already made reference to the phenomenal growth of the oil industry in the Edmonton area.

Edmonton is built on a large coal field and has large resources of natural gas, with more being discovered almost daily. Fuel is abundant and cheap. For the ordinary-sized house, it requires from $5.00 to $12.00 per month for heating. Power is cheap. Edmonton has one of the most modern steam power plants on the continent. An interchange agreement with the Calgary Power Company ensures an ample supply of power for peak loads. Many industrialists are beginning to realize the potentialities of the district. One of the latest announcements concerns the development of a large pulp and paper industry. A large agricultural area contributes to Edmonton. The commerce of the vast Peace river area and the Northwest Territories are all channelled through Edmonton by northern waterways, railways, highways and by air.

It is our hope that the trans-Canada highway will pass through Edmonton. There are many reasons why it should. The northern route would serve the largest number of people and it would be cheaper to build. A caravan of about fifty motor vehicles recently travelled from Edmonton to Vancouver through the Yellowhead pass, demonstrating that even over the unimproved terrain of the mountains motor travel is possible. By following the route of the Canadian National Railways it is found that snow is not a problem except for a stretch of about ten miles. This portion could easily be kept open for year-round traffic. The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) raised an important point in the house yesterday concerning the use of this highway for national defence. If the announcement the Prime Minister made last week means anything, it means we should look to our defences. We are preparing our defences in the Atlantic; what about the north?

In the event of war, the Edmonton area which is producing oil, the vital necessity of war, would be very vulnerable to attack. I fully realize, Mr. Speaker, that the highways are within the jurisdiction of the provinces. Nevertheless, I would suggest that the urgency of national defence considerations alone warrant the setting up of a fact-finding commission to gather all the data as to cost of construction, economy of maintenance and military value of the various mountain routes proposed for the trans-Canada highway. Let those facts be made available to all the provinces concerned before the location of the highway is finally determined.

The Alaska highway extends north to Alaska, but has no southern outlet and so does not connect with Edmonton. The Alberta government does not seem to have the money or, for some reason, has never linked up this highway with the highways in the south. The discovery of oil has not been an unmixed blessing. Since Edmonton has become the oil capital of Canada—I am saying this for the benefit of my friends from Calgary—

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I can take a joke; I can go along with a gag.

Mr. Prudham: —there has been a tremendous influx of people. At the present time it has been estimated there are at least a thousand people moving into the city of Edmonton every month. The population has increased from approximately 90,000 before the war to nearly 140,000 today. This tremendous influx is taxing the facilities of the city such as transportation, schools, office space and especially housing. I have been told of oil executives who conduct their business in Edmonton during the week and commute to Calgary to live with their families over the week ends.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): That is a good idea, too.

Mr. Prudham: Immediately following the war, the government spent a great deal of money providing emergency shelter for the returned veterans. Army barracks and anything else that would provide shelter were converted into temporary housing units. The wartime housing scheme has been extended to over 1,200 units. Much of the so-called temporary housing accommodation has become permanent because it has been occupied for four or five years now.

Before the war Edmonton was known for its wide open spaces. Today there is scarcely a lot that is undeveloped. The city has been forced to extend utilities to areas which were previously agricultural. The city has done a good job under difficult conditions. From two to three thousand houses have been built per year since the end of the war but this does not even keep up with the increase and certainly does not replace the temporary shelters. So far as housing is concerned, I would say Edmonton was at the explosive point.

I was pleased with the proposals made by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Winters) last week. In the first place his proposals would reduce the down payment required which should make eventual home ownership possible for a large number of young people. There is also a proposal for federal government assistance to the provinces and municipalities in providing serviced land. If our province acts, and the city provides the necessary serviced land, it will remove one of the chief obstacles in our housing program.

Since the war, the city of Edmonton has made commitments by way of land subsidies and tax subsidies to the wartime housing amounting to over $2 million. The new scheme provides for government-sponsored housing schemes, whether for sale or rent, paying full municipal taxes. This remedies an injustice and removes a heavy financial burden which has been placed on many cities across Canada. The minister is to be highly commended for his very constructive proposals. I was pleased to hear his statement that the government does not propose to enter the construction field directly. The conditions I have described as pertaining to Edmonton could be duplicated to a greater or lesser degree in practically every city in Canada.

During the depression of the thirties, the house-building industry practically went out of existence. There were many technical advances during that time such as insulation, modern plumbing fixtures and improved heating equipment. Many new techniques were developed; but, because of depressed economic conditions, it made little difference so far as the general public was concerned. The introduction of the National Housing Act brought about a general improvement in many provinces. The reduction in the interest rate at that time was a big help. The difference between 4½ per cent and 7 per cent, which was formerly the prevailing rate, on a $6,000 house means a saving of over $2,600 within a twenty-five year period.

Upon the outbreak of war the entire building industry was mobilized for war purposes. Barracks and emergency housing for war workers were built. These were produced at a speed which was thought impossible. There were, however, few private homes built until about 1944. The manufacturing and lumbering industries were still geared for war production and therefore many bottlenecks developed in the supply of building materials. Many of these scarcities have been with us until recently. It is only within the last few months that an adequate supply of building materials has been available. A high level of prosperity caused by the war and by wise government policy, contrary to the prophets of gloom, has been continued since the end of the war. It is without precedent and our economy still shows little sign of a recession. Our country is more prosperous than ever before in its history. More people are gainfully employed than at any time in our history. Our national income has more than doubled. The result is that the marriage rate is at an all-time high. Our housing industry has made a marvellous recovery since the war. We in Canada have produced more housing units, on a per capita basis, than has Great Britain or the United States. Nevertheless we have been barely keeping up with new family formations. There has been a vast improvement in the quality of housing during the last twenty years. The house of today is insulated, and is fully equipped with modern kitchen, bathroom and efficient heating equipment. In the short period of five years there has been a tremendous technical improvement both in materials and in contractors' equipment, and also in the planning of homes. The home of today is planned for use rather than for appearances. Costs are high, but I do not think anyone can successfully refute the statement that the general public today are better able to pay for housing than they ever before have been.

The minister's proposal should remove to a large extent the financial difficulties that have beset the house-building industry, and the emphasis is placed on home ownership. I do not believe that the average person in this country wants subsidies. All that the young people want is a chance to help themselves. Shelter is one of the necessities of life. We cannot escape it. We pay for the landlord's house or we pay for our own. The monthly carrying charges for a home under the National Housing Act, including principal, interest and taxes, is in most cases less than the rent for similar accommodation. Every payment adds to the purchaser's estate and in a few years he has become a home owner with all the advantages of a more satisfactory family life, which is reflected in the community life. I believe the new legislation will provide a solution to most of the problems besetting the industry, recognizing of course the fact that public subsidies may be necessary for those who, because of age, infirmity or extreme misfortune, are unable to help themselves. I am confident that if we are to accomplish the maximum production of housing necessary to provide decent shelter for all of the Canadian people, it can only be accomplished through the co-operation of the industry in all its branches, with all the governments, municipal, provincial and federal, participating.

Having regard to the greatly improved material and labour supply, I am confident that the industry, with the co-operation of the various governments, will during the next building season produce houses on a scale that was heretofore impossible. I hope to have a chance to speak on this housing bill when it is introduced, and I shall not take up more time at the present moment.

Before closing, I should like to say just a word about national unity. I am happy to be a member in this twenty-first parliament of Canada. During this parliament Canada will assume the full status of nationhood. With the inclusion of Newfoundland our family is complete. We have been greatly enriched, both materially and culturally. The spirit of true Canadianism which is personified in our esteemed Prime Minister is evident everywhere in Canada. Under his leadership I am confident that we are going forward to true national unity such as we have never before known. It is a privilege indeed to be here and to participate in the conduct of the national affairs of this country.

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate you upon your recent appointment and I offer you my best wishes for success in the discharge of your duties. To the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Dion), who is Deputy Speaker, I extend my heartiest congratulations. I should also like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the motion we are now discussing. Their initial efforts in this house justify the reputation they enjoyed before entering it. I am sure that a brilliant future awaits them in parliament.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, before the debate comes to a close, I wish to bring briefly to the attention of the government a question of some importance not only to my constituents but to the country at large: that of our foreign trade and its repercussions on the economic life of the kingdom of the Saguenay. As Great Britain has decided to reduce her imports at the expense of Canada, our country will this year export much less pulp, paper and aluminum. It is estimated that this reduction will amount to many millions.

Such a move on the part of England, towards whom we have always been extremely generous but who seems to forget it when it suits her, affects especially the economy of the riding I have the honour to represent in this house. As a matter of fact, the normal operation of the aluminum and paper industries of our district is essential to the prosperity of our population. To ensure the regular functioning of our plants, it is extremely important, it is even essential, that we have markets for our products.

Our legislators, in the past, neglected to set on a strong and permanent basis our trade relations with countries anxious to buy from us and most of the time looked to England who, most of the time, was looking elsewhere.

Here is the record: From January to September, 1948, Great Britain signed trade agreements with some twenty countries in Europe and in the western hemisphere. In March, Poland agreed with the United Kingdom to a bilateral trade agreement involving approximately £11,000,000, whereby Poland undertook to supply England, during a period of three years, with eggs, bacon, lumber and zinc.

A similar agreement had been signed, on the same date, with Finland who undertook to send pulpwood to England, amongst other items.

The treaty signed with Denmark in February brought to England increased supplies of butter, cheese, eggs and bacon. In April, following the usual negotiations, it was agreed that Norway would provide Great Britain with mine-timber, pulpwood, zinc, iron and steel alloys.

The agreement with Argentina provided Great Britain with corn, meat and lard. Following negotiations initiated in December 1947, England obtained, in September 1948, 500,000 tons of coarse grains from Russia.

I have summed up Great Britain's standard way of doing business.

During the war, when we supplied the United Kingdom with the foodstuffs and other products mentioned above or when we made gifts amounting to billions of dollars to enable the British to purchase those products, they did import them from Canada. Now that they have to pay for them, they buy them elsewhere. Our country has to find new customers.

The pattern of our trade relations has been upset, bringing about as an immediate result the devaluation of our dollar. Canada's great and only source of real prosperity lies, as we all know, in the exportation of our excess production. Apart from paper and aluminum, goods such as canned meat, woollens, dairy and agricultural products, as well as certain building materials, are in great demand in South American countries.

What, I ask the government, is preventing us from trading with the Latin-American countries?

I am in favour of signing air agreements with the different nations of the world and with any scheme designed to assist in the building of houses for our workers, as outlined in the speech from the throne. Above all else, however, I want jobs for our working classes and bread on the family table. That is the primary condition on which depends the happiness of our citizens. At present, there are thousands of unemployed in our district. People are worried.

In view of the fantastically high cost of living, they have every reason to fear winter's hardships. Since the dominion government moved to inaugurate a scheme of unemployment insurance, it must look after the jobless. That is a government responsibility. My constituents know it and will insist that the authorities provide them with the financial help they need to maintain their usual standard of living. During the last decade, we lived through a dreadful period of unemployment; we do not want that to recur. In order to prevent a recurrence of this calamity, in order to guarantee the stability of our industries, it is imperative that the government should find markets for our aluminum and our newsprint immediately. Unemployment insurance is all good and fine, but it is hardly a cure. On the other hand, the various government departments are aware that post offices and customs houses are lacking in Chicoutimi.

They are aware, too, of the repairs to be made to some wharves as well as to airports. I urge them to carry out these various public works in order to alleviate the present unemployment situation.

The people must not be led to believe that war is a national blessing, that it brings with it prosperity and abundance and that full employment is otherwise impossible. War is a calamity which must unfortunately be reckoned with at times, but whose occurrence should be viewed with the greatest misgivings.

Prosperity should prevail in peacetime, otherwise there is something wrong with our economic system.

If, in order to maintain our capitalist system, we are compelled every twenty-five years to witness periods of war bringing in their wake waves of temporary and artificial prosperity, then, indeed, the time has come to change our system or at least to amend it in its broader aspects.

When economic theories and doctrines are no longer able to fulfill the wishes and essential needs of the people, they must be laid aside. I am an exponent of private enterprise. I have faith in the initiative, the skill and the intelligence of our businessmen. I know that we owe part of the goods which we enjoy to the improvement of methods of production and distribution created and brought into general use by men of initiative, courage and willpower.

Nevertheless I fear that mechanism will bring unemployment, while reducing the income of the working classes.

Mr. Speaker, I have tried to acquaint the government with the present economic situation in my constituency. I hope that my remarks will command the attention deserved by the people of the kingdom of the Saguenay.

(Text):

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks tonight I wish to say to you how greatly awed and overwhelmed most of us new members were when we came into this great chamber of the House of Commons. Because of that I would ask your indulgence for a few moments, and trust you will overlook any shortcomings that you may see in the remarks that I shall make. Naturally we are bewildered at the maze of rules and regulations that we have to apply in this house. I know that you will bear with us when I say to you that we hope soon to be able to distinguish between standing orders and orders in council, orders of the day and orders for returns. These things were almost impossible of understanding when we first came into the house but we are gradually beginning to see the light of day and in a few more weeks we hope to be able to take our places with you.

We are grateful too, Mr. Speaker, for the fact that so many of the older members have given us such a warm welcome on coming here. It has helped us a great deal to get our feet on the ground and we appreciate it very greatly indeed.

I should like to add my word of congratulations to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who is not in his seat tonight. I congratulate him on the magnificent victory which he achieved in the June 27 election. It was a great personal triumph. In saying that, I should not like to go as far as the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) went in eulogizing his leader, but I do wish him the best of health so that he may continue to lead the great party which he heads in this parliament.

I should also like to say a word about the new members of our party who have come into this house. The four hon. members who have already addressed this house have brought credit to our party. We have heard the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins), the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), and the two new members from Quebec, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Courtemanche) and the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer). These four gentlemen are members of the great legal profession. I, in common with many other people, have a great deal of respect for the legal profession. However, the constituency of Haldimand in the province of Ontario decided to send a new member from the agricultural community to represent them in this house. I am very happy as a farmer to represent that constituency.

I should like to say a word or two about the section of the country from which I come, the great garden spot of Canada. I make no apologies to the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) when I say this, because in the house the other day he commented on the wonderful peaches that we had in this house and said that they were on a par with those that come from British Columbia. Therefore I am happy to have the honour to represent that section in the province of Ontario.

