THE DEBATES

OF THE

SENATE OF CANADA

IN THE

SECOND SESSION OF THE TENTH PARLIAMENT OF CANADA, APPOINTED TO MEET FOR THE DESPATCH OF BUSINESS ON THURSDAY, THE EIGHTH DAY OF MARCH, IN THE SIXTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HIS MAJESTY KING EDWARD VII.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Thursday, March 8, 1906.

The Senate met at 2 p.m.

Prayers.

NEW SENATOR.

The following newly-appointed senator was introduced :

Hon. Peter Talbot, of Lacombe, Alta.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir Albert Henry George, Earl Grey, Viscount Howick, Baron Grey of Howick, in the County of Northumberland, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, and a Baronet ; Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George, &c., &c., Governor General of Canada, being seated on the Throne,

The Honourable the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that—"It is His Excellency's pleasure that they attend him immediately in the Senate."

Who being come, with their Speaker,

His Excellency the Governor General was then pleased to open the Session by a Gracious Speech to both Houses :—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:
Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In again summoning you to meet for the despatch of business, I am glad to be able to congratulate you on the prosperity prevailing throughout the Dominion.

The severe bereavement which Queen Alexandra has sustained through the death of her father, the King of Denmark, has occasioned much sorrow throughout the empire, and I am satisfied that the warm sympathy of the people of Canada will be readily extended to Her Majesty.

It afforded me much pleasure as the representative of His Majesty to take part in the inauguration of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan as constituent members of the confederation. The universal rejoicing on the assumption of provincial autonomy everywhere visible was gratifying to witness, and I venture to say that in no part of the world could a more contented population be found. The universal sentiment was one of abounding confidence in the future.

The bountiful harvest with which we have been blessed in the past season, together with the continued development of our industries and transportation facilities, have so stimulated business in all parts of Canada and have given such an impetus to our exports and imports that the trade both with the United Kingdom and foreign countries for the current fiscal year gives promise of being the largest on record.

The flow of immigrants seeking homes in the three prairie provinces still continues, and from the present outlook the number will be in excess of any previous year, and it is gratifying to note the increasing proportion from the British Isles.

A treaty on behalf of Canada has now been concluded between the United Kingdom and Japan which it is confidently hoped will largely increase our trade with the people of that progressive empire. When the formal documents have been received they will be laid before you.

The rapid destruction of our forests now going on will, unless the operations of the lumbermen be prudently regulated in the future, and a system of reforestation adopted, result in grave consequences—affecting the uniform flow of our rivers and limiting our valuable water powers to a few months in the year. A Bill will be submitted for your consideration empowering the government to set apart forest reserves on lands under its control.

In accordance with the offer made by my ministers to the government of the United Kingdom, the imperial treasury has now been relieved from the cost of garrisoning Halifax, and arrangements are in progress for taking over the defence of Esquimalt, and hereafter detachments from the Permanent Force of Canada will have charge of both those important stations.

You will be invited to consider the propriety of making such a change in the fiscal year as will bring it more in harmony with the active business season.

The result of the investigation into the administration of leading life insurance companies in the neighbouring Republic has naturally created some uneasiness in the public mind as to the condition of Canadian companies. A commission has therefore been issued to inquire into and report on the management and financial standing, not only of companies holding Canadian charters, but also of all companies doing business under license in Canada.

Satisfactory progress is being made in the exploration and surveys of the Eastern Division of the National Transcontinental Railway, and it is expected that contracts for the construction of two important sections embracing together about 400 miles will shortly be executed.

The interim report of the Canadian section of the International Waterway Commission will be laid before you. The work of the joint commission has been somewhat delayed owing to a doubt as to the jurisdiction of the American section. The great development of commerce on the waters dividing the two countries and the opportunities for the generating of electric power at many points necessarily evolve questions which can only be dealt with by international arrangement or by treaty. At Niagara the commission will have to consider how best to preserve the scenic effect of the falls, while not unduly restricting the use of the flow of the Niagara river so valuable for power purposes.

A report has been received from the Transportation Commission containing several important recommendations; the document will be laid before you.

The legal experts appointed to revise, classify and consolidate the public general statutes passed since the revision in 1886 have completed their task, and it is expected that the volumes will be ready for distribution before July.

A measure for the better observance of the Lord's Day will be submitted for your consideration.

You will be invited to consider among other subjects Bills to amend the Railway Act, the Fruit Marks Act, an Act respecting Usury and also the Dominion Elections Act.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts for the past year will be laid before you; the estimates for the nine months embracing a portion of the proposed fiscal year terminating on the thirty-first of March, 1907, will be submitted for your approval at an early day.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I invite your earnest attention to the several subjets I have mentioned and to the general business that will come before you, and I trust your deliberations will be guided by wisdom and moderation.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire, and the House of Commons withdrew.

The Senate adjourned until Monday next at 3 p.m.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Monday, March 12, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock,

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATOR.

The following newly appointed Senator was introduced;

Hon. L. Geo. DeVeber, of Lethbridge, Alberta.

THE ADDRESS.

MOTION.

The order of the day being called:

Consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the second session of the Tenth Parliament.

Hon. Mr. DeVEBER—In addressing you for the first time I wish to make acknowledgment of the very great compliment which has been paid to me as a resident of western Canada in allotting to me the task which now falls to me. I can assure you it is a very considerable undertaking to me. And in commencing my remarks I would ask that the House be lenient. I must confess to a certain indefinable feeling, the chief symptoms of which are fear, apprehension and timidity; and were some one other than myself the subject, I do not think I would have very much difficulty in diagnosing the case. I would probably term it a mild case of nervous prostration, easily recoverable as soon as the exciting cause was removed. I trust that the exciting cause in my case will be removed in a very short time. As a remedy, in the meantime I have the knowledge that this House, always kindly, welcomes any new man seeking entrance to its mysteries. I also have the knowledge that for the first day at least a new member can count upon an unusual degree of kindness, courtesy and consideration. The press, following out their usual custom of writing up everybody who has the honour to be summoned to this House, has given you my record. You probably have seen in it that for the last 25 years of my life I have lived in the west—the very far west—under the shadow of the Rockies. During that time I have visited the east but once, so if my language savors of westernism, if everything that I touch upon is viewed from the standpoint of the west, I hope I may stand excused, and that you will grant me your indulgence.

His Excellency, in his gracious speech from the Throne, has alluded to the severe bereavement which Queen Alexandra has sustained, through the death of her father, the King of Denmark. Death always carries sorrow in its train. We do not perhaps feel it so acutely unless it is brought home to us closely by the death of some one near and dear to us. In this case the loss is sustained by one who is known throughout the empire for her warm sympathy in distress, her kindly assistance and her womanly feeling towards those who may be suffering. In the present instance she is herself the sufferer. His Excellency states that he is satisfied that the warm sympathy of the people of Canada will be readily extended to her Majesty. Speaking for this House, I think I may safely speak for the Dominion at large—His Excellency may rest assured that the hearts of all Canadians have already gone out in a wave of sympathy in connection with the loss sustained by our beloved Queen.

It afforded me much pleasure as the representative of His Majesty to take part in the inauguration of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan as constituent members of the confederation. The universal rejoicing on the assumption of provincial autonomy everywhere visible was gratifying to witness, and I venture to say that in no part of the world could a more contented population be found. The universal sentiment was one of abounding confidence in the future.

I can say, hon. gentlemen, that the pleasure afforded His Excellency was nothing to that experienced by the people of the territories. While speaking for myself, I can also safely say that I am voicing the feelings of the people of my own province, Alberta. As an evidence of this I have only to refer you to the emphatic way in which the territories last fall gave voice to their satisfaction. That the financial terms were considered generous, and that even the settlement of the very much discussed school question was not thought little of by the people of my province was amply demonstrated on that occasion; and their emphatic answer should be sufficient to convince every one, even the most sceptical, that the Autonomy Bill in its entirety was perfectly satisfactory to the people most concerned, namely, the residents of the territories. The chief point of contention was, of course, the much-vexed school question. The word coercion was the battle-cry. Now the people of the west are thinkers. They do not become hysterical; they are not easily stampeded. Party lines are not as finely drawn as you have them here in the east. The people asked themselves can there be coercion where there is no coercion? Can it be called coercion to give us a School Act framed by our own legislature, and their answer was emphatically no. I had not the honour to be a member of the legislative assembly at the time that the school ordinance was first passed; but for the past eight years I have had the honour to be a member of that House, and I took a very great interest in the amendments that were passed from time to time to perfect that ordinance. Amendments were added from year to year until we, the representatives of the people, fondly imagined that we had evolved the most perfect school system in the universe. Yet it was contended that the inclusion of this in the Autonomy Bill, originally our own creation and our own perfection, was coercion.

His Excellency next says that:

> The bountiful harvest with which we have been blessed in the past season, together with the continued development of our industries and transportation facilities, have so stimulated business in all parts of Canada and have given such an impetus to our exports and imports that the trade both with the United Kingdom and foreign countries for the current fiscal year gives promise of being the largest on record.

In no part of the universe, I think, was the bounty of our Maker more in evidence than in this our own Dominion, and in no part of the Dominion was it more marked than in the western part of Canada, Manitoba, and the two new provinces. Our crops were immense last season, the yield was abundant, but, hon. gentlemen, it was nothing to what is coming. As our tillage improves and increases, so will our crops increase until in the near future our exports will not be counted by the hundreds of thousands, but by the millions. We in Alberta have strayed from the beaten path and solved a problem of our own. After experimenting with fall or winter wheat for some years, and having no failures, we decided that that was the grain for us. The yield is more abundant and it ripens earlier; the farmer gathers his grain so early that he has time to replough the soil and plant his seed for the ensuing year the same season.

Now, I wish to call your attention to the fact that what is our plenty is your plenty. Prosperity with us is your prosperity, and a full pocket with us is a full pocket for you. We raise our immense crops of grain, our huge herds of cattle. We find sale for them readily in outside countries. You get, to use a western expression, a rake off, in the transportation of our products to the seaboard. Again, the money upon being received by us is immediately returned to the east in payment of the machinery, food, wearing apparel and other commodities necessary to the maintenance and comfort of life. In the Lethbridge district, owing to the enterprise of the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Co., and to the foresight of the present government who passed the necessary legislation to enable and encourage them to do so, we have been able to establish a new industry, the manufacturing of beet sugar. The Knight Co. have been in operation for three years, and since the inception of that company they have annually paid a dividend of six per cent. Their output for the last year I think was somewhere in the vicinity of five million pounds of sugar. The success of this industry I feel sure will lead to the establishment of others of the same kind. I have no hesitation whatsoever in saying, from what I have seen, that it will not be many years before all the sugar used in Canada will not only be manufactured in Canada, but manufactured from the Canadian product, the sugar beet.

The next paragraph in the address is:—

> The flow of immigrants seeking homes in the three prairie provinces still continues, and from the present outlook the number will be in excess of any previous year, and it is gratifying to note the increasing proportion from the British Isles.

We in the west say let them come; the more the merrier. We have the land; send us the people. It may cost money—the expenditure may be large, but it is money well spent. It is a first class investment, and will return large dividends. The continued opening of the west means the continued prosperity of the west, and the prosperity of the west means the continued prosperity of Canada. What we want in the west is men—hale, hearty men, willing and able to work. A man, no matter where he comes from, as long as he has a pair of hands and is willing and able to use them, will be no incubus to Canada. These are the men we want; we do not want those who wish to live by their wits alone. We can breed all that we want of those in the west. It is very pleasing to one who has lived in the west since the early days to note the advancement of the last eight or nine years. In the eighties we hoped, we feared, we doubted. The light would shine for a short time and then die out. In the early nineties we despaired—the long looked for—the long hoped for prosperity came not; and all was gloom and depression; but our day has come and, as His Excellency has remarked, we in the west are a happy and contented population. The construction of new railways is, to my mind, the important factor in our advancement. Transportation facilities are what we require. The first train of the Canadian Northern that entered Edmonton, transformed the country between Edmonton and Winnipeg. It lowered rates; it gave us better service, not only on its own line but over every existing line. With the advent of the Grand Trunk Pacific we shall, I hope, see a very much greater change. Railways are good servants, but very poor masters—so we consider in the west. They are not constructed for the health alone of the promoters. They are not operated exclusively for the convenience of their patrons. They are operated chiefly to declare dividends. They will give good service, and they would give fair rates when compelled so to do. Nothing will compel them but competition. Therefore we in the west say give us railway competition, and all that you can. In one way it was a happy choice of the House when it chanced on my hon. friend the hon. member from New Glasgow (Mr. McGregor) and my unworthy self to father this motion. He represents the extreme east, whilst I represent, I might almost say, the extreme west; he the lowest elevation, I very nearly the highest elevation. We from our extreme corners can stretch forth our arms and embrace all the immense territories between us and clasp hands and thank our Maker for the many mercies he has showered and is still showering upon our beloved Canada. I move, seconded by Hon. Mr. McGregor:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General to offer the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament, namely:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir Albert Henry George, Earl Grey, Viscount Howick, Baron Grey of Howick, in the County of Northumberland, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, and a Baronet; Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, &c., &c., Governor General of Canada,

May it please Your Excellency:—

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjets, the Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—The hon. mover of the address has announced that I am to follow him as seconder. I cannot plead youth and inexperience in this chamber and crave indulgence on that score. In the first place, let me thank the leader of the House for giving me the opportunity of seconding the address. I may tell the hon. gentleman from Lethbridge (Hon. Mr. DeVeber) that he will receive, as I have received on every occasion when I have attempted to address the House, the consideration of members on both sides. I remember the first time I had the honour of addressing the Senate, I was complimented on my attempt by the hon. leader of the opposition, a kindness I have never forgotten. On the few occasions that I have addressed the House since, I have never wearied them with long speeches, and I crave indulgence from that fact, having occupied so little time in the past, though I may say I do not intend to speak at any length at present. If in the remarks which I am about to make I follow in the same line as the hon. mover of the address, I ask your indulgence. My mind is not quick enough to enable me to shift my thoughts into new lines, and I had arranged my thoughts before hearing the speech of the hon. mover of the address.

Reference has been made, and the mover has also spoken of it, to the sad bereavement which Queen Alexandra has sustained by the death of her father, the King of Denmark. Many of us are old enough to remember the great rejoicing that took place in England and throughout the empire when our beloved Queen became Princess of Wales, and how she captured the hearts of the British people, and we all know that she has held them firmly ever since. Their love and admiration for her has deepened and increased as the years have gone by, and in no part of her vast dominions is the sympathy for her greater or more sincere than in Canada.

His Excellency has been pleased to congratulate the country on the admission of the new provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta as constituent members of the confederation, and it will add a chapter to the history of his distinguished family that His Excellency was present and took a part in the inauguration thereof. This was without doubt the greatest event of the past year, and its successful accomplishment is a source of great pride to the whole Canadian people.

The growth of the western provinces during recent years is phenomenal, and certainly most gratifying. Fifteen years ago we could not have believed it possible. We all remember the depressed and unsatisfactory condition these provinces were then in, and we cannot but contrast it with the buoyant and hopeful feeling that is met everywhere in the country to-day.

For many years before and during that period the best of our young people were turning their backs upon us and making homes for themselves across the border, but to-day the tide has turned, and with open arms we welcome our neighbours to the south, who are crossing the line by the thousand and settling in the new provinces.

The homestead entries in 1895 in Manitoba and the Northwest Territories were only 2,394 while in 1905 they were 30,819.

The people of the east can join with the west in congratulations and rejoicing for a bountiful harvest. Not only have our farmers had more than an average crop, but our fishermen never received such prices, and while the catch was not large the profits were above the average.

Our collieries were run to the full capacity, and the output largely increased.

And in many branches our manufacturers could not supply the increased demand. So that we can readily accept the statement that the current year, for both exports and imports, gives promise of being the largest on record.

It is most pleasing to note the flow of immigrants seeking homes continues ; it is certainly gratifying that the largest increase is from the British Isles. I find upon looking at the statistical returns for the year ending Loyalty and sentiment require us to have a preference, yet, as a matter of fact, the American settler is a great boon to the country. They know the conditions of the country so much better than the British people do. The American farmer is an object lesson from which the Englishman gets a practical education immediately on arrival, and it is an acknowledged axiom that observation is cheaper than experience.

I may be permitted to remark that it is extremely gratifying to the government that their policy in regard to the new provinces has been so emphatically endorsed by the people of the west in the recent local elections. When the Autonomy Bills were before parliament, the people of this country were led to believe that there was danger of revolution in the new provinces. The press of Ontario, and particularly the Toronto newspapers, condemned the educational clauses so vigorously that I was almost convinced that there was a dangerous excitement in the west. During the recess in May, I went up to the Northwest to learn for myself how far the reports were true. I travelled a considerable portion of the new province of Saskatchewan, and found scarcely a man who would give time to talk about the Autonomy Bill or the school question. Every man was so hopeful of the country that he would talk of nothing but the general advancement and progress everywhere in that region. I visited one of the separate schools. Brought up as I had been, I had a feeling almost of repulsion for such schools, but I had to acknowledge, after that visit, that my opinion was very much changed. I was not critical enough to know much about the teaching myself, but I was accompanied with one who, in his younger years had been an experienced teacher, and he said that he was very much pleased with the whole teaching in the separate schools of that country. We remained for the half hour where religious instruction is given and heard the priest giving the children their religious training. The subject that day was baptism, and I can conscientiously say that, while I have often visited our own sabbath schools, I have never heard children answer questions better than the pupils did on that occasion. At the close of the school, the priest presented me with the catechism, and I found, on reading it, that it conveyed the fundamental doctrines which I had been taught.

When we recall with what vigour and strenuous opposition the educational clauses of the Autonomy Bill were resisted, we now have the verdict of the people of the west themselves, and that is an emphatic vindication of the policy of the government.

In respect to our great natural forest wealth, we have lived prodigally as a people. We have to some extent sold our birthright, and are not unlike the man who set his house on fire in order to cook a dinner; whereas the first lesson which civilization teaches is that man must not selfishly live wholly in the present, gratifying at any cost the needs of the moment, but that he must regard the rights of those who will come after him.

It will be said by some that we are locking the stable after the horse is stolen. Perhaps, however, it is not too late yet for us to preserve a large part of our once-magnificent forests. At all events public sentiment has been aroused. It is gratifying to see the interest which was manifested in this question at the Forestry Convention recently held in this city, and we are particularly fortunate in having had strong interest manifested therein by His Excellency the Governor General and by the right hon. the First Minister of this Dominion.

On account of the feeling of unrest which has recently characterized the public attitude towards life insurance, caused largely by the exposure of fraud and graft in the United States it is a source of the highest satisfaction to know that a Royal Commission composed of able men is now at work, clothed with the amplest powers necessary for bringing out the truth upon all material points of this important business. The amount of money which life insurance companies collect each year from the people for the fulfilment of future obligations is vast and rapidly increasing, and it is of great importance that such moneys shall be wisely invested.

That the present is a critical time in this regard, no one will deny. The system of inspection now exercised over the companies by the Insurance Department is extensive and thoroughly efficient as I understand. The head office of every company is visited each year, and its transactions subjected to the minutest scrutiny. Even if the law as it stands is well complied with, it may be advisable further to strengthen the hands of the department by a modification or extension of the present statutes.

We may be assured that the commission besides giving attention to the question of speculative investment of funds, if any such tendency exists, will in general be able to recommend amendments of the existing laws which will prove most valuable to parliament.

In a report published in the morning papers of the 8th inst., I notice that Judge MacTavish made an important announcement at the opening of the proceedings of the commission. He said:

> The secretary has read the terms of the commission directing this inquiry which, with the order in council already published, discloses the very wide scope of the investigation now proposed to be held. In must be apparent to every one that there is an absence of any restriction or limitation to the scope of the inquiry, nor is there anything omitted therefrom that can, at this stage at all events, be suggested or anticipated.

We may be sure, then, that the commission, besides giving attention to the evidence that will be submitted, will in general be able to recommend amendments to the existing laws which will be most valuable to parliament.

I also see reference made to the progress being made in the exploration and survey of the eastern division of the National Transcontinental Railway and that it is expected that contracts for the construction of two important sections embracing together about four hundred miles will shortly be executed. On inquiry to-day I find that at this very hour, while this House is sitting, tenders are being opened for two sections, one for one hundred and fifty miles east of Winnipeg, and one for one hundred and fifty miles west of Quebec, and that contracts will be let immediately.

It is satisfactory to know that the report of the Transportation Commission will soon be forthcoming, for it is not too much to say that the problem of transportation, or in other words, distribution of the products of field and factory among those most in need of them, is the key of the whole economic situation. Without a proper solution of this province, our bountiful harvests and successful industries alike fail to produce their best results.

The measure for the better observance of the Lord's Day is sure to receive serious consideration at the hands of hon. gentlemen, whatever the form of religion to which they are attached may be. The question is a far reaching one. It affects in the most wide-spread manner the welfare of our population at large, and reaches out to every home in the land. To my mind, however, the privilege of one day's rest in seven carries with it the obligation of faithful service on the other six days. If the two principles could be combined and made universal, a very large proportion of the vice and poverty of the world would vanish.

While it is true that all men cannot be expected to have their religious convictions cast in the same mould, the present question may be entirely separated from religion, since all men of experience and earnest purpose must agree as to the desirableness of one day of rest in seven.

Skilled mechanics tell us that even the most strongly built machine needs rest, for if worked ceaselessly it will break down and wear out prematurely,—much sooner than if allowed its stated time of rest.

How much more then, must the same principle hold true in the case of man? Scientists are unanimous in asserting that the mental and physical powers absolutely demand their periods of relaxation.

Since, therefore, both revelation and nature unite in teaching the same truths, we should do our utmost, I think, to extend to the humblest citizen the blessing of one day's rest in seven.

It is also brought to our notice that we will be invited to consider, among other subjects, bills to amend the Railway Act, the Fruit Marks Act, 'An Act respecting Usury,' and also the Dominion Elections Act. These will all, I have no doubt, receive due consideration; but there is one remark I would like to make—I would not like to say that I would be bound to support all these measures until we have seen them. The only one I would refer to at present is the bill relating to usury. I do not know how far the government intend to go, or how far I myself would follow the government in the matter of usury. We know that the Old Testament denounced the usurer, but at the same time the Great Teacher Himself in his parable of the talents, condemned the man who hid his one talent in the earth, and asked him why he did not go to the exchangers, so that when his lord returned the money might have been repaid with usury. The point to my mind is, where can the line be drawn? What may be usury in one part of this country would not be usury in another. Money is worth more in the west than it is in the east, and I can hardly see where a distinction can be made. I may have two thousand dollars to invest; I may buy a house with one thousand dollars, and lend the other thousand to some one else taking a mortgage as security. If you frame a law so that I must not charge more than six per cent on my mortgage, why do you not confine me to the same figure in the case of rent. I may receive a return of twelve or fifteen per cent for the thousand dollars invested in the house. I cannot myself see any difference, and I cannot see where the government can interfere; but when the matter comes before the House I am sure it will receive our best consideration.

The speech goes on to say:

> The accounts for the past year will be laid before you; the estimates for the nine months, embracing a portion of the proposed fiscal year terminating on the thirty-first of March, 1907, will be submitted for your approval at an early day.

This implies, I suppose, that whatever the estimates for the nine months may be, they will be larger in proportion than for three-quarters of an ordinary year because the expenditures will be largely of an annual nature.

In conclusion I may say that in the course of my whole parliamentary experience I do not think I have ever seen a speech from the Throne which contained more that was valuable and less that was objectionable, and I have no doubt that the address which has been moved will be adopted without very much debate, either in this House or in the other. I have now very much pleasure in seconding the motion of the hon. gentleman from Lethbridge.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It may seem strange to some hon. gentlemen who heard my utterances at the close of the last session of parliament that I should be occupying the position I am in at the present moment. I have simply to say that I am here from duty and for duty. The time will soon arrive when some other hon. gentleman who is more able and a better parliamentarian than I am will occupy the position that I now hold. And the duties which devolve upon me to-day will devolve in the future upon some one who is younger, more energetic, more talented and better able to deal with public questions than I am. Be that as it may, I will endeavour so long as I do occupy this position to perform the duties pertaining to it with what little ability I possess and from the standpoint which I believe to be in the public interest. When I first read the speech which is now before us for consideration, I came to the conclusion that there was some master-hand behind the scene who was an adept at using a great many words, saying them very nicely and conveying very little thereby. However, upon re-reading it there are many points at which one can read between the lines and we must, I think, come to this conclusion that the gentleman who wrote this speech and those for whom he wrote it, were in a state of perfect satisfaction with the position which they hold themselves and that they hoped that others who would read the address would come to the same conclusion. However, we will try and deal in as short a manner as possible with the subjects that are presented to our notice.

No one will disagree with the first paragraph. We all rejoice at the prosperity of the country, arising as it does from various causes which I shall not weary the House by enumerating just now. I would merely say, parenthetically, that while the prosperity undoubtedly exists, I do not lay the credit for it exclusively at the door of the hon. gentlemen who control the destinies of the Dominion at present. I am under the impression that there is a higher and a stronger—an omnipotent power—who has given us that prosperity—higher and stronger even than the distinguished gentlemen who are sitting before me. The next portion of the address invites us to express sympathy with Queen Alexandra at the death of her father. That sympathy undoubtedly exists, and is shared by every member of the British race no matter in what part of the world he may live. We not only sympathize with the daughter of the King of Denmark but we regret the death of the King himself. He was perhaps the most eminent among the rulers of the smaller principalities or countries of the world, and no sovereign outside of our own empire who has been reigning for such a long time was more universally beloved than the King of Denmark. He occupied a most distinguished position, and his family occupied most distinguished positions; he was a man of exemplary philanthropy, and we all believe that it was a loss to his country when he died and we deeply sympathize with our Queen in her bereavement.

Next we come to the paragraph to which my hon. friend, if I may so term him, who moved the address, paid somewhat particular attention. The Governor General in the course of the year visited the western country and saw a great deal of it. I believe that no one can pay a visit for the first time to the Northwest Territories and reflect upon its immense possibilities without coming to the conclusion at which His Excellency arrived.

When he said that there was universal rejoicing in Alberta and in Saskatchewan at becoming constituent parts of the confederation, and that they were happy and contented he stated what is very true. How could His Excellency come to any other conclusion, surrounded as he was by a people contented so far as their own interests are concerned. But he might have gone further and said there was latent discontent in the minds of the people, that seed of discord had been sown which would grow and ripen in the future. He was surrounded by all that would lead him to the conclusion that happiness and contentment prevail throughout the country; there was no one there to present the other side of the question, and consequently he could come to but one conclusion, and that is the conclusion which has been put in his mouth by the ministers, that universal rejoicing exists. The hon. gentleman who moved the answer to the address told us that the vote which was cast in the province was, to use his own language, an emphatic approval by the people not only of the Autonomy Bill, but of those sections of it which had created so much difficulty. He followed that immediately by telling the House that he had been in the Northwest Council for eight years—that he had devoted much time and attention to the enactment of the school law, which he declared, was the most perfect school Bill in the universe. Now, I should like to ask my hon. friend in all sincerity if they had in the Northwest a Bill framed and placed on the statute-book which was the most perfect and best in the world, why should any clause of the Autonomy Bill be enacted which interfered with that perfect legislation? Why not be content with that legislation? We were quite willing, so far as the opposition were concerned, to leave things precisely as they were. Then my hon. friend would have had his perfect legislation without any interference. He may say there is no interference.

Hon. Mr. WATSON.—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman who seconded this motion gave us a glowing account of what is called a separate school in that country. If I have any recollection of the declarations made by those who framed the Bill, they denied emphatically that they were giving any separate schools. If we turn to the speech delivered by the Premier at that grand demonstration in Toronto the other day—magnificent no doubt it was, and a credit to the people of that city—what did he say when dealing with this question of the Autonomy Bill. He evidently was labouring under a good deal of depression. No one can read that speech without coming to the conclusion that he felt he was talking to an audience adverse to the principles contained in that Bill, and he made this bold declaration that he gave to the people of Saskatchewan and Alberta only the provisions that are contained in the Constitutional Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who said hear, hear ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—We all say it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am very surprised that he acquiesces in that statement. When the motion was made in the House of Commons by the leader of the opposition confining the educational clause exclusively to the terms of the Confederation Act, my hon. friend the Premier, and the hon. Secretary of State himself, I have no doubt would have, had he been there, voted it down. If he turns to the speech made by the Minister of Justice, the Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick, he will find that he made this bold statement, that the reason they framed the clause in the Autonomy Bill affecting education as they did, was because he did not believe that the provisions of the Confederation Act gave the people of the west that which the government intended to give them, and did give them under the Autonomy Bill. There are their own utterances, and their votes giving emphatic denial to the statement made by the Premier. The answer of the Minister of Justice was equally strong on that point. They made the provision for fear the Confederation Act did not make the concession which they desired to give to those people, and yet my hon. friend opposite declares that all they did was to leave to them the provisions in reference to schools that are contained in the Confederation Act. My hon. friend said that the people of Alberta and Saskatchewan are quite content, and that the vote declaring they are content was an emphatic one. I know that the vote in some sections was emphatic. It is very easy to elect members and give large majorities of a very emphatic character, when you take the ballot box into a section of the country outside of the electoral division, never open the polls, and return the box full of ballots marked for the government candidate by the returning officer himself. I commend the simplicity of that plan in the west, in comparison with the trouble taken in the section of the country that I live in There they sent to the United States and had bogus ballot boxes constructed, and with these attempted to defraud the electors. It is much easier to take the ordinary ballot box to a quiet place and fill it with bogus ballots. I have no doubt that kind of voting was done in more places than one, and thus the elections were won. But let us see how far the statement of the hon. gentleman is correct. I have no doubt he has read the letter that was written by the Premier of Saskatchewan, to Mr. McInnes, the editor of a paper published in Regina. Some portions of it are interesting. I shall read a paragraph in which he gives the reasons why the people of the west should consent to these provisions of the law which a majority of the people were decidedly opposed to, if we are to judge them at present by their actions in the past. Mr. Scott in writing to Mr. McInnes giving his reasons why he on behalf of the people of Saskatchewan accepted the school clauses in the Autonomy Bill says:

> Laurier had induced Quebec to swallow twice —in 1896 and again in 1899 over the South African business. Neither Manitoba nor Ontario thanked him very emphatically on either occasion.

What he means is that the people of Quebec swallowed the position he (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) took as against the Remedial Bill which was introduced by the government of which I was at the time the head, and in the other case the people of Quebec, he intimates by this, disapproved of raising the contingent to be sent to South Africa, but in both cases, at the instance of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, so says this Premier, they swallowed these objectionable measures. Then he goes on :

> In the present case the hierarchy would have too much reason behind their contention. I do not for a moment think that the case for separate schools is legally or constitutionally binding, but morally the case is pretty strong, and in my view it would be simply now beyond all reason to expect Sir Wilfrid Laurier to induce Quebec to swallow a third time—with the weight of the moral argument so strongly against them.

What does that mean ? It means that as the Premier induced his friends in Quebec to swallow the views he took on the Remedial Bill and to swallow their convictions against sending a contingent to South Africa, ergo the people of the Northwest must swallow the objections that they had to the school clauses in that Bill. That is the position that they take, or in other words we might ask in the name of common sense, what had one position to do with the other. They virtually say 'you sent contingents to South Africa against our wish—that is the wish of the people of Quebec—therefore to please us you must establish separate schools in Alberta and Saskatchewan. Ontario got its way in regard to the South African war ; we must now have our way in regard to separate schools in the Northwest.' Now, that is the position of the Liberal premier in one of the provinces of the Northwest. I am sure my hon. friend who moved this address must regret that himself. No one in the public position he has occupied in the Northwest, taking the active part that he did at the late elections, could by any possibility have overlooked so important a document as that emanating from the premier of one of the provinces. There may be a certain satisfaction at the granting of autonomy. My hon. friend who seconded the address says that in travelling through the country one hears very little of the Autonomy Bill. I have heard that before, and believe the statement to be correct. They were too much engrossed with their own prosperity at that time, and they talked of very little else. They were delighted, as His Excellency has said, at having been erected into provinces, and having to a certain extent, all the rights and privileges of the other provinces.

Passing from that, His Excellency rejoices at the bountiful harvest. He speaks of the development of industry, the impetus to exports, the English treaty with Japan and the increase of trade with Britain and foreign countries. The bountiful harvest is what has really contributed to the prosperity of the country, and as the honourable gentleman who moved the address properly said, the prosperity of the west, the filling of the pockets of the people of the west as the result of the bountiful harvest is to us an advantage almost as great as to the people of the west, and for this reason, they are not yet manufacturers; they have to come to the manufacturing centres of the eastern provinces to supply their wants, and we rejoice equally with them that the harvest has been bountiful and their pockets full, because we know that in central Canada and eastern Canada manufacturers will get a portion of the riches which they have acquired by supplying them with the necessaries of life. What His Excellency means when he speaks of the impetus to the export trade, requires explanation. There is no question that in proportion to the production, whether it be of the manufacturers or of the agriculturists, to the extent that we produce beyond what we require for our own consumption will we export; but the exports of the country during the past eight or nine months have been falling off. I do not know that that is any great evidence of a want of prosperity, because as the surplus products of the great Northwest were exported early in the season, in the latter part of the year the exports will necessarily decline. The trade and navigation returns show that the exports have falling off during the last financial year, to the extent of some ten million dollars. I will not weary the House by pointing out what was the cause of this falling off in the export trade, but the exports as well as the imports increase and decrease just in proportion to the wants of the people and the supplies that they have over and above what are required for consumption. I am at a loss to know how the English treaty with Japan is going to affect us materially in our trade with that country. If the hon. gentlman read the Premier's Toronto speech to which I have already called attention, they will find that he boasted in eloquent language that he can use so well, that as a result of the construction of this Transcontinental Railway ere long the tea and products of the Orient would be flowing through this country to the east. One would suppose in reading that sentence that this had never been done before, and that we were just opening up a trade with the Orient. We all know that for ten or fifteen years, through the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway the placing upon the Pacific ocean of Canadian steamships, the subsidizing of the Canadian Pacific Railway Steamships and of the Canadian-Australian Line, that the sugar, the rice, the tea and the coffee from the Orient have been rolling through the Rocky mountains down through the eastern portion of Canada even to the maritime provinces, for the last ten or fifteen years; yet when the Premier of this country spoke before an intelligent audience and announced that trade with the Orient would be opened up by the construction of the Transcontinental Railway, and they cheered. They would cheer anything he might say because of his eloquence and his admirable choice of language. No one could hear him speak without being pleased ; but they all knew just as well as we know, that that trade had already been created. I hope the construction of the Northern Railway on which we are now expending such an immense amount of money, will increase and develop that trade. As facilities are furnished so will trade increase, but when the present government arrogate to themselves praise and honour for having created that trade, I must be excused if I take exception to the statement.

Next His Excellency refers to the necessity for the preservation of our forests. Any one who knows the condition of the lumbering districts in eastern Canada will echo that opinion. Travelling as I have done through my old constituency where the fire has destroyed hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of timber, I am aware of the rapid destruction that is overtaking our forests. I am sure we all fully approve of that portion of the speech, but it contains one sentence which strikes me as rather peculiar—that is the proposition to establish a system of forest reserves, I should like to ask where that is to be done. The forest and timber in the old provinces belong to the local governments. All the valuable timber is to be found in those provinces where the Dominion have no more control over it than they have over the ordinary roads and bridges.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It says 'lands subject to its control.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That does not change my position in the least. The only forests that are under the control of the Dominion are in the provinces of the Northwest Territories, and the timber in those provinces we all know is very limited.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (De Lanaudière)—Ungava.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I feel inclined to ask where is Ungava ? The country east of Hudson bay and James bay known as Ungava is largely controlled by the province of Quebec and Newfoundland. There is, I admit, a considerable area which may belong to the Dominion, but until the question of jurisdiction is settled it is doubtful if the Dominion will take much trouble in dealing with the preservation of the forests in that region. I may add that from all I can learn there is very little timber of any value in all that district. The timber in the Northwest Territories on this side of the Rocky mountains, I agree with the government, should be preserved as far as possible, and I am very glad to know that it is intended to have forest reserves. But if the timber is to be preserved it will be of little benefit to the people of the Northwest until the trees grow to merchantable size. By forest reserves I presume plantations are meant.

The next paragraph in the address is one of very great importance. It calls attention to the fact that the garrisoning of Halifax and Esquimalt are to be controlled in future by the Dominion of Canada. I have very grave doubts, as I said last session when discussing this question, of the propriety of the policy adopted by the government. My own impression is that it would have been much better, from an economic standpoint and from every other standpoint, that these garrisons should have remained under the control and management and at the expense of the imperial government, and that Canada should contribute one or two millions annually in aid of the British Navy, which is our navy as much as it is the navy of the British Islands, and let the imperial government continue to garrison and manage Halifax and Esquimalt. Very few who have not given some study and attention to military expenditure have the slightest conception of what it will cost this country to maintain those fortifications. Let us consider Esquimalt, examine the fortifications there and see what is necessary in order to maintain them and keep a force sufficient to be of any use, and then go down to Halifax and make the same examination there, and I think you will find ultimately that the expense to the country will far exceed any sum that the most sanguine of us have contemplated. I regret it for this reason; I think that the maintenance of these two military points in this country was a bond of union between the older portion of the empire and the outlying portions, stronger than can exist under any other circumstances. When I gave utterance to these views last year my honourable friend the Secretary of State cried out 'nonsense.' When we consider the views that have been expressed by the Premier of this country, leading the great party that he does, that he looks forward to the time at no distant date, when Canada will fall from the parent tree—meaning the older country—as a ripe apple falls from the stem—that you can look upon it that this is one of the first steps to prepare the Dominion for the separation from the mother country. Honourable gentlemen may say that is all nonsense—that we have all the autonomy and self-government under our system that we would have under the other, and that that will not affect us in the least. It is not at all likely that I shall live to see it, but my views are on record on that point, and I shall be very much mistaken if events do not verify the prediction I make on this point. I notice in a speech made by the mayor of Toronto, an active supporter of this government, when Prince Battenberg visited that city, he expressed strong views in favour of Canada making contributions to the navy. The Prince accepted them, coming from so eminent a source as the mayor of a large city of Toronto, as evidence of the will, desire, and opinion of the government of the day, and if you will read his speech you will find that that is indicated in the remarks that he made. I was in hopes when I read that speech that he indicated the intention of the government, but that is not their policy. The policy of the government is to grant no money except what we control ourselves. That is in the main sound enough, but if you grant the money in aid of the navy, the navy is to us what an insurance company is to the merchant who takes out a policy. It is as much our navy, or should be considered as much our navy, being the navy of Britain, as it is of those who live in England.

I do not think any one has any objection to the change in the fiscal year. I remember when my hon. friend, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, advocated the same policy, that it was changed from the first of January till the last of June.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That was a good while ago.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is true, but the hon. gentleman's memory is sufficiently active I know to remember it as well as mine. His suggestions were accepted at that time. At present our reports are delayed. We have now from June until March—about eight months, and the reports are not yet on the table. Some of them are. If parliament is to meet in November, I should like to know when we will get the reports if the same delay takes place in preparing them as there is at present, and we shall be in a worse position from that standpoint to consider the various questions which will be brought before parliament, with the delay in the reports which must necessarily arise. If they cannot be prepared now in six months after the close of the fiscal year, what delay may we not expect if there is only four months to intervene. However, that is not a matter of very great consequence.

The next item is a very important one. It relates to the commission for making an investigation into the workings of Life Insurance Companies in Canada. There have been strong objections taken to the appointment of a Royal Commission by the government. Many of their own friends and supporters think that the question should have been left for parliament to deal with, and that it was arrogating to themselves a power which they should not have exercised under the circumstances. Now I differ from the gentlemen who take that view. Speaking for myself and for those with whom I am associated in Life Insurance business, I express my gratification at the conduct of the government in this matter, and for this reason ;—after the exhibition of a parliamentary committee which we had two years ago, I came to the conclusion that if we want to get calmly and coolly at the bottom of the workings of Life Insurance Institutions in this country, we had better have a small commission of clever men with power to investigate to the fullest possible extent. I have seen it mentioned in one paper—I hope it is not correct—that the commissioners are to be confined in their investigations to the rules of a court. Now that will never accomplish the object which the dissatisfied, which the people of Canada have in view at the present moment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It will accomplish nothing.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have since seen other authoritative statements that this is not to be the case, we have a faint idea from experience of what the rules of a court are in reference to evidence. We know that in a parliamentary committee the principle laid down is that you can probe a question to the very bottom, and that you are not to be trammelled by the rules of a court as to the evidence to be produced. I should be glad to hear from the gentleman who is to reply to me that the commission is to have full powers. It has been argued —and there is a great deal of force in it— that the mere fact of appointing a commission inferentially indicates that something is wrong and therefore casts a reflection upon the honesty of the management of the different life companies in Canada. Those who have taken an interest in the question I think must come to the conclusion that the excitement throughout the country, created by the improper attacks—and I was going to say the improper motives of those who have raised this agitation—have created discontent and suspicion in the minds of the people on account of the exposures which took place in the United States, and hence it was necessary that a calm and judicious commission should be appointed to make the fullest investigation. So far as I know, the companies in this country court that investigation. That errors may have been committed by directors I do not think is at all improbable. We all commit errors in our own business, and we very often find out these errors afterwards and try to act differently in the future. That may be the case with some of the companies; but I venture this opinion, from some little study of the question, that it will be found that on the whole there has been none of that boodling which characterized the American companies. If there has been such, let the blame fall upon those who have committed it, and let them suffer the consequences. That is one portion at least of the government policy that I confess I approve of.

We are next told that the work in connection with the eastern division of the Grand Trunk Pacific is being proceeded with very satisfactorily and that it is hoped before long to have a report laid before parliament. I do not know how my hon. friend from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen) has been able to undergo the strain which must have been upon his mind during the delay which has taken place in the last two or three years, for fear of that invasion which was to take place from the other side of the line in case we did not have this safe road over which to send westward, ammunition and guns. However, it is about three years since the Bill was passed and we have had no trouble yet. I think we are safe now. The Minister of Militia told the people a short time ago that we were under the protection of the Yankee Navy—that the Monroe doctrine was the safeguard of this country. As the gentleman to whom he addressed these remarks very aptly said, if that be the case, you had better contribute to the maintenance of the United States navy, because if they are protecting us we ought not to ask them to do it for nothing. I wonder if the Minister of Militia thought for a moment that there was any possibility, in the case of any European difficulty, of the ships of a foreign navy entering our waters. The canals and the rapids, it seems to me, would be sufficient to stop them. I question very much whether our French confreres who 'swallowed' the objectionable measures to which reference has been made, would allow them to get past Quebec; and the fortifications at Halifax are quite sufficient to protect that part of the country. If it did come to a question of a naval invasion we would simply have to blow up one of the locks and the ships could get no further. If we are to have any menace against the peace of this country—if we are to be invaded—it must of necessity be by our neighbours across the line; and when that occurs I scarcely think the Yankee navy will come to our assistance. How the hon. gentleman got possessed of that idea is altogether incomprehensible, but he has a vivid imagination, and when he is driven to a stand on a question of this kind, he is sure to find some excuse for his utterances.

I would like to know, if possible; whether there has been any verification of the report made by Mr. Butler, the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals. The Premier told us in the glowing speech which he made in reference to the short line from Moncton to Quebec, that they were going to save 140 miles. Now according to the interim report made by Mr. Butler, he makes the distance between Moncton and Quebec 11·5 miles longer by the projected line than it is by the Intercolonial. We are to spend millions of money to build a road to connect at Quebec with the Transcontinental road, the Grand Trunk Pacific, paralleling to a great extent the Intercolonial Railway and yet that road, if Mr. Butler's report be correct, will be eleven or twelve miles longer than the Intercolonial Railway itself.

We have our government road and we are paying interest upon the eighty millions which it cost to build it, and yet we are going to spend another twenty millions to build this new road, which, if the engineer's report be correct, will be eleven or twelve miles longer. Perhaps my hon. friend will be able to tell us when he rises to reply whether that statement of the engineer is correct or whether he has found a route that could be used which would be shorter than the Intercolonial.

Next we are informed that we shall have an interim report of the Waterways Commission and also a report upon the effect which the works now going on will have upon the Niagara Falls. That is an important matter to Canada. It is another evidence of the grasping character of our neighbours, particularly in any matter that pertains to trade. In the speech delivered by the vice-president of the United States at Niagara, when the commission met there, he indicated clearly that they were seeking to control the trade of the inland waters of this continent and that if they only looked to their own interests, they would soon control the whole of that trade. The United States have for years been utilizing the water-powers on their own side of the falls, building up factories of all kinds without uttering a single whimper about any interference with the scenic beauties which present themselves to the thousands of travellers who go there every year. Ontario has latterly been spending a large amount of money in beautifying Victoria Park. Canadian companies are beginning to utilize the electric power created by the construction of certain canals on this side of the river, but the moment they begin to do so we find the statesmen of the United States rise up in their might and begin to denounce any interference with the falls. Then the question comes up in Washington as to who has control of these waters. They ask, have we to treat with the English government and Colonial Secretary or with the government of Canada ? That question I believe is now under the consideration of the government. It is claimed that it is not a navigable stream because the falls interfere with navigation. If that be the case then the St. Lawrence is not a navigable stream. Because we have had to construct canals in order to navigate it, and reach the upper lakes. It is just the same with Niagara Falls. The Welland canal was built for the purpose of connecting Lake Ontario with Lake Erie, and to my mind the Niagara river is just as much under the Dominion's control as any other navigable water. At the same time Ontario will look with a good deal of jealousy upon any attempt to interfere with their autonomy in connection with their right to control the waters of the Niagara river, whether such attempt is made by England or by the Dominion government. I commend the government for the course they have pursued in appointing this commission, and I trust the members of it will know how to deal properly with the question without allowing the American government to dictate to us as to how we shall utilize the power which is on our side of the line. Let the scenic beauties be protected to the fullest possible extent, but let it be done in the interests of Canada and not in those of the United States.

Next we have a reference to the interim report from the Transportation Commission. If there has been anything which has occurred in the political world during the past year or two which has confirmed the position taken by the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons when the question of the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme was under consideration, it is the character and nature of the reports which have been received from the Transportation Commission. The commission, according to their last report, regret that the government did not take possession of the Canada Atlantic Railway, thus making connections between Georgian bay and the maritime provinces via the Intercolonial Railway. This was the scheme propounded some years ago by the Hon. Mr. Tarte, when he was in the government, and it was fully approved of by the party led by Mr. Borden, in the House of Commons. Now we have the report of the Transportation Commission verifying and confirming the soundness of the position taken by the opposition at that time. The more one thinks of it, if government ownership is to have any place at all—I am not going to argue on that point now, because I am not altogether an admirer of government ownership in all its features—that is a scheme which should have been adopted by the government.

Next we are promised the Revised Statutes. They have been long enough at them; however, I suppose those who are doing the work are well paid, and the volume will be very handy when we get it. Next we have a promised amendment to the Railway Act. It would be folly to attempt to discuss that until we have the measure itself. Then we have an amendment of the Fruit Marks Act. If the government can make any amendment to that measure which will prevent the frauds which are being perpetrated, it will be most acceptable to the country. It is really amazing that fruit growers and packers should so far forget their own interests as to face their packages with fruit of good quality and put inferior fruit in the middle.

Then we have a most important clause relating to the usury law. Our hon. friend, the Speaker, will no doubt be fully in accord with that. When he occupied a seat on the floor of the House he attempted to procure legislation to regulate the rates of interest. The iniquities perpetrated by usurers in the province of Quebec and in the city of Toronto have been of such a character that restrictive legislation is demanded. I did not exactly catch the remarks of my hon. friend who seconded the address, but I understood him to be in favour of free trade in money, and that he gave arguments why it should not be interfered with. I am perhaps one of those old fogies who believe, as I have believed from boyhood, that there should be a usury law, for reasons which I shall not take the time of the House to give now, but what has occurred lately convinces me of the need of some such legislation. I do not believe, however, that it would be wise to give the judge discretion as to what interest should be paid. My view is that it should be a simple law fixing a certain maximum rate which money lenders might charge, and if any higher rate is demanded, proof of the fact should deprive him of the right to collect any interest at all. That is the only way you can get an effective usury law.

We are told that it is intended to amend the Dominion Elections Act. We cannot have it improved too soon, judging from events of recent occurrence. If the government will act upon the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition in another place in some recent speeches, and have a Crown prosecutor independent of all parties to prosecute violations of the Act, there will soon be an improvement. It should be taken out of the hands of the judges. I do not care how conscientious and honest a judge may be, parties on one side or the other are sure to accuse him of doing wrong, and when we look at the conflicting judgments which have been rendered of late in Quebec and Ontario and Saskatchewan, one shudders at the differences of opinion and may be excused for questioning the wisdom of leaving such cases to judicial decision. I was going to discuss one case, but I shall confine myself to general principle. Let us hope that the proposed amendment, will be of such a character as will put a stop to these frauds. There should be no mincing of the matter. The man convicted of fraud in an election should be incarcerated, and not merely fined. A fine is of no consequence; the party comes to the rescue or gives bail, and if need be, pays the bail. If the bail bonds have been given by supporters of the government, then the government do not exact the bonds. It is only recently in Ontario, since the Whitney government came into power, that the bondsmen have been compelled to pay the penalties for having become surety for the appearance of one of the rascals who stuffed ballot boxes and perpetrated other villainous acts in the province of Ontario.

The address states that the accounts for the past year and the estimates for the past nine months of the proposed fiscal year will be laid before the House of Commons. I notice a singular omission in this paragraph. In old times the paragraph used to contain a sentence to the effect that the estimates would be prepared with due regard to economy. I wonder if the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) insisted on that sentence being left out. If he did he used good sense, because it would be folly to add a sentence of that kind referring to any estimates which might be prepared by the present government. Economy is not a trait of their political character, as can be very well shown by a reference to the public accounts, and a study of the difference between the expenditure to-day and what it was when the present government assumed office.

There is one closing paragraph that must be not only of interest but one in which all will acquiesce. His Excellency says that he trusts our deliberations will be guided by wisdom and moderation. Let us all hope that they may; whether they will or not we may well doubt. The wisdom I question very much, but the admonition to deliberate with wisdom and moderation is very good.

There are one or two points outside of the address to which I should like to call the attention of the House. This is more particularly in the interest of the Senate itself. Last session my honourable friend from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen) intimated that if important Bills were not brought down in the Senate at an earlier period in the session he would keep the House sitting until proper time was given for their consideration. Promises and threats of that kind coming from supporters of the government are not very apt to be adhered to when the time of trial arrives. But what I want to call the serious attention of the Senate to is this—the exhibition of legislation, for such it may be termed, of last session, I was going to say it was a disgrace to any legislative body. If honourable gentlemen do not like that word disgrace, I will withdraw it, and say it was of a character which should never occur again. What did you see first? Something which I never witnessed before in my thirty-nine or forty years of parliamentary experience. We had a Bill affecting a very important interest at Rainy river; there was great difference of opinion as to the propriety of granting the powers which were asked for in that Bill. We discussed it pro and con for a long time. It came from the committee, was referred to a committee of the whole in this House, and, strange to say, when that committee did meet to consider the question, the whole scope of the Bill was found to be changed. When I compared the original Bill with the one submitted to the committee, I found out where the trouble was. I called the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that here was a Bill changed in its character, and in its clauses. A different Bill had been substituted and laid before the committee, and if attention had not been called to it, the substituted Bill would have passed without the slightest reference to the irregular and unparliamentary manner in which it was attempted to be carried through the House. There is a gentleman in this House who understands the rules as well as and better than perhaps any of his confreres. He at once knew how to get over the difficulty. He gave notice immediately of a motion to insert these clauses in substitution of the one which had been passed by the committee on the third reading, and moved the suspension of the rules in order to have that accomplished. My hon. friend the Secretary of State, the custodian of the honour and dignity of this House, acquiesced in the suspension of the rules although personally I know in the committee, although I cannot speak of what took place in there, he did not altogether approve of it. That Bill was passed by a majority on the third reading in the manner I have indicated to the House. Now, I ask hon. gentlemen whether a deliberative body like this, which is supposed to be constituted for the purpose of revising and correcting the legislation coming from the other House, is worthy of that character, when Bills are rushed through in that way? I have spoken plainly on this case. I feel strongly upon it. It lowers the dignity of the Senate to such a degree that I have come to the conclusion that the press of the country was justified in denouncing the manner in which business has been done in the Senate. One day three or four other Bills of a most important character, increasing the salaries to judges, increasing the sessional indemnity, and what is called the Pension Bill all came to us in a hurry. My hon. friend the Secretary of State moved a suspension of all the rules so that they went through in a gallop. I was called out five minutes to speak to a gentleman at the end of the Chamber. On my return I asked what had become of such and such Bills. The hon. gentleman to whom I spoke said that they had passed through the three readings in my absence. That was the way legislation was pushed through the House last session, but not to such an extent as in previous sessions. I appeal to the common sense of this House, —probably this is the last time I shall ever speak from the position I now occupy—to consider this matter, and if they wish to maintain their own respect and the honour of the House of which they are members, put a stop to that practice in future.

Had proper consideration been given those Bills, do hon. gentlemen suppose that half the difficulty which has arisen in discussing these three questions to which I have called your attention, by the press and even among ministers would have occurred —because we find they did not agree. We find Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson at London, at one of those by-elections, addressing the people defended the legislation. We find the new Postmaster general and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Hyman), telling different stories altogether, and we find even the premier intimating his intention to make certain changes. I do not know that anything has been discussed to a greater extent, and without knowledge of what they were talking about, than the measure, increasing the members indemnity. Have any hon. gentlemen looked at that question? On analyzing the figures I find that under the provisions of the new law, with its restrictions, as interpreted, the cost to the country will not be as great as under the old law. I shall give an illustration of what I mean. I have been looking into this question to a considerable extent, and I take this opportunity to lay before the Senators and the public the result, in order to prove that the newspapers and the members of parliament and others who have been discussing this question, were ignorant of the subject with which they were dealing. I have taken instances of ten senators—I shall not give their names, because whatever these gentlemen received was what the law gave them, but in laying this statement before the Senate I want to point out this fact, that the gentlemen who drew these large amounts for a few days attendance were strictly within the law as it then existed.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is not conceded. I was always of the very opposite opinion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is a minority opinion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There are some portions of the opinion which I do not agree with myself. The old law made this provision, that if you came the first day of the session you were entitled to the full indemnity of $1,500, less the number of days that you were absent from the sittings of the House. You had included in the attendance all the holidays that took place. There is no question about that. You also had included fifteen days of non-attendance.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, under the old law.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not admit it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We have all acted upon that interpretation of the law. We were entitled under the old law to count in the days of attendance, and days that we sat upon committee, though not in the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I should like to ask my hon. friend if his contention is to this effect, that a member who has not been here thirty-one days can count in the fifteen days which he is allowed to be absent, in order to make the attendance thirty-one days?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That I believe has been the interpretation given to the law.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That has not been my opinion, and I have never met a lawyer who holds that opinion either.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I never consulted a lawyer about it. My recollection is that the fifteen days has been included in all cases. If a member sat thirty-one days he would be entitled to it, less the days he was not here, and there would be less advantage in giving fifteen days. I am stating the interpretation which has been given to the old law, and how we were paid. I want to point out that if the interpretation put upon the present law is correct, it will be a saving to the country rather than an increase. I have commenced at British Columbia and gone down to the maritime provinces, and I take ten cases and read the result. In reading these first figures it must be remembered they include the mileage; hence it will be much larger in the case of people coming from the Pacific than it would be for the same number of days a member would sit coming from a constituency near the capital. One drew $3,003. He sat seventeen days, but he had the advantages to which I have called attention. Under the present law those advantages being taken from him, the mileage and other perquisites he would have drawn only $340. Another drew $2,191, though he sat in this House only four days. Under the new law he would have drawn $80. Another drew $2,243 for sixteen days attendance; under the present law as it has been interpreted he would have drawn only $320. Another drew $2,315 for twenty-three days attendance. His sessional allowance under the present law, for the same attendance, would be only $460, because he had not sat the thirty-one days which is provided for in the law. Another drew $2,203 and he sat thirteen days. Under the present law he would have been entitled to $260. Another, an Ontario senator, drew $2,215 for ten days sitting. Under the present law he would have drawn $200. Another drew $2,187 for ten days attendance; his allowance under the present law would be $200. Another in Ontario drew $2,259 for eleven days sitting. Under the present law he would draw $20 a day for the eleven days, making $220. The ninth senator drew $2,188 and he sat in the House twelve days. His allowance under the present law, with the interpretation placed on it, would be $240. Another drew $2,293 for eighteen days. Under the present law he would have been entitled to $360. The total amount that these ten members of the House drew for these attendances was $23,097, for one hundred and twenty-four days sitting. Under the present law they would have been entitled to only $2,680, plus their actual expenses in coming to Ottawa and returning home, not including railway fares. I have not given the amounts drawn by members of the House of Commons, but the same principle applies to the indemnity paid in that House. If this comparison applied to this House with its small number of members, shows such a result, how much greater would be that comparison if applied to members of the House of Commons ?

If the hon. gentleman will analyse these accounts they will find that what I have pointed out is strictly correct, that under the present law the payment of members would be less than if the previous law were in force and would cost the country less than it did under the old law. That was my opinion, and I took the trouble to look through the whole of the statement. I have all the particulars, and you can judge it from the file I have here. So much noise was made about it in the press and through the country, that I thought it a subject worthy of the consideration of every representative man, and my opinion has been verified by the fact. Amendments should be made to the present law. When the question comes up we can discuss them. It seems to be a jumble.

Scarcely any one can read that law and know what it means. I question whether my hon. friend, for whose opinion I have a profound respect, would, after reading that law, give us an opinion which he would himself call an intelligible opinion on the subject. As a layman perhaps it would be presumptuous to put my opinion against that of a lawyer, but when I looked at the incongruous character of the law itself, I came to the conclusion the government would change it themselves. One good point about the law is that the man who attends to his duty will get the largest amount of indemnity, and those who come at the beginning of the session and spend a few days here, taking advantage of the concessions made in the old law, will receive a smaller amount. If it has this effect, it will be gratifying, and I am sure every member who has been in the habit of attending to his sessional duties, will know that the man who remains at home is not going to fill his pockets to the same extent as the man who attends continuously and intelligently to the business of the country. I have other matters that I should refer to, but I have spoken already at much greater length than I intended. The questions will come up before the Senate, no doubt before it rises, and whether I occupy this seat or a seat somewhere else, I shall reserve for myself a right to take advantage of my position to discuss these questions as they present themselves to me. There are points in connection with other questions which are worthy of consideration of the whole of us, and I hope, in the language of the address itself, that these questions will be approached with wisdom and moderation. Let us forget in dealing with these questions which are not of a purely political character, that we are here for the purpose of trying to perfect legislation and let us put down, Grit or Tory, our foot firmly against the railroading through of Bills of a very important character involving millions of money in about ten or fifteen minutes under suspension of rules of the House. All I can say is, if health and strength permit, I am going to join my hon. friend—we do not pull together in harness very often—from Wellington, in protesting if we are here at the close of the session, against any such conduct as characterized the proceedings of this House at the close of last session of parliament. All I can say is that if health and strength permit I am going to join my hon. friend from Wellington in protesting at the close of the session if we are here, against any such conduct as last session of parliament. Let us deal with public questions as sensible men, with wisdom and moderation, and we shall be respected rather than condemned by the public and the press.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.—I am quite sure I voice the opinions of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House in expressing our gratification at finding the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat occupying his old position. He has filled that position with dignity and with the approval of this House generally for the past nine years. We are glad to note too that he is in good form and voice notwithstanding the years that are being added to the long term during which he has served the public. I sincerely hope that for many years to come we may have the opportunity of hearing from the hon. gentleman, who I believe is sincerely anxious to see that all measures which come before the Chamber shall receive proper attention, and if they are not, in his judgment, in the best interests of the public, he certainly will candidly give us his opinion to that effect.

I desire to congratulate the mover and seconder on the very excellent manner in which they have discharged the delicate task assigned to them. The hon. senator from Lethbridge (Hon. Mr. DeVeber) is evidently no novice in discussing public questions. He has had eight years experience in the local legislatures, and I have no doubt we will find from time to time that the opinions he has formed during his long experience there will be a very great advantage in discussing questions which may come up affecting that important part of the Dominion. My honourable friend from New Glasgow (Hon. Mr. McGregor) has been in this Chamber for some years. We have all learned to respect the dignified, frank and fair way in which he discusses all public questions. He does not give us long speeches, but what he does say is to the point and good sound sense.

The speech from the Throne, imitating the speech which was delivered a short time ago in the imperial parliament, proceeds on the lines of least resistance. It refers to subjects which are many of them not controversial in their nature, but which are just now being discussed in the public press. It will be of great advantage to have the views and opinions of both Houses freely expressed on the many important questions to which reference is made. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition, in criticising the observations made by the senator from Lethbridge in reference to the Autonomy Bills rather departed I think, from the sound sense which usually characterizes him. The question of whether we ought to leave an apple of discord in those two provinces was freely discussed here last session. I think the experience which my hon. friend has had of the terrible consequences of the mistake of the Privy Council in the Manitoba case ought to be sufficient to prove that we should not leave this important question to be settled by a court of law in an action which any Joe Martin might bring, in either Alberta or Saskatchewan.

It was one of the fundamental principles of confederation—I say it because I have personal knowledge of the fact—that wherever separate schools, whether Protestant or Catholic existed by law when any portion of this Dominion came into confederation, these schools were to be preserved. There was an exception, however. No school law had been enacted giving to Protestants in the province of Quebec those special privileges which they now enjoy. Sir Alexander Galt, in the session of 1866, called attention to that fact, and stated that unless parliament then and there made special provision for the minority in that province, he would not remain in the government. Sir George Cartier assured him he might trust to the honour of the parliament of Canada or he might trust the local legislature. Sir Alexander Galt was not satisfied, however, to do so ; and he went out of office. Now we have, as I may say, forced on the province of Quebec the schools desired by the minority. That is practically what we did. We did not force any measure of that kind upon Alberta or Saskatchewan. They had deliberately adopted a school law themselves. When the Northwest Territory Act was discussed in 1875 both Liberals and Conservatives in the parliament of Canada said then and there, 'we will settle this question for all time, and not allow any apple of discord to exist in the future.' What was done then was done by universal consent. Every man who has since settled in the Northwest knew the conditions of the constitution ; but when this government attempted to give force to what had been agreed to in 1875, a howl went up all over this country from parties who protested against any legislation of that kind. Finally we thought that it was infinitely better to make a compromise, if this country was to prosper and continue in the course of united advancement and so we were satisfied, those of us who supported the separate school idea, with a minimum of privileges. The schools were to be practically public schools until half past three in the afternoon ; and we have the evidence of my hon. friend who personally visited a school in the Northwest—strong opponent though he had been of the principle of separate schools—that he was rather pleased than otherwise at the prayer or religious instruction which was given between half past three and four o'clock. It does seem in my judgment to be a protest against Christianity, against God himself, when people say, 'we object to prayer in the schools ; we object to teaching the children to be devout ; all we have to consider is this world ; we do not care about the future.'

Now, to my mind we are in this world to prepare for the next, and surely that man must be lost to all sense of morality and Christianity who says, 'I object to an appeal to God to make us a better people.' I do think it is most regrettable that such an objection should be raised. This is a very broad subject, and I do not propose to follow it up; but it was most important that no firebrand should be in a position in the future to raise the question in either of these fair provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. The minority who believe in religious instruction were satisfied to make a compromise and to accept the least possible concession, which was a half-hour of religious instruction. Surely that could hurt no man. The schools were to be public schools until half-past three and after that religious instruction might be given to those who desired to receive it. There was no compulsion—children could leave if they desired to do so. Special provision was made to avoid interference with the conscience of any who were not content to receive such instruction. My hon. friend imported into his controversy something which I was going to say was not in good taste—perhaps that is going a little too far—but it certainly did not comport with my notions of parliamentary etiquette. He brought up the question which has been before the court, of the suit between Mr. Scott, premier of Saskatchewan, and Mr. McInnes, and he read a letter that was produced from Mr. Scott. I quote from a gentleman who was for many years the colleague of the leader of the opposition, and who was counsel for Mr. McInnes in this suit—the Hon. Mr. Daly. Mr. Daly condemned most emphatically the conduct of his own client. I will read what he said from the report of the trial :

Mr. Daly began his speech to the jury. He spoke slightly over an hour and undoubtedly made the best of the case he had, although he was guilty in one instance of deliberately misstating the evidence given by Mr. Scott. Mr. Daly said he had no excuse to offer or defence to make of the conduct of J. K. McInnes in publishing private and confidential letters.

Hon. Sir. MACKENZIE BOWELL—That does not make their contents any the less true.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Nor had he any defence for Mr. Tom McInnes for having eavesdropped and spied upon his own father.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am reading from a report, 'McInnes Found Guilty of Criminal Libel.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What paper?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Manitoba 'Free Pres.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Does my hon. friend believe that that is a correct report?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think so. I have faith enough in the public press for that. They could have no motive whatever in wilfully misstating the facts, it would be sure to be corrected the next day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I read that statement as coming from Mr. Howell—I am not vouching for its truth—I read the statement as coming from Mr. Howell, who was defending Mr. Scott, in which he accused the son of McInnes of being an eavesdropper, and spoke of him in the most contemptuous manner.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman, by way of trying to throw discredit on the statements made by the hon. gentleman from Lethbridge (Hon. Mr. DeVeber) who has been for eight years a member of the local legislature, as to the satisfaction with which the people received the inauguration of the new provinces—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do not misquote me. I threw no discredit upon his statements. I merely quoted his own language, and asked if he had such a perfect law, what necessity was there for the government interfering with it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.—The hon. gentleman, by way of explaining the majority which was obtained for the government in the west, introduced the question of ballot-boxes. Now there were fifty constituencies, and in only one was an attempt made to perpetrate fraud. The gentleman who received the majority vote in that constituency declined to take the seat; but because there was one fraud in fifty elections, the hon. gentleman denounces the whole fifty seats practically as having been corruptly obtained, whereas in Alberta there were twenty-three seats for the government. Thirty days went by, and not a single protest was entered. Does any one believe that if there had been the opportunity to set aside even one of the elections, resort would not have been had to the courts. The very fact that the whole twenty-three seats were allowed to go unprotested is the best evidence that there was no general fraud, no general desire to evade the election law of the country. No charges were made of any sort and the inference is that the election was fairly and honestly carried on. I do not choose to go back in the past history of this country, or I might bring up elections in years gone by, but I am not going to do anything of the kind. There are men connected with both political parties who disgrace the party with which they profess to be allied. The hon. gentleman quoted an instance in his own neighbourhood in which the ballot-boxes were interfered with. What did the government do in that case? The very hour that they found a fraud had been attempted they issued instructions to their prosecuting attorney, and as a result of their action, there is one man in the penitentiary now serving time in connection with that attempt at fraud. Another had to flee the country. And this goes to show that the government were no party to the attempt. This government has the moral fibre to utter its denunciation on all occasions where crimes of that kind are attempted. And now the government has taken the very best way to prevent such things happening in future. Notice has been given to parliament of a Bill which will improve the Election Act if possible. It is the duty of members on both sides to make every possible change to defeat the attempts made from time to time to steal seats in the manner which has disgraced the past history of Canada. It has not prevailed alone under this government, it prevailed under former governments. Every one knows very well that there were very much worse frauds under the Conservative administration. But we do not cast it up to them. As I said, there are men who disgrace both political parties, and it is our duty to defeat their intentions if we can.

Now, as it is six o'clock, and as it is not proposed to sit to-night, I move the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Allow me to ask a question. Perhaps I did not understand the hon. gentleman correctly. Did he say that when Mr. Galt retired from the government a law was passed obliging the province of Quebec to give separate schools?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said the reverse. Sir Alexander Galt resigned because there was no law in the province of Quebec, giving the minority their rights, and therefore we forced on the province of Quebec, so to speak, a law—but I am using the word 'forced' in default of a better one, because the parliament of Canada was only too glad to do it, and if they had failed to do it, the majority in the province of Quebec would themselves have done it.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I understand that the legislature of the day enforced on the province of Quebec the obligation to give separate schools.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said that at the time of confederation Mr. Galt resigned because provision was not made in advance for the protection of the minority in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is one remark to which I wish to take exception. The hon. gentleman said that Canada forced upon the province of Quebec the separate schools desired by the Protestant minority.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was put into the Act of Union. The Act of Union read in this way: 'All the privileges granted to the minority in Upper Canada shall be granted to the minority in an equal degree in the province of Quebec.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is quite true; but there was no law at that time that the province should provide separate schools. Sir George Cartier afterwards pledged himself to give them, and he carried out his pledge.

The motion was agreed to, and the debate was adjourned until to-morrow to be the first Order of the Day.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the House adjourns I would ask leave of the Senate to give notice of the following questions:—

MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION.

NOTICE OF INQUIRIES.

If the accounts of the attorney and of the insurance expert employed by the Special Committee, which was appointed by order of this House to investigate into the affairs in Canada of the Mutual Reserve Life Association of New York, and which have been certified to, as regular and legal, on order of the said committee, by its chairman, have been yet paid, either in full, or in part?

If not paid in full, why not?

If paid in part, when will the said attorney and expert receive the balance of their accounts?

Also, if the government is aware of the fact that the president of the said Mutual Reserve Life Association, Mr. Frederick A. Burnham, of New York, who refused to obey the summons of your Honourable Committee to give evidence during the said investigation, has since been arrested, and indicted by the grand jury, and arraigned in General Sessions of New York, on five indictments found against him, two for grand larceny in the first degree, and three for forgery in the second degree, all in connection with the administration of the affairs of the company, affecting the interests of Canadian policy-holders?

If the government is aware of the fact that George D. Eldridge, second vice-president of the said company, who appeared before the said committee, as the principal witness in the interests of the said company, during the said investigation, was also recently arrested, and indicted by the grand jury and arraigned in the General Sessions of New York on five indictments found against him, two for grand larceny in the first degree, and three for forgery in the second degree, all in connection with the administration of the affairs of the company affecting the interests of Canadian policy-holders ?

Also, if one George Burnham, brother of the president of the said company, also a director thereof, and counsel for the same, is held by the police and judicial authorities of New York under the same charges as mentioned above ?

