PART II.

CHAPTER XII.—[CONTINUED]

With her feet through the park, Martha passed down an avenue of trees Which led her to the high road by a side gate; then crossing the road she reached a copse, hard by which, and surrounded by willows, was a pool;

CHAPTER XIII.

SIX MONTHS AFTER.

'That letter distressed me much,' said Dr. Lester to his wife, and he laid on the breakfast-table a dainty little perfumed note which the postman had a few minutes since left at the house.

CHAPTER XIV.

LOOKING BACK.

Some few weeks before the letter we have alluded to was received by Dr.
Lester, Martha sat in her chamber reading the Daily Telegraph. Suddenly the paper fell from her hands, a marvelous light came over her face, and she was looking at the paper with astonishment.

CHAPTER XV.

LOOKING AHEAD.

'I have alluded to the letter we would escape, and the end of it was that to get rid of him I slipped a couple of coverlets into his hand, took down his address and promised to convey it to you as soon as possible; and so my dear creature, you must rest content, you see that there exists an insuperable barrier to my raising you out of your position by marrying you.'

'And on my part, have something to say that will not be very pleasing to you, Captain Alastair; the young lady who now is in the house is desperately in love with Mrs. Buzze's son. If you do not see mischief in the future, now that my precious mistress may say the pleases come across her old friends now living at Stoney, then I assure you that I do.'

'I'll not believe it, where is your proof, woman? Give me proof,' exclaimed the Squire.
'In this copy which I made from the original addressed to Miss Lester and picked up by me near the lake a night or two since, and in this recapitulated letter which in view of my constant indiscretions I ventured to open.'

The Captain took them both and read them to the end, his fine features working with the temper he could ill suppress, whilst Martha remained cold and impassive.
'In this copy which I made from
constant indiscretions I ventured to open.'

'We must suppress this letter, of course,' said he; 'and as to this man Hazelton, he must be looked after; it may be a dangerous matter this of his return to London.'

He had turned away from the Willow Pool as he spoke; she had followed beside him, and bidding her to be cautious, as it would be prudent to separate and return to the house by two contrary roads, they had each other good-night; then, acting on a sudden impulse, calling her back, he said:

'Give up your present position whenever you please; I will look to your future before long.'

proof, woman? Give me proof,' exclaimed the Squire.

understand,' said she, starting up and confessing him, whilst her frame trembled with rage, though from a profound fear of being overheard she sank her voice almost to a whisper, and her low, hissing tones contrasted strangely with the angry countenance, so general it is that the hottest anger rages with the loudest voice.

'How was it?' she asked: 'I have you mentioned that childlike doll, young enough to be your daughter; that thing of pink and white. Think you that I have not watched you hanging on her very words. I come not, however, to bandy speech with you. If I am to be your friend, well, you know on what terms; if your love, even so let it be, but—'

'You will be the lover, will you not?
You will remain a servant all the days of your life should you do what you are hinting at; but here,' he said, as the sound of carriage wheels on the gravel path without struck upon his ear. 'I declare, it is Mrs. Alastair.
Yes, yes,' he added, 'I will think over all you have said, and—'

'How well she had learned the art of scolding her countenance, so that it should not betray when she chose to conceal what was passing in her mind.
He withdrew through the glass door that gave access to the garden; she by that leading to the hall, and with face as impassive as if it were hewn out of a block of stone. She was now transformed into the decorous and somewhat obsequious waiting-woman.

But, like the barb of a poisoned arrow, the sting his words had inflicted did not deeply in her woman's heart.
Her love had given to him freely, and fully all these many years that, as she had truly said she was a widow in all things save the name, and this was her return.

She loved this handsome Alastair still, and with keener eyes than Laura she noted how gradually he was falling from his heroic status, drinking, betting, horse-racing, and yet ever head and ears in love with the girl now under his roof. She paid no credence to the words he had last uttered. She believed they were said on the spur of the moment merely to pacify her, as before, which course she never did take; and she was as soon as her husband's name as usual had been rendered to Laura, she sought the solitude of her own room, and sat down, not to give vent to her feelings on paper, (an act of indiscretion which Martha was too cautious to perpetrate,) but to prepare herself to fight her deceiver with the most formidable weapons she could procure.

A few days elapsed, during which she had no opportunity of again resuming her attacks on the Squire; but her eyes were Argus eyes. She was now more of companion than maid, and no sign or word passed unobserved when she was hovering about Mrs.
Alastair's person.

But she stopped further trade by starting from her chair, and she exclaimed:
'Mr. Alastair, I must beg you to press me no further; I have already told you I have no heart to offer you; please let me pass,' she added, for he stood in her way as she was about to leave the room.

'I know nothing of her movements,' said Alastair, roughly; and raising her eyes for a moment she beheld his face darkened by an almost savage frown; very pleased at the interruption she insisted to accompany Martha in her room for her friend, but she was distinctly aware that she would return without delay to her own home.

proof, woman? Give me proof,' exclaimed the Squire.
constant indiscretions I ventured to open.'

return to London.'

He had turned away from the Willow
said:

'Give up your present position when-
future before long.'

exclaimed the Squire.

PARSONS' PILLS
Make New Rich Blood!
A LETTER FROM QUEBEC,
(Translated from the French.)

I have deferred writing the better to testify to the benefits derived from the use of your Liniment. It has done wonders among all the people who have used it about here.
I can certify that in every case where I have used it upon myself, I have been very well satisfied.

Mr. N. Mooney, of St. Sylvester, had a bad leg which was said to be incurable. I told him to use Simon's Liniment, and it has effected a complete cure in a very short time. His neighbor, Mr. John Devlin, having received a very serious cut in his leg, Mr. Mooney took him the Liniment, and having used it, found himself completely cured.

Mr. Wm. Bennett, of St. Ferdinand, has had it some time for himself, and he has since bought it for his friends, who suffer from Rheumatism, and they have all been well satisfied.

I have never known any medicine to have had such good results about here as Simon's Liniment.
Hoping that it will prove as satisfactory elsewhere.
I am, yours truly,
DAMASE PAGÉAT,
Merchant.