In passing, I should like to make some reference to the constituency which I represent, Haldimand. It is mostly a rural constituency, but we have a number of towns in that county. We have the town of Dunnville, which has two large textile mills, and if the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth (Mr. Charlton) were not here tonight I would say that at Caledonia and Hagersville we have the two largest gypsum lime and alabastine plants in the Dominion of Canada. We are also very proud of the magnificent war effort of the constituency from which I come. During the war we had four airfields which graduated many thousands of our young men who served in the various ranks of the air force throughout the war on the different fronts of the world. Next year we celebrate our one-hundredth anniversary. May I extend an invitation to every member of the house to visit us at that time. We have already invited the governor general, and if any hon. members would care to come we would like to show them the hospitality we can extend from our constituency.

May I at this point make reference to Mr. Mark C. Senn, the gentleman who formerly represented the constituency of Haldimand. I wish hon. members to know that we in the constituency of Haldimand have a great deal of respect and esteem for Mr. Senn, who represented that riding for almost three decades. We have every reason to be proud of the representation he gave us in the House of Commons during those thirty years.

With the exception of the former Prime Minister, and I believe the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), who came to the house about the same time, I believe Mr. Senn was the senior member. I am pleased to have many inquiries concerning his health. These inquiries come from every part of the house, and they are deeply appreciated. I shall convey your good wishes to him, and I know they will make him very happy indeed. I am pleased to report that his health is slightly improved and that he continues to watch with keen interest the proceedings of the House of Commons.

This evening I intend to say a few words with respect to the question of markets, in which farming people throughout the country are keenly interested. I have received many communications from farmers across Canada concerning this vital subject. Therefore with Your Honour's permission I shall take a few moments of the time of the house to discuss the matter.

We have read in the press and heard over the air in the past few months a great deal of comment about future markets for our agricultural products. We hope to hear from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) before this debate is concluded just what our primary producers may expect in the way of markets in 1950.

During the ten-year period from 1939, our agricultural production in Canada was greatly accelerated. This was directly due to world war conditions, and as such it is only reasonable to expect some reduction in demand as European countries come back into production.

As the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Aylesworth) so ably brought to the attention of the house on April 27 of this year, the future outlook for Canadian agricultural markets appears to have receded beyond what many consider to be in the best interests of this country, and this very basic Canadian industry. During the ten-year period from 1939, we negotiated with the United Kingdom over 140 agreements for the purchase of various agricultural products. Today there are only four in existence, namely, wheat, bacon, cheese, eggs; and, with the exception of wheat, these are for very considerably reduced amounts.

While these agreements were in force, the price was in many instances below the prevailing world price, if such could accurately be determined, and at any rate was certainly competitive with what the same products could be purchased for elsewhere. During those years, little objection was expressed to the policy of selling to the United Kingdom below what was considered a world price, because it was hoped that by so doing we would retain these markets for our Canadian farmers after the war was over and when competition would become more keen.

These contracts also served as the support for farm prices in this country. Today that prop is rapidly disappearing. No indication has been given as yet whether or not the three remaining agreements, in addition to the wheat agreement, will be renewed after this year.

The Financial Post, in a dispatch by their own special correspondent who reported the Washington conference, stated in a story published on September 17 last:

> It is considered unlikely that Britain will renew her 1949 contracts for Canadian eggs, bacon and cheese.

While this may not mean that the United Kingdom will discontinue buying any or all of these items from Canada, it very clearly indicates that we can expect substantially reduced United Kingdom markets in 1950. Should such a situation actually materialize, it would be very serious for our Canadian farmers.

Our bacon contract for 1949 was for 160 million pounds, representing a very considerable reduction from the contract year 1945-46, when we shipped in excess of a billion pounds to the United Kingdom market.

This bacon market which Canadian farmers hoped to retain after the war has been reduced from year to year, until today it is a matter of question how much of this market Canada will retain. Some months ago, Britain's food minister stated that the United Kingdom intended to purchase all the bacon, eggs, et cetera, that countries such as Denmark, Poland and Hungary could sell to them. This announced change of policy was followed by agreements for bacon with a number of countries including Denmark, Poland and Hungary, over periods of four and five years, extending up to 1953.

Since these agreements have been negotiated, giving these European countries a good portion of the British bacon market, other factors have arisen which may result in reduced sales of Canadian bacon in the United Kingdom market.

Similar uncertainty exists in connection with our United Kingdom market for cheese, our present contracts for 50 million pounds representing an amount lower than our shipments to this market in any one of the last fifty years.

Today, United Kingdom markets, formerly supplied by Canada, are being filled elsewhere under agreements negotiated within the past year. Australia and New Zealand now supply cheese under a contract which extends to 1955. Denmark, Holland, Switzerland and France have also in the last year become substantial suppliers of this commodity in the British market. Our present market for eggs expires this coming January. Last year this contract was reduced by 38 per cent from the adjusted 1948 figure. Since that time, under the bilateral trade agreements which the United Kingdom negotiated with European and other countries, Poland, Denmark, Holland, Eire, and Australia have all become suppliers in this market under contracts, one of which, with Poland, extends until 1954.

Is it any wonder that our farmers are concerned about future United Kingdom markets for these and other agricultural products? This concern, which is very widely felt, arises not alone from what has happened to these contracts in the past few years, but largely from indications of what the future may hold.

Some months ago the United Kingdom announced its intention to cut purchases from the dollar area by one quarter. Has the Minister of Agriculture yet been able to ascertain whether or not this announced policy to reduce imports by one quarter will apply to the few remaining or existing food contracts?

Just recently, I noticed a press report to the effect that the United Kingdom officials had informed the continuing committee on Anglo-Canadian trade that the recent devaluation of sterling will have little immediate bearing on previous intentions to cut purchases in the dollar area by one-quarter.

Since the United Kingdom announced its intention to cut imports from the dollar area, a five-year trade pact with Czechoslovakia has been signed, amounting to $340 million, including foodstuffs and other goods that in the past came chiefly from Canada and the United States.

It is also reported that the United Kingdom is at present negotiating trade agreements with Yugoslavia, Hungary and Russia, all of which involves goods, chiefly primary products, formerly purchased from Canada.

These new trade agreements, along with bilateral deals now in existence with Poland, Denmark, Hungary, Russia and other countries, constitute a threat, and a very serious threat, to the future markets, particularly of the primary producers of this country.

During the past ten years our food contracts with Britain have, with the exception of wheat, been largely for periods of one year. Contracts with other countries such as Poland, Denmark, Holland, Czechoslovakia and other countries, have been for periods of up to five years. While there may have been some advantage in annual negotiation of these contracts, the fact remains that we now find ourselves with a very materially reduced number of contracts, all but one of which expire at the end of this crop year.

Today we enter into the question of new contracts, at a time when the United Kingdom has negotiated bilateral deals with several countries for the supply of primary products formerly purchased from Canada. In addition to this there is the question of price. Many of these countries which today have long-term bilateral agreements with the United Kingdom have devaluated their currency in close relationship to the devaluation of the British pound. As a result, our ability to sell in the United Kingdom markets will have to meet competition not only from the many bilateral deals now in existence, but as well from the question of price and any advantage which may accrue to these European countries as a result of devaluation.

I bring this matter to the attention of the house at this time in the hope that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will at the earliest opportunity make a statement to parliament and to the country as to the future outlook for agricultural markets.

I make this suggestion because I believe it to be in the interest of the farmers of this country who today face a crisis on the question of future markets, notwithstanding the fact that no cabinet minister has to date participated in this debate.

At the present time the situation is not as serious perhaps as the facts would indicate, but this in no way lessens the potential dangers ahead. The production of agricultural products is not something that can be turned off and on again like an electric switch. Our farmers require to know well in advance what possible markets exist in order that they may plan their year's production. Up to the present we have been able to sell much of our surplus production in the United States of America and this has served to defer the crisis which otherwise would have arisen as a result of markets lost in the United Kingdom.

Today we can no longer ignore the fact that we have a similarity of production with the United States and indicated surpluses in that country no longer provide our farmers with any assurance of markets in that direction.

In the past our food contracts with the United Kingdom have been a prop for prices in Canada. The question now is: Will the existing contracts be renewed, and at what price? Is there any prospect or possibility of regaining for the farmers of this country markets in the United Kingdom for those goods which we supplied in such large quantities during the past ten years?

The speech from the throne indicates:

> The government is seeking by all appropriate means to co-operate in measures to restore economic equilibrium. The achievement of a pattern of world trade in which the trading nations can operate together within one single multilateral system continues to be the ultimate aim of my government.

I hope that the minister will take these facts into consideration, because these things are of vital concern to our farming people, and I hope also that the minister will be in position to advise this house and the people of Canada at the earliest possible date so that the farmers of Canada may know just what to expect in the future in regard to markets.

Mr. J. W. Welbourn (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate may I be allowed to congratulate the Deputy Speaker upon his elevation to that office, and furthermore I should like to compliment you upon the very able and dignified manner in which you are fulfilling your duties. I should like to join with other hon. members in complimenting the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert) upon the fluent and capable manner in which he moved the acceptance of the speech from the throne and also the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) who so very ably seconded the motion. I must say that some of us, particularly those of us who are new, find our positions complicated further by the realization of the fact that we are following two such outstanding speakers as the two hon. gentlemen I have just mentioned.

[Mr. Catherwood.]

At this point I should like to take it upon myself to reply to a statement made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw). I do this because I object to the inference that has been left with the house in connection with my colleague, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore). I have known the hon. member for Vegreville for many years and I have no hesitation whatever in stating that there is no greater opponent of communism in this house than he.

Some hon. members have taken advantage of this debate to give the house some information regarding the constituencies that they represent, and I am going to follow that practice. The constituency of Jasper-Edson, which I have the honour to represent, is in my opinion the finest constituency in Canada. Situated as it is in the west central part of Alberta, it extends from just outside the outskirts of the city of Edmonton for a distance of 275 miles west to the boundary of British Columbia. Jasper-Edson is bounded on the south by the Saskatchewan river and it extends north to Chisholm Mills on the Athabasca river.

In the east and northeastern parts of the constituency we have some of the finest agricultural land in western Canada, admirably suited to mixed farming and the growing of grass, clover and alfalfa seed. I speak from personal knowledge of this area as my father homesteaded a few miles west of Edmonton in the year 1892, and in that particular area there has never to this date been a crop failure. Also in the constituency immediately west of Edmonton is located the Woodbend oil fields with the now world famous Schoepp No. 1 well which has the greatest depth of oil-bearing strata ever found in an oil well. This is just seven miles from my old farm. Crude oil from this field is flowing by pipe line, truck and tank cars to the various refineries in western Canada.

In the central part of the riding there are vast areas of timber where millions of feet of lumber and many hundreds of thousands of ties are cut every year. In this area as well are deposits of coal that are apparently inexhaustible and on the coal branch the very finest grades of steam and domestic coal are produced. I read in a recent Ottawa paper that coal, advertised as American coal, is being sold here in Ottawa at $24 to $25 per ton and yet a few months ago one of the old established mines at Mountain Park closed down because of lack of orders for their products. I would urge the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) to give serious consideration to the problem of devising ways and means of placing western coal in the bins of the consumers in this part of the dominion.

There are several well developed summer resorts in Jasper-Edson. The Seba and Kapasiwin beaches on lake Wabamun and Alberta beach on lac Ste. Anne are all within easy driving range of Edmonton and are patronized very extensively by the residents of that city. In the two lakes I have just mentioned, as well as in other lakes in that area, commercial fishing is an industry that brings a very substantial revenue to the residents of the constituency. The whitefish that are taken from the waters of lake Wabamun are recognized as the finest in Canada.

We all know and appreciate the value of tourist traffic to the economy of this country. In fact it has developed into one of the greatest industries in Canada, and in Jasper national park we have an attraction for tourists that is second to none in the dominion.

The town of Jasper is situated in a valley surrounded by towering snow-covered mountains, with many lakes and streams, well stocked with trout. It forms a setting that many tourists return to year after year. Adequate accommodation is provided both at Jasper Park lodge, the modern hotels in the town of Jasper and many attractive bungalow cabins. The dominion government maintains a large and up-to-date fish hatchery in Jasper for the purpose of restocking the lakes and streams to provide sport for the tourists. The number of tourists visiting Jasper park has been increasing steadily each year, and nearly twice as many visited there in 1949 as in the previous year. The number of tourists will be very greatly increased if and when there is a suitable surfaced road leading to and from Jasper park. The residents of Jasper-Edson, particularly those of Jasper town, are vitally interested in the proposed trans-Canada highway. We of Jasper-Edson feel that the first trans-Canada highway should be constructed through Edmonton, Jasper and the Yellowhead pass, and although I realize that the choice of the route has been left to the provincial governments, I believe that, in view of the very large sum of money involved, the possible importance of this road from a military and defence standpoint, and the economy of construction and maintenance, an effort should be made to have the various provincial governments agree to the setting up of a fact-finding board and that they, the provincial governments, will agree to the recommendations of such a board, and furthermore, that at least one member of that board should be a qualified military engineer.

I have tried to give you a brief description of the great constituency I represent. I am very happy and very proud that on the 27th of June the electors of Jasper-Edson did repudiate the theories and doctrines advanced by the Social Credit party and voted in favour of the policies of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the great party he so ably leads.

Motion (Mr. Boisvert) agreed to, on division.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That the address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are of the honourable the privy council.

Motion agreed to.

MEAT PACKING INDUSTRY

WORKS AND UNDERTAKINGS DECLARED TO BE FOR THE GENERAL ADVANTAGE OF CANADA

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5, to declare the meat packing industry works for the general advantage of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, a bill identical to this was introduced two sessions ago, in the last parliament, and was adopted. It had to do with the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company, which carries on operations in Manitoba and Saskatchewan; and for very obvious reasons the house saw fit to adopt that legislation.

The purpose of this bill is quite simple. As I said when introducing the legislation, the purpose is to bring the meat packing industry under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act so that if a dispute should occur with respect to any matter of collective bargaining, the federal Department of Labour will have power to step in and try to conciliate the dispute. The department has done this in the past; it has been very successful in its endeavours, and deserves much credit for what it has achieved.