If the government is aware that this executive action by the authorities of criminal justice in New York, against the said two Burnhams and the said Eldridge, was suggested by and is largely based upon the results of the parliamentary investigation, ordered by this honourable House two years ago ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Many of these questions relate to matters entirely outside of Canada, and I do not know that the government has any connection with them.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We will see that later on, or know the reason why.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Tuesday, March 13, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT laid on the table the third volume of the Report of the Auditor General.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the third volume, is it not ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it includes two of the most important spending departments, Railways and Public Works.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Are not the first and second volumes ready for distribution ?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, there is another volume which, I understand, will be ready to-day. It will be presented to-morrow, and there is still another to come. The report is being published in this form because Mr. Fraser, the new Auditor General, did not like to cut it down since it was Mr. McDougall's report. The delay of presenting it does not lie with the Department of Printing, but occurred in getting the material ready and reading the proofs.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems singular that we should have the third volume laid on the table before either the first or the second. Is it possible that the first and second volumes are not yet printed ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was found that the whole report could not be got out because some of the departments had not completed their portion. My hon. friend knows that the volume is made up in alphabetical order, A to Z. The two most important departments in regard to which parliament would desire to be informed are, of course, Railways and Canals and Public Works, and as these were ready they were included in the volume which is now presented. Another volume has been delayed because it happened to contain the Mounted Police expenditure, and there was some delay in obtaining the items. It will, however, be presented to-morrow or the day after, I believe.

THE RULES OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to suggest to the hon. member form Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), if he will take a suggestion from me—that the committee of which he was chairman reported certain amendments to the rules governing this House at the last session. It was deemed inadvisable so near the close of the session, to adopt them in bulk, and without further consideration. What I would suggest to the hon. gentleman, if he thinks it is a better way to proceed, is that he should put a notice on the order paper asking to refer the report which was presented to the House at the last session, to a Committee of the Whole House, so that we can consider calmly and cooly in Committee of the Whole; as we shall have very little to do during the coming and probably the next week, so that we can take them up and consider them seriatim, clause by clause, and come to a much better decision as to what we shall adopt than we could do if it were done in a hurried manner. There are some of the rules with which I fully concurred last session. During the interim, however, on thinking the matter over I concluded that some improvements might be made in them, and it is very probable other gentlemen may have taken the same view. There is another reason; hon. gentlemen will remember that the rules governing the Divorce Committee were revised on the line of simplying the proceedings, not in any way, as I understand it, restricting the fullest investigation, but to do away with certain, if I may term it, red tapeism connected with the management of that committee, and as they will have a good deal of work to perform during the present session, there being some fifteen or twenty cases, it would be better if we could adopt the rules with such amendments as the House might deem it advisable to make in order that the committee might work under them during the present session. There is no reason why they should not be adopted before the other rules are considered. The time that will be at our disposal has induced me to make this suggestion, if the hon. gentleman from Halifax approves of it. I appeal to him particularly because he devoted a great deal of time to the question during the last session, and was chairman of the committee to whom the matter was referred.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for the suggestion which he has made, and which, in fact, anticipated the line of action that, after consultation with one or two friends who were on the committee last session, I thought it should be best to take. I propose to put a notice to that effect on the order paper to-morrow.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called;

Resuming the adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the second session of the tenth parliament.—Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said: When six o'clock arrived last night I was commenting upon the remarks of my hon. friend opposite, on the subject he had been discussing, that is the educational clauses, of the Autonomy Bills. I do not purpose to extend any further my remarks on that subject, more than to express my regret at the attitude my hon. friend has taken on this subject, and for this reason. In the year 1870, when the constitution was granted to Manitoba that province was carved out of the territories then just in the same way that the new provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan have been carved out. When the House was considering the constitution to be given Manitoba, my hon. friend left his party, who were pretty united on giving separate schools to the new provinces. He voted with the body then known as the Grits. If you look over the division list you will find that, with a few exceptions, the Conservative party supported the proposition to give Manitoba separate schools. It was thought then that it would be a French province. The French were then in a majority there, and it was considered advisable and proper that the rights of the minority should be protected, just as, for the same reason, it was considered advisable and proper in 1895 to give to the territories which included what are now the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan the separate school system. My hon. friend did not vote with his party in 1870. He had a perfect right to do as he did, but the vote having been carried, he loyally adhered to the principle laid down by parliament that year that separate schools should form part of the constitution of Manitoba. Through good report and evil report my hon. friend stood true to the principle of recognizing that parliament had confirmed the proposition, although the Privy Council had created some confusion in it. He was still willing, although few saw the possibility of accomplishing it, that parliament can be adopted as a channel to re-enact the school law of Manitoba. He was still willing to have carried out the proposition. It will redound for ever to his memory, and the minority, the Catholics of Canada, owe him a debt of gratitude for the manner in which he adhered to the principle which parliament had adopted. In 1875 when we provided the future constitution which should be given to the new territories it was specially laid down by parliament that it was better then and there to settle the school question and remove it for ever from being a source of discord in the new territories. My hon. friend's voice was silent; I assumed therefore that he concurred. There was no vote taken upon it, and there was no dissenting voice raised to it in 1875 in the House of Commons. There was in this Chamber. I had charge of the Bill; the whole subject was thoroughly threshed out and we carried it by a very narrow majority. The Liberal party, to a very considerable extent, deserted the leadership of Alex. Mackenzie and but for the support of the Conservative party, the Bill could not have been carried. I think therefore it is regrettable that my hon. friend has not been consistent in the course which he laid out for himself some thirty years ago. His career has been a long and distinguished one, and I should have been glad had he seen his way to observe the same principle in 1906 that he adopted in 1870.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think I can show that I was quite consistent.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have said all I am going to say on that subject.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is speaking for himself only.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I now come to the close of the address criticised by my hon. friend. In reference to the treaty with Japan I note that in another place the government have been criticised because they did not acquiesce in the treaty between Japan and the United Kingdom at the time that Canada had the opportunity. The treaty was made in 1894, and an amendment was made to it in 1895. The outlying provinces of the empire, including Canada, were given two years within which to adhere. For a year and nine months of that period the Conservative government was in power. They only ceased to govern Canada in the summer of 1896, so that we simply followed in their footsteps in declining to become a party to the treaty. We had strong reasons—stronger than they had—because at that time we had decided to grant a preference to the mother country, and, as the law of preference then stood, Germany and Belgium had the right, under an existing treaty, to any preference that might be granted by a colony to the mother country. Under the most favoured nation clause any countries with which we had treaties would have the same right to the preference we desired to give Great Britain, and for that reason we declined then to be a party to the treaty with Japan. Since that time the Belgian and German treaties have been set aside, and new treaties have been made with the mother country to which we are not parties, so that we are now perfectly free to make a treaty with Japan, and we have done so. The treaty document has not yet been received, but I understand it has been sanctioned. The advantage we gain is this: Japan like some other countries has a maximum and a minimum tariff. Under the treaty we come in under the minimum tariff which confers certain advantages.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand that the colonies are to have the advantage of the minimum tariff?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Only Canada. The treaty that has been made was made wholly at the instance of Canada. We applied to come in under the treaty between the mother country and Japan, but the Japanese said 'no that treaty is made and passed and gone; if you desire to come in on similar lines, we will consider the propriety of a new arrangement.' We acquiesced in that proposal, and we practically adopted the treaty that now exists between Japan and Great Britain which gives Great Britain the benefit of the mimimum tariff.

In reference to that clause which relates to the rapid destruction of the forests by fire, my hon. friend concurred in the propriety of any policy that might in future be adopted to save our forests. Those of us who have given any attention or thought to this question must feel very great regret at the fearful sacrifice that has been made by the provinces of the Dominion, in the wanton destruction in earlier years, of their forests. My attention was drawn very forcibly to this matter fifty years ago, representing as I did a constituency that was then more directly interested in the timber trade than any other part of Ontario. Ottawa at that time was the centre of the great traffic in timber between Canada and Great Britain. The trade in sawn lumber had not in the early fifties arisen—the trade with the United States. At that time no sort of provision existed under the regulations for the protection of timber. Limits were given indiscriminately to persons who made surveys, without any practical regulations for the prevention of fires, and these remarks, I may say, apply not alone to Upper and Lower Canada of that day, but also to the maritime provinces. The system in the maritime provinces was even worse than that in vogue in Upper and Lower Canada ; particularly in New Brunswick. The practice prevailing at that day was to yearly auction off the right to cut the timber. The person who bought at the auction had the right for one year only and very naturally he took the best of the timber. He had no expectation of retaining a permanent interest in the limit. Somebody else would come along and buy up the following year, and so no care whatever was exercised in the preservation of the timber. I can myself remember the terrible fire which took place, known as the Miramichi fire, the smoke from which extended up the St. Lawrence river. It covered a vast extent of country, I understand over one hundred miles in one direction, and the amount of timber destroyed would have enriched New Brunswick for all time to come. No one can calculate the vast wealth in white pine and red pine which has been lost in this way from time to time by the older provinces of Canada. It was said that for years a vastly larger amount was annually destroyed by fire than was converted into timber. The wealth of California would not compare with the value of the timber of this country had it been judiciously and prudently economized in its management. Having had something to do with the change of policy which took place at the time of confederation, representing as I did, the lumber interests, I found very great difficulty in educating the public mind to the importance of preserving the timber. The argument in those days was that an immigrant was worth $1,000. We built our colonization roads through the forests in Upper Canada such as the Opeongo road, the Frontenac road, and various other roads leading back from the settled parts of the country. The surveyors ran them through the most valuable pineries without paying any regard whatever to the character of the land, instead of limiting settlement to the lands suitable for agriculture. The lines were run by the surveyor's instrument so as to locate the shortest possible route from one point to another. The difficulty, in the early sixties, to induce the population of the provinces to preserve their timber and set apart the sections which were chiefly valuable for the red and white pine was extremely great. The practice was to give any settler who chose to locate a farm all the timber he wanted. It was only by making use of object lessons showing that men who had worked in the timber limits made a practice of taking up lots, cutting the timber on them, occupying them for three or four years—the ashes furnishing nutriment for the crops, and then abandoning the location and passing on to some other portion of virgin forest, that the public mind was educated up to the absurdity of indiscriminate location by settlers in the pine timber country.

My hon. friend made some observaaions as to the object the government might have in putting this paragraph in the speech. It was more particularly for the purpose of emphasizing the importance to the provinces of taking some better means of preventing the spread of forest fires. No doubt both in Quebec and Ontario, and I presume in the maritime provinces also, there are now fire rangers, and efforts are being made to prevent the destruction of timber by fire, but these efforts might be redoubled. In the month of January last, we had a forestry convention in the city of Ottawa at which some very valuable suggestions were adopted, and one can only hope that the sentiments which there prevailed will be taken up by the various provinces and an effort will be made to preserve the timber which remains by adopting reforestration as is being done in the older countries of the world, in Germany for instance. Wherever a tree is cut down it ought to be incumbent on the man who cuts it to plant another in its stead. The object of the Bill to be submitted to parliament will be to preserve any forests there may be in the territory under government control. We have retained the control of the lands in Saskatchewan and Alberta. It will be the policy of the government to encourage the planting of groves of timber at various places. I think it would be a very good idea myself to give some sort of advantage to the homesteader who would surround his dwelling with trees or, at all events, plant a wind break on some part of his farm and in that way adopt individually—which probably would be the better way to carry it out on an extended scale—the principle of reforestation. It would enable the people of Alberta and Saskatchewan to grow fruit. I have inquired of gentlemen familiar with that country whether apples would not grow there. I am told that the Duchess of Oldenburg, which grows so well in this district, and apples which grow in Russia, have been cultivated successfully in the Northwest, and it would be a very great blessing to those provinces if the settlers there could grow their own fruit even though it were limited to apples. They certainly could grow apples, plums, cherries and other fruit, and it could be done more successfully if windbreaks were planted by the farmers in the way I have suggested.

My hon. friend made a good deal of comment on the clause which refers to our garrisoning Halifax and Esquimalt. In many of his observations I entirely concur with him. There was and is a good deal of sentiment in this question of imperialism, and no doubt the presence of British regiments in Canada had a good effect in that direction. There was always a very great pleasure taken—I know in my earlier years it was so—in witnessing the evolutions of the imperial troops. In my day we had a large force in Canada, and there is no doubt it had an influence in moulding the opinions of the people; but the policy of the imperial government has been to withdraw the troops, and it has been thought proper to withdraw the navy from the waters of the North Atlantic. A different principle prevails now from what existed nearly one hundred years ago. Up to within the last year it was thought important to have stations in Canada on the Atlantic and on the Pacific. The stations at Bermuda, Halifax and Esquimalt were thought to be of very great importance. They were centres from which operations by the navy were easily operated in any direction that became necessary. If hon. gentlemen have noted the observations of Mr. Haldane, the new War Minister, they will see that he is carrying the concentration principle to a degree that rather surprises some of us—that is, he is even proposing to reduce the fortifications around the coast of Great Britain itself, relying entirely on the naval arm and not adding to the army but rather strengthening the navy and reducing the expense of the army. My hon. friend thought that instead of our garrisoning Halifax and Esquimalt with detachments of the permanent force, it would have been better to give a money contribution towards the maintenance of the imperial forces. I do not agree with him, and had we proposed such a policy we would have been met with a storm of opposition. Our contribution would have amounted, perhaps, to one half of one per cent of the cost, which would be no perceptible advantage to the British tax-payer. The amount voted for the army and navy is very large, about $350,000,000, and our contribution would be so insignificant that it would make really no impression. Whereas now we are doing something substantial, and it is an advantage no doubt to our permanent force. We must keep up, to some extent, a permanent force in Canada simply as a nucleus in order that the militia may from time to time be better disciplined by the example set before them. Therefore, it seems to be the only sensible way of meeting this demand that Canada should do something to aid in the defence of the empire. No one will deny the fact that if Canada did not exist to-day the British navy would not be one ship the less. The navy has been removed from our waters. We in Canada do not recognize that war on this continent is possible. It will soon be one hundred years since arms were taken up in earnest between the two countries on this continent, and one cannot be accused of prophesying without any foundation or justification in predicting that another hundred years must go around before a shot will be fired in anger between ourselves and our neighbours to the south of us. The tendency of Canada now is to rapid growth. That is universally recognized. Canada will be the home of probably as fine a class of people as will be found anywhere on the globe, and for this reason Canada will have, has now even, according to its population, a larger proportion of the agricultural class, who certainly form the very best yeomanry that any country can possess, not a class holding their lands under a feudal system, but a class absolutely independent, owning their own farms and rapidly developing into the possession of comforts that are unknown by farmers of any other country, and therefore with an intelligent class that will live in Canada and with the popular system of government we have we need have no fears for the future. We know that the friendship between Great Britain and the United States is year by year increasing which, of course, is some guarantee that we are in less danger than we might otherwise be. Unfortunately, in the past, Canada has had to contribute to the cementing of that friendship. Perhaps it was best in the end because our neighbours were a very large population, with a vast area of country that they had occupied in advance of us, and they had certain advantages in position which were superior to those we hold. If one were disposed to review all that Great Britain has done to conciliate the Republic to the south of us, he would be perfectly amazed at the serenity and calmness of the Canadian people at the great sacrifices which they have had to submit to in order to preserve a state of friendship between Great Britain and the United States. We know what a very small part of the continent to the south of us was occupied by the thirteen colonies which obtained their independence in 1785. We know how comparatively limited was the purchase made of what is called Louisiana, which carried the thirteen colonies up in the direction of St. Louis. The portion which belonged to Canada, occupying a range of country extending in a line west of Lake Erie, embracing a great part of Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, and the country along that line over to the Pacific, was part of the country that had been conceded to Britain by France in 1759. That was all given up simply because the United States desired to possess it. It was not thought worth while in those days, when that concession was made, to hold it for the young colony on the north side of the lakes and along the River St. Lawrence. We know how the Ashburton Treaty was carried out—how a good part of the state of Maine was carved out of Canadian territory, even against the protest of the people who lived within it. I need not refer to more modern conditions, because they are all so fresh in the minds of hon. gentlemen. I merely mention this to show how great the sacrifices have been on the part of Canada in order that Great Britain might be permitted to cement a friendship with the United States. I trust there is no need to do it at present. I think our manhood will cause us in the future to stand up at least for our rights, and I think the good sense too of the people of the United States will recognize that Canada has rights. Our population is rapidly increasing and we are receiving pretty large numbers of United States people who are coming over and investing their money in Canada, and the Dominion is becoming better known not only in Great Britain, but also in the country to the south of us.

The change in the fiscal year requires very little comment. It will be very much more satisfactory hereafter if our fiscal year corresponds with the business year of the country, which is practically our summer season. During the winter very little business, with foreign countries at all events, is done. Our trade, both import and export, is largely in the summer months. My hon. friend agreed in the change of date, but he thought we would scarcely be able to get the departmental reports in time. He has, however, overlooked the fact that the time is the same—it will be seven months from the 31st of March to the end of November, just as it is now, from the 30th June to the beginning of February. On the first occasion we shall have to use them, I have no doubt we may have some trouble, but in the following session, which will perhaps be held at the beginning or end of November next, and which will probably extend to the month of March, with a considerable adjournment at Christmas, the tariff will be the subject during the month of November and December, and the ordinary business, discussion of the estimates and the consideration of public accounts will come then in January and February.

I was glad to hear my hon. friend state that he entirely approved of the policy adopted by the government in appointing a commission to inquire into the insurance question. The powers, if he will take the trouble to read them, given to the commission are of the most ample character. They are absolutely free even to employ actuaries. Of course they can call witnesses. They are not only representatives of the insurance companies, but all persons who have complaints, and they will sit at different places where it will be convenient for the people to be present and express their opinions in reference to the policies issued by any particular company. It will probably have the effect of making the companies more careful. I do not know that any more will come of it, because we all hope that the insurance companies can stand the inquiry. It may be that public attention being drawn to the cost of administration of insurance companies, that may be somewhat cut down. I know that the cost of administering British companies is very much less than the cost of administering Canadian companies. I do not see why there should be that very great difference. The cost of the British companies, according to the reports that I had occasion to see, were about nine, ten and eleven per cent of the receipts, but with the Canadian companies they run up from twenty to thirty per cent. The difference is rather excessive and it was in that direction that the frauds in the United States were committed, by the payment of huge salaries, and by, I was going to say—

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Political contributions.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Corrupting legislatures. But the parliament of Canada is away and beyond any charge of that kind. It would not be necessary to make any reference to that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the point the hon. gentleman has raised is susceptible of explanation—that is the difference of cost between the management of imperial life companies and Canadian companies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume one explanation would be this; our companies do business on a very active scale. There is great rivalry betwen them. They are constantly soliciting business, and the expenditure may be justified. Certainly their growth is phenomenal, and that may explain it. It may redound to the advantage of the policy-holders. I am not sufficiently conversant with the subject to explain it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Competition with United States companies has very much to do with it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The clauses relating to international waterways is an important one. The subject is now in a very unsatisfactory condition. There are state rights and provincial rights and federal rights both in the United States and in Canada. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have not helped us in this matter. In dealing with the fisheries question, as hon. gentlemen know, without throwing very mucb light on it they beclouded it by deciding practically that the provinces owned the bed of the river half way across. But, of course, navigation belongs to the Dominion and is under federal control. I quite agree with my hon. friend that it is idle to contend that the inland waters to tide water are not under the control of the Dominion, although the provinces have been liberal in giving out rights. Possibly it may be, I will not say curtailed, because I do not know what view the commission is taking of it, but I presume that Canada will not be satisfied to give up the scenic effect of the falls unless we get our share of the valuable power that can be created without destroying the beauty of the falls. That is the whole story in a nutshell. If I am correctly informed, one or two companies incorporated in Ontario have already sold a large portion of their power to the United States. I speak, of course, subject to correction. Perhaps I ought not to have mentioned it, but I have seen it so stated, and I should like to have it either rebutted or confirmed. If it is so, then Canada is placed in a somewhat embarrassing position. It will scarcely suit the views of the people of Ontario, especially west of Hamilton, to be told that the factories and industrial establishments on the south side of the Niagara river shall have sixty or seventy per cent of the power of Niagara, whether obtained from the United States side or from our side, and that we shall have to be content with thirty or forty per cent. I do not think that would be satisfactory. Whatever has to be done must be done on a fair and just basis.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Has the local government charge of the power of the Niagara river?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have assumed it, as my hon. friend knows. The hon. gentleman made some very sharp remarks which somewhat reflected on myself and on the government. He said that we had allowed important Bills to be brought up from the other chamber in the dying days of the session last year and had them put through without proper consideration. With an experience over some thirty odd years in this Chamber, I venture to say our sessions will compare favourably with those of our predecessors. During the eighteen years my hon. friend's government was in power, we had very much more legislation coming down in the last days of the session than has been the case in the last eight years. He particularly alluded to one Bill which he said was put through without proper consideration—the Minnesota Power Bill. If there was one Bill that this Chamber was entitled to credit for full consideration it was that very measure. It was before the committee for two months and they refused to pass it. The promoters wished to give a larger share of the power of the Rainy river to the American side of the stream than to the Canadian side. The committee thought that should not be done, and the matter was held over from time to time. The promotor himself, the main financier himself, the man who was promoting the enterprise, appeared before the committee and gave many reasons why we should not adhere to that principle, but we did adhere to it nevertheless. Two days before the session closed, he gave in. The promotor saw there was no possibility of getting the Bill through unless the company yielded to the principle laid down by the committee, that the power should be developed on both sides simultaneously and that one half the power should be available on the Canadian side. This was a fair and just principle, although the greater portion of the water came from the Canadian side. At the last moment the promoters consented, and the Bill was changed to suit the views of nine-tenths of the committee. Nobody was prepared to oppose the Bill then; there was nothing further in controversy and, therefore, there was no possible reason why we should withhold the measure. If my hon. friend will recall the facts he will find that the strictures which he made were scarcely applicable to that particular measure. Last session we did what I never remember before. On the last day of the sitting there was not a single Bill before this House. The Supply Bill was carried the day before the House rose, so that as far as the Senate was concerned it could not be said that Bills were rushed through. The measure which occupied our attention during the last two or three days was the change in the Criminal Law relating to trading stamps. My hon. friend from Stadacona, (Hon. Mr. Landry), who fought for the preservation of the trading stamps system, held up the House for a couple of days and that was the legislation which really occupied our attention. It is quite true the Bill known as the Indemnity Bill went through this Chamber perhaps at a rushing rate, but nobody got up to speak against it. My hon. friend was not in the Chamber at the time. I do not know whether he was out of town or simply absent.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is mistaken. If he refers to the reports he will find I was here and objected to some portions of it. It was another Bill I had reference to.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Indemnity Bill had been discussed in the caucuses. I myself was never present at any caucus, but I know as a matter of fact that both political parties held caucuses and made up their minds with regard to the Bill. I was led to believe at the time that there were not half a dozen dissentients in the two Houses.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Those were not caucuses in which the senators took part.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know really. I think they did. I have seen senators at caucuses before.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I know of no caucus where the question was considered, and I was not invited to any.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then I am wrong, and will withdraw my statement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I notice in the 'Free Press,' which is the organ of the government, a statement published, that it was an arrangement between the supporters of the government and the opposition and that the Senate were a party to it. Immediately upon reading that I wrote to my hon. friend on my right from Prince Edward Island (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) asking him if he had any knowledge or understanding to that effect, and he replied that he knew nothing of it except by ordinary rumour. I take this opportunity of correcting the statement. The hon. gentleman will excuse me for interrupting him, I forgot to mention the matter yesterday, and I wish now to give a flat and positive denial to the allegation. It was also stated that the bargain was in consideration of voting for the Autonomy Bill. Now if there was any such bargain as that, it must have applied to the hon. gentleman's friends and not to us who voted against the measure.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I never heard that the Autonomy Bill had anything to do with it. I know that negotiations had been going on, I will not say with the members of this House, but with the members of the other Chamber. That is a matter of notoriety.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Let it be known publicly then, that the senators here opposing the government had no knowledge of it, and were not consulted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I accept the statement as correct. On the 19th of July all the Bills had been disposed of, and parliament prorogued on the 20th. Therefore the charge that we rushed Bills through without giving the senators an opportunity of discussing them really has not the foundation that he thought it had.

I see that the House of Commons has already got down to business, and I hope within the next eight or ten days to be able to submit some Bills for the consideration of the Senate. I notice that an hon. gentleman has given notice that he proposes to put the question to the government whether they cannot arrange to have a better division of business. As there are only two members of the government in this Chamber, naturally the bulk of the Bills introduced must be in charge of the ministers to whose departments they relate, and it is a difficult thing to induce the ministers to give up what is naturally an appendage to their office, but at all events I think some Bills will be introduced in this Chamber at an early day.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I regret that I should have to interfere with my hon. friend the senator from Queen's, who usually follows the leader of the House on occasions such as the present, and to whom I invariably listen with the greatest of pleasure; but as the leader of the House has spoken, and as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has also spoken, it is perhaps only fair to the leader of the newly created third party in this House that he should now have his turn to speak. I have no intention, however, to prolong the debate on the subject matter of the address, because it is not calculated to excite very protracted discussion, and already we have listened to four able and exhaustive speeches, but I do desire to avail myself of the opportunity afforded by the concluding observations of the leader of the opposition last evening, and those just made by the leader of the House, in reference to several important measures which passed through parliament at the close of the last session, when I was absent from my place owing to illness. I allude amongst others to the Indemnity Act and the Pensions Act. It is more satisfactory, at least to myself, that I should take advantage of the opportunity which is now afforded me to make some personal explanations which otherwise, perhaps, I should be compelled to make under a formal motion, thus giving them a prominence which they do not deserve.

I need not, I suppose, remind hon. gentlemen that I have been made the subject of several newspaper notices in regard to my supposed opinions upon these important measures which passed this House at the close of the last session, and, also that I have been represented as having assumed an unfriendly attitude towards my hon. friend the leader of the Conservative party in the other House. I may state at once that these newspaper references are in the main correct, and that I have felt it my duty, my unpleasant duty, to withdraw my allegiance from the present leader of the Conservative party in Canada. Late last month I received a letter from my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) notifying me that a caucus of the Conservative party was to be held during the first week of the session and that he hoped to see me as a senator, and a member of the party, at that caucus. I immediately replied to him in a short note saying in substance that I disapproved so strongly of certain measures which had received the assent of the caucus last year, and of the action of the party in regard to those measures, as well as of his own action as its leader, that my position hereafter would be that of an independent Liberal Conservative member of the Senate, free from any party ties or party allegiance. That is the position, I desire it to be understood, which I now hold as a member of this House.

I must say that the ostensible reason given for my withdrawal of my allegiance to Mr. Borden's leadership did not include all my reasons for my action in that respect. For some time past, I have ben dissatisfied with Mr. Borden's leadership and especially since the last general election—since the introduction into the House of Commons of a new element in the Liberal Conservative party which, to my mind, has too largely dominated the action of the party organization in parliament and elsewhere.

Since the assumption of the leadership of the Liberal Conservative party by Mr. Borden I have felt that the party in this House have not been treated with the courtesy or consideration to which it was entitled, and that that state of affairs has been growing worse from day to day for several years past, and has been accentuated lately by the cool disposition of the party in the House of Commons towards their friends in the Senate since the reappearance—I will say it plainly—of the Hon. Geo. E. Foster in the House of Commons, and who, playing the role of a village politician, has exposed his animus lately in open insults and sneers at the Senate on a public platform in the province of Ontario. Seeing, as I could not help seeing, that the leadership of the party, and the party itself was being dominated by an influence that I at any rate am not willing to follow, it may, perhaps, have made me more inclined to take exception to particular acts of Mr. Borden, and perhaps view some of them with more severity than they deserve.

But when I recollect the attitude of different leaders of the Liberal Conservative party in the past towards their friends in this House; when I recollect the attitude of Sir John Macdonald, of Sir Charles Tupper, of Sir Mackenzie Bowell and of Sir John Thompson—when I recollect the consideration the Liberal Conservative party in this House invariably received from such leaders while we had the happiness of having them at the head of our party, I cannot but feel some dissatisfaction that under a man of yesterday we should receive such very different treatment. I have often heard Sir John Macdonald say that he did not wish to have a caucus without having his friends in the Senate fairly represented; and in his great battles for power, and for the retention of power, he has more than once declared that unless his friends in the Senate stood by him he would give up the fight. A very different doctrine prevails to-day, and I should infer that it is the intention of the Liberal Conservative party, when the Senate loses power, to give effective service to it as a legislative body, to adopt perhaps the role which our friends on the other side adopted towards this House, of abuse and vilification when they were in the minority, of which I hope some of them have had time to repent. It appears as if something of the same policy is intended to be resorted to by the Liberal Conservative party in the future, now that they think perhaps the Senate will be a good and popular object of abuse. I had hoped that the futility and unwisdom of such a course had been sufficiently verified to deter them from any such action; but appearances, under Mr. Foster's tutelage, are rather against them.

I said that I was gratified to have the opportunity given me to offer these remarks by the observations of the leader of the opposition yesterday and by the references to-day, of the Secretary of State to the Indemnity Act and the Pension Act. I was rather pleased to find that without appearing to go out of my way I might in connection with these references offer the personal explanations which I desire to make. Before proceeding to do so, I desire to say a few words with regard to the argument of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition yesterday, in his comparison of the cost of the old and the new Indemnity Acts. I do not, however, intend to raise any legal controversy here. It would be futile and of no good result. I can only say that the legal construction of the old Indemnity Act given yesterday by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, is not the construction of that Act which was entertained by Sir Alexander Campbell, or Sir John Abbott or myself when I was speaker of this House and had frequent occasion to look into it. It is not necessary, however, that I should go into any legal argument with my hon. friend on that point, but I take issue with him with regard to the argument he based on the comparison he made of the operation of the old Indemnity Act and the Act now on the statute-book. In the first place I would say that taking last session as an illustration is in itself a very unfair beginning. Last session was exceptional in many respects, but especially in regard to this House because of its many and long adjournments. The Senate did hardly anything last session but adjourn, and the adjournments were very long. I do not blame the House for that; there was no business for it to do, and it might as well adjourn as remain here doing nothing, but I say it was an exceptional session, and I venture to assert that in no other session of parliament however short since confederation were there so few actual days of attendance to the credit of the members, in consequence of the long adjournments. Therefore to take last session to illustrate his comparison of the number of days of member's attendance, and to base an argument on that comparison such as my hon. friend used yesterday was very unfair. It would be fairer to take a session one or two years back when the anomalous conditions of last session did not prevail.

But there is another feature of my hon. friend's comparison yesterday which I cannot help considering as very surprising and incorrect. My hon. friend tried to show that the present law if carried strictly into operation would actually cost the country less than the old Act as it was now enforced. When trying to prove this he took the old Act and applied it to the new indemnity of $2,500, and made a comparison in this way between the two laws. Now if my hon. friend wanted to make a fair comparison he should have taken the old indemnity that was applicable to the old law, and not the new indemnity. According to my hon. friend's mode of reasoning, the larger the indemnity the more unfavourable the old law would show by his interpretation, and therefore the less the increase would cost the country under the new Act, and it was a pity for the sake of his argument that the indemnity had not been $5,000 instead of $2,500. My hon. friend will see that in making a comparison he should have applied the operation of the old Act as a whole, and the actual indemnity of $1,500 under that Act, and compared it with the new Act and its operation on the indemnity of $2,500. That would have been a fair comparison, but it would not have sustained the argument which my hon. friend placed before the House.

With regard to the general question of indemnity, when I first became a member of this House the amount was only $600. It was afterwards raised to $1,000, under the Conservative party, and at no time did I complain of its insufficiency, or hear complaints from other members of parliament in either House. It was felt at that time that until the experiment of confederation had become an assured success, the more economically the machinery of the government could be run the better, and the indemnity was therefore accepted not as an allowance or salary for services performed by members, but as what it was, an indemnity for money out of pocket in attending the sessions of parliament. This state of things continued until the change of government in 1896 and a few years after. In 1901 the present government increased the indemnity to $1,500. Now I am frank to confess to the House that for some years past, and especially since the promulgation of the draft constitution of the commonwealth of Australia, I have been of opinion that the indemnity to members of parliament, should be $2,000, I consider it would not be one dollar more than the present circumstances of the country warranted, and the great pressure of business upon parliament which necessitated long sessions, justified. If at the start, Australia could in its constitution provide for an indemnity or allowance of £400 sterling, or $2,000, although we at the start allowed our representatives only $600, when a change was made the government should have given to the members of our parliament at the end of forty years the indemnity which Australia gave to its representatives at the start. The mistake that was made was when the increase was ginven in 1901 from $1,000 to $1,500, the indemnity was not then increased to $2,000. Had that been done there would have been for many years no attempt to disturb it, and that sum would have given general satisfaction in both Houses.

However, that was not done, and when an attempt was made in the other House to secure the increase in the indemnity and I understood from rumour that the sum asked for was $2,500, I said I did not believe Sir Wilfrid Laurier would grant that request. I did not believe that he would go as far as to increase the indemnity to $2,500, of which I certainly disapprove. It may be said in these days of lavish expenditure the extra $500 amounts to only the sum of $150,000 a year, that it is a bagatelle hardly worth speaking about, but a few years ago we regarded $150,000 a year as a very large amount of money. He would be a bold minister who would then approve of putting the country to that expense without ample justification. However, the indemnity having been raised to $2,500, I was not and I am not prepared to make any hypocritical fuss about receiving it, and I can only say that while parliament continues to vote $2,500 as indemnity or allowance to me as a member of the Senate, I shall have no conscientious scruples about accepting it. Indeed, if I had any qualms of conscience on the subject, I could easily set them at rest by treating the extra $500 allowance as back pay upon the many years that I served in this House for $600 and $1,000 per annum.

Coming, now, to the Pension Act, I entertain a very decided opinion on that question. I consider the introduction of a system of class pensions for politicians in this country to be a matter of the gravest importance. It is a new departure in this country and I believe on this continent, because there is no such class system of pensions to public men in the great country to the south of us, and I say that the introduction of such a system should take place with the greatest caution and deliberation. Any of us who possesses the slightest knowledge of English history knows what an abuse the pension system became in England until it required the giant strength of a Burke to grapple with it, and abolish the infamous system in that country and bring about much needed reforms, so that to-day the pension system of England is one which is easily justifiable. I say therefore at the outset that we should not entertain the idea of establishing a system of class pensions in connection with the public life of the country without the plainest possible necessity for it, and I do not believe that necessity has yet arisen in Canada. If, however, the matter had been discussed openly and above board, and not made a matter of a secret round robin as it was last session, I am not prepared to say that this country would not grant a pension to any of its public men who stood in need of assistance and who had earned it by service as cabinet ministers. If for instance—and it would be a very liberal sum—a pension were given to ex-ministers who had served a certain time in the government, of £500 sterling, our present indemnity, I think it would be a very handsome pension indeed in such a country as Canada. In deserving cases at least the public would not hesitate to give a public man of the class indicated who required it, but such a pension should not be enjoyed by any one while at the same time occupying a seat in either House, and this would shut out senators as their appointments are for life. If the Liberal Conservative party in the Senate had been represented in the caucus of the party in the House of Commons when this measure was brought up, I venture to say that it would not be to-day on the statute-book.

Coming next on the increased salaries of the judges, when this subject was brought before this House a few years ago by the senator from Montreal (Sir George Drummond) I then expressed my opinion very freely. I said that there was a great deal of nonsense talked in parliament about an increase of the judges' salaries generally. No doubt there were cases in the large centres where the cost of living was high and where in order to secure good judges larger salaries had to be paid according to the professional incomes which the appointees were receiving before being called to the bench. These things ought to be considered in fixing the salaries of judges, but to indiscriminately raise the salaries of all the judges in the country of a superior class by $2,000 was neither wise nor expedient. Take the case of a judge in the city of Montreal, a hard worked man. It costs him double as much to live as a judge in the rural districts of Quebec, and yet he is given the same increase as the rural judges down the St. Lawrence. That is not right. The judges in Montreal, Toronto and other large centres should receive more increase than the judges in the small provinces. I do not consider the judges in the smaller provinces have the right for many reasons to the same increase as the judges in the larger provinces. The only case in the smaller provinces where the larger increase was justified is in Prince Edward Island. I never could understand why all the maritime provinces were not on the same footing in respect of judges salaries. I therefore say that the Act of last session is most unfair, unwise and not justified by any circumstances connected with the administration of justice in this country. I believe if the Conservative members of the Senate had had a representation in the counsels of the party when this Bill was before the caucus, it never would have been put on the statute-books in its present shape.

I come lastly to the salary of the leader of the opposition. To this I declare at once I am decidedly opposed. It is an innovation opposed to all my ideas of constitutional usage under British institutions. I believe you could strike no greater blow at the prestige of the leader of the opposition than to make him—I do not say virtually but even apparently in the eyes of the people—a beneficiary—a salaried official of the government of the day. I felt that I could not remain in a party organization with a leader occupying a position of this kind. The astute managers of the Liberal party tried these same tactics once before in Ontario with Sir William Meredith and failed. But they caught Mr. Borden easily with the lasso they threw in vain for Mr. Meredith. I give due credit for astuteness to the gentlemen who have got the Conservative party into this hole, for until the Conservative party gets out of it, the Indemnity Act, the Pension Act, the indiscriminate increase in the salaries of the judges, all put together, will not be the occasion of greater loss of votes to the Conservative party than this one false step of making our leader in the eyes of the people a beneficiary of the government. This is the opinion I conscientiously entertain, and it is one of the reasons why I find myself in the attitude I am in to-day in regard to the party with whom I have been so long associated. You could do nothing better calculated to destroy the prestige of a party leader than to make him appear in the eyes of the people to be actuated by sorbid or selfish motives, and a leader without prestige is good for nothing. He can inspire no enthusiasm in his party, and a political party without enthusiasm, especially a party in opposition is like a leader without prestige, also good for nothing.

Take the case of Sir John Macdonald, what was the chief cause of his prestige before the country, and half the battle in every fight, it was the knowledge of his unsordid and unselfish character; and that great statesman never uttered truer words than when on a memorable occasion he exclaimed, 'These hands are clean', and even his enemies did not insinuate for one moment that he could ever be tainted with personal sordidness, selfishness or corruption. And I am not so intense a political bigot as to be blind to the fact, that the self-same prestige which was half the battle with Sir John Macdonald is to-day also half the battle with Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I am not for one moment attributing any such motives to Mr. Borden and do not wish to be understood as imputing to him any thing of the kind.

Far be it from me to do anything so unjust. I do not believe that Mr. Borden is a sordid or a mercenary politician and, unlike his first lieutenant, the respected leader of the opposition has no need of becoming either a place hunter or a pension hunter, for he can by giving his time and talents to the practice of the honourable profession of which he is an ornament, make more money than any office would give him in the gift of any government.

I must say a few words with regard to the attitude of this House last session in reference to these important Bills. I do not think this House was open to any censure whatever in passing these Bills. We have the power here to reject money Bills; we have not the power to amend them. But I think it would be difficult to find any precedent either in England or in any of the self-governing colonies where any upper House rejected a money Bill coming to it with the unanimous consent of both parties in the money voting branch; and these Bills came up to this House with the unanimous consent of the House of Commons. I think it would have been an unprecedented thing to reject these Bills under the circumstances, and therefore not the slightest blame can attach to the Senate for its action on that occasion.

Proud as I am of the traditions and achievements of the Liberal Conservative party of Canada, in which it has been my privilege for so many years to claim an humble share, I think I shall be found in the future as in the past generally voting—at least I hope so, in support of the policy and measures of that party, but I do not wish on these occasions that my conduct should be taken to indicate any change of mind on my part in regard to the present leadership of the opposition.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I desire to offer a few observations, and I shall be very brief. I do not know that I would have spoken had it not been for a statement I made at a public meeting in my riding which I have had the honour of representing for eighteen years; it was carried into the public press and in justice to myself I cannot allow the statement that has been made in this House on this occasion to go unchallenged, as far as I am concerned. At that meeting I said that the Indemnity Bill and the Bill granting an allowance to ex-ministers was rushed through this House at a moment when the Governor General was in the building prepared to prorogue parliament and the guard of honour was before the door. That I still maintain. My memory serves me very badly if I am not correct in making that statement. In justice to this Chamber as a deliberative body a reasonable opportunity should be given to deal with important measures of this kind instead of rushing them through at a gallop, as I heard one hon. gentleman say, at the last moment of the session. The Secretary of State has said to-day that these Bills were discussed in caucus. For my part I can honestly say that I never heard of any caucus and I never heard from any member of the other House directly or indirectly the first suggestion with regard to the allowance to retired ministers. That question was not, to my recollection, discussed in any caucus of the ministerial party, nor was it made known to members of the other House. I have talked with several of them, and they say that they never heard a word about it. It was tacked on to the Indemnity Bill at the last moment, and carried through, and eventually made its appearance in this House. That the legislation was objectionable is beyond all question. People of Canada are not in favour of it and, if the government assumed the responsibility of keeping it on the statute-book, their supporters will have to meet it on every political platform when the next general election comes round. I was pleased to notice that the Hon. the Postmaster General, when he was fighting for the seat he now holds, stated that he would use all the influence at his command to secure, if not the abolition of that enactment, at least an amendment of it that would bring it more in accord with public opinion. I hope that that promise on the part of Mr. Aylesworth will be carried out, and that this clause will be abolished. For my own part I have always been opposed to superannuation to a retired cabinet minister. I think that any minister of the Crown can surely manage to live for the balance of his days, after retiring from office, without becoming a charge upon the treasury of this Dominion. I agree with my hon. friend who has just sat down, that if any gentleman who has discharged the onerous duties of the minister of the Crown finds, in the evening of his existence, that what he has to depend upon in the way of support is so very limited that he is not able to live upon it—that if the country will not do something for him he must either go to the poor house or become a pensioner on the bounty of his friends—in that case I have no doubt parliament would be generous enough to give him some allowance.

I know of men who have been ministers of the Crown who have been provided for even by those with whom they were not politically connected. The present government provided for one man who had been a minister of the Crown from confederation, generously provided for him by giving him an appointment enabling him to draw a sum to maintain him for the balance of his days. Nobody ever found fault with that or considered that any wrong had been done, and I surely think that all governments will be patriotic, considerate and charitable enough to deal with any worthy case which may arise without putting upon the statute-book of this country the tempting offer to retired ministers to make a demand upon the Dominion treasury and become a charge upon the country as long as they live. I do not favour that legislation and I earnestly hope the government will see it as their duty to abolish it.

Now, with regard to the question of Canadians taking charge of the fortifications at Esquimalt and Halifax, I very much regret, in a way, that the government find themselves compelled—if they are compelled, to assume that responsibility. I regret that England took the attitude—if she did take it—of leaving these fortifications to be looked after by Canada. I regret it because it will unquestionably lead to very heavy expense, which I believe will increase year after year. We will have to undertake the construction of some kind of a navy sooner or later, if we are to protect these two ports. I fear Canada's entry into or undertaking an expense of that kind. More than that, the trouble may be greater than anything that has yet been intimated by anyone who has spoken here. Canada may unfortunately do something through the equipment of those fortifications which may give offence to the United States and lead to international difficulties. We have always depended upon England to guard us against trouble of that kind. I wonder if England would be willing to turn out her ironclads and supply men to protect us against any attack which we might bring upon ourselves? We would have to assume all the responsibility of an attack and protect ourselves. I hope nothing of that kind will arise, but I would have been glad had the government been able to make such terms with the imperial authorities that by our voluntarily contributing, as Australia does, a sum each year towards the maintenance of the British Navy, and left to them the care of these two fortifications. That would have been very much better policy for many years to come, and I fear that something may arise to show that it would have been better had we adopted that policy.

The question of the international waterways has been referred to many years ago, when I was a member of the House of Commons. When the Chicago drainage canal was being constructed, I drew attention to what I thought would be the result of the very heavy drain that canal would have on Lake Michigan and consequently on Lake Huron and Georgian bay. The waters of our ports on Georgian bay and Lake Huron have been receding. They are to-day from two to three feet lower than they were twenty-five or thirty years ago. Last year there was an improvement, but up to that time they had been receding considerably. I have not the slightest doubt but the construction of such waterways as the drainage canal, which runs from Lake Michigan through Chicago and empties into the Mississippi, has contributed very considerably to the fall of the water level in Lake Huron and Georgian bay, and diminished the volume of water that passes over Niagara Falls. A resident near the falls showed me, when I was there some time ago, a large stone on the United States side of the river and told me that he could remember the time, years ago, when the water ran over the top of it. That stone is quite close to the falls and stands something like four or five feet out of the water. I have no doubt that the drain upon the source from which that water comes, caused by the construction of such canals as that at Chicago, is partly responsible for the diminution in the volume of water at Niagara.

With regard to the Minnesota Power Company's Bill, the hon. Secretary of State said that an agreement had been come to in this House at the last hour. That is quite correct. There was a fight over the division of the power, but at last an understanding was arrived at. What was that understanding?

It was that there should be an equal power developed on each side of Rainy river, but if the Canadian power so developed should not be utilized, the developers should have the right to apply to the Railway Commissioners for a transfer of the power from the Canadian to the United States side. The difficulty with those people who were undertaking the development of the power was this: the work involved a very large expenditure of money and if only one-half of the power developed could be depended upon to earn a revenue the return on their investment would be inadequate, and they wanted to make some arrangement by which they could rent the power on the Canadian side for use in the United States if it was not used in Canada. It would be no advantage to Canada to let it lie there unused, and it is a good thing that the arrangement was made, because that power is now being developed and the company that has undertaken the work will make a magnificent job of it. They have gangs working night and day, light being supplied at night by an electric plant run by steam-power. The improvement will be a great advantage to that portion of Ontario. I earnestly hope that the power developed will be used on the Canadian side and there will be no necessity to apply to the Railway Commission for permission to transfer it to the other side of the river.

There is a clause in the address which has not been touched upon, one which I very much appreciate, and which I hope the government will carry out determinedly. That is in passing an Act with regard to Sabbath observance. I am strongly in favour of legislation of that kind. I do not want any man to be forced to go to church if he does not want to go, but there should be a law in this country which would ensure to every man the opportunity to attend public worship on the Lord's Day and protect him in the enjoyment of the Sabbath as a day of rest. I earnestly hope that such legislation will be submitted, and that it will receive the endorsation of every loyal Canadian. I congratulate the government very heartily on having incorporated this clause in the address, and I hope that the legislation will be brought down and that it will be a measure creditable to them and advantageous to the people of Canada. I would not have spoken on this subject had it not been for the references made to the legislation of last session. I adhere to what I then said ; I hope that all measures submitted to the Senate will be brought down in good time so that we shall be able to give them proper consideration. I do not care what has been the custom in the past. I do not care whether the present government is prepared to compare records with its predecessors. I do not care what the records may show. We have a right to a fair and reasonable opportunity to discuss all measures brought before us, if we are to render to the people of this country any service for what this Chamber costs. I have no doubt last session the Hon. Secretary of State was between two fires. The session had been long, and the government were anxious to close it. Efforts had been made for days I presume to arrange for a day on which they could prorogue parliament, and as the session drew near its close, I suppose the business had to be rushed. I hope that he will convey to the members of the cabinet the fact that the Senate exists and must be given some reasonable time to discuss measures in the closing days of the session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My statement as to the Indemnity Bill has been challenged. I find in the journals of this House that a message was brought from the House of Commons on the 18th July with a Bill entitled 'An Act to amend the Act respecting the Senate and the House of Commons' and that the said Bill was then read the first time. With leave of the Senate on motion of Mr. Scott, seconded by Sir Richard Cartwright, the forty-first rule was suspended in so far as the same relates to this Bill, and that it was then read the second time. It was then ordered to be read the third time at the next sitting of the House, but it was not read at the next sitting of the House, not until the day after the 19th July. I find in the Debates the following discussion took place :

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is there any alteration in the reference to the 15 days' grace?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it still continues.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I should like to ask the Secretary of State what the position of the leader of the opposition would be. He is to get a salary. Will he have to resign his seat and be elected again?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, he receives an addition to his indemnity.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (de la Vallière) reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

The House did not rise until the following day, the 20th, so the Bill was brought down two days before the House prorogued. I made the observation that I understood the Bill had been discussed in caucus. I was not present at any caucus, and I may be wrong, and I will withdraw that statement; but what I did understand was that a round robin had been signed in the other House, by both sides, for the increased indemnity.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When I heard the hon member from Richmond addressing the House, I began to ask myself the question, 'Has Sir Wilfrid Laurier resigned, and has Mr. R. L. Borden been called to form a government, and is he at this moment conducting the affairs of the Dominion?' because my hon. friend who is an eminent constitutional authority must know that constitutionally the government of the day is responsible for legislation brought down and carried through parliament, and any charges he has to make should be directed against the government of the day and not against the leader of the opposition. I generally listen with great pleasure to the hon. gentleman from Richmond (Mr. Miller) and very generally it has been my pleasure to agree with the views, which he so eloquently places before the Senate; but I must on the present occasion dissent very emphatically from his conclusions. I understood him at the outset to say that he had lost confidence in the leader of the Conservative party in Canada, on account of some things which had occurred last session, on account of a power which he said had been allowed to dominate the Liberal Conservative party since Mr. Borden had become its leader. My hon. friend did not elucidate that point any further, so I am not quite clear as to what he meant. I assume the reference was to a section of the Conservative party who took very extreme ground with regard to separate schools last session.

Hon. Mr. MILLÆR—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—At all events my hon. friend did not proceed to explain what he meant by some power or influence which had dominated the leader of the Conservative party.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think I clearly indicated that I meant the Hon. Geo. E. Foster.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understood that a later reference was to Mr. Foster. I was going to point out that no later than last year my hon. friend, in a letter which he read in this House, and which appears in the Debates, warmly supported Mr. Borden's views on the great question then before the country, and he went still further to say that the argument which that hon. gentleman had addressed to the House of Commons on the Autonomy Bills, had never been answered and was simply unanswerable.

We will pass that part of the question and reach another part of it, on which my hon. friend laid very great stress, and which he elaborated at very considerable length; that is the voting of an allowance to the leader of the opposition, which my hon. friend has denounced in the very strongest terms. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman in his denunciation of that proposition. In my humble opinion it is the first time in the history of confederation when that question has been dealt with honestly by the political parties of Canada. Since confederation both parties have been compelled to make provision for the leader of the opposition for the time being and means have been resorted to which were not by any means as free from objection as the course pursued last year. For what was done last session Sir Wilfrid Laurier must get the credit and must take the blame, if any attaches. Mr. Borden is no more responsible for that legislation, than any other member who voted for it. When Sir John Macdonald, the greatest man that Canada has ever produced, was leading the opposition in the House of Commons he was not a rich man, and his friends subscribed a very considerable sum of money as a gift to Lady Macdonald in order that Sir John might be able to give his time and services unreservedly to the people of Canada. I was a close student of Canadian politics at that time, and I remember very well that the Toronto 'Globe' ably supported by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) or I should say that my hon. friend ably supported by the 'Globe' succeeded in convincing nearly half the people of Canada that the giving of that money to Sir John put him under an obligation to the contributors of that money and that it amounted to a scandal, because if Sir John Macdonald should ever have judgeships to grant, or contracts to let he could not help being influenced in favour of those who had contributed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He was out of power when that was given to him.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend is mistaken. I know the facts, and for the matter of that I may tell him I was a subscriber to the fund collected for Sir John Macdonald. It was given to Lady Macdonald at least a couple of years before Sir John was defeated, which was in 1873. It was while Sir John Macdonald was Prime Minister that the subscription referred to was made.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not entirely. The subscription was completed and given to him after he left power in 1873.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend is mistaken. I speak with knowledge on the subject. I tell him I did not disapprove of the subscription being made for Sir John Macdonald at the time. What I did disapprove of was the fact that a number of corporations had been asked to subscribe to the fund. That I objected to very strongly, but the subscription itself I thought was reasonable, and, as I tell him, I was myself one of the parties who subscribed to it, although then in opposition to Sir John Macdonald.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I must with this explanation withdraw anything which might appear like an accusation against the hon. gentleman personally, but he admits that he did object, although he gave his own subscription, to corporations contributing. Therefore my argument is not weakened by the hon. gentleman's explanation, but on the contrary, made all the stronger. If Sir John Macdonald was in the government at the time, it makes the argument all the stronger than it was as I originally stated it.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—There was another subscription.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There was an occasion when the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was leader of the opposition. Mr. Mackenzie was not a rich man and his friends made provision for him when he was in opposition. I have it on excellent authority that one of the objects in forming the North American Life Insurance Company. was to provide a position and adequate salary for Mr. Mackenzie as its president. The suggestion came from Geo. Brown to solicit subscriptions for the formation of that company, one of the objects being to obtain a position for Mr. Mackenzie which would enable him to remain in public life. With all the noise we hear to-day about Insurance companies in the United States and their political affiliations and their subscriptions to political funds, I ask whether the voting of the sum of money out of the public treasury to a man who is performing a valuable public service is not better than the method to which I have referred? I might quote a later case, that of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. If the principle was wrong in the one case it would be wrong in the other, because subscription to such funds would be putting the leader of the government or opposition for the time being, being under an obligation to the contributors. Now here we have had several attempts by both political parties to deal with this question, and the legislation of last session was in my opinion, the first attempt to deal with the question properly. My hon. friend has referred to the case of Sir Wm. Meredith in the province of Ontario. I have taken the trouble to look up that case carefully and read the discussion that took place upon it, and the reasons given by Sir Wm. Meredith for declining that vote. It was not a proposition to put a law on the statute-book making permanent provision for the leader of the opposition. It was a proposition to put an amount in the estimates for the current year. Hon. gentleman will see at once why Sir Wm. Meredith would not accept that. The government could give it one year, and withhold it another year, and it would be a personal vote to himself. My hon. friend says because Mr. Borden has consented to accept an allowance voted to him by statute that he is becoming a beneficiary to the government of the day, and that Sir Wm. Meredith would not put himself in such a position, but if Mr. Borden is in that position, so also is Sir Wm. Meredith, to-day, because he receives his salary as a judge from the government precisely as Mr. Borden does. Mr. Borden is no more dependent on the government of the day, and no more a beneficiary of the government than the judges are. My hon. friend says that it was an innovation. That statement is not exactly correct. Many years ago this parliament in its wisdom granted an increased allowance to the first minister, different from the allowance to any other cabinet minister. The first minister here as in England holds his position under certain conventions of the constitution and in Canada a sum of money is voted by statute as a salary to the prime minister in addition to what he receives as head of a department, precisely the same principle therefore has been adopted in giving a salary to the leader of the opposition that has prevailed in giving an extra allowance to the leader of the government. I can see no difference between the two cases. Before I leave that point I may say that for a long period of years both governments have voted an amount of money for clerical assistance for the leader of the opposition. That is recognizing him in the same way. It is exactly the same principle although in a different degree, but were we to agree that it is an innovation, does that settle it? To my mind it does not by any means. If the world had refused to adopt any good principle because it was an innovation, we would still be Druidical worshippers and we would be governed in this country without a parliament, and

> The good old way, the simple plan,
> That he shall take who has the power,
> And he shall hold who can.

would prevail in the relations of man to man.

It is by means of innovations that we have attained our present system of constitutional government; by innovations we have reached the high ideals of Christianity which prevails amongst us; by innovations we have reached the high plane of civilization which characterizes the foremost nations of the world. We are not going to discard any good principle because it is an innovation, and I maintain that the voting of a salary to the leader of the opposition is a good principle and that it should be supported and sustained by the people of the country, as I believe it will be so supported and sustained when it comes to be thoroughly understood. I had the pleasure of meeting the representatives of the party to which I belong, some four hundred of them, in conference in January last, in Prince Edward Island, and this question was brought up. I am able to tell you, and my statement will be supported by one of my colleagues in this House who was present at the meeting, that it only took about twenty minutes to dispose of this matter. The gentleman who brought up the question in an advance way left the meeting without recording his vote and the resolution on the subject, approving the action which was taken, was adopted with enthusiasm. And I believe such will be the verdict of the country at large when they come to understand it.

With regard to the increase of pay of the members of parliament, and in regard to all measures of a like nature which were brought down last year, I have no hesitation in saying that I hold the government very blameable. There is something to recommend itself in every one of these propositions, but I say without fear of being successfully controverted, that these measures should not have been brought down so late and brought down in a bunch as if it was a system of log rolling that was being inagurated. These measures should have been gone over deliberately, carefully and in detail early in the session, so that the press, and members of parliament would have ample time to consider their provisions, and if that were done there would be less dissatisfaction in the country than there is to-day. The government is responsible for that dissatisfaction by having brought down so many important measures at so late a period. For years we have pleaded for increases in the salaries of the judges in many parts of this country. I know that there was a crying demand for an increase, and I have no hesitation in saying also that the members of parliament should be adequately paid. Although I would not have objected if a smaller amount, say $2,000 had been voted to members of parliament, still I believe the amount at which the sessional allowance has been fixed is not too great.

If a gentleman is sent to parliament who is not worth $2,500 a year, it is the fault of the constituency and not of the amount of his allowance and if a gentleman is called to be a member of this honourable House who is not worth $2,500 a year to the country, the fault lies in the advice given to His Excellency in making the selection and not in the amount of the allowance. I believe that the people of the country, when the matter is fairly, clearly and fully laid before them, will regard it as very small politics to attempt to raise a cry on this subject. It is, in my opinion, unworthy of the press of Canada, when some of the most influential newspapers apply the word grab to the members of parliament because they voted a reasonable amount for their own remuneration. Why should it be so regarded? What other authority could vote an increase of pay to the members but themselves? Is there any other power under our constitution by which the services of members of parliament can be rated except by a vote of their own? I had my attention called, when looking up some other information, to a speech made by Sir Wm. Meredith in the Ontario legislature on this very question, in which he denounced in the strongest terms the application of offensive and opprobrious expressions to members of parliament because they voted to increase their own salaries. In England the principle has recently been adopted by the imperial parliament. The amount parliament has named is a small one, but it is the introduction of the principle and no doubt later on it will be carried further. In the United States, for many years, they have paid five thousand dollars to Congressmen in addition to which there has been a sum of from twelve to fifteen hundred dollars a year provided for clerical assistance, and now I see it is proposed to raise the salary to seven thousand five hundred dollars, leaving the clerical assistance to remain as before. In the Australia commonwealth the amount paid to members is four hundred pounds or two thousand dollars, and Australia is not to be compared with Canada either in wealth or in the importance of the legislation with which it has to deal. In some of the provinces of Australia,—New South Wales and Victoria—they pay £300 as sessional indemnity. There has been a great deal made of this question in the country, but when the electors come to discuss it fairly, calmly and reasonably, there will not be very serious fault found with it.

I had intended at some point in this discussion to interject a few observations with regard to matters in the speech, and I presume as I am now on the floor of the House, and have disposed of the subject which was more particularly in my mind when I arose, I may as well make the few other observations which I intended to address to the House at a later stage. The hon. gentleman who moved the address made a very admirable speech, to which I had the pleasure of listening very attentively, as well as to that of my hon. friend who seconded it who, I know, always speaks judiciously. But the hon. gentleman who moved the address started by throwing into the arena as a subject for discussion the Autonomy Bill and the fight of last session on that measure. Of course, he did not do it aggressively, but he brought the subject up. For my own part I think, that, important as that discussion was and great as were the principles involved, and however unpleasant the result has been in a constitutional sense to many of the people of the Northwest and how much the co-religionists of the minority in the other provinces of Canada feel that they have not obtained what they were promised or what Sir Wilfrid Laurier proposed to give them, or pretends even yet that he did give them,—I feel that this question might well have been allowed to pass from public discussion for the present.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We have so many questions of great importance pressing themselves upon us that we cannot afford to be going back over the work of a previous session and bringing it into the next. We must deal with the issues that are coming before us each session as we meet them. My hon. friend did not, however, in his observations refer to one point that I think is of great importance in connection with the granting of autonomy to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. And that is what I regard as a grave constitutional—I would almost say crime—that was committed—the great offence against the constitution of the country in passing over Mr. Haultain and calling upon Mr. Walter Scott to form a government in Saskatchewan. I had hoped from what occurred with regard to a former governor in British Columbia and the action of the government in removing that governor—an action almost on similar lines with that of the government of Sir John Macdonald in removing Lieutenant Governor Letellier in the province of Quebec—I had hopes that as our constitution would be worked out from year to year under different parties that we would not have any further complaints to make with regard to governors using their influence improperly or being held under the influence of the federal government. A painful impression has been created by this act that the governor of Saskatchewan was influenced from Ottawa by the federal government, and that he passed over the man above all others that was the most eligible and most in the minds of the people, who had enjoyed their confidence again and again—Mr. Haultain—and took Mr. Walter Scott from the federal arena and entrusted him with the duty of forming a government. In speaking on this subject in another place the Premier gives as a reason justifying this course the allegation that Mr. Haultain was not loyal to the constitution of the new province, and that on that account he was properly passed over. If hon. gentlemen will just think for a moment they will see that any man could be ostracised on similar grounds. What one man might consider to be loyalty to the constitution another man might regard as treason. To my mind Mr. Haultain's course was one of loyalty to the constitution of Canada, and I think on that account there is no reason whatever why Mr. Haultain should have been passed over. It forces the painful conclusion upon our minds that the whole thing was originated in and directed from Ottawa that Lieutenant-Governor Forget was influenced by the ministers here to pass over Mr. Haultain. In fact the cause of the action is not concealed, but is assigned by the Premier in another place, only a few hours ago, as being on account of the supposed hostility of Mr. Haultain to what he called the constitution of the new province or in other words to the policy of the Liberal party.

I notice that in the speech with which His Excellency has opened this session there are three paragraphs devoted to the Northwest and I am pleased to say that I agree with all of them.

His Excellency says in two of these :

> The bountiful harvest with which we have been blessed in the past season, together with the continued development of our industries and transportation facilities, have so stimulated business in all parts of Canada and have given such an impetus to our exports and imports that the trade both with the United Kingdom and foreign countries for the current fiscal year gives promise of being the largest on record.
> The flow of immigrants seeking homes in the three prairie provinces still continues, and from the present outlook the number will be in excess of any previous year, and it is gratifying to note the increasing proportion from the British Isles.

We are pleased to hear these statements. My attention was called in connection with this subject to a speech made by one of the most influential members of this government, the Minister of Finance some twenty years ago, with regard to the Northwest. In 1886, Mr. Fielding, speaking in support of his motion for a repeal of the union, said :

> Immense expenditures of public money have been incurred for the construction of railroads in the far west, while the roads of the lower provinces remain practically undeveloped. One would think we were an old and finished country, in which nothing remained to be done in the way of public works and that our money could well afford to be spent in the far west. We know that this is not true, that the development of railrods is more needful to us than to the great provinces of the west, because tthe great provinces in the west are not needful to the confederation.

That was the deliberate opinion of the present Finance Minister in 1886 after the Canadian Pacific Railway was completed—that these great provinces were not needful to confederation. I know very well that the hon. gentleman who made this speech would rather almost meet his grandmother's ghost than the reproduction of such a speech as this at the present day, and that he now, like myself, regards the great Northwest as being the most important part of confederation and realizes the fact that it is in these great western provinces that the future of Canada to a large extent must lie.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition, addresed some observations to the House with regard to the insurance investigation proposed to be entered upon by the present government. I entirely agree with my hon. friend that an independent commission is a better method of investigation than a parliamentary committee would be, providing the commissioners are instructed not to adhere to strict rules of evidence and are given the most ample scope, and that they are able and independent men. Provided all this has been attained, I am free to admit that a better investigation can be had, because the different parts of the country may be visited and thus better results obtained than by a parliamentary investigation. The experience of this House two years ago in connection with a select committee which inquired into the management of one company was not satisfactory to any of us. This investigation must be of a very technical and expert nature, and on that account I think it was better on the whole that it should be dealt with in the way proposed. While saying that much, however, I must say I am doubtful about the personnel of the commission. I have not the pleasure of knowing any of the gentlemen, except that I have a slight acquaintance with the chairman, Judge MacTavish. What I do know of him is most satisfactory. I have met him on different occasions and have also heard favourable opinions expressed of him, and have no doubt he is an excellent man; but at the same time I entirely dissent from the action of the government in appointing a judge on the commission. It is a vicious practice, and one that should be abandoned. We talk of beneficiaries of the government; but when action of this kind is taken the judges become in reality beneficiaries of a government. When you give a judge a clear-cut salary and provide for him by statute, he should be required to perform strictly judicial duties only. When he is called from the bench and paid for other services, his attention is distracted from his judicial duties. I have condemned the same thing in this House on many occasions, and I cannot pass over the present appointment without uttering the same condemnation. I must say that I have heard the most satisfactory things said about Mr. Langmuir, another member of this commission; but there is this difference in regard to his case. It is alleged—I have no personal knowledge of the fact—that the Trust Company of which he is manager has a board of directors, most of whom are at the same time directors of insurance companies, so that really he will be investigating the transactions of men who are to a great extent his masters. If that is the case a very great mistake has been made, and the country will not, I believe, place the confidence in the work of the commission which they otherwise would have done. However, if the commission is perfectly untrammelled and all its proceedings are regular and the investigation proves thorough this may be condoned; but I am convinced that an actuary should have been a member of this commission.

The third gentleman named is a chartered accountant, but a chartered accountant is of no practical use in investigating the affairs of insurance companies. The most important phases of the insurance question call for men of very high mathematical training, who have passed examination as actuaries; and I think great pains should have been taken to get an actuary. The answer to that may be that a man could not have been obtained in Canada who is not connected with the companies. The same objection would come up as is coming against Mr. Langmuir, but they would perhaps be more directly influenced than Mr. Langmuir would be. But even if it had been necessary to go out of this country and bring an English actuary here, a man whose qualifications would be beyond all doubt, and who would be entirely free from any entanglements with insurance companies, I think a better result would have been obtained. However, it is still open to the government to employ an actuary, an expert to assist the counsel in the investigation, and if a full and complete investigation is made, and people are satisfied, these objections will all be brushed to one side. I am here to say that, holding policies as I do in different insurance companies myself, and members of my family being interested also, and watching very closely their affairs, I have very great confidence that no grave scandals will be disclosed in the investigation. But even if that should unfortunately occur, the public mind has been disturbed by what has happened in the United States that it is proper that the investigation should be made, and I am in accord with the government in appointing a commission to undertake it. I am sorry they did not exercise greater care in selecting the commissioners, leaving out the judge and selecting men undoubtedly disinterested and qualified for the position.

The paragraph in the speech which refers to the report of the International Waterways Commission has suggested to my mind what has already been sufficiently discussed in this House, that is the Bill relating to the Minnesota and Ontario Power Company passed last session. I took a great deal of interest in that Bill and as soon as I scanned its provisions came to the conclusion that it was a Bill with which we should take the greatest possible care, because it was the first time we came to deal with water power in connection with these international waterways, and our action would be taken as a precedent and might have a very dangerous effect in other places as well as in the place where it was proposed this company should operate. The result, however, proved what has been often proved before to my knowledge, and this House did a most valuable service for Canada inasmuch as it made ample amendments to that Bill, and the clauses introduced in it by the Senate will form very valuable aids to any authority that will ultimately deal with the greater question of our waterpowers along the boundary between Canada and the United States. Reference has also been made in the address to the National Transcontinental Railway and the fact that 400 miles of that road will soon be under contract. That suggests a subject that was brought up in a very pertinent way by my hon. friend from Halifax towards the close of last session, that is with regard to the action of the government in connection with the road from Quebec to Moncton. My hon. friend pointed out on that occasion that by an interim report of Mr. Butler who had charge of the survey, that this proposed route through the centre of New Brunswick would not shorten the line as compared with the Intercolonial Railway, and it brought up the question to our minds of what was claimed to be gained by the construction of that section of the National Transcontinental Railway, by the leader of the government when he introduced the National Transcontinental Railway Bill, when he ventured the opinion that that road would shorten the distance between Quebec and Moncton by about 140 miles. If my memory is right Mr. Butler's interim report on the subject showed that the only route that had been found through the centre of New Brunswick would make the road nearly 11 miles longer than the Intercolonial Railway. The subject should seriously engage the attention of parliament. The contracts have not yet been let on that end of the line, and if these statements are true, that no material difference can be made in the length of the line, parliament should certainly pause before allowing the government to proceed, and the government should pause before proceeding to build that part of the eastern extension. The Intercolonial Railway is doing badly enough at present but if you build another line at an expense of $20,000,000 to take the traffic from the Intercolonial Railway you will create a situation that ought not to be created unless for the most grave and serious public reason. I see no reason whatever. There is no demand even in the centre of New Brunswick for that road. I believe the feeling in that part of New Brunswick is against the road, because they fear that its construction will destroy the valuable timber areas in a country which is valuable chiefly for its lumber. They have waterways by which they can get their lumber out, and there is no strong feeling even along the projected line in favour of the construction of that road. If that is so, and it will not shorten the route materially, it is marvellous to me that the government do not reconsider the question and come to parliament with some proposition by which this extraordinary condition of things would not be perpetrated.

It being six o'clock, I move that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until three p.m. to-morrow.

THE STRIKING COMMITTEE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved :

That, pursuant to rule 79, the following senators be appointed a committee of selection to nominate the senators to serve on the several standing committees during the present session, namely :—The Honourable Sir Mackenzie Bowell, K.C.M.G., and the Honourable Messieurs Miller, Power, Ferguson, Gibson, Watson, Lougheed, Béique, and Casgrain (de Lanaudière), and to report with all convenient speed the names of the senators so nominated.

The motion was agreed to.

CAPE BRETON PILOTS RETIRING FUND.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.) moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, all correspondence between the Pilot Commissioners, the secretary of the Board of Pilot Commissioners, or any of the officials of that board, at Sydney, Cape Breton, and the Department of Marine and Fisheries, or any of the officials of the said department, showing : 1. The amount paid into the pilots' retiring fund in each year, from December 31st, 1896, to December 31st, 1905, respectively. 2nd. The amount paid into the pilots' widows' and orphans' relief fund from December 31st, 1896, to December 31st, 1905, respectively. 3rd. The disposition made of the said funds in each year during the above-mentioned period; the amount on hand on December 31st, 1905; the interest it bears; where it is deposited; the security for its safety for the benefit of the widows and the orphans of pilots. 4th. The amount on hand in these funds, respectively, on December 31st. 1896. Also all other correspondence. if any, bearing on this matter.

He said. I wish to say a few words as regards the matter of this motion. In 1896, the Pilot Commission of North Sydney was changed and a new commission appointed The by-laws and regulations of the pilot board at Sydney and North Sydney provided a fund for the payment of retired pilots and for the widows and orphans of the pilots. It is said that the fund at that time amounted to $4.700. On the change being made in the Pilot Commission, the new board ordered the secretary of the old board to hand the money over to a new secretary or a new treasurer. The pilots alleged that they have been unable to obtain an account of that money from that day to this. The widows and orphans of the pilots entitled to a portion of that money have not yet been able to secure any of it. It is said that it has mysteriously disappeared. The secretary of the Pilotage Commission now refuses to give any account or explanation of that fact. The pilots hold the old secretary, to whom they paid the money, responsible for this amount of four thousand seven hundred dollars. The matter is causing a great deal of talk among the pilots and their friends and others in that district. It appears by the press that they have been unable to secure any satisfaction from the Board of Pilot Commissioners, or from the secretary of that board, and they have been unable to take any legal steps to secure this money. They have applied to the local premier; they have applied to the attorney general, but no steps have been taken to secure it. They have been informed that it was necessary for the pilots to get incorporated before they could bring a suit in the Supreme Court for the recovery of this money. For these reasons I wish to move for all the correspondence relating to the matter. I wish also to read what the local press of Sydney has to say on that point. The Sydney 'Post' says :

WHERE IS THE MONEY ?

