> Weaving by Electricity. The Commerce Sericole, a French commercial paper, gives an account of the remarkable invention by which it is proposed to utilise the electric current in the process of weaving. In the Jacquard loom, as is well known, the regulation of that particular order of the threads which determines the distinctive character of the fabric, and which was formerly effected by children crouched under the loom pulling cords, is at the present produced by the movement

This invention, however admirable, is not with- stances : that our Committees, or Commissions, are busy out difficulties and certain defects, which it would be satisfactory to overcome by still simpler means. At each passage of the shuttle there the powerful nations now hastening to the only be made public at the proper period, but I must be a piece of cardboard of a certain breadth, pierced with holes arranged so as to correspond with the design ; and when we bear n mind that for certain designs as many as 40,-000 of these pieces of cardboard have to be used, and that 1,500 are required in ordinary cases for a design of the simplest coloring, and ber over his bed-room, and was obliged to hear together, many of those who formerly procalculating that they cost about 15 francs (12s. him cough continually and distressingly. There is every appearance that he fd.) per hundred, it will be easily seen that dured the annoyance, night after night, till it led pable forms of infidelity, others to join in these cards must be the cause of great expense

> There are other objections, also, of more o less importance ; such as the noise which the loom makes in working, the space which it ocsuples and its constant liability to derangements All these inconveniences are about to disappear by the introduction of electricity, the action of which is so powerful, so easy to be directed and so prompt in its various operations. The treadle of the weaver lifts the thread and connects the extremity of each by means of copper wire with a current of electricity eithe positive or negative at will, and the result is that without any noise some of the threads remain suspended, and others descend, according as the current is directed. By this means a great a simplicity is effected in the weaving o fabrics of the most complicated nature as in that of common clock. To direct the electricity there is no longer need of mechanism for trans ferring or tracing the design. A series of points are arranged in a line like the teeth of a comb, each point communicating with an electronagnet. The weaver will only have to pasinderneath these points the design, traced in varnish on a cylinder or on a metalic leaf, i communication with the battery.

The current will pass only where the var nish is wanting, and it will be the correspond ing threads only which will remain suspended. and which by that means will reproduce the lesign as it came from the hands of the artist with a surprising exactitude. Instead of the expense of a design through the means of comcated cards, you have only that of the simple design, and of the tending of the battery.---relegraphic experience proves how slight will be this last. There will be a saving in the nost complicated designs of very nearly three-fourths of the expense, and in others certainly more than half. We shall be able, moreover.

A Vow and not a Vow.

"A curions illustration of the light in which Papists regard their vows in their lealings with " heretics," is furnished by a proceeding which took place on Monday in the registration Court at Morpeth. The Monks of the Order of St. Benedict, it is well known, take among other vows, that of poverty : the effect of which is that the per son who has taken that yow, cannot hold any property whatever. Notwithstanding this isqualification, seventeen monks belonging to a Benedictine Convent at Liverpool claim ed to be placed on the register in respect of their being possessed each of a share in a freehold house and garden in Oldgate, Mor peth. The claim was eventually disallowed as, independently of the question what effect the vow of poverty may have upon the legality of the alleged tenure, it turned out that the property on which the c.aim was founded, was insufficient in amount to sustain the seventeen votes claimed. But such a claim has been preferred, and the manner in which the Monk endeavoured to evade the conclusions obviously following from his status, and from the vow he had taken, is highly characteristic. In his relations with the Papal Church the Monk recognizes the obligation imposed upon him by the vow of poverty, to lay no claim to any property; but the moment he has to Spanish Maxim.

A Drop of Water. BY MRS. R. T. ELDREDGE.

It is a little thing, 'tis true, But o'er the aching, burning brow It falls with healing power; One cooling drop may life impart, And bring pulsation to the heart, Where all was still before,

One drop may soothe and ease a pain. And bring back joy and life again, And tranquilize the mind; That little drop we deemed so small. Or little worth, if prized at all, Will live in memory's shrine.

'Tis thus one kind and soothing word, Soon as its lute-like sound is heard, "Twill soothe the careworn breast; One well-timed word, when whispered In friendly voice, may banish woe, And lull each care to rest.

One tear drop shed on sorrow's shrine, Will dwell within the thinking mind, For days, for months, for years ! No gem could e'er be shrined so dear, As that bright drop that pearly tear, It flowed to soften tears.

And oh, if all could know the power Of little things in sorrow's hour, There might be less of grief; One word may wound or break a heart, Or add a pang to sorrow's smaft, One word may bring relief.

The Launch.

BY WILLIAM BELCHER GLAZER

Well may they deck the ship to-day, With colours flaunting free. Well may she wear her best array, So soon a bride to be : Long hath the dainty beauty kept Her lover from her charms, But now her last lone sleep is slept, We give her to his arms.

Ah, guard our darling from the storm : Thy bosom never bore A prouder or more faultless form. A fairer love before. Tame down thy billows thundering shock Thy foaming wrath, O Sea ! And keep her from the angry rocks That lie along her lee.

Her home has been where green hills kiss The river's rippling tide, But, ah ! our eyes must learn to mis The Ocean's new made bride. Where white-capped waves for ever rise, Where sea-birds skim the foam, Far off, beneath the sea-kissed skies. Our Beanty seeks her home.

Ab, proud may be the mariners That stand upon her deck; They little fear, in strength like hers, The tempest or the wreck; And proudly may her ensign fly