The meat packing industry is of importance to all Canadians; it is important to the workers in industry, to the producers who supply the livestock, and of course to all of us as consumers. I suppose most hon. members remember the last strike that took place in the industry, in 1947. On that occasion two groups suffered most: the workers, through loss of income, and the producers who also suffered a loss of income because they were unable to market their livestock. That dispute began with Swift Canadian Limited, and it continued for two weeks. Had the federal department had the power to intervene, I am quite sure this dispute could have been settled. As it was, it lingered on for two weeks and then spread throughout the industry. In no small measure, settlement was delayed by the refusal of Swift Canadian to arbitrate the dispute, in spite of their being requested to do so by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and various provincial governments. While I have said the workers and producers suffered during that strike, according to the evidence submitted to the prices committee it would appear that the companies did not do so badly in the long run, for they made more money in the two months following the strike than they made in the previous eight months. The reason for that is fairly obvious; there was a glut of livestock on the market, and we had a population which to a certain extent was meat starved.

There are three major meat packing companies in Canada: Canada Packers, Burns and Swift Canadian. The policies of these three companies are directed from their head offices. I have no quarrel at all with that; but that being so, of course the union had to constitute itself in such a way that it could deal efficiently with the employers; so the bargaining powers of the union also are concentrated. Bargaining on a national basis was first accepted in 1944, when there was a dispute in the meat packing industry. At that time the federal Department of Labour stepped into the picture under the War Measures Act and appointed a conciliation commissioner, who assisted in no small measure in the settlement of the dispute. The same thing happened in 1945 and in 1946, when the federal department was able to bring about an amicable settlement. In 1947 jurisdiction over most labour matters was returned to the provinces, and we had a different situation. While the united packing-house workers were continuing to deal with the employers on a national scale, because of provincial jurisdiction there was no national authority to which they could apply for help in arriving at a settlement. The union, therefore, was compelled to go to eight different provinces with the inevitable result. It would be almost as logical to expect the railway brotherhoods to go to the eight provinces to find some amicable settlement in one of their disputes. I am certain that this unworkable situation was in no small way a cause of the 1947 strike and of the undue delay in settlement.

If negotiations on a national scale fail to resolve differences, there is no provision for conciliation at the top level today. As I say, conciliation has to take place through the various provincial governments if any settlement is to be reached. The consequences are as obvious as they are serious. Today, in its agreement with two of the major companies, Canada Packers and Burns, the union has a clause containing a provision for the mediation of disputes before a strike vote is taken. Thus, we see the industry recognizes the need for national collective bargaining, and believes it to be the most effective way of bargaining. Past experience has shown that peaceful settlements can be reached on a national scale, whereas on a provincial scale there has been conflict, with eventual strikes. No one, of course, wants to see that. The differences between the union and the companies in 1944-45 were much greater than those which exist today. If the federal Department of Labour could bring about a peaceful settlement of these differences, then I am convinced it could do so now if workable machinery could be made available for use in the event of a breakdown of negotiations. Agreements would then be reached quickly and efficiently. If that happens, then Canada will be spared the expense as well as the annoyance of a strike in this important industry. It is for that reason I am anxious to see this industry placed under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. I am certain the results would be of benefit and to the general advantage of Canada as a whole.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), as stated in the explanatory note, is to make that part of the meat packing industry which carries on operations in two or more provinces subject to paragraph (g) of section 53 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. This means that if this bill is approved by the house, the federal Department of Labour shall have complete jurisdiction in future collective bargainings concerning the employees of those industries as well as in labour disputes which may arise.

May I be allowed to point out at this time that the hon. member for Winnipeg North, who is the sponsor of this bill, wanted to show his appreciation—undoubtedly without realizing it—to the Liberal government, to the distinguished Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and his departmental officials for the efficient and unprejudiced manner in which they all discharged their responsibilities during and after the war.

We of the Liberal party accept with pleasure that compliment, but that is all we can accept under the circumstances.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North said a while ago that the bill in question is very simple. He was probably referring to the fact that it is short and plainly worded. It is however fraught with far-reaching consequences, especially in so far as provincial autonomy is concerned.

Since confederation, the provinces have always exercised their jurisdiction in the industries mentioned in Bill No. 5, although that jurisdiction is not specifically assigned to the provincial legislatures, under section 92 of the British North America Act. As for myself although I am not an expert in constitutional law, nor even a lawyer, I understand that, by tacit consent, the right has been granted the provinces to legislate on and to intervene in collective bargaining and labour disputes that might arise in the meat packing industry.

If the house were to pass this bill dealing with the industries I have referred to, we would, by that very fact, admit the principle that any industry or business operating in two or in several provinces, could, at the request of a member of this house and following its approval, come under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Liberal party, having always upheld the rights and autonomy of the provinces, cannot accept the bill presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. As I said a few moments ago, that bill would encroach upon powers which the provinces have always exercised themselves, except in especially serious circumstances such as war, when the security of the state might be jeopardized. It is true that in certain quarters we of the Liberal party have been accused of having violated on various occasions that often-mentioned autonomy. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I still have to hear in this house or outside a single orator prove, with evidence in support of his allegations, that the Liberal party has taken away from any province a single power guaranteed to it under the constitution. Efforts were made, even during the last election, to bring the people to believe that provincial autonomy would be in danger if the Liberal party were returned to power. But, as was seen, the great majority of the people did not believe those false prophets and showed by a nearly unanimous vote, that they had full and complete confidence, on this point, in the honesty of our distinguished leader, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and of his candidates.

Besides, without giving any thought to the political advantage which he could have derived thereby, the Prime Minister said himself when, on September 16, he tabled the letter he had written to the provincial premiers:

> Before the recent election I stated on several occasions that it was the view of the government that a method should be worked out to amend our constitution in Canada, and that any such method should include the fullest safeguards of provincial rights and jurisdiction, and of the use of the two official languages and of those other rights which are the sacred trust of our national partnership.

This goes to prove that the electors were right in trusting the man whom they have chosen as their leader.

Moreover, as regards the bill which is now before us, the provinces can, if they so desire, come to an understanding with the dominion Department of Labour, with a view to reaching an agreement whereby the officials of that department could assume the administration of the provincial legislation.

In practice, this means that the provinces may, whenever they wish, ask for the cooperation of federal civil servants. This agreement is made possible by virtue of section 62 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act:

> Where legislation enacted by the legislature of a province and part I of the act are substantially uniform, the Minister of Labour may, on behalf of the government of Canada, with the approval of the governor in council, enter into an agreement with the government of the province to provide for the administration by officers and employees of Canada of the provincial legislation.

It is obvious, then, that the provinces, whenever they so require, may at any time, pursuant to an agreement, have the cooperation of the employees of the federal Department of Labour.

Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I have given and more especially in order to protect the rights of the provinces, I am unable to agree to the bill introduced by the member for Winnipeg North and I shall accordingly vote against it.

(Text):

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): The objections, Mr. Speaker, to the bill which has been proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) are extremely simple and obvious, and they have an importance which has nothing to do with the question of the relationship between employers and employees in the meat packing industry in Canada or in any other industry. The bill proposed by the hon. member is to amend section 53 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, an act to provide for the investigation, conciliation and settlement of industrial disputes, assented to on June 30, 1948, and which is chapter 54 of the Statutes of Canada, 1948.

When we read the section which it is proposed to amend, we see the real objection to the amendment proposed. Section 53 is the section which deals with the application of the act, and it reads as follows:

> Part I of this act shall apply in respect of employees who are employed upon or in connection with the operation of any work, undertaking or business that is within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada including, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing—

And then are set out certain subsections which delineate certain of the undertakings or businesses within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada to which the act applies. The purpose of the amendment is to add, by declaration of this parliament, a certain business or undertaking as a work for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more provinces.

As this country is a federal state, there are certain limitations upon the legislative authority of this parliament, and they are those set out in our constitution, the British North America Act, which lays down a division of authority between this parliament and the legislatures of the various provinces. When we say that there is a limitation upon the power of this parliament, that does not mean that this parliament is not free to pass any sort of legislation which it may see fit to pass; but there is a limitation on the effectiveness of that legislation by reason of the fact that if this parliament sees fit to pass an act which infringes upon, or tries to take away any of the authority which, by the constitution, is given to the provinces, that act is ineffective in spite of the fact that it is passed by this parliament because it will be declared ultra vires when submitted to the courts. We are therefore free to pass an amendment of this kind if we see fit to do so; but by so doing we cannot make it effective. Therefore, in reviewing any legislation which comes before it, it is one of the responsibilities of this parliament to see that such legislation is within its competence. Otherwise, in passing it we are doing an empty act, something which will in the end be found to be completely ineffective.

In the field of relationships between employers and employees in this country, the parliament of Canada is competent to deal with matters for which no better description exists than that which is contained in the preamble of section 53, which I have already read, namely, matters within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada. If a matter is not within our legislative authority, Mr. Speaker, we cannot effectively pass any legislation dealing with it.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Dickey: Certainly.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Is the hon. member arguing that the legislation passed by this house concerning the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company Limited, and which is precisely similar, is also ultra vires?

Mr. Dickey: That is a question which, if there is any doubt about it, should be referred to the courts. I am not a court and I do not propose to make any decision in that regard.

Mr. Knowles: The minister brought in that legislation.

[Mr. Dickey.]

Mr. Mitchell: By consent of the province.

Mr. Dickey: If it was by consent, then the provinces withdrew. That is a different situation. I do not think there has been any suggestion that any consent had been given by the provinces to the amendment that has been proposed by my hon. friend.

But, Mr. Speaker, that is the situation in the field of labour relations. The preamble of this section is the operative part of it. Hon. members who were members of the industrial relations committee of the last parliament which considered the clauses of this bill will recall that when this particular section was before the committee it was in a slightly different form from that in which it now appears in the bill. The preamble was shorter, and the provision with respect to the limitation "within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada" appeared as one of the subsections of the suggested section.

The section as it then stood was thoroughly discussed in the committee and on the motion of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) it was amended. The amendment was agreed to by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), and the section was redrafted in the form in which it now stands. As the result of the present form of the section, the operative words "within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada" affect the whole meaning of the following subsections of the section, and these subsections are merely in the act to indicate the various activities which are within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada, either by direct legislative authority in the constitution or as a result of judicial decision in constitutional cases where the provisions of the constitution, the British North America Act, have been interpreted. The various matters are there set out. The proposal is to add to these matters the particular industry of meat packing.

The situation is this, Mr. Speaker. Whether or not this house sees fit to pass the proposed amendment, it will not in itself put the meat packing industry, or any other industry, within the legislative capacity of the parliament of Canada. I personally do not think it can reasonably be argued that the meat packing industry is an industry which should come under the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada as opposed to the provinces, any more than a half dozen other industries that one could name, for example, the creamery industry or the farming industry, or any industry that is carried on in the majority of the provinces of this country.

I submit that in passing this amendment we would be doing an act which would be found in the result to be completely ineffective, and we would be found to have attempted to legislate in a field which is closed to us by the constitution. I think that is the most important aspect of this question.

The relationships between the central government and the provinces are matters which have to be dealt with with great care, and this parliament should not knowingly and intentionally infringe upon any of the legislative fields which have been assigned to the provinces, without the consent of the provinces affected. We have heard a great deal, not only in this session but during the last session, about provincial rights and consultation with the provinces. This is clearly a case where the passage of this amendment would be an infringement of provincial rights, the invasion by this parliament of a field which has always been clearly understood to be within provincial jurisdiction.

The arguments which were made by the hon. member in introducing his bill may well be arguments which should be considered by a body which is representative of all the parties concerned and is dealing with the question of amendment of the constitution or of assigning to the central government, the federal parliament, certain powers, which under modern conditions it needs. But the fact is that the federal parliament has not now the authority to invade this field, and without the consent of those who have the field I submit that we have no right to invade it.

Perhaps the hon. member will have an opportunity to make his submissions to a body which will consider the arguments he has put forward, apart from their connotation in this instance. I submit, however, that this parliament has to consider its position as a legislative body with restricted powers and the responsibility, greater perhaps than it might have had even in the immediate past, of seeing that we do nothing which might be interpreted as an intentional and complete invasion of a field which has been dealt with by the provinces in the past. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I submit that we should vote against the bill to amend the act which has been proposed by the hon. member.

(Translation):

Mr. Philippe Valois (Argenteuil-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have the honour to make a speech in this house. I do so in order to carry out my mandate. I hope you will allow me to depart somewhat from parliamentary procedure. I wish to offer you, in my turn, my most respectful congratulations upon your appointment to the speakership of this house. I feel sure it has been a happy choice, one that does you honour and will ensure the house a worthy Speaker under whom parliament can work for the good of the nation.

Mr. Speaker, we are now considering a bill introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) to amend section 53 of the act appearing in statute 11-12 George VI, chapter 54, and entitled "The Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act". That title is so clear that it speaks for itself.

Section 53, which the bill would amend, contains the very provisions designed to determine the administration of the act.

The proposed amendment would broaden the scope of the act to include certain packing houses and related industries which would then come under the sole authority of the federal government in matters of industrial relations and disputes.

Mr. Speaker, if I may use a familiar phrase, everyone should stick to his trade. I do not propose to question, at this stage, the advisability of the bill under review. I know that the matter of the strike in the packing industry will be brought up. If, however, I were to venture upon this ground I would only be heading for disaster. In my humble opinion, at first glance, this legislation may appear restricted in its scope, but it could establish a precedent whose full implications I am at the moment unable to foresee.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that this section 53, which it is proposed to amend, is worth reading. It will be found to be an almost textual reproduction of the terms of the constitution, that is the British North America Act, 1867, especially paragraph (g) of section 53, which reads as follows:

(g) such works or undertakings as, although wholly within a province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces;

That should be compared with the following paragraph (c) of subsection 10 of section 92 of the B.N.A. Act. But first, so that we may have a better understanding of the text, I quote the heading of subsection 10, as follows:

10. Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:

And paragraph (c):

(c) Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

We must therefore conclude that the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act is couched in such terms, the very terms of the constitution, that it is intra vires in that it scrupulously respects the rights of the provinces in matters of this nature. I submit, humbly but with the utmost conviction, that the separation of legislative powers is one of the keystones of our constitution. To me it would be rash to invade this field unless every precaution which human wisdom can foresee had been taken.

I admit that paragraph (c) of subsection 10 of section 92 of the British North America Act which I have just quoted could, after summary consideration, provide an easy and expeditious solution. I feel, however, that the remedy suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North is worse than the evil he is trying to cure.