It is evidently impossible to obtain any information regarding the missing relief and retiring fund, which the pilots of Sydney Harbour gathered together by hard labour extending over a period of years. The money was intrusted to an official of the Pilotage Commission. It amounted to about $4,700. It has mysteriously disappeared. The commission have been appealed to and they are dumb. The Crown prosecutor has taken no action as far as we can ascertain. The attorney general has not moved in the matter. The Department of Marine is deaf to all appeals. The members of parliament for the country have pursued a course of masterly inactivity in this regard. The premier of Nova Scotia has not time to give his attorney general a hint of it. The culprit goes free. The pilots and their heirs suffer and there is no redress.

Some of the pilots are reported to be afraid to press the matter lest they might be dismissed. Others of them are said to be glad that the fund disappeared when it did because they believe that it would only be stolen anyway and the bigger the amount the bigger the temptation.

It is rather a sad state of affairs if a body of industrious men cannot lay by a fund upon which they may draw in an emergency without having it appropriated by some office holder.

Now it is said that the official who got possession of this money, placed it to his own credit and drew the money on his own cheque and that it disappeared. It is said that the government is now about to force this official to mortgage his property; that they in the meantime will supply the lost money and secure themselves by taking a mortgage from this official for the amount. The 'Post' goes on to say:

The report comes now that in response to the public exposure that has been made, and in order to relieve a faithful follower, who was so unwise as to allow himself to be found out, the government is going to restore the missing fund and that they will take as collateral a mortgage on certain properties at North Sydney.

I am not responsible for the accuracy of this statement; I am merely reading it to you.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to this motion going, but I am informed by an official of the department that this information is given every year in a supplement to the report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I have tried to get a copy of the report, but we simply seem to be unable to get one when we want it. In order to test the correctness of the statement that has been made to me, and see if the information is printed annually I sent a page for a copy, but he could not get it. If information on such matters is printed annually in the departmental report, there is no ground for the accusation made by my hon. friend. We shall see that all the information comes down.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And that it includes all the correspondence?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Whatever is available in the department.

The motion was agreed to.

DIVISION OF PARLAMENTARY BUSINESS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DAVID inquired:

Does the government intend to adopt some measure to divide the legislative work between the Senate and the House of Commons, in order to avoid rush of work and hasty consideration at the end of the session?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The question is asked every year or two, whether we could not equalize the business before parliament in order that the Senate may have their share of the work in the early part of the session, but it does not seem possible. So far as private bill legislation is concerned, it embraces a large proportion that depends upon the wishes of the promoters. The House of Commons consists of nearly three times as many members as this chamber. They are more in touch with the people naturally. The business of initiating private bill legislation goes as a rule, however, to the House of Commons members, although some of it may come to the senators. If they are themselves in touch with those who have private bills to submit to parliament, they will naturally come here. In reference to government bills it is a more difficult question. Naturally the minister at the head of the department, when it is proposed to make any change in the law over which that department has special jurisdiction, he prefers that he shall have the inauguration of his own measure, because he has to explain the changes that are asked for in the earlier stages of the bill. Government bills as a rule emanate from the departments of Justice, Marine and Fisheries, Railways and Canals and Public Works. I have repeatedly asked my colleagues to allow me to introduce bills in this Chamber, and on several occasions have succeeded in doing so. I shall be only too glad to increase the number at any time the opportunity presents itself.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—As regards government Bills I appreciate the answer made by the hon. Secretary of State. He has just stated that the government will do everything in their power to give us the introduction of public bills when possible. As to the private bills, I do not see why it should not be possible to divide the initiation of that legislation. I do not know exactly when or to what extent that division should take place. Perhaps it could take place at the outset when the petition is sent in by the promoter of the bill and the deposit is made with the public officer, and a decision then would be recognized by both Houses; or perhaps when the petition is presented to the House of Commons the choice might be made by the Minister of Justice. I do not pretend to have sufficient experience to indicate the mode which could be adopted, but as hon. gentlemen know there is at present a revision of the rules of both Houses being made. Two committees have been appointed, one by the House of Commons and the other by the Senate to revise the rules. Would it not then be possible to instruct these committees to see whether they could not agree upon a mode which should be adopted for the distribution of private Bills on their introduction. I am not ready to say how it is done in England, but we all know that whatever mode of distributing the work obtains in England, it is done in a much more practical way. If the question was seriously studied by both committees, I think they could come very easily to some agreement in virtue of which the Senate would not be obliged to wait six or seven weeks before Bills come to them for their consideration, and they would not then be exposed to having the rush of work, and hasty consideration towards the end of the session which has been criticised so justly by some of the most prominent members of this House. There must be a remedy; as they say in French, 'Where there is a will there is a way.' We must admit that our frequent adjournments are not very well understood, or very favourably appreciated by the public; and in the eyes of many, we have to bear the responsibility of those adjournments. It is unjust. Any way we should put it on record that the members of the Senate have done everything in their power to change this state of things and have shown their willingness to assist in promoting the work of the session, and the interest of their country and the Senate.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—This question has occupied the attention of the House almost every session for several years past, and I do not think any reform can be introduced. We must take conditions as they are. We must remember that most of the heads of the departments are in the other House, and that consequently any minister having measures to bring before parliament, it is only proper that he should introduce them in the House where he can explain them, and we can say nothing against such procedure. Most of the ministers being in the other House, the bulk of the Bills must of necessity be first introduced in the Commons. We must also remember that the people at large look more to their members in the Commons to carry their measures through parliament than they do to the Senate. They are more in touch with people at large than we are, and consequently any one having a measure to promote sends it to the member representing the section from which he comes. The people have a right to go to whom they please and consequently we cannot force any reform in that way, or press for the introduction of private Bills in this Chamber more than is now done. The government might bring down their own measures sooner than they do sometimes; at the same time we must remember that the Senate has never unduly delayed the prorogation of parliament. Unless we make strict rules, applicable in all cases without exception, we cannot accomplish anything in that direction.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called.

Resuming the adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the second session of the tenth parliament.—Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON said: When the House adjourned yesterday afternoon I was making some observations with regard to the National Transcontinental Railway and I pointed out the grave questions that I think still exist and should be pressed on the minds of parliament and on the government and the country as to whether the eastern part of that road from Moncton to Quebec should be proceeded with. I placed some reasons before the House yesterday, which I think are very strong ones, and should call for serious consideration before any steps are taken to build that part of the line at all events. Parliament has at least a right to expect that a full and complete survey of that part of the line shall be laid before both Houses before any contracts are called for or anything is done in regard to it, in view of the very strong opinions that I know exist in the minds of men of both political parties as to the propriety of proceeding with that section. With regard to the road generally I have not seen anything to cause me to change the opinion I held when the question was first submitted to this House three years ago. I have seen nothing to change my view as to the unwisdom of the course then taken in authorizing the construction of that road. I have seen many things which more than ever convince me that a great mistake was made. One of these things is the paralleling in such close proximity other roads between Winnipeg and Edmonton, and faith has not been kept with the people of this country. We were told most emphatically that the new line would break new ground in the Northwest and serve as a colonization road for a very large proportion of the fertile belt which was not served by the existing railroads. Instead of that being the case, the entire distance I may say from Winnipeg to Edmonton, the road runs very close to existing railways—as close as even in the older settled parts of the country, would be regarded as not altogether the proper thing to do. On all these considerations I have seen no reason to change my views, but I think the eastern section from Moncton to Quebec is one which should be very carefully considered before a sod is turned towards its construction. I am aware that after the subject was discussed in this House last year on a motion by the hon. member from Halifax that the Board of Trade of Halifax passed a resolution with respect to it. I do not know who constitutes the Board of Trade at Halifax or whether the meeting at which the resolution was passed was largely attended, but I do know that resolutions are very easily put through at Boards of Trade. They do not feel much responsibility for big undertakings of this kind and as long as some local advantage appears to them to be in sight, they care very little for the general broad consideration. I have not been able to find in any part of the lower provinces, where I have come in contact with public opinion, that any strong feeling exists in favour of the construction of that part of the line from Moncton to Quebec. On the contrary I found adverse opinion with regard to its construction.

Now, with reference to the general question of the National Transcontinental Railway, hon. gentlemen will remember very well—and the point was brought out by the leader of the opposition in his very able address on Monday last—that before this National Transcontinental Railway scheme was broached, or before the public knew that it was coming, an announcement was made in the speech at the opening of parliament three years ago that a commission was to be appointed to consider the general question of transportation in Canada, and we know that some months after the opening of parliament that commission was appointed and very elaborate and full instructions were given in the form of an order in council, which was submitted to parliament, and afterwards such commission was appointed. All this was done before the introduction of the National Transcontinental Railway Bill. It was pointed out at the time that it was rather forestalling the work of that commission to proceed with the National Transcontinental Railway before having the report of that commission. We are told, 'Oh it is for another purpose altogether; its work can not be expected to throw any light upon the scheme that is covered by the Bill now introduced.' The speech contains a paragraph that a report—not a final report—from that transportation commission is to be laid before parliament. It has got into the press, and is not contradicted, that one recommendation, a very important recommendation of that commission is that the government should build a road extending the Intercolonial Railway from Montreal to Georgian Bay. Now, if that is so, the commission has certainly understood its instructions in a way different from what was stated in this House by the friends of the Bill three years ago; for that would be a very essential point as determining the propriety of undertaking the road as it has been undertaken by the government of Canada. As my hon. friend from Belleville, pointed out on Monday, the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons urged the government as a counter proposition to acquire the Canada Atlantic Railway, which was then in the market and effect the purpose of transportation between the east and the west in that way, instead of building a railway, away north of Ottawa in a direct route from Winnipeg to Quebec. What do we find? Although we have not the report before us yet, still it has been published in the papers, and that announcement is believed to be true, that this commission reports that the right thing for the government of Canada to do, is to get possession of the Canada Atlantic Railway or build a road that would tap the Georgian bay, and in that way acquire for the Intercolonial Railway the traffic of the west. If that is true, it throws light upon the discussions which we then had, and shows most conclusively that Mr. Borden was right on that occasion, and that a grand opportunity has been lost to Canada by allowing the Canada Atlantic, then owned by Mr. Booth, and for sale, to pass into the hands of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, rendering it absolutely impossible for the government to get it except by means of expropriation at greatly enhanced cost, or necessitating the building of a parallel road between Montreal and Georgian bay. I mention this to show that precipitation, at least, was used in passing that Bill, and that this transportation commission ought to have been allowed to make its report before the country was committed to this tremendous deal. I did not say when this Bill was before the House and did not believe then that the people of Canada were not able to build that road. We know that the resources of this country are great. I was not prepared to say that a great deal of good would not arise in the settlement of the country and carrying freight from the west by means of that road, but I did say, and I believe that events will prove that I was right, and that gentlemen acting with me were right, that there were other and better ways by which Canada could proceed immediately to foster and develop transportation between the east and west than by adopting the stupendous scheme of constructing the Transcontinental Railway.

There is a promise in the speech from the Throne that a Bill wil be introduced to amend the Fruit Marks Act. The subject is one of very great importance, although many hon. gentlemen may not appreciate it, to a large industry in Canada. It is known to hon. gentlemen that, taking one year with another, Canada exports more apples to Europe than the United States of America do, and the surplus that we are raising and exporting is likely to increase faster than the surplus fruit production in the United States, because our consumption is not as great and we have in Canada, I believe, a larger area of country adapted for the production of apples than there is in the United States. A firmer and better quality of apple with a better flavour is produced in our northern latitudes than in the milder climates of the south. This subject is of very great importance. Some years ago the Minister of Agriculture had a Bill passed, known as the Fruit Marks Act. We discussed that measure very fully in this House and it was amended in very many important particulars here after it had left the House of Commons, and I am free to say from what I know of this question that the amendments which we made to the Bill have been very beneficial. Since that time there has been no attempt made on the part of the government to restore the clauses that we removed from the Bill in 1901. At that time I had very serious misgivings with regard to other provisions of that measure, and one of them was this ; that without interfering with the classification or standard of No. 1 and No. 2 apples as provided in the General Inspection Act of 1893, there was a provision inserted in the Fruit Marks Act that an exporter or dealer in apples could not be convicted of fraud unless more than ten per cent of the apples contained in a barrel of No. 1 apples were found to be wormy, scabbed, inferior in size or defective in other respects. Hon. gentlemen will remember that that provision did not provide a definition of No. 1 apples. By no means. We had the definition in the General Inspection Act ; but here was a clause which permitted a dealer in apples to put No. 1 on his barrel and still have ten per cent of bad apples stowed away in it. I believe, as a result of four years experience, it is demonstrated to-day that that is not a good provision. There were other clauses in that Act which provided for a force of inspectors, and provided penalties for facing or other dishonest practises and they worked well. Inspection always does good. It is true that you cannot inspect every barrel of apples or every barrel of flour, but provided that there are good inspectors appointed, they are able to intercept most shipments of apples passing through and to drop down upon a dishonest packer; but as matters stand now, when the inspectors open a barrel, although there may ten per cent of inferior fruit in it, they cannot get at the offender, and I believe he should be got at and punished. I make this statement early because I know the minister is preparing an amendment to this Act pushing the provisions of the Fruit Marks Act still further, and I am desirous that he should know my views at this stage in order that he may think them over. A convention of fruit growers is called, to meet on the twentieth of this month, to advise with the minister with regard to this and any other matters relating to the packing and shipment of fruit. I will not be present at that meeting. I cannot be present or take any part in it and I think this is a better way of putting my views on record than even by going to the meeting. It will also give others who are interested in the question an opportunity of considering what I say and forming their own views as to whether I am right or wrong.

Now this here is the way we have progressed in this matter of apple shipments. In 1898 Prof. Robertson appeared before the Agriculture and Colonization Committee of the House of Commons and gave—as he always does when he appears before any committee or before any audience—very valuable evidence with regard to our trade. He had passed the foregoing season in Great Britain watching the landing of our apples and other products, and examining for himself into the character of the trade. He said in 1898 before the committee of the House of Commons :

> On the whole, in England, I did not find more than two or three per cent of the apples not honestly packed. I mean by that, barrels that are faced by fine apples and filled with poor ones. There has been a larger percentage of our apples landed in Liverpool in a damaged condition by heating on the voyage or otherwise, but I do not think that more than two or three per cent were packed dishonestly.

He was dealing with the export trade. It is a notorious fact that the apples produced in Canada and put on the home market are generally very badly packed. Much inferior stuff finds its way to the home market and that is why the question is continually coming before our people. Every consumer is confronted with the fact that trash is put on the home market, but in 1898 Prof. Robertson found that as regards the export trade there was only two or three per cent which could be said to be dishonestly packed. Now after eight years. Mr. Jackson, the Canadian agent at Leeds. sent this report to the Department of Agriculture, and I find it published in a Montreal paper on the 1st of February last. It says :—

> John B. Jackson, Canadian trade agent at Leeds, in a report received to-day quotes a north of England trader as saying that the fraudulent methods of packing apples practiced in Canada this year has created a deep feeling of suspicion, which it will take some time to remove. This dealer, when satisfied that the practice has been discontinued would take from 200 to 300 barrels per week.

Now here was Prof. Robertson's report in 1898, that not more than two or three per cent of the shipments were bad, and here we have the government agent reporting that the general character of the apples is now so bad that traders will not take them. Now I want my hon. friend the Secretary of State and the members of the government to take note of what I say. I believe that that provision in the Fruit Marks Act permitting ten per cent of inferior apples to be put in every package before a dealer can be prosecuted, has lowered the standard of our apples and very many persons are taking improper advantage of it. Indeed you will find a great many of opinion that apples are still up to the full standard of No. 1 although ten per cent of the fruit may be of an inferior character. I hold that the inspection is all right, and that good work is done, but the inspectors ought to be able to get at the offenders and there should be nothing in the law which would indicate that it is possible to put in ten per cent of bad fruit into every barrel of apples. We still have the provision in the General Inspection Act governing such cases, but parliament made another law, the Fruit Marks Act, which provided that notwithstanding the standard of apples should be what I am going to read and what is in the General Inspection Act, that a packer could not be prosecuted unless it is found that ten per cent in every barrel were bad although he had marked them as No. 1 :

> No. 1 inspected apples shall consist of well-grown specimens of one variety, sound, of nearly uniform size, of good colour for the variety, of normal shape, and not less than ninety per cent free from scab, worm, holes, bruises and other defects and properly packed.

That is the law, but we never hear about it, but we hear apple dealers all over the country saying, 'Oh we are allowed to put in ten per cent of bad apples in every barrel.' I believe harm has been done by the passage of that law, and I think it would be better to wipe out the section of the Fruit Marks Act which permits it. Keep on with your inspection; enforce it by every means you can; but remove that provision. I believe that if that were done the standard of our apples would rise instead of going down, as it appears to be going down, if the report of Mr. Jackson of Leeds is entitled to any credence whatever.

Members of the government have been speaking on public questions during the interim, as they have a very good right to do, and as the country really expects them to do; but I would say with regard to some of the colleagues of my hon. friend the leader of the House and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that it would be a very good thing if either of these gentlemen would say to some of their colleagues as a very eminent prelate in my part of the country said to a man who was proposing to enter public life and who asked him for his advice as to whether he was altogether fit for the position, 'keep your mouth shut and you will do.' I think there are some of my hon. friend's colleagues who stand in need of some such advise. My hon. friend to my left (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) referred to the Minister of Militia and his remarkable speech on the Monroe Doctrine. I would cite another case and that is the Minister of Agriculture, in the extraordinary speech which he has made lately in reference to British preference for Canadian products. After all that has been said on this question, after the action that has been taken by the parliament of Canada and by the government of Canada, not only here but in the conferences held in England in regard to this question, is it not a most extraordinary thing that the Minister of Agriculture, the minister who above all others might be expected to voice the sentiments of the government on this question, seeing that agricultural exports are the most important of all our exports to Great Britain—should put himself on record, and impliedly put the government on record, as being indifferent to whether we got a preference in the British market or not. I do not think it is necessary to refer to what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said on this subject in 1896, I presume hon. gentlemen are familiar with those speeches which he made in London and Toronto, when he said 'that Sir Charles Tupper was not more anxious for a preference for Canadian products in the British market than himself and he pointed out the immense possibilities there were there with regard to our butter, eggs and cheese and all our other products being allowed free admission into the markets of Great Britain while similar products from Russia, the United States and other countries should be subject to a duty. He ended up by saying the possibilities were immense. Those were his words, but it might be thought that the hon. gentleman had changed his mind and did not at present entertain the same opinion. In fact it woud be inferred that the Minister of Agriculture spoke for his colleagues when he said that it was a matter of indifference to Canada whether she obtained a preference or not, in fact that he was pleased at what he thought was a decision adverse to any such admission of our products. That decision was the result of the recent British election. Now, I turn to the resolutions of the colonial conference which was held in England in 1902, and I find these resolutions were passed:

That this conference recognizes that, in the present circumstances of the colonies, it is not practicable to adopt the general system of free trade. The principle of preferential trade between the United Kingdom and His Majesty's Dominions beyond the seas would stimulate and facilitate mutual commercial intercourse, and would, by promoting the development of the resources and industries of the several parts strengthen the empire.

Another resolution reads:

That with a view, however, to promoting the increase of trade within the empire it is desirable that those colonies which have not already adopted such a policy should, as far as their circumstances permit, give substantial preferential treatment to the products and manufactures of the United Kingdom.

That the prime ministers of the colonies respectfully urge on His Majesty's government the expediency of granting in the United Kingdom preferential treatment to the products and manufactures of the colonies, either by exemption from or reduction of duties now or hereafter imposed.

Hon. gentlemen can easily see how inconsistent with these resolutions was the announcement of the Minister of Agriculture the other day, that it was a matter of indifference to Canada, and further when he expressed pleasure that the English electors had, as he claimed, voted adversely on the question of giving a preference to Canada. The resolution goes on to say :

That the prime ministers present at the conference undertake to submit to their respective governments at the earliest opportunity the principle of the resolution and to request them to take such measures as may be necessary to give effect to it.

Now, in connection with that, allow me to read a letter which has been addressed to Mr. Sydney Fisher, the Minister of Agriculture, by Colonel C. Howard Vincent, M.P., Honorary Secretary and founder of the United Empire League. After remarking on the change which has occurred in Mr. Fisher's views since September, 1904, when he welcomed the representatives of the United Empire Trade League at Ottawa, the writer proceeds :

But availing myself of a personal acquaintance with you and deeply interested in the question, I venture to ask you if you have been correctly reported and in such case, if the views to which you gave expression have become those of the Canadian government, and particularly of the Premier, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, of the Minister of Finance, the Hon. W. S. Fielding and of the board of trade and agricultural associations throughout Canada ? But what has brought about so sudden a right about face I am at a loss to understand. The administrations of Sir John Macdonald, of Sir Charles Tupper and of Sir Wilfrid Laurier have for a quarter of a century shaped their course straight towards the imperial goal of commercial federation without regard to party—I had almost said 'parochial' politics. After reviewing the history of the movement in favour of preference, the writer adds :

Why, then this change ? Do you really think that England has come to a final decision because of the result of the recent general election ? Let me assure you that you are in error and misinformed. Neither Mr. Chamberlain nor any one of his 150 followers in the House of Commons is in the least discouraged. No less than 44 per cent. of the votes cast were for our candidates. . . . We are not dismayed nor defeated, nor routed, not driven to recantation of our opinions because to-day there is an excess Liberal free import vote of 3 per cent or so, even though reinforced from other sources.

Col. Howard Vincent says that forty-four per cent of the popular vote was recorded in favour of preferential trade. We know how that may happen, from the experiences we have had in this country, we know how easy it is for a large majority to be returned on one side though the popular vote may not be proportionately large in its favour, and he points out that that is what happened in England. It is very important that in regard to this matter it should be thoroughly understood what is the position of the government. Are the views which Mr. Fisher announced in his speech the views of his colleagues? If they are we should know it. The empire wants to know if Mr. Fisher spoke for the government when he made a speech so thoroughly at variance with the policy of his party. An explanation should be called for.

Hon. Mr. POWER—An explanation has been made in another place.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I notice the speech from the Throne does not contain words which I might say have been regarded almost as consecrated to a particular use in the framing of regal or vice-regal speeches in all countries enjoying constitutional government. We are usually told that the estimates are framed with due regard to economy. These words are left out; it does not lie in the mouth of the present government to make such a claim. They know in their hearts, and they have some respect for truth, that no regard whatever for economy has been observed. They have omitted these words in the speech from the Throne, knowing very well that there has been no regard for economy whatever, not only in the present estimates, but in the estimates for many years past. With regard to the record of the present government on this question of economy hon. members when they come to know the authority from which it comes, will, I am quite sure, receive with great respect the extract I am about to read, and I think I recognize one gentleman in the Senate who will receive it with the most profound respect. I shall read the words and when I have read them, if I can see any reason for doubting who their author is I will announce it to the House :

Now I admit that abstract propositions cannot always be depended on. But I say that in matters financial you can almost with safety lay down this proposition : That whenever, without war or some other extraordinary cause like that you find the taxes of a country increasing very rapidly, increasing out of all proportion to its population, you can rest assured that the government has been grossly extravagant and in all possibility, grossly corrupt, and when you find the taxation remaining stationary for a term of years, you may feel equally assured that the government has been honestly and economically conducted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Who said that ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in this House. I call it the Cartwright canon, by which you can ascertain directly and precisely whether on the one hand the government is extravagant and corrupt or whether on the other hand economical and honest. I think it is very clearly laid down and entitled to be rated as a canon of criticism in financial matters. We will see how this has worked out during the years that have intervened since the hon. gentleman made this speech. I take from the public accounts, the taxes for nine years of the preceding administration and compare them with the nine years during which my hon. friend has been conducting the government of this country, and here is what I find. The taxes were, in round figures :

1888	$28,000,000
1889	30,000,000
1890	31,000,000
1891	30,000,000
1892	28,000,000
1893	29,000,000
1894	27,000,000
1895	25,000,000
1896	27,000,000
Total	$259,000,000

or an average of $28,800,000 for the nine years.

Hon Mr. McMILLAN—I suppose the hon. gentleman means the customs and excise duties ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The revenue collected by means of taxation, apart from revenues obtained from railways, post offices or these other sources of revenue ; and I do not think that it will include—I have not looked very closely at that—much more than the customs and excise revenues. However, that is what we generally refer to as our taxes, and that is the way it is described in the public accounts from the earliest days of confederation, and I know from the trend of the hon. gentleman's speeches, and the very speech from which I am quoting, that he was dealing with these figures when he spoke of the taxes of the country. Now what are the figures for the nine years the present government have been in power? The taxes were, in round figures :

1898	29,000,000
1899	34,000,000
1900	38,000,000
1901	38,000,000
1902	43,000,000
1903	49,000,000
1905	54,000,000

The increase of population during these years we cannot exactly get at, but, after making fair allowance for the larger influx of people into Canada during the latter than during the former period, I think the increase in the last decade was only eleven per cent, and I am willing to admit it has been greater since and I allow twelve per cent for the nine years. It would appear from the information we have that our population increased in the nine years about twelve per cent, while the taxation has increased nearly one hundred per cent. My hon. friend may say that our people have imported more, and that it is owing to the fact that they are more prosperous than they were before. There may be something in that, but it does not come into the question at all, because the hon. gentleman's doctrine at that time was that the government had no right to collect more taxes than were absolutely necessary to conduct economically the affairs of the country, and that it was the duty of the government, if the revenue was swelling, to reduce the rate of taxation to an amount which would be sufficient for honest and economical government. Here we have the Cartwright canon and here we have also the working out of that canon in practical operation. We find that during the Conservative administration in nine years the taxes of the people were not increased, but in the nine years that have intervened since that time the taxes have increased 100 per cent while the most that can be admitted as an increase to the population is that it has increased about 12 per cent. My hon. friend, in this canon to which I have referred, was particular to say that regard had to be had to the increase of population, and unless there was some large increase of population an increase of expenditure was not justifiable. I find in 1896 the total expenditure, including consolidated fund and capital, was $44,000,000. In 1905, the last financial year, it had gone up to over $78,000,000, an increase of $34,000,000 in the expenditure in nine years, or an increase of 78 per cent, while the population has increased only 12 per cent. I find the estimates for the last complete year were $85,000,000. We have estimates now for another nine months, and taking a slice equal to one-fourth from the estimates submitted last year and adding it to the $67,936,000, now estimated to be the expenditure for the nine months, we find the estimates brought down, without supplementary estimates, that we know will yet come, according to the invariable practice of this government and other governments, the amount to be voted for the next financial year is to be $89,000,000, or double the expenditure, capital and consolidated fund, in the last year the Conservative government were in power.

In connection with the preferential trade question let me point out that we used to hear a great deal in the old days from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, now in the government, about the character which the Conservative government had given to the tariff, and that under their tariff the trade with the United States developed more rapidly than the trade with Great Britain, that we had really given a preference to the United States and the proof of that preference was to be found in the fact that our trade with the United States was growing more rapidly than our trade with Great Britain. What do we find? Comparing the exports of this country to Great Britain in 1896 with those of 1905, we find that the increase has been 54 per cent, while the increase in our exports to the United States has been 74 per cent. But when we come to our imports it is perfectly appalling. What do we find? In 1896 we imported from Great Britain $32,979,000. That has increased to $60,000,000, an increase of 87 per cent. But what has been the increase in the volume of our imports from the United States during the same period? From $58,000,000 to $162,000,000, an increase of 179 per cent. Perhaps this may furnish an explanation, perhaps it may be a fitting commentary on the speech of the Minister of Agriculture the other day when he said that the government is indifferent as to whether we get any perference in the British market or not, because he is satisfied that this enormous expansion of our trade with the United States should go on to the exclusion of a well regulated and developed trade with the mother country. Since last session a very important member of this government has disappeared from parliament, I refer to Sir William Mulock. I think the country has not been favoured with substantial or sufficient reasons for the very sudden and unexpected retirement of that hon. gentleman. He was apparently one of the most active and progressive members of the government; he was pressing upon public attention the telephone question. A very important committee was struck last session to investigate the telephone system with a view to acquiring it and operating it in connection with the post office service. It is known to-day that the Bell Telephone Company has become a gigantic corporation and has decided to come to parliament for power to extend its capital to $50,000,000. It is spreading its influence all over the country. It was well known to be the policy of Sir William Mulock that the government should acquire the telephone system. Why did he retire in the midst of his work on that great question, and why is it that since his retirement nothing is said about acquiring the telephone system and that it has dropped out of public consideration? Is it because Sir William Mulock demanded such a reform as this that he was told that he must go, or find he would be of no use in the government, left of his own accord? This question should be answered. The reasons given out by the government press about Sir William Mulock's retirement are very amusing. The reason assigned is that his health obliged him to retire from the conduct of the Post Office Department. At the same time he accepted the position of Chief Justice of the Exchequer Court of Ontario. A gentleman whose health was so bad that he could not remain at the head of the Post Office Department was hardly in a fit condition to assume the work and responsibility of a judge of the Exchequer Court, yet, up to the present time, that is the only reason assigned for Sir William Mulock's retirement. But we can see as far into a millstone as those who are picking it, and we know that the telephone commission has dropped out of notice and that Sir William finding that he had no sympathy from his colleagues retired or was told, as Mr. Israel Tarte had been told, to retire.

Before taking my seat I wish to very emphatically corroborate the remarks addressed to this House on Monday last by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, in regard to the opposition members in this House being consulted or taking part in the arrangement with regard to the financial measures passed towards the close of last session. As my hon. friend as explained, when he saw statements to the contrary in the press on the authority of so eminent a man as Goldwin Smith and others, aware as he was that no communication had been made to him on the subject, he wrote me a letter to know whether I was aware of any action of that kind being taken, and I was able to answer him, as I now tell the House, that I was not myself consulted by any one in parliament on the question, and that no action had been taken by the opposition senators, collectively or individually, with regard to the passing of those measures. I want to say that distinctly, while at the same time taking my stand with regard to them, that most of them—perhaps not all—have some feature of merit about them. I am not mean enough, believing as I do that that is the case, to try to make any political capital out of the amounts voted, but I want to state here most emphatically as I shall do in the country, that it is a scandal that such important matters as that should be held up the government's sleeve until the last days of the session and then be brought down in bulk. It has created what is almost a scandal in the minds of the people. You cannot get it out of the mind of the ordinary citizen that there was a sort of log rolling game going on, and that in consequence of it these measures were passed through hurriedly without being discussed on their merits. Had these measures been brought down in time, and the press been given an opportunity of having their say about them, and members of parliament an opportunity of reading them, which they had not with regard to some of these measures—had everything been done in the light of day, I am satisfied there would not have been much dissatisfaction in the country with regard to any of them. There might be some with regard to the Pension Bill more than any other, for in looking over that measure I was astounded, as gentlemen on both sides of the House were, when that proposition was brought down. I did not hesitate to give my opinion freely to members on both sides of the House that I was surprised at the shape in which it was submitted. I have never had any one answer this question: Why should five years be the term fixed, and why should the word consecutive be used? It is true the general trend in Canada is towards a long tenure of office by governments, but it may not always be so. It has not always been so, and I doubt if any public man in old Canada, although he might be twenty or thirty years in public life, could draw an annuity under such an Act as this. Why should a man who goes into a government and resigns for conscience sake, and the cause of his objection being removed or settled, is again called to the cabinet, fail to have his services recognized, because he may not have been able to remain five years continuously in the government? Why should he be kept out of a pension, while a younger man who has barely held office five years, who has clung to it until he earns his pension, be rewarded with an annuity of that kind? The measure received no proper consideration or it would not have contained such provisions. The fixing of five years was arbitrary, and untenable, and putting in the word 'consecutive,' was equally objectionable, allowing a young man to come in and reap the benefit of this annuity, while it might shut out old and deserving men. These are things which ought not to have been entirely overlooked, and which should have been gravely considered before that measure was adopted.

My hon. friend from Richmond may have thought that I was a little warm yesterday evening when I rose after his speech, feeling that he had unfairly aspersed Mr. R. L. Borden. I have the greatest respect for my hon. friend, and he knows very well that I would be the last member of this House to say anything disparaging or calculated to offend or insult him; but I regard the men chosen by the two great political parties to be their leaders to be great workers for the people of this country in solving its political problems, as men whose character is a national asset which we should jealously guard, and that we should be ready, as long as we are in sympathy with them, to protect them from anything that we can regard as an unfair attack. I look upon Mr. Borden, the leader of the Conservative party, as one of the most promising men ever given to the public life of our country. I know him to be a man of the most eminent professional qualifications, a man of the highest personal character, and who has proven before the people of Canada to be a public man who has made his mark in parliament, even though comparatively young, since he entered it, in the wise suggestions he has been able to make, and which have been received with the greatest respect by the able men who confront him in the House of Commons. Knowing he is rendering a most important service to the country. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues in the government felt in their hearts that he was worthy of the allowance made to him as leader of the opposition or else they would not establish the principle in his time. It is not a grant to any person; it is a concession to the man who holds the office. I have not the slightest doubt but that the government feeling in their heart of hearts a respect for Mr. Borden, and knowing the good work he has been doing in parliament is the cause of their desire to carry out what I regard as a very important reform.

I remember when a similar question came up in the province of Ontario some years ago—I referred to it on Monday last—Sir Oliver Mowat made use of the most generous terms of praise with reference to Sir William Meredith, his opponent. He went so far as to say that the statute-book of Ontario owed more to Sir William Meredith than to himself. He explained that his own time was too much taken up with other matters connected with his office, and Sir William Meredith was able to give so much attention to the framing of the laws of the country, that Sir William had left his mark on the statute-books of the province to a much greater degree than he had himself. That was such a tribute as a generous and able man could afford to pay to a distinguished and able opponent, and it was in that spirit, I have no doubt, that the government brought down the Bill providing for the payment of a salary to the leader of the opposition, knowing, at all events in the inception of the plan, that they were voting the public money correctly, and that it would go to a man who was giving eminent services to the people of Canada. We have to-day a whole bunch of measures introduced by the Minister of Justice, who is a very able lawyer, submitted to parliament by the government at this session, all based on suggestions made last year in parliament by the Hon. Mr. Borden. Such work as that, no doubt, the people of the country do not thoroughly understand. It is not reasonable to expect that the ordinary voter should thoroughly understand it. The mass of the public regard a man coming to parliament as having for his object to fight his political opponents, but men in public life know that there are higher public duties than merely to engage in political controversy. A public man is responsible for giving the country good and effective laws, and in that respect I claim and know that the universal verdict is that Mr. Borden is doing his work in a manner which reflects credit upon himself and upon the people of the whole Dominion of Canada.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It appears to me that the hon. gentleman who has just sat down is labouring under considerable confusion of ideas. The hon. gentleman does not seem to understand that taxation is one thing and revenue is another. If he had understood that he would have seen that the present government has carried out to the letter the canon which he has been good enough to describe as 'The Cartwright canon.' The taxation of the country has not merely remained stationary but has been largely reduced as compared with the taxation we found when we entered upon the task of governing this country. The taxation has been reduced by nearly thirty-three per cent, because the operation of the preferential tariff extended far beyond the articles imported from England. There is also this difference between us and our predecessors: We reduce the taxation and increase the revenue, and we put the revenue into the public chest. Under the government of hon. gentlemen opposite, the taxation was heavier, but the revenues did not go into the public chest—a portion of them only found their way there, and that is the reason why, under our regime, the public have received a very great deal more than they received under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, and at the same time the collective taxation of the people has been less. More than that, Sir, under our regime, as the hon. gentleman had to admit, although he very greatly underestimated, and very greatly understated the extent of the increase of the population, as he did the increase in the wealth of the country, there has been a very large—an enormous augmentation of the population of Canada, and that of the best sort. Before our time, Canada was almost stagnant. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that the rate of increase of the population of this Dominion between the years 1878 and 1896 fell below the rate of increase of any European country, with the possible exception of Ireland; while within the last ten years the rate of increase of the population in Canada has been probably three or four times greater than during the preceding eighteen years of the hon. gentleman's administration of the affairs of the country. That is the way to judge. When you double the revenues, and the trade and commerce, and add very largely to the population and wealth of the country, then the people are able to endure and are able to pay a larger sum into the treasury without incurring any additional burdens, because it is a well known fact, and is easily demonstrated from a reference to the customs returns, that, under our system, a very much larger percentage of the average taxation of the country has gone into the treasury than ever before. That, Sir, is the explanation, and that is the justification of the expenditure which the government has found it expedient in the public interest to incur during the last few years. Now, I am not going to pursue the hon. gentleman through the devious mazes of the Trade and Commerce Returns further than to say this: If he will take the trouble to examine the Trade and Navigation Returns he will find that the trade with Great Britain had been steadily decreasing for ten years before the present government took office. Since we have taken office, our trade with Great Britain has exactly doubled. I am speaking of dutiable goods imported into the country, and the increase would be in all probability something like one hundred per cent on the amount that was imported in 1896. These are facts which hon. gentlemen can verify for themselves if they choose to refer to the report which I laid on the table of the House yesterday, or the report of my colleague the Minister of Customs and the Trade and Navigation Returns.

The hon. gentleman was good enough to inquire how it came about that the Hon. Sydney Fisher should have depreciated the preference, and he was desirous of knowing whether Mr. Fisher, on the occasion in question, spoke for the rest of the government. Had he taken the trouble to examine Mr. Fisher's speech, he would have seen that Mr. Fisher took great pains to point out that he spoke for himself alone and not as Minister of Agriculture. Anybody who takes the trouble to read the report of the speech will see that the whole of the context shows that Mr. Fisher was speaking in an individual capacity, as a farmer, and not as Minister of Agriculture, and he so expressly stated, I believe, the other day in discussing the matter in another place. But whether or not, I take this ground, as I have always taken it, that the preference was a benefit to the people of Canada quite as much as to the people of England. I take that ground, Sir, when we gave the preference we largely reduced the taxation of the people of Canada, and in that respect we benefited them, and the granting of that preference did a great deal to give us a substantial advantage in the markets of Great Britain, as is clearly shown by the returns of our exports to the mother country. As for the United States, it is only natural that we should deal very largely with them. Over and over again in my place in parliament I have pointed out that when you are the near neighbours of a country like the United States, separated from them only by four thousand miles of an imaginary boundary line, it is not so much a question of tariff as it is a question of freight rates and propinquity. Under such circumstances we must continue to have a large trade with the United States, and in proportion as manufactures and population increase as the country develops, in all human probability that trade will of itself increase and expand proportionately; and it is a very good proof of the extent to which Canada is developing, that in spite of the heavy tariff we have as against American products, and the comparatively light tariff as against the products of Great Britain, it is, I say, a proof of the remarkable development of this country that we have gone on and increased our imports from the United States. It is true that a very considerable portion of those imports consists of goods which can be obtained from the United States alone, of which they have practically a monopoly. It is utterly impossible for us to obtain anthracite coal elsewhere, and it is almost impossible for us to obtain cotton elsewhere. There is a considerable number of other articles coming from the United States in regard to which no competition on the part of Great Britain is possible. There is no competition, as a matter of fact, on the part of any other country. We must take the goods from the United States or go without them, and being now in a state of active development, beyond all doubt we are importing a very much larger quantity of goods from the United States. As for Sir Howard Vincent, all I can say is that I cannot conceive how any human being who has paid the slightest attention to the trend of public affairs in Great Britain can fail to see that Sir Howard Vincent and his friends utterly and completely misunderstood the temper of the British public. Never within the memory of man has there been so complete and utter a defeat of a political party as that which the high protectionist party recently suffered at the polls in Great Britain. Why, Sir, within a very few days a declaration tabled in the House of Commons shows that, I think, something like 500 members or thereabouts recorded their distinct declaration that they would have nothing to do with the protectionist principle, and so far from Mr. Chamberlain being able to count one hundred and fifty supporters, to the best of my recollection he was only able to muster 84. There is a convincing proof how far and how correctly he and his followers read the mind of the people of Great Britain on that important question. I am not going to follow my hon. friend in a disquisition on the railway policy of the government. When the papers are brought down it will be time enough to deal with the matter, and I shall be happy then to deal with it.

In the meantime, let me remind my hon. friend of two things. One is that the present government have retained and secured absolute running powers over the Canada Atlantic railway for the purpose of carrying grain or other freight from Georgian bay to Montreal if they so see fit, and if it is found expedient to do it. The other is that there is every ground to believe that the route which has been selected from Quebec to Winnipeg is likely to prove an exceedingly advantageous route for the transport of heavy goods. We are informed that there has been rarely found in any country, over a similar extent of territory at any rate, an equally favourable line with equally favourable grades and equally free from the curves which unfortunately interfere with the working of the Canadian Pacific railway line to the south of it. It has been discovered by our engineers, and I have no doubt whatever of the fact, that in the construction of that railway there is every ground for believing that, at any rate, so far as concerns the part of the line which the government are constructing, very important and very valuable tracts of territory will be made available which, without that line, would have been utterly useless to us for a great many years to come. As for the allegation that the Grand Trunk Pacific is unduly paralleling other lines, I beg to point out that, as every one knows, when you fix Winnipeg as one point and Edmonton as another, it would have been utterly impossible, under these conditions, for the Grand Trunk Pacific or any other company, to construct a line of railway between these two points without, to some extent, paralleling the existing roads; but that it will fail to open up a very large and important tract of country is, I must say, entirely in contradiction of the reports which we have received from those who are best acquainted with the country and best able to offer an opinion with regard to it. With respect to the other remarks of the hon. gentleman, all I can say is that I have not very much fault to find with them. A great deal of his speech, and of the speeches of his predecessors, was taken up more by criticisms of each other than with criticisms of the government. I have no objection to that; it amuses them and certainly does not hurt us; but the hon. gentleman diverged from that pleasant task of criticising his own friends. He diverged into constitutional questions, and he was good enough to read a lecture to the Lieutenant Governor of the Northwest Territories on an alleged infraction of constitutional usage because, forsooth, he did not see fit to summon Mr. Haultain to become his chief adviser. It occurs to me, Sir, that the hon. gentleman has either never known or has entirely forgotten everything that has ever been written on the question of constitutional law by writers who are entitled to respect in dealing with that subject. If there be any one thing more than another which the Crown, either in England or through its representative the Governor General or the Lieutenant Governor—if there is one privilege more than another which they are entitled to under the conditions which existed in the Northwest Territories at the time of the creation of the two new provinces, it is that of selecting their own advisers. That is practically almost the only remaining prerogative of the Crown. It is a prerogative which has been exercised again and again in the past reign if not in the present. It is a prerogative inherent in the Crown. The Crown has a perfect right, under such conditions as existed in the territories last year, to select its own adviser, whomsoever he may be. In the case of Mr. Gladstone, it is well known that the Crown saw fit to exercise this prerogative, and it was only when the ministry so formed retired, and not till then, that Mr. Gladstone was sent for, and it would be perfectly justifiable to-day either here or in England, or in the case of our lieutenant governors whenever such a case arises as existed in the Northwest Territories, for each official representing the Crown to select his own adviser. If the Crown makes a mistake, then it is for the people or the people's representatives, as the case may be, to rectify that error; but in the first instance, I beg to state to the hon. gentleman, that there can be no doubt whatever as to the prerogative which the Crown possesses of selecting its own adviser to begin with. As far as my own opinion is concerned, I think the discretion was very wisely exercised in the case of Lieutenant Governor Forget.

The hon. gentleman proceeded, and so did some of his friends, to dwell at some considerable length on the question of indemnity and pensions. I do not propose to discuss that matter at any very great length on the present occasion. It may be that the whole subject will come up for revision either here or in another Chamber, and, when it is brought before us, then will be the time, I think, to discuss the matter in extenso; but I will say this, and it is all I propose to say on the subject at the present moment, that I for my part have never been able to see that there was any reason for the granting of pensions to judges which did not apply or could not apply with quite as much force to the granting of pensions to cabinet ministers after a certain length of service; and for these reasons: it is in the highest degree in the public interest that every man who is entrusted with the high and important duties of a cabinet minister, conducting a department, should be financially independent. I say that that is in the highest degree in the public interest. In the next place if there are any men on the face of the earth—and I think the gentlemen who sit opposite to me will bear me out in this—who are continually subjected to unforeseen and unexpected demands for all kinds of purposes from their constituents and supporters, it is the members of the cabinet of the day. If there are any set of men in this Dominion of Canada who it is desirable in the public interest should give their whole absolute and undivided attention to the affairs entrusted to them, it is the cabinet ministers of Canada, either past or present. Sir, should these men make an error, a mistake—I am not speaking of questions of maladministration, but of errors of judgment arising from hasty decision of important questions --every man who has had experience in public affairs knows that such errors may cost the people of the country, I will not say hundreds of thousands of dollars but millions of dollars, yes tens of millions, hundreds of millions as the result of errors or mistakes committed by these men; and I add further—whether they have always lived up to the ideal standard or not—that it is in the very highest degree in the interests of the public at large that the men who are entrusted with such responsible duties should be men of high integrity and of large capacity. I shall say no more on that subject at this present moment, but I have a word to say particularly, as special allusion was made to it by the hon. gentleman who preceded me on this question, of testimonials to which he alluded. And more particularly I have a word to say as to the testimonial which was presented to Sir John Macdonald a considerable number of years ago. Now, on these matters I have an advantage over the hon. gentleman: I speak from personal knowledge; the hon. gentleman speaks from hearsay. I perfectly well remember, and if the hon. gentleman desires further information I could refer him to the life of Sir John Macdonald, by Mr. Pope—I perfectly well remember that in 1870 or 1871, Sir John Macdonald was struck down by what was supposed to be a mortal illness. Under those conditions, knowing perfectly well as people did that Sir John Macdonald was at that particular time an embarrassed man, it was thought—and I think it was thought correctly—by many of his friends and admirers, and by some who were not his particular friends and admirers, that an occasion had arisen on which very fairly and very appropriately a testimonial might be made up for the purpose of saving Sir John and his family from the results that would probably happen to them if he were prematurely taken away. Now, it so happens, that a matter of some 14 or 15 years ago this question was brought up in the House of Commons. I am not going to inflict even a summary of that lengthy debate on the House, but I shall read to hon. gentlemen some few remarks that I made on that occasion. They will be found on page 3827, vol. 2, of the 'Hansard' of 1891. My remarks were as follows:

> Now, Sir, in our own case, with respect to this testimonial business, it is unfortunately too true that the beginning of the evils of which I complain, and which I desire to rectify, took its rise in the first instance in a testimonial which was presented a considerable number of years ago to the late Sir John A Macdonald. That was very much to be regretted, and the more to be regretted, because I have always maintained, and I feel it due to myself to say here now, that in the first inception of that testimonial I believe that the motives of the men who originated it were pure and honourable. The circumstances of the case, which the House will pardon me for reciting briefly, are these: Sir John A. Macdonald had been struck down by a very dangerous illness. It was perfectly well known that he was in deeply embarrassed circumstances; deeply indebted, I believe, and that but a very slender provision indeed had been made for his family. Under these circumstances, Sir, if ever, it was quite justifiable for the hon. gentleman's personal friends and admirers to have contributed for the purpose of relieving his family from any danger of want, and had two or three very obvious and very reasonable precautions been taken, no blame could have been attached to the parties who were concerned in getting up that testimonial. Unfortunately these precautions were not taken, unfortunately publicity was not given, as I have always said publicity should be given, to the names of persons who subscribed; and, still more unfortunately, precautions were not taken to see that subscriptions to that fund were not accepted save from sources from which they could honourably be accepted. Now, Sir, I am not going at the present moment to repeat what I have found it my duty to say on other occasions on that subject. But, as hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have lately developed an extreme respect and admiration for an eminent gentleman no longer with us, Mr. Edward Blake, I propose to read to those hon. gentlemen, rather than give any words of mine, the language in which Mr. Blake found it necessary to speak of that particular testimonial. What Mr. Blake said was this:
> 'Another case was the gift several years ago to the present First Minister by means of a settlement upon his family of the sum of about $80,000, which was subscribed for and presented to him or to his family while he was First Minister of Canada. It was so subscribed and presented largely by actual and intending contractors, whose business it was to obtain favourable contracts from the government, and having obtained them to get the largest prices for the least returns, and the most liberal allowances for extras that they could manage. It was subscribed largely also by public corporations greatly indebted to the treasury, and dependent upon the executive for favourable settlements of their indebtedness and favourable adjustment of their financial relations.
> That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the chair, but that it be resolved: That the acceptance of gifts or testimonials of any kind on the part of ministers of the Crown or of any member of their families from contractors, government officials or other persons having pecuniary relations with the government, is entirely opposed to sound principles of administration, and is calculated to bring parliamentary government into contempt, and that the example thus given tends to corrupt and demoralize the officials serving under ministers who have accepted or permitted the acceptance of gifts or testimonials as aforesaid.

That was moved, although not as want of confidence, in going into Committee of Supply. It was accepted by Sir John Thompson, who was then leading the House. I am not quite sure that he was premier—I think not—but he accepted the motion and it was passed unanimously. I think that very fairly defines the position which ought to be assumed with respect to testimonials of any kind presented to ministers of the Crown occupying office. After men have ceased to occupy office, if their friends so desire, there is no objection whatever to their presenting them with testimonials to any extent and in any shape or form they wish, but while in office they should not receive testimonials from men who have any business relations with them. That principle was unanimously accepted by the House. It is sound in itself and deserves being maintained in its integrity now. It bears, as the House will see, considerable on the question before us, and I do agree with several hon. gentlemen who have spoken, that on the whole it is better, if these things are done at all, that they should be done openly and publicly out of the public chest, rather than they should be done by sending the hat round in the fashion it was found necessary to do on several previous occasions. I think that the whole question may, perhaps be considered in reference to some remarks that have been made, and it is quite probable and quite possible that some amendments may be found desirable in the present Act; but as regards the matter in general, I think the government will be found on the whole to have acted wisely in what they did, and they are fully prepared to accept the responsibility for it.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not intend to enter upon a discussion of the financial questions which have been so ably dealt with by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and by my hon. friend from Marshfield, who preceded him. It is perhaps not necessary for me to say more than to make one or two observations with reference to the statement with regard to the policy of the present administration and the financial result, and the reply which the hon. minister who has just taken his seat made to those observations. If I understood the hon. gentleman right, he said in reply to the charge made by the hon. senator from Marshfield, that the taxation of the country had been more than doubled since the present administration came into power, that the policy of the present administration had reduced the taxation and increased the revenue. I sat for many years in the House of Commons and heard a good many speeches delivered by the hon. gentleman, bearing on the fiscal policy of this country. I well know, and we all know, how at all times and on all occasions he denounced the tariff policy of the late government on account of the protective features which it contained, and I believe there was no stronger advocate in the House of Commons in those days of the abandonment of the protective tariff and the adoption of a revenue tariff as being the policy best calculated to promote the interests of this country. I would have expected, when the hon. gentleman claimed that the present government had reduced taxation, that he would have been able to preface that statement by showing the House that the present government had adopted the policy which he had so long advocated and always claimed was necessary in order to produce those results. It is, however, surprising that he defends now practically the same policy with regard to fiscal matters which was adopted by the late government. The only change for which the hon. gentleman took credit to the present administration was the preferential tariff adopted as regards our imports from Great Britain and other portions of the British empire. While I entirely approve of that change in the fiscal policy of the country, and heartily endorse what the government has done in that direction, I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman that this has been the cause, or is a sufficient reason for justifying the statement which he made that the general taxation of the country has been reduced although the revenue has been increased; for it was pointed out by my hon. friend from Marshfield, and not contradicted by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, that although this preference had been given to imports from the mother country and other portions of the British empire, the increase in our imports from Great Britain had been very small compared with the increase of our imports from the United States and from other countries. The hon. gentleman claimed too that this preferential tariff had given the Canadians a great advantage in the British market. I can hardly understand how that could result when, as we know, the free trade principle has always prevailed and still prevails in England. The only point which I intended to make in referring to this feature of the hon. gentleman's speech, is that it was difficult to understand how the government could claim that the protective policy of the late administration had the effect under that administration of increasing taxation and reducing the revenue, and how the present administration adhering in every material respect to the same policy had been able to reduce taxation and increase the revenue.

The other observations of the hon. gentleman I do not intend to refer to now. My principal object in asking the indulgence of the House for a short time in the course of this debate, was to refer to another subject which has been imported into the discussion, and to which considerable attention has been given by different gentlemen who have addressed the House. I refer to the measures passed last session altering the allowance to members of parliament. It is well known, I assume, that my views on this question differ from those of the great majority on both sides of the House. The hon. Secretary of State, in addressing the House, made the statement that when this Bill was introduced last session it met with no opposition. I agree with what has been said by different speakers in condemning the time and manner in which the Bill was introduced. It was brought here in the last days of the session. I believe it was not printed, and I was myself unprepared for many of the provisions which it contained and there was no time or opportunity to discuss it. I did the only thing I could do, under the circumstances, that is, made a general protest against the principle of the Bill. I am not aware that much benefit can be derived from opening up a discussion now, but I feel that it is only right, since the subject has been referred to, that I should embrace this opportunity of making my views more clearly known and having them placed on record. My opinion has always been that the principle of allowing a salary or remuneration to members for their services while attending parliament, or such losses as they may sustain in connection with their private business during their absence at the sessions here, was not a wise principle or one in the interest of either this parliament or of the country. I formed these opinions early in my political career and chiefly as the result of opinions expressed both publicly and privately in my hearing by the late leader of the Conservative party, Sir John Macdonald, and subsequently to a more limited extent by Sir John Thompson and others with whom I have been associated in parliamentary life. My own study of this subject and my own observation of political life in Canada since, has had the effect of strengthening and confirming my opinion on this question. It will be apparent at the outset that if such a principle is adopted it will be very difficult—absolutely impossible—to find any standard by which a rate of compensation can be given which will be at the same time uniform and equitable and fair and just. The members who attend parliament, come under very different circumstances. There are some, quite a considerable number, who have retired from active business and come here without any material inconvenience. A larger number perhaps have considerable business interests in the country, and act on the directorate of incorporated companies or business enterprises. Their personal attention is not necessary to the conduct of the business in which they are interested. Such persons come here not at any great loss or inconvenience to themselves, and their income does not suffer any diminution in consequence of their absence from their homes.

There are of course other classes represented in both these chambers—those who are engaged in active business, whose incomes suffer to a greater or less extent, and who, no doubt, feel considerable inconvenience in being absent from their homes for the length of time required to attend the sessions here. I am drawing attention to these facts merely to make this point, that the circumstances of individual members of parliament are greatly different in this respect; that there is no standard by which you can fix a rate of compensation which would be equitable and fair to all. If you attempt to make a standard for the loss sustained in connection with their private affairs, it is evident that while a very trifling sum of perhaps one thousand dollars would be sufficient to compensate very many who attend here, and others attending here really suffer no loss at all, yet in other cases the compensation would not be more than sufficient if five or even ten thousand dollars a year was granted to make up what the representative might lose by the neglect of his business affairs at home. The same difficulty arises if it is attempted to adjust the compensation in proportion to the services rendered. We know there is a great difference in the amount of services rendered by different gentlemen who attend parliament in both chambers. Some give their attention principally to the local affairs of the constituencies which they represent and very little study to the more important and general legislation which comes before parliament, devoting a great deal of their time to their private business and the direction of their affairs at home. Others devote a great deal of attention to the general business of the country, give their time and devote their energies and thoughts to studying and perfecting general legislation which comes before parliament. It is evident, therefore, that if compensation were attempted to be adjusted upon that principle, as a reward for the services performed, the same difficulty would arise, that no uniform amount could be fixed that would be equitable and fair to all concerned. There are services of a general public character, and I may say the majority of the services of a public character are of such a nature, that no money value can be placed upon them. This is true of the services rendered from time to time by men who have performed great and notable and heroic deeds. It is also true of those who devote their lives to philanthropic work, to men who give their time and often at great personal inconvenience devote their energies and talents to the advocacy of principles or the promotion of schemes which have for their object the betterment of the human race. The services of such men to the country or the human race are in almost every case, I think I am correct in saying in every case, voluntary and, as I have said, no money value can be placed upon them. In my opinion the services which a member of parliament is called upon to perform have a very striking analogy to the class of services to which I have referred. I would in this connection like to direct the attention of the House to this fact, that these services are voluntary in their character. There is no one obliged to accept a position in this Chamber, nor is any one obliged to accept a nomination to contest a constituency for the House of Commons. I do not see that any obligation can rest upon any man to accept either of these positions if he feels that he cannot afford to accept them, if his circumstances are such as to prohibit him from doing so. One of the objections that might be urged against the argument I am making now is that unless remuneration is attached to the position there will be a difficulty in finding candidates, that the class of persons will be too much restricted from which a choice can be made. I do not think that is a practical difficulty. I have yet to learn that in the history of Canada there has ever been a gentleman requested to accept a seat in this branch of the legislature refusing on account of the small remuneration which the members of the Senate received. So far as my experience and observation go the same remark may be made, with not perhaps quite the same force, in reference to the House of Commons. The difficulty has generally been in my experience not that there was a scarcity of candidates but, rather, that embarrassment resulted from there being too many anxious to serve their country in that capacity. It has also been claimed that under the old system of remuneration the representation of the country would be confined principally or altogether to the richer classes. I do not think that the experience of the past sustains that theory. It certainly cannot be stated that a large number of gentlemen who occupy seats in either chamber of the legislature are gentlemen of wealth. We have some among us, in both chambers, but they also contain a very large number of gentlemen who are in what I should perhaps properly call comfortable or moderate circumstances, so that our experience in the past shows that the practice which has hitherto been adopted has not had the practical result of excluding the less wealthy classes from either branch of the legislature and confining the representation of the people to the wealthiest classes. I would like, however, on this phase of the subject, to invite the attention of hon. gentlemen to a danger in the opposite direction. The danger which may threaten us if the principle is adopted of paying members of the Senate or members of the House of Commons what may be considered a competent salary. I have heard no argument advanced in favour of the present change which is claimed to be a compensation, or in a certain measure as a compensation for the time and trouble and loss sustained by those who attend parliament which might not with equal force be used in advocacy of a much larger amount, say $5,000 or $10,000, so that while we have adopted $2,500 as a compensation for the present, if this principle is adopted, we cannot say how long it may be before an agitation will again arise to have the amount still further increased. I want to point out, in connection with that, the danger that may result with regard to the representation in either of the branches of the legislature if the principle is adopted of attaching to these positions a salary which affords the occupant an independent and comfortable living. We know that under our system of government abuses have crept into the civil service; that the gentlemen who are promoted in that service are not always chosen because they are best qualified to fill the positions which are given them, that the choice is often made not so much with regard to the qualifications or the fitness of the person who is to be appointed, as to the influence of political friends or wealthy relatives with the government of the day, and whose object in securing these appointments is not to provide a person who is well fitted and well qualified and who will discharge in a satisfactory manner the duties of the position, but rather to provide an office for some friend who has not been very successful in his business or professional career and give him a comfortable living without imposing upon him any very onerous duties. This evil, or abuse, has, to some extent, at least, crept into the civil service of the country, and I want to warn this House that if the same policy of adopting a sessional salary which makes the position in either branch of the legislature one which affords a comfortable living for the person occupying it, it will open the door for the same abuse to creep in here. I am not making these remarks as casting reflection upon any gentleman who occupies a position in this House at the present time. I am not casting any reflection upon the appointments of the present government, or upon the appointments of any other government. I am only pointing out the danger which may be apprehended at some time in the future if this principle is adopted, and carried, as it possibly may be carried to a greater extent, and the amount of the remuneration considerably increased. The practice in the United States has been referred to. I think my hon. friend from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) called attention to the amounts which are at the present time paid to representatives in the United States Congress, and I understood from him that a measure was now proposed which contemplated a further increase in the amounts paid there. In order to induce us to follow the example of the United States in this respect it will be necessary first to establish the fact that this has resulted beneficially upon the life of their public men and upon the legislation of the country. We have had, in the past, two entirely opposite practices prevailing in the United States and in Great Britain. In the United States they have paid what may be regarded as a large salary for the services of members of Congress. In Great Britain, up to the present time—I regret from my point of view to see that a change has been introduced there—but, up to the present at all events, they have followed the practice of requiring representatives in parliament to serve without remuneration. The result of my study and observation of political life in Great Britain and the United States has led me to the conclusion that the effect of the practice which has been followed in Great Britain has been to bring prominently into public life a class of men who have strong convictions on public questions, who enter public life, not with the hope of any remuneration or reward, but merely to advocate the principles which they believe in, and to use their votes and influence in parliament in order to bring about the reforms or advance the legislation which they believe to be in the best interests of the country. On the other hand, in the United States the practice which has prevailed there has, in my opinion, had an important influence in leading public men to look upon the position as one to be used for their own private or personal advantage. The disclosures which have recently been made, as the result of investigations which have been held there, establish the fact that not only have large and wealthy corporations and influential interests in the United States used their wealth and paid large sums of money to influence the action of legislative bodies, but there have been numerous instances in which those large corporations and wealthy interests have elected men to sit in the legislatures whom they could control, and these men have remained there year after year, enjoying a life of ease and even a life of luxury, at the public expense, merely to watch the interests and forward the schemes of the corporations or interests which they represented. I trust we shall pause before we adopt the principle which has been adopted there, for, in my opinion, if we follow their example in this respect, and, as I have stated before, attach to these positions such a salary that it affords the occupant a comfortable and easy livelihood, the same results will follow here.

I do not intend to say much more upon this question, except to refer again to the manner in which this Bill was introduced into parliament and passed. In my opinion, if this change was to be made, and if this new policy was to be adopted, if we are to receive something in the nature of a salary or a compensation for our services or for the losses we sustain, instead of a reasonable sum merely by way of an indemnity for our living expenses while attending the sessions at Ottawa, it should have been brought before parliament and there discussed and then submitted to the people before it was adopted. We are here, not as paid representatives of the people; we are here, in my opinion, as trustees of the public funds. There is, in my judgment, a very striking analogy between the position which members of parliament occupy and the position which trustees occupy in the ordinary business of life. We know that the laws with regard to trustees are very strict, and if, in any one respect, they are more strict than in another it is in this, that trustees shall not fix their own remuneration nor in any way appropriate to their own use or receive as a reward for their services anything from the trust funds, unless such remuneration has first been granted them by the person who created the trust or fixed by a judge of the Supreme Court. Our position, it appears to me, is analogous to that of trustees in this respect; we are here as guardians of the public interest and of the public treasury, and while there is no other power which could grant a salary to members of parliament except parliament itself, the least we could have done, if we decided upon that course, was to submit the question to parliament, have it fully discussed and receive the sanction of the people whom we represent, before such a change was brought about. The hon. the leader of the opposition referred to what I might call the good features of this Bill. He submitted statements in which he compared the amount that shall be paid under the present Act and the amounts which were paid under the old law. I do not think his figures were exactly correct. I have not had an opportunity, however, of testing them; but, certainly, under the old law many abuses crept in which have been corrected by this Bill. Under the old law, as he pointed out, it was possible for a gentleman to attend parliament, be present at a very few sittings and by spending a short time at a committee and in other ways, draw a very large proportion of the sessional indemnity and give very little attention really to the business of parliament. This abuse has been corrected under the provisions of this Act. I only wish that in this respect it had gone a little further, and that the clause of the Act allowing members of parliament to receive pay for fifteen days when they are absent from their duties should have been repealed. For my part, I can see no reason why, if members of parliament find it necessary to be absent from their duties here to attend to their private business at home for fifteen days, or for any other number of days, that they should receive their pay for the days when they are absent.

With regard to the other legislation which has been referred to, the salary which has been granted or the increased indemnity or sessional allowance which has been granted to the leader of the opposition in the other House, I have not very much objection to make. I have often felt that the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons was entitled to some remuneration. Indeed, unless he is a man of great wealth, it is impossible for any man to hold that position unless he is remunerated from some source, and he must either be remunerated from the public chest or in the way to which my hon. friend has referred—the way in which remuneration was given to some of the leading statesmen in the past, by subscriptions collected by his friends and supporters, voluntary donations from those who desired to retain him in that position. I do not share the opinion expressed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and am not so very averse to this remuneration. I do not believe that in the cases which have been referred to that there was any corrupt intention on the part of those who contributed to these funds, or that they had any corrupt influence whatever upon the gentleman who received them. I think it is quite possible that this system could have been continued and that the leader of the opposition could have been remunerated by voluntary subscriptions from his friends and admirers and those who desired to see him retained in the position, without paying him from the public funds. However, I do not believe that this is a very serious matter, and I do not think there is any very serious objection to the manner of paying the leader of the opposition in the way proposed in this Bill. There is, of course, the constitutional difficulty that there is no recognized person under our constitution holding the position of leader of the opposition, and it is quite possible that more than two parties might exist in the House. We might have here a third party, or we might possibly have a fourth party, and it might be difficult to decide which of the leaders of these parties was entitled to the vote, or whether the money should be divided among them in proportion to their followers. However, under our system of government, where party lines are pretty clearly drawn, I do not think we need apprehend that this will become a practical difficulty ; therefore, it is not a serious objection to the policy which is now proposed.

With regard to the other question of pensions to ex-ministers, if I understood the Minister of Trade and Commerce aright, this subject is likely to be reconsidered, and any remarks we have to make in regard to it had better be made at a later date. I may say that I am not entirely opposed to granting some pension to ex-ministers. I think, however, that the provisions of the Bill which was passed last session were very ill-considered and inequitable. I do not think it is right to grant the same amount to every minister who has served five years in a cabinet position. I can see no reason why persons who leave the cabinet because possibly they differ with the government, or it may be for other reasons, who are in the prime of life, and who enter into business or into the practice of a profession which gives them a large and remunerative income, should be entitled to a pension from the government. However, we cannot make distinctions of persons; but it appears to me that if this principle is adopted there should be a graduated scale something on the same lines as superannuation in the civil service, and that ex-ministers, if they are paid pensions, should be paid an amount bearing some proportion to the number of years they have occupied the position. I am inclined to think too, that some age limit might be inserted in the Bill; something similar to the provision in regard to judges, so that young and active men who, when they leave the cabinet are not incapacitated from carrying on their ordinary avocations should not be pensioners upon the public funds, but that the older men, men who had spent years in the public service, and who were, to a large extent, incapacitated for other duties, are fairly entitled to consideration and have a very much stronger claim upon an allowance of this kind than the class to which I have referred. I have no further observations to make, but desired to embrace the opportunity which presented itself at this time to place on record my views upon this question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There seems to be some misapprehension as to the basis on which I made the calculation that I gave to the House yesterday. It may possibly be on account of my not being sufficiently explicit, but I think if members who listen to me will look at the report of the remarks I made, it will be seen that I based that calculation upon the interpretation which had been given to the present Act, and they will remember also that I stated at the time that I was not in accord fully with the opinion that had been given as to the interpretation of the Act; but taking the interpretation which had been given and applying it to each senator to show the affect of the law as it stands on the statute-book, I then made the comparison from that, giving full effect to the interpretation which had been given and showing what would be the effect as compared with the old law. I think, probably, I may not have made it as clear as I should have. There are other calculations which can be made, providing that interpretation which has been given to the law is not correct. My hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Wood), referring to the allowance to the leader of the opposition, said he saw in that a constitutional difficulty. To my mind it is simply a question of policy. Constitutional difficulties do not present themselves to my mind. He says the leader of the opposition is not known in the British constitution. That is quite true, and neither is the premier of the country recognized as an official position in the constitution. Yet we have it, and it is only since Campbell-Bannerman recently became premier of England that the office of a premier has been recognized in the order of precedence either in England or in Canada. It is said, and I believe with authority and correctly, that the present King saw the propriety of giving the premier of England some status in order of precedence which he had not occupied before, and it was offered to Mr. Balfour, but that Mr. Balfour declined to acquiesce in the suggestion made to the King.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—During his tenure of office.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—During the tenure of office of Mr. Balfour, but just as soon as the change took place, then the King exercised his prerogative and placed the premier in a position which, to my mind, he ought to occupy; and I think the present Governor General of Canada has recognized that fact, as I noticed at the late state dinner the premier of this country was given a position that he had never been given before during my forty years' recollection of attending state dinners. I was glad to see it. I discussed this question with Sir John Macdonald when I saw men who had just come into office taking precedence of the premier of the country, at state dinners.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until three p.m. tomorrow.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Thursday, March 15, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN rose to inquire:

If the accounts of the attorney and of the insurance expert employed by the special committee, which was appointed by order of this House to investigate into the affairs in Canada of the Mutual Reserve Life Association of New York, and which have been certified to, as regular and legal, on order of the said committee, by its chairman, have been yet paid, either in full or in part?

If not paid in full, why not?

If paid in part when will the said attorney and expert receive the balance of their accounts?

Also, if the government is aware of the fact that the president of the said Mutual Reserve Life Association, Mr. Frederick A. Burnham, of New York, who refused to obey the summons of your honourable committee to give evidence during the said investigation, has since been arrested and indicted by the grand jury, and arraigned in general sessions of New York, on five indictments found against him, two for grand larceny in the first degree, and three for forgery in the second degree, all in connection with the administration of the affairs of the company affecting the interests of Canadian policy-holders?

If the government is aware of the fact that George D. Eldridge, second vice-president of the said company, who appeared before the said committee, as the principal witness in the interests of the said company, during the said investigation, was also recently arrested and indicted by the grand jury and arraigned in the general sessions of New York on five indictments found against him, two for grand larceny in the first degree, and three for forgery in the second degree, all in connection with the administration of the affairs of the company affecting the interests of Canadian policy-holders?

Also, if one George Burnham, brother of the president of the said company, also a director thereof, and counsel for the same, is held by the police and judicial authorities of New York under the same charges as mentioned above?

If the government is aware that this executive action by the authorities of criminal justice in New York, against the said two Burnhams and the said Eldridge, was suggested by and is largely based upon the results of the parliamentary investigation ordered by this honourable House two years ago?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I can best answer the categorical questions put by the hon. senator who has just sat down by referring to the account which was sent in by the Attorney, Mr. Coster. The account as originally furnished was :

C. J. Coster, K.C.—
Retainer..	$ 250 00
Hotel expenses, 54 days at $5..	270 00
Travelling expenses..	83 60
Counsel fees, 54 days at $50..	2,700 00

The accounts, as is usually done with accounts in which lawyers' charges are concerned, was referred to the Department of Justice. The department considered the account excessive and it was taxed as follows:

Retainer..	$100
Hotel expenses (which was the amount allowed by this Chamber, 54 days at $5..	270

The department allowed the full amount for travelling expenses of $83.60 and $600 for attendance before the committee, making a total of $1,053.60. The following session the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Cloran) brought up this question before the Senate and maintained that the Department of Justice had not been sufficiently liberal. A committee of this House was therefore formed. I presume at the instance of the hon. gentleman that committee made this report.