This is a rather strange fact, but I believe I can vouch for its absolute veracity: the provisions of paragraph (c) of subsection 10 of section 92 were never resorted to when our country was faced with the many problems which the conduct of the war brought to our attention with an impatience that would tolerate no delay. If the federal government invaded legislative fields belonging to the provinces, it did so when faced by the imminent danger of war by referring to section 91 of the constitution. I am prepared to admit, for the sake of discussion, that it may be that the federal authority is better prepared than are the provincial governments to deal, for instance, with certain labour disputes. However, it would be necessary to investigate the devices to be sought in an agreement with the provinces. But deliberately, in one fell swoop, might I say, to assume a legislative power hitherto exercised by the provinces would not only be high-handed but, to my mind, at a time when precisely there are disputes regarding the separation of legislative powers between the federal government and the various provincial governments, it would be provocative. Nay, it would be setting fire to the powder kegs.

Not for a moment, Mr. Speaker, do I wish to impugn the good faith of the member from Winnipeg North; not for a moment would I gainsay the commendability of his intentions. However, being a Liberal, I attach great importance to provincial autonomy and I therefore feel it to be my duty to warn the house against this bill whose surest and almost inevitable effect would be to create a dangerous precedent which, in time to come, would provide the federal government with a convenient means to gather unto itself legislative powers which the constitution has reserved exclusively to the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I am wondering why, with the inadequate means at my disposal, I have made so bold as to take part in this debate. I have found the means to do so in my conviction that the Liberal creed has as a basic tenet a claim to total autonomy for the national government in its own field and, at the same time, a claim to complete autonomy for the provinces. That is why I wish to warn the house against adopting this amendment which would create a precedent through which, I believe, the autonomy of the provinces would be forever threatened. I feel sure that in wishing to improve a certain state of affairs, the member for Winnipeg North has not considered all the consequences of his amendment. I would therefore ask him not to give up the object which he has in view, but to choose some other method whereby, while achieving it, he will not be creating the precedent which would otherwise follow its approval by this house.

(Text):

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to speak on this bill until I heard the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) lay down the law on the question of the jurisdiction of this parliament. I do not know what effect that hon. member had on members of the house who understand the law, or perhaps I should say who are trained in the law; but certainly his argument that this parliament cannot, if it wishes, pass the bill now being debated cannot be accepted as valid.

Then, the point he made in conjunction with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), that in the Hudson Bay mining case the province had given its consent, is surely not good law.

Mr. Mitchell: I should have said "at the request of the province".

Mr. MacInnis: Even "at the request of the province". It would be no more legal at the request of the province than if the province had not requested it. If it is a matter within the jurisdiction of a province, as I understand the British North America Act, the province cannot delegate its powers; otherwise a case could be taken into court at any time by any other government, because the government of Manitoba today may not be the government of Manitoba tomorrow. Consent of that kind by the province does not vary the provisions of the British North America Act.

The dominion government does do things not authorized under the British North America Act; but there are such things as assistance with old age pensions and payment of family allowances, matters concerning which no province nor any person within a province is going to raise an objection. When we had an issue such as unemployment insurance it was not only necessary to get the consent of the provinces; it was necessary to have an amendment to the British North America Act to confer upon the dominion government the right to establish unemployment insurance.

Mr. Mitchell: May I say this to my hon. friend—

Mr. MacInnis: The minister knows, if anything, less about the law than I do; and he may demonstrate his ignorance to the house in the time available to him, because I am sure it is the intention to talk the measure out. So will the minister kindly not interfere with me at the present time.

The point I am making is that while this may not be good legislation, yet it is legislation which it is certainly within the competence of the House of Commons to pass. Section 92, subsection 10, was quoted by the hon. member who preceded me. I could understand what he was quoting, but I could not understand what the arguments were which he based on it. Section 92 of the British North America Act sets out the exclusive powers of provincial legislatures and subsection 10 reads:

> (c) Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

It is competent for this parliament to pass legislation stating that any work is for the general advantage of Canada, and that is what the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) is asking this house to do. If this house does not wish to pass it, that is one thing; but it is sheer poppycock to say that this parliament has no right to pass it.

Mr. W. F. Carroll (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I did not have the pleasure of hearing the remarks of the hon. member who introduced this bill, but I think I can agree that the reasons for its introduction are perfectly legitimate and proper, that is, if the hon. member wants the labour laws of this country to be uniform as far as they affect those great industries which employ large numbers of work people. If that is his object, and I think it is, then I am in hearty agreement with him. The time has come, as a matter of fact it has long passed, when something should be done, either by amending the British North America Act or through other legislation, to give the Department of Labour at Ottawa jurisdiction in connection with labour difficulties and other labour matters affecting the large industries in this country, especially those which operate in more than one province.

I remember when I was chairman of a committee of this house which sat some years ago. Another member of that committee was a gentleman who has since passed away. He was a gentleman for whom I had the highest regard and I think he had some regard for me after we became acquainted. For years the provincial governments of our provinces —I refer to both Liberal and Conservative governments—had taken the stand, when a labour union or a group of men went to them to ask for the passage of laws with regard to the hours of labour in a particular industry, that that was a matter for the dominion parliament. Then when they would come to the dominion parliament they would be told that hours of labour and that sort of thing were matters over which the provincial legislatures had jurisdiction. Both governments were right, but the unfortunate thing was that the labour people of this country were led around for years in connection with the eight-hour day.

The late Mr. Woodsworth brought these facts to the attention of our committee and one of the recommendations of that committee was that a case be presented to the Supreme Court of Canada. Anyone who knew anything about the law knew what the law was, but there was a need to define the jurisdiction of the dominion and the provinces in connection with hours of labour. Unfortunately the minister of labour of that time combined with that reference a reference concerning matters which were under consultation at the Geneva conference. There was never any doubt that jurisdiction rested with the provincial legislatures concerning local matters and with this parliament concerning dominion matters such as railroads and so on.

I do not know whether the hon. gentleman who spoke last is a lawyer, but I am in agreement with him. I submit that this parliament has the jurisdiction to pass the bill introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. That power is given to this parliament by section 92, subsection 10, paragraph (c) of the British North America Act, which the hon. gentleman quoted. But even though this legislation is enacted I doubt if it would meet the intentions of the hon. member who has introduced it.

Section 92 outlines the exclusive powers of the legislatures of the provinces. The subsection quoted by the hon. gentleman gives this parliament the power to pass this legislation, but this parliament would have no right to hand over any civil rights. That cannot be done when it is purely a question of civil rights. There is another section in the British North America Act which I have often thought should be more widely used. I refer to section 94, which reads:

Notwithstanding anything in this act, the parliament of Canada may make provision for the uniformity of all or any of the laws relative to property and civil rights in Ontario, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and of the procedure of all or any of the courts in those three provinces, and from and after the passing of any act in that behalf the power of the parliament of Canada to make laws in relation to any matter comprised in any such act shall, notwithstanding anything in this act, be unrestricted; but any act of the parliament of Canada making provision for such uniformity shall not have effect in any province unless and until it is adopted and enacted as law by the legislature thereof.

After this act was passed there were four provinces; but the province of Quebec is not included under the act. In other words the province of Quebec was not given power even to adopt the laws on property and civil rights that might be passed and handed on by the parliament of Canada. There was very good reason for that. The civil law of the province of Quebec was not the same as the civil law of the other provinces, at least at that time.

When I was in this house previously, so many years ago that if I were to tell you how long you would think I was a decrepit old man, I had hopes of getting this parliament to pass legislation on civil rights as far as they concern labour, which would afford the provinces an opportunity of accepting and adopting those laws. In other words, I would have had parliament pass the law and let the provinces adopt it if they wished. It was always pointed out that after all this would not be such legislation as the creators of the British North America Act had in view, though I do not agree with that contention. Today, however, I believe it is still open to the parliament of Canada to pass a general labour law and let the provinces adopt that law if they wish to do so. Of course Quebec could not do that, because under the British North America Act it was not given power to adopt such legislation.

I am not opposing the principle of this bill, but I think the time must come when legislation will have to be passed to make the labour laws of this country uniform, not only with regard to the meat packing industry or any other special industry but with regard to all large industries that have their location in more than one province. That would be fair to labour and fairer still, I think, to industry if only they would look at it in the right way, though of course I do not know how they would look at legislation of this kind. But even if this parliament passed this bill tonight, I do not think we would achieve the purpose the hon. member has in mind. We have the jurisdictional power to pass such legislation. That is given in the very labour code which has been adopted by this house.

Paragraph (g) of section 53 cites verbatim the very words quoted by my hon. friend from the British North America Act. So I do not think there can be any doubt that parliament has the power, as far as legislative jurisdiction is concerned, to pass a bill of this kind tonight or any other time.

As I say, however, I do not believe the adoption of such legislation would meet the purpose—and it is a very good purpose—of the hon. gentleman who introduced the legislation. I do not think that would produce what he wants to produce. If the time comes when this government will undertake to consult the provinces in regard to matters over which the legislatures have jurisdiction in order to bring about some compromise, and if I am in this house, I shall be one hundred per cent behind the hon. member and others who may support such legislation. At the proper time I shall certainly be in favour of legislation that will bring all large industries doing business in more than one province under the jurisdiction of our labour code.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure we have all followed the argument of the hon. member with interest, and before he sits down I should like to ask one question. If as he contends the property and civil rights references in the British North America Act would prevent my colleague's amendment from becoming effective in the various provinces, why is it that the property and civil rights clauses do not prevent the labour code from applying to such an industry as our railways?

Mr. Carroll: Because the British North America Act gives this parliament jurisdiction over the railways of this country.

Mr. Knowles: The same section?

Mr. Carroll: The same section.

Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province.

Mr. MacInnis: If the hon. gentleman will permit another question, he has said that paragraphs (a) and (c) confer that right on this parliament—

Mr. Mitchell: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), whose deep knowledge of the law equals my own, has already spoken this evening. This is not cross-examination; this is a debate.

Mr. MacInnis: An hon. member can agree to answer questions.

Mr. Mitchell: Wait until we are in committee. My hon. friend has been here long enough to know the rules.

Mr. MacInnis: I know the rules, but you do not. You should be sitting down.

Mr. Mitchell: Well, wait a minute. I am raising a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: What is the point of order?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. friend did not want me to ask a question. We are not in committee.

Mr. MacInnis: What is your point of order?

Mr. Mitchell: My point of order is that you are out of order.

Mr. Carroll: I have no objection to answering what I could understand of the hon. gentleman's question. The difference is that the British North America Act did make provision concerning lines of steamships, telegraph companies, and so on, and in paragraph (c) gives this parliament power to make laws concerning other works.

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): I desire to say a few words in connection with this bill because in my riding of Vancouver South there are a number of packing plants, none of which are connected with what are commonly known as the big three. We have a number of small packing plants capable of producing perhaps twenty per cent of the meat consumed within the province of British Columbia. That being so I must say a word, because the amendment proposed would apply only to those plants operating in more than one province. The plants in my riding operate entirely within British Columbia, and I can envisage a situation where industrial relations and disputes may come under two separate authorities and two sets of rules, with at least two different kinds of trouble as a result.

I believe the inevitable tendency of this amendment would be to give the aura and panoply of a public utility to the meat packing industry. In the province of British Columbia we have recently had some experience with public utilities and we are going to have more in the future. My friends on the other side of the house may have a great deal of confidence in public utilities, but I am not as sure that I have as much today as I used to have. Public utilities can go before a commission—I know this is the attitude in the province of British Columbia—and say they have spent the money and can prove it; therefore, they require higher rates. I doubt very much if that attitude is in the public interest because they are, in sum and substance, providing a cost-plus service to the people who are in a wholly competitive business.

In this particular instance I can say that I doubt very much if the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) is endeavouring to make more money for the packing plants. Probably he is thinking of labour. I can foresee a situation arising in which this bill would prove to be against the interests of labour. I doubt if you can apply labour relations on a nation-wide basis. One can easily envision circumstances where a particular—

An hon. Member: Railroads.

Mr. Laing: Yes, I know, railroads—where a particular packing plant in the province of British Columbia would be in a position to offer its men higher wages than a packing plant in another section of Canada. Owing to the inability of the plant where profits are not so high to meet this demand, that plant would hold out against the payment of higher wages and thus prevent the payment of higher wages in the plant prepared to grant them. I believe there is a good deal of advantage in leaving the packing plants on a basis of locality.

In the future, I believe we shall have to provide a new formula for public utilities because I doubt very much if the attitude of many public utilities today is in the public interest when they operate on a cost plus basis and say to the public, "We require more money because we can prove we have spent that money". This bill would probably harm those people it is intended to assist. I believe it would lead to a tremendous amount of confusion in a province where, in the plants which I have enumerated in my riding, they would still be subject to provincial regulations in industrial relations. The plants involved account for a considerable portion of our supply. We shall be wise indeed, particularly in respect to food, if we permit the widest possible play of economic and competitive forces. I doubt very much if this bill is designed to ensure that in the future.

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): In participating in this debate, I cannot help recalling a somewhat similar bill, which was introduced in another legislature in this country in the early part of the year. It did not prove to be very popular. It gave rise to the objections of organized labour as well as a good many other groups across the province of Quebec, as a result of which the bill had to be withdrawn. There is a certain amount of similarity between these two bills.

The bill to which I have just referred had for its purpose the taking away from organized labour of important rights and privileges which they had fought persistently throughout the years to acquire. The purpose of the bill was to vest in the provincial government those rights and privileges which were the property of organized labour. In Bill No. 5, which we are discussing now, there is a definite attempt to take from the provinces certain rights and prerogatives which the provinces have enjoyed since we have had a written constitution in this country. I believe this is a very dangerous bill, because if it passes it will set a precedent for similar bills. These would be presented on behalf of industries in this country as important as the meat packing industry.

I share the fear voiced by certain speakers who preceded me that the whole matter would wind up in the courts. If this measure submitted by the member for Winnipeg North were placed on our statute books I believe i would be declared ultra vires.

On motion of Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we wil take up the resolution in the name of th Minister of Transport, No. 12 on today's orde paper; Bills Nos. 8 and 9, an act to amen the Exchequer Court Act and an act t amend the Department of Justice Act. Som time during the day we will go into suppl and take up the estimates, commencing wit the estimates of the Department of Agri culture.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standin order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

September 30, 1949

The house met at three o'clock.

THE PRIME MINISTER

ANNOUNCEMENT OF DECISION TO ESTABLISH OFFICIAL RESIDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I should like to mention a subject that is in the minds of members of parliament, and, I believe, a large section of the public. My subject is a permanent home in Ottawa for Canada's prime ministers. Canada is one of the few countries that does not have an official residence for its prime minister. Most of us realize the difficulty of a prime minister, coming to Ottawa for an uncertain tenure, in obtaining the type of house suitable to the high office he holds.

Some years ago the government purchased the Edwards property, which is located on the banks of the Ottawa river adjacent to the French embassy. The government purchased the property without any particular purpose in mind. At the moment it is rented to the Australian high commissioner and used as a legation. The lease on the property expires on the first of November. Today the government, acting in the absence of the Prime Minister, has decided to ask parliament to make it possible to rehabilitate the house by making provision for the cost of alterations, repairs and future maintenance. If there is no serious opposition to this program, the house will be asked, in the estimates for 1950, to provide funds for the required repairs, alterations and future maintenance of that property as a home for Canada's prime minister.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Shortly before the opening of this sitting, Mr. Speaker, I was informed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce of the government's decision to make arrangements for an official residence for Canada's prime ministers. I feel sure the decision is one which will meet with the general approval of the members of this house and of citizens in every part of Canada. Members of parliament know—it may not be known generally throughout the rest of the country—the extent to which the Prime Minister of Canada is called upon to receive official visitors. Certain duties which are essential to that high office should be a part of the responsibility of the state.

I am not in a position to give any opinion as to the particular residence mentioned. I do wish to express our satisfaction that the Prime Minister will have the opportunity of carrying on his official duties and receiving official visitors in a manner more in keeping with Canada's present position in world affairs. These visits of important and distinguished visitors are no mere social engagements. They are part of world development in one of the most important periods of history. The fact that in these days Ottawa should be visited by so many of the leaders of other nations is in itself evidence of the importance that Canada has assumed in the minds of the governments of other countries. It will assist the Prime Minister of Canada, not only in receiving those important visitors but in carrying out his own heavy personal duties, to have a permanent home, where, as the elected head of the government of Canada, he can discharge his responsibilities in a manner that will be in keeping with the status of Canada in the world today.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that the announcement was made this afternoon that a home will be provided for the prime ministers of Canada. I am also grateful to the Minister of Trade and Commerce for mentioning this matter before the opening of this sitting, because I can now speak not only for myself, but for my colleagues, whom I have had an opportunity to consult.

The house that has been chosen is beautifully situated on the Ottawa river. I am sure that visitors to Canada who are entertained there will appreciate the beauty of the city more than they would if they were housed in a hotel in the heart of the city. I know where the house is, and I know something about it. Several times since the minister spoke about this matter, I have wondered whether the government might not be well advised to build a new house, with modern conveniences, and perhaps more suitable for the purpose in mind, instead of reconditioning or rebuilding the interior of an old house. I hope the government may give some consideration to this suggestion.

I am glad that the Prime Minister is to be suitably housed; and I hope that we in this parliament may all co-operate to the end that all the Canadian people, both rural and urban, may be suitably housed.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): It gives me considerable satisfaction, Mr. Speaker, to be able to say on behalf of our group in the house that we welcome the announcement which has been made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am not acquainted with the particular property he has mentioned, but I am sure the government has made investigations and knows whether it would be better to build a new house or to recondition the old one.

While the government is making provision for a home for the Prime Minister, I think they should consider also the question of furnishing adequate recompense for him by way of indemnity. The prime ministers of this country have been notoriously underpaid. Over the years they have been called upon to make sacrifices far beyond the measure of the services they have given to the country.

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): As all of the prime ministers since confederation—Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Robert Borden, Lord Bennett and Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King—have lived in my riding, I think it is only fitting that the permanent home of the prime minister of Canada should remain in Ottawa East. I am thankful to the government for its decision.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): As the one who first mentioned this matter in the house this year, Mr. Speaker, I am sure I express the gratitude of those who, in debate, urged that this very step be taken. I assume that this residence will be for any prime minister, the leader, male or female, of any government party.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE

DEVALUATION OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—EFFECT ON PRICE OF CLASS II WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Have class II Canadian wheat prices been altered following the government's action in devaluing the Canadian dollar? If so, what is the change in price?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Class II wheat is wheat sold outside the contract with the government of the United Kingdom, and outside the international wheat agreement. The price of Canadian wheat is the world price, adjusted to the value of the Canadian dollar. When the Canadian dollar was devalued, the price of class II wheat increased by roughly ten per cent.

Mr. Green: In other words the price was brought up as though the Canadian dollar were at par with the United States dollar?

Mr. Howe: That is correct.

Mr. Green: Can the minister give us an assurance that such action will not retard the sale of this Canadian wheat?

Mr. Howe: So far as I know, all wheat moving to class II countries is on the same price level. There are not many countries buying class II wheat today. I believe there are some thirty countries within the international wheat agreement, and those countries purchase wheat under the terms of the agreement. United Kingdom transactions are covered by a bilateral contract. It is only to countries outside the wheat agreement that sales of class II wheat are made. We have made sales of class II wheat in considerable volume this year, and I know of nothing in the revaluation that would change the situation. It is still as cheap as any other wheat.

DEVALUATION OF POUND STERLING—NEWSPRINT TRADE WITH BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. What steps are being taken by the government to offset the ill effects of devaluation of sterling on our newsprint trade with Britain, and to prevent the switch of Britain's newsprint imports from Canada to soft-currency Scandinavian countries?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The strongest possible representations have been made to the authorities in the United Kingdom as to the desirability of continuing the purchase of newsprint in Canada. British members of the United Kingdom-Canada continuing committee on trade have just left Canada. While they were here we placed the situation before them as strongly as we could. While we appreciate the right of the government of the United Kingdom to spend their dollars as they think best, we are hopeful that the trade in newsprint that has been going on for many years will continue under the present situation.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

FOOTBALL—TORONTO ARGONAUTS AND OTTAWA ROUGH RIDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Is it true that the R.C.M.P. have reported that the ancient weapons used by the Argonauts to stampede the Alouettes are considered to be obsolete and extremely hazardous if used against the devastating attack of the supercharging Rough Riders tomorrow?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the special committee on government annuities, promised by the minister on June 30, 1948, be set up at this session?

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell (Minister of Labour): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no.

Mr. Knowles: Another broken promise.

Mr. Mitchell: It is all right for my hon. friend to say that, Mr. Speaker; but when it comes to promises, I think he has the world licked, including this House of Commons.

OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION ACT

CORPORATION TO TAKE OVER PROPERTY AND EQUIPMENT OF MARCONI AND CABLE AND WIRELESS LIMITED

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to establish under the direction of the Minister of Transport a corporation to be called Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation to take over the property and equipment of Canadian Marconi Company, Limited, and Cable and Wireless, Limited, used in connection with the external communication services. These communication services to be operated by the corporation and co-ordinated with the serices of other parts of the commonwealth.

The Minister of Finance with the approval of the governor in council to be authorized to pay to the corporation out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund an amount not exceeding in the aggregate four and one-half million dollars and in addition thereto such moneys as may be appropriated by parliament for the capital purposes of the corporation.

The Minister of Finance with the approval of the governor in council to be authorized to lend, from time to time, moneys to the corporation out of unappropriated moneys of the consolidated revenue fund, for temporary purposes, the aggregate outstanding at any time not to exceed $100,000.

The amount of losses suffered by the corporation in any year to be paid to the corporation from moneys appropriated by parliament for that purpose.

The amount of the profits realized by the corporation in any year to be paid to the Receiver General of Canada.

Mr. Green: Will the minister make a statement explaining this proposed measure?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. I thought the proper place to make it was on second reading, but I am prepared to make it at this stage.

In a statement to the house on November 8, 1945, concerning commonwealth communications, the then acting prime minister stated that the Canadian government had indicated its willingness to nationalize external telecommunication services—in other words to acquire the overseas telecommunication facilities owned and operated in Canada by the Canadian Marconi Company, Limited, and Cable and Wireless, Limited.

I think perhaps I should here give the house a brief outline of the history of external telecommunications. The present organization of these services goes back to 1928, when the position created by the competition between the beam wireless telegraph services and the submarine cable telegraph services came under review by the Imperial Wireless and Cable Conference, 1928.

The recommendations of the conference were approved by the governments of the commonwealth, and as a result two companies were formed: one, a merger company owning practically all the shares of the old cable companies and the Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company; the other, now known as Cable and Wireless, Limited, an operating company owning all the communication assets of the merger company, certain cables previously owned by the governments of the commonwealth, and a lease of the beam wireless stations in the United Kingdom then owned by the United Kingdom post office. At the same time there was established a communications advisory committee—now the commonwealth communications council—a body which included representatives of the dominion and which was given certain powers of control over policy and rates. This committee was the official means of communications between the various governments and the company.

Soon after the formation of Cable and Wireless, Limited, operating difficulties became apparent. There was serious contraction in international trade in 1930, and in addition the company had to face foreign competition, particularly from new wireless telegraph services. These difficulties led to a review of the relationship between Cable and Wireless, Limited, and the governments of the commonwealth, and certain changes were made in the operational and financial arrangements.

Coming down to the war years, I should mention that direct radio circuits were established between the United States and many parts of the commonwealth. Such circuits were opened on the understanding that their operation was limited to the duration of the war, but it later became evident that it would be inexpedient to close them, notwithstanding the fact that their retention would result in a loss of revenue to the commonwealth cable and radio circuits.

The problems which had arisen were considered at the commonwealth telegraph conference held in Australia, and later by the commonwealth communications council at a meeting in 1944. The view of the council was that the needs of the commonwealth telecommunications system were not being adequately served, and that there should be a change in the organization. Companies existed in the dominions and India; nevertheless the main instrument of commonwealth telecommunications was Cable and Wireless, Limited, a United Kingdom company owning a substantial interest in the capital of local companies. The council felt it was essential that the dominions and India should have a greater share in the administration of the commonwealth telecommunications system with a view to building it up as a whole on both cable and wireless sides. It was also felt that a company with obligations to private shareholders might not be in a position to provide a service which would fully satisfy public needs and strategic requirements.

Early in 1945 Lord Reith, on behalf of the United Kingdom government, visited the dominions and India to explain the point of view of the British government. Following these discussions the commonwealth telecommunications conference was held in London in 1945, and the conference unanimously recommended public ownership of the overseas telecommunication services of all the commonwealth governments. Pursuant to this recommendation the United Kingdom government purchased all the shares of Cable and Wireless Limited which it did not already own, and subsequently an agreement, designated as the "over-all agreement", and now known as the commonwealth telegraphs agreement, was signed in London on May 11, 1948, by representatives of each of the commonwealth governments, referred to in the agreement as the partner governments.

The agreement provided, in part, that each partner government in whose territory a local company is operating external telecommunication services shall purchase all the shares in the local company or otherwise acquire the local company's undertaking; that for the purpose of acquiring the local assets and of operating and maintaining its external telecommunication services each partner government shall either nominate an existing department or other body or establish a public corporation having the powers necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the agreement, such agency being referred to in the agreement as "the national body"; and that for the purpose of promoting the efficiency and development of the external telecommunication services of the commonwealth there shall be established a body known as the commonwealth telecommunications board.

The functions of this board will be mainly advisory, but substantially wider than those of the commonwealth communications council which it replaces, and including: (a) the formulation of joint telecommunication policy, including rates; (b) the co-ordination and development of the wireless and cable systems of the commonwealth; (c) the co-ordination with the appropriate authorities of telecommunication matters affecting the defence of the commonwealth; (d) the co-ordination and conduct of research; (e) negotiations with foreign telecommunication interests, if requested to undertake these by the commonwealth governments.

Cable and Wireless, Limited, was transferred to public ownership of the United Kingdom under the Cable and Wireless Act effective January 1, 1947, with the share capital of the company transferred to the United Kingdom government. The company will remain in being as a government-owned company and will continue to own the assets and operate the telecommunication services outside the United Kingdom apart from those to be operated by the respective national bodies of the partner governments. The commonwealth telegraphs bill which was presented to the United Kingdom parliament on February 1, 1949, provides for the establishment of the commonwealth telecommunications board and for the transfer of the assets of Cable and Wireless, Limited, in the United Kingdom to the United Kingdom general post office, its national body, effective April 1, 1950.

The governments of Australia, New Zealand and South Africa have already passed the necessary legislation to establish their national bodies. Southern Rhodesia took over operation of its external telecommunication services on April 1, 1949, and India on January 1, 1947, while the policy of the governments in Pakistan and Ceylon has not yet been decided.

Canada has approved the financial arrangements under the "over-all agreement", based on the wayleave scheme as recommended by a conference of financial experts from the commonwealth countries, including Canada, held in London in October, 1947, on the understanding that final acceptance will be conditional upon acceptance by all commonwealth governments concerned.

In brief, these arrangements call for, first, each country to retain all receipts on originating traffic, less out-payments to carrier companies handling such traffic other than carriers of the national bodies; second, each national body to make payments towards the expenses of the commonwealth telecommunications board, based on the proportion of its receipts to the total net receipts of all national bodies; third, each national body to make wayleave payments to the central board towards the over-all expenses of maintaining and operating all common user cable and radio services of the commonwealth telecommunications system, based on the proportion of its net receipts to the total receipts of all national bodies.

Under the wayleave scheme, the Canadian body, namely, the proposed Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, the establishment of which is provided for in the bill to be brought down, will, according to figures made available by the commonwealth communications council, based on 1947 traffic volume, show an annual profit of approximately $50,000. My technical officers are inclined to put this estimate at a higher figure. I might add that the financial effects of the wayleave scheme are to be reviewed by the central body immediately after figures for one year's operations are available from all national bodies.

The resolution now presented to the house can, I believe, be divided into five heads, which provide, first of all, for the establishment of a corporation to be known as the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, which will take over the telecommunication assets of Cable and Wireless, Limited, together with those of Canadian Marconi Company, Limited.

The object, too, of the corporation will be to operate these telecommunication services not only in this country but also in co-operation and in co-ordination with other commonwealth countries. The second part of the resolution provides for funds for this purpose. As stipulated there, they are not to exceed the sum of $4,500,000. It also provides for working capital.

The third part of the resolution provides for loans which may be made to the corporation from time to time, none of which on any occasion shall exceed the sum of $100,000. The two remaining paragraphs provide, first, for losses which may be made by the corporation, such losses to be voted by parliament, and, second, for payment to the Receiver General of Canada of profits which may be made by the corporation.

If the house so desired, I would be prepared to make any further remarks when the bill is presented. I understand in the resolution stage it is not the custom to debate the measure at length, and perhaps I might limit my remarks at the present time to what I have just said.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before going into committee, at which time questions may better be asked, perhaps I might direct one or two questions to the minister. He may indicate whether he would prefer to give the information now, or when the bill reaches the committee stage.