Friday, 14th July, 1905.

The special committee to whom was referred the claim of C. J. Coster, K.C., regarding legal services to the special committee appointed last session to investigate the affairs of the Mutual Reserve Assurance Association, and to examine the said claim and to report to the Senate thereon, have the honour to report as follows :—

1. Your committee recommend that Mr. Coster be paid at the rate of ($30) thirty dollars per day for the time devoted to the work of the committee, being the per diem allowance fixed by the Department of Justice.

2. Your committee find that the Department of Justice, with the information before them, limited the number of days to be paid for to the number of days occupied by the sittings of the committee.

The Justice Department thought that that would be a fair payment for every day that the committee sat, thirty dollars a day. The committee liberally interpreted the reference and said we will allow Mr. Coster all the days during which the committee sat.

Your committee have, however, ascertained that Mr. Coster was actually engaged on the work of the committee for forty-six days in all, for which he received on account $600, leaving a balance of $780, which your committee recommend that the Clerk of the Senate be instructed to pay to Mr. Coster.

That brought the amount up to $1,833.60 which he has been paid. I presume as this Senate has already disposed of it in the most liberal manner it would be useless for the hon. gentleman—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—When was he paid the last amount, yesterday or to-day ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The cheque was sent about ten days ago I believe; it might not be so long ago as that. The clerk informs me that the $700 cheque has been sent recently.

Hon Mr. CLORAN—Yesterday I think.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Some days ago.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Since the notice has been put on the paper ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In reference to the other matter, the simple answer is, the government of Canada know nothing about the circumstances to which these inquiries referred; they take no special interest in either Mr. Eldridge or the Messrs. Burnham, or affairs transpiring in the United States in which they are concerned and know nothing at all about them.

PATENT MEDICINE LEGISLATION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DAVID rose to inquire:

Does the government intend to propose at this session some measure to control the sale of patented medicine, in order to protect the public without injuring legitimate trade ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The subject is under the consideration of the government.

MUTUAL RESERVE LIFE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a return of the number and amount of policies transferred from assessment section to legal reserve section under Act of 1904, by the Mutual Reserve Life Insurance Company of New York ; also the number and amount of policies written by the company during the year and the cash payments made thereon.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the address being presented.

The motion was agreed to.

WRECK OF THE STEAMSHIP 'BAVARIAN.'

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid upon the table of this House a copy of all the instructions given, of all the evidence heard, of the judgment rendered, and of all communications exchanged on the subject of the wreck of the steamer 'Bavarian' last autumn upon the Wye rocks, and of the inquiry held thereinto, as well as of the correspondence exchanged between the Department of Marine and Fisheries and any person whomsoever regarding the choice of the judge holding the inquiry and of his assessors.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to this address.

The motion was agreed to.

THE EXHIBITION AT LIEGE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Who was appointed commissioner for Canada at the Universal Exhibition held at Liége (Belgium) ? At what salary ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps it would be most convenient to answer each question as it is put.

1. There was no special commissioner for Canada appointed for the Universal Exhibition held at Liége.

The Exhibition commissioner, Mr. William Hutchison, an officer of the Department of Agriculture, by direction of the Minister of Agriculture, was in charge of the Canadian exhibit at the exhibition at Liége. His salary is $3,000 per annum.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—By whom was he paid ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know whether he was paid at all or not; he was not paid by the Dominion. The next question is :

Had the commissioner for Canada at the Liege exhibition a sufficient knowledge of the French language to authorize his appointment, or to make it useful, at an exhibition held in Belgium ?

Mr. Hutchison had the qualifications necessary to warrant his appointment, and to enable him, with the assistants furnished him, to make a most successful Canadian exhibit in Belgium. Several of these assistants were of French origin; and others, while of different origin, were thoroughly familiar with that language.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Who discharged the functions of assistant commissioner for Canada at the same exhibition, and at what salary ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There was no assistant commissioner for Canada at this exhibition. Mr. Hutchison's principal assistant was his secretary, Mr. James Brodie, whose salary is $1,500 per annum.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was one honorary commissioner or were several honorary commissioners appointed ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There was one honorary commissioner appointed, the Honourable Adélard Turgeon, Minister of Lands, Mines and Fisheries, for the province of Quebec. He was appointed generally, without reference to any province.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Who represented more particularly the province of Quebec as commissioner or honorary commissioner ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There was no representative as commissioner or honorary commissioner for the province of Quebec in particular.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—By whom was he paid ? Was it by the Dominion or by the province ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Honourable Mr. Turgeon, being an honorary commissioner, was not paid by the Dominion government; and the Department of Agriculture is not aware that he was paid by the government of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is the government aware that the aforesaid commissioner positively refused the use of the Canadian pavilion for the distribution of a pamphlet containing information as to the province of Quebec ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The aim of the government was to make the Canadian exhibit a national and provincial one; the resources and products of the Dominion being displayed as a whole, without reference to any particular province; and the literature prepared for distribution was of the same character, there being no publication dealing with any one province exclusively.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think that is not an answer to the last question ; I am not asking what were the instructions given to the commissioner; I am asking if the government is aware that notwithstanding the instructions to the commissioner that the commissioner refused the distribution of a pamphlet setting forth the advantages of the province of Quebec ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I put the question to the Minister of Agriculture, and he answers me in the way I have indicated, that, as it was a Dominion exhibition, no one province was to take precedence and that the information furnished must be general.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was not a question of precedence it was a question of refusal. If I understand the minister correctly he got that information from Mr. Fisher ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Minister of Agriculture ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Speaking as a minister or as a farmer ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Speaking as a minister.

DECEASED SENATORS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the orders of the day are called, it has been suggested to me by an hon. gentleman that it might be a convenient time to make those usual references to gentlemen who were with us a year ago, and who are not now here. Death has been active during the last year. Since prorogation in July, 1905, no less than four senators have departed from this world. The death of the first could not be said to have been unexpected. It came in the natural order of time. He went to sleep as peacefully as a child. The time between life and death was not marked by any event that could be in any way noted. He had lived more than thirty years beyond the time allotted by the psalmist as the life of man. The death of Mr. Wark was like his life, calm and peaceful. It had been my good fortune to be associated with him for five years, during the Mackenzie administration, and I then learned not only to like but to respect the qualities which marked the man. During the eighteen years from 1878 to 1896, when I sat on the side occupied by my hon. friend, Mr. Wark was still an advisor and counsellor of mine and his judgment was always sound and reliable. Again I had the pleasure of welcoming him to this Chamber after the change of government in 1896. Hon. gentlemen will remember the affecting scene that took place in the month of April, 1904, when he had completed his term of one hundred years. This Chamber, both sides uniting, presented him with an address. On that occasion, the leading members of the other House, Mr. Borden, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and other gentlemen from the House of Commons, attended in this Chamber and addressed very kind remarks to Mr. Wark, who occupied, for the time being, the Chair that you Mr. Speaker now sit in. Perhaps if I read the concluding remarks of the answer he gave to that address, and the answer that he gave to the observations made by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition and my friend on my left (Hon. Mr. Power) and myself, it will give one a clearer idea of his character than any language I could make use of. In closing his observations, he referred this way to the present time :

I join with you most cordially in the belief that God exercises a wise providence over the affairs of this world, and especially over the affairs of this empire ; that He intends to make it a powerful, populous and prosperous empire united under our gracious sovereign, in policy of peace, and that it will be greatly blessed under His guidance in bringing about the time when the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea. I thank you again for your kindness and for the kindness of the whole House.

That language is a clear indicaion of the marked characteristics of the man. His career has extended over a period in our history that is and always will be the most important—the change from a number of scattered provinces to the union of this young nation, the confederation of the Dominion. Senator Wark had been in the local legislature, part of the time in the provincial government, for a period of sixteen years. He was one of the members that were enumerated in the Royal Proclamation by the sovereign in calling together the Senate of Canada. He was the last of the Liberal members—the last link but one that connects this body with that important epoch, and I am glad to see that my hon. friend who sits at this table still continues to enjoy vigorous health—that the years he has passed do not seem to tell upon him, and we hope that we will long have him with us, the last link binding us to the youthful days of confederation. Senator Wark's life, as I have said, was unique in many particulars. I do not know that even in the British House of Commons or House of Lords, there is any case on record where a man has acted in a legislative capacity for a period longer than Mr. Wark, upwards of sixty years—a long term. His life was a most useful one. As a member of this Chamber, he always gave calm and clear advice. On the committees they had the advantage of his impartial judgment. While he adhered strongly to the political party with which he had long been associated, yet on questions in which politics were not at all involved, he gave evidence of a judicial cast of mind. We can scarcely say that we should regret the manner of his death. We would all be only too glad to live as Mr. Wark did the last quarter of the century of his life. It was a peaceful end. The change between life and death was scarcely visible, it was so natural. No one function, no one part of mind or body, physical or mental gave way before its natural period.

I now come to the loss of another member of this House, a gentleman who sat on the other side, Mr. Black, who, though he had only been with us for two years, soon occupied a position of prominence in this Chamber. His utterances were always marked with good sense. They were terse. He did not seem to be tied particularly with the party who appointed him, because on several occasions he spoke independently of the views I had myself expressed on this side of the House. His death came unexpectedly. Although he had reached the three score and ten years, still he was apparently physically strong, and I was certainly very much shocked when I heard of his death.

The next senator to leave us was the one who occupied the seat now filled by my hon. friend Mr. Young—the late Mr. Fulford. We will miss his cheery face and bright smile. He always came into this Chamber bright, happy and friendly with everybody. Unfortunately, we did not receive much of his time. His private business required his personal attention, I may say the world over. It was not confined to this continent, and therefore he travelled about and we only saw him at short periods towards the end of the session. He was a man with many estimable qualities, a man who showed his good sense by making his home wherever he happened to be. His family was not large, and in his travels abroad, whether to Europe or Asia, he took them with him and so was at home everywhere. He had been very successful in life, and his death was an extremely sad one. Hon. gentlemen will recollect the circumstances. Riding in one of those modern machines which have dealt with human life so freely —so many deaths occur by the automobile— going down an incline the automobile came in contact with a passing car, and he with his companions were thrown out. Some internal injury was sustained by Mr. Fulford, and though it was hoped for some days that he would survive, because he was a man of strong and vigorous constitution, still some vital organ had been injured and his death followed.

The next death to which I should allude is that of our friend Mr. Church. He had been with us a year or two longer than Senator Fulford. He was very well liked in this Chamber. He occasionally addressed us and always in good temper and with sound judgment. He had been ill for a good part of last session and only came to Ottawa towards the very end of it, I think, so he was in delicate health, and his death was not altogether unexpected, although he had not attained such an age that a fatal termination might have been looked for. There are, I presume, other hon. gentlemen who know more perhaps of the lives of some of those gentlemen to whom I have referred and who perhaps can convey to this House their thoughts and impressions on the characteristics they possessed.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I trust no body will accuse me of trying to supplant our leader in taking a few moments before catching an early train to say a few words. I should like to make some remarks with regard to our late colleague, Senator Wark, whose career as a politician in this country deserves more than a passing reference.

One has to think over some historical fact, to enable one to realize how extraordinary was his longevity. The mere statement that he lived over 100 years conveys but a dim expression of his great age, but when we consider that he, a boy of 15 years of age, might have gazed upon the face of general Brock in his coffin or have seen Tecumseh going forth to do battle, it seems astonishing to think that he lived and spoke amongst us within so recent a period as a few months ago. The youngest people who remember well the Crimean war are beginning to find too many gray hairs about their temples, yet they are but little over a score of years older than our late brother was when Wellington and Blucher entered Paris after Waterloo. He was a contemporary of Frederick the Great, and might easily have remembered events that occurred before he died. When Kosciusko rose against the oppressors of recently partitioned Poland, he was old enough to 'take notice.' Warren Hastings had only recently been impeached. Burke, Sheridan, Lord North, Lord Granby, Grattan—he might have conversed with them all. George III, not yet half through his long reign, was participating with Queen Caroline in the pleasure of haggling with tradesmen over the price of fruits and groceries when our late member was a well grown boy. He was the subject of four sovereigns, and lived through the whole of one and the greater part of the other of the two longest British reigns. Mungo Park first visited Africa in the year he was born. Beau Nash had not established the Argyle rooms when he was 16. Gladstone was not born till some ten or twelve years later. Beaconsfield was only fourteen years old. Macaulay but eighteen.

At first mention of the names of great writers who made their fame after he was almost middle aged, it sounds almost as if there was no English literature before his time. Sir Walter Scott was but an infant when Mr. Wark was a grown up lad. Sir Walter died at 61; that was 65 years ago and Mr. Wark, who died yesterday, was then 40 years old. Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge, Keats, Shelley Byron, Carlyle, Lamb, Thackeray, Dickens, Tennyson, George Eliot, all came and vanished 'like snow upon the desert's dusty face' during his lifetime. How great a change in political ideas his world saw. He was six years old when the Duke of York and Charles James Fox were struck off the list of Privy Councillors for proposing and seconding the toast of 'The Majesty of the people.' He was the contemporary of seven Popes, seven Sultans of Turkey, five Kings, two Emperors and three Republics of France; thirty-four Lord High Chancellors of England, eight Archbishops of Canterbury, fifty-five Attorney Generals of England, five Kings of Prussia. He was grown up at the union of Ireland with England and outlived the time of forty-two viceroys, eighty-six coercion Acts and twenty-seven parliaments. The independence of the United States was acknowledged some nine years after his birth. He heard the names of twenty-two presidents and saw the population of the republic grow from 5,000,000 to 80,000,000.

Mr. Wark could have remembered the French revolution, the taking of the Bastile, the execution of Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette, the assassination of Marat, Napoleon's advent, his wonderful campaigns, his fall, banishment and death. He was nine years old when Nelson bombarded Copenhagen, and was born but a year or two after the one in which Rodney beat De Grasse. The 'Young Pretender' had drank himself to death only a year before he was born. The mutiny at the Nore occurred when he was a boy of five. Men old enough to remember well the surrender of Abdel Kader, have long been grandfathers, and Mr. Wark was then fifty-five. He was at middle age when Byron died at Missolonghi. There was then no independent Greece. He was an old man when Italy achieved freedom, and he saw scores of principalities wiped off the map. In his time the population of the whole world was thrice renewed, and he may be said without exaggeration to have outlived forty hundred million of contemporaries. And now

> The mossy marbles rest

> Have been carved for many a year
> On the tomb.

The world in which his character was originally formed was not our world at all. Then, even though Peter Pinder and Junius, Rousseau and Voltaire were writing and speaking, kings felt their crowns very firmly fixed on their thrones. 'Democracy was still generally regarded with abhorrence, workingmen scarcely dreamed of combining for their own protection. Pitt's proposition to reform parliament had to wait nearly fifty years for fulfilment. Fast coaches had not even been established when our centenarian was a child. He was forty-three when Huskisson was killed at the opening of the first real railway in England. He was middle aged before the first steamboat ran, and quite old at the introduction of telegraphs. Geology was an embryo science in his infancy. The first daguerreotype was taken when he was forty-six. Since he was eighty the Darwinian theory was broached. When he was already an aged man science was in such a state that 'caloric' was talked of in the schools, and every new discovery of truths about nature was howled at as jeopardizing religion. Rifled ordnance had not been heard of in the wars of his youth and the earliest iron clad was then forty years in futurity.

What a length of days, what stores of observation and experience this ancient gentleman must have possessed. Must have possessed I say, for he was, by the testimony of all who knew him, a singularly shrewd, intelligent and wise, as well as good man and it is to be hoped that those survivors who passed much time with him since he transcended three score and ten, and few others who then knew him well can be alive. will not fail to record what they remember of his recollections and sayings by which labour of love our late brother may long be distinguished, not only as a well authenticated centenarian, but as one remarkable for large endowments of sense and feeling.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (C. B.)—It has been my privilege to board with the late Senator Wark during a whole session. We agreed in a great many things. We belonged to the same church and went to church together. While he was an Irishman by birth, he was a Scotchman in thought, in breeding, and in almost everything that tended to adorn his character. He was a great reader, was well informed, courteous, gentlemanly and kind, and I only rise to endorse what has been so well said by the hon. Secretary of State of the character of that great and good man.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not at all surprised at the feeling exhibited by the hon. Secretary of State in referring to a colleague with whom he had been associated for so many years. I do not know that I can add anything of importance in reference to the death of Senator Wark to that which has been mentioned by the hon. Secreary of State. The historical events which have occurred during the period of his life, as given to the House by the hon. senator from Brandon, have been very interesting. It only shows how the world progresses in science and in every other respect, even during the lifetime of one of ourselves. My principal reason for rising just now is to add a few words of commendation, and to show my respect for one with whom I was associated in parliament since 1867. I had the pleasure—because it was a pleasure—to sit with that gentleman on the joint committee on printing thirty-nine years ago. Never during that whole period, except upon one occasion in a committee, did anything unpleasant occur between us. Once we had a few words upon some item on which we differed. I have often thought of the remark made at that time as the venerable gentleman was leaving the room, and have never ceased to regret having used it, because it was unwarranted, but under excitement, on occasions of that kind, we sometimes give utterance to sentiments which, perhaps, we felt at the moment, but afterwards regret. I was acquainted with him intimately in my associations on committees, and formed a very high opinion of his character as a man in every respect during the time I sat in this House with him. I shall not refer to his many good qualities, nor do I intend to allude to his political history, nor to his political character. I was very much struck however, when I read an account of his funeral, when his colleagues from this House and I think of the ministry, sent their respect to the family with the motto which was placed in flowers upon his coffin—'Faithful to the last.' When I reflect on his character I think that he was well deserving of that tribute of respect. He was not like many other politicians. In his public career I have never known him to differ from the opinions which he had formed upon political questions, no matter what positions others of his party may have taken. He seems in his early life to have formed strong views on the Liberal side in politics, and he adhered to them to the last, and his character was truly represented in the motto 'faithful to the last.' That he took a deep interest in every event that was passing is evidenced by the fact that during the excitement of the Autonomy Bills he wrote me a letter. He was then in his 102nd year, and I treasure his letter very much. He asked me what my views were upon the question of the Autonomy Bills, and what I thought the result would be in the Senate ? I mention this fact to show what a deep interest a man of his advanced years still took in the political events of the day.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Would my hon. friend have any objection to reading that letter so that it may go on record ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no objections. I have it in my desk and will read it later. I want to refer however to another event. It shows that during his life, when his party, to which he was devotedly attached, was agitating for unrestricted reciprocity and other things of that character he took strong grounds against them, and wrote a very intelligent letter of two columns protesting against the course then being pursued by his own political party. So pleased with that letter was Sir John Macdonald at the time that he wrote Senator Wark a letter thanking him for the views which he had expressed, saying that they were the sentiments of the party of which he was leader, and that they were in accordance with what he conceived to be the convictions of a truly loyal and patriotic man. In saying that I do not wish to be understood as saying that all those who advocated unrestricted reciprocity were not loyal or true to their country. I merely mention it to show that having formed strong opinions in his early days, he adhered to them to the last and, therefore, the motto 'faithful to the last' was as complimentary a tribute as could possibly be made to his memory. On the fifth day of May, 1905, I received the letter which I am about to read. I made a memo. upon it in order that those who might see it afterwards might know that the writer of the letter was at the time in his 102nd year. The letter is as follows :

My dear Sir Mackenzie :—I am glad to know that you are well, as I see your name in the proceedings of the Senate. You have not done much in your House this term, but I have no doubt you did all that you had to do. I see that the two long discussed Bills have now been sent up to you, and I would like very much to hear from you how you and the Senate are going to dispose of them.

I am yours truly,
DAVID WARK.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

I think that letter is in his own handwriting—it is quite evident that it is and that it was not dictated to, and written by any one else. To that letter I replied as follows :

My dear Senator :—Thanks for your letter of the 5th instant, which brought the gratifying intelligence, that you are, notwithstanding your great age, still in the enjoyment of such health and vigour of mind as to enable you to continue to take an intelligent interest in public affairs, particularly on questions which are now agitating the public mind, the equitable settlement of which will materially affect the future peace and harmony of the people of the Dominion. The long debate to which you refer has just closed, and the Bills are now in committee. You have no doubt followed the discussions in the Commons sufficiently closely to know that Sir Wilfrid has slightly modified the terms of his first propositions in re the separate school clauses. It is, therefore, in view of the diverse opinions held by members of the Commons—some that the clause does not go far enough, and others that it goes too far in fastening separate schools on the people of the two new provinces—uncertain what the provisions of the Bill may be when it reaches the Senate. I may add that the government, having now a majority in the Senate, the Bill, no doubt, whatever provisions it may contain, will in my opinion be accepted and passed.

Permit me to express the hope that so soon as the weather becomes more settled we may have the pleasure of seeing you again in your seat in the Senate.

I am, my dear Senator,
Yours sincerely,
MACKENZIE BOWELL.

I must confess that I cherish that letter very much, coming from a gentleman of his great age. When he was a hundred years old, it was my very great pleasure to bring him to his seat in this House and as my hon. friend the Secretary of State has already said, when he was 101 a committee was appointed to draft an address which was presented to him, and which he answered in the terms which have been read by the Secretary of State showing that even at that time, any one who takes the trouble to read critically the answer of that old gentleman, will come to the conclusion that his mind was as clear and acute as that of a man of 40 years of age. I deeply sympathize with his family. Although we could not expect to have him much longer with us, by his death the Senate lost an honest man and his own province and the Dominion lost a man in whose footsteps every one of us might find it to our credit and benefit to follow.

I have very little to say in reference to the death of Mr. Black. I never knew the gentleman, except by reputation, until he came to the Senate; but, like my hon. friend the Secretary of State, I formed a very high opinion of Senator Black of his character, and his keen appreciation of what he believed to be the duties of a senator. Whenever he spoke it was to the point. He had a high ideal of what a senator ought to be, and he often expressed his astonishment at some of our acts in this Chamber as not being in accord with the character and dignity of a body of this kind. I was very much surprised when I read of his death.

As to Senator Church, I sat in parliament with him many years ago in the House of Commons and I always found him to be what my hon. friend says, a man of strong convictions and opinions, straightforward and honest so far as I ever learned in any transactions politically or otherwise.

The death of Senator Fulford is one we must all regret. Perhaps I felt it as much as any one. When I was a boy I was very intimate with his father and mother, and all his acquaintances. They were all intimate friends of my wife's relations and consequently I always felt a deep interest in the late senator from the fact that I always looked upon him as a Bay of Quinté boy. There is a kind of freemasonery among those who come from that part of the country. It was the boast of the late Sir John Macdonald that he was a Bay of Quinté boy. That pleasant and beautiful part of Canada has produced if I may be permitted to say so, some of the first men of the Dominion, and every one who comes from that section of country feels proud of the fact. Consequently I have always looked upon Senator Fulford from that standpoint. He was generous in character; he had as my hon. friend said acquired great wealth and had been very successful in business. He was genial in his character, always with a smile, treating all, no matter whether he was a political friend or foe, in a like manner. I think the country, and particularly the locality in which he lived, have lost a very good man.

It might not be out of place for me to say, although my hon. friend did not refer to it, with regard to the death of the late Mr. Prefontaine, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that I used to hold an opinion of that gentleman politically which it is not necessary for me to express just now, but I have learned that in his capacity as a minister of the Crown he displayed such talent and perseverance in his efforts to make Canada what I think she ought to be and particularly in the matter of defences, that I hesitate not to express the opinion that in the loss of the Hon. Mr. Prefontaine the country has lost a valuable minister. I am speaking of him distinctly in his official and public character and of his political career. He was a man to my mind of indomitable pluck and energy. He formed strong opinions as to what he thought was the duty of Canada in reference to the defences of the country, and to my mind he took a noble stand during the time of the South African war. In opposition to many of his confreres he boldly advocated the sending of a Canadian contingent to that country. I remember meeting him when the first contingent was being sent off, and I said to him 'Prefontaine you have done a great many things I do not approve of, but for one thing, the action you have taken in reference to this South African contingent, I will, as an Englishman forgive you all your past sins.' That was said jocularly and we exchanged the compliments which I think should always pass between gentlemen. For these and other features of his public career I have taken this opportunity, although I have said many hard things against him politically, the last one that presents itself to me, to give a frank expression of the opinion I hold of that gentleman as a minister of the Crown and as a progressive minister, one whose example it would be well that his colleagues should follow. I apologize for having said so much but I though it my duty under the circumstances, and particularly in view of the position I have held toward the government, and the position I hold this present moment, to give expression to my honest convictions.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (C.B.)—I would ask permission of the House to say a few words with regard to the late senators Black and Church. I should have done so when I was on my feet before. I had not so much acquaintance with Senator Black, because he was living in the county of Cumberland. Senator Church was a citizen of Halifax for a number of years, and occupied the position of Minister of Mines and Public Charities in the Fielding and Murray government until such time as he was appointed to the Senate. He was an extremely temperate man, mild in his character, gentlemanly and courteous. It was my privilege to call to see him on New Year's Day. On meeting Mrs. Church she informed me that the senator was improving. He came down stairs to see me and I said I am glad to hear that you are improving. 'Yes', said he 'they say so, but I don't feel like it.' Three days after that he was dead. We have now the sad news of the death of one who was the Minister of the Crown under the Mackenzie government, I mean Governor Jones of Halifax. I called to see him on the day that I left, the 6th inst., and he desired me to convey his best wishes to all old friends who might inquire after him, 'as' he said 'I never hope to see Ottawa again.' He was then hale and hearty and able to walk across the room. I do not wish to institute any comparisons, but I must say that there never was a governor appointed for Nova Scotia by the government of Canada who has been more acceptable to the people of that province than the late Governor Jones. I think I am allowed the privilege of making these few remarks. He was my own personal friend. We were in parliament for a long time together and I cherish for him and his memory the highest respect.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—As senior member in this House for New Brunswick since the death of Senator Wark, I crave permission to add my tribute of respect to his memory. Senator Wark spent his youthful days, taught school, toiled—toiled hard—met with his first political and other successes in the county of Kent which he was supposed more particularly to represent. When the thought first occurred to me that I might raise my eyes to this honourable House and through the influence of my friends possibly be elevated to it, it was as successor to the senator for Kent, as he was then called, that I thought my chances lay. That was in 1885 twenty-one years ago. Senator Wark had then passed his 80th year. He had reached the limited days ascribed to men of our generation. He was an old, a very old man ; he had lived to see the face of the Senate renewed. Old and young had fallen by his side and around him. Only fourteen now remain in of those who sat with him and me in 1885. While of all those who were appointed at confederation with him, only one now survives. All the others slumber their eternal slumber beneath the sod. It has been said that life is a dream and death is an awakening. Very few among us hon. gentleman will now dream very long. The grim mower is constantly at work harvesting from among us. There is no necessity of prophesying the reform of the Senate through Providence making room for new comers ; whether reformed or not we are certainly changing. Vacancies occur every year ; every succeeding session sees vacant seats amongst us. Conservatives go and Liberals also go, and except that a Conservative majority has given way to a Liberal one, the reform of the Senate, so far as its improvement goes, is not very visible. Possibly but few among the latest appointees are better men, better Christians, better citizens, better senators than Senator Wark was, while none among the ancients, among those of my generation, will claim to be so. His life may well be pointed to as a model for all Canadians. For a full century he was a useful and a dutiful citizen of New Brunswick first, and, after 1867, of Confederated Canada, a Britisher with profound convictions and liberal ideals, ideals that were liberal not merely in profession and in word, but in deed and reality, a man of charity in deed and in act. A christian he was and as a true Canadian his memory hon. gentleman will endure among us, no doubt, as the memory of the patriarchs did endure in Judea.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I rise with a sentiment of deep gratitude to the hon. leader of the opposition in this House, who has, I think, done a great deal this afternoon to cement the feeling of harmony and union which should exist among all our people in the different provinces of this Dominion. He has paid a national tribute to the memory of a man who has done a great deal for his own city and for his own province, and who, with the opportunities afforded him in the past two years accomplished a great deal for this Canada of ours and for the British empire. Coming as I do from the province of Quebec, I gratefully thank the hon. leader of the opposition, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, for the tribute he has paid to the memory of Hon. Raymond Prefontaine. The Hon. Raymond Prefontaine was a man who had no mean qualities, a man of energy and action, a man loyal and true as steel to his friends, and in no way malicious to his opponents and adversaries, a man who bore no hard feeling against the men who tried to down him in life's struggle, a man who stood frank and true for his friends. As he did in social and private life, he brought these qualities into active public life, and his loyalty to his friends was duplicated in his loyalty to his country and to the empire. We have the proof of it in the fact that the two greatest nations of the earth, France and Britain, paid a tribute to his memory and to his ashes, such as has never before been paid to a colonial statesman, and Canada in its turn did likewise. I am proud to see that in the lower House, and in this House to-day, his political opponents should mention his name and his virtues and recount what the state owed to his works and his achievments. Therefore, I say that Sir Mackenzie Bowell has rendered a service in thus cementing the bonds of harmony and union between our peoples, and I have every certainty that the people of Quebec will be thankful to him because the people of the province of Quebec loved and admired the Hon. Mr. Prefontaine for his sterling qualities, for his active political life, his life of duty to his fellow-citizens, and had learned to admire him for the great things he accomplished during the past two years. I have not much to say in regard to my other colleagues, two of them were my neighbours, Senators Black and Church. They have gone. Death is a fearful thing to meet. Senator Fulford also was a friend of mine and Senator Wark as well. I had the pleasure of receiving a kindly remark from him one day. I offered to aid him as he was coming up the stairs without a cane, but he declined my aid. He said: 'No, I don't need any assistance just now.' and he asked: 'Who are you?' 'Oh,' I replied, 'I am the baby senator.' Well, 'he said, you are the makings of a fine boy.' I have always kept the memory of Senator Wark green in my heart since then. I thank the House for the attention they have given me and I thank the leader of the opposition for his remarks in regard to the Hon. Mr. Prefontaine.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—I desire to add a few words of testimony to the character and worth of the two senators from Nova Scotia. I had the honour of a seat in the local legislature with both of them. Both were members of the local government for a period of years. Senator Black, the older of the two, was a member of the government without portfolio. For many years he occupied the position of chairman of the Board of Agriculture, and his experience as a successful farmer and stock raiser was of great value to the province he served so long. Senator Black was also a member of the exhibition committee for all the years during which the exhibitions were held in Halifax. He was a prominent member of that committee and Nova Scotia has reason to deplore the loss that has been sustained by his death. Senator Church held the position of head of the Department of Public Works and Mines. No more honourable man ever filled a public office than Senator Church. The office which he held is one in regard to which the public have always entertained some degree of suspicion, particularly with regard to the gold mines, that things were not quite as they ought to be. There was a feeling that in regard to applications for licenses and attempts to obtain special favours in this and other matters, things were not as they should be. That was prior to the time Senator Church took that office. But from the day Senator Church took that office never was there a suspicion of wrong-doing. If it was not a personal matter I should like to relate to the House an incident which shows the character of the man, an incident in which I knew him to do an act of justice under circumstances which showed that he was a man who would swear to his own hurt. That is the character of the late Senator Church. No more honourable man ever held public office, and I can only say I think it was appropriate to both these men that they rest from their labours and their work doth follow them.

THE ADDRESS.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the second session of the tenth parliament.—Hon. Mr. Power.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think my first duty is to congratulate the hon. gentleman who moved the address in reply to the speech from the Throne. He is a gentleman whose acquaintance I had not the pleasure of having before he became a member of this House, but his name is a well known one in the lower provinces and I am satisfied that he is a worthy member of a distinguished family. I am satisfied too that he is going to prove a very worthy and useful member of this body. He has experience in public life, business capacity, and can make a good speech, and those are all qualifications which are very necessary in a senator. And there is this about it, that the hon. gentleman, I hope, will not form for a great many years the subject for the kind of notice we have just been having, of gentlemen who have left us. It is not necessary to say anything about my colleague from Nova Scotia who seconded the address. We all know him and have come to respect and admire him.

With respect to the speech of the Governor General, and to the discussion which has taken place on it, I may make this general observation; that it covers a good deal of ground. There are a great many topics mentioned in the speech; still the discussion with respect to it, has covered a great deal more ground. In fact, probably the greater portion of the discussion has been with respect to matters which are not mentioned in the speech at all. The discussion resembles that discourse which was said to deal with matters and things in general and several things besides. I propose to deal, I hope briefly, with some paragraphs in the speech. The first one that I shall say something about is that in which His Excellency says that it gave him much pleasure as a representative of His Majesty to take part in the inauguration of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. That was a sentiment that we thought we could all share in ; but I noted that the hon. leader of the opposition, in dealing with this paragraph of the speech, expressed regret apparently that His Excellency was not accompanied by some one who could give him the other side of the story—could exhibit the other side of the shield. You know, Mr. Speaker, that when there is a question of canonizing a man of exemplary life in our church, important functions are discharged by the ecclesiastic who for the time being is known as the 'Devil's Advocate,' who points out all the things that can be said against the person whose canonization is proceeding. The hon. leader of the opposition seems to think that on the occasion of His Excellency's trip to the west there was no 'Devil's Advocate' present. Well, I have been informed that there were at any rate three gentlemen present who, I think, could play that part very well. Two of them were members of the other Chamber in this parliament and one was a member, I think, of the late legislative assembly of the Northwest Territories, and I know that whatever those gentlemen could have done in the west they certainly played the part to which I have referred in the east at an earlier stage of the autonomy question. As a good deal has been said about the educational clauses in the Autonomy Bills, I may be permitted to say just a few words. The provision embodied in the two provincial constitutions with respect to education is substantially the provision which was embodied in the Act passed by this parliament in the year 1875, modified to a certain extent —not to a very great extent, by the results of the experience of the Northwest Territories.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—To a large extent.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The legislature of the Northwest Territories had been dealing with the schools of that country. They had made certain modifications in the Dominion Act of 1875 in working under it and the provision embodied in the constitution of the two new provinces is to all intents and purposes the provision of the Act of 1875, as modified in actual practice by the provincial legislation. I do not see how any one can regard it as an outrage upon the provinces that this parliament when giving Alberta and Saskatchewan a constitution should have given them with respect to education, the provision which had been practically in operation for several years in the province under the legislation of the territorial legislature. Something has been said as to the provisions of the British North America Act. It would be a difficult thing, under the circumstances, and looking at the fact that this Act of 1875 had been passed by the parliament of Canada, to make the British North America Act applicable. To have made no provision with respect to schools, and to have given no protection to the interests of the minority in that country, would have been a breach of faith, because, as the Secretary of State pointed out the other day, in 1875 the leaders of both parties took it for granted, and some of them expressed the distinct opinion, that they were settling this question for all time, and the people who went in there to colonize that region on the faith of those statements and of that Act of 1875 would have been in a way defrauded if the provincial constitutions had not contained some provision for their protection.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why did you change the Bill ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not going to discuss that question at any length. We discussed that last year. I noticed that the hon. leader of the opposition quoted a letter which I understood was a private letter, and which one would suppose was hardly a proper subject for discussion in parliament; but in this letter there was some reference made to the fact that the premier of this country had swallowed certain convictions of his own.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman would leave the impression on the mind of any one hearing his speech that I quoted from a private letter. I quoted from a letter which was not marked private, and which had been published in the newspapers.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was a private letter. published in a Conservative paper. I do not think that that really improves the position very much.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It improves it so far as I am concerned.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is this to be said with respect to the premier; one of the most important benefits which he has conferred on this country is that he has always tried to promote peace and good-will amongst all classes of our population.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—At the expense of our rights.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not at all. I have not heard that there is any serious discontent in the Northwest provinces over the educational provisions of the Autonomy Bill.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—There is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The truth is, with respect to these Autonomy Bills that we have not heard any complaint from the people directly interested : the people of the Northwest have not been making any noise about it. The noise has been made at this end altogether, on both sides. The Conservative organizers and head centres in Ontario have been denouncing the government for interference with provincial rights and imposing denominational schools on the new provinces and the gentlemen on the other side, in the province of Quebec, have been denouncing the government because they have not done enough in that way; but we have not heard any strong expression of opinion from either side in the Northwest ; and it seems to me that, after all, if the people who are directly interested are satisfied, there is no reason why we should howl about the matter and I think howling is the only expression which will describe the noise that was made during last session when those Bills were before parliament. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, has, when necessary, shown courage and firmness enough. I remember having been particularly struck by that fact on the occasion of one of his visits to France. When, before a French audience where he might have to a certain extent, perhaps, curried favour with his audience by being very French and criticising England, he was more English and spoke more highly of the English form of government than he is in the habit of doing when he is amongst English speaking people on English territory. I think that he acted wisely, that getting what has been got with the good-will of all parties was a much better thing for the country than to have fought and created a lasting disturbance by trying to get something more. My honest conviction is, as I stated last year, that the arrangement which has been made is satisfactory. The policy of peace is certainly better than the firebrand policy or devil's advocate policy.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Excepting in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have heard from the people of Quebec, and I suppose we shall hear again. Gentlemen like the hon. member from Stadacona talked in the same way in 1896 and in 1904, before the elections. We know what the result was, and I think that probably the people of Quebec will show their good sense on future occasions, as they have done in the last two general elections. Whatever we might think about this question theoretically, I take it that the result of the local elections in these two provinces and the result of the Dominion by-elections held there, afford a triumphant vindication of the government. If circumstances had been otherwise, if the government of to-day had been Conservative and the results been such as they are, we should have had all these gentlemen claiming that the elections ratified the action of the government and that we had nothing more to do with the matter. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield did take that line rather. In the course of his speech on this subject he said that we had nothing to do with this Northwest school question now, that the question was settled and disposed of.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman will turn to page 44 of the debates of this session he will find himself reported as saying :

> For my own part I think, that, important as that discussion was and great as were the principles involved, and however unpleasant the result has been in a constitutional sense to many of the people of the Northwest and how much the co-religionists of the minority in the other provinces of Canada feel that they have not obtained what they were promised or what Sir Wilfrid Laurier proposed to give them, or pretends even yet that he did give them,—I feel that this question might well have been allowed to pass from public discussion for the present.

I think that bears me out.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—For the present.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then the hon. gentleman goes on to say :

> We have so many questions of great importance pressing themselves upon us that we cannot afford to be going back over the work of a previous session and bringing it into the next. We must deal with the issues that are coming before us each session as we meet them.

I think I was perfectly justified in the reference I made to the speech of the hon. gentleman. He adopts the poet's doctrine that the dead past should bury its dead with respect to a contest the echoes of which are still ringing in our ears. But the hon. gentleman had not gone very far when he found it proper to go back to what the Finance Minister said, when a provincial leader in Nova Scotia twenty years ago. It shows how thoughtless and unfair some wise men may be. Then the hon. gentleman said something with respect to Mr. Haultain. He was understood to lay down some extraordinary doctrine, evolved for the occasion, as to the duty of the lieutenant governor. That has been answered already by the Minister of Trade and Commerce ; but there is another small circumstance which I think would have carried weight with the lieutenant governor, that Mr. Haultain had been a resident in the province of Alberta, and consequently was not just the man to send for to act as premier of the province of Saskatchewan. The truth is, and I have noticed it very often in this Chamber, and it is true elsewhere, that a Conservative may steal a horse while a Liberal may not look over the fence. That is the sort of justice we get. I trust I may be pardoned for having dealt so long with a matter which, as the hon. gentleman from Marshfield said in part of his speech, had better be left behind.

I do not propose to say anything with respect to the paragraph of the speech which deals with the bountiful harvest and the impetus to our exports and imports. The leader of the opposition said, and truly, that Providence deserved thanks for that. I know that under a former administration congratulations of this kind were very common and, although Providence was then, I suppose, doing His work as He does now, the government claimed a good deal of credit for what was done. In the present case, if we take this paragraph in the speech and the next paragraph with respect to the flow of immigrants, I think it will be clear that a good deal of credit is due to the government. The hon. leader of the opposition spoke of the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway had been completed some 20 years ago and was in operation for several years before the present government came into power. Well, the railway was completed as far as Winnipeg at any rate about 1881, so that the railway had reached the prairie fifteen years before the change of government. That western territory was just as fertile then as it is to-day : there were multitudes, thousands and hundreds of thousands of people leaving the over-crowded countries of Europe and seeking homes in the new world all those fifteen years, but practically none of them came to Canada, or if they did come they did not stay here. It was only after the change of government and the introduction of business methods into our immigration department that the immigration set in, and that these lands began to be filled up. I am particularly surprised that a gentleman like the hon. member from Marshfield, who claims to stand on a somewhat higher platform than most of us, should have overlooked that fact and that he should not have given credit, being an impartial man, to the present government for the great success of their immigration policy. That policy has been so successful that we find Australia sending gentlemen here to find out how we do things, in order that they may as to their own country imitate the policy which is working so successfully in Canada. So I think the government deserve much credit even though Providence deserves the most.

The right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has pointed out the circumstances in connection with the treaty of Japan which made it of special value. There is another matter mentioned in the next paragraph of His Excellency's speech which I think is of very great consequence, that is the subject of preserving our forests. I do not propose to go into that. Every one recognizes the importance of the matter; but I think it only right to call attention to the great service done to this country by the premier in summoning the forestry convention to meet at Ottawa at the beginning of this year. That was one of those acts which, I think, indicate the statesman. There were no politics in the matter. The question of forestry did not come into politics at all; but the premier saw that it was a question in which vital interests of this country were concerned, and he summoned this convention, with the result that in the various provinces to-day the local legislatures, where they had not before dealt with the matter, are now dealing with it, and the care and protection of the forests has received an impetus such as it could have got in no other way.

The next paragraph of His Excellency's speech refers to the garrisoning of Halifax and Esquimalt. The leader of the opposition said, very properly, that the garrisons of British troops in those places formed a bond of union between Canada and the mother country. I cordially endorse that sentiment, and take the liberty of saying that the views which I expressed here a year ago on this subject are unchanged. I don't blame the government of Canada for having fallen in with the views of the imperial government; but I must say that in my humble opinion the change is not in the interests of the empire nor is it in the interests of Canada. However, as there was pressure from the mother country as I understand, to have this change made, I assume that the government of Canada felt that they were doing only their duty in meeting the views of the imperial government. The next two paragraphs of the speech I do not wish to say anything about. We have had investigations in insurance matters in this Chamber, and I do not suppose that hon. gentlemen care to discuss that subject just now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? I understand him to say that the British government pressed upon the Canadian government the taking over of the Halifax and Esquimalt fortifications. I was under the impression that the offer was made voluntarily by Canada. Could the hon. gentleman or one of the ministers say what the facts are in reference to that, because it may leave a wrong impression on the minds of many who read the hon. gentleman's utterances.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I really cannot say. I have no official information on the subject. I understood that the imperial government were very anxious to get rid of the expense of garrisoning those places, but just what correspondence took place between the two governments I cannot say.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was a natural result which arose out of the conference in London. It was then pointed out that Canada was not contributing what the imperial government considered a fair proportion—we had been paying a portion of the cost at Esquimalt for some years—I think that was going on before the change of government. We paid one hundred and twenty thousand dollars.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is correct; that was the bargain made when the graving dock at Esquimalt was built.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When the question arose as to Canada's share, the simple solution which suggested itself was to say, 'Well, we are only paying a portion of the cost at Esquimalt now; we will pay it all and take over Halifax as well. We have a permanent force organized, and they may just as well be stationed there as anywhere else.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That verifies the opinion I had on the point.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The next paragraph in the speech that I shall refer to is the one which refers to the surveys of the eastern sections of the National Transcontinental Railway. His Excellency informs us that:

> Satisfactory progress is being made in the exploration and surveys of the eastern division of the National Transcontinental Railway, and it is expected that contracts for the construction of two important sections embracing together about 400 miles will shortly be executed.

Since His Excellency delivered that speech, I see that the tenders have been received for those sections to which he refers; and I understand that a remarkably good line in the matter of grades and curves has been found so that it is to be hoped the work will be prosecuted successfully. There was some reference made by the hon. leader of the opposition, I think, and also by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) to the Quebec-Moncton section of the line. I may say that as to this, I feel exactly as I did last session. Some reference was made to a statement made by the right hon. the premier. Now, that was in the session of 1903. The premier at that time spoke from information which he had received from people who would naturally be expected to know what they were talking about, and he said that he was given to understand that the distance between Quebec and Moncton would be shortened from 120 to 140 miles by the proposed line. It now turns out, even after the very latest surveys—it will be remembered that last year we had only a preliminary report based on the first surveys—now that further surveys have been made, no shorter line than the Intercolonial Railway has been found between Quebec and Moncton. That being the case, it is to be hoped that this new line will not be built, and I do not think that any member of the government or any member of parliament would have dreamed three years ago of building this line if it was not to be an improvement on the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—I understand that the line will not be any shorter, but are not the grades very much better so that a great improvement may be expected in that way, very much heavier loads can be carried in consequence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Undoubtedly the gradients of the recently surveyed line are easier than those on the Intercolonial Railway. When the Intercolonial Railway was built, the standard grade was one per cent; and now, on the Transcontinental, the grades going east are supposed to be four-tenths of one per cent, and those going west six-tenths of one per cent. That is a considerable advantage, but my contention is this—I may be wrong, but I think inquiry should be made at any rate; the government engineers may have recently inquired into this point. For all I know the inquiry may be going on. My own conviction is that the gradients on the Intercolonial Railway can be reduced to the four-tenths and six-tenths of one per cent respectively without very much lengthening the road, and at very much less cost than would be involved in the building of a new road.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Can the hon. gentleman inform the House is there any further report than the interim report discussed in this House, and which we all had in our hands last session—the interim report made by Mr. Butler, and to which my hon. friend refers—Has there been any further report made public?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think so. I think that there was further information given in a reply to a question which was submitted in the House of Commons within the last day or two. At any rate, my information is that no shorter line than the line mentioned in the preliminary reports of last year has been found. My own view is, as it was last year, that if it is found—everything depends on that—if it is found that the grades on the Intercolonial Railway can be reduced to the Transcontinental standard and the curvatures can be cut down to that standard without very great expense, the better and wiser plan would be to improve the Intercolonial Railway; and then if the government wished to lease the Intercolonial Railway from Quebec to Moncton to the Grand Trunk Pacific company they should do that rather than build the new line at great expense and lease that new line to the company. The lease, if made, should contain such condition as to running powers and rates as would protect the people living in the districts affected. I particularly direct the attention of the hon. gentlemen who represent the government in this House to the fact that if the country builds this new road, then the Intercolonial Railway from Moncton to Quebec is condemned to perpetual deficits. The local traffic on that part of the road, which would be pretty much all that the road would get, is not of such a character as to make the road pay; and it would simply mean that that portion of the line would be involved in continuous deficits. It may be said that two roads would be required to do the business. I hope that the business will increase rapidly in the future, but I wish to direct attention to this fact that all engineers say that, at the very least estimate, a road with double tracks will do four times as much work as a single track road, so that if you get the proper grade and curves of the Intercolonial Railway and the business increases, and the government double track that road, they would be in a position then to do twice as much business over the Intercolonial Railway as they could do over the Intercolonial Railway and the new road, both roads being single track roads. I hope the House will excuse me for dealing at such length with a subject about which perhaps I am not supposed to know anything.

The speech goes on to say:

> A report has been received from the Transportation Commission containing several important recommendations; the document will be laid before you.

With respect to this paragraph, the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) had a great deal to say, and in dealing with that subject he departed from the line which he had taken with respect to the Autonomy Bill and undertook to fight over again the battles which had been fought in 1903. Considering the fact that the elections of 1904 were conducted on that question chiefly, in fact almost altogether, it is rather late now to talk about the policy which the country at that time condemned. The hon. gentleman shows a certain want of consistency also in this that he finds fault with the government for so locating the Transcontinental Railway that it parallels, in some parts of the west, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern Railway. Now that is an argument in favour of which something can be said, but when he comes to Ontario, the hon. gentleman wants the government to adopt the policy of acquiring the Dominion Atlantic Railway and entering into competition with the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I do not suppose that he wishes to misrepresent me, but that would be the effect of his remarks. I pointed out the opportunity that had been lost by the government in allowing the Canada Atlantic Railway not the Dominion Atlantic Railway—to pass into the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway. Instead of the policy of building a new line in the north, they should have adopted the hon. Mr. Borden's proposal.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The policy of the leader of the opposition, which the hon. gentleman supported, was not only to acquire the Canada Atlantic Railway—I made a mistake if I said the Dominion Atlantic,—but to build a further line up to Sudbury. As I understand, that line is now being built by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Canadian Northern are also building a line to that neighbourhood. It amounts substantially to what I said, that the government are invited by the hon. gentleman to enter into competition in Ontario with the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway and also the Canadian Northern Railway. Now, whatever we may think about government ownership, it must strike one as being very unfair and unbusinesslike that the government should enter into competition with roads which are owned by companies who have put their own money into them. The hon gentleman in speaking of the right hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce and of the Minister of Finance quoted some saying which I do not remember to have heard before—I have forgotten now to whom the hon. gentleman attributed it—'Keep your mouth shut and you will do.' I think that the hon. gentleman himself is open to a suggestion of that kind. The hon. gentleman is not one of those who hesitate about expressing their opinions at considerable length, and with considerable force on a great many subjects, and he is open to the charge of sometimes not being as wise as if he had not said so much. That is all I propose to say in respect to the speech of His Excellency, but about two amongst those other things to which I have referred as forming part of the discussion I propose to say a few words. A good deal has been said with respect to the Act providing for pensions for ex-ministers.

I think, hon. gentlemen, that the Act is right in principle. If a gentleman has given his services to the country for a considerable number of years, and when he leaves the government is in straitened financial circumstances, it is not creditable to the country that he should not to a certain extent be provided for. In England there is a provision of that kind; and I think the measure was right in principle, but that some of the details were decidedly objectionable. I notice that the right hon. the premier intimates that amendments will be made in the measure this session. In my humble opinion it would have been wise on the part of the framers of this measure to have adhered more closely to the lines of the English law. There are two points on which I look upon this measure as being defective. I shall just read one provision of the English law, which I regret is not to be found in our Canadian law:

> Whenever any person seeks to obtain a pension under this Act, his application for that purpose shall be made in writing.

In this case it would be to the Governor in Council I suppose—

> To which he shall subscribe his name and which shall contain not only a statement of the services performed by him and the grounds on which such pension is claimed, but a specific declaration that the amount of his income from other sources is so limited as to be inadequate to maintain his station in life and without such declaration no pension shall be granted under this Act.

If our Act had contained a provision such as that which is contained in the English law, a great deal of the objection to the measure of last year would have been removed, because the country would have been satisfied that only those gentlemen who needed the pension were to get it. I have heard it stated that it would unduly humilate an ex-minister to require him to make a declaration of that kind. Now ex-ministers in England make that declaration and do not feel that they are unduly humiliated; and I do not see why, if men like Lord George Hamilton and the late Sir Stafford Northcote, afterward Earl Iddesleigh, were able to make a declaration of that kind without feeling undue humiliation, a Canadian ex-minister should not do the same. I think myself there is no humilation in a gentleman's admitting that he is not well off, and that he needs a pension. That is less humiliating than to accept a pension that he does not need. The other defect which I humbly submit is to be found in this measure of last year is that it contains no provision for deducting the amount of indemnity which an ex-minister receives as a member of either house of parliament from the pension. That does not need to be enlarged upon at all. When a gentleman receives a sessional indemnity of two thousand five hundred dollars, there is no reason why he should receive three thousand five hundred dollars in addition. I think therefore, that there should be no pension in that case, or that the amount of the indemnity should be deducted from the amount of the pension. It was suggested by the hon. gentleman from Sackville (Hon. Mr. Wood) and I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of his suggestion—that there should be an age limit. I suppose the hon. gentleman meant that if an ex-minister was under 45, or some such age as that, he should not be entitled to a pension. If he were still young enough to hustle for himself and succeed in some other occupation he should not be allowed a pension. I think that is a point which deserves consideration. With respect to the indemnity, there has been a certain amount of misapprehension apparently on that point. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) thought that the government were responsible. He said :

> With regard to the increase of pay of the members of parliament, and in regard to all measures of a like nature which were brought down last year, I have no hesitation in saying that I hold the government very blameable.

Now, at first sight, it occurred to me in listening to the hon. gentleman that he was a little inconsistent, because almost immediately he proceeded to approve of the increase in the indemnity, and one would rather get the impression from his remarks with respect to the pay of members of Congress in the United States that he would be prepared to go further than parliament had gone here.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman just stopped short reading from my speech in a way which enables him to make this comment, but if he had read a little further on he would have found that I held them blameable for bringing down the measure so late in the session—not that I had such strong objections to the measures themselves as I had to the late period of the session when they were introduced.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was making my own speech, and if the hon. gentleman had only waited he would probably not have interrupted as he has done. I read what he said, and then was just going to turn to the debates of last session to show that what the hon. gentleman said with respect to the lack of time for consideration was not justified. Now I find in the debates of last year, at page 852, on July 18, that :

> A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (202) an Act to amend the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons.

The Bill was read the first time, as every Bill in our House is, without any motion, and then the Hon. Mr. Scott moved the second reading of the Bill. He said :

> This is a Bill to increase the indemnity to members of the Senate and House of Commons from $1,500 to $2,500.

I want to call attention to this fact. An impression has been attempted to be created that this Bill was smuggled through the Senate, and that the House knew nothing about it; but I have read the explanation given at the time by the leader of the government in the Senate. Then the hon. gentleman from Marshfield rose and made a fairly long speech. This is the gentleman who complains now that the measure was brought down so late that there was not time to consider it. The hon. leader of the opposition said he had looked over the Bill hastily, and Mr. Macdonald, (B.C.) spoke; then Mr. Wood spoke in the same sense in which he spoke yesterday, and made a speech of some little length. Mr. Domville, Mr. Lougheed, and Mr. Landry spoke, and Mr. Poirier made quite a little speech. The leader of the opposition spoke a second time, and your humble servant said a few words; that was on that day. Then on the next day, at page 919 it is reported that the House resolved itself into committee of the whole on 'Bill (202) An Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons.' You see there was no rushing through or smuggling through, and in the committee Mr. Macdonald (B.C.), asked if there was an alteration in reference to the 'days of grace,' to which Mr. Scott replied, 'no, it still continues.' Then Mr. Ellis asked a question and Mr. Scott replied. All these hon. gentlemen were present, and there was ample opportunity to discuss the measure in committee, and the hon. gentlemen did not avail themselves of the opportunity. I hold that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield is not in a position to complain that no opportunity was given to discuss the measure. That is the point I make; and now the hon. gentleman is welcome to any comfort he can get out of the fact that I stopped reading the speech where I did.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to turn to his own remarks on that occasion, when he rebuked the whole of us for talking of a Bill that we had not properly before us ? I do not think the Bill was in the hands of members at all, and the hon. gentleman rebuked us all for talking about it because we had not the Bill in our hands.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman thinks that will improve his position I shall be very glad to read what I said. We all know that every member of this House knew about this measure. It had been talked about for weeks and months, and the idea of any hon. gentleman rising here now and wishing us to assume that he did not know about this measure, is perfectly absurd. No one was surprised. The hon. gentleman made his speech and then Mr. Scott said;

It is a pity to discuss the Bill when it is not before us.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Mr. Scott continued :

It was only agreed upon the day before yesterday, and I am not sufficiently familiar with its details to discuss them.

Then I said :

I would suggest that the second reading be agreed to now, and we can discuss the details in committee.

There was ample opportunity next day to discuss the details in committee and no hon. gentleman took the opportunity to do so, though the Bill had been printed and distributed. Every one has a right to pass an opinion on this measure. My own views on the subject are not altogether remote from those of the hon. gentleman from Sackville. The government are responsible for this measure, but everybody knows how it went through; that there was what is called a round-robin signed quite as universally by the members of the opposition as by the members of the government side, and the duty of the opposition—their first duty I think—if they saw the government doing anything improper in making an attack on the treasury, was to guard the treasury, but they did not do so. There is just one circumstance in connection with the measure of last year which I regret. I regret very much that the allowance of fifteen days absence to each member has been retained. There were certain valuable changes made in the Act which will hinder gentlemen from coming here for one day and then drawing a large sum at the end of the session, but I think it is very much to be regretted that this fifteen days absence was allowed, because it just comes to this; if there are no absent days allowed, then members who are anxious to earn the whole indemnity will remain here and attend to the public business. They will be anxious that the session shall terminate as soon as possible, and will try to accelerate business and enable us to get away earlier, but under this fifteen days arrangement these gentlemen can go home to their families and business and they are indifferent or almost indifferent as to whether the session ends or not. I hope that the fifteen days allowance will be done away with. I am not undertaking to blame any one in connection with this indemnity matter, but I venture to say that the principle upon which these indemnities are based is altogether wrong. My contention is that it is altogether wrong that any body of men should have the uncontrolled power of fixing their own pay. Senators and members of the House of Commons have all of them more or less human nature about them, and if a man is in a position to fix his own pay he is certainly not likely to err on the side of economy. It is perhaps to be regretted that there is not a provision in our constitution which would provide that between the proposal of an increase and the enactment of increase there should be a general election.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I want to direct attention first to the allowance question. Perhaps this debate on the subject is out of place, because the Senate has not much to do with it unless we reject the Bill entirely, which I think would be an absurd thing for the Senate to do. We have not much to do with money Bills. However, an hon. gentleman last night has likened us to trustees. I am quite willing to accept that comparison. The law in some provinces—in my own province at all events—allows a trustee, when the Act appointing the trustee does not mention anything about it, five per cent of the whole assets. At that rate I take it for granted the revenue of Canada being about $80,000,000, that the trustees are entitled to five per cent of it, which would be $4,000,000. Give $3,000,000 to the House of Commons and let us have $1,000,000. I am quite willing to accept that position. Up to the present the Senate has not by any means gone up to that amount in its expenditure.

I desire to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address. It is a pleasant duty to discharge, but, without reference to any particular gentleman, I think it is regrettable that this year the old usage has not been followed of having one French speaking gentleman move or second the address. This, I admit, is no right at all, but it is a courtesy which goes a long way to establish harmony and accord between us. If the government would take that into consideration in future years it would be very acceptable to every one. It is also regrettable that we have no French minister on the treasury benches. It seems to me that if the government could find way to remedy, what I consider a wrong to some extent, it would also be very acceptable.

The address refers to the death of the King of Denmark. The reference is quite proper. The King of Denmark was one of the most distinguished monarchs in Europe. There is hardly a throne in Europe now which is not adorned with one of his family, so much so that he was styled the father-in-law of Europe. But what concerns us much more is the relation of the King of Denmark with the royal family of England and it is proper that we should express regret at his demise.

The address refers also to the prosperity of Canada. It is true that we are enjoying a period of great prosperity, but perhaps people do not look to the real causes of that prosperity. Possibly the action of the government has something to do with it, but I attribute the present prosperity of the country principally to confederation itself. It is quite true that the two great parties of Canada had something to do with it and are entitled to some credit when we consider that; but confederation has enlarged our Dominion and brought it prominently before the whole world. It has perfected the acquisition of the Northwest, and altogether has improved the transportation facilities of Canada and fostered its industry, and therefore I attribute the greatest part of the present prosperity to that union of the provinces. Another cause of the prosperity is the development of the west. The hon. gentleman from Halifax has referred a little to that. He said that for a certain number of years, up to 1896, we had almost no immigration at all and the west was not developed. The railway was built, he said, at least to Winnipeg, in 1881. It is true we had access to the Northwest in 1881, but it was by a long circuitous route. We had to pass through the United States, and there was but a link of the Canadian Pacific Railway built then, from Emerson to Winnipeg. I had myself to travel by the long route through the United States, and I know what it was. The Canadian Pacific Railway was not completed until the fall of 1885, and it was only in the spring of 1886 that it began to produce some effect on the settlement of the west. Besides the inconvenience of not having better facilities to reach the Northwest, there was one thing then that retarded the settlement of the country, and that is the attacks of the American press and the Liberal press of Canada and the leaders of the Liberal party of this country on our Northwest, depreciating the soil and climate and consequently preventing people going there to settle. That policy of depreciation was carried on for a long time. Then we had frosts in 1882, 1883, 1884 and 1885, which killed the crops. That was not a good advertisement for the country. But now the west is developing, better methods of tilling the soil have been adopted, and I do not entirely dissent from those who say that the policy of the government may have had something to do with our prosperity. But I maintain that the greatest part of that prosperity is due to our bountiful crops. That is an advertisement much more effective than anything the government have done. I say also that the prosperity is due to efforts made by previous governments to open new channels of trade and commerce. I remember when the reciprocity treaty was abrogated, the government of the day went to work and tried to open new channels in Europe, Asia and everywhere. That also has produced its fruits. Then another cause of the prosperity is the continuation of the National Policy, which the present government has not abandoned. They have accepted the National Policy practically almost in its entirety, so that the prosperity of the present day if attributable to the policy of the present government must be due largely to its commercial policy. In fact they are to-day in the position of those who are reaping the crops of those who put the seed in the ground.

Now, I come to the Autonomy Bill of last year, since reference has been made to it. It has been said that the people in the west are satisfied. I have had the opportunity of talking with the people out there, high and low, and they are not satisfied. First, everybody knows that a faction has arisen under the pretext of protecting provincial rights. These people are not satisfied. Then there are the Catholic people who are not satisfied either. They have accepted, to a certain extent, the position as it is, because they could not do any better. They were between two fires. Mr. Haultain and Mr. Bennett made such a sweeping declaration at the time of the election as to wiping out the rights of the Catholic population that the latter thought it had no other course left to them but to fall in with the Liberal government of the day; but to say that they are satisfied is quite inaccurate. The law does not give them what they are entitled to in every way, both by the constitution and by the dictates of their own consciences. One hon. gentleman has said this afternoon that the law is now what the law of 1875 was, as modified by the ordinances. Well, that is a very great change. The modification has been very great indeed; it has wiped out all the privileges that the Catholic population had in 1875, and which were intended to be secured to them. It has tried to make it appear that the western population have a system of separate schools, while, as a matter of fact, they have not. They have the words but they have not the genuine institution, the true separate schools. Originally the separate schools were understood to be denominational schools. Now, the meaning of that word has entirely changed. It is restricted to the school-house. They may have separate school-houses, but they have not denominational schools, or what I call separate schools. The present system gives only one advantage, and that is the possible advantage of choosing the teacher, which is something no doubt; but it is not all and it is not sufficient. The fact of having half an hour of religious instruction at the fag end of the class day does not give the character of denominational schools to these schools. The hon. Secretary of State has referred to the judgment of the Privy Council on the Manitoba school case, and to my mind he has not given to the House the exact meaning of those judgments.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He does not understand them; he never understood them.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—There were two judgments. The first judgment was on one point and the second was on an entirely different point. By the first judgment it was decided that we had no right by usage or practice before confederation. That was the point which was referred to the Privy Council the first time, and that was the only point. It is distinctly stated in the judgment of the Privy Council that that is the only point affected by the judgment. We contended that we had by usage or practice the right of having separate schools, that right arising out of the position we occupied before the entry of the province into confederation. That point was decided against us. Afterwards we appealed to the government at Ottawa, in accordance with the provisions of the law, and our petition was, in course of time, referred to the Privy Council again, and this time we were supported in our contention as regards the rights we had acquired after the entry of the province into confederation. It will be seen that these two judgments have no connection with each other, and that they are not necessarily inconsistent. The last one is the law of the country at the present time, and it has been supported by the order in council passed in 1895 which governs the case entirely. It has been said that this matter is an apple of discord. Well, if it pleases somebody to apply to us that term, we have to put up with it I suppose. But it is not an accurate description of the evil. If any one possessing rights in this Dominion and claiming those rights is liable to be called a disturber of the peace it is really to be regretted. Any one who has a right must have the privilege of claiming that right without being called a disturber. We are not people who wish to foment discord in this country—very far from it; but surely, when we have rights, we must be allowed to claim them, and to fight for them. Speaking of the decision of the people in this connection is to my mind a distortion of the constitution. The constitution says expressly that these matters are to be decided by the Governor in Council and not by the people. That clause in the constitution was framed with a great deal of care, and it was adopted so as to protect the minorities in the Dominion, which is not the case to-day in the Northwest. The hon. Secretary of State has referred to the hon. gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) and has commended him on the attitude he has taken in this matter. He said that the Catholic people owed a debt of gratitude to the hon. gentleman. That is true, and I am glad to express my own gratitude to the hon. gentleman; but then if the action of the hon. gentleman was right, the action of those who held opposite views was wrong, and if he was right in taking one course why should the people decide in favour of the other gentleman who took the very opposite course ?

It being six o'clock, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Friday, March 16, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved :

That the third report of the special committee of this House, appointed during the last session to consider and revise, and if deemed necessary, to add to the rules, orders and forms of proceedings of the Senate, the consideration of which was on the tenth day of July last postponed to the present session, be committed to a committee of the whole House to consider and report on.

He said : I do not suppose that it would be the wish of the House to proceed at once to consider these rules, because the address in reply to the speech from the Throne has not yet been disposed of. Perhaps if this motion is passed I could then be allowed to name a day when the House would go into committee on the rules. I therefore make this motion now with the understanding we shall go into committee on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to say that it would be important to know from the leader of the House what is going to be done about an adjournment ? I think we ought to know whether the adjournment will be from now until after Easter, or next week only. We have been here all week debating on the address. It has been very interesting, no doubt, but we came here with the intention of doing as was done last year. So far nothing has been said about an adjournment and I think we ought to know to what date the Senate is going to adjourn.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the feeling of the House is that there should be no adjournment at present. This is not a time to talk about an adjournment; it does not follow that because we had an adjournment last year we should have one now, I for one do not favour it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I think when we adjourn until Monday, the House should not meet until eight o'clock p.m.

Some hon. MEMBERS—No, no.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It may suit the convenience of three or four senators to meet in the afternoon, but there are fifty or sixty senators in this Chamber whom it would very much convenience to meet at eight o'clock on Monday evening. It would suit the convenience of senators coming from the west and from Toronto. it would suit the convenience of senators coming from the east as far as Quebec. It may suit three or four to meet at three o'clock for half an hour. because we do not have very much business to do on Monday; but by meeting at eight o'clock, time would be given to a great many others to leave their homes in the west on Monday morning, instead of forcing them to leave on Sunday afternoon, and it would also give gentlemen coming from the east a chance to do business all day in Montreal and have our meeting here Monday evening. We did that last year to the satisfaction of everybody. I simply throw out the suggestion and would repeat that if it does not suit the convenience of three or four, it would suit the convenience of three-fourths of the members of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the sense of the larger number of members should be taken and considered on the point. Last session we made a rule to adjourn from Friday until Tuesday at three o'clock. There may be reasons for which it would be more desirable for the present to meet on Monday. If any considerable number of the members of the House should leave for their homes on Friday evening and cannot get here by three o'clock on Monday, it certainly would be a reasonable concession to allow the House to meet at eight o'clock. If that is the sense of the House I should agree with it and with the consent of the House I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until eight o'clock on Monday evening.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the second session of the tenth parliament.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER said : When the House rose last night, I was dealing with the school legislation of last year for the Northwest. My contention was that the Roman Catholic population of the Northwest had not received all they were entitled to. In support of that contention, I want to quote the words of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. They are as follows :

I am quite free to admit that as far as I can judge it is considerably less than the actual legal obligation incurred by us in the Act that we passed in 1875.

In connection with that, I desire to recall a remarkable passage in the speech of the hon. Secretary of State in the present debate, where he complimented so highly the hon. gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell). After referring to the stand the hon. gentleman had taken in 1870, he went on to say :

It will redound for ever to his memory, and the minority, the Catholics of Canada, owe him a debt of gratitude for the manner in which he adhered to the principle which parliament had adopted. In 1875 when we provided the future constitution which should be given to the new territories it was specially laid down by parliament that it was better then and there to settle the school question and remove it for ever from being a source of discord in the new territories. My hon. friend's voice was silent ; I assumed therefore that he concurred. There was no vote taken upon it, and there was no dissenting voice raised to it in 1875 in the House of Commons. There was in this Chamber. I had charge of the Bill; the whole subject was thoroughly threshed out and we carried it by a very narrow majority. The Liberal party, to a very considerable extent, deserted the leadership of Alex. Mackenzie, and but for the support of the Conservative party, the Bill could not have been carried.

Well and good, and if that course taken by the hon. gentleman from Hastings was deserving of such a compliment, surely those who took a totally different course are not deserving of such compliments. The hon. Secretary of State continues :

I think, therefore, it is regrettable that my hon. friend has not been consistent in the course which he laid out for himself some thirty years ago. His career has been a long and distinguished one, and I should have been glad had he seen his way to observe the same principle in 1906 that he adopted in 1875.

Here is a charge of inconsistency against the hon. gentleman from Hastings. Well, I do not see my way to admit that. If the political course of any hon. gentlemen has been consistent in this House, it is the course taken by the hon. gentleman from Hastings. After the principle had been adopted by parliament, as well as in the constitution, that there should be legislation to establish separate schools, or denominational schools, the hon. gentleman complied with the constitution all through, whilst the hon. Secretary of State, although proclaiming the rights of the Roman Catholic population to such legislation, voted directly against it. That is, the hon. gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) has voted in compliance with the constitution, while the hon. Secretary of State has voted against the constitution—he has spoken one way, and voted another way. If there has been inconsistency, it lies with the Secretary of State and not with the hon. gentleman from Hastings.

I shall now refer to the remarks of the hon. Secretary of State with reference to the position of Sir A. T. Galt in Quebec before confederation took place. He wanted to make a point for what is called provincial rights. The action of Sir A. T. Galt in the province of Quebec, was not in that direction. The Protestant minority then, whether right or wrong it is not for me to say at present, complained that they had not secured to them under the proposed Confederation Act all the protection they were entitled to. Sir A. T. Galt went so far as to withdraw from the government on that question. The Conservative party of Quebec led by Sir Geo. E Cartier, together with his friends, gave Sir A. T. Galt a pledge that as soon as the province of Quebec had its autonomy, after confederation, they would remedy the alleged wrong complained of by the Protestant minority, and so they did. They kept that pledge after confederation and the status of the Protestant minority in Quebec to-day was at that time fixed by provincial legislation; but it was so fixed in virtue of a pre-arrangement, a virtual pledge made before confederation; therefore that case does not support the view of those who urge provincial rights to carry on legislation against the views of the Roman Catholic population. The hon. gentleman who seconded the address has been kind enough to make some complimentary remarks about the separate schools in the Northwest. Surely we are indebted to him for that, although it is to be regretted that we had to wait until after the whole legislation is fixed, to have such testimony. It comes somewhat late; all the same we are very thankful to the hon. gentleman for the compliments he has paid to the separate schools.