Mr. Chevrier: I would prefer to give it in committee on the resolution, if I may.

Mr. Drew: Then I shall defer my questions until we reach the committee stage.

May I point out that the presentation of this resolution follows a course which has been followed in every one of the dominions, with the exception of Pakistan and Ceylon. It is in keeping with the conference held in 1945, as has been pointed out by the minister.

I think it would be more appropriate if I were to say at this time, rather than when the bill is in committee, that when a corresponding bill was before the House of Commons at Westminster—and that, of course, is the bill which creates the largest segment of this integrated organization—a special committee was set up to examine the consequences of the bill and to make recommendations in relation thereto.

It would seem to me most desirable that a special committee be appointed when this bill is presented, so that before the House of Commons is called upon to deal with it there may be an opportunity to go into certain of the questions which arise in connection with this operation. By way of illustration, the Canadian Marconi Company operates broadcasting stations CFCF and CFCF-FM in Montreal, and also short wave station CFCX. I should think members of the House of Commons might well have some opportunity to secure the advice of a committee appointed to consider that and other incidental results flowing from a decision of this kind. I put the proposal forward now so that the government may give it consideration before the bill is presented to the house.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the action now proposed is being taken more or less to consolidate this kind of service in the commonwealth. I hope, however, that the house will look into the financial structure of these organizations and give careful attention to the balance sheets of the companies, particularly the Canadian Marconi Company, which we propose to take over.

I have in mind the fact that from time to time when we have taken over an enterprise and placed it under public ownership we have been forced to become the owners of these facilities because of bankruptcy on the part of private enterprise in the operation of the services in question. The outstanding example of that in the history of Canada was the taking over of the systems which now comprise the Canadian National Railways. We should, therefore, guard the country against any overpayment.

I have looked at the amount mentioned in the resolution, and also at the records of the companies. When the matter comes before the house I hope hon. members will give careful consideration to this phase of the proposal made by the minister. I am not suggesting that the initial amount of $4,500,000 set out in the resolution is too great, although it may be. But the further amount that will be paid should be scrutinized carefully by the house in order that we may be protected from anything of the kind that happened after the last war in connection with our railway system.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a word to what has been said by my leader (Mr. Coldwell). The one point in the measure which concerns me is the balance sheet of Canadian Marconi Company, Limited. I was checking this afternoon in Moody's, and I find that last year this company, which we now propose to take over, lost $408,000. In 1946 it lost $115,000. During the past year its current assets dropped by $468,000, and it had only $36,000 cash on hand. Moody's also points out that the shares dropped from $6 to $1.25. This company last year had a bank overdraft of $2,523,000; a year ago it was $2,300,000. Accounts payable accrued are $529,000. Among the assets are included patents with a valuation of $1,863,000—which may or may not be a fictitious valuation. I should like the minister to state whether or not the government is paying for those patents.

I agree that in principle this may be a sound scheme, but I am wondering whether the government is buying a lemon. If the company's profit and loss continue as they have been for the last several years, the question may be asked whether this will be a good thing. If the company fails, then the government will start screaming that social enterprise did not work, that the company did not last because it was owned by the government.

Mr. Howe: Social enterprise owns it now, since it is owned by the government of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member for Moose Jaw is destroying his own argument.

Mr. Thatcher: I should like the minister to be explicit about some of these details, because the record of the Canadian Marconi Company has not been good over the past several years. Why is it that every time a company gets into difficulties the government has to pull it out?

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I am not altogether happy about this resolution. I know it is not unusual for resolutions to be brought down in the earlier part of a session, but there was no mention of this matter in the speech from the throne. I realize that the speech from the throne does not contain the details of all the legislation the government intends to bring down during the session, but it does seem to me that the taking over of a corporation of this size, and one which is of international importance, should warrant mention in the speech from the throne; so that hon. members would have been given ample time to think about it. We have not said a great deal about this resolution, and I fancy the reason is that we are not prepared to do so.

Mr. Chevrier: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman and ask him to consult page 15 of Votes and Proceedings, where he will find that in the speech from the throne there is mention of this bill to incorporate the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation?

Mr. Hansell: I am sorry that that particular point escaped my notice.

We are deciding now whether or not it is expedient to bring down this measure. We all know that the further along any measure goes, the more difficult it is to turn it down. If it is a dangerous thing, the best thing to do is to turn it down before it gets too far. I am not saying that it is dangerous; it might be the best thing in the world to pass a measure of this kind, but I do say that we are being asked to do it when we have only a little information.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) referred to the financial position of this company as set out in the volume he had in his hand. It might appear that the company is going broke, and it might appear to some that that is private enterprise for you.

Mr. Thatcher: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hansell: The hon. member for Moose Jaw says "hear, hear", but let me remind him that if it is private enterprise that is going broke, it is a good thing because the taxpayers will not have to foot the bill. If the government takes it over it will not go broke, because no government institution goes broke. Government institutions do not have to show profits, and if they do show a loss it does not matter because the taxpayers will come to their rescue. It is all right to say that eventually the country will go broke when the sources of taxation dry up—

Mr. Blackmore: They are drying up now.

Mr. Hansell: The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) says they are drying up now. In that case the country would go broke if its wealth were based on financial considerations; but that is not the true criterion for measuring a nation's wealth.

While a government corporation ostensibly may be responsible to parliament, it always feels that it can call upon parliament or the people to cover any losses. That is the thing I do not like about government enterprises. There is just too much of that sort of thing. I trust that this company is not being taken over because it is going broke. If it is being taken over so that greater service can be rendered to the commonwealth, that would be a different matter. But even then, if their solvency were involved they could always call upon the taxpayers, and that is what I do not like.

I hope that this matter will be gone into thoroughly and no stone left unturned until we get all the information, until we know where the people of Canada through their responsible government are heading in and heading out.

Mr. T. L. Church (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the house to one or two matters relating to this important resolution.

The war broke out in 1939, and after ten years—six of war and four of the aftermath of war—the government want to make a change, although they were satisfied during that period with the present method of external communication.

Originally there was a code. The idea of making a change started when the war broke out, because of the code used. I referred to that the other night in connection with the Statute of Westminster. There is a difference between the old system and the new one. When the war broke out, what did they have? For two and a half years the dominions were the only countries behind the mother country, and they had a code system. The government had the right to make rules and regulations as to the code. After two and a half years of war, during which Great Britain and the dominions worked together, they decided to adopt a new code because of the entry of the United States into the conflict.

I have been reading extensively about this whole matter, and it arises out of the statute I have named. In the first place there are external communication services by other means. The radio is used extensively for external communication, so much so that there is a radiotelephone system between Canada and the old country. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the British Broadcasting Corporation have the right to make rules and regulations as to their code, and today it has been expanded.

You will notice the change in the resolution. There used to be a federal censor in charge of this work. He was the man who typed the code and told them what they could do. Often during the war the censor prevented certain information from being given out in Canada. The information was held back, and even the House of Commons did not know about it. We were told that we could get some information in a secret session, but I did not attend for the reason I gave at that time—that I thought there would be nothing revealed that the Soviet did not know already.

Now they are adding something new. I must say that the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has been obliging in any contacts I have had with him. But this is going to be a political organization, and I am not using the word "political" in any offensive way so far as the minister is concerned. I have a great deal of confidence in the present minister. I had a lot to do with him during the war. I am not using the word in any personal sense, but because every minister of the crown is more or less in politics. The present Minister of Trade and Commerce did a lot of good work during the war, but this new corporation is to have vast powers over the property and equipment of Canadian Marconi Company, Limited, and Cable and Wireless, Limited, used in connection with external communication services. In the words of the resolution, these communication services are to be operated by the new corporation and they are to be co-ordinated with the services of other parts of the commonwealth. There is no definition of the word "co-ordinated". I linked this matter the other evening with the Statute of Westminster. As you know, some of the former commonwealth countries are now out of the empire—India, Pakistan, Burma, Ceylon. Seven or eight of them are now out of the empire. They do not belong any more; they are separate organizations, so that this resolution will not apply to them.

You will notice that the Minister of Transport can also make rules and regulations for the corporation. A corporation is to be created called the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation. It is to take over certain property and equipment. Without being subject to any censor at all, the minister is going to have the right to make rules and regulations.

I call your attention to another matter about the new code. The resolution reads, "co-ordinated with the services of other parts of the commonwealth." The Statute of Westminster does not apply in the same way to all parts of the commonwealth. For example, sections 6 to 13 of that statute did not apply to New Zealand and Australia until trouble arose about it over the dollar and the pound sterling and so forth. It is just as I said the other evening. Nevertheless the minister will be able to make rules and regulations.

There are other bodies that deal with external communication services. I have mentioned radio. Everybody knows what the radio corporation does. It takes quite a part in handling external communication services. In conjunction with the B.B.C., the C.B.C. has a code, and there is the power to make rules and regulations. I do not know where it is all going to end. In my view the resolution is simply an extension of the separatist policy of autonomy and sovereignty. That is all it amounts to. It is an extension of that principle which has caused so much trouble in the countries of the empire, and we do not know now who is in the empire and who is out of it.

The resolution proposes to co-ordinate the Canadian service with the services of other parts of the commonwealth. There are embassies all over the world. No wonder we are a separate country. We have ambassadors in the countries all over the seven seas, and the old empire is divided. They are all spending money. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), in a very witty speech, referred to these ambassadors as "so-called ambassadors", and the then member for Davenport said, "So-called is right."

Now you will have all these ambassadors in the countries all over the seven seas making use of the code. There will be different codes, and you will not know who is in the empire. These ambassadors learn only by experience. They also have codes for communication in matters of external affairs. They all want to be ahead of the king and the queen in the procession. They are, as the hon. member for Temiscouata said last year, akin to the undertaker who is first in the procession, or the drum major who leads the band in the royal procession.

I fail to see any necessity for such a measure as this at the present time. Ten years after the beginning of the war you want to co-ordinate these services. Part of the resolution reads:

> The Minister of Finance with the approval of the governor in council to be authorized to lend, from time to time, moneys to the corporation out of unappropriated moneys of the consolidated revenue fund, for temporary purposes, the aggregate outstanding at any time not to exceed $100,000.

If you ask me, this is a new policy, appropriating $4,500,000 for these services. I can tell you this, it is another form of separation akin to that of autonomy and sovereignty.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not rise to make any extended comment upon the principle of the resolution. I should like, however, to make some brief references to the two statements made in this house this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). I am sure the house listened to their statements with some interest because it must have seemed strange to most of us to hear those statements from people who hold such a belief in the principle of nationalization. Now, when the question of nationalization arises in what is admitted to be a public utility, it is strange there should be such grave questions raised from the socialists themselves. Apparently their belief in the idea of socialism has some exceptions and their approach is rather selective to the principle of nationalization.

Then, we heard some rather scathing references to the weak financial position of this company. Session after session we have heard these same people denounce profit; profit, according to them, is something inherently wicked. Now when we have a company that has no profits, this company is held up as the sort with which those people who believe in nationalization should have nothing to do. This company is in a very poor financial position. There does not seem to be much consistency in their position, but if we wait for consistency from the socialists, we will be waiting here a long time. I could not help making these observations. So many attacks have been made on companies with profits and now here is a company without those wicked profits. It seems to me this is a field which is often regarded as the natural object for nationalization, namely, a public utility, and yet the socialists are warning us against nationalizing this company because it has none of these wicked profits.

Mr. Thatcher: I am sure the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) wants to be fair both to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and to myself. We said we agreed with the principle of this bill. We prefaced our remarks with that statement.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): I realize the difficulty we sometimes have in the committee of the whole as to whether our questions are proper. I have no right to question the minister at this stage, but at the appropriate time I should like him to give a full explanation of the implications in this bill. I am almost totally ignorant of overseas telecommunications. I am sure the house will agree that is not the only thing upon which I am in complete ignorance. Does it follow that one of the objects of the bill is to create a government monopoly in this field? I should like to know why we are taking over this company. Is it because present facilities are not sufficient? Is it for safety, so that in matters of defence we may have control over telecommunications? In the net result, does it mean we are creating a monopoly in this field?

I am not going to enter the argument which has been raised, but it seems to me this subject is quite important. When we come to the bill itself, it seems to me it requires examination from a committee dealing with the financial aspects and the necessity for doing this at all. I can think of reasons why it should be done. It is my opinion these things should be made very clear to us. I believe the proper time and place to do that is in a committee of the house where we may examine witnesses who are engaged or have been engaged in this business as well as officers of the department who have had to deal with it.

I hope the minister will remember I am not suggesting he is withholding anything, but I am suggesting he should give us full details, first, as to why we want it; second, as to the result that may be achieved or may flow in the event the bill is passed. There is no implied criticism; all I am seeking is full information and I think the house and the people are entitled to that. After all, $4,500,000 is not peanuts, although in comparison with other large sums it is not large. Still, it is a substantial sum of money.

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I would hope the government is going into this business because it cannot help itself. It seems to me we are operating enough businesses at the moment. I do not think the government is going into this particular field because it desires to control more enterprises in Canada.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I did not suggest they were; I am asking for information.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): The Pacific terminus of this cable is in my constituency, and naturally a number of my constituents are employees of Cable and Wireless, Limited. When we reach the committee stage, I trust the minister will be able to give me an assurance that their working conditions will not be worsened by reason of the government taking over the company.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might deal with some of the difficulties that seem to arise in the minds of hon. members. In the statement which I made at the outset, I believe, will be found most of the answers to the questions that have arisen. There appears to be a misapprehension in the minds of some of the members as to what is to be done. It may be that the statement I have prepared was not a clear one. I shall attempt to elaborate.

In the first place, this resolution which precedes the bill for the establishment of the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation is made pursuant to an international convention. I could go into the history of the telecommunication services from 1928 to date, but that would be somewhat lengthy and it already appears in the statement. After 1928 difficulties in connection with telecommunication services arose in the commonwealth countries owing to competition between beam wireless circuits and cable circuits. The handling of messages by beam was far cheaper than those by cable. I believe I can put it succinctly when I say that about that time it cost twenty-five cents per word to send a message by cable, whereas it cost eighteen cents to send it by beam.

One or the other of these companies was going out of business. So the United Kingdom decided that the best thing to do was to form a merger company. That led to dissatisfaction among certain of the commonwealth countries, so they convened at a number of international conferences, one in 1942 in Australia, where the commonwealth communications council was set up, and that met in 1944. In 1945 Lord Reith, of the United Kingdom government, came to Canada and other commonwealth countries to survey the position and to ascertain what were the views in the various commonwealth countries. In the same year a commonwealth telecommunications conference was called in London, and it was there that an agreement was made to which this country and the other commonwealth countries, namely Australia, New Zealand, India, Southern Rhodesia and the United Kingdom, became signatories. The agreement provided two things: (1) that the commonwealth countries should, just as quickly as it is possible to do so, nationalize the telecommunication services within their own territories; and (2) that there should be established what was known as a commonwealth telecommunications board which would act as an advisory board to the various commonwealth countries and co-ordinate the telecommunication services. At an international commonwealth telecommunications conference in 1945 we agreed to do this. We signed the agreement.

While this legislation seems to have been a matter of some surprise to one hon. member, I think it was mentioned not only in the speech from the throne of this session but also in the speech from the throne in the previous session of 1949. I therefore do not think there is a great deal to be said in favour of anyone's being taken by surprise any more than one is taken by surprise when a matter is brought before the house on the first occasion.

I realize that this is a matter of great technicality. While the hon. member for Calgary West says that he does not understand a great deal about it, I can assure him that it is not an easy matter to understand. I do not understand all the things that I should like to understand about it because many parts of it are highly technical and are not very readily comprehensible. As I go along, however, I shall attempt to clarify things as much as I can for the committee.

To come back to the apprehension which seems to be in the minds of the members, that this is a lemon that we are taking over, may I say in the first place that the resolution proposes to take over the assets of Cable and Wireless, Limited, and to take over the telecommunication assets of Canadian Marconi Company. The assets which it is proposed to take over are a wireless receiving station at Yamachiche, Quebec, a wireless transmitting station at Drummondville, Quebec, together with the Marconi building in the city of Montreal. That has nothing to do with the broadcasting stations of the Canadian Marconi Company; it has nothing to do with the industrial or manufacturing end of the Canadian Marconi Company; nor has it anything to do with the overdraft which was mentioned. This is not a lemon which is being bought. On the contrary, these are assets that have value.

I am informed that the telecommunications end of Canadian Marconi have shown, for the year 1948, a profit of approximately $100,000.

Mr. Fraser: Net or gross?

Mr. Chevrier: This is a net profit of $100,000. This is therefore in no sense a liability. I would be tempted to say something to my hon. friend about the criticism he levelled at Cable and Wireless, Limited, but I do not want to follow the example of the hon. member for Eglinton. Suffice it for me to say that the shares of Cable and Wireless, Limited are owned by the United Kingdom government and I think the majority of the shares of Canadian Marconi Company, Limited, are also owned by the British government—certainly fifty per cent if not seventy-five per cent or more. I will find out the exact situation when the bill is before the house.

Mr. Thatcher: Will the minister say they are taking over no liabilities whatever of either of these companies?

Mr. Chevrier: No, none at all. I would say that we are certainly not taking over any liabilities. I think the hon. member for Calgary West asked a number of pertinent questions. He first asked why we are taking this business over. The answer is that we are committed to do so by a commonwealth telecommunications agreement signed by the various countries. We are taking this over because we agreed to do so at the convention and because it has already been announced in the house by the Acting Prime Minister; I believe the announcement was made some time in 1945. Why are we taking it over? Again, we are taking it over because it was decided at that international conference that, in order to further co-ordinate telecommunications in the commonwealth, it would be far better if our country nationalized the assets of this service. It was asked whether the bill would create a monopoly. My reply is no, the bill will not create a monopoly. The result to be achieved, I hope, will be one where some profit can be shown. I do not mean only monetary profit; I mean profit from the point of view of benefit to the commonwealth countries, and that is from the defence angle as well. That certainly was the intention of those who signed this agreement in London. I hope there will also be profit in the financial sense. The advice that I have from the technical officers in the department is that it is hoped that a substantial operating profit can be made in this corporation.

Mr. Drew: A number of questions arise in connection with this matter, but I should like to take up right away one point mentioned by the Minister of Transport. He said that this would not create a monopoly. As I understand it, Cable and Wireless, Limited, through their holding company, control about eighty per cent of the world's cable communications. If that is the case, I should think that this would come as close to creating a monopoly within the commonwealth as it is possible to imagine. I should like to ask the minister what observations he has to make upon that part of this transaction.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not in a position to say whether Cable and Wireless, Limited, control eighty per cent of the world's telecommunication services.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt the minister, but I would point out to him that I did not say "telecommunication services". I said "cable communications". This resolution includes both cables and wireless, does it not?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it does. I do not want to challenge that statement, but I would be surprised if that were the case. In any event, whether it is or is not the case, the Anglo-American Cable Company and Commercial Cable Company are in direct competition with both Cable and Wireless, Limited and Canadian Marconi Company, Limited, so there is no danger of a monopoly. From what I understand, in the international field exclusive of the commonwealth field there are telecommunication services, both wireless and cable, that are quite strong and quite competitive in these services.

Mr. Drew: What effect does this have on the arrangements that are now in existence between Canadian Pacific Telegraphs and the Canadian Marconi?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think it affects Canadian Pacific Telegraphs. For instance, the arrangement that exists today whereby a message goes over the Canadian National or the Canadian Pacific will continue. I do not know what the amount is; but suppose that the rate for one word is twenty-five cents. I would imagine that four cents of that would be paid to the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National as it went to the cable head, and perhaps eighteen cents on the cable and another two or three cents in the United Kingdom to go by the land telegraph system there. If that is what my hon. friend has in mind I would think that those arrangements will not be changed.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Now that we are nationalizing the cable companies, would the minister not consider the Canadian National as the exclusive carrying agent?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it could not be because, as it is now, Cable and Wireless or Canadian Marconi must use Canadian Pacific lines. I do not know what the arrangement is, but I suppose, if you go into a Canadian Pacific telegraph office to send a message, the message will go by the Canadian Pacific for a certain distance and then by cable or wireless for the remainder of the distance.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): For a great length of time on the Pacific the question of rates has been a problem. The Pacific coast of Canada is practically cut off by high rates from the coast of China, and from other countries on that side of the Pacific. I believe it would be a good investment for Canada if the minister could assure us that he will be able to reduce the commercial rates on the Pacific to a basis where they will be equal to those on the Atlantic. I refer more particularly to a reduction of rates on press messages. Today we hear a great deal about the iron curtain. Our newspaper friends in Canada are unable to penetrate beyond the iron curtain. The high rates existing on press messages on the Pacific are contributing to the security of the iron curtain. If we are to have prosperity on the Pacific we must be in close touch with business houses on the other side. If we are to have peace in the world the people of Canada should be daily in touch with the political and military events in Asia, and they can be in touch with them only if we have low rates for cable and wireless on the Pacific.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): While I am grateful to the minister for the way in which he explained this resolution I must confess I am very much in the dark about it. I feel that hon. members are entitled to have more detailed information. The resolution speaks of the property and equipment of Canadian Marconi Company, Limited, and Cable and Wireless, Limited. I think that hon. members were under the impression that all the property, and the whole thing as a going concern, were being taken over. Now we know that only certain property and equipment are being taken over. The minister has not given us all the details that we should expect. He has not given us details of the property and equipment that are to be taken over and where it is located. The Canadian Marconi Company, Limited, is a large company and I suppose it has some ramifications all over the world. While it is intended to take over only the portion that is in Canada, I wonder whether the minister would be good enough to give us more details and say where the property is located. The Canadian Marconi Company, Limited, is also in business of a different type from mere communication services. While the resolution speaks of the external communication services, I should like to know the nature of the equipment that is to be taken over. At the same time the minister might be good enough to explain to us who has valued this equipment. I know that he has experts, but we might be told how this was done, and so forth.

Mr. Chevrier: Far be it from me to attempt to advise the hon. gentleman, but I am sure he will understand that I do not want to be offensive when I say that what we are discussing now is a notice of what it is intended shall be done at a later date. In discussing a resolution I do not think it has been the practice to give all the detailed information to which the hon. gentleman would otherwise be entitled when the bill is in committee. It is not that I object to giving it to him, because I would not want him to think that I am attempting to withhold any information. I shall answer some of his questions in a moment. I am sure he will agree with me that the proper place in which to do that is when the bill is under consideration and the details are therein set out. The purpose of a resolution is to provide an opportunity to discuss it in a general manner and have the minister answer questions of a general nature. At the proper time the hon. member is entitled to get the information which he seeks.

A moment ago I did say that we intended to take over certain assets of the Canadian Marconi Company. The hon. member will be interested to know that so far as the assets of Cable and Wireless are concerned it is the intention to take over the buildings and equipment at Harbour Grace in the province of Newfoundland. There are other details which I would prefer not to give until the proper time arrives.

The hon. member for Cariboo inquired about rates. I am pleased to be able to tell him that the commonwealth telecommunications board, which is established under the agreement, provides that, among a number of other things, rates fall within its jurisdiction. It provides for the formulation of a joint telecommunication policy, including rates.

Mr. Applewhaite: The resolution provides for a new corporation to take over the property and equipment of all existing companies used in connection with external communication services, and to operate them for that purpose. Will the minister be kind enough to tell us whether this in any way involves radio service for coastal or deep-sea shipping? I am particularly interested in the Pacific coast.

Mr. Chevrier: No, it does not.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

Mr. Higgins: Will the present services carried on in Newfoundland by both of these companies be continued as at present?

Mr. Chevrier: My information is that Canadian Marconi have no assets in Newfoundland, but Cable and Wireless have certain assets there, and they will be taken over. So far as the service in Canada is concerned it will be the same as it was heretofore.

Mr. Higgins: Do I understand that Marconi carries on no service in Newfoundland at the present time?

Mr. Chevrier: No, I did not say that, and I did not mean to imply that. What I intended to say was that I was not aware that they had assets there which we were taking over. They may operate an industry of some sort there, but I am not in a position to say that. This bill does not provide for the taking over of any of Marconi's assets in Newfoundland.

Mr. Higgins: If they are in business now, the business will not be taken over under this bill?

Mr. Chevrier: When my hon. friend speaks of "business", does he mean the manufacturing of radios?

Mr. Higgins: No; I refer to the business of communications.

Mr. Chevrier: No, I would not think so.

Mr. Church: Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to certain features in connection with this resolution. In the first place it is said that some Conservatives in England approve of this policy. I can say there is a large body of public opinion that does not approve of such a drastic change as this.

We used to have an empire parliamentary association which was set up for the purpose of considering just such matters as this, involving unity within the empire. However they have forgotten all about the empire. They even want to change their name and turn themselves into something else. I believe they turned themselves into a Pan-American organization. That is one organization to which matters of this kind should be sent, because it is supposed to be non-political. It is the only place I know of where politics are forgotten for the good of the empire and the parliamentary institutions within the empire.

They held a meeting, and we saw what happened to it. Right Hon. Vincent Massey always opposed Pan-Americanism. I admit there are some Conservatives in the Old Country who support this program, but I am absolutely opposed to it for the following reasons—and I shall take only a few moments of the time of the committee.

I was one of the members on this side of the house who, alone, opposed something which I thought would lead just to this new feature and this new program. What was that policy? It was called the Bretton Woods agreement and the monetary fund, which did more to cause disunity the world over than anything else I know of. I was the only Conservative on this side of the house who opposed that agreement—and I am very glad I did.

We have seen the consequences of it—this process of linking up with the international bank, as a result of which one country becomes forever the creditor of all the rest of the world. I was one who opposed it because of that feature in it.

Then, this summer we read about a meeting held near Orillia, on lake Couchiching. Was there any talk about empire up there? No. In fact, hardly any of the countries represented there are in the empire at the present time. Some of them have pledged themselves to a code. But Burma and other places are all out of it. That organization has done more than any other agency I know of to harm the empire. They even wanted to call it something else—to strike out the word "empire", and to call it by some high-sounding name such as "commonwealth". I believe it is now to be called the commonwealth organization, if you please.

The representative from Australia said that it had not been changed by any country within the empire or commonwealth. There was no evidence of it. In fact, I see no evidence of unity right here in the House of Commons. If we read what is proposed about unity within the empire, we find very little of it. The other night I read out a list of nine or ten such things, as they appeared in the debates and order papers of last session, and from the order papers of this session. Was there talk of unity? I say no.

This organization has held its meeting near Orillia. Well, if you ask me I will say this: I do not believe that, at a time when houses are needed so badly for the working-class people of this country, we should bother about these secondary matters. We should attend to primary matters—the ones we are now discussing are only secondary, in my opinion.

We have a large organization at Lake Success known as the United Nations. Up to date I think it would be far better if the name of that lake were changed to Lake Failure—because Russia knows everything that goes on there. They know all about everything. I can tell you that they know more than we do right here in the House of Commons—and certainly more than we are told.

Is this Orillia organization going to lead to unity within the empire? No. The United Nations tore down buildings worth millions of dollars. They have asked for a code—a code for what? I fail to see any value in this so-called code; there is no unity in it. It is just a waste of public funds. Just wait until you see them next year; it will be a regular sinkhole for capital and maintenance.

And what control have we? Just yesterday we were presented with estimates, but we have no control over them. We pass estimates for this, that and the other thing; but post mortems are all we can ever hold. The people of this country are worried about what is becoming of our parliamentary institutions. The tremendous popularity of the monarchy was apparent everywhere in their 1939 visit. The peoples of the empire support the king and queen today, but we see a threat to the dignity of parliament, and we see the decline of the House of Commons, when we hand over all our rights and privileges to these outside organizations such as the one here proposed. Wait until you see the codes which issue from it.

They all make rules and regulations. We have all sorts of organizations, radio, and all the rest of them. I fail to see any value in this proposal, and I venture to say that in the days to come it will prove what I have said when we were discussing the Bretton Woods agreement and the international monetary fund. I am absolutely opposed to the expenditure.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, some hon. members have found it a little strange that C.C.F. members should question this bill in any way. I assure hon. members, including the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, that C.C.F. members object to the spending of several millions of dollars more for assets than they are worth, just the same as Liberal members or any other members—if that is what we are doing. I am not saying that we are.

A moment ago the minister assured us that we were not buying a lemon. But the fact is that this particular company last year had a deficit in net earnings amounting to $408,000. Is the minister suggesting that most of that loss was entailed in other activities of the company? In other words, did the actual assets we are purchasing from them show a profit? Do you suggest that?