Now, hon. gentlemen, I want to refer to remarks made yesterday with reference to the death of our esteemed colleague, Mr. Wark. It is not my intention to raise any controversy on this point, yet, with the permission of the House I want to refer a little to one of the speeches. The hon. gentleman from Brandon (Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer) in his very elaborate speech, spoke of the achievement by Italy of its freedom. The hon. gentleman had, no doubt, in his mind the conquest of Rome by Victor Emmanuel. I am a student of history and I cannot accept that statement as made here. It is a reflection on the head of our church and on ourselves, and I cannot admit that, under the Pope, Italy was not free. I do not want to prolong my remarks on this point, but these remarks of the hon. gentleman might very well have been omitted.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It was not my intention to take part in this debate, but it appeared to me there was an aspect of a good part of the debate which has not been sufficiently noticed here. Because, as I understand and interpret the discussion for the first three days here, there appeared to be what might be considered an interesting struggle for the leadership of the opposition, conducted by three of the most prominent members on the opposition side of the House. We had first the hon. senator from Belleville (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) who has conducted the opposition for so many years acceptably, as I always understood, to his party, and certainly with great courtesy to all the members of the House so far as I have ever been able to hear or know. We had the hon. senator from Richmond (Hon. Mr. Miller) who is the senior member of the Senate, sometimes called the father of it, and we had the hon. senator from Queen's, (P.E.I.), (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) without whom no important debate is complete in this House. We can recall the resignation of the hon. leader of the opposition. We heard him utter the words of farewell and yet we find him in his place. It reminded one of a coy maiden, while declining yet consenting; resigning to-day he resumes to-morrow. Resigning on the last day of last session, he resumes on the first day of this session, and he charges with the same vigour as of old. He has no great lance to break with anything that is before the House at the present time, so for want of a better cause he makes an attack on the school clauses of the Autonomy Bill. He disregards the fact entirely that those clauses were framed and passed for the regulation of schools in the Northwest by a Conservative local administration under Mr. Haultain, who is spoken of almost with bated breath. When he comes to talk about the dreadful manner in which that gentleman was treated, he ignores the fact that the Autonomy Bills and the school clauses of them have been passed upon and approved of by a vast majority of the people of the Northwest who are most affected by them and most interested in them. That, however, was the line which he took. Then we have the hon. senator from Richmond (Hon. Mr. Miller) who denounced the leadership of Mr. Borden of the great Liberal Conservative party. Everything about that party must be great of course. He (the hon. senator from Richmond) intimated also that Mr. Borden's persistence in the leadership would demand his withdrawal from the party, and then, having done so, he went on to denounce the course which had been taken amongst others by the hon. senator from Belleville (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) on the school question, because it is well known from the record that the views which met the approval of the senator from Belleville are in accord with the views of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) and, of course, it is well known that the views of the senator from Richmond differ from theirs entirely. So that we can easily see that in hitting over the head of Mr. Borden he was hitting at the senator from Belleville, not only in that respect did he also express his views with regard to the public attitude of the senator from Belleville, but we find him attacking the clauses of the Indemnity Act, which, with so much elaboration and so much accuracy the hon. senator from Belleville had defended, and approved of when he established that under the provisions of the new law in that respect the government were securing an absolute saving of money and economy in expenditure; and pointed out that, the increased indemnity was to be paid to those who earned it, if in any case it could be said that the indemnity was being earned, by reason of attendance at the sessions of the House, and would not go to those who did not attend. Then the senator from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) demolished entirely the argument of the senator from Richmond with reference to the allowance that was made last session to Mr. Borden as leader of the opposition. The hon. senator from Marshfield then passed on to make an appeal with reference to the question that had been raised of hostility to the school clauses of the Autonomy Act—that they should be passed out of sight, by which I have no doubt he meant practically that they are to be buried, but whether buried for ever or not or buried for resurrection later on——

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto).

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Pardon me: I neither said buried nor passed out of sight. I used neither one expression nor the other.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—That they should be pased over for the present was the expression used, which means that they should pass out of sight for the present. I apprehend that means that they should not be brought up or considered or discussed at present.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If my hon. friend will allow me to say so, he has not read what I said on the point.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I have it before me.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did say that the matter might be dropped here for the present.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Pardon me the words are passed over.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Because there are other questions which are pressing for attention.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The expression was that they were to be passed over for the present. I repeat the words as they are reported. However, if the hon. senator prefers, I will take his present version: they were not to be the subject of discussion. He deprecated any further discussion of them now and here at all events, but, whether to be resurrected here or in the country, we leave it for him to determine and for him to state in his own way. But whether he raised here, or tries to raise it here, or elsewhere, his mind may be perfectly at rest. The obsequies have been already performed with reference to these provisions, and the whole hostility and the whole question of carping at the legislation with respect to that matter may be said to have been buried out of sight if not by him, at all events by the avalanche of votes in the Northwest at the recent elections. And, feeling all this to be the case, a reason had to be suggested for it, and it was rather suggested more than stated by the hon. senator from Belleville, that there were frauds in the elections in the Northwest. That is a grave charge to make. And if its only foundation is in the one case in which fraud has been established, I think it is a charge which ought not to be made. But at all events in the case where fraud has been established, all of us in this House—all I may say who belong to either of the great political parties—will denounce these frauds as they were exposed. The fraud in question is the one perpetrated in the Prince Albert election case, and no one will be more determined to denounce it and mark disapproval of it than the members of this House on this side as well as the members upon the other. But I understand that this is not the first time that there have been frauds in elections. We remember frauds in the MacDonald election case in the province of Manitoba; we remember that was a case where ballots were switched by the returning officer, under the instructions of an emissary sent out by the organizer of the great Liberal Conservative party. I do not know that I have ever heard the hon. senator who spoke on this subject denounce that election fraud. He certainly did not do it at the time the fraud occurred, and he did not call on his party to undertake any part in the prosecution of the criminal who had been guilty of it. On the other hand, in the case we are dealing with, the man who committed the fraud has been punished and punished by a prosecution instituted by the only people who are charged with responsibility in connection with it—the local government of the province—the Liberal government of the province who are entitled to take control of any such prosecution. We have heard of other frauds. We remember ballot boxes being stolen and votes in the South Grey election case. It was a Liberal Conservative government which was in power then and I do not remember hearing that fraud denounced, nor did I ever hear of proceedings being taken for the prosecution of the returning officer.

We remember the case of North Ontario where a ballot box was abstracted and votes were changed and doctored in order that a different result might be presented. I have no recollection of hearing any such protest made with reference to that fraud, or any attempt to prosecute those who were guilty of the act. It reminds me how careful one should be in condemning those things unless there is consistency about it. It is so easy for one to see the mote in another's eye and not to see the beam in his own eye. That was, however, a very poor explanation of the result of the elections in the Northwest. This all points to what has been rather an eye opener to me here. I have often heard it said that in the Senate there should be no politics, that this was a place where party politics were not a subject of discussion. I call attention to these things, because it appears to me this is very much over the border line in the way of discussing politics, and if we are going to discuss politics the mask had better be thrown off and let us understand it at once. Then fault was found with the government by the hon. senator from Belleville for undertaking to garrison the fortifications at Halifax and Vancouver, and for assenting to the withdrawal of British troops from Canada. This was looked upon as one of the first steps towards the separation of Canada from the motherland. Hon. gentlemen, however, will remember that this is not the first time that British troops have been withdrawn from Canada and our fortifications have been garrisoned by Canadian militia. In 1871 British troops were withdrawn from Quebec which from that time to this, that is for thirty-five years, has been garrisoned by Canadian militia. That, I submit, if there is to be any conclusion drawn from such an act, is the first act to which attention might have been called. What government was in power in 1871? Because it seems to make a difference as to what government was in power when we are discussing these matters. If it was right for a Conservative government to undertake the defence of the fortifications at Quebec, is it not right for the Liberal government to undertake in these years of grace the maintenance and garrisoning of the fortifications at Esquimalt and Halifax, or on what possible principle can a line be drawn? On what principle can it be said that it was proper to do in 1871 an act that was all right then but which is wrong if done now.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—If the hon. gentleman alludes to the government of Sir John Macdonald, I may tell him that Sir John was utterly opposed to any removal of British troops from Canada and sought by every means in his power to have them restored. It never was done with his consent or the consent of his government at the time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We all know that.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I suppose it was done by the government which best knew its own business, the British government. I suppose that troops were withdrawn by the same government which withdraws them from Halifax and Esquimalt. I suppose the garrisoning of Quebec was assumed by the Canadian government on behalf of the British government and as an act of grace towards the British government, and I assume the same thing is done with reference to the garrisoning of the fortifications at Halifax and Esquimalt at present. I want to know on what possible principle can there be condemnation in one case that does not apply to the other? On the contrary, there is much to be said in favour of the proposition that after thirty-five years have passed by since Canadian militia took charge of the fortifications at Quebec that the Canadian militia have shown themselves worthy of being entrusted with the honour of British prestige in defending fortifications or on the battle field. So that the argument, as far as I can see, is a very far fetched one to say that this is the first act towards separation. Surely we cannot shut our eyes to what has transpired during those thirty-five years. Surely we can point with confidence to what Canada has done in those thirty-five years. Canada never stood in the eyes of England in the same favourable light that she occupies to-day. England never took the same interest in Canada as she is taking to-day. Since the change of government in 1896 the policy of the present government has attracted the notice, won the esteem and commanded the respect of the people of England as it never had succeeded in doing before. What has been done by this government in the way of preferential trade? Colonial conferences and these acts of assuming obligations at Halifax, Esquimalt and elsewhere, have attracted the attention and commanded the respect of the British people. We must understand too that with the growth of Canada its responsibilities are growing, its prestige and its position are growing. That follows as a matter of course. The fact that we are assuming new responsibilities, that we are getting more control over our affairs than we had in former times, does not necessarily mean separation. Look at domestic life—look at the small community of the family. A young man grows up to strength and vigour, leaves the old home and moves into a home of his own, establishing his own home, working out there his own destiny. He controls his own affairs, and assumes his own responsibility; and, as it is with families, so it is with countries. If we take the history of this Dominion from the days of the early British settlers, we find that they came to a country sparsely settled and governed from Downing street. They gradually developed however, until the country was ready to assume responsibility, and when it demanded responsible government with all the national rights and liberty pertaining to it, it was conceded and with the growth and development of national life, and national responsibility, Canada has grown and matured until she is now able to command the respect and esteem of the old motherland and other countries as she had never done in years gone by. When a few years ago England stood in need of men for the maintenance of British power in South Africa, Canada sprung to arms and fought side by side—not behind—the English, Irish and Scotch regiments the flower of the British army. When we recall what happened and remember the conduct of our troops in Africa which did no discredit to the best traditions of the British army, and when we remember that the bones of many of those brave men lie buried beneath the sands of South Africa, and we recall their heroic deeds, surely we can say that the men of Paardeburg and of Hart's River and of a score of other trials and triumphs can be well trusted to maintain and hold aloft the British ensign on the battlements of Halifax and Esquimalt. Such suggestions as have been offered with reference to it here were unworthy of the place in which they are spoken. I submit that so far from these acts weakening the ties which bind the mother country and Canada together, the assumption of these national responsibilities, these British responsibilities in our own land, by our own government, with our own troops, will serve not only to bind those ties more strongly together, but also serve to teach us reliance upon our own people as well as the part we should take in discharging our obligations as a component part of the British empire.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I have no idea of replying to the hon. gentleman's assertions, which I do not think are relevant to the subject under discussion. If I were going to reply to him, I might say that I know something about those gentlemen whom he has seen fit to talk about as differing from each other, and I can assure him he need have no concern about them, that they are in entente cordiale and that they have simply exercised a right which is claimed by educated gentlemen everywhere to differ from each other. I have no idea of attempting to follow the hon. gentleman in discussing the sins of both parties. I dare say there will be sins committed in every party where there is party government, and a severe struggle for power; but the sins of the Conservative party have been venial compared to those of their successors. The present party in power have not quite purged themselves or gone through the purgatorial punishment they ought to have suffered for their sins.

I wish to say something with reference to the subject under discussion, to which the hon. gentleman for the moment drew my attention. This speech from the Throne is a very long one. It taxed the vocal powers of the Governor General to read it in both languages. I think he should have expected a little more moderation on the part of the framers of the speech. It is a speech which is delightfully discursive, and which takes you all over, from Saskatchewan to Alberta from Alberta to Japan, and from Japan to Esquimalt, and then down to Halifax, so that every man in the Senate has an opportunity of airing his vocabulary if he has any idea of discussing any particular subject. It is the most diversified speech from the Throne I have ever read, and has elicited from this hon. chamber more attention, I think, than any other on record. We have put a feather in our caps, to use a common expression, because the House of Commons disposed of this important document in eight hours, and here in the Senate, which is supposed to be very listless, indifferent and anxious to get as much rest as possible, discussing it a whole week, and God knows how long they will be discussing it, before they come to a conclusion. I have no idea of taking up the speech by paragraphs. There are eighteen paragraphs in all, and my idea is that the premier gave each member of the cabinet a paragraph to write, and I think I could pick out a few paragraphs were it not that some members of that body are not present.

The first is one which we must all acquiesce in, the general prosperity. The second is one which certainly no speaker could overlook, no matter how happy has been the expression of sympathy and condolence on this occasion—namely sympathy with our gracious and beloved Queen. We all remember when the laureate led the acclaim in one of his noblest odes, which welcomed that lady to England. He called her 'the blissful bride of a blissful heir.' He said:

> Oh, joy to the people, joy to the throne
> Come to us, love us, make us thine own
> For Saxon or Dane or Norman we,
> Teuton or Celt or whatever we be,
> Each are all Dane in our welcome to thee, > Alexandra.

These sentiments have never lost their force, and English speaking people throughout the world, in the United States as well as here, all accord to her a unique position among the ladies of the earth, an honour to her sex and one of the noblest women who was ever queen consort to the occupant of the Throne. It is not to be wondered at when we remember she was educated under such a noble woman as our late Queen. There is one thing to which I wish to refer with gratitude, and express sympathy as strongly as possible, it is the great interest she had taken in dispensing charity and assisting the poor. She established a hospital in England and sent to Copenhagen for the man who made the discovery with regard to a new system of treatment of diseases of the face, malignant and otherwise. That hospital has done incalculable good to people from all parts of the world. She also recently initiated the movement which resulted in the donation of millions to the great hospitals of London, which we know are open to every one, not only the people of the country but strangers from every clime. Therefore I thought it was necessary that I should say a word about it.

The next subject is immigration. I have nothing much to say about that, only that I hope the day has ended when the influx of Doukhobors, Galicians and above all that abominable sect, the Mormons, will enter Canada. I hope there will be a rigid inspection, because Canada is now in such a position that she can afford to cull the people who try to avail themselves of her immense resources, and can afford to see that they are of good quality and free from disease or contamination. It is our duty to do so. While Canada has in years past gone slowly it has been a decided benefit in one way. We have had a purer and cleaner immigration and, therefore, I hope no government will try to bring great numbers into the country and swell the population by allowing immigrants to come in indiscriminately. It is necessary to have a board of inspection or a board of health. It will have to be established sooner or later and part of its duties will relate to this subject. I know there is an inspection now, but I do not think it is as rigid or as efficient as it should be.

With regard to the matter of insurance, I think the appointment of the commission has been a very good thing, but the discussion on the subject might have been deferred until we saw the result of the investigation and had the full report of the investigation being carried on in the United States. That investigation has been a great success, and no doubt valuable improvements will result from it. The full recommendations of the commission may not be adopted, but a great many are likely to be. The important matter of deferred policies and tontine will be remedied and the investments will also be looked after. I am sorry that there is no insurance man on the Canadian Commission. There is a senator in this House who is perhaps better qualified than any other man in Canada to speak on such matters, one who began as a young man—he is not very old yet—in insurance, and who has been the means of assisting a Canadian company to a position that is a credit to the country, and a solid comfort and a dispenser of benefits to widows and orphans innumerable since its establishment. It now occupies the highest position of any company in Canada, and a man possessed of the information which he has and of the good business qualities and tact which he has, should have been a member of that commission. On the United States commission there was a member named Hughes, a lawyer, who, like a sleuth-hound, was placed on the track of these companies and has succeeded in exposing a great deal of wrong-doing, and his work will bring about incalculable benefit.

Something has been said about garrisoning Esquimalt and Halifax with Canadian troops. I differ somewhat from the gentlemen with whom I am accustomed to act, in that respect. I think Canada might garrison these forts—not that any sentiment of loyalty to Canada is wanting in these gentlemen who advocate the continuance of the British garrisons in these ports, but I think Canada as she advances should feel a certain amount of self reliance. I do not think that Canada will ever require a navy of any extent so long as we can rely on the navy of Great Britain; but I hope something will be done this session to show that we are entitled to claim the protection of that navy. We are accustomed to speak a great deal of our loyalty; we can hardly meet together without singing God Save the King, and any man in the assembly who did not take off his hat would be in danger of his life. But what have we done as a practical exhibition of our loyalty? When I was in London some time ago—I was only there once, I asked a young man who appeared to be of the working classes to show me where Whitehall was and he replied, 'I am accustomed to get remuneration when I give information.' I said to my daughter that man has diagnosed me rightly; he knows that I am a Canadian. This incident will give you an idea of how much we do for Great Britain.

In connection with the matter of loyalty, I might remind the House that some years ago one of the most illustrous of Canada's statesmen died in the Queen's household itself, under the most tragic circumstances. The conduct of Her late Majesty—who, I hope, is now enjoying her reward—in selecting the most appropriate wreath she could obtain and inscribing her own name under it and placing it on that man's bier, sent a thrill of pleasure and of satisfaction and of love through the hearts of the Canadian people. Further than that, the finest warship in the British navy was sent to convey his remains to Halifax. Could there be anything more noble or generous than that ? This action was repeated in the case of the death of an eminent member of the present government who went abroad for the purpose of serving Canada last fall. In his zeal and his enthusiasm for his country he overtaxed his powers and was afflicted fatally. The honours paid to that man by the French people require in my opinion special acknowledgment in some way. I have no love for the French government. I think they are a diabolical set who desecrate the altars of the Lord and try to pull down the worship of The Most High in France, but that does not detract from their conduct in doing honour to a Canadian statesman. I am told by one who was there at the time that more honour was shown to his remains than would have been shown in the case of a high official of France itself. But I turn with greater pleasure to what was done in that case by the British government. The admiralty immediately sent a warship and conveyed his remains with the greatest respect to Halifax, thus repeating what they had done in the case of the late Sir John Thompson. These honours call for some acknowledgment. Are we to sit in silence and say nothing of these noble efforts ; are we so dead to impulses of ordinary humanity as to allow such occasions to pass unnoticed ? Perish the thought. The government may have in their mind some means whereby they will acknowledge this great honour shown to a Canadian. I am not going to impose my little ideas upon those gentlemen, but I have felt the pulse of Canada so far as it has been within my reach for the past fifty years, and from all I know of the Canadian people there is not a man, woman or child possessed of sound reason in this country who would not endorse the government's action in recognizing this tribute. I suggest that we contribute a battleship, fully equipped, to the English government as an expression of Canadian feeling. It seems to me that the admiralty was trying to sound us when they sent over the 'Blenheim' and the 'Dominion' as if they were trying to see what Canada would do. I think it would not be unworthy of this House and of the government to take some notice of this matter, and if it be not inconsistent in any way with the rules which regulate the intercourse of nations, I say we ought to manifest Canada's appreciation of the honour in some tangible way.

I shall not take up much time on other subjects; they have been better discussed by those who have preceded me, but I wish to refer to the matter of preserving the scenic effect of the Falls of Niagara. I think that is of the utmost consequence. I do not speak now of the power. The power has nothing to do with what may be called the beauty, the grandeur, the attractiveness of Niagara Falls. Canada has the good fortune to be the owner of the grandest work of nature, the Horseshoe Falls, and I think it is the duty of the Dominion government whether they act through Britain or in whatever way, to see that no lust of power, no insatiable craving of money should tempt them to allow any one, whether American or Canadian, to interfere with in any way or damage or injure in the slightest degree the nobility and grandeur of that fall.

One other matter I might refer to, and that is the shipment of fruit. Fruit or other food products packed in Canada cannot be thoroughly relied on, I am sorry to say, without inspection. I think the due inspection of fruit will lead to Canada sustaining her reputation. If we export articles of food, they should be of the best quality properly packed, and in that way they will sustain the reputation of the country. During the last rebellion in the Northwest, I had charge of the purveying in the medical department—hospitals, &c. I found at that time that every article of preserved food from Canada was bad and we had to throw it out. The only good articles we had there came from Chicago and Omaha. That is some years ago and I presume that things are better now.

There is one other subject I wish to speak of, that is the indemnity. I do not know how it was brought into this discussion, but I think, with the leader of the opposition, that it is settled and fixed now, and I for one have not the slightest objection to the action taken. That action was taken by the House of Commons and by the government. They took the full responsibility for it; we did not initiate the measure but we are the receivers, and the receiver is as bad as the thief; therefore I think we are exactly in the same boat. The statistics furnished by the leader of the opposition should, I think, settle this question beyond all peradventure. Senators should cut out what he said and paste it in their hats, and when they are attacked on the subject, they should refer to those figures and they will then be able to offer a complete defence of anything the Senate may have done. Every one knows that the Senate cannot add to nor subtract from any money measure. We would not if we could, and we could not if we would, so I take it that any hon. gentleman who has indignantly rejected that indemnity and left it to the country should be known. It is too bad that he should hide his great act of self-abnegation. The man who gave that money up is a patriot and a martyr or else he is a lunatic. Some men would value their services at fifteen hundred dollars. Well, hon. gentlemen you have not touched yet the value which I place on my services—you are a long way off yet. The man who thinks that twenty-five hundred dollars is more than any hon. gentlemen is worth here should be made the subject of a lunacy commission immediately, and should either receive condign punishment or be locked up. I hope I have not occupied the time of the House too long. I thank hon. gentlemen for the opportunity of saying these few words, and for the attention they have given to them.

Hon. Mr. KING—I may say at the outset that while I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the eloquent speeches which have been delivered during the past week on the subject now under discussion, I had about concluded not to take any part in this debate, were not that reference was made in the speech from the Throne to a subject which interests the people among whom I live in the maritime provinces, and that that subject has been referred to by two or three members of this House in the most disparaging manner so far as our interests are concerned. Had that not been the case I would have refrained from speaking at this time. I will go further, perhaps, and say that so far as the leader of the opposition and the senator from Marshfield are concerned, I might have allowed their remarks to pass unheeded, but I find the senator from Halifax standing up in his place and repeating his speech of last year—I was not present in the House yesterday when he spoke but I am told the speech he made with regard to the Transcontinental Railway, that is the Moncton-Quebec section of it, was simply a repetition of what he said last year. Now, let me say at the outset if there is any problem confronting the people of the maritime provinces who are anxious to devise some scheme to improve their condition so far as trade matters in this country are concerned, it is the question of transportation. We are up against the problem in St. John and Halifax; we have competition with Portland, Maine and I had hope when the government brought down their railway policy and carried their other legislation providing for the construction of the Transcontinental Railway by the route proposed, that that difficulty we have had to contend with would have been met and disposed of; but I am surprised to find a gentleman coming from Halifax, who perhaps had as much to do with the project of the Transcontinental Railway as any other, standing up in his place in this House and denouncing the construction of that section of the railway between Moncton and Quebec. I think it would be fair on the part of that gentleman if, in giving his own views of the matter, he had given us both sides of the question. I understand the hon. senator simply takes the ground that as the report shows that the route as surveyed for the Transcontinental Railway from Moncton to Quebec is no shorter than the old Intercolonial Railway line, the new road should not be built. I do not think that he or anybody else is in a position to say exactly what the length of the new road will be, but I am willing to accept the report which was laid on the table of the House and take the figures given in it and base my argument in favour of the road on those figures. I believe I am safe in saying that when a final location survey is made it will be found that there is a considerable difference in favour of the Transcontinental Railway from Moncton to Quebec.

Now, the hon. gentleman proposes that we should abandon the building of that section of the Transcontinental road, and in lieu of that we should appropriate and expend millions in improving the Intercolonial Railway. I give the hon. gentleman all credit for sincerity and honesty, but I am afraid that when the business men of Halifax read this second speech of the senator from Halifax, while they may not doubt his sincerity they will question his business capacity. I propose to give some figures from the blue-book. I do not attach much importance to a good deal that is said in this book, but here we have the figures supplied by the engineers under the Railway Commission. They show that we have a line with grades of four-tenths of one per cent from the city of Moncton in New Brunswick to the Quebec bridge in the province of Quebec. It is true that the Intercolonial Railway between these points is four hundred and ninety-three miles in length and the new road is four hundred and eighty-six, and I admit that so far as the mileage goes the difference in length is not material, but it is not mileage that always counts on a railway. There are doubtless gentlemen in this House better qualified to speak on this question. I confess my knowledge of railroading is very limited, but at the same time I have travelled somewhat and have seen something of railway management. I have crossed the continent twelve times in the last six years and I have noticed railway companies, both in Canada and in the United States to-day are expending millions for the purpose of improving their grades and thereby capturing trade which they could not possibly capture in any other way. Look at what the Canadian Pacific Railway is doing to-day west of Port Arthur and Fort William, I do not know why they are doing it, but they know why. They are improving their grades across the prairie country and they are improving the grades on the Crow's Nest line in southern British Columbia. Only two years ago when the branch to Fernie was opened—I was not present I did not count the cars myself, but I heard it stated that when Mr. Hill who is the promoter of the road left Jennings with 90 empty box-cars with his own private car attached to the end of the train, and came into Fernie, that after those cars were loaded with coal he went over that road from Fernie to Jennings with those ninety cars loaded with coal and his own private car attached to them.

I venture the assertion that that coal did not cost ten cents a ton to haul it one hundred and sixty miles. I may be getting away from my argument, but, to come back to the subject from which I started, I purpose putting on record in our debates, in order that it may go to the country in reply to the views expressed by the hon. senator from Halifax, a statement from the report of Mr. Butler, who holds the important position to-day of Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, a gentleman whose authority on these subjects will not be questioned by any engineer in Canada. This report of Mr. Butler's has been on record for two years, and I have never heard the statement and calculations it contains questioned by anybody. I shall trouble the House for a short time by reading some extracts from the report of Mr. Butler made to Mr. Lumsden, chief engineer of the Transcontinental Railway :

1. The distance from Moncton to St. Chrysostôme, by way of the Intercolonial Railway, is 493·5 miles.

2. The distance from Moncton to St. Chrysostôme via the preliminary survey lines as run for the Transcontinental Railway, is 504 miles.

3. The estimated shortening of the preliminary line that will be secured by the final location is 18 miles, making the distance from Moncton to St. Chrysostôme by way of the Transcontinental line, 486 miles.

I find that Mr. Butler in the same report makes this statement :—

4. The estimated shortening from the preliminary survey lines, using 1 per cent grades both ways, is 100·3 miles, making the distance from Moncton to St. Chrysostôme, by such 1 per cent both ways, grade 403·7 miles. This estimated distance is contained in supplementary reports made by Mr. Guy C. Dunn, district engineer of district 'A,' and Mr. A. E. Doucet, district engineer of district 'B,' which are attached hereto.

If the grades which prevail to-day on the Intercolonial Railway had been adopted on the Transcontinental line from Moncton to Quebec, it would be folly on the part of the government to attempt to build that section, even to save a distance of one hundred miles. If I had to express an opinion of a line of that kind I would not stand before you now. But let us go further and see what Mr. Butler says about a comparative statement with regard to the cheapness of transportation by these two lines: He says:

5. For the purpose of the calculation, I have taken the Intercolonial Railway locomotive No. 310, a simple consolidation, recently built by the Canadian Locomotive Company at Kingston, Ontario, and which I understand is now in use on the Intercolonial Railway.

Following up that report Mr. Butler goes on to say:

I assume that thirty ton capacity cars, which weigh when loaded, 46·15 tons, will constitute the train. The several trains which the above locomotive can haul at a speed of 15 miles per hour on the several grades below are as follows:—

Intercolonial Railway 1 per cent grades, 22 cars, equal to 660 tons net pay load.

Transcontinental Railway east-bound 4-10ths of 1 per cent grade, 42 cars, giving 1,260 tons net pay load.

What does this mean? If the road were constructed to-day and in operation, and that locomotive to which this report refers was at Winnipeg it could haul to Quebec and across the Quebec bridge, forty-two cars, but, on the south side of the St. Lawrence, the locomotive has nothing but the Intercolonial Railroad to fall back on, and must split that train in two and go on to Moncton with twenty-one or twenty-two cars. What does that mean? That in order to haul those forty-two cars she has got to double up from Quebec to Moncton. In other words she has to travel 500 miles with 660 tons of freight, has to go back over that road to the Quebec bridge, and then take the balance of the train to Moncton, covering the distance twice with a load of something over 600 tons. This would not happen if this other new route were open. The same locomotive which brought the train from Winnipeg to Quebec could take it through to Moncton. Does that not decrease the cost of transportation? If we are after anything we are after that. If any hon. gentleman can devise some other plan by which St. John and Halifax can successfully compete with the Portland route, I am prepared to drop this and take up such a scheme. It would, however, be well to bear in mind that what I have said with regard to Intercolonial grades will apply with greater force to the Quebec-Portland line, but so far as I know the only possible way to succeed in diverting traffic to the ports of the maritime provinces in the winter season is by adopting the policy of the government and building a line with grades such as I have described. It is quite true that it is impossible to bring St. John or Halifax nearer to Quebec than they are now, but if it is possible to construct a line with grades so much better than those of the Intercolonial Railway that freight can be transported for half the present cost, we will have accomplished what we set out to do.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Why not improve the grades of the Intercolonial Railway?

Hon. Mr. KING—Let me tell the hon. gentleman, I do not think that would be an impossibility, but it would be a very costly job, because I have already called attention to the fact that to adopt the Intercolonial Railway grades upon the National Transcontinental Railway between Quebec and Moncton, a saving of distance of one hundred miles might be effected. If that is a fair proposition, as stated in this report, it is equally fair to say that if you improve the grades on the Intercolonial Railway to make them equal to the National Transcontinental Railway grades, you must increase the length of the Intercolonial Railway by about one hundred miles. Of course, engineers on the ground might discover a way by which it could be shortened, but it seems to me that if the hon. gentleman from Halifax will devote himself to improving the grades between Moncton and Halifax, he will render a greater service to Halifax than by endeavouring to improve the grades of the Intercolonial Railway between Moncton and Quebec. Mr. Butler further says, in the report from which I have already quoted:

Transcontinental Railway west-bound 6-10ths of 1 per cent grade, 33 cars, giving 990 tons net pay load.

The Intercolonial Railway, 10 daily freight trains each way, will haul in a year of 313 working days (length of line, 493·5 miles), net pay tons 660 x 2, trains 2 x 10 x 10 x 313 days—4,131,600 pay tons; and to haul this number of trains will make 493·5 x 2 miles, 2 x 10 trains, 313 days, 3,089,310 train miles per year.

The cost per train mile on the Intercolonial Railway for the year 1903, as given in the report of the Department of Railways and Canals is 97·65 cents, which cost will be used for all comparisons. Hence 3,089,310 train miles x 97·65 cents=$3,016,711.21, which gives the annual cost of operating the ten daily trains on the Intercolonial Railway.

The Transcontinental Railway low grade line will handle the same tonnage, with 7 trains east-bound and 5 west-bound, although they will not be quite loaded to the full limit, the ratio of east-bound to west-bound traffic is taken at about 6 to 4. (Length of line, 486 miles). Hence we get 486 miles x 12 trains x 313 days=1,825,415 train miles per year, which moneyed out at the same price per train mile of 97·65 cents equal $1,782,518.72, which gives the annual cost of operating the 12 trains on the Transcontinental Railway.

The annual operating cost of the Intercolonial Railway being ..	$3,016,711 21
The annual operating cost of the Transcontinental Railway being..	1,782,518 72
Leaves a net annual saving in favour of the Transcontinental Railway of..	$ 1,234,192 49
Which sum capitalized at 4 per cent per annum=..	30,854,812 25

And this amount is the increased value of the Transcontinental low grade line over and above the existing Intercolonial Railway, on the basis of ten daily trains each way over the Intercolonial Railway.

With increased business the difference will be much greater.

For instance, on the basis of 10 fully loaded trains each way per day on the Transcontinental, we get 486 length line x 10 x 2 trains x 313 days=3,042,360 train miles, which will cost per year at 97·65 cents, $2,970,864.54, and will transport 7,042,500 net pay tons.

To do this business on the Intercolonial Railway will require 34 daily trains, and we get 493·5 miles x 34 trains x 313 days=5,251,857 train miles, which will cost per year at 97·65 cents, $5,128,409.06.

The annual net savings in favour of the Transcontinental Railway on this basis being $2,157,544.52, which sum capitalized at 4 per cent per annum, gives $53,938,613, and this amount is the increased value of the Transcontinental low grade line over and above the existing Intercolonial Railway, on the basis of ten daily trains each way on the Transcontinental Railway.

In all the above calculations no account has been taken of reduced operating cost for passenger trains.

It is obvious that substantial savings will result from the use of lighter engines to haul the same passenger train. Less fuel, oil, &c., will be required, less wear and tear to track and bridges through lighter engines, better time and more uniform rates of speed may be maintained.

In referring to the Intercolonial Railway, I forgot to mention another road. We in St. John—and I dare say the same thing applies to Halifax as well—are subjected to serious competition from Portland, Maine. The fact is Canadian traffic has been going largely there. I am glad to-day to be able to say that St. John is a good second to Portland, and it has been made so by the efforts of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. St. John owes, I will not say a debt of gratitude, but owes a great deal to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for having brought a good deal of traffic to that city. With a line longer than the competing route to Portland, and with inferior grades crossing through Maine, the Canadian Pacific Railway has been able to revolutionize the trade from the west to the east, so that to-day St. John, if not up to Portland, is a good second, and I am prepared to say that the trade at St. John is not confined to the Canadian trade. I am glad to be able to say, however, that the promise made to St. John after this government came into power is being fully verified. I remember Sir Wilfrid Laurier saying then that it was the aim of his government to see that every pound of grain raised in Canada should find an outlet, summer and winter, through Canadian ports. He went further and said that the government would make a strong bid to secure freight from the United States. It was only last week one of the liners left St. John with freight to the value of about $700,000 and the greater part of it was secured from the northwestern states. What has been done at St. John with the means at the disposal of the Canadian Pacific Company, I am sure can be better done over a road with more favourable grades such as the government propose to build from Winnipeg to Moncton. I may be told that this road does not go to a port in the maritime provinces. A compromise was entered into between the people of Halifax and St. John to make Moncton the terminus, but no one supposed that freight brought from the west is destined to be shipped at Moncton. It will go to Halifax and St. John. I want to point out that what I have already asserted with regard to the grades on the National Transcontinental Railway and on the section to which I have specially alluded, will apply with equal force to the long stretch of country between Quebec and Winnipeg. I am not in the position to-day—I do not think any one is in a position to give official figures with regard to the distance between these two points, but I have heard it rumoured, and I believe it will be demonstrated when the surveys are about completed, that the distance between Quebec and Winnipeg does not exceed 1,316 miles. But I am willing to go further and say it is 1,400 miles, and if it is only that, and the National Transcontinental Railway is built either down the St. John river or by the central route through the province of New Brunswick, it will be found that the line to St. John will be shorter than it is by the Canadian Pacific Railway to St. John. The Conservative party, and especially the leader of the opposition in this House, are entitled to a great deal of credit for the extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the port of St. John. It has done a great work for St. John, and I hope when the subsidy given for the building of the road expires, there will be no disposition on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to haul out of St. John. Taking the distances, they are, from Winnipeg to Montreal, 1,424 miles, Montreal to St. John 481 miles, St. John to Halifax 274 miles, making the total distance from Winnipeg to Halifax by the Canadian Pacific Railway 2,179 miles. By the new route, estimating the distance from Winnipeg to Quebec 1,400 miles, Quebec to Moncton 486 miles, and Moncton to Halifax 184 miles, you get a distance of 2,070 miles. That is a difference of only one hundred miles, but as I have been trying to point out it means more than a saving of that distance. If you have a road from Winnipeg to Moncton on which you can carry grain at half the cost of the competing line, you effect a saving which is equal to a much greater shortening of the distance, because you diminish the cost of transportation. That is what we are after, and unless we can get that in the maritime provinces we may as well throw up the sponge and give up the fight. Take St. John and figure the distance in the same way, you get:

	Miles.
Winnipeg to Quebec..	1,400
Quebec to St. John..	486

I may be told that I am underestimating the distance to St. John, but I am not. I do not say that it is possible to go to Moncton, and then by Intercolonial Railway to St. John within that distance, but I do say it is possible for the St. John people to connect with that road at a point by which they can get to St. John from Quebec in 486 miles. That makes the distance to St. John by the new line 1,886 miles as against 1,905 miles by the Canadian Pacific Railway, with the advantage of the better grades on the new line equally advantageous to St. John and Halifax. I suppose it is a well known fact, at least to members of this House from the maritime provinces, that from time immemorial there has been a certain amount of rivalry—I think I might change the word and say jealousy—between the port of Halifax and the port of St. John, but I think the time has arrived in the history of Canada when both ports can do away with that feeling. What are the facts? This very year with a grain crop of 80,000,000 bushels in the Northwest, only half of it has been shipped through Canadian ports, the balance going through United States ports. If you can turn the tide to Halifax and St. John we will not be able to handle the whole of it there and more ports will be required. Does not every one know that the production of grain in the Northwest is increasing rapidly, and that the country is being filled up with population at a rate unparalleled in the history of any country. I predict that inside of five years in place of 80,000,000 bushels of wheat the amount will be 200,000,000 bushels. If some provision is not made for the transportation of that grain other than our friends propose, you can rest assured that for some time to come one hundred and fifty million bushels of that grain will go out of Canada via United States ports. But if this road is built, and the grades recommended are adhered to, as I believe they will be, there is no reason why St. John and Halifax should not get their fair quota of the trade of the Northwest. When the Intercolonial Railway was built we did not look for freight beyond the great province of Ontario, and when our friends built that Canadian Pacific Railway line through Maine there was no indication of the enormous possibilities of wheat production in the Northwest. That road was built to compete with the Intercolonial Railway when the traffic was less, and yet they condemn the government today for building a road to parallel the Intercolonial, when they themselves had done the same. I do not condemn the late government for what they did. That road has not been a bad thing for St. John. I say it ought to have been built. I supported that project, though I did not support the government of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I am glad I did support the measure, because the results justify the course I pursued. I am equally earnest in supporting this proposition of the present government to adhere to the policy of constructing that portion of the National Transcontinental Railway between Moncton and Quebec. It is as necessary as any other portion of the line. If we forego that in the maritime provinces, we can never hope again to be in the position we occupy to-day, with the prospect of getting that road through in a reasonable time.

There is another matter which I desire to call attention, and I wish to give my reasons for the views I hold. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield the other day took advantage of that clause in the Governor's speech referring to the National Transcontinental Railway, to assail the government of Canada because they had not forestalled the Grand Trunk Railway Company in the acquisition of the Canada Atlantic Railway. I know there has been a feeling which found expression in the press of the maritime provinces, and perhaps elsewhere, that the acquisition of that road would have been a great advantage to the maritime provinces. I shall state my reasons for believing to the contrary, and if I am not right I am subject to correction. The Canada Atlantic, as I understand it, commences at Coteau. Its terminus is not in Montreal. I need not remind hon. gentlemen how much it cost to get the Intercolonial Railway into Montreal at the other end, and I might say if the government of Canada had purchased the Canada Atlantic and undertaken to extend it to Montreal, it would have cost millions more than the other cost, because it traverses forty miles of one of the most valuable sections of country in Canada, and it would be no easy task to get an entrance into Montreal to-day except by the Grand Trunk Railway, and it is doubtful if their chances in that direction would have been any better than when Mr. Blair made the attempt some years ago, for which we are paying yet. But supposing we had that road—and I am speaking from the standpoint of the maritime provinces, the section in which I am directly interested—supposing the government had forestalled the Grand Trunk Railway and acquired the Canada Atlantic Railway, would it have been worth anything to us so far as trade to the maritime provinces is concerned? I assert it would not. Why? Suppose, to-day, Mr. Emmerson as Minister of Railways and Canals could place his train along side the elevators at Depot Harbour and load it with grain, take it to Montreal and thence to St. John, he could empty his cars into the elevator there, but what would happen then? He would have some thirty or forty empty box cars to take back. Could he get a pound of return freight? Not at St. John. I may be told that he could get freight at Montreal. Supposing he could, we do not require the Canada Atlantic to reach Montreal. He might haul it to Depot Harbour, but in the winter season he would simply have to dump it on the ice or store it there until spring. He would have no way of getting round the lakes and therefore he would have to return all the way from St. John with empty cars. Then take passengers. The Intercolonial Railway is one of the best and safest roads in Canada to travel on, and Mr. Ross, the agent in St. John, may back his train down on the east side of St. John—because he does not control the bridge across the falls, it belongs to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and if he went over it the cost would be four dollars per car to cross the bridge—and out of the thousands of immigrants landing at St. John this season of the year, could he take one of them on board his train destined for Depot Harbour in the winter season? True it might be said he could carry them to where the Grand Trunk Railway crosses the Canada Atlantic Railway, but what would he get for hauling them there? He would have to make arrangements with Mr. Hays to carry them to North Bay. Supposing he said to Mr. Shaughnessy, 'We have a thousand people destined for the Northwest, what will you charge to take them from North Bay?' He would reply: Just what I would charge to take them from St. John, perhaps more. No reasonable man will contend that the acquisition of that road would give us traffic between St. John and the great lakes in the winter season, either freight or passengers. You might take people to Depot Harbour, but unless they could skate to Fort William, they could not get there unless they were transported by the Grand Trunk Railway to North Bay. But that is not all. Suppose the government of Canada had invested fifteen or twenty millions in the purchase of the Canada Atlantic Railway and tried to work up trade with the Northwest, they do not own a steamer on the lakes, and I do not think they should. I ask you, to whom could they look for freight from ports on the other side of the great lakes? Not to the big steamship lines owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canada Northern. I think the Intercolonial Railway would not be in it so far as freight is concerned. I think I have disposed of that subject. I feel satisfied that I am right. If any hon. gentleman takes issue with me, I shall be obliged to him if he will show me where I am wrong. I could understand why the Grand Trunk Railway Company would want to acquire the Canada Atlantic Railway. I know that lots of people from the province from which I come—and they are not more ignorant than the people of other provinces, but on the contrary very intelligent—do not know that the Grand Trunk Railway Company have an immense system of branch railways in Quebec and Ontario independent altogether of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and can secure and transport freight all the year around; but it will not go to St. John and Halifax. I dare say the new line will be a useful adjunct to the Grand Trunk Railway system, but if they took freight from St. John in winter time by way of the Canada Atlantic Railway, when it came to Scotia Junction it could be carried north and west by the main line. I want to refer again to the fact, and to impress it on the country, that the shortening of the distance between Quebec and Winnipeg means something to the people of the maritime provinces. The lessening of the grade between Quebec and Winnipeg counts a great deal for the people of the maritime provinces. It comes to this, that if the government of this country should decide that it was in the interest of Canada to abandon the building of that section of road between Quebec and the maritime provinces, I would not think their claim in future would be very strong on the people of those provinces. I would feel myself very like resenting it, and that the people of the west had not stood by us. They appear to be standing by us pretty well. I myself would be willing to see every bushel of wheat raised in the Northwest going out by the Hudson bay route instead of coming to St. John if it would help to build up the new prairie provinces. If that would lessen the cost of carrying the wheat to the market to the man who grows it, let it go that way. We in the maritime provinces would share in the benefit, because, as I said before, the population pouring into that country would increase immensely in proportion as you decrease the cost of removing the crops, and when you get five million of people in the Northwest, a population equal to the whole of the rest of Canada, then the maritime ports will be able to take care of themselves. The towns there will go into manufacturing to supply the wants of the growing population of the west. I would not have risen to speak to-day if it had not been for the position taken by my hon. friend from Halifax, who, I think, takes a very erroneous view of this question.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Like my hon. friend who has just spoken, I would not have risen to address the House if it had not been for references that have been made to the section of the country from which I come. I do not intend to take up the arguments advanced by the hon. gentleman from New Brunswick with reference to the railroad question. I followed him as closely as I could, and I observe that he made one remark that might be explained in a different way from the way he explained it. He undertook to say that increased distance did not cut much figure in the construction of a railway; that if you have good grades you can overcome distance. In that case, if the Grand Trunk Pacific does happen to be a little longer than the Intercolonial Railway, why not spend a little money in lowering the grades on the Intercolonial and save the enormous expense which would be incurred in building the Transcontinental Railway through the maritime provinces? Now, there is another matter I would like to refer to before proceeding further, and that is the idea of the winter transportation of wheat to St. John, N.B. I may tell the hon. gentleman that that is entirely out of the question. He never will be able to ship from the Northwest wheat for export by way of St. John.

Hon. Mr. KING—They do it now.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The Canadian Pacific Railway takes a little.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Nine million bushels this year.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The price obtainable for wheat in the mother country would not warrant it. I have been buying some wheat this year myself, and the freight to Fort William is 10 cents and a fraction per bushel from Wolseley, where I live. The freight on the same quantity of grain, per bushel, shipped to North Bay, Ontario, is 22 cents a bushel. It is only about three cents a bushel from Fort William to Montreal by water, consequently there is seven cents at least of a loss in shipping to Ontario, and to go down to New Brunswick would mean a still further charge. People need never expect that we will ship our grain by rail to St. John for winter exportation. The wheat we ship now to Ontario is for Ontario use and is ground there. I have just received returns from a car of wheat shipped before I left. The freight on it is 22 cents a bushel from Wolseley to North Bay.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—But you shipped it there.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Yes, to be ground in Ontario; it is not for export, though. We could not ship it on an export basis at all. Consequently I may tell the hon. gentleman that in my judgment we will never be able to ship wheat by an all-rail route from the Northwest to St. John as a winter port. It would be much better to keep it over in the granaries. No insurance is required, and no expense is incurred, and we can ship it out in the spring to Fort William and save at least ten cents a bushel on the grain, as compared with what we would have to pay if it went to St. John.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman that in a statement issued by Bradstreet two or three weeks ago, the port of St. John on two or three occasions came up to the largest wheat shipping ports in America, and in one week the exports from St. John were two hundred and thirty thousand bushels more than from any other port in America.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I simply state the facts of the case from my personal knowledge. The freight on the grain from Wolseley to St. John would be at least fourteen cents a bushel more than it would be to Montreal by utilizing the water stretches. We cannot afford to pay it. That is too great a difference to overcome and you need not expect ever to make a business of the winter shipping of wheat. Every farmer in the country is anxious—and that is the reason why there is a congestion at some periods—to get his wheat down to Fort William before the close of navigation, because the prices are increased the moment navigation closes. I do not wish to speak disparagingly in any way of shipping wheat by all-rail to St. John if it can be done. I would be very glad to see it. But so far as expectations that the Transcontinental Railway is going to be of advantage in making St. John a winter port for the export of grain are concerned, I do not think they will ever materialize.

I have much pleasure in congratulating my hon. friend who moved the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, because he is a fellow-countryman of mine. He is a New Brunswicker. I was very glad to see him here and hear him make a speech. I might almost claim allegiance for him to the county of Sunbury, the county where I was born, and where I lived for a great part of my life. The hon. gentleman practised medicine in that county, and from there went to the Northwest, so that it is a pleasure to me to look upon him as coming from that county. I listened with considerable attention to what he had to say on the question of the autonomy of the new provinces. It is in striking contrast with some of the opinions which he expressed in the early days of the Autonomy Bill. He, I understand, was strongly opposed to it at one time; but, like some other people, he became suddenly converted. He likely received new light. It is possible that he had wrong impressions at the start, that these wrong impressions were corrected, and then he changed his mind. That is the right of every man in a free country. Now, as regards the good feeling existing in the Northwest, which is referred to in the second paragraph of His Excellency's speech, I do not hesitate to say that it is quite correct. I did myself the honour of accepting an invitation to attend the inaugural ceremonies in Edmonton in September last. It is well known that the Northwest people, perhaps more than the people of any other part of Canada, are enthusiastic; they always go in for anything in the way of entertainment with all their might. There is no half heartedness about them, and every one joins in. I am sure that their enthusiasm on that occasion was not on account of any warm feeling of approval in connection with the school measure as it is interpreted by some —there might be approval if it was taken as interpreted by others; but the people were rejoiced to meet His Excellency. They would at any time be pleased to do honour to His Excellency as the representative of the King. They are a loyal, patriotic people and they go into anything of that kind with their whole zest and force. The occasion was made a general holiday, and everybody turned out to enjoy it, and I do not hesitate to say that His Excellency made a very favourable impression. The people of the west, as far as I have heard, were highly pleased with His Excellency. He is very popular in that country, and for that reason the people would express themselves in the manner which he referred to in the speech from the Throne, but the question of the Autonomy Bill was not before the people at all, they do one thing at a time. They were there to welcome the Governor General, and they did it with all their might, notwithstanding that many of the people of that country are very much opposed to some of the features of the Autonomy Bill.

My hon. friend referred to the elections as having settled the school question, but he never made a greater mistake. Every day of the week there is money pouring in to Mr. Haultain to protest the elections, and in twelve months from now, take my word for it, Haultain will be in power. This school measure is a double-sided arrangement; it has two sides, brazen and silver, and both sides are being presented to the people. I heard my hon. friend from Lethbridge (Hon. Mr. DeVeber) saying that he helped to improve the school ordinance from time to time during the eight years he was in the Northwest Assembly. My hon. friend who seconded the motion told us that he attended an examination in one of the schools, and it was most admirable. Was it a separate school? Not at all. It was a Haultain school, pure and simple. It was a Haultain school from morning until 3.30 in the afternoon, and then the school was dismissed, and after that time a clergyman, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, according to the faith of the majority of the children, comes in and takes charge of the religious instruction. In this case it was a priest; I don't know whether or not they made a proselyte of the hon. gentleman to Roman Catholicism. He told us that he received some instruction in that school which he had never received in his own church. I suppose, however, he is still a staunch member of the old Presbyterian faith. The fact is, there is a great confusion of opinion with regard to this school matter. You meet one man and he tells us it is simply the Haultain school bill pure and simple; another man tells you it is separate schools from morning till night. What is the result? The Archbishop of St. Boniface issued a pastoral letter, which was published in all the papers of the west, imploring the people to vote for Mr. Walter Scott and that they would get separate schools. Did he mean that they would get the schools we have to-day which everybody says—which the hon. gentleman himself says, is a public school to all intents and purposes? When the school is dismissed at 3.30 every one goes away who wishes to do so; those who remain receive religious instructions, either Protestant or Roman Catholic, according to the belief of the majority. Do you call that any satisfaction or any gift to the Roman Catholics in the way of separate schools? I say no. I might as well say to my hired man, after he has served me faithfully for ten hours in the day, for the eleventh hour you can do as you like. He would soon tell me that it was none of my business what he did in the eleventh hour, that he had worked ten hours for me, and that the eleventh hour was his own. It is the same way with the school system in the Northwest. Until 3.30 the schools are public schools to all intents and purposes. The books of the common school are used, the teachers are properly certificated teachers from the Normal School, and the school is under government inspection. Why does the government not make the matter plain so that the people could all understand it. One man says, 'I will vote for Scott and he will give us separate schools.' Ninety-nine per cent of the Roman Catholics of the Northwest, in the province of Saskatchewan, voted for Scott for that reason. Mr. Haultain contends that if it had been made plain that the Haultain school law is the law that we are to have, and all the law we may expect, there would have been no opposition to it. We all favour that law; the strongest Protestant in the country would favour that, but now there is a division of opinion. When Mr. Haultain raised the question of the constitutional rights of this government to pass that coercive measure, it was the duty, in my judgment, of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government to have left no doubt upon the question at all. It is not creditable to the parliament of Canada to pass a law which no one can understand; but that is the case with the Autonomy Act. The people do not know whether it is one thing or the other. The government should have tested the constitutionality of their measure and then the people would have been satisfied. If they had taken the matter to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the people would have accepted their verdict; but at the present time there is a doubt about it, and as soon as Mr. Haultain returns to power the question will be revived. He will be returned to power, and that shortly. In the district where Mr. Brown, a very strong Reformer and one of the leading men of the place, ran in the interests of Mr. Haultain and provincial rights; and in the district where Mr. Haultain was a candidate, the majorities were larger than the total majority of all the government side put together. Mr. Scott said: 'Wait until we hear from the back districts!' It was not commendable in him to say that, because, without reflecting on the back districts, I may say that the great mass of settlement and of intelligence is, along the main line, in the districts which gave majorities in favour of Mr. Haultain. It was in the districts where the Doukhobors and Galicians and others who cannot read English reside that majorities against Haultain were obtained, and these majorities were very small. In Alberta also the majorities for the government were very small, so that even with the power and influence of two governments, with all their officials and emissaries they only carried the elections by a small majority; but if the government will to-day undertake to interpret the law and say that the school ordinance is the law we have to day there will be no opposition to it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is plain enough.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The government do not act as if it was plain enough. Your Prime Minister, because he is the appointee of the government here, received a letter from Mr. McInnes, proprietor of the 'Standard' newspaper. Mr. McInnes was a strong Conservative until 1896; he is a staunch Protestant too, and, I presume, in 1896, when the Remedial Bill was brought down, he left his party, as did a large number of others in the Northwest, and voted against remedial legislation. He has been on neutral ground until now. When this Bill was first introduced in the House of Commons he wrote to Mr. Scott for whom he had voted, protesting against the action of the government. Mr. Scott wrote him a letter. He put confidence in him that was not betrayed, although a great many people say it was. Mr. Scott wrote a reply to Mr. McInnes which I heard read in a public meeting, finding fault with the law. He said the facts were that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had to swallow the convictions of Quebec in not carrying out the promises he made in regard to the Manitoba School question in 1896, and he also cast a great reflection, which I do not think was deserved by the Conservative French of Quebec, by saying that they had to swallow their disloyalty in allowing Sir Wilfrid to send troops to South Africa. He said at that meeting too that no English-speaking Protestant in Canada could have induced Quebec to send troops to South Africa. That speech defeated their candidate in the town of Wolseley, for they said, Quebec would not fight themselves, nor would they let us fight. Is that the idea? If it is, said some, we are against you, Mr. Scott. He wrote that letter to Mr. McInnes, and that letter was read on the public platform and, does it not show that there are two opinions with regard to the school law? He Mr. McGregor, must have had an opinion then that it was not the Haultain law, because, if it was, Scott has not passed any legislation on the school question yet. Mr. Scott ought to know what the law means; he was in this parliament and helped to pass the Act, but the matter is not settled, and it will not be settled for a while yet. Mr. Haultain will come back into power next year, because they are going to protest twelve or thirteen seats and turn the present occupants out.

When another election comes round you will find the feeling in the country will be vastly different and Mr. Haultain will be sustained.

The hon. gentleman from Halifax waxed eloquent and bold yesterday about the prosperity of the country. Now, I have never yet said it was not a fortunate thing that this government came into power at the time it did. It is a well-known fact that this government when in opposition propounded a policy entirely different from that which they are carrying out. They were advocating free trade, commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity and other such things, and the people believed that if they were returned to power there would be a change in the fiscal policy of the country. No manufacturer in Canada during the time the present government was in opposition, dare build an annex to his factory because it was well-known that the members of the present government were very clever and able men, and it was believed that when they came into power protection would be wiped out and free trade would be the policy of the country. The result was stagnation everywhere in Canada. It was a reasonable thing for the manufacturers and the importers and all who were doing business, to fear that when the country was guided by these able and clever men, trade conditions would be completely changed, and that was one reason why we had hard times. Another great reason—the greatest reason of all was that agriculture in the Canadian Northwest was not understood as it is to-day. During the first four years of the present administration, until the pioneer farmers of the Northwest solved the problem of agriculture, the immigrants consisted chiefly of Doukhobors, Galicians and others, the scum of Europe. That was the class of immigration the government brought in in those days. It was pauper immigration, people who had to be fed during their passage, and fed after their arrival. I have seen them fed in the town of Brandon and in Winnipeg. That is not being done to-day. We are now getting United States and English capitalists, because the problem of agriculture has been solved. I would like to correct statements which have been made in this matter. It was not because of early frosts or poor crops that our crops were frozen. The first frost we had in the year 1882, that was the first year I was in the country, was on September 23. At White Mud river, on September 23, I pulled as green cucumbers and as green corn and other vegetables in Mr. Stewart's garden as ever I pulled on July 1, in New Brunswick. There was then no sign of frost, but that night it froze hard. In the next year it froze for the first time on September 7. In 1884 the first frost was the 6th of September; in 1885 the 22nd of August. There was no shortage in the straw. It was a crop far and above that of last year, as far as straw was concerned. Last year we had too much straw, but we had a good height of straw. I have seen on the Bell farm the grain come out of the elevator and out of the granaries in the spring of those years in lumps like bushel baskets because it had been heated. It was frozen grain. The cause was, we did not know in those days how to prepare the seed bed and how to sow the seed. We did not know until 1901, and then we learned how to seed. Now we prepare the seed bed the year before, and we sow the seed four inches deep. It grows through a dry period with the help of the moisture left behind when the frost leaves the ground. This moisture germinates the seed and it grows to a height of four or five inches above the ground, when the rain comes on in June and the crop is then all right.

For the last four years we have had magnificent crops. We had good crops of straw many other years, but the grain was frozen, because the grain was sown so late and so shallow that the seed was not matured in the fall before the frost came. We never lose a bushel of grain now by frost, and that fact is what has given the country a character. Many of our farmers raised 40 bushels of wheat to the acre last year. When you find a country producing such crops year after year it will attract settlement. Settlers are pouring in from the United States by thousands and tens of thousands. They are our best immigration agents. They are sending for their friends and bringing them in. Moneyed men are coming in and acquiring land. I have just read in a recent paper that a United States company bought three hundred thousand acres of land near where I live, and are starting farming this year on a large scale. Why ? Because they know how to work the land. New men coming in learn from their neighbours how to cultivate the land in that country, and they can go to work with some assurance of getting a crop. I regret exceedingly that the capitalists of the mother country have not invested their money in our Northwest and helped us to keep it a British country. You will soon find that the English-speaking people in the Northwest, outside of settlers from the United States, will be in the minority. The foreigners are filling up the country. It is useless to talk about them owing allegiance to the British empire. I do not see why they would. They settle in Canada to make homes for themselves and to make money, and they will sell their products where they can get the best prices. As I have already said, for four years we have been reaping splendid crops, and so long as that condition continues, we will have prosperity. Wheat bring 65 cents a bushel at Wolseley. That is cash, and no truck about it. The result is the country is prosperous. The people of the United States know a good thing when they see it, and they are coming in and taking possession of the country.

I do not see anything in the speech from the Throne respecting the tariff. There is no mention of any change to be made, though it has been suggested by the leader of the government that the tariff will be taken up in November. The tariff has more to do with the prosperity of the country than almost anything else except good crops. The tariff does not have anything to do with good crops, but it has to do with cost of goods and the development of manufacturing industries in our own Dominion. I do not hesitate to say that I am in favour of protection. In 1878, in New Brunswick I was a candidate in opposition to Mr. Burpee in Sunbury country, and came within 41 votes of defeating him. I had nobody to aid me, but just the people; all the other influences were against me, and the result was something of which I have no reason to be ashamed. I took the ground in that election that we should adopt protection. We did not know much about it then. Up to that time our tariff had averaged about 17 per cent, and as a farmer I found that implements and manufactured goods were supplied to a large extent from the United States. Our neighbours could bring in their supplies under our low tariff and compete with us while we could not sell in their country owing to tne high duty. I had looked the situation over as a farmer. I am a farmer, and it is my duty to consider the interests of the country from my standpoint. I do not want competition in the Northwest from the United States. It is my interest, as a producer of food, to have consumers for it. I say the time is coming, and I speak with some authority living in the Northwest and knowing something of its progress, with reasonable prosperity for say ten years, we will produce more wheat in the western prairie provinces than the British Islands can use and we will produce a lot of beef and other food supplies. When I say 'reasonable prosperity,' I do not mean the sort of prosperity we have been enjoying for the last two or three years, because that has been abnormal; but with fair crops we will produce more than the British Islands can consume, and what will be the result then ? The British Islands get wheat from Russia, India, Argentine, and Australia. Take the three countries which are not of our nationality, and they will be in competition with us in the English market. I do not look for big prices for wheat hereafter, because we will produce it in large quantities, and the supply will govern the price. The only way to get a market is to make a home market. We want to produce everything in Canada that can be manufactured here, and that will make a home market not only for wheat but for farm products of all kinds, and I assure this government that if they will bring down next session a tariff increasing the duties, it will have my support. I will support a high tariff no matter who introduces it, because I believe it will benefit myself and my brother farmers, but I want at the same time a law enacted against a combine in the selling price of goods produced under protection.

I do not intend to detain you any longer, but my hon. friend must not run away with the idea that the school question is settled unless the government see fit to define their policy. Then we will know what to look for. To-day the Roman Catholics all over the country are expecting to get separate schools from Mr. Scott, and if they do not get them they will be dissatisfied. Otherwise why did the Archbishop write that letter, and why did his friends support the government? If the present system were made the law, there would be no opposition, but as it is now there is a strong opposition which will grow, and the effect will be no doubt that Mr. Haultain will be returned to power.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (C.B.)—By the permission of the Committee on Agriculture the hon. senator from Wolseley was allowed to make a speech. That speech about the depth that wheat should be sown, and everything connected with it, he has repeated here to-day, so I had the pleasure of hearing it a second time. It is not for us to say when Mr. Haultain will come into power. That is a subject that the electors have to deal with and that they will in their own proper time decide. I am not disappointed that the tariff has not been brought down this session; but when it will be brought down, I think a good many who look for high protection will find themselves disappointed. There will be some important changes, no doubt, but when those changes come, I think it will be in the interest of the country to lower, not to increase the tariff. I am not a free trader, because that is an impossibility in this country, but I am certainly opposed to a higher tariff than we have at present. That tariff, wisely prepared, has been working successfully for the years that are past, and we can well afford to let it stand for another year.

I rose for the purpose of saying some kind word for the leader of the opposition in the other House. He has been rather roughly, I was going to say unjustly, handled in this House. Because the tide of public opinion is rather against his party at present, that is no reason why we should condemn him. He has been eminent in his profession in his own province, and would succeed in the chief cities of Canada if he were to devote his time and attention to his legal profession. He is courteous, gentlemanly, and kind even to those who differ from him politically, of whom I am one myself; but I heartily endorse the remarks that were made by the hon. senator from Marshfield as to the character and conduct of the leader of the opposition. When he found himself defeated in his native province he was so much respected by his party that they provided a seat for him, and still acknowledge him and cling to him as their leader. The day may come when he and his party may come into power. I am not favourable that that day should come in my time; but speaking about the allowance made to the leader of the opposition, it was made more to the leader of the opposition than to the party. However, when that party comes into power again, the leader who will head the opposition in that time will participate in the same benefit. I was rather amused with the hon. senator from Richmond. I read his letter which was, to say the least, vain and egotistical. I am an old man and was behind the scenes when all these changes took place. To-day there was not a more pronounced anti-confederate in the party than the hon. senator from Richmond; to-morrow he was gone. Does anybody believe that anything but a seat in the Senate was in view before that change took place? Nobody, I suppose, is so stupid as to think of anything else. Sir Fenwick Williams was sent out specially to use his influence to carry confederation, and it has been well reported that in several instances he buttonholed members of the House of Assembly in Nova Scotia and got them converted.

There was an expression used by the hon. senator from Richmond. He was complaining that the honours that were due him were overlooked by Sir Charles Tupper, when he gave his outline of the history of confederation, and he made use of this expression: that when he left the party it broke like a rope of sand. Does anybody believe that his influence in the House of Assembly in Nova Scotia was such that it was going to affect any part of it? There were only fifteen of us and we stuck together like men, and when we all appealed to the people every one of us was returned; every one got his seat, and the only man that was returned by a very bare majority was Sir Charles Tupper himself. Sir Adams Archibald and other men of prominence were defeated at that time, and the reason was this: We were not opposed to confederation from principle, but were opposed to having it forced down our throats before an appeal was made to the people. The speech from the Throne was delivered, and there was no allusion to confederation or to confederation resolutions, but by certain influences, and by securing a majority by getting so many men in the Senate and other vacancies that were made in the Legislative Council filled up, there was a large majority found in favour of confederation. I notice one thing omitted from the history that was given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I think it was a very unjust omission. The great founder of confederation and the great authority on the union of the colonies was my old friend Joseph Howe, with whom I had the pleasure of sitting in both parliaments. In 1852 he said: 'There are men in my hearing who will yet hear the sound of the engine passing through the Rocky mountains.' That was in 1852. There was no man in the Dominion of Canada who had the prophetic foresight to utter those words except Mr. Howe. On the 11th of February, 1854, he made a speech, the speech of all other speeches on the question of confederation that has been altogether ignored and he described what was necessary to be done. We required a railway, and he said at that time we will have men going from Halifax to Vancouver in five days. Of course when the subject came up Mr. Howe was not in the House at all, and he was altogether ignored; but I say now that those who have been writing about the history of the union of the colonies have done great injustice to him, a greater man than any other public man who has existed in the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg) moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday next at eight p.m.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Monday, March 19, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight o'clock p.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATOR.

The Hon. James M. Douglas, of Tantallon, was introduced and took his seat.

PETITION OF JAMES ALLEN.

The following petition was read:

Of James Allen, of the city of Toronto, praying to be allowed to present a petition to the Senate praying for the passing of an Act to dissolve his marriage with Margaret Jane Allen, notwithstanding his inability to pay the fees required by rule 108.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is contrary to the rules of the Senate, and unless the sense of the Senate is taken and an affirmative vote declared, it would not be possible to receive the petition. There should be a notice of some hon. gentleman's intention to move for the remission of the fee.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Truro)—I think the practice has been for a petition of this kind to be laid before the committee, and let the committee make a recommendation. I do not think this is the proper place to deal with it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—While I have no doubt that this honourable body does not wish to debar anybody approaching the Senate from obtaining redress because he has not the means at his disposal to pay the required fees, still it will be easily understood that if we permit this case to go through without any further light on the matter than we have at present, we are throwing the door wide open for a free court for every such petition that may be presented. The petitioner has not established his inability to pay the fees. We have simply his statement to that effect, and I think therefore under the circumstances the Senate would not be acting wisely in throwing open the door and receiving this petition. I will read a portion of rule 108, which governs the question of the deposit of two hundred dollars:

No petition for a Bill of divorce shall be presented unless the applicant has paid into the hands of the Clerk of the Senate the sum of two hundred dollars, towards expenses which may be incurred during the progress of the Bill ; and the said sum shall be subject to the order of the Senate.

The money deposited would be subject to the order of the Senate, and if the facts were clearly established to the satisfaction of the committee, the committee might make such recommendation as it saw fit, but I for one do not think at this stage that we should commit ourselves in this matter to the open door without some further light on the matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The presentation of a petition asking for anything does not commit the Senate to granting the petition. Any one could, I take it, petition the Senate asking for what they please, but the reception of the petition, without a motion to adopt certainly does not commit the Senate to the contents of the petition. The suggestion thrown out by the hon. gentleman from Truro (Hon. Mr. McKay), it seems to me is clear enough, that the petition should be referred to the Committee on Divorce, and they should make their recommendation. I take it for granted they would not make a recommendation unless the fact was established that the petitioner is unable to pay the required fee. I cannot see any impropriety in presenting the petition and referring it to the committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This has been done on former occasions. It is quite evident that a petition of this character must be presented to the Chamber before the petition for divorce can be presented. The rules require that the certificate of the clerk shall accompany the petition for divorce upon its presentation, hence it seems to me the only way to deal with the matter would be to permit this petition to go before the Divorce Committee. They can make inquiry into the circumstances of the petitioner and report to this House whether it is a case worthy of consideration or not. As I understand it, the petition simply asks that the fee be dispensed with. Therefore I think no injustice would be done in granting the prayer that consideration to which it is entitled, and which we have given on many other similar occasions.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to suggest that we do not receive the petition, but rather refer it to the Divorce Committee without committing the House to anything.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suggest that we receive the petition and have the case reported upon by the committee. No injustice would be done by that.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—What is the reading of the prayer.

The prayer of the petition was read as follows :

That your petitioner is quite unable to pay the fees required by the rules of your honourable House and entirely lacks the means of procuring the necessary funds for such payments. Wherefore your petitioner humbly prays your honourable House to excuse him from the payments of the said fees and to permit him to present his said petition for divorce without the payment thereof required by the rules as aforesaid.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is in direct violation of the rules. Rule 108 distinctly states that no petition for a Bill of divorce shall be presented unless the applicant has paid the sum of $200.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I was under the impression that the petition simply asked for leave to present a petition. I think the petition should be amended so as to bring it before the House in the way which I have indicated.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It is a direct petition to the House to dispense with the payment of the fees, and therefore it goes much further than a petition for leave to present a petition. I think the House should be seized of the facts in all their bearings. To my mind we should not receive it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It cannot be presented.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If we receive the petition we accept and grant the prayer of the petitioner, and the petition is operative to the extent of relieving the petitioner from paying any fees for the purposes of the divorce Bill. I do not think the Senate proposes to do anything of that kind. If it is a deserving case, let the committee to whom the matter is referred make a recommendation, and I am sure this House will always be prepared to consider favourably any circumstances arising which deserve any consideration, but if a direct petition like this is accepted by the House, then the door is opened wide for this petition for divorce to come in without payment of fees.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I had the honour of presenting this petition. I understand it is a very deserving case and a very hard one. I think it would not be expedient to stop the proceedings at this stage, but at a later stage, if after consideration it is not found expedient to grant the prayer of the petitioner, the matter could then be dropped. I think it might safely go through another stage, and we would then be in a better position to judge whether we should suspend the rule requiring the payment of the fees.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I raise a question of order upon that point.

The SPEAKER—Does the hon. gentleman from Cobourg ask leave to withdraw the petition so as to present it in another form ?

Hon. Mr. KERR—No I did not ask that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest to my hon. friend that he look at the facts set out in the petition with a view of placing them before the House in a more intelligent manner than has been done. These facts apparently would warrant the petition being sent to the committee in the way I have indicated. My hon. friend seems to be unaware of the facts set out in the petition, and upon looking over the document it would seem that really it is a petition to dispense with the payment of the fee. The petitioner sets out all the facts necessary, it seems to me, to establish the granting of the prayer and winds up in this way :

> Wherefore your petitioner humbly prays your honourable House to excuse him from the payment of the said fees and to permit him to present his said petition for divorce without the payment thereof required by the rules as aforesaid.

It is therefore manifest to my mind that it is intended to ask the House to dispense with the payment of the fee; therefore the petition in the shape in which it has been drafted should I think go before the committee and the committee should make inquiry into the facts and afterwards report to the House. No injustice would be done by so doing.

The SPEAKER—I suggest to the hon. gentleman from Cobourg that he withdraw the petition and re-introduce it, asking leave to present a petition.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I might say, in explanation, that when the petition was handed to me I had not really time to look into it. I assumed that it was quite regular ; it purported to be regular. I now ask leave to withdraw it so that it may be re-presented in proper form. While I make the motion, I may say that I do not see any objection, but rather a great deal in favour of the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Calgary. That would avoid the necessity of communicating with the parties and getting up another petition. A good deal of trouble would be saved and the same result would be achieved.

The motion was agreed to.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Before the Orders of the Day are called I have a motion to make. I move that this House do now adjourn. I do not feel called upon to offer the slightest apology to the Senate for making this motion, because it is the only way in which I can, in conformity with the rules of the House, reply to an unwarranted slander attempted to be placed upon the records of this House against me on the last occasion of our meeting in my absence by an individual for whom I entertain, and have always entertained, sentiments of unmitigated contempt.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There was no question, I am told, of order when that individual took the liberty of making against me one of the basest charges that can be uttered against a public man on the floor of this House. There were no cries of order then from his partisans, but I suppose every blow was fair that he could inflict upon me. I would not crave the indulgence of this House to notice this slander ; I would not attempt to answer it had it been made anywhere else than in the Senate—had it been made on a public platform, or in any newspaper of the country, but being made on the floor of the Senate, and placed on record in the 'Senate Debates,' I feel it my duty to myself and my friends that I should take the first apportunity of stamping the slander with the opprobrium it deserves. The octogenarian senator who rejoices in this House under the name of the junior member from Halifax, in his remarks on Friday last, referring to my change of attitude in 1866 on the question of confederation, used this language:

Does anybody believe that anything but a seat in the Senate was in view before that change took place ? Nobody, I suppose, was so stupid as to think of anything else.

This slander is nearly forty years old. For many years I allowed it to be uttered against me, in the public press and elsewhere, treating it with contempt, but at last my friends said to me: 'You should go into court and vindicate yourself against that slander, not only on your own account, but on account of the political party with which you are associated.' Well, I did go into court in the capital of my native province in the face of all the world, and I came out of that court more triumphantly than it was the fate of many men under similar circumstances to emerge from such an ordeal, under our jury system. I came out of court with the most sweeping apology and retraction for that slander that was ever placed on record in a court of justice. I have under my hand the report of that trial in the Dominion Annual Register of 1879, but it is long and I do not intend wearying the House by reading it in full. I shall simply make such extracts from it as I think proper, but any one who wishes to read it, can have it, who has curiosity enough to ask me for it. I had engaged on that occasion eminent counsel, the late Sir John Thompson, and Mr. Rigby, one of the most eminent men at the bar of Nova Scotia in that day, afterwards a judge and now in his grave. I brought an action of libel against the Halifax 'Chronicle,' the organ of the anti-union and repeal party. The 'Chronicle' had for its counsel the Hon. Otto Weeks, also one of the most eminent men of his day at the bar of Nova Scotia, and the Attorney General of the anti-union and repeal government in that province, with Mr. Morton, a prominent lawyer of that period. My counsel opening that case used this language:—

The plaintiff's counsel, Mr. Rigby, Q.C., in opening the case, went fully into the history of the union agitation in Nova Scotia, and called to mind the bitterness that marked the discussion of that question, both on the public platform and in the press, before and after the passage of the Union Act. The plaintiff had always been favourable to the principle of confederation, but was strongly opposed to the Quebec scheme, especially in its financial arrangements. When that scheme was promulgated in 1864, he was one of the first to oppose it, while declaring himself in favour of union on fair terms. Subsequently, in 1866, the plaintiff, in his place in the legislative assembly, proposed that the Quebec scheme be abandoned by its friends, and that the whole question of confederation be submitted to a new conference to meet in London, where terms of union should be agreed to under the sanction of the imperial government. The plaintiff's proposition met the views of a majority of the provincial legislature, and the union was thus accomplished. He therefore became the object of the most violent attacks of the enemies of union, at public meetings and in the press. When the plaintiff was afterwards appointed to the Senate his opponents said his appointment was the price of his support of the union. The 'Morning Chronicle,' which was the leading organ in the province of the anti-union party, as well as other hostile journals, were allowed to reiterate this charge with impunity during the excitement of those days. During that excitement the plaintiff felt that every allowance should be made by him as a public man for the violence of his assailants, as there were some grounds for irritation, and he believed, when the heated passions of the struggle had subsided, public opinion would not deal with him unjustly. He therefore brought none of his maligners before a court of justice. But as the libel had been republished by the 'Chronicle,' in a most offensive form, ten years after the occurrence of the events to which it referred, the plaintiff considered it his duty to himself and the leaders of the union cause in Nova Scotia, to demand a public investigation before this court, in the capital of the province, of the charges therein made against him. The plaintiff's object was not to obtain damages against the defendant, but to put such sworn evidence before the country, relating to his appointment to the Senate, as would vindicate his reputation—refute the accusations of his slanderers, and the general charges of corruption that had been so often alleged in connection with the passage of the Act of Union in Nova Scotia. It was the plaintiff's intention to place on the witness stand the leading public men of the province who were concerned in the carrying of the union, and every opportunity would thus be given to elicit the truth from those best able to give it.

That suit went to a jury duly empannelled, and before half my evidence was before the court the defendant struck his colours, pulled down his flag, and, as I have said made the most abject apology and retraction ever placed on record in a court of justice of the slander uttered against me in this House the other day. Before half my evidence was before the court, the hon. Mr. Weeks rose and said :

He reminded the court that there was no plea of justification on the record. The defendant had not ventured to say that the alleged libel is true. He did not say in his pleadings that Mr. Miller was bought or bribed to support the union. Had he said so, in the face of the evidence of Sir Charles Tupper and the plaintiff, $10,000 would not be a cent too much damages to give against the defendant, and he believed if a plea of justification had been pleaded any jury empannelled in this city would give such a verdict. But no such plea had been set up, even before the evidence of Sir Charles Tupper and the plaintiff had been publicly given in this court. In the face of that evidence (Mr. W. said) the plaintiff was bound to bring this suit, and he should have brought it long ago. Mr. Miller had vindicated his character by evidence on your lordship's minutes, which we cannot impeach, but he should have done so sooner. He should not have allowed similar charges to be made against him for years without giving the explanations that have been given in this trial. It is well for Mr. Miller that this public examination has been made, for the man who will hereafter assail him as he has been assailed in the past would deserve to be punished by a jury.

That was the vindication with which I came out of court on that occasion, and I have only to ask this House what they must think of the man, who, knowing that vindication as well as I do myself—of a man over eighty years of age, whose tottering limbs scarce bear him up the steps to the back seat he occupies in this House—of the man who at his time of life should be saying his prayers, or trying perhaps to make friends among his fellows—what I say can be thought of the man who, knowing these facts, would revamp and revive that old slander of forty years ago and prostitute his seat in the House by trying to make it of record in our Debates. I leave him to the judgment of the House, but I am not going to leave him there altogether. I am going to show you some of the incidents of the political career of this man, this toothless old viper——

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I am going to put him on record in the Debates before I resume my seat.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Order, order; Chair, Chair.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That individual first came——

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Chair, Chair.

The SPEAKER—What is the point of order?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman is using language which is unparliamentary in calling a member of this House 'a toothless old viper.'

Hon. Mr. MILLER—If it is out of order I withdraw it, but only on that account.

The SPEAKER—I would like the hon. gentleman to withdraw the language.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The hon. gentleman first came to the surface in the political commotion of 1873, and in that commotion he came into prominence as a member of Mr. Mackenzie's cabinet. When his name was published to the country as a cabinet minister the surprise was universal throughout the land. Everybody was surprised that without any antecedents to recommend him to consideration he should be placed into so elevated a position.

Not that the thing was rich or rare
But the wonder was how it ever got there.

However, he was not long in Mr. Mackenzie's cabinet—just long enough there to be found out, and when he was found out it is a matter of history that he was literally kicked out; but in getting rid of him it was necessary to provide him with some position, and they were compelled to give him one of the best offices in their gift, the collectorship of the port of Halifax, a position for which he was utterly unqualified by ability, or business attainments to fill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman has himself been Speaker, and he is very well aware that he is committing a breach of the privileges of this House and offending against a rule which reads:

All personal, sharp or taxing speeches are forbidden, and any senator conceiving himself offended, or injured in the Senate, in a committee room, or any of the rooms belonging to the Senate, is to appeal to the Senate for redress.

I ask my hon. friend not to make his remarks in the manner in which he is doing.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is too late now. The hon. gentleman should have read that rule a little sooner.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Well I have read it now.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I say he was expelled from the cabinet, hustled out of the cabinet because they found he was not fit to be there, but he was placed in a very important position, that of collector of customs of the port of Halifax, and it is a matter of history that before he was twelve months in that office, by his ignorance, his stupidity and his pig-headedness——

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Shame, shame.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I say by his ignorance and pig-headedness he had the whole commercial community of Halifax in turmoil and confusion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Speaker, this must be stopped.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—A cry went up to have him removed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend is too old a member of the Senate not to know that he is offending against the rules of the Senate in the remarks he is making.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I labour, as the House knows under the disadvantage of not being able to hear what the hon. senator says; otherwise I should be inclined to treat it, as I have always done, with the greatest respect. I say it is a matter of notoriety that while in that office an outcry went up, and from none more strongly than from the Liberal merchants of Halifax: 'What have we done to induce the government to put this man in so important a position for which he is not qualified?' The Mackenzie government did not remain long in office, but it was an admitted fact at the time, that their defeat in Halifax in 1878 was largely due to the unpopularity of this gentleman's appointment. When the Conservative party came into power there was a wild cry among the Conservative merchants of Halifax for his removal, but the Conservative party felt that, being an ex-minister, and being provided for as exministers usually are with a comfortable retiring position, they would be chargeable with vindictiveness, and with introducing the 'spoils' system if, without the strongest provocation they should remove him; but after a while the discontent became so great that he had to be removed, and when he was removed the business community felt that they had been relieved from an incubus. But more than that, while he was collector of Halifax, it was charged that he connived at breaches of the law, by foreign vessels entering the port of Halifax; in other words that he permitted United States fishing vessels to enter the port of Halifax and obtain supplies contrary to the stipulations of the treaty of 1818. That charge was publicly made against him at the time and he never did as I had done, never brought his accusers into a court of justice and asked for a retraction or vindication of his character from the charges made against him. He had to be put out of that office ultimately.

But the worst is to come. He represented Victoria in the legislature for some years. Victoria was a small constituency, one of the smallest in the province, and the chief recommendations for a candidate in that county were that he should be a Scotchman and a Presbyterian, and undoubtedly the hon. member was both. It was a small constituency, and it was charged against him that time after time he got elected for that county because he threatened to stab his party if he were not made the candidate. On account of Victoria being a small constituency, and he being the leader of a faction in the county, he could always, by controlling as he did a couple of hundred votes, compel the Liberal party to take him as their candidate, except on one or two occasions when they let the party be defeated in order to get rid of him. Mr. J. A. McDonald was returned, not because the Liberals could not return a candidate, but because they wanted to be relieved of the attempts on all occasions of this individual to claim the right to represent the county. This state of things went on until the last general election, when the little county of Victoria was merged into the county of Cape Breton.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I rise to a point of order. I am one of the youngest members of this House and I should like to learn the rules. A moment ago I heard the hon. Secretary of State read to the House a rule which is perfectly correct and which, according to my humble opinion, goes to show that the hon. member is out of order. I should like to have a ruling on this matter, and I ask if speeches of this kind, political speeches, stump speeches, are allowed in this House? I ask for the ruling of the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I am on a different subject altogether now.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—This is a point of order.

The SPEAKER—Of course I can do nothing else but read rule 25 which says:

All personal, sharp or taxing speeches are forbidden, and any senator, conceiving himself offended, or injured in the Senate, in a committee room, or any of the rooms belonging to the Senate, is to appeal to the Senate for redress.

There is no question, I suppose, that the speech of the hon. gentleman from Richmond, is personal and sharp.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I should say it is blunt.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Whatever question might arise as to some of my preceding remarks, what I am doing now is simply narrating facts, and I certainly cannot be out of order in showing that, before the last general election, the little county of Victoria—

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman might be justified in the former part of his address and in quoting what he read to us in justification of himself, but he is now attacking another member and not justifying himself it all, which I think, according to rule 25, is entirely out of order, If the hon. gentleman felt himself aggrieved and thought he should reply to the attack made upon him to justify his position and in doing so produced the evidence brought out in court, this honourable House might not take exception ; but to go on now and commit the very same offence that he charges against the hon. member from Halifax is, I think, violating rule 25, and it should not be tolerated in this House. Like my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Choquette) I am a young member of the House, but if we have rules let them be observed. As a young member of the House, I am surprised at the hon. gentleman from Richmond setting such an example to us to-night. It is one of the worst exhibitions I have ever seen in any legislative body and I have been a member of the House of Commons and of other legislatives bodies for some 30 years. I think the Speaker should call any one to order who uses such language as we have heard from the hon. member from Richmond.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am one of the youngest members of this House and probably would be permitted a latitude that elderly gentlemen would not be allowed; but young as I am, I would not dare to enter into a discussion on the basis laid down by the hon. gentleman. I have only been in the House five or six minutes this evening, and I heard attacks made on the character and past record of a man who has served his country. I have heard the motives and the character of an old public man assailed. I will not stand for it, and I say that when the Prime Minister of Canada is prepared to appoint a man to this honourable House and place him here as a member, his certificate of character is good enough for me, and he should not be attacked by any member of the Senate. What passed thirty or forty years ago in Nova Scotia, the petty squabbles of the past, should not influence our judgment in regard to immense general services rendered by the hon. gentleman from Halifax in his 84 years of life. I think it unworthy of his colleague who is nearly as old as himself, to attack him on the brink of the grave.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman should confine himself to the point of order. What is the point of order ?

All personal, sharp, or taxing speeches are forbidden.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We will see how the transgression is to be punished.

And any senator conceiving himself offended, or injured in the Senate, in a committee room, or any of the rooms belonging to the Senate, is to appeal to the Senate for redress.

If the hon. gentleman who is attacked feels that he is injured, it is for him to appeal.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Another good quality he has is modesty and humility.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a quality I miss in some others. I call attention to the fact the way the point of order is raised is not the proper mode of obtaining redress.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Fortunately for the hon. gentleman he belongs to the majority in the House and they are able to enforce their ideas of order against me ; but, as I said just now I cannot, in consequence of my physical infirmity, appreciate the argument of my hon. friend from Manitoba, and therefore I am not in a position to reply to him, though perhaps I might easily do so if I had his remarks before me.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The Speaker heard my words and I should like to have the ruling of the Chair.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is very good, but I think the hon. gentleman, if he had any sense of justice at all, would think it desirable that I should hear his remarks and have some chance to reply to them before the ruling. Would he like to have the Speaker's ruling on an ex-parte statement? That might serve his purpose, but it would not comport with justice or fair-play.

I was going to show the relations existing between the hon. gentleman's party and himself, how when he was not accepted by his party as candidate in the last general election as on many previous occasions—when the conference rejected him by a large majority, he made a determined effort to wreck his party and nearly did it, so much so that Mr. Mackenzie carried a Liberal stronghold with only forty-seven votes, which was carried the other day with over eight hundred, and I say it was because the party feared a repetition of this treachery and perfidy and baseness on his part—that he was appointed to the Senate.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I repeat it was for this reason that they put him in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Shame, shame.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I am not a young or old member of this House, but as a senator I call for the ruling of the Chair. This is altogether unbecoming, and is bringing us into contempt. I have great respect for my hon. friend from Richmond, but if this discussion is to be a precedent any of us can come here and malign a colleague with impunity. Every deliberative body has the power to see that decorum is maintained. Such speeches should not be allowed in any body that respects itself.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—My assailant's speech is all right, I suppose?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—No, I have no personal feeling of complacency for the hon. gentleman who has been attacked; it is for the Senate I am speaking. I could add a page to the chapter that my hon. friend is reading with regard to the hon. senator from Halifax. While he was minister, there stood in Acadia the fort of Beauséjour with cannons and fortifications; and these cannons were sold for scrap iron against the protest of both French and English, all of whom regretted to see an old land-mark, a place where foreigners were in the habit of coming to see relics of bygone days, sold for a trifle. Therefore I have no personal amity to spare for this hon. gentleman; but I call for your decision, Mr. Speaker, to have decorum maintained in this House.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The hon. gentleman's remarks are altogether uncalled for, I have finished.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I suppose with the high compliment that has been paid to me as an individual that I should thank the hon. member for Richmond for the attack that he has made upon me. I have been before the public for quite a long time. I have been elected to the House of Commons by acclamation at three successive general elections. Where is the record of the hon. gentleman from Richmond? He took care that he did not appeal to his constituency after the change took place. As to my conduct as collector of customs I appeal to my master who is here in my hearing, the hon. senator from Belleville (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell). He has gone down to Halifax several times and has held meetings in my office with the merchants at Halifax, and I ask him to say if he ever found anything unfair or unjust in my administration of the Department of Customs at Halifax? I wait for his answer.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must admit the correctness of the hon. gentleman's statement. So far as my knowledge goes in reference to the conduct of his affairs when I have been at Halifax, it is as he has stated.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I am proud to have this vindication from my old master. Now as to my position in the Mackenzie government. In the first place I studied military training under Sergeant Major Brechin, a strict disciplinarian, for two winters in Halifax. I passed my examination before a board of imperial officers, and I got my colonel's commission. That is the position that I was in when Sir John Macdonald resigned. I may say now, and I say it in the presence of Him who rules in Heaven above as well as on the earth beneath, that I had no more idea of entering the Mackenzie government than I now have of committing suicide. Mr. Mackenzie said that he would appoint two members of his government from among the Nova Scotians, whom the Nova Scotians themselves would select. I know that there was a man at that time who was very anxious to get the position, but some of the members said to me, 'Ross, you must enter that government.' 'No', I said, 'I do not intend to. I have no desire to.' However, after thinking the matter over until next day, I said, 'if they will give me the Department of Militia, because I know something about that department, the outside workings of it at least, I will accept.' I accepted the position. I was opposed by all the force and influence of the Conservative party in Nova Scotia, and in Halifax, particularly; but I was returned by a handsome majority—by such a handsome majority that when Mackenzie appealed to the people in January or February, 1874, I was returned by acclamation. That is something of my political history. What is the political history of my hon. friend, I was going to say in this House or out of it? I leave the public to judge for themselves. I did not seek a position in the Mackenzie government. There is a member of that government present in my hearing who will bear me out—but the party in Nova Scotia insisted that I should go into the cabinet.

Now, Mr. Mackenzie was a Highlander and so was the old man Ross. Let me say here to the hon. member from Richmond that I am not tottering; that I can stand on my feet and run up and down the steps like a boy. I will challenge him to go down to the front gate and see which of us will be here first in the Senate Chamber. Providence has blessed me with considerable strength and considerable energy, soundness of mind and soundness of body, for which I should be thankful. Mr. Mackenzie wanted to move the Department of Militia from its present position in the northern building, and Powell who was at the head of the Militia Department then in Canada, asked me then to oppose that. Mr. Mackenzie wanted the office for the engineers in connection with the Pacific Railway. We opposed the moving and said if they wanted to get a place in the northern building it would be better to go over themselves. Mackenzie was not very complimentary to me for refusing. At that time he had only the railway to look after. I wanted him to survey the road through to the Strait of Canso to show to the people of Nova Scotia that we were trying to do something. I, as a minister of the Crown, wanted to show the people of Nova Scotia that I was desirous of extending the railway further eastward. It was never done until it was done by the late government, who built it to Sydney and North Sydney. The reply I got from Mackenzie was characteristic of the man. He said, 'Thank God we can do without Nova Scotians now.' I said, 'Mr. Mackenzie, you could not have done without a Nova Scotian when we forced Sir John Macdonald to resign, and the day will come yet that you will not be able to do without them.' That day was not long in coming. There was a man in the Mackenzie government who was superior to most men whom I ever knew—Sir A. A. Dorion, who was afterwards promoted to be Chief Justice of the province of Quebec. Dorion and I were personal friends. He was a man who was beloved by everybody. The moment that he was appointed to the position that he filled—I think I may say it in the hearing of the senators from the province of Quebec—with so much satisfaction to the whole people, Mackenzie took everything into his own hands. Sir Albert Smith said to me several times, 'Ross, this thing is not going to stand long.' I was offered the position of Collector of Customs in the city of Halifax, the highest office in the province. I was very glad to get out of the party whose destruction I could see was written even at that time; and I took the position when it was offered to me and I may say that my best friend in the city of Halifax belonged to the Conservative party. Among other things there was an accountant sent down to investigate my accounts with the Bank of Montreal to see if there was anything in the nature of fraud that could be found against me; and I got a certificate to say that the dealings with the Bank of Montreal and the other accounts were correct to the cent. That certificate, to a man raising a family as I was doing, was dear to me and it is dear to me still. I am not afraid of anything the senator from Richmond can say about me. I must do him this justice—and I wish to do it very frankly—to say that the trial to which he refers escaped my memory altogether. I must do him and myself the justice to be very frank with him on that point. I do not think it is necessary for me to say much to vindicate either my public or private character. That is known to the people of Nova Scotia, to several of the members of the other House where I have occupied a seat for a long number of years, and also to some of the members now within my hearing. This is all I intend to say. I have endeavoured to speak as calmly and moderately as I could under the very trying provocation I have had to say some unkind things.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I ask that my motion be withdrawn.

The motion was accordingly permitted to be withdrawn.

THE ADDRESS.

The Order of the Day being called :

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the second session of the tenth parliament.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—Owing to the lateness of the hour and the suggestion of several hon. gentlemen I move the further adjournment of the debate on the address.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned until tomorrow at three o'clock.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Honourable Mr. S. N. Parent.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Since when has he occupied that position ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Since September 16, 1897.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Who occupied it before him ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax).

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Colonel J. Bell Forsyth.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What salary does the present president of the Quebec Bridge and Railway Company receive annually ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—None.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If he does not at present receive any salary, since when did he consent to occupy the position without taking the salary thereof ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Since 1st December last, 1905.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—For what reason or at whose suggestion did he consent to the decrease or to the complete cutting off of the salary which he was receiving before having come to or having yielded to that resolution ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The said Honourable Mr. S. N. Parent having been appointed Chairman of the Commissioners of the Transcontinental Railway had resigned of his own accord as President of the Quebec Bridge and Railway Company, but the directors having refused to accept the said resignation, he consented to act without salary.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was the salary then one of $5,000 or more ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The salary was fixed in April, 1904, at $5,000.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

In what building are held, at Quebec, the meetings of the board of directors of the Quebec Bridge and Railway Company, and those of the National Transcontinental Railway Commission ?
To whom does this building belong ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The meetings of the board of directors of the Quebec Bridge and Railway Company are held, at Quebec, in a building belonging to the Honourable J. G. Bossé, judge, Court of Appeals, situated at 147 Mountain Hill. The National Transcontinental Railway Commission does not exist ; presumably the Commissioners of the Transcontinental Railway are meant by this question. If so, they do not hold any meetings in that city.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How much does the Quebec Bridge and Railway Company pay as the annual rent of its offices situated in the said building ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Four hundred dollars from November 1, 1905, till May 1, 1906, and seven hundred dollars, including heating and taxes, for the three following years beginning on 1st May next.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How much does the annual rent of its offices in the same building cost the National Transcontinental Railway Commission ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The National Transcontinental Railway Commission not existing cannot pay any rent ; as regards the Commissioners of the Transcontinental Railway, they occupy no offices in the said building, and therefore pay nothing.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Have leases been signed to that effect ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If so, between whom, at what date, before what notary, and for what period ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Between said Hon. J. G. Bossé and the Quebec Bridge and Railway Company, before C. E. Taschereau, notary, on November 4, 1905, for 3½ years from 1st November last.

MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN moved :

For a return of the amount of moneys paid by the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York for legal expenses, during the investigation of the said company's affairs in Canada, held by the special committee of the Senate during the session of 1904, and also, a return of the names of all persons and firms who received the said moneys, with the special amounts paid to each.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Senate has no power to compel the Mutual Reserve Life Association of New York to divulge the particulars of any moneys they may have paid. I asked Mr. Fitzgerald whether that was one of the provisions under the law as it now stands, and he gave it as his opinion that it was not. A commission is now sitting, as the hon. gentleman is well aware to investigate the insurance business, and this would be a proper subject for the commission to take up. In reference to the other part of the motion for a return of the names of all persons and firms who received the said moneys, a return can be laid on the table of the moneys which have been paid. A number of people were brought here for the Mutual Reserve who received moneys for hotel expenses, and that statement will be laid on the table.

MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I regret very much to have to rise in my place to-day, not on my own behalf, but on behalf of a large number of Canadian citizens who are interested in the matter of insurance, and I may also add on behalf of members of the special committee who had charge of the investigation into the affairs of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association of New York—I regret extremely to have to say to them what I must say. The answer of the hon. Secretary of State to my previous question was not only incomplete but it was most unsatisfactory. I had put on the order paper questions asking the hon. Secretary of State, or through him the government of this country, if they knew that the officers of a foreign insurance company doing business in Canada, and to whom our Canadian people were paying in their good money, were thieves and forgers ? The answer was that he did not know. My reply on behalf of the people is that the government should know, and should have found out. Any insurance company doing business in Canada, taking the people's money, is bound through the government or through the insurance department, to give to the Canadian people an answer to their questions. To-day, on behalf of the Canadian policy-holders, and on behalf of a number of members of that special committee, I put a question, asking where this $20,000, which, in the insurance report of the Inspector of Insurance of the state of New York is charged against the Canadian policy-holders, or charged against the insurance company involving interests of Canadian policy-holders—I asked the hon. Secretary of State, and through him the government, for an answer, and he says he is not in a position to give it. I say that he or the government should be in a position to give an answer through the insurance department. I know for a fact that there is a discrepancy in the statement. I have the information, not from the insurance report itself, because I could not get it at the library. They said 'we have no copy.' But there is an hon. member of this House who has seen a copy of the insurance report of 1905, of the state of New York, wherein Mr. Eldridge, the vice-president of the Mutual Reserve Life Association of New York, that sanctimonious gentleman who has been held up here as a paragon of virtue by the Secretary of State——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, no; I am not responsible for that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—He made the statement that he paid $20,000 for services rendered before the Senate of Canada. His statement in the report is not what he swore to before the investigation committee, of the state of New York, at which I had the privilege of presiding with senator Armstrong in December last. Before that committee, Mr. Eldridge, vice-president of the company, said it had cost him $15,000 to defend himself, a forger and a thief, and his president, before the Senate of Canada. This is not extravagant language. Today these gentlemen are under arrest, indicted before the criminal sessions of New York state for the very acts that this honourable House appointed a committee to probe and investigate, and which was burked—I use the word deliberately—which was burked, but which was the cause of opening the eyes of the people of this American continent, of the people of England, of France and Germany, to the disreputable methods of the officers of insurance companies who so largely control the destinies of our widows and orphans. This committee, through your honourable House had a duty to perform. We performed it in spite of the most desperate obstacles, both from the opposition and from the government side of the House. We acted not on behalf of ourselves; but on behalf of the people of this country. Our report was laid low after a tie vote, but it was sufficient to arouse the authorities of New York state, after we had proved that the president of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Insurance Association of New York had paid $40,000 to Inspector Payne to change his report. When we had proved that they had bought officials of the inspectors office of the state of New York, our report was sufficient to justify the legislature of that state to appoint a committee of investigation, and with what result? With the result that the greatest financial institutions in the United States have been shaken to their basis, not through want of confidence in their financial standing; not through want of funds, but through the infidelity of their officers—through the grasping greed of their officers, stealing hundreds of thousands of dollars in salaries, stealing hundreds of thousands of dollars through speculations with insurance funds, against the rights of the people both of the United States and of this country and of England and of other foreign countries. Our little investigation was spurned here on the floor of this House by the hon. Secretary of State and characterized as 'a disgrace.' I wish to tell him here to-day that that word has got to be withdrawn by an apology, or it will have to be wiped out by an overflow of parliamentary denunciation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I rise to a point of order. Is this proper? The hon. gentleman denounces me because I cannot produce a document which is not in the possession of the government. A report of a foreign state concerning a foreign insurance company! The government of this country, most anxious to ferret out any improprieties that may have been committed in Canada, appointed a commission. It was thought to be a better way of arriving at the facts; that it would be more searching than a parliamentary committee. That commission is now sitting in this city, and it is proper that the matter to which the hon. gentleman refers should be investigated before that commission. I do not think that we should have re-enacted the farce of two years ago. The hon. gentleman has used strong language concerning me. I do not know what he calls 'spurning.' I opposed the action of that committee, because I thought the investigation was not carried on in a proper way. I thought it was carried on in a reckless and extravagant way, and I do not think the policy-holders of that company in Canada got any benefit from that investigation. A Bill was brought in to deal with the question, and it was settled without any aid from that committee. I ask, Mr. Speaker, for a ruling on the point of order; the hon. gentleman has no right to discuss a question which is not before the House.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman has not a right to speak on the motion before the House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am speaking on the subject of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Insurance Association. The Speaker decides that there is no motion before the House dealing with that subject.

The SPEAKER—There is a point of order taken which I must decide. Rule 55 is as follows:

When a question is asked by a senator the senator putting the question and the senator answering ought to make only such observations as they may deem indispensable to be understood, and no debate is allowed except by leave of the Senate. In the House of Lords (10 May, 206) and particularly in the Senate. this rule is generally disregarded and lengthy debates often follow. If the senator questioning or answering is allowed by the Senate tacitly or otherwise to offer any opinion, argument or inference, other senators may claim the same privilege.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Do I understand this applies to an inquiry or a notice of motion?

The SPEAKER—This is to a question put.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This is not a question put; it is a motion for the production of papers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman spoke to his motion in the first place.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—This has to come before the Senate sooner or later. In order to bring it before the Senate, I shall conclude my remarks with a motion. The members of that committee, myself particularly, have remained under a cloud. Now, I am going to dissipate that cloud, no matter whose head is going to break. I have been here, on the floor of this House, denounced as chairman of a committee that was 'a disgrace to the Senate.' These were the exact words of the hon. Secretary of State. I can quote the words of other hon. members, who said that we were not as a committee filling a good purpose; that we were filling a purpose that was detrimental to the people of this country. To-day the records that have been revealed of the insurance companies go to prove that our action in that instance was not detrimental, but was very beneficial not only to the people of Canada, but to the people practically of the entire civilized world. When we sat here for the past two years under that cloud of approbrium and odium cast on us, we bore it meekly and humbly and respectfully, but now the day has come when truth is stronger than hatred, stronger than the support of a corrupt company, a company that, a majority of the members of that committee felt to be corrupt through all its stages from the president down. It has been shown that the president is a public thief through the vice-president and through his officers. We knew it, and we felt it, but we were blocked at every stage of the investigation. We were blocked as far as some members of that committee could do it, in the committee, and we were blocked as far as supporters of that company could do it on the floor of this honourable House. I stand here to-day to challenge any one in this House or in this country, if the action of the chairman or of the majority of his supporters in that committee, was not perfectly justifiable in view of the facts as developed then, and especially in view of the facts that are now before the public of this continent? I say hon. gentlemen, that this charge which is recorded in the Debates of this House is not going to remain there. It must either be retracted and apologized for or wiped out by parliamentary denunciation.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Who is expected to apologize?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I want the hon. gentlemen who called our committee a disgrace to say that it was not a disgrace. I want the hon. gentlemen who called our committee a useless body to withdraw their words or they shall hear from us later on. What I have to say with regard to the charge of extravagance is this: The expenses of that investigation were as small as the expenses of any committee that ever inquired into a parliamentary matter. We sat practically three months, actually 54 sitting days, from ten in the morning until very often ten and eleven at night, and what was the cost of the investigation? Not more than seven thousand dollars. The hon. Secretary of State said that a judicial investigation would serve the purpose better than a parliamentary one. There I beg to differ from him. A judicial investigation is one calculated to cover up the truth, to hide the facts; a parliamentary investigation is one calculated to probe the sore to the bottom, and to find out what is rotten in the sore, and that is what I have referred to in the legislative investigation in New York. Sitting next to Senator Armstrong one day in the state building of New York, and when Mr. Hughes, the attorney of the investigation, put questions most direct, most pertinent, most personal, most private, I said to him: 'Do you allow that investigation to go on?' He said: 'Yes, that is what we are here for, to probe, to find out and investigate the affairs of the Mutual Reserve Life, the New York Life and the Equitable.' They had no two hundred dollars a day lawyers on the floor to object to the questions or prevent them being put as we had. We had one lawyer in whom we had confidence, who would not sell us, who did not sell his friend Colonel Domville; and he had against him an array of legal talent, the brightest in Canada, the most able in the United States. I said to Senator Armstrong: 'You astonish me with your investigation. Why, in the Senate at Ottawa the company had an array of talent from Toronto, from Ottawa and from Montreal, from New York, from all quarters, the best that they could get, and the highest paid.' 'Well,' he said, 'we do not run our business that way; we are investigating these institutions in the interest of the people, and not in the interest of the companies.' I said: 'I am very sorry we did not have the same opportunity in the Senate in Ottawa, but little as we had of an opportunity, we did good work, and I think our investigation is the cause of your investigation,' and he had to admit it. Now, hon. gentlemen, these are the facts, still the hon. Secretary of State and Department of Justice want to give a lawyer like Mr. Coster, an expert like Mr. Thompson, $5 or $10 a day. Mr. Hughes, who only examined the witnesses before that investigation committee of New York, received a fee of $25,000, and was absolute master of every question he put to these people. His counsel, who did not open his mouth during the whole term of that investigation, received $25,000, and a junior counsel got $10,000, with unlimited services of secretaries, stenographers and everything imaginable, while our Senate demeans itself and I use the word purposely, takes from a poor lawyer what he earned hard enough. The Senate did not do itself honour in the way it has acted in regard to that matter. It was not a matter of tremendous expense, and it has accomplished good results. Many a poor man has saved money for his wife and children by not paying it into the Mutual Reserve in the last two or three years, and I hold that when any hon. senator rises in this House to obtain information respecting the business of that company he should get it. I do not rise for myself personally, but on behalf of the people who day after day, by correspondence and otherwise, are asking what they should do—men up in years, men young in years, what they shall do in regard to this Mutual Reserve Life Company, and when I ask for information from the government I am told 'We are not able to find out what they have done with the money.' I say the answer is not satisfactory. Any company doing business in this country can be required to furnish information. The government can demand it, and I shall quote not only in regard to the motion I have put to-day, but in regard to an inquiry made some days ago with reference to the vice-president and second vice-president of the company being under arrest, indicted for forgery, when the government answered that they did not know what their organ said. It was the business of the government to find out and to lay the facts before the people of Canada. I have in my hand an article from the Liberal organ, the official organ of the government, which does not coincide with the views of the hon. Secretary of State.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What paper?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—'Le Canada,' the official organ of the government. The article is as follows:

Nous n'avons encore lu que le témoignage donné par M. Fitzgerald, le surintendant du département des assurances, dans l'enquête instituée par la commission. Et cependant nous trouvons à relever deux choses :

10. L'inspection du gouvernement ne peut vérifier que les placements faits par elle au département.

Elle ne va pas jusqu'à l'audition ou contrôle des livres, où les comptes peuvent être manipulés et faussés sans que le gouvernement puisse s'en apercevoir.

20. Les compagnies d'assurances se refusent à donner le détail des appointements qu'elles paient à leurs officiers supérieurs.

Si l'on se rappelle, maintenant, que c'est par le contrôle des livres, de la comptabilité de l'" Equitable " que l'on a pu avoir la première indication des spéculations auxquelles les directeurs de ces compagnies se livraient pour leur propre compte, avec les fonds des assurés ;

Et que ce sont surtout les énormes appointements pavés aux présidents et vice-présidents des trois grandes compagnies qui ont attiré l'attention de la commission et du public sur l'extravagance des frais d'administration, des commissions payées à certains agents, etc.;

On en viendra à la conclusion que l'enquête entreprise par la commission devra, pour assurer le public, suppléer à la pénurie de renseignements que possède le département sur ces deux points.

Remarquons que dans le cas d'une assurance d'Etat, ces renseignements sont nécessairement à la disposition du public et que le contrôle de la comptabilité devient une des fonctions de l'auditeur provincial.

Nous ne saurions faire un crime à M. Fitzgerald où à ses subordonnés de n'avoir pas fait ce qu'il leur était physiquement impossible de faire ; mais ce n'en est pas moins un avantage précieux d'une assurance d'Etat, que de ne pas avoir besoin de rien cacher de son administration, de peur de trop renseigner les concurrents.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to say a few words, it may relieve him if I tell him that among the information asked of the companies by the commission which is now sitting is the following :

To furnish statement showing any moneys or other property belonging to the company at any time paid out by way of gift, donation or otherwise for charitable, political, promoting or like purposes, showing in each case to and through whom the payment was made.

Second—Furnish statement of all sums of money paid for legal, contingent, parliamentary, legislative or other like expenses showing similarly in each case to and through whom the payment was made.

The hon. gentleman's inquiry will be answered most exhaustively.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—What is the hon. gentleman reading from ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—From to-day's 'Free Press.'

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If the hon. Secretary of State had given me that information in answer to the question which I asked——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I mentioned that matter, and said it was going to be dealt with by the commission.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman said he could not give any information because the companies would not be obliged to answer.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I told the hon. gentleman that the government believed the commission would be the best way of making the inquiry, because the most ample powers were given, and it was idle to talk about a parliamentary commission which might dilly-dally for five or six months and accomplish as little as did the commission of which my hon. friend was chairman two years ago. It was for that reason and because the government have no power directly to compel the production of this information—I asked Mr. Fitzgerald the chief of the department whether this was one of the questions that he could fairly put to the companies with the certainty of getting an answer—because it would be very undignified for me to tell Mr. Fitzgerald to write to the companies for this information and have them say in reply : 'We are not bound to answer.' The insurance law requires amendment, I have no doubt, and I hope it will be amended this session after the completion of the present inquiry. The hon. gentleman will see that the very point he is making here as to moneys paid for counsel in connection with matters which are before parliamentary committees, is one of the chief questions that is to be taken up by the comission.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would ask the hon. Secretary of State whether the information which is to be asked for, about which he has read to the House just now, applies to the Canadian companies or to those of the United States?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it includes all companies doing business in Canada under license. I presume the Mutual Reserve Fund Life is one of these ?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I am quite willing to accept the explanation of the hon. Secretary of State in regard to the matter, but I wish him to convey to Mr. Fitzgerald my opinion, and I think the opinion of the majority of the committee, that he has no opinion to offer in regard to what the companies shall and what they shall not answer. Companies doing business in Canada are bound to answer every question put by lawful authority and lawful authority is in a parliamentary committee. A judicial committee is lawful authority also, but it is restricted by rules and regulations which, I contend, are calculated to hide the truth, while under parliamentary authority, which is equally lawful, there is no restriction whatever and I hold therefore that a parliamentary investigation into this matter would be much more effective than one by a judicial committee. Mr. Fitzgerald may give what opinion he pleases—the authorities of New York state gave the same opinion, but when it came down to the question of deciding whether the Equitable, the Mutual Life, the New York Life, the chief officers of which were being paid from $75,000 to $200,000 a year salary, refused to answer the questions put to them, but the power of the state came down on them and they had to answer. Before a judicial committee, with half a dozen lawyers present paid to protect their interests, they could get behind the screen. Before a parliamentary committee, every citizen is bound to answer no matter what the consequences may be to himself. Before a judicial committee he may say, 'I will not answer because I might jeopardize my standing or my liberty,' but before a parliamentary committee there is no such jeopardy to be encountered. The parliamentary committee answers in such a case: 'You shall not suffer but you must give the facts.' I hold that in these matters, were national interests are involved, it is not a petty judicial-legal-lawyer business we want, but a fair straight inquiry into the whole sore, and nothing else. But as the hon. gentleman has stated that the recently appointed commission of inquiry is given power to ask questions of this nature, I shall drop the matter. If I have spoken with a little heat it is because the cinders have been under the ashes for two years. Do not blame me hon. gentlemen. I have stood on the floor of this House with my colleagues of that committee under a ban—degraded as it were, but to-day the cinders are aglow and will burn and burn until justice and right shall triumph, and truth shall prevail throughout the country and also in this honourable Senate.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONCLUDED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the second session of the tenth parliament.—Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—In resuming the further adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the second session of the tenth parliament of the Dominion, the remark is obvious that while the speech presents a great variety of topics for our consideration, the speeches themselves upon the consideration of the address in this House have been equally diversified; in fact the debate has taken a wide range. I will not say unprofitably so, because many of the topics which have been discussed have no doubt been suggested and have grown out of the topics embraced in the speech from the Throne. Some one asked the question long ago, 'What shall a man do who follows the King?' That question involved a very considerable amount of trepidation and embarrassment on the part of the man who asked it. I can sympathize with him, and I feel that I can ask the question what shall a man do who follows several kings in debate? I wish at the outset to have the privilege of adding my contribution to those who have congratulated the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech. The arrangement was a happy one. The mover of the address hails from the far west. He could tell us about the state of the country and the feeling there, and he was happy in his remarks. The seconder of the address hails from almost the extreme east. He also was happy in his remarks, and told the House about the state of the Dominion and the prospects and the feeling of hope that dwells in the breasts of our fellow-countrymen down by the sea. I read the reports of those speeches in order to form a more intelligent opinion as to their character, and I think it is only due to the hon. gentlemen who delivered them to say that they made a very excellent impression upon my mind, and I am very hopeful of the usefulness of the mover and seconder in their future career in this House. I should like, if it would not be considered out of place, and I do not think it is, to extend a cordial welcome to those who have this session entered this Chamber for the first time. That thought is tinged, however, with a good deal of sadness, for, although I had a similar pleasure seven years ago when I entered this Chamber, it saddens me when I think that I shall see no more, faces which I have seen honoured and loved on both sides of this House. I would like as an old friend, one who perhaps has enjoyed a longer acquaintance with the leader of the opposition in this House than any other hon. member, to say with what extreme regret I heard him announce from his place this session his intention to retire from the position which he has held so long and so much in the interests not only of the successful working of this Chamber, but of the country at large. But I am not surprised that he has expressed the intention to retire. He has spent a long, a useful and, I am bound to say, an honourable public life, and it is not surprising that when one has worn public harness as long as he has, he should occasionally feel the gall of the collar and the pinch of the hames. Whoever may be his successor in this Chamber can take courage, from the fact that he will have for many a day, as we all hope, the support and the benefit of the knowledge possessed by the present leader of the opposition, for he is a storehouse of political and other knowledge, and it is the wish of every one on the floor of the House, I am sure, irrespective of political leanings, that his days with us may be many.

Coming directly to the speech from the Throne, the first paragraph invites our attention to the continued prosperity of this Dominion. I hope hon. gentlemen that we realize what that word as applied to this Dominion means. The prosperity of this country now and for some years past and likely for many years to come, is and will be simply wonderful. There is an epic of joy and hope sung now in every province of the Dominion. It is set to the sweet music of happiness and peace, and it is sung by the busy hum of the Atlantic cities; it is chanted by the glad shout of the proud iron horse, and the gay boat song of the St. Lawrence, and it is rolling and increasing in volumes as it swells over the three prairie provinces of the west. It extends beyond the Rocky mountains and is re-echoed from the shores of the bright Pacific by that province which has grown up on its shores. Now, I hope that we will all be properly thankful that Providence has given to our country such wonderful prosperity. But every joy—and it is a joy to contemplate the prosperity of this Dominion—has its corresponding sorrow. The next paragraph of His Excellency's speech calls our attention to the sad fact that Her Majesty Queen Alexandra has suffered a great bereavement in the loss of her father, the King of Denmark. His Excellency feels satisfied that the sympathy of the British empire and especially of Canada will be offered to Her Majesty in her sorrow and bereavement for such a father. King Christian of Denmark was one of nature's noblemen, and, as I have always looked upon him one of the worthiest monarchs that ever occupied a throne. I hope that that little kingdom, although deprived of his presence and guidance, will continue to flourish in the time to come. And why should not our sympathies go out to Her Majesty in her sore bereavement? From the very hour her auspicious invasion of the British Isles when she made a willing captive of the heir apparent to the British throne, down to the present time, by her noble qualities and queenly virtures she has held the British empire's heart in fee.

Our attention is next invited to the two new provinces in the west. These two provinces were long in coming into existence, but they have finally done so and I am bound to say, from all the reports I have heard, that they are the two youngest and fairest princesses of the royal family of provinces in this Dominion, they had hard struggles but I hope the struggles are over. His Excellency, I understand, was simply charmed by what he saw and observed, and his notions of Canada and its great future were not only confirmed but enlarged. I do not wish to resurrect the discussion which took place while the Bills creating those two provinces were under discussion. Whatever cry of race and creed or prejudice with regard to them was then aroused, I hope it has been buried a thousand fathoms deep, and that it will never be resurrected, although sometimes I feel that like Banquo's ghost, these cries will not down. I hope, however, that they will have no place in this Chamber. I would like to make a passing reference and do it in all charity and in all good feeling. I have heard in the early part of this debate, with some surprise, that the ex-premier of the territories did not receive that consideration at the hands of the government which he was entitled to receive. I do not agree with that statement. I have a very high opinion of the abilities and statesmanship of that hon. gentleman, and think he has done a great deal of good in the territories now included in the two new provinces, but I did think—and I have not changed my mind yet—that for some time before these Bills became law he had acted very badly. He acted not only unwisely, but very injudiciously, and instead of expressing surprise that he was not called upon to form an administration of one or the other of these provinces, from my point of view, I would have been very much surprised if he had been. I consider that a man to work a policy or constitution and get the best results from it, must be a man in sympathy with that policy and with that constitution. We all know that the gentleman in question—and I would not for anything say a word in disparagement of his abilities and usefulness as a Canadian—advocated making one province out of the territories instead of two provinces. I am satisfied that there is territory enough for two great provinces, and that it would have been unwisdom to have made that vast country into one province. I am very hopeful of the future of these provinces and trust that peace and prosperity will abound in all their borders.

I want to dwell for a few minutes on another item in the speech from the Throne, that is, our immigration. It is most encouraging, and while we extend a hearty welcome to those good settlers from the south who prefer, I hope, the Union Jack to their own flag, but certainly our institutions to theirs, we especially welcome immigrants from the British islands, and I am glad to see that they are coming to us in increasing numbers. I want Canada to have not only as good a population as any other, but, if possible, a little better population than any other country. I want to see Canada in industry, temperance, push and energy, ahead of any other nation on the globe, and, so far as my humble efforts will go, I shall be glad to contribute my mite to that result. Nay more, while all these qualities are admirable and necessary I want to see Canada especially a God-fearing and a God-honouring nation, and I hope that will be accomplished by the class of immigration coming to our shores at present. I should like to ask the indulgence of this House for a few minutes, in dwelling a little longer on this topic, to read an extract from a pamphlet which has recently come into my hands, an admirable address delivered by Mr. Willison, a member of the Royal Society, and editor in chief of the Toronto 'News,' who lately delivered an address on the subject of Anglo-Saxon amity, and I honour him for his courage on account of the place and the surroundings in which that address was delivered. It is worthy of the perusal and the remembrance of every Canadian. If you would kindly, for his sake, rather than for my own, give me your attention I shall read this extract, which presents ideas much needed at the present day, and gems in their way. On the subject of immigration he speaks most encouragingly. He says :—

> At last we are a light upon a hill top and the nations see from afar. At last the movement of population is towards Canada. North and west the march of settlement proceeds, and hope and confidence and courage abound. We are taking rich treasures of lead and silver and gold out of the mountains of British Columbia. We are rearing new cities on the western plains and in the valley of the Pacific. We are sending the railway over the hills and through the frowning passes, and across great stretches of virgin land before which the foot of civilization has paused for centuries. We are filling these wide leagues of western prairie with a choice immigration from the old world, and from some of the populous states of this Republic. A growing commerce is passing out of our seaports on the Atlantic and on the Pacific. An increasing volume of the products of the west is passing through our canals, over our great through railways and on by the mighty St. Lawrence—which we shall make the chief traffic way of the continent—to the eager markets over seas. We are building more factories and employing more workmen and at better wages in all our centres of population. Our manufactures, as well as our agricultural products, are getting firmer hold upon foreign markets. Our young men have learned that distant fields are no greener than the smiling fields at home. We are absorbed in the development of our natural resources, in the settlement of our western provinces, and in the keener prosecution of industrial and agricultural pursuits in our older communities. We are a united and a confident people. The industrial east aspires to sympathetic community of interest with the agricultural west, and in all the provinces a robust national sentiment prevails. We lie closer than ever before to the heart of the empire to which we belong. We hold more firmly than ever before our great place on this new continent. We know as never before that the day of our strength is at hand, and that long before this century has run its course, Canada will be a name of power among the nations.

Hon. gentlemen: I need hardly make any apology for having read that extract.

Another paragraph in the speech to which I should like to refer is that which relates to forestry. For many years I have personally taken a great interest in that question and have mourned, so to speak, that our beautiful land should be so denuded of the forest and timber which the virgin soil produces, and I hope it will be found possible in connection with our immense lumbering interests, which I would not like to see interfered with, to devise some plan to preserve our forests. In fact I am told that it is possible and practicable to preserve a great deal of our forests now existing without seriously interfering with lumbering operations; but, be that as it may, I hope that the interest and attention given to this question will not rest simply and stay with His Excellency's admirable speech; that it will receive the consideration of the best minds in this Dominion. Any one who knows much about the question understands that there is nothing like forests to preserve our waterways from drying up, and for that reason alone, apart from hundreds of others that might be mentioned, I hope that the arrest of the wholesale distruction of our forests will be accomplished.

Some hon. gentlemen have spoken, and spoken with effect, on the question of the removal of British troops from Halifax and Esquimalt. At first I felt a little wrench at their withdrawal and thought it was a pity; but, on consideration, I am reminded that Canada is not now in the kindergarten stage of development, but has put on the clothing and the strength of manhood. We have, I am glad to say, a very considerable military force and I have every confidence that it will be sufficient to garrison these places. In fact I think that the best garrison which any country can have is an intelligent, contented, and prosperous people. These garrisons, I suppose, were a precaution against danger without and within the country, but happily constituted as we are to-day, I think we need not give a passing thought to the possibility of trouble arising within the Dominion, for however we may be composed of different races and creeds, I am happy to say that the hour is fast approaching, nay, now is, when these things play but a secondary part. The great thought is, are we loyal Canadians and members of the British empire? I do not look for any invasion from a neighbouring power. That was tried a hundred years ago, and I do not think the result was so encouraging as to lead to another invasion for a hundred years to come. In fact, I am told that we have in our country soldiers of such bravery and such daring that one of them in the South African war, with the aid of his force, actually rolled back the tide of battle and brought the Boer war to a successful termination and saved South Africa to the British empire?

There is one other subject on which I should like to touch. It may seem trifling and yet it is not. We are promised amendments to the Fruit Marks Act. In the province of Ontario, as most of you know, the fruit industry is becoming a very great industry, and although I have not much faith in making man honest by Act of parliament, I have great faith in legislation which will punish him if he goes wrong, and which will deter him from repeating the offence. Everytime that I hear of a barrel of fruit being opened in the British market which is found inferior to the quality represented, I feel humiliated and I feel that five million Canadians are dishonoured.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—Dishonoured before forty million British subjects of the mother country. In fact I have sometime been so uncharitable as to wish that the man who would pack fruit dishonestly could himself be thrown into the barrel, carried with the fruit abroad and exposed. You know what Sir Isaac Newton's theory of gravitation was. That the centre of our earth is the centre of gravity and that large bodies gravitate downward. Rivers run towards the sea because they are rushing towards the centre of gravity, but strange to say, in the packing of many barrels of apples shipped out of this country, the law of gravitation seems to have been reversed. Would it be any wonder if one's faith in Sir Isaac Newton's theory were shocked by such incidents ?

There is still another topic in the speech which, to my mind, which though last is by no means least, and that is the National Transcontinental Railway scheme. From first to last I have been astonished that that project was opposed. I do not know that I would refer to it to-day except for the fact that even after the discussion on the subject two years ago, we occasionally meet with doubting Thomases. We are even told—I think we have been told during this debate, that another transcontinental railway is not needed in the west. Well, my opinion, and the opinion of a better judge than I am, is to the contrary. That question is so important, and touches us at so many points that I shall take the liberty of reading views expressed by a great railway minister a few years ago. This is what he says :

> There is no country where the soil is more fertile than in the millions of acres in Canada which the plough has not yet touched and which man has not yet invaded. Railways are necessary to open up these great fertile tracts. If we are to invite the people from the world outside to immigrate here, that they have a right to expect that the government can assure them the means of transportation. That means a great many railways in many parts of Canada, and we feel, as a government, that we have ample justification in going to all reasonable lengths to meet this need. The tide of immigration is just setting in full and strong towards Canada, particularly from the south, and I believe the time is near when there will be a greater immigration than ever before to Canada from the motherland. This influx of settlers must bring its problems.
> It means an increase of soil production and necessarily of transport. We cannot long remain content with only one transcontinental line. I am ambitious myself to see another right away. It cannot come fast enough to satisfy me, and I am doing all I can in my small way, without public pretense about it, to ensure its construction.

All honour to Mr. Blair for these noble sentiments. I think it was a report of that speech that fired me, as I never was before, in favour of another transcontinental railway, and I am glad to learn from His Excellency's speech that exploration and surveys are in a prepared state, and that we may look for some sections of the eastern division being put under contract immediately. I hope to live long enough, and I hope the majority in this Chamber will live long enough, to see that railway constructed from ocean to ocean. Already I like to look down the vista of coming years, only a few years, and see the first transcontinental railway train pull out from the station at Moncton, decked with Union Jacks and the maple leaf, and the band playing the National Anthem and heading for Prince Rupert or some other point on the Pacific coast. I can see in my mind's eye that train careering through the province of New Brunswick opening up territory never before pressed by the foot of civilized man; I can see it on its onward career through the province of Quebec, opening up thousands of acres of arable land and valuable timber to civilization, lands that without that railway would not be settled, perhaps, for centuries to come. I see it entering my own province the great province of Ontario and traversing a fertile belt of good arable lands from sixteen to twenty milions of acres as good as any part of the province, and I see it bounding across the prairie provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, over the Rocky mountains and through British Columbia to the sea coast; and when that train arrives at the coast I think I hear great rejoicing. I almost think I hear the voices of the venerable Secretary of State and of the leader of the opposition joining in singing the doxology and the National Anthem, and I think I hear a third triumphant shout and it is three mighty cheers for the Laurier government for conceiving and carrying to successful execution that great National Transcontinental Railway. I wanted to say, just in passing, that some hon. gentlemen have spoken on this question as if the enormous quantities of grain being grown in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta were the only reason why this railway should be built. Let us enlarge our vision; let us rise to the importance of the occasion and, if we do, we shall see that that railway primarily is intended to develop the northern zone of this continent. No doubt you have felt, as I have felt, that our country has length, but we were not sure until now that it had breadth, and that railway, when it stretches across the northern zone of this country and reaches out its Briarian arms bringing the products of the north and of the south together and sending them by a line of steamships over the Pacific ocean, it will be the means of girdling the globe with the traffic of Canada. I see the first train moving out of Moncton, and I see another train moving out a few years later. This second one, instead of traversing a trackless wilderness, now leaves in its wake smiling fields, expanding pastures and waving harvests, multiplying towns and villages and cities, which will be growing like the prairie grass in the spring, which will baffle time and distance like the telegraph or telephone, which will spread the pulsation of its life tide to the remotest parts of the world, and then will be seen by those who come after us, a people inhabiting this northern region and the whole Dominion free as the mountain air, independent as the soaring lark, active and powerful as the giant strength of millions of free men and women. Hon. gentlemen, if we would have some part in that great accomplishment, let us follow the advice of the poet who says:

In the grayness of the dawning we have seen the pilot star,
In the whisper of the morning we have heard the years afar,
Shall we sleep and let them be
When they call to you and me?
Can we break the land asunder
God has girdled with the sea?
For the fog is floating o'er us,
And the track is clear before us,
From the prairies to the ocean
Let us lift the mighty chorus
For the days that are to be.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It was not my intention to occupy any portion of the time of the House upon the address, had there not been certain remarks made by different speakers during this debate. In the first place, I must say I join heartily in the congratulations which have been offered to the mover and seconder, and also in the reference to the prosperity of our country. We all feel a strong interest in the welfare and prosperity of Canada. I equally sympathize deeply with the bereavement of our beloved Queen. We know what death and sorrow are. We all know and feel deeply anything of that kind, and we are all anxious to extend sympathy wherever it is required.

I must say at the outset that I do not agree with some of the remarks which have been made by hon. gentlemen in this House with respect to that strong feeling of antagonism to the government for bringing down their measures in the manner they have hitherto brought them down. I am well aware that perhaps it was late when some of these measures were brought before the Senate, but we are also aware that it is not only the case with the present government, but it has been the case with all previous governments that have been in existence for years.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That does not make it right.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We are here to make it better.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—If my hon. friends will bear patiently, and give the government a fair opportunity, they will not only do better in this respect, but they will do whatever the interests of the country may require. We know that, heretofore, the governments of the day have been late in bringing down important public measures. We know the difficulties they have and the hardships they have to contend with to frame their measures so that they will be satisfactory to the people. As far as concerns the measure which has been considered so very important, relating to the increased indemnity and the pensions granted to certain individuals, was there any justification for the leader of the opposition saying what he did in reply to the fair, straightforward, honest and upright statement of the hon. Secretary of State? I say there was no excuse for it whatever. The Secretary of State deserves every credit for the manner in which he stated the facts in connection with the administration during the vacation, and also during the time when these measures were brought down. Was the measure brought down too late? Had the hon. gentlemen not an opportunity to remain here and discuss these measures? I say they had, and when my hon. friend from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen) stated in very strong terms that he disagreed with the manner in which the Indemnity Bill was brought down, I could not sympathize with him. He had the opportunity to remain here not only one day but a week if he so desired. Did we not find one hon. gentleman who had strong convictions in reference to another measure brought down at the end of the session, standing up here three and four hours at a time to discuss that measure. Had the hon. gentleman from Wellington not the same opportunity of contending against the granting of the increased indemnity or the pensioning of the retiring members of the government? Perhaps if there had been a measure brought in by the government and introduced into this House even on the last day of the session reducing the indemnity by one-half or one-third do hon. gentlemen suppose that my hon. friend would not have remained here and demanded an explanation from the government? I think he would, and I think the leader of the opposition would also have remained until he found out fully why the government had made such a change in their policy. There are strong reasons why they should remain here and discuss and oppose any matter they disapprove of. Did the hon. gentlemen disapprove of the increased indemnity? If they did, it was their bounden duty to make known the views they entertained, to oppose the increase, and to take the time necessary to fully explain their reasons for opposing it.

Then we are told that some other important measures came down late, and that we had not an opportunity of discussing them. The same argument applies in this case as in the case of the measures I have just referred to. We are here for the purpose of checking hasty or ill-advised legislation, and our views should be fully expressed on everything wherein we disagree with what is brought down to us by the government. So long as we are here, that is our duty, our first duty. I agreed with my hon. friend the leader of the opposition in reference to some Bills coming from the committees entirely changed and presented to this House in a new form. The Minnesota and Ontario Power Company's Bill was one of these. It was true, as the leader of the opposition has said, that that measure came before us practically an entirely new Bill. If it was entirely a new Bill, I ask why did the Railway Committee present a report to this House without going fully and amply into the reasons for the change they had made in the Bill? I disapprove of our alienating any portion of our rights in the waterways of this country. While I would prefer living on peaceable terms with the people of the United States, I say our first duty is to see that our interests in the Dominion of Canada are protected, and we have no right to alienate any portion of our waterways to the people of the United States. It may be argued that we do not need all the power at present, but we can understand that the possession of that power by the people of the United States, the using of it, and continued use of it for a length of time, might cause a difficulty when we desired it to be returned to Canada, and we might find difficulty in asserting our rights. Then we have another measure spoken of, relating to our insurance companies. While I disagree, as a rule, with royal commissions, it is sometimes absolutely necessary that such commissions should be appointed. I do not believe that this House should divest itself of rights and privileges which parliament possesses in investigating the various affairs of the country. Legislation by commission is a bad principle. We are here for a purpose—to protect the interests of the people at large, and what right have we to alienate those powers, given to us by the people of the country, to a royal commission? We know what royal commissions are, and, therefore, I disagree wholly with the leader of the opposition when he says that he thinks this was a better method to follow than by appointing a select committee. I disliked very much the remarks of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition in reference to the select committee that was appointed two years ago. He condemns the action of that committee. He seems to contend that that committee was not what it should have been. We know that the committee was appointed for a specific purpose; we know that it undertook the task of investigating the affairs of the Mutual Reserve Life Insurance Company of New York.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask the hon. gentleman whether I used the language he attributes to me?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I shall read what the hon. gentleman said, and perhaps he will be in a better position to say whether he meant that or something else. I was about saying that the censure and reflections cast upon that committee were certainly neither fair nor just. The committee did their work, although they were handicapped all through. They were prevented from having a free hand and from exercising the powers which they desired. I remember on one occasion we moved that Mr. Eldridge, who was here giving evidence before the committee should be cited to appear before the bar of the House, but the House refused to grant our request. We will see now what my hon. friend said :

> The next item is a very important one. It relates to the commission for making an investigation into the workings of life insurance companies in Canada. There have been strong objections taken to the appointment of a royal commission by the government. Many of their own friends and supporters think that the question should have been left for parliament to deal with, and that it was arrogating to themselves a power which they should not have exercised under the circumstances. Now I differ from the gentlemen who take that view. Speaking for myself and for those with whom I am associated in life insurance business, I express my gratification at the conduct of the government in this matter, and for this reason : after the exhibition of a parliamentary committee which we had two years ago, I came to the conclusion that if we want to get calmly and coolly at the bottom of the workings of life insurance institutions in this country, we had better have a small commission of clever men with power to investigate to the fullest possible extent.

'After the exhibition'—and who contributed towards the exhibition more than my hon. friend the leader of the opposition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I had nothing whatever to do with it.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—When it came before the House did not my hon. friend support those who were obstructing us in the committee ? Did he assist us in endeavouring to have Mr. Eldridge brought before the bar of the House? My hon. friend knows full well that he was antagonistic to that committee doing its full work and investigating the matter thoroughly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In that respect the hon. gentleman is making a statement for which he has no justification. I never opposed the investigation, but I did oppose the manner in which it was conducted, and I repeat that now.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—My hon. friend says he opposed the manner in which the investigation was conducted. Is there any difference ? Did he not oppose the committee having full power to proceed with the investigation ? I appeal not only to him, but to his assistant leader, who took the same course in condemning the conduct of that committee, and expressing the belief that a royal commission would be better fitted to conduct an investigation into the question of life insurance.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is my opinion yet.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—They went on further to say that they had every confidence in these insurance companies. That may be. They may have confidence, but we knew that there had been wrongs in Canada, and we extracted from one of those witnesses the statement that he did not dare to continue a transaction which he had begun here, that although he had obtained the goods in Canada he never made use of them. He stole the goods, and when we tried to get him to answer questions he refused to do so. When the matter was brought before the Senate, the committee was not supported, and I say it was unfair indeed that that should be held up as a reason why they should rejoice that the investigation has been undertaken by a royal commission rather than by a committee of this House. I believe a committee of the Senate is the best tribunal to examine into abuses of this kind, and that being so, there is one reason why I do not approve of the course the government has taken in this matter. I might read the remarks made by my hon. friend who sits next to the leader of the opposition (Hon Mr. Ferguson) wherein he conveys the same idea in reference to the committee of this House Therefore, I think those two gentlemen. were inconsistent in this matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where is the inconsistency ?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The inconsistency is that they may believe that a committee of this House should investigate these insurance companies, but they conveyed the impression that the government would hardly be justified in appointing a committee after their experience of two years ago.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is evidence that we are not such old fogy Tories as the hon. gentleman is.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What I said was that the investigation made by that committee some two years ago was not satisfactory to any of us, and we have had evidence to-day that it was not satisfactory to the chairman of the committee.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It was not a satisfactory investigation ! Why ? I have endeavoured to show why. Perhaps I have not made myself clear. We appointed a committee of this House to make the investigation. If these hon. gentlemen disapproved of the appointment of the committee, or of the members of the committee they should have risen at the time and said so. They either approved or disapproved of that committee. If they voted for the appointment of the committee, they thereby expressed their approval. True, the committee did not do all that we perhaps would like to have had them do, but if they failed to make a thorough investigation what was the cause? The Senate was to blame in refusing to summon Mr. Eldridge before the bar of the House to compel him to answer questions put to him in the committee, and which he declined to answer there. If we could have brought Mr. Eldridge before the House, we would have obtained the desired information. We asked him what amount the president, vice-president and other officers of the company received in salaries and commissions. Mr. Eldridge refused to answer. We said, and said quite correctly, that the people of this country were interested in knowing the amount paid to these men. Some members of the committee refused to compel Mr. Eldridge to divulge that information. We were told that we had no right to ask what salary these officials received, that bank managers do not publish to the world what amounts they pay their presidents, and vice-presidents. In this position they were sustained by the Senate, and thus we were prevented from carrying out the investigation as fully as we desired. Now, these gentlemen turn around and say that after the exhibition we had two years ago, they have no confidence that a satisfactory investigation would be made by a parliamentary committee. What they want is a small committee, composed of whom ? Composed to a greater or less extent of insurance men themselves. Do you expect to get justice at their hands ? Will the people of Canada have the same confidence and reliance on an investigation made in that way as they would in an investigation made by an independent committee of the Senate ? I say no, and, therefore, the whole argument goes to show that the hon. gentlemen are more or less wedded to the commission as appointed by the government. Therefore I must say that I am not fully in accord with the course pursued by the government in this matter, nor will the people get as fair an investigation by means of a royal commission as they would have had from a committee of this House.

We have heard a great many deplore the idea of the removal of the British troops from Halifax and Esquimalt. I am not one of those who feel that such a course will in any way injure Canada. I believe the government acted wisely. What we want more than anything else is self reliance. We should not feel that we ought always to remain in swaddling clothes. We should assume the responsibility of making provision for the protection of our own country. We have no reason to fear attack from the only people who would be likely to attempt an invasion. Is there any one within hearing of my voice who for a moment imagines that there is danger of trouble between Canada and the United States ? We know that we have our own garrison at Halifax, and that knowledge will give us a feeling of self reliance which we would not otherwise possess. Some hon. gentlemen went so far as to say that they feared it was the commencement of a movement to separate Canada from the mother country. Had there been such a feeling existing in the minds of the people of Canada, when they were called upon to make provision for the protection of the Dominion —that it will alienate the Dominion from the mother country, we would have heard something of it. I believe if a poll were taken to ascertain the feeling of the people on this question you would find scarcely an individual from one end of the country to the other who would be disposed to change the present relations with the mother country. There is no danger whatever that in undertaking to garrison Esquimalt and Halifax that there will be any weakening of the ties that bind us to the empire. Feeling that way myself, I think the government did wisely in the interest of the country in undertaking the garrisoning of these two important seaports.

One hon. member stated that he thought no reference should have been made to the Autonomy Bills of last session, yet in the very same sentence he referred to transactions which had taken place twenty-two years ago whereby feelings of hostility among political parties might possibly be aroused. I feel that, as far as the Autonomy Bills are concerned, they were just, proper and right. The deputy leader of the opposition, stated that the government had treated Mr. Haultain unfairly in dismissing him and calling on Mr. Scott instead. What rights had Mr. Haultain in the new province, more than any other individual ? He had been premier of the Territories, but that was no reason why the government of the day should have selected him to be premier of either one of the new provinces. He was not dismissed, and, as the elections afterwards showed, if he had been selected as premier, he would have been defeated at the polls or in the first division after the meeting of the legislature. Therefore, I say that the government, did perfectly right in selecting Mr. Scott, and his success will prevent bickering and strife which might have otherwise been expected.

I approve fully and entirely of the course the government has taken in every matter except the appointment of a royal commission to investigate the insurance companies, and I view with satisfaction the speech as a whole delivered by His Excellency to parliament. I believe that a better view of the country could not be taken, and when I consider the great Northwest and the possibilities it is opening up, I realize that we have a glorious heritage, and that we ought to be true and loyal Canadians. As far as the construction of the National Transcontinental Railway from Moncton to Winnipeg is concerned, the reports of the engineers show that the country will reap great benefit from the construction of that important line.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I had made up my mind, as the debate proceeded, to address the House on two points only, and I shall adhere to that, although other matters came up to which I should like to make reference. If the House will, therefore, consider that I have duly praised the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address, that I have properly sympathized with the Queen of England, with regard to the death of the King of Denmark, that I have praised the government for all the good things they have done, in proper and appropriate language, that I have duly anathematized the dishonest fruit-growers, and covered the whole address in that manner, I shall thank them. I want to refer to the remarks made by the hon. member from Wolseley with reference to the carrying of grain across the continent. The hon. gentleman has scared us with a statement that grain cannot be carried at a profit so far by rail, that it will not be carried to the coast, and he goes on to give us the rates by water showing that his conclusion is sound. I do not want to spring on the House the old story of the man in jail, but the facts are against the hon. gentleman. Last year we sent from Canada, according to the report submitted by our agent at Birmingham, about 6,500,000 bushels of grain. Somebody has published a statement of the exports from the port of St. John up to Saturday last, showing that up to date, for the present year, the quantity of grain shipped from St. John is 3,786,422 bushels, valued at $3,594,503. That was carried over the Canadian Pacific Railway. More than half of the entire export from Canada last year, if the statement of our agent at Birmingham be correct, has been shipped so far this year, from the port of St. John and all that has been carried to the sea-board by rail. Bradstreet's of the 10th of March shows that the shipment from the port of St. John in the week then taken into account, was over 400,000 bushels. More than half of the whole shipments on the Atlantic coast in that week have been from the port of St. John. I may say for the benefit of the leader of the opposition, whose kindness to the port of St. John we remember with gratitude, that, up to Saturday last, 75 steamers have sailed from the port of St. John taking away goods valued at $16,188,086. Last season, with a sailing of 99 vessels, the total value of goods shipped was $13,706,877, so that we have run nearly $2,500,000 over the shipment for last year already, with all the time before us to fill up the season. I put that forward in answer to the statement of my hon. friend from Wolseley.