Mr. Chevrier: I said that; the profit shown was approximately $100,000.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member for Moose Jaw gave the balance sheet of the company when it was operated by the United Kingdom government. Can he show the profit made by the company before 1945 when they were operating under private hands?

Mr. Thatcher: As I understand it, the hon. member is mixing up the cable company with the Canadian Marconi Company.

Mr. Sinclair: It is the cable company I am talking about.

Mr. Thatcher: I am talking about the Marconi Company.

Mr. Sinclair: Let us have the cable company as well.

Mr. Thatcher: I am interested in the Marconi Company.

Mr. Sinclair: Why not ask about the cable company? The British government is not in that at all.

Mr. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): What steps did the minister's department take to determine this amount of $4,500,000? Was it the appraised value of independent appraisers of the value of the assets taken over?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. Departmental officers, after going over the various assets of both Cable and Wireless, Limited and Canadian Marconi Company, Limited came to the conclusion that they could be purchased for at least the amount asked for in the resolution.

Mr. Green: I understood the minister to say that there were to be extensions or improvements in the inter-commonwealth system. The resolution, as I understand it, makes provision not only for $4,500,000, with which to acquire the interests of these two companies, but also there is provision for such other moneys as may be appropriated by parliament for capital purposes of the corporation. Are there any extensions or improvements in mind; and if so, can the minister give us an idea of approximately how much is involved on Canada's part?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think that that is what is meant by the paragraph in the resolution. It is a question of expropriating the assets of the companies for which $4,500,000 may be required. But then money would be required to pay the staff and the day to day expenses for a period of perhaps three or four months until the company begins taking in revenue. I think the amount required in that paragraph is for that purpose, not for capital.

Mr. Green: No extensions are in contemplation at the moment?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. Green: What is Canada's representation on the commonwealth telecommunications board? It seems to me that it is important that Canada should have strong representation on the board if for no other reason than to deal with the question put by the hon. member for Cariboo. He is quite right when he says that the cable rates on the Pacific are far too high. If we have not strong representation on the board there is not much likelihood of those rates being reduced. Have any representations been made to the board by the Canadian representatives for the reduction of rates?

Mr. Chevrier: The board has not begun to operate and it will not until the agreement goes into effect.

Mr. Green: There has been a conference?

Mr. Chevrier: There was an international telecommunications conference at which the agreement was entered into. That agreement stipulates that the assets shall be taken over and a board established. It then goes on to stipulate that, until the partner governments have signified their intention of abiding by the terms of the agreement by passing the necessary legislation, it shall not go into force. I think that date will be about April 1, 1950. When that is done I presume that each partner government will appoint a member to the board.

Mr. Green: Has it been decided yet what representation Canada will have on the board?

Mr. Chevrier: Canada will have one member.

Mr. Green: What will be the total membership of the board?

Mr. Chevrier: Each partner government is entitled to appoint one member.

Mr. Green: Will the Canadian government make representations to the board that the Pacific rates be reduced?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not in position to say whether they will or will not, but I can tell my hon. friend that that is the object of setting up this board. There has been competition from foreign telecommunication services and there was a danger that the commonwealth group might go out of existence. Therefore they merged together to protect themselves against competition. I would not expect that they will try to boost rates but rather to move in the other direction.

Mr. Green: I hope the Canadian government will ask that the rates be reduced. How does the United States fit into this picture? In making his statement before the resolution went into committee the minister said that during the war certain direct circuits were set up between the United States and some of the commonwealth countries.

Mr. Chevrier: There was an understanding between the United Kingdom and the United States whereby the one country would carry the messages of the other. During the war years direct circuits were set up from commonwealth countries to the United States. Those circuits were opened on the understanding that they would be closed at the end of the war, but they have been operating, and operating satisfactorily in the sense that they provide additional service which did not exist before. The feeling all round is that it would not be a good thing to close them down and I should think that they will continue as they were before. There is no intention of changing the position by the implementation of this resolution. On the contrary, the hope is that they will be continued.

Mr. Green: I do not understand how the circuits between the United States and commonwealth countries are to be operated. Are they to be operated by the different commonwealth companies or by United States companies? Just what is the picture?

Mr. Chevrier: To be quite frank, I do not know what the picture is. I presume the commonwealth telecommunications board will enter into some sort of understanding with the United States companies.

Mr. Green: The board will?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. This resolution is intended to do two things: to take over the assets and to operate an external telecommunication service to the various commonwealth and other countries. I stated a moment ago that I considered I had been quite fair in answering all sorts of questions that had been put to me on the resolution. My hon. friend is asking questions which should be asked on the bill and not on the resolution.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When the technical officers are here.

Mr. Chevrier: As the Minister of Public Works says, when the technical men are here and can provide information of a technical nature. I do not want to refuse to answer any questions, but I do not want the hon. member to take undue advantage of the position.

Mr. Green: I am not trying to take undue advantage of the minister at all. Earlier in the afternoon when replying to an hon. member, one of the hon. members from St. John's, I believe, the minister stated that there was a limit on questions that could be asked. I think the minister was drawing a very fine line in a way that I have never seen done in committee before. If the minister has not the information I have asked for, that is perfectly all right; but I do ask him to try to get that information so that when we are in committee on the bill he can tell us just how this commonwealth board will carry on with the United States companies. Is it the intention that the new crown corporation will retain the same management and personnel, or is there to be an entirely new staff?

Mr. Chevrier: That is clearly a question which should be asked on the bill, but I shall answer it now. I do not know where the dividing line is between questions which should be asked on the resolution and questions which should be asked on the bill. However, the intention is to take over the present staffs of Cable and Wireless, Limited and Canadian Marconi Company, Limited, along with perhaps some other officers who are not members of those corporations. I am not in a position at this time to say how many.

Mr. Thatcher: Would the minister put me right as to what would be the exact effect if this resolution did not pass? Would there be a curtailment of services in any way?

Mr. Chevrier: If this resolution did not pass we would be denying a responsibility which we have undertaken as a government at an interntaional conference. Canada's reputation for living up to its commitments has so far been excellent, I think. In so far as actual results are concerned, I presume Cable and Wireless, Limited would continue to operate through the United Kingdom company; but that certainly was not the intention at the conference. The intention was that because of reasons that I mentioned a moment ago the commonwealth countries would operate their own services.

Mr. Pearkes: Can the minister say whether or not the assets include a cable-laying or cable-repairing vessel? I hope that will not be considered too detailed a question, but it involves the maintenance of cables, and where the responsibility would rest for their maintenance.

Mr. Chevrier: I would not think so. I am not able to say, but I would be very greatly surprised if it did. I do not think that is an asset of either Cable and Wireless, Limited, or Canadian Marconi Company, Limited.

Mr. Drew: I do not think there is any occasion to press for a distinction between what can be asked at this stage and what can be asked at a later stage, but the very fact that a number of questions have been asked which indicate a feeling on the part of hon. members that they are not very clear as to what result will be produced by the bill, and the fact that so many of the questions are directed towards technical aspects of the problem, suggest the desirability of this measure being sent to a special committee, or one of the standing committees of the house.

Mr. Thatcher: Banking and commerce.

Mr. Drew: Any one of the standing committees will be satisfactory as long as it goes before a committee of the house. Then there will be an opportunity to ask those with technical information questions that cannot be satisfactorily asked in the house, and the answer to which, in all fairness, the minister cannot be expected to have at his fingertips. While there is a system of deputies coming into the house to assist ministers on certain occasions, the nature of the problem is such that it calls for an examination by a committee, as was done in the House of Commons of the United Kingdom, where a similar bill dealing with the same subject, and under the same agreement, was placed before that body.

The minister has said that a monopoly will not be created. That is a most important statement. If the measure does not create a monopoly, but simply has the effect of placing certain Canadian communication facilities within the intercommonwealth communications system, then that differs greatly from the situation which would be created if the bill were to grant something in the nature of a commonwealth monopoly, leaving certain other interests outside, but which would of necessity be subject to the overriding arrangement in their own activities.

Then again there are certain details as to the relationship of these companies to other organizations which, it seems to me, can best be examined before a committee. I recognize that a publication such as Moody's Public Utilities has no official status, but nevertheless it is highly regarded by all those who want information on matters of this kind. The 1949 edition of Moody's Public Utilities, in describing the activities of the Canadian Marconi Company, Limited, says:

> Operates a world-wide wireless telegraph service in association with Canadian Pacific Telegraphs, whose offices throughout the dominion act as collection and delivery agents, and a trans-Atlantic wireless telephone service and others between Canada and Newfoundland, and various places in West Indies.

Surely a committee would be the place where hon. members could best ask such questions as would give them information about the extent to which the commonwealth communications system would be taking over wireless telephone services, the extent to which it would be absorbing the telegraph activities of Canadian Pacific Telegraphs outside of Canada, and other details of that kind that are suggested by the statement I have just read as to the nature of the activities of Canadian Marconi Company, Limited.

Then there is also the fact that Cable and Wireless, Limited, is a company which has world-wide ramifications, and the position of the Canadian properties within that system is something that might far better be discussed before a committee than by asking questions in the house, subject to the limitations that are necessarily placed thereon in this chamber.

As I mentioned before, there is the question of the radio broadcasting stations which are under the control of the Canadian Marconi Company, Limited, and what is to become of them, whether they are a part of this transaction. I grant you that the minister can answer those questions when the bill is in committee, but it seems to me that if the house is to deal effectively with this matter hon. members should have technical information and the technical advice of those who would be brought before such a committee so that they might be able to make recommendations based upon a full examination. It might well be that a committee might suggest that certain properties be included that are not now suggested, in the interests of a wider and fuller intercommonwealth communications service. In mentioning this, the minister used words that I think should be borne in mind, and about which there can be no suggested secrecy whatever. In his first statement, which gave a very broad and comprehensive explanation of the purposes of the bill, the minister used the words "strategic requirements". There again it seems to me that by setting up a committee the members could secure the evidence they wished in regard to what the strategic requirements are, in so far as they do not affect any matters of national concern or national interest from the point of view of secrecy, and the adequacy or inadequacy of the integrated communications system that is to be built up in this way which will obviously be related to what those strategic requirements actually are.

A committee can obtain that information much better than can hon. members in the house by the rather casual method of asking questions which are not directed to any particular expert, or to any particular technical aspect of the problem at a given time.

Furthermore, there is the important question of how this business is to be managed when acquired. The whole concept of the operation of public business by crown companies is relatively new on its present scale, and it took form largely because of the necessities of war. Of course there were many crown companies operated for years here and elsewhere before the last war, but this rather convenient method of operating certain types of public activities, or semi-public activities, expanded enormously at that time. Now that crown companies are being carried forward fairly extensively into the years of peace, it seems to me when we have this particular matter before us it will be a good time for the members of the House of Commons to examine not only how crown companies of this kind are set up, but also how crown companies can best be operated in the interests of the public for whom they are created, and also what methods will be employed which will determine how they will be managed during the time that they continue to operate, and what safeguards there will be in the handling of these crown corporations by way of disposition or otherwise at some future time.

Now that we have this matter before us, it is an opportune time to make an inquiry into that very important aspect of this problem. I am raising these points now more for the purpose of emphasizing what I believe to be a very good reason for setting up a committee or referring the matter to a standing committee. I would ask the minister to give us assurance that when this bill is presented it will be referred either to a special committee or a standing committee, as was done in the United Kingdom. If that is done, there will be no necessity for asking further questions. The members will then have all the technical and other information before they are called upon to make a decision on this bill.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no feeling one way or the other in the matter, nor have I considered whether or not this bill should be sent to a committee. I believe my hon. friend will agree with me when I say that the proper time to decide that is when the bill is before the house. It would strike me that there is nothing secret about what is proposed. Since it will be under my jurisdiction, I would welcome a complete airing of the whole matter, either in committee of the whole house or in some other committee. Would my hon. friend allow this matter to stand until the bill is before the house? I believe it is the practice to decide whether or not a bill is to go to a special committee at that time.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to press the point. My main purpose has been to place before the minister, as well as the other members of the house, the reasons why I believe this bill should go before a committee. I thought it was proper that I should do so now so that the government would have an opportunity of considering the matter. I would hope, in view of the nature of the transaction and the difficulty there is in dealing with a subject of this kind in general discussion, that it might be decided to set up a committee to which it could be referred.

Mr. MacInnis: The leader of the opposition has made out a good case for referring this matter to some committee of the house. I do agree with the minister, however, that we should wait until the bill is before us. During the time I have been here, there has always been some difference of opinion as to whether there should be a debate on measures of this kind at the resolution stage. I understand there is no debate at the resolution stage in the United Kingdom parliament. When the matter is as important as this, having a debate on the resolution stage puts the members at a disadvantage because they have nothing to go on except conjectures.

Surely, there is no purpose in going into the committee of the whole on the resolution except to get information. We are entitled to all the information that is available. The only way in which the minister can safeguard himself is to say quite frankly he has not got that information and it is not available until the people who understand these technical matters are able to assist him. I agree with both the minister and the leader of the opposition that we could save time by not going into the subject any further. The minister does not seem to have the information now, and when the bill comes down more details will be available. The members will be in a better position to ask questions and to decide whether or not the subject should be referred to a committee of the house.

Mr. Fraser: One thing the minister said, with which I do not agree, was that this would not create a monopoly. Is it not true that when this corporation is set up it will not pay any federal, provincial, or municipal taxes?

Mr. Chevrier: No; it will pay taxes.

Mr. Fraser: It will pay federal taxes?

Mr. Chevrier: It will pay municipal taxes.

Mr. Fraser: It will not pay federal taxes, and yet last year's profits amounted to $100,000.

Mr. Chevrier: That would be paid into the federal treasury as provided in the resolution.

Mr. Fraser: The corporation would not pay any excess profits taxes or income taxes.

Mr. Wright: Everything is paid into the federal treasury.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, even if it only makes $10. However, this company puts other companies at a disadvantage owing to the fact that it does not pay these taxes. Where do these government corporations pay municipal taxes? No government body pays municipal taxes.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not discussing that angle with the hon. gentleman. This is not before the house. I wish he would not bring the question of municipal taxation into the debate at this time. All I am saying is that there is provision here for that being done. I do not want to enter into a discussion of federal or municipal taxation.

Mr. Fraser: I still say this does create a monopoly. You cannot get away from it. The government has an advantage over the other firms.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Chevrier thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 12, to establish the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND TIME FOR APPEAL TO SUPREME COURT, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 8, to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Mr. Green: Is the minister going to make a statement on this bill?