But the points which I proposed in the first place to take up were two in number. One of them arises out of the discussion which has taken place on a paragraph of the address. The first matter to which I desire to refer is with regard to the Senate itself. I hope hon. gentlemen will bear with me, because I know that I shall be considered very heterodox in the observations I am about to make, but I trust the House will consider that I have spoken out my honest views. The hon. leader of the opposition found fault with the government because of the manner in which the measures that the Senate had to adopt were brought down very late in the session, and the hon. Secreary of State, as on other occasions, made reference to the fact that this is not a new practice. It may be so. If it be so—if that be a correct statement, that for the last thirty years the Senate has been so treated—if the Senate is not able to grapple in time with the legislation which is laid before it, what is the use of the Senate? Is it not the constitution of the Senate itself which is to blame, and ought not hon. gentlemen to ask themselves whether this House is in the condition and in the relation in which it ought to stand in a country having a bi-cameral legislature. Before I came to the Senate I was strongly of the opinion that we might get along in Canada with one chamber. I do not know that I have altered my opinion very much. Some one might say, it is very inconsistent in you to sit in a House of the usefulness of which you have doubts, but I have only to answer that there must be a Senate, that it is provided for by the law and if a fair proposition were put before us for the improvement or the reform or the changing of the Senate I think such a proposition would be met by this body with as great fairness as any other questions which might come before them. There is an impression created by observations in the other House and by the press that the Senate is in some way neglecting or not performing its duties. I do not agree with that. I think such criticism does no good. It is often directed toward the House of Commons as well as the Senate, and the House of Commons will have to stand just such criticism as the Senate unless it rises to the importance of its position and discharges the public business of this country in much less time than was occupied last year and the year before in the business of parliament. But, with regard to the question of a second chamber, I do not think the genius of our people is in favour of it. We have nine provinces in the Dominion, and only two of them have second chambers. In New Brunswick we abolished it. In Prince Edward Island they did the same; they made an arrangement of some kind, I believe, by which the second order in the state is represented in the remaining House. In Quebec I think they retain the second chamber. In Nova Scotia they have voted it out in the lower House two or three times; but the hon. gentlemen in the Legislative Council are fully satisfied that they are necessary to the well-being of the province, and they remain there. In British Columbia they had a second chamber when they entered confederation, but it has been abolished. In Ontario they did not establish one at confederation. Manitoba had one I think, but if so it was abolished. Anybody who thinks over these matters, will, I think, be led to inquire whether there is any real feeling on the part of the people of Canada themselves in favour of a second chamber. You must remember—hon. gentlemen know this just as well as I do—that our country is different from England. There the House of Peers represents a distinct order in the realm. It represents an estate of the realm. We do not do that in this country. Further, the English House of Lords has been greatly enlarged in late years. There is a difference in the appointments made; there is a different mode of selecting peers to that which has prevailed in time past. I noticed the other day that when the imperial government went out and a new government came in, eighteen men were appointed peers, some by the outgoing government and some by the incoming. Several of these men were selected because they were eminent Englishmen—not politicians—eminent in poetry, literature or science. That gives some evidence of the growth of English ideas; they have regard to other things than politics. Nobody will deny that the sole ground of appointment to this Chamber is prominence in political affairs. I think in Italy where the appointments are made very much as they are in England, the King of Italy is bound by the constitution of the country to appoint to the second chamber of that country men who are notable in the state in connection with the arts and sciences, a strong evidence of the high civilization of the Italian people. Of course the United States has a senate, but that is a body representing the states of the American Union. Each state has two representatives in the senate; but Judge Storey—every lawyer knows him by reputation at least—has said that the Senate was not only to operate as a salutary check upon the House of Representatives but occasionally upon the people themselves, against their own temporary delusions and errors. We might congratulate ourselves upon the idea that that is what this body exists for, but that idea is inconsistent with the idea of responsible government. Responsible government is based upon votes, the ideas and the will of the people; and the moment you interpose another body not responsible to the people, you have attacked the principle of responsible government. Further than that, the hon. Secretary of State says that the ministers who have control of legislation are all or nearly all in the lower House and they desire to present such legislation in person. That is very natural, but what I object to is this: An hon. gentleman who was a member of this Chamber was recently appointed to a position in the government. Straightway he goes out of the Senate. Why does he not stay here and carry on his department while remaining a member of the Senate? If this House occupied the position it ought to occupy, and which it was designed by the constitution to occupy, such a course on his part would be the proper one; but not only that—this hon. gentleman on his return stayed over in the city of Winnipeg, and the newspapers interviewed him there; and he expressed himself as quite in favour of a great enlargement of the Senate. According to his theory he does not think the maritime provinces should have so large a proportion of senators. I do not know whether he has impressed his colleagues with this view or not, but the hon. gentleman proposes that the Senate should be enlarged by the addition of, eventually twenty-four more members apparently to overcome some difficulties in his own province. Now, I think the government should deal with this question in some way—I do not pretend to say how, but I am sure some way could be found. It would be my idea to reduce the number of senators—not by turning out any who are here now. Unfortunately during the past year members have been reduced in number very quickly; but there might be some plan devised by which the membership of the Senate could be reduced, and I believe a reduced number would be quite as effective in every way if they were appointed properly. We have as many senators in Canada as they have in the United States with 80,000,000 of people; we have twice as many as in the new Commonwealth of Australia. It seems to me there should be some plan devised by which the Senate, if it is out of touch with the community, could be brought into touch. I will say no more on that point at present, because I want to get through with what I have to say before six o'clock.

The other point to which I refer relates to the abandonment by the government of the eastern and western forts or dockyards. I sympathized greatly with the speech made last year by the leader of the opposition. We were then discussing the Militia Bill, and the hon. gentleman pointed out that the policy of the government was to dissever to some extent, as regards the head of the militia, the militia force from the government of Great Britain.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Their action was preparatory to that.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I sympathize with the remarks of the hon. gentleman, not because I agree with his view, but from the point of view which I know the leader of the opposition has, to project the ideals of the past in the government's action in the present. I have gone along the sea-coast of our own country, and in the grave-yards at Halifax, at St. John—and I suppose the same is true of others along Lake Ontario and Lake Erie wherever there are old graveyards—and have looked at the monuments referring to the memory and the deeds of men who fought for British rule and carried British arms on to positions of great glory and honour. It is impossible not to feel somewhat touched by the memories of the past and to regret that that time is passing away and that a new order of things is coming into existence in this country, but it arises out of conditions which we cannot control, and it arises because of the very efforts we are making to develop this country. The hon. gentleman from Wolseley (Hon. Mr. Perley) told us the other day that foreigners were coming into the country so quickly that the proportion of those speaking the English language, excepting the Americans, is becoming less and less.

Well, it is impossible to suppose that these men will not be influenced by their ideas and thoughts, and the time must come when we shall have to enlarge our relations, if I may say so, with the mother country itself. Whether the day will not come when no longer the ideas and theories to which I have alluded in my reference to the leader of the opposition will entirely disappear from Canada except that they may exist in our poetry and our sentimental feelings, time alone can tell. I think we should set our house in order in regard to that. I believe in an advanced movement in that respect. Then there is a change going on in the mother country also. The flag of England still floats upon the seven seas, and it is as true now as when Daniel Webster said it three-quarters of a century ago, that the roll of her morning drum awakening with the sun and leading the hours in their course around the earth encircles the globe with the martial airs of England. Indeed, England has extended her authority in India; has created new spheres of influence in China, and own now half of South Africa. All this brings with it responsibility for her; it imposes burdens on her, and on this continent a change is taking place. Anybody who observes the policy of the King—I trust I do not infringe on what might be considered the proper thing to say—must see that His Majesty himself is actuated by a sincere desire to make friends in America; to stand in, if I may use the expression, with the United States, and it seems to me that should be our policy to.

Another thing; there has grown up within the last thirty years an immense power in Europe, a nation now of 60,000,000 of people. If the Empire of Austria-Hungry falls to pieces there will be 10,000,000 more Germans added to the German empire, and if Holland falls into the net, as she is likely to, there will be a power in Europe such as Britain has not been confronted with for many years. I do not think there is any ground for apprehension that they will ever be involved in war, yet Britain is preparing for such an emergency. She is making friends, and has made friendship with France. When I was a boy it was thought right to feel hostile to France, but since then Britain has sought the friendship of France and is now maintaining the most friendly relations with that country. France has reciprocated, and has given the best evidence of her desire to cement the friendship by withdrawing from this continent. One of the best things that was ever done for France, and for England too, was to withdraw the French flag from the shore of Newfoundland, thus creating harmony which might not have otherwise existed. That being so, if the German empire should look with an eagle eye on any part of South America and desire to strengthen herself there with the great navy she has created so suddenly, not having to get rid of old ships, there is a power which it might be well for England to be prepared to face and to have a great many friends. My idea is we might help her best, not by entering into actual warfare with any of her enemies, but by adding to the sphere of her influence on this continent, by removing every difficulty and trouble which may in the future assail her. Therefore, we must do more than we have done, and take up greater burdens than we have assumed, and meet those new duties manfully and cheerfully. The hon. senator from Wellington fears that through undertaking to garrison Halifax and Esquimalt we may get into some trouble with the United States. That is the very thing we should avoid, and, perhaps, if I might dare to make the suggestion, the Senate would be a very good place to moderate any unfriendly feelings which might arise. What I was going to ask you to listen to was an expression of opinion showing that the government of Canada is not responsible—of course I did not know state secrets—for the withdrawal of British forces from Halifax and Esquimalt, but that it is due to the policy of the imperial government itself. It has come about because the imperial government has adopted a particular policy which leads to that. Hon. gentleman will remember that last year Prince Battenberg, a relative of the Royal family and an admiral of the fleet, visited St. John. He had a splendid lot of warships with him. He was not able to bring them to Toronto, but he was able to bring them to St. John. Many little entertainments were given to him, and the mayor of St. John gave him one, the last probably that he got on British soil on this continent. The governor of the province and senators and members of the House of Commons, members of the local legislature and many other representative men were present. Prince Battenberg made a speech which contained an important statement, coming as it did from a relation of the royal family and head of one of the most powerful fleets that Britain has ever sent out. After thanking the people for the entertainment and saying he would tell the King about it, he said :

This, my first visit to this important seaport town, marks the end of what it has been to myself and the officers and men under my command, a most enjoyable and interesting visit, a grand visit, I may say. My visit is indirectly caused by what some people describe as a change in the naval policy. The dockyard at Halifax has been closed, and the same policy has been pursued on both sides of the Dominion of Canada, as well as in the West Indies, and we have benefited by it.

If you will give me your attention for a few minutes I should very much like to have the opportunity (probably the last time I will be in a position of addressing a representative body of citizens of one of the most important centres of the Dominion) to explain in a few words the misapprehensions which have arisen in the minds of a great many on this side of the Atlantic—views as to the steps taken by the Admiralty.

I should like to show that instead of having to deal with a sudden change of policy, it is more in the nature of the natural evolution brought about by a great many factors and it is an old saying that we should profit by the misfortunes of one's friends. I beg your forgiveness if I have to imply technicalities in the course of my remarks to you.

Concentration is the essence of strategy and strategy the art of war, which applies to the army as well as to the navy. The worst form of strategy is the dispersion of the main forces in far outlying posts—stations beyond all means of direct communication. Under old conditions the Admiralty had to form squadrons which were sent away, and there they stayed and they worked their own sweet will and as it would take a letter the best part of a year to reach them, nobody could interfere.

Now take the squadron which I command. We can get up steam practically in an hour. We can get under way in about the same time. We can disappear in two hours beyond the horizon and no man living can tell where we may turn up in a few days time., The matter was brought to a heading in consequence of certain factors one being it had gradually been brought home to people who are charged with these matters that no ship is of any use whatever unless protected, unless properly armoured. These cruisers will be finished in suitable numbers. A ship like the ' Drake ' had 30,000 horse-power and the largest complement of men. The difficulty which the Admiralty had to face was where to get officers and men for these important ships, but they looked around and found at different stations a number of ships absolutely useless and having no protection whatever. In case of emergency these ships would be very poor factors. These ships are being disposed of, being sold, and the officers and men thus set free from the different stations have been employed in many ships that are of use in war. The squadron which I command was formed in consequence of this difficulty and could not have been formed if those ships had not been withdrawn from those stations. When those ships were withdrawn, it was obvious that a dockyard which existed for the sole benefit of these ships ceased to have any present value. A dockyard such as the one at Halifax is expensive to keep up. There are the wages of the people, the masses of stores that accumulate and deteriorate and it was the natural result that when the permanent ships were withdrawn the dockyards should be unfurnished. The difference between Halifax dockyard now to what it was last year is the difference between a furnished house and an unfurnished house.

There is perhaps an exaggerated idea about the importance of a naval basis. You will see a great deal of talk where naval experts think that the only salvation is where you get a fine harbour to plant it with guns. The guns in a place like this have a very limited range. The harbour is safe, but nothing beyond. Admiral Togo, who has just brought this great war to a victorious issue, during eighteen months never made use of the numerous well stocked and well fortified naval bases at his command, but used what is called the flying bases—establishing himself where he found it would be a convenient base with respect to the work in hand. Togo never went near the coast of Japan—if he got the worst of it then perhaps he might have gone to Sasebo.

Gentlemen, I apologize for keeping you at such length. I am extremely anxious to remove, if I can, any misapprehensions that may be in your minds if you felt that you were being badly treated by the Admiralty. Believe me, your interests have never been better looked after, the full disposition of the naval forces of Great Britain have never been so advantageously placed for safeguarding the interests of the empire, not only on this side of the Atlantic but everywhere else.

Now, that was delivered by a man high in authority. It was the statement that no man such as he was could have made without being authorized or permitted to make it. It shows with the greatest clearness that the imperial government is changing its lines and endeavouring to adapt itself to the new conditions in warfare which have arisen through new improvements made in building war ships. My own idea is that we are compelled to take up the great responsibility of the nationality, which seems to be our destiny in the future. I suppose the government will never hurry a change of that kind. We must eventually and perhaps before long so order ourselves that we may feel that we are no longer a dependency but an ally of Great Britain, endeavouring to help to carry out the ideas which she has implanted in us and so help her as best we can, and in the only way in which we can, with our influence and strength. We should not criticise her on every occasion. I felt ashamed myself more so than I have ever felt before in my life, in regard to a public matter, with respect to the treaty which was made recently between the mother country and the United States for us. We have never accepted a treaty yet in a generous spirit. The discussions upon the last treaty made, as those who read the press must know, would lead us to believe that in some way we were enemies of the empire. We squabbled and fought and discussed in the newspapers to the very extreme the question whether we got a bit of land here or there in a country where we have so much. We might easily be more generous with the motherland. I hope hon. gentlemen will not think that I am lecturing them in any way. I am endeavouring to express my views with reference to the future before this country.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Wednesday, March 21, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise, not exactly, as I consider it, to a question of privilege, because I do not consider it strictly to be such—but in conformity with a practice which has prevailed for many years, in both Houses, of permitting references to misstatements of proceedings in parliament in the public press. Before doing so, however, I wish to call the attention of the House to the particular position of the gentleman who is presumed to report the debates of this House for the press. For many years this House has adopted the practice of paying a handsome sum of money for a correct and impartial report of the debates. The gentleman who has generally been assigned for that work, Mr. Holmden, has discharged, as far as I know, that duty with fairness and impartiality, and it was necessary that he should do so, because it was the understanding that he should always be prepared to give to the press of the country a fair synopsis of the debates of this Chamber for use in the newspapers all over the Dominion, because if a fair report were not given, it would colour and distort the position taken by senators in every newspaper in the country. It was, therefore, with a desire of having a fair report given to the press of the country that Mr. Holmden has been receiving a very handsome salary out of the public funds. I am sorry to say that he has not been in his place here for some days. He may, perhaps, have been excused from attending by the committee, or he may be ill. I fear he may be ill. For the years he has been reporting I have never had any occasion to find fault with his fairness. I have found fault with him in other respects, but as regards his fairness and impartiality I have never had any reason to find fault. I do find fault, however, with the report of the gentleman who took his place and reported the proceedings of this House on Monday last. I think the report is very unfair and very discourteous to me, and I do not think the House is justified in paying money for having its members treated in that way by the reporter. I am not very sensitive about such matters. If what I complain of had been done by any of the reporters of the press generally I would have said nothing, but we give special privileges on the floor of the House to the gentleman who reports our debates; therefore I have a right to complain. In the first place, I complain that what brought me to my feet was to vindicate my character against what I consider a very gross and unprovoked charge made against me by a member of this House.

I occupied the greater part of the time I was on my feet in reading extracts from the trial of the libel case, in the city of Halifax, based on the same charge, which I thought fully vindicated me from that charge. That portion of my speech, which I say was half my speech, is glossed over with a bare reference, and the charge itself as made by Senator Ross was accentuated by the reporter. That is not the sort of reporting we expect from the gentleman who receives a salary from this House for making an impartial press report. I have no fault to find with the Montreal 'Star.' Quite the contrary. I consider the 'Star' has placed us under obligations. It has been the fairest defender of the Senate in the press of he country, and on all occasions has stood out for the necessity of a second chamber, and for the actual value of the work done by this House. The Montreal 'Star' has been, through the ability with which it is conducted, and its enormous circulation, a power in the land; therefore, I for one have always felt that we owe a debt of gratitude to the Montreal 'Star' for the fairness it has treated this Chamber.

One portion of the address of the hon. member from Halifax, which was intended as an excuse for his attack on me, and which drew forth my reply, was that he had forgotten all about my vindication in the libel case in Halifax. If the hon. member makes a declaration of that kind in the House here, we are bound to believe it. His friends anyway will—that he had forgotten all about that celebrated libel case in 1878. Strange to say, that, although it was a complete retraction of the attack made upon me the other day, it is not at all referred to in the report of the remarks made in the Senate on Monday last as published in the Montreal 'Star.' Now, can anybody say for a moment that such a report is anything like a fair report? But there is still a more important misrepresentation of the proceedings of the Senate on Monday night on the part of that reporter, where he says:—

During the course of his speech Mr. Ross appealed to Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who was Minister of Customs under several Conservative governments, as to his record as collector of customs at Halifax. Sir Mackenzie rose and said that Mr. Ross was a good official, there had never been any complaints against him.

Now, I say this is a complete misrepresentation of what Sir Mackenzie Bowell said, because it is not disputed that, at the time, Mr. Ross was summarily, without notice, dismissed from the position of collector of customs at the port of Halifax; and I do not think that Sir Mackenzie Bowell ever had the reputation of doing anything so unjust as dismissing a qualified officer against whom there was no charge, especially a gentleman who had held the position of collector of customs at Halifax, under the circumstances that Mr. Ross held it. I do not think he would have summarily and ignominiously dismissed an officer in that position without cause. I therefore say, that I should like to call the attention of the House to what is a complete misrepresentation of Sir Mackenzie's reply to Mr. Ross on Monday evening. One word more before I sit down. It has been my misfortune on more than one occasion, during my long public career, to take part in episodes such as occurred in the House last Monday night, but, hon. gentlemen, always on the defensive—never as the aggressor. I defy any man to put his finger on a single instance in my public career where I spoke so bitterly or indulged in personalities towards a political opponent, except where I was put on the defence by unjust provocation, and that has been too frequently the case. There have been times in my public life when I was a persecuted man. My position was almost as bad as that of a candidate running for the presidency of the United States, where every sort of crime in the calendar, except murder has been charged against him. But although I have lived that persecution down I feel keenly that such charges should be revamped now and put on the records of this House.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (C.B.)—I did not intend to refer to this subject again, and I think my master at that time, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, has vindicated my character while administering the affairs of the customs house in Halifax for fourteen years. He did it honourably, and he is not going to reract now, even at the desire of the hon. member from Richmond. I happened to be in the House of Assembly in Halifax for a longer time than was the good fortune of the hon. member from Richmond, and I was there when very active doings were taking place. To-day there was not a more pronounced anti-confederate among the party than the hon. member from Richmond; to-morrow he was gone.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I desire in my place to give a flat contradiction to that statement, and to say that three or four weeks before I made my speech in favour of confederation, in the House, I had a personal quarrel and was not even on speaking terms with the leader of the anti-confederation party, Mr. Annand.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—I am not going to refer to the influences which were used at that time. Perhaps other members of the Senate know as much about it as I do. Speaking about the trial that took place, which I had forgotten, ten years after this affair took place, the hon. member from Richmond thought it a good opportunity to take action against the press. Anybody who knows anything about the management of a newspaper is aware that in a case of that kind which had happened so long before, knows that they would sooner make something of an apology than submit to a trial.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not all the press.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—A statement was made the other day, among the other invective statements made by the hon. gentleman from Richmond, about my conduct in the general election in northern Cape Breton and Victoria, that I nearly defeated the candidate at that time. A circular was sent out from North Sydney stating that the rule was to have two delegates from every poll at the convention. This would give Victoria 36 and Cape Breton 30. When the crowd at North Sydney and Sydney Mines found that my 36 friends in Victoria were one solid phalanx they doubled up their numbers. Instead of sending eight from Sydney Mines and eight from North Sydney they sent sixteen from each, so when we went up on nomination day we found ourselves driven to the wall. I went home as you may suppose, not very well satisfied. I met a member of the government who said: 'Ross, I want, as a favour, that you will not write anything in the papers of the way you were treated; it might affect the elections in some of the other counties in Nova Scotia.' And I kept my promise like a man. The election was going on, and they began to realize the danger in which Mr. McKenzie was placed, and a special delegation was sent from North Sydney to Halifax imploring me to go down and take part in that election, to save Mr. McKenzie from being defeated, and I say here, without saying it boastfully—I say it in the presence of all the senators from Nova Scotia and in the presence of all the members from Nova Scotia in the other House, that if I had not gone down and worked earnestly to get Mr. McKenzie returned he would never have been elected.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I would like to ask the hon. gentleman one question: Was he not, on that occasion—rumour says so—promised a seat in this House if he would do so?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—No, I say it emphatically, and before my Maker in heaven, there was no promise, verbal or written, ever given to me about my receiving a seat in the Senate. I am speaking in the hearing of a member of the government. Another thing: I never wrote a letter to any member of the government seeking that appointment.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I never said the hon. gentleman did; that is not the point.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—The appointment was made and it was received by the Conservatives of Nova Scotia, and by the Conservative press with almost as much pleasure as it was by the press supporting the government. This is all I need say. I need not refer in this House or out of it to attacks upon my public character. It is known to the people of Nova Scotia and I am not afraid that the member from Richmond can cast a stain or a blot upon it by anything he can say in this House or out of it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must say that I am not like my hon. friend to my left (Hon. Mr. Miller). He says he is not sensitive as to what the press says. Although I have been connected with the press for fifty or sixty years, I am sensitive —I dislike to have words put into my mouth which I never uttered. I have no objection to; on the contrary I am always desirous of having my words, in a case of this kind, recorded; then I should be prepared to defend them, but I do not like to have language attributed to me which I did not use. What I said when this question was under discussion on Monday night, I am prepared to repeat now, verbatim, so far as I can remember it. I have inquired for the official report of the debate, but have not been able to obtain it. I do not understand how these matters are managed. I have on my table the report of yesterday's debate, containing the speeches of my hon. friend from St. John and my hon. friends from Northumberland and St. Thomas; but I have failed to obtain the printed report of the events which took place here on Monday evening.

My hon. friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Ross) in his remarks, made in his own defence, called the attention of the House to the fact that I had been, as he termed it, his master. I do not think that was a good expression to use, because I never profess to be any one's master. But he referred, I suppose, to the fact that I was Minister of Customs at the time mentioned by the hon. gentleman from Richmond. The statement was made that I had been in the habit of visiting Halifax upon many occasions, and had always gone into the office of the gentleman who is now the Senator from Victoria, and investigated the affairs of his office, and he asked me then whether I had ever had any complaint made against him while I was in the city, as to the management of his office. I rose at once and said that the hon. gentleman was quite correct, that no complaints were made to me upon those occasions. That is all I said, and I did not use the language attributed to me in this report. Whether it would have been justifiable or not I am not going to say now, but I did not use it and it is a pure invention on the part of the reporter. I repeat: What I said in answer to the hon. gentleman was that during my visits at Halifax, inspecting his office and looking over his books and examining the manner in which the business was transacted, there were no complaints. To show that I am correct in my recollection, my hon. friend behind me came to my room the next morning and complimented me. He said: 'A categorical question was put to you, and you answered it in a categorical manner without going into the question at all.' That confirmed me in my recollection of what I really did say.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I ask then, why was the hon. gentleman dismissed?

Some hon. MEMBERS—Order, Order.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—As I happened to be the Chairman of the Debates Committee during last session, perhaps I might be allowed to give a word of explanation in connection with the press report which has been made of the proceedings on Monday night. I must inform this honourable House that Mr. Holmden, who occupied the position of reporter, tendered his resignation a few days ago, and suggested that for the time being, until the committee is organized, that he be replaced temporarily by the gentleman who at present occupies the position. I have sent for the report of Monday evening's proceedings made by our reporter, This is all that the report contains:—

Hon. Mr. Miller moved the adjournment of the House and proceeded to make a violent attack upon the Hon. Mr. Ross, Halifax, to which that gentleman made a dignified reply. The motion was subsequently withdrawn. Mr. Kerr, (Cobourg), moved the adjournment at ten p.m.

This is the whole of the report, and the report is subject to the judgment of the House as it stands on file. I was not present on that occasion, but I am informed that the House of Commons was not sitting on Monday night and that the reporters of several papers were present in this House. That might explain the way the proceedings were published in the press throughout the country. As far as the official report is concerned, I am informed that it was distributed amongst the members a day or two ago, and I do not understand why the hon. leader of the opposition did not get his copy. He should have received it as the other members did.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I sent up to Mr. Soutter's room for the press report and found that the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Beique) had it. It has now been read to us, and I must say that it is a very improper report. What right has the reporter to characterize the remarks of any senator as 'violent'? We do not pay a man to come here and describe and put a character on our speeches. We want him to report what is said and done. I never saw a more outrageous report made by any person purporting to be a reporter of the proceedings of the House. He had no right to say that any senator made 'a violent speech.'

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I must say, in defence of the reporter, that what he did that afternoon was done in the interest of the Senate. He told me he had left the debate out, and I thought he had done well.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He might leave it out, but he had no right to characterize any senator's speech one way or another. That is not what we pay him for. He has no right to say that any senator's speech was violent.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Was it not violent?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not the question. The gentleman who is paid by the Senate to furnish a press report of its proceedings is not employed to give his opinion as to the character of the speeches. The speech of the hon. gentleman from Richmond may have been violent, but that was none of his business. He was employed to report the speeches made, to give a correct synopsis of them and not say whether they were violent or moderate. We do not want his opinion. If he wants to publish his opinion, let him do so over his own name. I have had some experience with reporters of newspapers, and the instructions always given to a reporter are to report what a man says and leave it to the editorial department to comment upon the speech, to approve or disapprove as they like. As long as I am here, if we are to continue employing this reporter, I shall call the attention of the House to every instance where I see he is giving his own opinion as to the character of the remarks that we make. I do not want any reporter to be put on the staff without the consent of the Senate. The person who is appointed and paid by the Senate has no right to substitute another. He might be much superior to himself and he might be infinitely inferior, and for that reason the Senate should be consulted before any one is permitted to take the official reporter's place.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I will not dispute the position taken by the leader of the opposition as to what the reporter should do, but I will go this far, and I think the good sense of the House will bear me out, that the hon. gentleman from Richmond should thank the reporter gratefully for having favoured him to the extent he did by suppressing his violent remarks of Monday night; and I think he should also call for a vote of censure, if possible, on the outside reporters who reported, not fully, but even as far as they did go, the scene of last Monday night. It would have been much better both for the dignity and honour of this House if it had all been left out.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the reporter must have faithfully reported my remarks when he reported nothing? If the hon. gentleman shows such partisanship as to make such a statement, I do not consider his remarks worthy of a reply.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. What I tried to convey to the House was that the hon. gentleman from Richmond should thank the reporter for having done him a great kindness in suppressing his remarks of Monday night.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that there have been a great many complaints about these press reports. As I am informed, a gentleman is employed by the Debates Committee to take a synopsis of the speeches and furnish copies to the reporters of the press in the other House. I am informed that no French version is furnished to the representatives of newspapers published in the province of Quebec, and the representatives of the French press would like to have a man appointed in this House who understands both languages and can furnish reports in French and English. I, therefore, take advantage of this discussion to ask the Debates Committee, when appointing another reporter, to employ a man who understands both languages and to instruct him to furnish press reports in French and English. If he cannot supply a report in French, he can always get the assistance of some representative of the press of Quebec who understands both languages.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—There is no evidence before the House that the press reporter has done any of the things charged against him. The proper way to discover if there is any foundation for the complaint, would be to refer to the original report. Every one knows that his report is handed to the representatives of the newspapers, and they do with it as they please, cut it up or leave it out, or publish it without change. If I were an editor of a newspaper handling this report I would have suppresed a great deal of what the hon. gentleman said, and may be that is what the newspapers did. It is no use to blame the reporter, under the circumstances, until we know actually whether his original report contains the words complained of. My hon. friend says he did not get a copy of No. 7 of the official report; I shall be glad to give him my copy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I went to the reporters office specially to ask for it and was told that they had not received it yet.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—There was such a demand for that particular issue, that it was as much looked for as divorce evidence, and so it was difficult to get copies.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I think I voice the opinion of the entire House in expressing the hope that we shall hear no more of this incident. Let it be considered closed. The less said about it now the better. It has reflected no credit or honour either on the participants or upon this honourable House. If it must be fought out to a finish, I would suggest that both the combatants should retire from the House and thresh it out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or shake hands.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—But let us, for the dignity and honour of the Senate, and for other important considerations which affect us, hope that this incident is now closed, and closed for ever.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (A) An Act to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act. He said: This Bill to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act is required, inasmuch as the court heretofore has been regarded only as a court of appeal. Under the British North America Act, section 101.

The parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, from time to time, provide for the constitution, maintenance, and organization, of a general court of appeal of Canada.

That is as far as section 101 was adopted in our former legislation, and it is proposed now to go further and avail ourselves of the additional powers conferred under section 101.

And for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada.

Not very long ago a question arising under the Separate Schools Act was referred to the Supreme Court. The court stated that they had no power to hear a case in the first instance, that they were a court of appeal and could only hear subjects referred to them, special constitutional questions referred by the government of Canada. The object of this Bill is to give the additional powers conferred under the British North America Act to that court, making it a court practically of first instance to hear any case arising under the laws of Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Could the hon. gentleman inform the House what is the case to which he has referred?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The case came up in Ontario. It was a case arising under the law of 1863, which provided that persons who were then authorized to teach schools in the province of Lower Canada, and also to teach in the separate schools of Upper Canada should continue to teach. It affected chiefly the Christian Brothers and the Sisters of some of the teaching orders. A dissatisfied person in the city of Ottawa, after the law had been working for thirty odd years, was annoyed because the Christian Brothers were getting a school here, and he took exception to their right to teach.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I recollect now.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to make some observations on the subject of references of matters of public interest to the Supreme Court of Canada. The Bill does not seem to make any provision for the opposite side being heard before the court. That may be largely a matter of procedure, but it may be productive of mischief in this respect: The Supreme Court of Canada is, of course, the highest appellate court in the Dominion, and we usually presuppose that before a case of any kind reaches that court it will have been thoroughly threshed out in the other courts. The difficulty which confronts us with reference to this legislation is that where the government may be interested in obtaining from the court a declaration as to the interpretation of a statute, or any constitutional question, it may not be presented to that court in the same vigorous way or ventilated to the same extent as if both parties interested were before a lower court. I can easily conceive of the government desiring to have some special interpretation put on a constitutional question, or upon a statute, going before the court, laying the case ex-parte before the court and asking for a declaration on that question. By and by the matter may assume very much consequence. Public interest may have been excited over the same question, and it may have received the attention of lawyers of ability who may have viewed it from an opposite standpoint, and yet a declaration of the court has been given on the question. Therefore, the parties interested in the opposite view to that which the court may have declared on the subject will be prevented from obtaining a judgment from that court. The court, having pronounced judgment on it, would naturally be precluded from again expressing an opinion. The consequence is the parties interested would have to go to the Privy Council, and we would thus be deprived of the appellate jurisdiction of the court. I have known questions of this kind to come in an ex-parte manner before a court, in which they have made a declaration of what their opinions may be, and yet I am satisfied had both parties been represented such a declaration of law would not have been made. This phase of the subject should be safeguarded by both parties being represented before the court and the matter should be argued with the same vigour and interest as if they were about to pronounce judgment on the question referred to them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is in error in asuming that this is a case in which the initiative is taken by the government. It is nothing of the kind. It can only be a question raised as between two parties. There is no doubt about that. The opponents of course have the same right to be heard as the parties bringing the case under the notice of the court. At present the government can submit a question to the Supreme Court, but that is not wide enough. This is to provide that any person who desires to raise a question with regard to the interpretation of the British North America Act, or the constitutionality or the interpretation of any Dominion or provincial legislation, may apply to the court; but it would be on an issue, of course, just as in any other case.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out to my hon. friend that, under the last clause of the Bill, the court can only be put in motion by the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I would direct the attention of the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) to the fact that this Bill is merely to amend subsections one and two of section 37 of the Act of 1891, chapter 25, and that the other sections of that Act remain in force. These other sections cover the very point which has been raised by my hon. friend. Subsections three, four, five and six of section four of the Act of 1891 are as follows:

> In case any such question relates to the constitutional validity of any Act which has heretofore been or shall hereafter be passed by the legislature of any province, or of any provision in any such Act, or case, for any reason, the government of any province has any special interest in any such question, the Attorney General of such province, or in the case of the Northwest Territories, the Lieutenant Governor thereof, shall be notified of the hearing, in order that he may be heard if he thinks fit.
> 4. The court shall have power to direct that any person interested, or where there is a class of persons interested, any one or more persons as representatives of such class, shall be notified of the hearing upon any reference under this section, and such persons shall be entitled to be heard thereon.

5. The court may, in its discretion, request any counsel to argue the case as to any interest which is affected and as to which counsel does not appear, and the reasonable expenses thereby occasioned may be paid by the Minister of Finance and Receiver General out of any moneys appropriated by parliament for expenses of litigation :

6. The opinion of the court upon any such reference, although advisory only, shall, for all purposes of appeal to Her Majesty in Council, be treated as a final judgment of the said court between parties.

I think, therefore, that the law if it is amended, as is sought to be done by this Bill, will contain the necessary provision for the parties interested being represented by counsel. I do not understand that the Bill is for the purpose of creating a court of appeal; it is merely for the purpose of permitting the government to obtain an advisory opinion from the Supreme Court. The Bill, as I take it, does not go further, and is not intended to go any further than the law as it exists at present.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What subsections did the hon. gentleman read ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I read sudsections 3, 4, 5, 6, of section 4 of chapter 25 of the statutes of 1891. I do not think this Bill is creating any new court of appeal.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not a court of appeal, but a court of first instance. Those are the words. These words are new :

And as an additional court for the better administration of the laws of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The sections which my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Bêique) has read are repealed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The whole object of the Bill is that constitutional questions can be brought up in the first instance in that court by individuals.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The only words which I find in the first section which are new are the words :

'A general court of appeal for Canada.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend has not read the Bill. It reads :

And as an additional court for the better administration of the laws of Canada, and shall continue to be a court of record.

The words are taken from the British North America Act. Under the former legislation it was limited to being a court of appeal, and we subsequently gave it power to inquire into matters referred to it by parliament or by the Governor in Council. This goes further still, and allows constitutional questions to be inaugurated in that court.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—In offering the remarks which I was making I had in mind only section 2 of the Bill. I had not in mind the first clause at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the important one.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Section 4 of the Act of 1891 is wiped out; it is absolutely repealed.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No, the Bill reads as follows : 'Subsections 1 and 2 of section 37.'

The motion was agreed to.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

The Order of the Day being called :

Second reading (Bill B) An Act further to amend the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been held, in a case decided in the courts of Ontario, that when we made the husband or wife a competent witness under the Evidence Act of 1893, having become competent they could be made compellable. That was not the intention of parliament, and it would be a highly improper deduction. We think the interpretation of the court is wrong, and this Bill is simply for the purpose of correcting what we regard as a judicial mistake in interpreting legislation improperly. This Bill provides :

4. Every person charged with an offence, and, except as hereinafter provided, the wife or husband, as the case may be, of the person so charged, shall be a competent witness for the defence, whether the person so charged is charged solely or jointly with any other person: Provided, however, that no husband shall be compellable to disclose any communication made to him by his wife during their marriage, and no wife shall be compellable to disclose any communication made to her by her husband during their marriage.

It chiefly refers to a number of cases that are instanced in the Criminal Code, clauses 174 and 175—unnatural offences, such as sodomy, seduction, incest and cases of that nature. It would be highly improper that the husband and wife should be brought into court to contradict each other in regard to any case of that kind.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the figures 279 appearing in the second last line at the bottom of the Bill in the amended schedule. I find by comparing it with the Criminal Code that there is no section 279 in the Act of 1900; these figures 279 must be an error.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will have the law clerk examine it before the Bill passes through its next stage.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON. My impression is, although I had not time to refer to the statute, that a husband or wife is not, under the existing law, a competent witness in cases affecting each other.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The court has decided to the contrary; it decided that they were not only competent, but compellable, and this Bill is for the purpose of overcoming that difficulty.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was under the impression that they were not competent. Is it now the intention to make them competent but not compellable?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, they are not to be compellable witnesses. We are making the other provisions of the Act fit into that change.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I ask what is the application of section 2 in adding this schedule C ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Schedule C is a continuation of schedule B. I did not look through all the references to the Criminal Code. I assumed the clerk of the Department of Justice, who prepared the measure, has gone through it carefully. I looked through a number of them, but I did not check each individual one, but will do so since the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island has called attention to an error which he thinks has crept in.

The motion was agreed to.

THE STANDING COMMITTEES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON moved the adoption of the first report of the committee of selection to nominate the senators to serve on the several standing committees.

The motion was agreed to.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called:

Committee of the Whole House to consider and report on the third report of the special committee appointed during last session to consider and revise, and if deemed necessary to add to the rules, orders and forms of proceedings of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I think it is very important that the report of the special committee appointed to consider the rules should be before every member of the House, and I think the hon. gentleman who is chairman of the committee should have no objection to postponing the discussion until the report can be laid before us.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was under the impression that the report had been distributed again this session. Hon. gentlemen will remember that it was distributed at the close of last session and every senator was furnished with a copy.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. gentleman is under a wrong impression. I think that report has not been distributed except to the members of the committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I really do not know. A sufficient number of copies were ordered to be printed last session, if I remember rightly, to give a copy to each member of the Senate; and I supposed that the copies had been distributed. I did not feel that it was my duty to inquire into a matter of that sort.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If hon. members are not in possession of copies of the committee's report, it is idle to talk of going on with the matter—it must be postponed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How long would it take to print the report ? It seems to me it would be almost impossible to print it before the latter part of the session, judging from the size of the very voluminous document which I hold in my hands, and from the rather tardy way in which the Printing Bureau acts in getting out a paper of this kind—not, I must say, wilfully at all—but I think it would postpone the consideration of the rules for at least six weeks.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh no, I think it can be done in a week. I would like my hon. friend to go down to the Printing Bureau and see for himself the confusion prevailing there, with the amount of material they have on hand. The Auditor General's Report alone—the copies which have not been bound up yet—would, I think, nearly fill this Chamber. It is a report of nearly three thousand pages and they have about ten thousand copies to make up, making a total of millions and millions of pages. I was amazed when I went down and saw the space it occupied. That report alone takes up a whole flat. The hon. gentleman I am sure can have very little idea of the amount of work which the Printing Bureau has on hand.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is all the stronger reason why we should do something now about the rules. If the Auditor General's Report absorbs the entire energies of the Bureau; there is very little hope of getting this report printed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand it, the type has not been broken up, and the additional copies can be secured in a short time. I would therefore move that this Order of the Day be discharged and that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the subject on Monday next.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could we not come to some understanding to have a copy of that report printed in our daily Minutes of Proceedings. Every report which is brought in by a committee is printed in the Minutes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is printed sometimes in the appendix.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Or in the appendix if you like. The reason I ask for this is that if the report is printed in the Minutes of Proceedings we will have it in French as well as in English; otherwise we shall not get it.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I would like to ask the House if one portion of the rules could not be gone on with. I refer to those relating to the Divorce Committee. A great deal of delay is caused by these not now being considered, and if it were possible to take them up and proceed with them we would be able to go on with our business, which will be delayed unless these rules are agreed to. If the House could possibly go into a consideration of those rules now and have them passed and a report made we might proceed with those cases.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. member from Brandon might have stated also that there are some seventeen Bills for divorce before this Chamber, thus obliging the Divorce Committee to apply themselves at an early date and in an active manner to deal with this legislation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Could not the divorce rules be taken up now?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am completely in the hands of the House. I have no wishes in the matter. If it is thought that it will be advantageous to the transaction of public business to go into committee and deal with the divorce rules, I shall be very glad to modify the motion in that way, that we go into committee, with the understanding that at this sitting we shall deal simply with the rules relating to divorce.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—The rules which deal with divorce begin at 140. I may say generally that these rules were carefully considered by the Divorce Committee last session. With the assistance of the law clerk, they amended rules for the facilitating of the business of the Divorce Committee. As I understand, and as one would gather from reading the new divorce rules, divorce is not made any easier to get than it was before, but the proceedings are very considerably simplified, and the expense connected with the work is somewhat diminished. There was no division of opinion with respect to these rules, as I understand, either in the Divorce Committee or in the committee to which the rules of the House were referred last year. The latter committee made certain verbal changes in the draft submitted by the Committee on Divorce, but no substantial changes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The object of the committee in revising these rules was to make them conform, as far as we possibly could, to the procedure which obtains in the superior courts with reference to the issuance of writs and the trial of actions. That is to say, we have adhered as closely as possible to that procedure; and while it would absorb too much time to explain at length yet I can say with confidence that this will result in both parties being seized with a wider and more particular knowledge of facts as to what is occurring with reference to a Divorce Bill than heretofore. The practice has been simplified and made to conform almost exactly to the rules of court, and I may say it will be fraught with less expense.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS from the committee, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that the report of the committee be received.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Are we receiving the report of the Committee of the Whole on the rules relating to divorce cases, or are we adopting the report asking leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand, the report of the committee is that they have gone through the rules and schedules relating to divorce, and they report favourably on those rules without amendment, and ask leave to sit again to consider the remainder of the report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not know that there is any more light thrown on the subject. What is the report of the committee ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has heard the report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The Chairman reported from the committee, that they had made progress and asked leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—That they had passed certain clauses.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If we receive that report, it does not put those clauses into force.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest that a motion should be made that the report be adopted, because I understand the original motion was that we should go into committee on specific clauses. Those clauses have been passed by the committee without amendment, and consequently a motion would be in order that we adopt those clauses.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When the report is received I intend to make another motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have not had time to prepare a special motion, but I think that the following will probably cover the ground.

That rules 140 to 159, both included, of the proposed rules as referred to Committee of the Whole, together with the schedules, be approved and adopted.

If that motion is carried, I shall give notice under existing rule 16, for to-morrow, to make these rules part of our Standing Orders, and there must be a special summons of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It takes more than one day for that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The rule does not say that. This is not the initiation of the subject for discussion, and does not come under rule 13.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The motion of the hon. gentleman is under rule 16, but subject to rule 13.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is for the House to consider. I shall give either one or two days notice as desired.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the notice, is it to be one day's notice or two days ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think it should be two days, but I do not want to raise an objection, and with the general consent we could make it one day.

Hon. Mr POWER—Then I give notice that to-morrow I shall give notice that these rules which have been adopted shall be made Standing Orders of the Senate and that the Senate be summoned. The notice can be accepted now and the Senate assembled to-morrow.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

ANALYSIS OF FOODS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN inquired:

1. How many practical or analytical chemists are in the employ of the government ?
2. What are their names and their remunerations ?
3. How many and in what department are they employed in the examination of foods to test their purity ?
4. Are the examinations made by analysis at the places where they are sold or at Ottawa ?
5. Are there any other chemists than those on the government staff; give names of articles examined, the date of examination, the locality where sold ; how many were convicted, and what, if any, punishment inflicted ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—1. Three in the Department of Agriculture.

2. Frank T. Shutt, M.A., chemist, Central Experimental Farm, salary, $2,250 per annum; A. T. Charron, assistant chemist, $1,200 per annum; H. W. Charlton, second assistant chemist, $1,100 per annum.

3. In addition to analyses of soils received from farmers all over the Dominion, of ensilage, well waters, water from farm homesteads, creameries and cheese factories, these chemists have made analyses of a considerable number of milling products, meat meals and stock foods, which analyses now constitute an important branch of the work of these chemists, owing to the many new products and condimental foods being constantly put upon the market.

4. These analyses referred to are made at the Central Experimental Farm, Ottawa.

5. No others so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned.

In the Inland Revenue Department, Adulteration of Food Branch, there are employed six practical or analytical chemists attached to the laboratory at Ottawa, and five as district analysts at the places mentioned below.

The names and remuneration of each is as follows : At the laboratory at Ottawa, Thos. Macfarlane, chief analyst, $3,000; A. McGill,, assistant to chief analyst, $2,000; S. E. Wright, assistant analyst, $600; F Davidson, assistant analyst, $700; A. Lemoine, assistant analyst, $700; J. A. U. Valin, assistant analyst, $700. District analysts paid by fees : W. H. Ellis, Toronto, fees 1904-05, $780; J. T. McDonald, Montreal, fees 1904-05, $1,107.70; M. Bowman, Halifax, fees 1904-05, $573 ; J. C. Fagan, Victoria, B. C., fees 1904-05, $544 ; F. X. Valade, Ottawa, fees 1904-05, $400.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. The analysis is made principally at the laboratory in Ottawa, but certain classes of samples are examined by the district analysts.

5. This department employs no other chemists other than those mentioned in answer to question No. 2. The balance of the question cannot be answered unless some definite period is mentioned, and then only after a compilation of a statement which would require a considerable period of time to complete.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I desire to make a few remarks on this subject if I may be permitted to do so. I wish to take this matter up because I think matters of this kind, just as well as drugs and patent medicines, which were discussed here a few years ago, come especially within the purview of the Senate. The question can be discussed here calmly, and in a manner which will result to the benefit of the people. Hon. gentlemen will remember the agitation, as I may call it, which took place in this Senate with regard to patent medicines ; how it sounded the tocsin of alarm all over the country, and how the United States has taken the matter up. The result is that there is now a Bill before the House of Representatives in that country—I do not know whether it has become law yet or not—with regard to patent medicines, and to foods, and our own government has taken aging. It encourages me to trust that aging. It encouraees me to trust that some good will result from that hitherto useless Act called the 'Adulteration of food Act.' It is to my mind, almost entirely useless at present because a law in Canada, to be effective, must be enacted with the consent of the people. Where the Canadian people approve of a measure it can be thoroughly enforced ; where they do not approve, it would take too large an army to enforce the provisions of the law. I do not suppose, however, that I shall incur the same odium in this matter as I did in the first instance. I was very nearly being made a martyr of in that patent medicines affair. I was threatened with sundry and dire punishments if I did not make a written retraction at once. Those who were affected called on me and wanted to know why I had selected them for attack and they brought editors of newspapers with them, I suppose, to make what they had to say more emphatic. However, I was not made a martyr although I should like to have been, because you know, in Ireland, it is a great honour, and it would have been a great honour to me in this instance. I am sure the members of the Senate, so long as I would have been shut up in prison, would have sent me hampers of champagne and game and other delicacies and besides, I should have had the honour of being the foremost man in the Senate. Think of the greatness I was nearly having, but unfortunately, the matter was settled otherwise. However, I intend to go into this question thoroughly and with the aid of my confrères of the medical profession—I am simply acting as a spokesman of theirs and I am not detracting from the share which they have or which they may have in the martyrdom which may be in preparation. That is all I have to say at present, and that is the reason why I put the hon. Secretary of State to so much trouble. I am very grateful to him for what he has done, and will try to make the information, which he has given, of profit to the country.

BURNING OF THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY SHOPS AT MONCTON.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.) inquired:

1. Was there an investigation as to the cause of the fire and burning of the Intercolonial Railway shops at Moncton ?
2. What is the amount of estimated damages?

He said : Let me quote a despatch in the Ottawa 'Free Press,' just issued, from Moncton, which is as follows :

Moncton, March 22.—The 'Transcript' will state to-night that a fire, believed to be of incendiary origin, took place on Monday night in the Intercolonial Railway shops, and was discovered and extinguished before much damage was done. The fire was discovered in the tender shop, which was part of the works not destroyed by the first fire. A quantity of waste had been stuffed under the door in an obscure corner of the shop, and was evidently set on fire, as there were two distinct blazes. The surroundings were all wood and had the blaze been left a minute longer it would have been beyond control.

I think that fire ought to be investigated also.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—An investigation as to the cause of the fire in connection with the Intercolonial Railway shops at Moncton is being made under oath, and will occupy some time yet.

In regard to the second inquiry as to the amount of estimated damages, the total loss is also being inquired into, and the figures covering the damages may be available to quote in a few days.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired:

Whether an order in council has been passed declaring the Canada Temperance Act not in force in Prince county, Prince Edward Island, a majority of the electors of said county having on the first of February last voted in favour of a repeal of the said Act ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has not been passed yet, but I shall have an order prepared at once and put it in force. I held it, under the impression that the temperance people in Prince Edward Island desired to have the Act annulled in the three counties at the same time. I had a letter from the chairman of the Provincial Alliance in Prince Edward Island, Mr. Burke, I think a clergyman, asking me if I would hold back Queen's proclamation until the return from King's county came in, as the temperance people were desirous that the vote in these two cases should be taken on the same day. I answered him that if the delay was not too great I would, but as I have not received the petition from King's, I gave orders to-day to approve that regarding Queen's and Prince Albert shall be issued forthwith. The thirty days have expired.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am rather surprised to hear that the temperance people have made such a request.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I may be mistaken. I got the information from Mr. Burke's letter.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He is here now and the hon. gentleman may have seen him.

I am glad my hon. friend is taking action, because it is not a desirable state of affairs that a county like that should be without any law regulating the sale of liquors.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall have it promptly attended to.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved:

That the rules this day reported from the Committee of the Whole and adopted by the Senate, be made standing orders under rule 16 of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (A) An Act to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In addition to what I said yesterday as to the necessity for this legislation, I have a memo. from the Deputy Minister of Justice, in which he calls attention to the fact that the opinion of the Supreme Court was desired when those in favour of better Sabbath observance brought the subject up before the government. There was a considerable difference of opinion as to what the powers of the provincial legislature and the Dominion parliament were. I was quite clear that the Acts that were in force, at all events in Ontario, before confederation, especially the Act of 1845, were still in force in Ontario, but it was thought wise to get the opinion of the Supreme Court. That court answered that they did not consider that they had the power under the statute which organized the court. Mr. Newcombe's memo. is as follows :

The necessity for this amendment is occasioned by the views expressed during the argument and in the considered opinion of the Supreme Court in the case relating to Sunday legislation. Doubts were suggested as to whether the court was sufficiently a court of first instance to entitle it to hear a reference at all which did not come before it upon appeal.

It was said also that questions affecting proposed legislation are not within the scope of the present Act, and that the doctrine 'ejusdem generis' applies, and that in any case it was only questions upon actual legislation that could be considered. The majority of the court, while they answered some of the questions referred, did so notwithstanding the opinion which they expressed that they had no jurisdiction to do so, but they gave their answers consistently with the practice which has heretofore prevailed. In view of these doubts and opinions expressed by the court, and the uncertainty of the treatment any future reference might receive, it is thought advisable to amend the Act so as to remove as far as possible all doubts.

The change proposed to be effected by this amendment as to section 3 is the addition of the words 'as a general court of appeal for Canada, and as an additional court for the better administration of the laws of Canada.' These words are taken from section 101 of the British North America Act which authorizes the parliament of Canada to establish courts, and are, perhaps, the broadest words which parliament could use for conferring jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask what remedy or redress those interested, for instance, in a declaration which may be made by the Supreme Court on such a reference as is indicated it is the intention to include in the Act, would have in the event of, say, a difference of opinion as to that particular declaration? The object of the Supreme Court of Canada is to furnish the entire Dominion with an appellate court of the highest character. Of course it is the highest court to which we have access in the Dominion. It seems to me that if this Bill passed, and the Supreme Court of Canada is made a court of first instance, it robs the people of Canada of the original intention of the court. There is no other appeal court to which an appeal would lie upon a subject of this character, except the Privy Council, and it is only upon questions of very large interest that such an opinion will be sought as is intended by this Act, constitutional questions, questions of a very far reaching order, and if the public becomes precluded by the declaration of the court when the reference is made by the Dominion government, it seems to me that we wipe out at one fell swoop the object of the creation of the court and compel the public to have redress by bringing their cases to the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has misconceived the scope of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let me instance this case. The government makes a reference to the Supreme Court to have a declaration upon a statute. The reference is made and the parties interested are not before the court.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, they are.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I fully appreciate the fact that provision is made for the reference to be argued by those who may come in and ask the government to appear before the court; or the government, of its own motion, may appoint counsel to represent both sides of the case, but the public at that point may not be interested. The matter may not have received that consideration which would afterwards appeal to the public; consequently, the court, in the meantime having given this decision upon the question, cannot therefore act as an appellate court. Therefore, I say, that the very object of the court is defeated by the procedure which is now suggested.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the opinion of the government, and more particularly the Department of Justice, this amendment was considered essential. The British North America Act authorized it. It was not inserted in the Act when the court was first organized, and it was thought wise to carry out the full intent of the British North America Act under which the court was organized. It does not seem to me that the difficulty which my hon. friend has foreshadowed can possibly arise. The argument will take place just in the same way. It is only in a few constitutional cases that it will ever come up. It is not likely to arise in any others; those which are to come up are here specified—educational matters, for instance—under the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let me instance the case of the Manitoba School Act, where this government indicated to the province of Manitoba that a reference should be made to the Supreme Court of Canada and where that province refused to enter upon a reference. The matter, apparently, had not reached that stage of public interest at that particular time when the provincial government would be justified in appearing before the Supreme Court. That reference, of course, precluded the Supreme Court afterwards from acting as an appellate court in hearing the appeal from the court below.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Supreme Court did hear the case. The Manitoba School Act came up regularly on an appeal from the court below and the opinion of the provincial court was overruled.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is not the case I have been referring to.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is the first case; the hon. gentleman is speaking of the second case.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was practically not a case at all.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Suppose the question of jurisdiction is raised before a court in the province of Quebec or in the province of Ontario by one of the parties interested in a case, would the case be affected by this Bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It does not affect ordinary litigation between parties in the slightest degree.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—As I understand the Bill now before the committee, it does not change the law at all. It is not intended to change it. It is simply a matter of phraseology, to make matters more clear; and the question raised by the hon. gentleman from Calgary is settled, I think, by subsection 6 of section 4 of the Act of 1891, chapter 25, which I read yesterday. That was the last section to which I called attention. It is as follows:

> The opinion of the court upon any such reference, although advisory only, shall, for all purposes of appeal to Her Majesty in Council be treated as a final judgment of the said court between parties.

Therefore, we have it here that the opinion of the court is advisory only, for the guidance of the government, but it is open to any private party or to any province to carry the opinion of the court to the Privy Council, and the present Bill does not change in any way this provision which has been in the statute since 1891. But I understand that the hon. member is raising the question as to whether this should remain on the statute-book as it is. The matter being now before parliament, it would be open for the Senate to amend the present Bill and repeal this provision altogether, if that is thought desirable. I would, however, call the attention of this House to the fact that this reference which is made to the Supreme Court for the purpose of getting an advice intended to guide the government in its dealing with provincial legislation or Dominion legislation and decide as to whether an Act passed by the province, for instance, should be disallowed or not, or as to whether some action should be taken against that Act, does not debar any of the parties interested from bringing the question before the ordinary courts of the province. Although this opinion of the Supreme Court has been given, it remains open to any of the parties interested, to a province or to an individual, to question the validity of the Provincial Act, or the validity of the Dominion Act before the courts. It is true that the Supreme Court, having already expressed this opinion, might not be as open as it would otherwise to reconsider its decision; but we must suppose that, especially if the point has not been properly argued in the first instance, the court would be open to hear a new argument and to reconsider its decision. But in any case there is always the recourse to the Privy Council as a court of final resort in matters of that kind.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say that the opinion which he has expressed is diametrically opposed to what has been said by my hon. friend the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State has informed the House that the object of this Bill was to overcome the difficulty raised by the Supreme Court, that they had not the jurisdiction to hear a reference such as is contemplated by the Act, and that they had refused to hear such reference. As regards the court acting in an advisory capacity, my hon. friend is scarcely a judge of human nature if he fancies for one moment that the court, having made a declaratory judgment, or having given the advice sought by the government, will turn round and, after an argument, reverse the judgment which they may have given either by way of advice or of declaration. After making a declaration upon a constitutional question which may have been referred to them, no matter whether subsequently it may be known that they have erred, they certainly will adhere to the first declaration, and it will be impossible, short of going to the Privy Council, to have the judgment reversed.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not think that anything I have stated is in contradiction to what was said by the hon. Secretary of State. The hon. gentleman has properly explained that the reason for introducing this Bill is to make the law more clear in order that the Supreme Court may not refuse to act on a reference to it, as they have refused to do in certain instances. I have not stated anything to the contrary; in fact it is within my knowledge that the Supreme Court have refused to act when the Governor in Council thought they should have acted; and this Bill is intended to close the door to any further refusal of that kind. As far as the other remarks of the hon. gentleman are concerned, I am aware that a bias may be found, but we cannot avoid that, although we have for instance, in the Manitoba school question, a case in point.

It is perfectly well known that the Privy Council decided two cases, on two different occasions, and that at the last decision they practically overruled their previous decision; and a number of cases, both in the Privy Council and in the Supreme Court, can be found where the court, on further argument, have reversed their former decision. But I admit that it would, no doubt, be hard work to get a court to change its opinion in that way. That cannot be helped however. The only remedy will be to go to a higher court, carry the question to the Privy Council. This question arises every day in the course of our practice. We meet with cases in which the same point has been raised in another case, and it has been decided by the Supreme Court. We very often advise our clients to institute a new case for the purpose of carrying the matter to a higher tribunal—to the Privy Council—with the expectation of obtaining another ruling.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—If I was convinced that the object of the Bill is to extend the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, I would hesitate to vote for it, because I think that the Supreme Court has already too much jurisdiction, especially in civil matters. Every day we see that the decisions of the courts of the province of Quebec—decisions given sometimes by four, five, six or seven judges—are reversed by a tribunal composed of five or six higher judges, of whom there are only two who are familiar with our French laws. I think that is a great anomaly, but, as I am convinced that the object of the Bill is not to extend the jurisdiction of that court, but only to give clearer interpretation of the constitution, and, believing what has been stated, that the constitution in reality gives the Supreme Court the right to do what is proposed in this measure, I suppose I shall vote for it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the principal object of this Bill is to make clear what the law is. I do not think it proposes to change the law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It adds to it only.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Let us take first the second clause of the Bill. It repeals subsections one and two of section 4 of the Act of 1891, which are as follows :

1. Important questions of law or fact touching provincial legislation, or the appellate jurisdiction as to educational matters vested in the Governor in Council by the British North America Act, 1867, or by any other Act or a law, or touching the constitutionality of any legislation of the parliament of Canada, or touching any other matter with reference to which he sees fit to exercise this power, may be referred, by the Governor in Council, to the Supreme Court for hearing or consideration, and the court shall thereupon hear and consider the same.

The Bill before us does not alter the substance of that enactment, but it alters the phraseology somewhat. The Bill reads as follows :

37. Important questions of law or fact touching—

(a) the interpretation of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1886 ; or

(b) the constitutionality or interpretation of any Dominion or provincial legislation ; or

(c) the appellate jurisdiction as to educational matters, by the British North America Act, 1867, or by any other Act or law vested in the Governor in Council ; or

(d) the powers of the parliament of Canada or of the legislatures of the provinces, or of the respective governments thereof, whether or not the particular power in question has been or is proposed to be executed ; or

(e) any other matter, whether or not in the opinion of the court ejusdem generis with the foregoing enumerations, with reference to which the Governor in Council sees fit to submit any such question ;—

' may be referred by the Governor in Council to the Supreme Court for hearing and consideration——

And this is the point :

—and any question touching any of the matters aforesaid, so referred by the Governor in Council, shall be conclusively deemed to be an important question.'

So that the court is obliged to hear it. Then the second subsection of the 4th section of the Act of 1891 is as follows :

2. The court shall certify to the Governor in Council, for his information, its opinion on questions so referred, with the reasons therefor, which shall be given in like manner as in the case of a judgment upon an appeal to the said court ; and any judge who differs from the opinion of the majority shall, in like manner, certify his opinion and his reasons.

In the Bill before us the language is different:

2. When any such reference is made to the court it shall be the duty of the court to hear and consider it, and to answer each question so referred ; and the court shall certify to the Governor in Council, for his information, its opinion upon each such question, with the reasons for each such answer ; and such opinion shall be pronounced in like manner as in the case of a judgment upon an appeal to the said court ; and any judge who differs from the opinion of the majority shall in like manner certify his opinion and his reasons.

The court has, in the past, declined to answer these questions, but the first subclause in this clause before us makes it the duty of the court to answer the questions. The rest of the clause is simply for the purpose of providing that the court shall carry out what was the intention of parliament when it passed the former measure. The hon. gentleman from Calgary referred to the fact that things might be done, as it were, behind the backs of the provinces. By the third and following subsections of the fourth section of the Act of 1891 it is enacted:

In case any such question relates to the constitutional validity of any Act which has heretofore been or shall hereafter be passed by the legislature of any province, or of any provision in any such Act, or case, for any reason, the government of any province has any special interest in any such question, the Attorney General of such province, or in the case of the Northwest Territories, the Lieutenant Governor thereof, shall be notified of the hearing, in order that he may be heard if he thinks fit.

4. The court shall have power to direct that any person interested, or where there is a class of persons interested, any one or more persons as representatives of such class, shall be notified of the hearing upon any reference under this section, and such persons shall be entitled to be heard thereon.

5. The court may, in its discretion, request any counsel to argue the case as to any interest which is affected and as to which counsel does not appear, and the reasonable expenses thereby occasioned may be paid by the Minister of Finance and Receiver General out of any moneys appropriated by parliament for expenses of litigation.

6. The opinion of the court upon any such reference, although advisory only, shall, for all purposes of appeal to Her Majesty in Council, be treated as a final judgment of the said court between parties.

It will be seen that the only object of this is to make it clear that there shall be no mistake as to what parliament intended.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It seems to me that so important a measure as this one is, especially to the different provinces, should not be discussed until we have the Bill before us printed in French. I understand a little of the English language, enough to be able to discuss a measure of this kind in a general sense, but perhaps not enough to say what is the exact signification of the words used. I have asked for a copy of this Bill in French in order to ascertain its exact meaning, but I have not been able to obtain one. This is a very important matter to the province of Quebec, and we French members ought to be in a position to follow the discussion carefully and compare the expressions in the Bill with those contained in the existing law. In Quebec, difficulties often arise because of the fact that an expression which means one thing in English when translated may have a somewhat different force in French.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Do I understand that the Bill has been printed in French?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why has it not been distributed then?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I sent upstairs to the office of the Clerk of the Senate, and the reply I received was that they had not a copy in French.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have taken the trouble to inquire personally at the post office, and I find that the French copy was distributed the day before yesterday.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No one has it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot be responsible for these details.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I do not go so far as that, but I think we should not finally adopt the Bill until we have a copy in French. We might perhaps discuss it, but without finally adopting any clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We will postpone the third reading.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I have no objection to that, but I do not think we should dispose of the Bill in this way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not familiar with domestic arrangements in this Chamber, but the system is very lax. It often happens that Bills are not distributed. The day before I brought up the Bill, I inquired particularly whether it was in type in French and was assured it was, and that it would be distributed the following morning. I have no doubt it was distributed the following morning, but it does not seem to have been fairly and properly distributed, and somebody is to blame for it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I raised that question yesterday, and the hon. minister told me that the Bill had been distributed. He promised me it would be in the hands of members before we resumed this discussion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I sent a boy up stairs for copies, and he has brought some from the distribution office.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I sent a boy for copies, and he came back and reported that they had none.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Well, I do not employ the boys.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—We should have competent employees and they should understand the French language.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We can postpone the third reading until Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. COX, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that the Bill be read a third time on Tuesday. I name Tuesday, because I see nothing on the order paper for Monday, and I have been asked for an adjournment until Tuesday.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—No, no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Personally I see no objection to the adjournment because there will be no business before the House on Monday, and it will be a considerable convenience to some twenty or thirty members. There are particular reasons why some of them should be absent on Monday. On former occasions we used to adjourn over Monday for the convenience of those who could reach home and spend Sunday and Monday there.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What time would you suggest the House should meet on Tuesday ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The usual hour.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That would necessitate those members who live in the west, leaving home Monday in order to reach here in time for the opening of the House on Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no objection to the House meeting at eight o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not anticipate there will be much business on the order paper, but we are considering these rules and I am under the impression that they will occupy our time for a day or two. It will be a great pity to adopt the rules as reported without considering them. A number of them require a good deal of consideration, and some few amendments may be proposed. What I purpose doing myself is to ask the chairman, whoever he may be, to take up each rule by itself, so that it may be calmly considered. Otherwise they will be of very little use, and we shall, probably, have one rule conflicting with another. I am merely making this statement so that we can take plenty of time to consider them, particularly as the important business of the session, outside of the rules, will not be before us for some weeks.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The rules with regard to divorce were adopted by general consent. It was understood that they had been prepared by the committee itself. I quite concur with the hon. gentleman from Belleville that the rules should be thoroughly considered. We have Friday, Monday and Tuesday to consider them before the proposed adjournment on Wednesday, and the rules should be in operation when we meet after the recess. I trust, therefore, that the House will sit and consider these rules. I am perfectly willing, when we get fairly down to work, to give Monday to those who live in Montreal and Toronto, and I want to go away for Sunday; but, with a long adjournment before us, should we take two days and let the business of the country go ? I really think we ought not to do that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—While my sympathies are always enlisted for the Quebec and Ontario members who wish to go away on Friday and remain away Sunday and Monday, it cannot be considered that I am actuated by selfishness, living as I do a long distance from the capital, if I urge the necessity of finishing the business before us before the adjournment next week, so that those living a long distance from the capital may participate in some of the benefits of the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At present I think it would be possible for the House to adjourn next Wednesday or at latest Thursday. A supply Bill is expected to come up, and I asked the premier to put it through to-morrow or, at latest, Tuesday, so that we could dispose of it on Wednesday.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Allusion has been made to the representatives from Toronto and Montreal, as if we were in the same boat about wanting adjournments. So far as I know, those who come from Toronto are ready to meet here and work when there is work to be done. Ready to stay as long as may be necessary, and, as an earnest of that, I would suggest that instead of the House adjourning now, we remain and go on with the rules. Let us sit this evening, and to-morrow and Monday and finish them.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Then it seems to be understood we will have a night sitting ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think it would be a mistake if we had a small adjournment before the long one. I do not quite understand what is proposed to be done, but some hon. gentlemen have spoken as if we were to adjourn to-morrow afternoon until Tuesday evening. I do not think that is a reasonable thing to do. If we are going into these rules, let us give them very careful consideration. The matter is important. If we make mistakes in them they will not be easily corrected when the rules are printed in book form. We should not allow the desire of some hon. members to go home, to interfere with our giving the best possible consideration to those rules, and all the time necessary to make them as perfect as we know how. There are many intricate questions arising in connection with them, as members of the committee know well. I have no objection to adjourn until Monday at eight o'clock, but I do not think it is reasonable to adjourn until Tuesday afternoon, a small adjournment, just when we are going to have a general adjournment over the Easter holidays, a day or two later.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I think the House is seized with the importance of amending our rules. That fact was impressed on us very forcibly not only last session, but recently, and I agree with what has been said, that we must give all the consideration necessary to make our rules as perfect as possible so that they will stand the test of time and experience; and if it is possible the rules should be accepted by the House before we adjourn so that they will be in force after the adjournment. We should leave no stone unturned to accomplish that object, because the sooner we have the results of last year's work laid before this House the sooner will hon. gentlemen appreciate the many changes proposed to the advantage of the Senate. While there may be some discussion over all the rules, and difference of opinion over some, we should be able to complete our work in such a way as will redound to the credit of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In view of the expression of opinions that we have listened to, I withdraw the suggestions I have made.

The motion was agreed to.

THE RULES OF THE SENATE.

Consideration of report postponed.

The order of the day being called—

House again in committee of the whole to consider and report on the third report of the special committee appointed during last session to consider and revise, and if deemed necessary, to add to the rules, orders and forms of proceeding of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER said: It will be remembered that yesterday, when we proposed to take up these rules, objection was raised that they had not been distributed to all the members. As I understand, they were distributed last session, but a majority of hon. members, as a matter of course, and very naturally, did not keep them about their personal luggage, and they are not here. We had a promise from the Printing Bureau that these rules would be delivered to-day at three o'clock. They have not been distributed yet. I am prepared to take any course the House pleases, but I assume that, under the circumstances, it would not be courteous to the gentlemen who have not received copies of the rules that we should go on now. If that is the view of the House, I move that the order of the day be discharged, and that we go into committee on this report to-morrow, and that it be made the first order of the day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should like to inquire whether those copies of the rules have not been sent up from the Bureau? I would not be surprised to learn that they are here in this building.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE— I know one member who has not received a copy yet, the Hon. Mr. Montplaiser. He went to the post office to inquire for a copy and they had not been received.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand the hon. gentleman from Halifax to say that they will be ready for distribution to-morrow?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was assured they would be ready to-day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Are they in type?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I found that the tpye had not been distributed, and gave orders to have an extra force put on so that copies could be distributed here this afternoon. They told me they would have them here between three and four o'clock. The House of Commons is pressing its work in the Bureau, more particularly the Auditor General's Report. It may astonish gentlemen to know the volume of printing in connection with that report. Complaint was made to-day in the House of Commons of delay in distributing it. I am told by Mr. Dawson that the Auditor's Report weighs twenty-nine tons of paper. When I went down to the Bureau a couple of days ago I found that it occupied a good deal more space than this Chamber, and the Bureau had to stitch and bind those volumes while other things were going on. There are some sixteen million pages in that report.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We can all understand that, but if the type is in galley form all they had to do was to put it on a press and print it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr) has made a suggestion, which I take the liberty to submit to the House, with his permission, that we call it six o'clock now, and meet this evening at eight o'clock sharp and then take up these rules.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—Suppose we did receive those documents at eight o'clock, members ought to have at least a few hours to look over them. It would not be fair for those who have not seen the proposed changes yet to expect them to discuss them without having had an opportunity to study them. Therefore I think the matter had better be postponed until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I said before, I am only, in a sense, the mouthpiece of the House. I am quite ready to do what the House thinks best. With a view of passing these rules with as little unnecessary discussion as possible, probably the better way is to let the matter stand until to-morrow and then hon. gentlemen will have a chance to read the rules over before we meet. The discussion will then be more intelligent, and hon. gentlemen will not object to something which seems wrong, but which is provided for perhaps in a later rule. So I persist in my motion, that the order of the day be discharged and that it be made the first order for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It should be understood that we go on and have an evening session to-morrow. I am quite sure these rules will not be adopted for a month if we are to have only afternoon sessions.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is nothing to prevent the hon. gentleman objecting to an adjournment at six o'clock.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—My hon. friend from Toronto will be in a better position to judge after he sees what progress we make at our first sitting.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three p.m.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Friday, March 23, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATOR.

The Honourable George Riley, of Victoria, was introduced and took his seat.

RESTAURANT COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—With the leave of the House, I wish to move that the name of the Hon. Mr. Tessier be substituted for my name on the Restaurant Committee. The hon. gentleman takes more interest in the restaurant than I do now, and I know he will be the right man in the right place.

The motion was agreed to.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

The order of the day being called :

House again in Committee of the Whole to consider and report on the third report of the special committee appointed during last session to consider and revise, and if deemed necessary, to add to the rules, orders and forms of proceeding of the Senate.—Hon. Mr. Power.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Mr. POWER—As will be observed, several hon. gentlemen have left the House during the sitting this afternoon. One hon. gentleman spoke to me with respect to these rules and asked that no rule as to which there is a marked difference of opinion should be taken up until the sitting on Monday next. I was only too glad to be able to oblige the hon. gentleman in that way, and I assume that the committee will endorse what I have done.

On rule No. 3,

1. All existing rules and standing orders of the Senate are repealed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I ask that rule 3 be allowed to stand, because there may be some uncertainty about it.

On rule 4,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think confusion is likely to arise from the employment of the words 'principal motion. We deal with different kinds of motions which are defined, but there is no interpretation placed upon the words 'principal motion.' The phrase may possibly be confused with a substantive motion or some kindred motion. I would ask my hon. friend in what way is a distinction to be drawn between principal motions and others ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The principal motion is the original motion, the one which is moved in the first instance. These expressions 'substantive motion,' 'incidental questions,' 'subsidiary questions,' are used in our rules and in the books of practice with respect to the procedure in legislative bodies, and it is desirable to have some definition of these terms so that we shall know what we are talking about. With respect to incidental questions, they are such as arise out of other questions and are consequently to be decided before the questions which give rise to them.

'Of this nature are'—I am reading from Cushing—

'First questions of order, second motions for the reading of papers, &c., third for leave to withdraw a motion ; fourth for the suspension of a rule and fifth for an amendment to an amendment.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is that what is meant by principal question ? If so, why not adopt a phrase which would be self explanatory ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I find in the books of practice the expression used is principal question or principal motion. Subsidiary questions are secondary questions or motions, as has already been stated, and these relate to a principal motion, and are made use of to enable the assembly to dispose of it in the most appropriate manner.

The subsidiary or secondary motions in common use are the following : namely, to amend, to commit, for the previous question, to lie on the table, and for postponement.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Would it not be well to put in writing what is being read.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have given 'Cushing's' definition.

On the definition of two days' notice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What constitutes an entire sitting ? Why not say a sitting day ? Let us assume that we have two sittings—an afternoon sitting and an evening sitting, and a notice be given at the night session ; how about the next day ? Can a distinction be drawn as to the sitting ? Is not every sitting entire ? Can there be a partial sitting ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, we sometimes have two or three sittings in a day. It does not apply to that, but a real day must intervene. Suppose a notice is given on Tuesday, it cannot be taken up until Thursday ; Wednesday intervenes, which would be an entire day.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—If we have two sittings in one day, we cannot move at the second sitting. Unless there is unanimity in the Senate, notice cannot be given.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We, in the committee understood it to mean that there should be an absolute twenty-four hours intervening between the day the notice is given, and the day the matter should come up. Towards the close of the session, when there are two or three sittings in a day, those rules are suspended anyway ; but for the protection of the House, this must be understood, that it means twenty-four hours, which intervene before the day on which the House again sits.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not seem to me to bear that construction, not if I understand the rule, 'two days' notice' a notice where an entire sitting day intervenes, &c. If a motion be made that the House sit three times the same day, say from eleven until one ; from two until six ; and from eight until it adjourns—three distinct sittings ; would not that be interpreted to mean three distinct sitting days ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend says no. I think not. What constitutes an entire sittings ? It certainly means from the time the House opens until it adjourns. The chairman makes the suggestion that it would exclude Saturday, which is not a sitting day, as a rule. Supposing we meet on Saturday, what would be the effect of it ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Saturday would then be a sitting day.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is the distinction between a sitting day and 'an entire' sitting day ? There surely is no distinction. The word entire is only going to lead to confusion. An entire sitting day cannot be more than a sitting day.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It may be a day, and not a sitting day. There is a distinction between a sitting day and a non-sitting day.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What constitutes an entire sitting day ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The real point we have to consider is the one which comes from the chairman, is Saturday to be considered as a day intervening ? I do not think that is what any of us meant.

These Australian rules have been constructed almost wholesale. They have not been brought into existence like the rules of many other parliaments that have grown through years of practice and experience, so that it would be unsafe to adopt them without careful consideration. This rule is one we took from the Australian rules, and I think none of us intended that a day from the day on which the House adjourned should not be a day that should suffice as a day intervening—Saturday or any other day the House was not sitting—and I think we should hold this rule over until we can think it over a little better.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Of course, if it is the desire of the committee to hold the rule over, I have no objection ; but the hon. gentleman is in error in supposing that this rule is borrowed from Australia. This particular definition is one which the committee framed themselves for the purpose of meeting a difficulty which very often arises. Hon. gentlemen will remember that in the existing rule, No. 13, I think it is, there is a reference made to an intermediate day.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentlemen does not appreciate the point I made.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do, but I am answering the objection of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield. This is intended to meet a difficulty which we have in the past experienced ; and the object of the committee was to make it clear that there should be a complete day intervening between the day on which the notice was given and the day on which action is to be taken under the notice. There was no difference of opinion in the committee ; but if hon. gentlemen think that two days' notice should mean something less, of course it is for the committee to decide. With respect to what the hon. gentleman from Calgary says, I think that probably he is right, but the hon. gentleman is not as a rule given to microscopic criticism, and even if the word entire be not necessary it does no harm. It does this, however, it emphasizes the intention of the House that there shall be a complete day intervening. It just shows what the drift of the feeling of the House was. I admit that, as a matter of strict interpretation, the meaning, if you strike out the word 'entire' would be practically the same.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The House might sit until one o'clock in the morning, and that day on which the House adjourned would not be considered an entire day if this word 'entire' is left in.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My view in making the remark about the Australian rules was this—and a new rule made by ourselves would stand in the same category—the old rules have stood the test of time and experience, and we are tolerably familiar with the general scope of them ; but when we frame new rules ourselves, or adopt the Australian rules, framed at the inauguration of the commonwealth, we have not the same guarantee that we have of rules founded on British practice, or rules that we have been working under ourselves, and on that account it would be wise to look carefully at all the new rules, including those we take from the Australian Commonwealth. I know that the chairman of the committee has given a great deal of care and attention to this question and deserves credit for what he has done, but no matter how careful a man is, when new work of this kind is undertaken, it is only by the experience of time, that we can tell where we may find a defect. Although I did not discover it at all in the committee, I really think that this clause requires some further thought in order to make it perfect or nearly so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The meaning is perfectly clear I think.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As it stands now, I do not think a day on which the House adjourns would be considered an intervening day, and I think it ought to be.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILE—The hon. senator from Toronto has remarked that if you give a notice on Friday there will be no intervening sitting day. The matter could not be taken up until the following Tuesday—is that the meaning ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It was not with a view of being microscopically critical that I raised the point. The reason I raised it was this ; if you speak of an entire sitting day, then you impliedly say that there is a degree which might be termed a sitting day. You might as well speak of a whole twenty-four hours, as to say an entire sitting day. There cannot be degrees of a sitting day, and it is the inference which might be drawn that there is a less degree of a sitting day than an 'entire' sitting day that I want to avoid, because it might lead at some future time to doubt.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then I move to strike out the word 'entire'.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—At page 317 of Bourinot, you will find under the heading of 'two sittings on one day'.

> If it is intended to meet earlier next day, a formal motion should be made previous to the adjournment of the House as in the case of holidays or church festivals. Sometimes the House has two or three sittings on the same day. In such cases each sitting is considered a full parliamentary day.

Now, under this rule, the view I took of it first would be the correct one, that is, that each sitting would be an entire parliamentary day, because Bourinot says :

> In such cases each sitting is considered a full parliamentary day and Bills of Supply can be advanced stages without objection.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—As I understand it, the idea of requiring two days notice, means that it should be a more ample notice than an ordinary notice, and therefore, while that is quite right in the book, it seems to me the object is to provide that time should be given to deal with these particular matters, and that time should be one intermediate day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no doubt that is the intention, but the discussion arose as to what constituted an entire sitting day.

Bourinot says that if you sit three times in one day each sitting is an entire parliamentary day.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

On the paragraph,

> One day's notice—a notice given on any sitting day for a motion or inquiry should be made on the next succeeding sitting day.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I would suggest to leave out the word 'sitting', it might delay the work of the House towards the close of the session.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the change is necessary, because under the practice which we have pursued, and which is set forth in the passage from Bourinot read by the hon. member from Belleville, when the minister moves that there be more than one sitting in one day, the resolution provides, that each sitting shall be deemed a separate day's sitting. On the other hand, if the suggestion made by the hon. member from Toronto were carried out, and you were to strike out the word 'day', we would have hon. gentlemen contending that when the House met at three o'clock, rose for recess at six, and then met again at eight o'clock, the second sitting was a different sitting from the first; and I do not see any object at all in striking out the word 'day'. The meaning is perfectly clear, and while it may be desirable that any imperfection should be removed, still I do not see that you attain any good by striking out the word 'day'.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It seems to me the very argument that has been presented shows that the point has been well taken with reference to the use of the word 'day' here. In other words, according to the interpretation put upon the words 'separate sitting', it is quite plain that it is not the expression which is used in this rule. It is not a sitting day, but a day's sitting that it is equivalent to. Therefore you will get into the very trouble I have been pointing out by adopting that form.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It seems to me that we ought to have a definition of the words 'sitting day'. The words from Bourinot, read by the hon. senator from Belleville, carry the meaning distinctly, that each of these sittings that we are liable to have towards the end of a session is one parliamentary day. We should put it of record here so that there will be no doubt about it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have expressed my concurrence in that view.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Would it not be better to put a definition of it in the rules ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think so.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 8. No meeting for want of quorum.

8. If, thirty minutes after the time of meeting, fifteen senators, including the Speaker, are not present, the Speaker takes the Chair and adjourns the Senate until the next sitting day, the names of the senators present being taken down by the clerk.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It strikes me that this clause might be amended. It declares that the Speaker takes the Chair and adjourns the Senate when the Senate is really not in session. I would suggest the following instead :

If, thirty minutes after the time of meeting, fifteen senators, including the Speaker, are not present the Speaker takes the Chair and announces the adjournment of the Senate is continued until the next sitting day, the names of the senators present being taken down by the clerk.

Is it not somewhat incongruous to say that the Speaker adjourns the Senate, when the Senate is not in session and cannot be in session for want of a quorum ?

The SPEAKER—Would not that make it mean that there has been no sitting ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the fact.

The SPEAKER—Under the present rule, there is a sitting and the names of the senators being taken down is merely for the purpose of registering the fact that there was no quorum, and that the Senate was adjourned until the next day. I quite see that the hon. gentleman from Belleville means that, by implication, there could be no sitting where there is no quorum.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I say distinctly there is no sitting. There not being a quorum, there cannot be a sitting, yet you announce the adjournment of the Senate. I think it would be much better that the announcement should be that 'the adjournment is continued.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That pre-supposes the Senate doing business, when they continue the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The moment the Speaker takes the Chair the House is sitting, and the sitting continues up to the time that it is discovered that there is not a quorum in the House. For instance to-day we have a sitting, and yet there may come a stage in the proceedings where there may be no quorum. When the Speaker calls attention to it, then and there the sitting ceases. The rules provide for that, but the point is that the members who are present with the Speaker in the Chair are entitled to call it a day sitting up to the time that it is announced that there is no quorum.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I sympathize with the view of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, that where our rules have worked well and no question has arisen with regard to them, it is not desirable to alter them. There is a sitting of the House for the purposes of adjournment, if for nothing else ; and the course suggested by the leader of the opposition might lead to difficulty. To what time is the House adjourned ? The Senate having been adjourned say until Monday afternoon at three o'clock, if there is less than a quorum present at that time, to what time is the House adjourned ? It is the old adjournment ; it is not a new one. I would call attention to the fact that in the House of Commons they have just the same procedure. In Australia they have the same rule also. As no difficulty has ever arisen in connection with this matter, it would, in my opinion, be venturing into unknown waters to make a change.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. gentleman overlooks the first rule when he takes that position. If the Speaker announces that the adjournment is continued, the rule says that we shall meet every day at three o'clock,and, therefore, the continuation would be simply until the following day at that hour.

The SPEAKER—I differ from the hon. gentleman. I think it should count for a sitting, and the hon. gentleman thinks not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand now, that, as it is to be counted as a sitting, members are to be entitled to a day's pay.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 16. Power and duty of Speaker.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is understood if there is any objection the rule must stand over.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I may say that on the point involved in this rule the committee were unanimous; however the matter must stand over if the hon. gentleman objects.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This rule is an entire departure from the rules of the House of Lords in England. In England the Speaker has no authority, and the desire of the committee was that our Speaker should be given authority. I believe it is objected by some senators that we should not depart from the British practice. That is, I take it for granted, the reason why the hon. gentleman asks that the matter be allowed to stand.

The rule was allowed to stand.

On rule 19. Order of business.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—What is the meaning of the word 'inquiries' being inserted after 'Notices of inquiries and of motions'?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Supposing the hon. gentleman wishes to ask a question from the government about some matter not before the House. He gives notice to-day, and it is entered on the minutes of to-day, along with notices of other inquiries and motions, and then, to-morrow, when he is to make his inquiry, the inquiries come before the motions. That is the practice in England and it is a reasonable practice that questions should be answered before motions are made.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 20. Unfinished business.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—This rule appears to be all right, but I would call attention to rule 73 which it strikes me varies No. 20 somewhat. No. 73 reads as follows:

> 73. Notwithstanding anything in rule 20, orders of the day for the third reading of Bills take precedence of all others, except orders to which the Senate may have previously given priority.

Would it not be well to make No. 20 a complete rule, so that we would not have No. 73 overriding it? I think if 73 provided in the latter part of it 'any order of the day which at the adjournment is under consideration shall stand first in the orders of the following day.' We say this in rule 20, but we say in rule 73, 'notwithstanding that, that the third readings come first'; why not make it clear by inserting in rule 20 that third readings come before an order of the day which at the adjournment was under consideration. Then you have rule 73 in line with rule 20.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I think we should not discuss rule 73 until we come to it. We can examine it in its order.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Under ordinary circumstances I think my hon. friend is right, but it might be well to amend rule 20 while we are considering it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Rule 73 is carrying out the practice of the House now, that third readings shall take precedence. Rule 20 makes the orders of the day come first; but 73 sets that aside so far as third readings are concerned. It seems to me to be all right as it is.

The SPEAKER—I think the hon. gentleman from Killarney is right. Rule 20 provides that an order of the day, which, at the adjournment is under consideration, shall stand first on the orders of the following day. That is not true, because rule 73 declares that third readings shall come first. Why not say so then under rule 20.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—The difficulty would be met if these words were inserted in rule 20 after the words 'the following day', 'next after readings'. Then strike out rule 73 altogether.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I quite recognize the force of what has been said by the hon.

gentleman, but it will be observed that there is no change made in our rule in this respect. The present rule 12 is substantially rule 20, and the present rule 44 is the new rule 73. We have never had the slightest difficulty in working under these two rules, and I doubt the wisdom of making a change. I do suggest, however, that the following words be inserted in rule 20: 'Except as provided in rule 73'.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—Why continue rule 73 if the insertion of the words would make the intent more obvious?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think it will make it clearer, but in order to prevent misapprehension I think the words 'except as provided in rule 73,' should be inserted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is this advantage in retaining the two rules. Rule 73 is included in a bunch of rules dealing with public Bills, and it might be misleading if it were removed. I think it would be better to keep the old rule 44 as rule 73 because 73 makes it very clear wherein it overrides rule 20.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I ask the committee to let it stand, and I shall draft an amendment to meet the views of the hon. gentleman from Killarney, without striking out rule 73.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It will be seen that 73 goes beyond giving priority to third readings, because it says:

> Orders of the day for the third reading of Bills take precedence of all others, except orders to which the Senate may have previously given priority.

——So that it deals with other matters besides third readings.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I think we should not adopt the principle of taking up a clause which is far beyond the one under discussion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the one clause conflicts with the other, they must both be considered at once.

The rule was allowed to stand.

On the 21st rule. Notice of motion; how given.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A difficulty might arise under the exceptions to this rule. This rule does not apply to motions with respect to Bills or reports of committees. Was it intended by the committee that this rule should apply to all committees, no matter of what character.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I take it, there is no necessity for reading this formal notice in the House where you are dealing with a report of a committee, no matter what kind of a committee. The chairman of a committee hands his report in, and the House receives or does not receive it, and he moves that the report be taken into consideration two days later, or at whatever time he selects; but it has never been the practice to give a written notice, to be read at the table, that the report is to be taken into consideration then. It is the duty of the officers at the table to make a note of what the chairman moves.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not discuss that question at all; I simply asked whether this rule is to apply to all committees or to standing committees only?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was intended to apply to all committees.

The rule was adopted.

On the 23rd rule. Two days' notice of certain motions.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This carries out the idea that I attempted to convey, that rule 21 applies only to standing committees. Is there any difference between a special committee and a select committee?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, a select committee is every other committee except a committee of the whole. It is made of members chosen or selected out of the body of the Senate. These select committees are either standing or special committees. That is the difference.

The rule was adopted.

On the 24th rule. One day's notice of certain motions.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It strikes me as you go further on in the rules you find that there is conflict between this and other rules.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I move to insert after the words 'for the appointment of a standing committee', the following as the seventh subclause—'For an instruction to a committee'. That is something which we overlooked. There should be a day's notice given of that.

The amendment was agreed to, and the rule as amended was adopted.

On the 25th rule. Motions for which no notice is required.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would ask the chairman if this does not conflict with other rules? Look at rule 24 ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Rule 14 refers to the usual adjournment from Friday until Monday, and rule 24 says that any member may move the adjournment of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That adjournment during debate is dealt with later in the rules. In this rule 25, in order to remove doubt, a paragraph should be put in towards the close of the rule. No notice is required by a minister for the immediate presentation of papers, and none is required for the ordinary adjournment of the Senate at the close of the business for the the day, but the ministers being in charge of the business of the House should always be in a position to move the adjournment of the Senate. That is the rule in Australia. Rule 59 of the Senate of the Commonwealth says that the adjournment of the Senate may be moved at any time, by or on behalf of a minister of the Crown. While it might be held that there would be no difficulty perhaps it would be wiser to make it clear, and if there is no objection I shall move an amendment to that effect.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I do not see the necessity of it. The government has a majority in this House, and we have no trouble. The ministerial side is always strong enough to have an adjournment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is the rule everywhere. It is the rule here now, but we have been specifying certain motions which require notice, and certain others which do not, and in order to remove a doubt which might be created as to whether a minister had the right, which he undoubtedly has now, I suggest the insertion of that rule.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I thought the hon. gentleman meant that nobody but a minister should have the right to move an adjournment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, I did not dream of anything like that.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Then what necessity is there for such a provision?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The ninth paragraph of the 24th rule declares that for an adjournment of the Senate you must give a day's notice. Rule 45 gives the right to the Crown to move an adjournment at any time. Now, there is a direct conflict between the two. Can you carry out the provisions of rule 49 without suspending rule 24 ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—There may be some more happy way of putting it, but what is intended in rule 24 is this: if an hon. gentleman as the hon. member from de Lanaudière did a day or two ago, give notice that on a certain day he will move that the House adjourn until some other time, than that fixed by rule, he must give at least a day's notice. At the close of the sitting or during the sitting, the minister may move an adjournment without notice. With respect to the other matter which the hon. gentleman has referred to, that is dealt with by two separate rules, as to one of which the hon. gentleman from Marshfield has given notice of amendment. I do not think any doubt can arise about it, if it is a motion for an adjournment, made during debate, for the purpose of discussing some matter of public interest. What is referred to in rule 24, is the notice I have spoken of, that the House shall adjourn for some specified time other than that fixed by rule.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Rule 50 also refers to adjournment. It provides that, 'when a question is under discussion, no motion is received unless to amend or for the adjournment of the Senate.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Rule 25 is all right, but it will be affected by rule 45. By the common law of parliament a motion to adjourn is always in order, but now we are reducing it to rule. I approve of this rule, but not of rule 45. However, we can discuss that when we come to it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My suggestion is necessary here in order to remove a doubt under this paragraph with respect to a motion by or on behalf of the minister for the adjournment of the House at any time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is, only a minister could move the adjournment of the House. That is a subject on which there will be great difference of opinion. If an amendment is proposed we will require to have it laid over to give time to discuss it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not an adjournment for the purpose of discussing a matter of public interest or importance. It secures the minister a right he has now to move the adjournment of the Senate for the purpose of closing a sitting. The point is this; the right which the minister has, under the common law of parliament, might be brought in question by the fact that it is not mentioned in the rule where we undertake to specify what can be done without notice.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—What the hon. gentleman means is to empower the minister to move the adjournment of the House after the close of the business of the day, whether that be at six o'clock or five o'clock.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, because the ordinary adjournment of the House at the close of the business of the day is provided for.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think the Senate would ever consent to confine the right of moving an adjournment to the ministers.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The amendment proposed by the hon. member from Halifax would limit the right of moving an adjournment to the minister. That will never do. We had better leave it, without any rule at all, under the common law of parliament. Otherwise we must leave it discretionary with the House as to how it shall be adjourned. Suppose a case were to arise of this kind, as has happened—that a member of the government should move the adjournment of the House and the opposition would be able to defeat it and thereby show that the government had lost control of the House. With this proposed rule in operation the minister might lie back and say 'you can do as you like,' and it would not be competent for any other person to move an adjournment. I think we had better leave it under the common law of parliament, or let the motion stand as it is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not press the suggestion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Under rule 1, we have decided in all cases not provided for to be governed by the rules and usages of the imperial parliament.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have not moved the amendment and I do not press it.

The rule was adopted.

On the 26th rule. Objectionable notice disallowed by Speaker.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Would it not be well to provide here that irregular petitions should be dealt with by the Speaker, as in the House of Commons ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—We are dealing now with notices of motion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We all approve of the principle, but in what period of time is the senator allowed to amend and who is to call the attention of the Speaker to the objectionable character of the notice ? Any senator may rise in his place and read a motion, and scarcely any one is paying attention to it; it is not handed to the Speaker to decide whether it contains anything offensive or not. You must impose on the clerk or the Speaker the duty, as soon as he perceives that the motion contains offensive language, of dealing with it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is not to appear on the notice paper.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But how is the Speaker to know that the motion is objectionable, until his attention is called to it ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is the duty of the clerk.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A senator rises and reads a motion. It may be read in such a manner that scarcely any one hears it. It is then handed to the clerk—the Speaker knows nothing of the wording of it. His attention must be called to it by some person, and then, I take it, the Speaker's duty would be to call the attention of the senator to the objectionable portion of the motion. After that has been done, if the senator refuses to amend the motion, the Speaker would then give orders to the clerk not to receive it. It should be some one's duty, after the motion comes to the table. to read it and ascertain whether it contains objectionable language, and, if so to call the attention of the Speaker to it. I would suggest something like this: 'If not amended by the senator giving the same, after his attention has been drawn to it by the Speaker'. Then, if he refuses to amend it, the Speaker gives positive orders that it be not received.

The SPEAKER—There is no special objection to that addition, but I think it is fairly implied, because the senator could not comply with a request of that kind unless it is brought home to him.

As the rule reads now, it does not state that the clerk will have to draw the attention of the Speaker to the matter. The whole responsibility rests with the Speaker, and it will be for him to say that either the clerk or some other official shall examine the notices before they appear on the order paper.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I quite agree that it might be implied, but why not make it plain ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Make it the duty of the clerk.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—When a senator gives a notice of motion, and the Speaker objects to it on account of any expression it may contain, I think the Speaker ought to write to the senator and say to him, 'I forbid the insertion of this notice on account of something which is not regular,' mentioning what that is. Otherwise, the Speaker, of his own will, might declare that this notice of motion could not be put on the order paper, and the senator would have no notice of the fact. The Speaker should write to the member who gave the notice, and inform him of the grounds upon which it is excluded.

The SPEAKER—This rule is not as stringent as is understood by the hon. gentleman, because there is this proviso 'If not amended by the senator giving the same' which implies that his attention must be drawn to the irregularity, and if he persists in maintaining his expression, then, and only then, can the Speaker act.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—He must be notified by the Speaker, and I think it should be in writing. If that is understood I would have no objection to the rule.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it would be too much to require that a letter should be sent by the Speaker to an hon. gentleman in every such case. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to suggest that ?

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Yes, the Speaker ought to write a letter, because otherwise, the senator might not have had notice of what had been done.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It would naturally be the duty of the clerk of the House to call the Speaker's attention to the fact that there was something improper in the notice of motion, and then the clerk might ask the member to modify his motion. The rule, as originally drafted, was to the effect that any notice containing unbecoming expressions, or which offends against any rule or order of the Senate, is amended by the Speaker before it appears on the notice paper. That is the Australian rule. When the committee came to discuss this matter, they thought that perhaps that was putting too onerous a duty on the Speaker, and one which might bring him into collision with the members of the House, and they altered it so as to give the senator who had given the notice the opportunity of amending it himself, and then, if he declined to amend it, the Speaker, would not allow it to appear on the notice paper.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I ask that this rule be allowed to stand over.

On rule 30. Notice of suspension of rule.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there any rule providing that all motions must be reduced to writing ?

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—With regard to the latter part of rule 30, it might happen, during the afternoon session for example, say at 5.30 o'clock, there would be a very small number of senators present, still that small number might be sufficient to suspend the rules and do something which would otherwise not be in accordance with the wishes of the House. I think there should be some provision that the members should be called in before suspending the rules.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This rule has been in operation for 39 years, and no complaint has been made.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think there is a provision in the rules that all motions which are placed on the notice paper for consideration at a future time must be in writing; but there is no rule, if I remember correctly, providing for the reduction to writing of a motion which a senator may desire to make. If there is such a provision, I have overlooked it. If there is not, I think there should be; otherwise the Speaker is put to the trouble, when putting the motion, of interpreting what the senator may mean.

The CHAIRMAN (Hon. Mr. Ellis)—That might be added to rule 27.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it would lead to endless trouble, because then the simplest motion to adjourn would have to be in writing. The practice has been that it must be reduced to writing if any senator insists.

The SPEAKER—The Speaker has the right to ask for it in writing before putting it. His memory may not be able to retain the exact wording.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am quite aware what the practice has been, and I am also aware of the right which the Speaker has exercised in the past, but it would be well to make a distinct provision to cover the case.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a matter of fact the great majority of our motions are not reduced to writing but any member can insist upon it; there is no question about that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where is the rule for that?

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is not a rule to that effect, and it is better so, because it would be very inconvenient if any one wished to move, for instance, the adjournment of the House to be obliged to reduce the motion to writing.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is certainly an omission in rule 21, which we have passed over, because the second part of 21 rather presupposes that the earlier part of the rule dealt with motions as well as notices of motion. It proceeds to make the exception that the rule does not apply to motions with respect to Bills, or to certain other motions which are specified. The word 'motions' should certainly appear in the earlier part of rule 21, then the exception in the latter part of that rule fully provides for the case now in point. I think the word 'motions' must have been omitted by mistake.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Rule 21 deals with notices of motion.

The SPEAKER—It would come in under rule 27.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why make the exception in the latter part of the rule then?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Written notices are not required with regard to the motions mentioned in the latter part of the rule, because, as the hon. gentleman must see, it would cause inconvenience. When a Bill, for instance, has been read a second time, or is reported from a committee, the senator in charge says, 'I move that this Bill be read a third time to-morrow.' That need not be in writing.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 32. Certain motions may be reconsidered.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Is there not some conflict between rules 32 and 35? I do not think it is a very good principle to pass a thing one day and back set it to-morrow. I opposed rule 32 in the committee and I oppose it yet.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have any abuses arisen owing to inability to reconsider a motion?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, for instance something is done, perhaps a snap decision of the House is given, when the House is very thin, on some important matter.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Suppose we take the converse of that where, by a snap resolution, you may reconsider something which has been thoroughly discussed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That cannot happen, because the reconsideration can only take place when the notice is given on the day when the resolution passes. Those who were present then are notified that an attempt will be made to reconsider that decision at the next meeting of the House, and I think it is a very important thing in the interests of good government. Rule 35 relates to a different thing, it provides for rescinding something which has been finally passed.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If I move, for instance, that some motion should be reconsidered, the effect of my motion may be that the majority may rescind something that was done the day before. Now, under rule 35, if the House is going to carry my motion to rescind, I must give seven days notice.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 33. Motion to reconsider, when made.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How is this to be reconciled with rule 35 ? I see no difference between reconsidering and rescinding.

The SPEAKER—If the reconsideration reverses, it also rescinds.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Certainly. Supposing the vote for reconsideration carries, it operates at once as a rescission of what was done the preceding day.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the case of reconsideration at the time that the vote is taken, some hon. member rises and gives notice that he will move that this vote be reconsidered. It does not apply to votes respecting stages of Bills, but to anything else. Every one has noticed then that there will be an attempt made to reconsider. The notice of reconsideration appears on the notice paper and then, when the matter comes up, a different decision is arrived at. Practically the matter had not been finally dealt with. In the other case, in the case of rescinding, the matter has been finally dealt with and a longer notice is required, and very properly so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I may be somewhat dense, but I see no difference in the result. If a motion is carried to-day and you move for its reconsideration to-morrow, and you reconsider and reverse the decision of to-day, that is a rescission of the motion, and, consequently, the result under rule 32 and rule 35 is precisely the same. The effect is the same, you may call it what you like.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The action of the House in reconsidering might not be to reverse its previous decision altogether, but only in part. Rescinding would be to block the whole thing out, to obliterate it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—In either case it would be upsetting the judgment of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not necessarily.

The SPEAKER—What harm would it do, because under the first procedure the matter is, so to speak, in suspense for another 24 hours by the notice already given under the assumption on the part of the senator moving, that it has been a surprise vote, or that a majority of the Senate duly and more solemnly consulted will vote otherwise. Now, the other procedure, under rule 35, is one which we shall discuss in a moment which calls for seven days' notice where there will be absolutely no possibility of a surprise.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED. Under these circumstances, you do not rescind, you reconsider. The result is the same. Then it is immaterial, when the result is the same, whether you consider it a rescission or reconsideration. As far as the degree of reconsideration is concerned, I do not see how we can take that into account, because the reconsideration may result in rescinding what we have done.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Reconsideration does not at all imply rescinding. The object may be to reconsider some particular point, without at all affecting the whole Bill. It is very proper to reconsider a Bill on some minute detail which might be overlooked in the first place.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—We provide by our rules, if they are strictly applied, that this House cannot be surprised. There is only one way in which the House may be surprised, that is by an amendment moved without notice. We are supposed to be a deliberate body, and it looks strange to me that our minds may be upset to-day after we have pronounced a serious judgment on any question. I do not like the idea that we are going to stamp on our rules and orders that we are clearly of opinion that our after-thought is a long way better than our fore-thought. I opposed this strongly in the committee, and I oppose it to-day. I am consistent in that respect. In the past we have had no occasion for a rule of this kind, unless it was a matter to which the House had given unanimous consent. With regard to what may happen when there is a thin House, it is the duty of the senators to attend to their business, and we should give no consideration to absentees. I am opposed to the principle in rule 32; I believe it conflicts with rule 35.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The principle involved in this rule, and in all rules of the kind that I have seen in other bodies, is that only those who desire to change their votes upon a question can ask for a reconsideration.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is the American practice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is the British practice, too. If it is not restricted in that way, you might have any person rising at any moment and giving notice of reconsideration for the purpose of having a debate. That is objectionable. It should be confined to those who wish to change their votes.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The affect of it would be practically to duplicate a debate on any controversial question decided against the wishes of the minority. My hon. friend from Shediac (Hon. Mr. Poirier) pointed out that reconsideration might not mean rescission, but once a question is considered and settled, reconsideration might lead to rescission. Then some person might say: 'Inasmuch as you have gone so far, you come now under rule 35 which enables a senator to bring up the question again on seven days' notice.' I do not know where our business will finish if we work it under such rules. It opens up the possibility of resurrecting questions already decided by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Reconsideration would be desirable in case a thin House passes an important resolution and a senator without wishing to change his vote, but wishing to appeal from a smaller to a larger House, asks for a reconsideration without necessarily having in mind a rescission, but desiring to improve or remodel some special point in a Bill.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—But would you not then rescind some of it if you amend it at all?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Necessarily some part, but rescinding would mean the blotting out of the whole thing. You remember the case when an appeal was made from Philip drunk to Philip sober; what I want is to provide for an appeal from a thin House to a fuller House, so as to have the sense of an absolute majority of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I should like the hon. gentleman to define the line between a thin House and a fuller House.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—It is getting a clear illustration at this moment.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The hon. gentleman from Calgary spoke of a catch vote. A vote might be taken to-day, adverse to a certain principle. To-morrow the members being in their places, and knowing that that question was to come up again, should have an opportunity of casting their votes again if they thought proper. It is said that it is the duty of members to be present always so as to be ready to attend to the business of the House. That is all very well in theory, but not in practice; therefore I contend that this rule is a proper one. If, by a catch vote, we, to-day, should be in the minority, is it not right and proper that notice may be given of reconsideration so that every one may have an opportunity to record an intelligent vote. It would be a mistake not to allow this clause to pass.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I rather resent the idea of the hon. gentleman from St. Thomas that senators give two classes of votes, one an intelligent vote and the other a catch vote, and that the catch vote is supposed to be given first.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Which would be the catch vote, the one taken first or the one taken after twenty-four hours consideration.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—All our votes are supposed to be intelligent.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then the hon. gentleman takes the ground that Adam never sinned.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I was not conversant with Adam's troubles, except from what I have read in sacred history. We are not to assume for a moment that any vote is given here without fair consideration, or without due notice. Our rules provide for giving notice so that we shall not be taken by surprise. I object to opening the door to rehashing any business on which the House may have given its decision after debate. There may be time when a reconsideration would be reasonable, but, whenever an occasion of that kind arises, I am sure the majority of the Senate will consent to suspend the rules. I fear the opening of a door to duplicating our discussions, which would not redound to the credit of the Senate and which any one can invoke if he desires to do so.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Why should not a member have an opportunity for discussion if he has anything to say. New light may come to one in twenty-four hours. If you want to stifle free discussion you strike at the principle on which this House is based.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—You might have the same thing occurring every twenty-four hours.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman from Killarney were to push his views to the logical limit, he would put an end to our having three readings of a Bill or a discussion of it in committee. What is the object of the three readings? To give the members of this House time to know just what they are doing, and for the sober sense of the House being taken on the measure. This rule 32 does not apply to Bills, because the existing rules provide that there shall be a chance for reconsideration.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman contends that, if my ideas were to prevail. Bills should not receive three readings, and in the next breath he says this rule does not apply to Bills at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This rule that we are dealing with does not apply to Bills, because the existing rules of the House provide that Bills shall not be passed without due consideration, but this rule would apply to a report of a committee for instance, which might come up here in a very thin House, and a decision involving large sums of money or important interests might be arrived at when, if there had been a full House, a totally different result might have been reached. We do not dally too long over our work as a rule. The great danger today is that objectionable measures may be railroaded through parliament. If there is any place in Canada where you should try to insure ample deliberation, it is in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why not extend it to Bills?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Because it is unnecessary.

Rules 32 and 33 were allowed to stand.

At six o'clock, the committee rose and reported progress.

After Recess.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I suggest that rules 32, 33, 34, 35 be allowed to stand as they all deal with the same matter.

The rules were allowed to stand.

On rule 37. Two or more senators rising to speak.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—In a case of this kind, if a motion were made that a senator be now heard, I think that motion should be put without debate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would be absurd to have a debate on the subject.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That may be so, but if the rule, as we adopt it, permits of any action of that kind, you cannot, in future, object to any member exercising the right. If it is desired that the motion should be put without debate, it is easy to insert these words now.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I suppose the member of the Senate would have a right to appeal from the Speaker's decision. I think you ought to give the Speaker absolute power to say who should speak, subject to an appeal to the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A difficulty might arise in this way: If two senators arose and the Speaker decided in favour of one of them, any one making a motion that the other senator should be heard first would have to give reasons and that would constitute a debate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This rule is borrowed from the House of Commons, and they have been acting upon it ever since the union.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The difficulty is that there is a difference between the House of Commons and this Chamber. There the gentlemen who rise and address themeslves to the Speaker, but in our House we address ourselves to the members of the House, and, probably, the Speaker might not be in a position, in consequence thereof, to decide as to which gentleman had the floor.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is a good deal of force in that. I have been twelve sessions in this House, and I never saw any conflict. If two gentlemen arise at once tney are generally ready to defer to each other. It is true, as my hon. friend says, that in the Commons the members address the Speaker; here we address 'Hon. gentlemen.' It is not a case in which any serious difficulty has ever arisen, or is ever likely to arise.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The point I make is simply one that was made by the hon. gentleman from Killarney some time ago, that it might not be easy for the Speaker to decide. That difficulty would be gotten over if the members of this House would address themselves to the Speaker.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not see any reason for the clause at all. I was for 25 years or more in the Commons, and I never, in all my experience, saw a conflict arise such as is provided for in this rule.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Speaker's decision is accepted as a matter of course.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—That may be correct enough, but we do not address the Speaker here, and his attention is not liable to be called immediately to the fact that a certain member is on his feet and wishes to speak to the motion. If we address the Speaker, as they do in the Commons, I think the leader of the opposition is quite correct when he says that no difficulty would arise; but the Speaker may not always be on the alert. If he were addressed in the same way as in the Commons——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is his duty to always be on the alert.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—We do not all adhere to duty, unfortunately.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 41. Reply closes debate.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It seems to me we are granting under this rule a greater privilege to a mover of a resolution than he ought to have. Something may come up in the discussion, or something may be said by the mover in his reply to remarks of other members, which should be answered. Those who do not agree with him should have an opportunity of replying.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The debate must close at some point. Practically this has been the law of the House—it is the common law.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Is it provided that when the minister, after waiting for everybody to speak, and seeing nobody rising, gives his answer, that nobody can speak afterwards?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There must be some termination to the debate. The Australian rule from which this is virtually borrowed says:

> In all cases the reply of the mover of the original question closes the debte.

The committee were careful of the rights of other members and added this provision:

> It is the duty of the Speaker to see that every senator wishing to speak has the opportunity to do so before the final reply.

It is practically the duty of the Speaker to ask if any other member wishes to speak before the mover replies. You cannot go further than that.

The rule was adopted.

On the 43rd rule. No debate on mere inquiry.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is taking away a right which has heretofore prevailed in making inquiries.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The rule is broken every day.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It ought not to be.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The rule cannot be broken if it never was law.

What I am pointing out is, that not only the practice but the privilege obtained to every member when asking a question to give his reasons for it, and a reply can be made providing his argument is pertinent to the question, but he must not go beyond that. That privilege prevails, even in the House of Commons in England. A member may make an inquiry of the government, receive the reply, and can debate the subject to the extent of the answer given; but he must not go beyond that. What impressed it so strongly on my mind was the fact that I sat in the gallery of the House of Commons one or two nights, and had a discussion with Sir Henry Lawson, now Lord Knutsford. I said it was contrary to the rule laid down in 'May,' and that we never practiced it in Canada. We are restricting it here, while in the House of Lords they are much more liberal than in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The practice here has been to permit others to speak besides the one making the inquiry, and the minister replying. It has never been the practice to speak very long on such occasions. Under this rule, what will happen in regard to a quasi motion that has very frequently been made in the House for a long time, that is, when an hon. gentleman calls the attention of the government to a matter and ends with an inquiry?

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is provided for in the next rule.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The rule we have under consideration certainly restricts a little. As a rule we do not have discussion enough here. This House would stand better before the country if there was a more general participation in the discussions of the House on the part of members. If this rule 43 will restrict discussion, which has not been carried too far, I think possibly we ought to consider it at this stage and amend it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Rule 43 does restrict, but rule 44 gives all the privileges we have at present, so when you take the two rules into consideration, you have all the latitude you enjoy at present.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. member from Richmond (Mr. Miller), who occupied the Chair for some years, pointed out the objection to this unlimited discussion on a mere inquiry, and if hon. gentlemen will turn to page 432 of 'Bourinot,' they will find there that 'Bourinot' considers this practice which had grown up in this House a very objectionable one, and thinks the practice provided for in rule 44 is one which should be adhered to.

The rule was adopted.

Rule 52. Personal and taxing speeches.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—This is the present rule, but we found it inoperative. We have a lively recollection of an occurrence not long ago, when, had this rule been operative, it would have been put into effect. If we had rule 16 of the present draft passed, it might not be of much account whether we amended this one or not, because in rule 16 we propose to clothe the Speaker with full authority to maintain order; but rule 16 has been allowed to stand, and I think we had better let rule 52 stand also.

The rule was allowed to stand.

Rule 53. Exceptionable words to be taken down.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—This clause should stand too.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No doubt it was understood that no debatable matter was to be taken up, but, really, if rules which have been in force ever since the Senate has been a Senate, and which are in force in all legislative bodies, are to be demurred to, we are simply wasting our time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The argument advanced by the hon. gentleman, I understand, is that since this has been a rule for years we ought not to interfere with it. Now, this committee was appointed for the purpose of altering the rules, and surely if a gentleman who is not on the committee desires to have it amended he should have the right to ask that it stand in order to discuss it later on. I am fully in accord myself with the wording of the clause, but every senator was not on that committee, and, consequently, could not know reasons given in the committee for allowing this rule to remain. If he has objections to it, I do not see why he should be charged with creating a discussion upon a question we are here to discuss, and to amend whatever rules we may consider need amending.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not charge the hon. gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. De Boucherville) with doing anything. This is one of the plainest of our rules, and no question has ever been raised about it. I am prepared to stay here and discuss the matter, but I do not think we should be asked to allow it to stand over.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I see no objection to rules 51, 52 or 53, but the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry told me he was going away, and that he understood that no debatable or contested rule would be proceeded with. It is possible that some gentlemen who could not possibly be here may wish to discuss this rule in connection with rule 16. I do not think myself that this is a debatable clause, but in view of the facts it might be well to allow it to stand.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Many other members of the House as well as myself have never seen these rules until to-day. The members of the committee have, to my mind, taken a great deal of time and devoted a great deal of care to their work, but surely discussion is not to be cut off on a question of this kind. I would like to ask, how are we to apply this rule ? To whom are we to appeal ? The Speaker is not brought into the question in any way. If a gentleman uses exceptional or unparliamentary language he is to be called to order by the Senate. What member of the Senate is to do it ? Is everyone going to shout ' sit down ' ? Is his case to be tried en bloc or is there any one who can be appealed to ? I would like the chairman of the committee to explain this, because it is quite hazy to me.

The rule was allowed to stand.

On rule 54. Interference in quarrels.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—This should stand, because it is very much in line with the preceding rule.

The rule was allowed to stand.

On rule 55. Speaker addressing the House.

The SPEAKER—I should like to say that I caught a very bad cold last week because I felt a little timid about covering my head with my three cornered hat. Although it has not been the practice for the Speaker to cover his head when in the Chair, I would ask whether this rule implies that the Speaker may sit with his hat on ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I question the propriety of amending this rule. The practice has been, in the House of Lords, that if the Speaker desires to address the House he descends from the chair and comes to the floor, except it be upon a point of order.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I suppose the Speaker's chair in this Chamber represents the woolsack. The Lord Chancellor does not leave the woolsack when he addresses the House. The woolsack stands almost on a level with the floor, and he does not have to come down any steps. The Speaker's chair, and the steps leading to it, represent the woolsack as far as we can make one thing represent another which is not the same. There is no more reason why our Speaker should leave his chair than there is for the Lord Chancellor to leave the woolsack.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The practice has been in the past that when the Speaker wished to address the House on anything other than a question of order, he left the chair. Speaker MacPherson always left the chair to address the House. That has been the practice ever since, and it is also the practice in the Legislative Council of Quebec.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 58. Senator with pecuniary interest not to vote.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—This is not new, but I would like to know what is the meaning of the words ' direct pecuniary interest '; does it mean, for example, if a senator has shares in a bank ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If he has shares in a bank when the Senate is passing a Bill relating to the bank, would he be prevented from voting ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If it were possible to strengthen this rule in any possible way I should like to see it done. In my opinion, it is necessary perhaps not so much so in this House as it is in the House of Commons, but it is a matter of notoriety that scarcely a session occurs but, evidently, members are advancing Bills in which they have a pecuniary interest, and it is very hard to really find out the exact bearing of this rule. I had hoped when we were in committee on the matter, the rule would have been strengthened. I am sorry that my hon. friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) is not here to-night. I have great faith in his skill as a draftsman and his desire to make our rules as effective as possible. He gave me an assurance that he would endeavour to deal with this clause at some later stage in the meetings of the committee, but, at the final meeting, he was not present and I was prepared to submit an amendment, so that the matter was passed over and the rule was left in its present form. I think we ought to allow the clause to stand.

On rule 62. Protest controlled by Senate.

The SPEAKER—I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if there is any revised rule which explains the different modes of voting in the Senate, because sometimes it is simply by senators rising, and sometimes by having them called in before a vote is taken. Is there any machinery ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

The SPEAKER—It seems to me we have had discussions on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN—That is settled by rules 56 and 57.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 68. Restrictions on dealing with Bills.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We have had occasions repeatedly when a Bill has been reported from a committee with an unimportant amendment or an amendment to which every one agrees, and the rule has been suspended and the motion put ; but under the second paragraph of this rule, the Speaker cannot permit anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The rule is suspended.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, it says ' It is the duty of the Speaker in no case to put a question contrary to this rule.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That provision is wholly unnecessary. By implication it leads to the conclusion that the Speaker has no duty to perform with regard to the other rules.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This rule is an exact transcript of the rule of the House of Lords. It may not be necessary—in fact the whole rule might be omitted, because, this being the rule of the House of Lords, it might prevail even though not expressly enacted, but it is much more convenient to have it here in our own rules.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It may be the rule of the House of Lords, but I would much rather hear the hon. gentleman rebut the argument I advance.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The rule which has been in operation in the House of Lords for a long time is probably safe to go by. It is not likely to be contrary to common sense.

The CHAIRMAN—It is the practice here when committees report.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The practice generally is when a Bill has gone through the committee without amendment, to read it the third time without suspending the rules.

Hon Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It might apply to any amendment, however trifling.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We might insert the word ' substantial.'

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Would this second paragraph make it the duty of the Speaker to refuse to put a question when the rules are suspended ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—We might strike out the second paragraph. I do not see any occasion for these two lines.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—With the consent of the House the rules may be suspended, and this goes with the rest.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—But the Speaker would say, the rules of the House prevent me putting such a motion. It is not the same as if it said that no motion to suspend the rules shall be submitted by the Speaker. I would suggest, as a way of making it perfectly clear, to add the words 'other than a motion for the suspension of this rule.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The better way is to strike out the concluding paragraph altogether. Although it may be a rule in the House of Lords, it is not consistent with our practice, and, that being so, questions might arise under it and it would be better to drop the paragraph.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Suppose a member was in a hurry with an important measure and asked for a suspension of the rules of the House and every senator favoured the suspension, under this paragraph it is the duty of the Speaker to call our attention to the fact that the question could not be put.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It is the rule of the House of Lords, and, by our general rule, that practice would prevail; but a practice has grown upon it in England which enables them to expedite the business by suspending the rules. That irregular practice might not be introduced by the adoption of this as a new rule here. It might be interpreted to be in the way of allowing motions to suspend. I would suggest, if it is the practice, without the insertion of these words, we might leave out this paragraph.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have a rule which says that any rule may be suspended by the unanimous consent of the House and that includes rule 68, but as hon. gentlemen seem to take a very special objection to this paragraph, I have no particular wish to retain it. If it is the wish of the committee I move that the second paragraph be stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to and the rule, as amended, was adopted.

On rule 69. Principle discussed at second reading.

Hon. Mr. BAKER—That is simply the affirmation of a fact that any one knows who has had experience of legislation. Why is it made the rule ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—For this reason: it is to direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that that principle exists in parliamentary law, and it is a good thing to realize that there are some principles in parliamentary law.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 83. Standing committees.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Should not provision be made that the Senate should have as large representation upon the joint committees as the House of Commons? I have noticed that there is a larger proportion of members of the House of Commons on the two joint committees than of senators as provided for under this rule.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I understand that the House of Commons will revise their rules this year, and I believe we are supposed to have an equal representation with the other Chamber on these committees.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That has been the practice.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If we are to have equal numbers, our rule would be just as workable if we were to say, 'an equal number of senators to the members of the House of Commons.' In one or two important committees over which we have absolute control, especialy the railway committee, there is a considerable reduction in the membership. The striking committee, will bear me out in saying that they have no lack of applicants for membership on the railway committee, and I do not think it will be agreeable to those who have served on that committee to be struck off in order to reduce the number from fifty to thirty-five. I fancy it will lead to considerable irritation, and I do not know whether it will lead to better work or not. This portion of our rules cannot be brought into force this year as our committees are struck, but, next year, when we come to reduce the railway committee to thirty-five members, I do not think it will be very popular with those who are struck off that committee. The House should consider well whether it is wise to make the reduction. Through the anxiety of members to be represented on that important committee, we have found it necessary in past years to increase the number from time to time, until it has reached fifty members, and I do not think we have any good reason to offer why we should now reverse our judgment and reduce the number to thirty-five. The motions for the various increases were carried unanimously, and, seeing that the drift of opinion in the Senate has always been in the direction of increasing the membership, the decrease must naturally be a very unpopular one. I think we had better adhere to the number as we have it now—fifty. My hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Lovitt) points out to me that we have not a smaller House but if anything a larger one, and apparently a more attentive House. I throw out this suggestion, not for the purpose of upsetting the work of the committee, but because I happen to hold the same views as I held last year, that we had better adhere to what we have found to be a workable basis and not make changes which may be irritating and disappointing.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I agree with my hon. friend that there will be some difficulty in reducing the number to thirty-five. When this matter was discussed in the committee, we all had in our minds what was happening in the Railway Committee last winter. Talk of innovations; a very serious innovation was introduced there, by bringing in chairs and putting a bar across the room. The result was that we were unable to get good deliberative meetings as in former sessions. I am pleased to find that the suggestion which I made, that chairs and other arrangements should be removed and the table restored, has been complied with, and now we will be able to conduct our meetings in the old-fashioned way. With the large room and the excellent arrangements which have been provided, we are not going to have much trouble, even with a membership of fifty. It is very seldom that more than thirty members will be present. I think it would be well worth our while to retain the membership at fifty. The selecting committee will have considerable trouble next year if fifteen heads have to be cut off.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I have been a member of the striking committee for a number of years, and I know the difficulty which the committee has had in satisfying members as to the committees upon which they are placed. The House of Commons it is true has a large number on its committee, one hundred and seventy-six members, I think, out of a total of 214, or four-fifths of the House. Now, the proposed amendment will reduce the proportion in the Senate to only five-eighths of the whole House. It is within the recollection of hon. gentlemen that within the last two or three years, on account of the desire on the part of many members—valuable members of the Senate—to get on the Railway Committee this committee has been added to from time to time, and, before adopting a membership of thirty-five the sense of the House should be taken. It would be unwarranted to declare to-night that, in future, thirty-five should be the total number of members in the most important committee of the House. I hope the hon. gentleman who has given this matter a great deal of attention and care will accept my suggestion. The same thing applies to the Banking and Commerce Committee, which I see is being reduced nearly one-fourth, from thirty-two to twenty-five. I think we are making a mistake if we reduce the numbers of these two important committees.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the object of having these committees was ministering to the pleasure of members of the House, there would be some force in the argument in favour of a larger number on this committee. But I was under the impression that committees were appointed for the purpose of transacting the business of parliament. The object of sending a measure to a committee is that its details may be carefully considered as they cannot be in a larger assembly. If you put five-eighths of the House on a committee, that is practically the whole House undertaking to deal with the details of the measure, and that cannot be done satisfactorily. Reference has been made to the practice in the House of Commons. That is an unfortunate reference, I think; because professional men and others who have had to do business before the committees of the two Houses, were in the habit of contrasting the satisfactory way in which the business was done in our committee with the very unsatisfactory way in which it was done in the Railway Committee of the House of Commons. That committee do not carefully deal with the details of a Bill; the great question is shall the friends of the Bill have their own way and get it through as it is, or shall those who are opposed to the Bill block it. One party or the other succeeds. If the party in favour of the measure succeeds, the Bill comes to this House, and in our committee the amendments which should have been made in the Commons committee are generally adopted. I appeal to any hon. gentleman who was at the meetings of our committee last year as to whether our Railway Committee has not got into nearly the same condition that the Committee of the Commons has ? If the gentleman who promotes a Bill is a friend of a majority of the members, his Bill will go through probably in the shape it is presented; if not, it may not go through, but if the committee decides that the Bill needs amendment, and if it is perfectly clear that it needs to be amended, then the amending is not done in committee, but in a sub-committee, which is a circuitous way of doing business. In the old days, when the committee was of moderate size, the members sat around the table and talked business. They did not make speeches. They discussed the details of the measure, and the proposed amendments. We ought to consider the public business, and should not look at the matter from the point of view from which it has been regarded. I was under the impression that hon. gentlemen were anxious to be on committees, because, up to this year, attendance at a committee counted in the same way as attendance at a meeting of the House, and gentlemen who had to leave the city before the sitting of the House in the afternoon, were enabled to do so if they attended a meeting of the committee in the morning. I cannot understand why gentlemen should be so very keen about being upon the Railway Committee or any other committee. This is a matter which should stand over and be discussed by the full House.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I am glad that this opportunity presents itself of enabling me to say a word or two with reference to the work of the Senate committees. Since I have been a member of the Senate, if there is anything which has given me satisfaction, it has been the thorough and efficient way in which the committee work of the Senate is attended to, and if there is one thing more than another which helps to make the Senate and its influence felt throughout the country it is this revising work which is done in its committees. I have heard it on all sides, and a very pleasing contrast has been drawn on many occasions, both public and private, between the way in which the business of the committees of the Senate is transacted and that in which the business of the Commons committees is carried on. Whether it is to be done better by reducing the number of members to thirty-five, I am not prepared to say. I would take the judgment of others on that point, but it would be unfortunate if any step is taken here which is calculated to impair the efficiency of the committee work. It is deliberative work, work which should be done from a business standpoint, and done in a judicial manner. and I believe that is one tribute which can be paid to the general committee work of the Senate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am fully in accord with the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentleman from Toronto. I have heard the same remark made by some of the more moderate members of the House of Commons. After sitting in our committee for a short time years ago they made the same remark as to the manner in which we conducted business as compared with the committees of the Commons. When you have over a hundred members in a committee, as they have, it becomes more like a Babel than a deliberate body, and, from long experience, I am fully in accord with the arguments offered by the hon. gentleman from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—With regard to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Halifax to the effect that a great many members of the House wanted to be on the committee for the reason that it counted as a day's sitting in the House——

Hon. Mr. POWER—Excuse me, I did not say that; I said that was my impression.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The hon. gentleman should not have bad impressions.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have seen so much of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I do not think that charge could be laid to the members of the Railway Committee. We usually meet on Thursday, at the call of the chairman, so that so far as membership on the Railway Committee is concerned, it is not sought for to shirk the sittings of this House. I think the members of the Senate have a higher idea of their duties, and I want to bear testimony to my conviction, that so far as hon. gentlemen can divest themselves of political leaning it is done more in the committees of this House than in any other place I have ever been in my life. As the hon. gentleman from Toronto has said, it is a credit which the Senate gets from the professional men who come before us, interested in railway legislation, the business-like manner in which our affairs are conducted. We are not appealing to the galleries. Questions are treated on their merits. I would say to my hon. friend from Halifax, that if he will be one of fifteen to volunteer to remain off that committee, it will certainly lighten the work of the striking committee next year; but the members of that striking committee will have a very unpleasant duty thrown upon them to take fifteen men out of the fifty now appointed to it. In looking over the list of names which I had the honour to submit the other day, I would not like to name a gentleman on that committee who should be struck off. Every one of them has given attention and time to the working of the committee in the past, whether their attendance has counted for them or not, and I earnestly hope no alteration will be made in the number. This matter could well stand to be discussed by the whole House.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I think it would be very wise to allow the condition of things now existing to continue. I must express my admiration for the manner in which the Railway Committee and all the committees or this House transact their business. If you make a reduction in the number of the committee, you will transfer to the floor of this House discussions over railway Bills that ought to be fully and finally threshed out in committee. If only thirty-five are appointed on that committee, there will be a great many other members who will have opinions to express when the Bill comes before the House. As a rule, Bills reported from the Railway Committee are passed without amendment, and I have no doubt that will continue to be the case so long as the committee remains as large as it has been; but, otherwise extended discussion is likely to take place here which should be done in committee. The committee is doing good work, which is appreciated by the public. I entirely endorse the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Toronto upon that point. With regard to the Railway Committee of the House of Commons, I should not like any reflection to be cast upon that committee. I was a member of it for seventeen or eighteen years. It discharges its work in an admirable way. As a rule, if any amendment is made, it is done in that committee; the Bill is perfected there to a certain extent, and when it comes to this House we only put on the varnish. We do more than that, sometimes, I admit; but we have not to deal with a Bill in the crude form in which it is when it comes before the Railway Committee of the House of Commons. They have, I think, done their duty fairly well. There have been extended discussions in that committee, but I have also noticed that, owing to its comparatively large size, when Bills are reported from it they usually pass the House with very little comment. I dare say it is largely owing to the size of the committee. I agree with the hon. gentleman from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson). I think the question deserves a great deal of consideration before venturing to make a reduction.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. gentleman must judge the work of the Railway Committee of the House of Commons from the standard which obtained when he was a member of it. It was only last session that one of the leading members of that committee rose in the committee room and denounced it as a mob, and not even the chairman or any member of the committee dissented from the opinion which he expressed. It is coming down to the level of a political combination, and many members vote upon measures there simply because they have been lobbied by the parties interested. I would not desire to see that practice obtain here. I was on the committee, as was my hon. friend, for many years, and the Railway Committee of late has not been what it was ten or twenty years ago. With a small select committee to discuss questions, you are more apt to reach correct conclusions and analyse each clause better than where the committee is larger. If the hon. gentleman from Wellington will look at rule 86 he will find that no member of the Senate is precluded from expressing his views before the committee; all he is debarred from is the right of voting. I am strongly in favour of the reduction to 35. I have no doubt that there will be pressure next year from people who are interested in railway legislation to get on that committee, but if we only have stamina enough to resist it, there will be no trouble.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Before this rule is disposed of I wish to say that I have not the sympathy towards those members who are advocating and contending for a larger committee. We all know full well that a small prudent committee will do better work than a large one, and as far as the House of Commons is concerned, with the very large committee they have there. I do not think they will perform the duties which they are called upon to perform with the same efficiency that they used to do when the membership was smaller. I was on that committee for eight or nine years and I know full well what that committee did. I am inclined to think from the size to which it has grown at the present time, it does not do its work as efficiently; it does not give the care and consideration to the Bills coming before it which was given in years gone by.

As far as our own committee is concerned, I have been present at its meetings and have heard the discussions in that committee, and to tell me that that is a careful, deliberative body is to tell me something that I cannot fully recognize.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I agree with the hon. gentleman; it has been so since the committee was enlarged.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I can mention some measures reported from that committee which were afterwards completely changed by the House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—All except the preamble.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—They would have liked to cut out the preamble too, because it was so bad. We know what they do in committee. Let any man go there and observe what is going on, and I think he will say that the committee is too large and should be reduced in numbers to make it more efficient. The hon. member from Wellington says that after Bills are threshed out in committee there is no opposition to them in the House. Why? Because they have not the same opportunity here that they have in the House of Commons of going into a committee of the whole House and examining carefully into the Bill. Do you want three-fourths of the members to be on that committee so that the other fourth may not have an opportunity of understanding a measure which has been referred to that committee? It is reported back to the Senate and members not on the Railway Committee have no idea of the nature of the Bill, because they have no opportunity to study it. Why not refer such Bills to a Committee of the Whole House here? We are not worked so hard that we cannot spend the necessary time to examine a Bill as carefully here as they do in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Does the hon. gentleman say that a Bill, after it comes from the Railway Committee, is referred to a Committee of the Whole House in the Commons?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—What I say is that such Bills are not referred to a Committee of the Whole House here; I claim they should be.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Are they referred to a Committee of the Whole House in the other Chamber?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Yes, all private Bills go through a committee of the whole.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—No.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—My hon. friend ought to have known that.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Do railway Bills go through a Committee of the Whole House, after they pass the Railway Committee? I say they do not.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—There is not the same necessity in the House of Commons that there is here. The committee of the Senate, if it is a small committee, will be able to go through the Bill carefully and understand it fully, and the House knowing that it has been considered by a select number of men, will be satisfied that it comes before the House in a proper condition. As I said before, take the Rainy River Bill, and what a spectacle did we have last session? It was a disgrace to the Senate the manner in which that Bill was reported from the Railway Committee; yet they tell me that careful consideration was given to that Bill by the fifty members of the Railway Committee. I say there was no consideration; that they did not have a proper conception of what the Bill was, although they were giving away power from Canada to the United States. They did not report the Bill in such a form that a single clause could go through. That is what was done in that committee, and yet they want to keep 50 members on that committee so that legislation will be treated in the future as it has been in the past. I am strongly in favour of reducing the number of the committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Bill came from the committee in a proper state. It was manipulated and changed after it came to the House.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It may have been in a proper state, but was it in the form that it was agreed upon by the parties in the Railway Committee? I say no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The committee agreed among themselves as to what the Bill should be. It did not meet the views of those who desired to have it passed, because it was altered after it came here and my hon. friend, I think, voted for it.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On rule 102. Seats for members of parliament.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Could we not pass a rule to prevent confusion at the opening and closing of parliament? Seats should be reserved for senators. I was at my seat at the opening, and was told that some ladies from Rideau Hall wanted the seats. Of course I gave mine up, but it seems to me that seats should have been provided for ladies without our having to lose our seats. Should not something be put in the rules bearing on that?

The rule was adopted.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress, and asked leave to sit again.

The Senate adjourned until three p.m. on Monday next.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on Bill (B) An Act further to amend the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The necessity for this Bill may perhaps be best explained if I read a memo. which I have received from the Department of Justice:

> The object of this Bill is to bring our Evidence Act into harmony with the English Act.
>
> By the judgment of the Supreme Court in Rex vs. Gosselin it has been held that the wife, being a competent witness by the Act of 1893, is compelled to testify against her husband; and in that case, the evidence of the wife was admitted to contradict her husband (a prisoner on trial for his life) as to their sexual relations;—which seems repugnant to the most elementary principles of common decency.
> Besides this, it necessarily follows from the judgment of the Supreme Court that the prisoner, being a competent witness under the Act, is also compellable. This can never have been the intention of the Act. The English Act provides that the husband and wife are competent for the defence only and the same as to the prisoner; except, of course, in those cases where at common law they may be called as witnesses against each other (injuries to each other, assaults, neglect to provide necessaries, bigamy, child stealing, &c., &c.).

The hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) called attention the other day to one of the sections mentioned in schedule 'C' numbered 279. I find it was a typographical error and that it should read 278. I have a list here of the various sections that were added to the schedule now existing which it is unnecessary for me to read. They refer altogether to unnatural offences.

On clause 1,

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I would ask the hon. Secretary of State in regard to the provision for the giving of evidence by a wife against the husband or a husband against the wife. It is limited here to the time after the nuptial knot is tied. I do not think that goes far enough. I think no communication should be forced from the wife or from the husband after they have been engaged. They become one after their engagement or as they say in French 'leurs fiançailles,' which in many churches is part of the marriage ceremony. Although not actually man and wife, they are so considered, I think, by many of the Christian churches. Not for all legal or all religious purposes, but between man and woman, they are considered one and one, and I think that any communication between them under these circumstances should not be made a case of revelation before the courts. I merely point out this as a matter which might affect testimony. Of course I understand that in all cases these matters are not so religiously followed, but in the case of a man and woman who find themselves bound by religious or other scruples to be considered as one and one. that extension of this clause should be given to them.

An hon. GENTLEMAN—Carried.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No, it is not carried. If it is a question of moving an amendment; I am prepared to do so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman surely does not pretend that we should legislate for people before they are married, with the multitude of actions for breach of promise before the court?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I base my observation on the fact that there are many people in the Christian world who consider themselves bound to one another even before they are married. The hon. Secretary of State must not laugh at this matter. This privilege is given to a married couple because they are bound to one another after marriage. If there are people who consider themselves so bound after marriage, why not give the same privilege to those who consider themselves bound before marriage.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Victoria misapprehends the effect of the clause before the committee. This clause provides:

4. Every person charged with an offence, and, except as hereinafter provided, the wife or husband, as the case may be, of the person so charged, shall be a competent witness for the defence, whether the person so charged is charged solely or jointly with any other person.

Does the hon. gentleman wish to provide that if a young man and a young woman are engaged, neither of them shall be a competent witness for the other?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Well, that is the effect of the clause.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—After the banns are published in church, why not give them the same privileges as they would have under this Bill after the marriage is celebrated?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The point is that parties are made competent witnesses for the defence alone. I fail to see any objection to that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Whilst before marriage they would be competent witnesses one against the other. There is the difference. All I am asking is that this marriage tie, which is so largely disrespected in this honourable House, after marriage, be respected before marriage.

An hon. GENTLEMAN—Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—We respect the marriage tie just the same as any court in the United States. I say if the marriage tie is to be respected after marriage, why should it not be respected before marriage after the banns are published?

The CHAIRMAN—Shall the first clause be adopted?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—No, it cannot be adopted until it is discussed.

The CHAIRMAN—Carried on a division.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The hon. gentleman has no right to say 'carried on a division'.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill is in the direction of the hon. gentleman's views. Under our law either the husband or wife would be a competent witness, and the court held that, being competent, they might be compellable. We are changing that, and placing the law as it was when it was last before this parliament. The only change is from 'compellable' to competent.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I fully comprehend what the hon. Secretary of State says. Here are two parties engaged before the church, their consciences and the state, practically married, once the banns are published. The marriage takes place one, two or three weeks afterwards. I do not wish to divide the House on the matter, but I want to express my opinion as to the sacredness of the marriage tie and the obligations which arise under it.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (C.B.)—I think the sacred tie of marriage is well respected in this House. There is no doubt about that, but there are instances in which engagements are broken, even after the publication of the banns. What are you going to do in a case of that kind ? There have been cases where everything was prepared and the clergyman was there to perform the ceremony, and at the last moment the lady backed out. What are you going to do in a case of that kind ?

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not understand sub-clause :

4. Nothing in this Act shall affect a case where the wife or husband of a person charged with an offence may at common law be called as a witness without the consent of that person.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot tell my hon. friend the cases referred to under the common law. The Bill has been prepared in the Department of Justice, and the authorities have been very carefully looked at.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is no reason why we should pass a Bill that we do not understand. If there is anything in the hon. gentleman's argument there is no necessity to bring the Bill here ; let the Department of Justice run the whole thing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are not changing the law as it exists. We are simply changing one word in the law ; that is changing the clause which was interpreted to compel either husband or wife to give evidence against the other.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is all right. But what about subsection 4 ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is purely negative. We are not interfering with the common law, whatever that may be.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The Bill might be reported now with the understanding that this clause shall be explained before the third reading.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière), from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

THE RULES OF THE SENATE.

RESUMED IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of :

The third report of the special committee appointed during last sesion to consider and revise, and if deemed necessary, to add to the rules, orders and forms of proceeding of the Senate.

(In the Committee.)

On rule 114. Publication of Notices.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to this rule, some hon. gentlemen who have had a good deal to do with these notices seem to think that some change should be made, and perhaps the hon. gentlemen will express their views now.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The first paragraph of this rule provides that when the application is for an Act to incorporate a railway or canal company, notice should be given in the principal city, town or village in each county through which the proposed railway or canal is to be constructed. It is suggested to make the publication compulsory in a newspaper published in the capital of each province for the time being ; and later on it is proposed to suggest to the Committee of the Whole that in each case of an application for a railway, telegraph or telephone charter, notice shall be given to each municipality through which the proposed work is to run, thereby securing better notice to the parties interested than is adopted at present, with a system less cumbersome and expensive to all concerned, and more effective than we have with the present rules.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do you propose to omit the publication of the notice in each county ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—In each county, but it is proposed in lieu thereof, that the notice shall be sent to each municipality at least three weeks before the application is made to the Standing Orders Committee, insuring time for the municipalities to take such action as they may deem fit. At present notice is supposed to be sent to the municipalities, but it is desired to make it clear that all the municipalities affected shall not only have notice but ample time to act if they see fit. That is the proposition ; one paves the way for the other, and hon. gentlemen can see the direction the amendments are taking.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Has the hon. gentleman framed those suggestions ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The chairman of the committee has the wording of them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I question very much whether that would be as effective a mode of notifying the people of the municipality as the present method. The notice might be sent to the municipality, but the council of that municipality might not meet for a week or two and the people most directly affected would not hear of it in time. If the notice suggested by the hon. gentleman is to be in addition to the publication, then it might be of benefit, but anyone who knows the workings of municipalities will understand that the clerk of the municipality might neglect to notify the reeve ; then after he had been notified he would have to summon the council to consider the question. After the meeting they would appeal to the people, probably, to know whether they were in favour of it or not. All this would consume too much time. If the publication be made in a leading journal published in the county through which the road would be run it will be read by nine-tenths of the people, and anyone who desires can enter his objections. It would be an advantage, I think, if notice were sent to the municipality also, but we should not confine the notice to the municipality.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—In the first place, the wording is open to the question, which is the principal village or town in the county. There might be no question in the case of cities, but it certainly would arise in the case of villages. We had an experience last year of that nature. In some of these counties newspapers spring up perhaps a short time before the notice is given. The applicants for charters, although acting in good faith, not knowing that these papers are published—little local papers, fail to advertise in them. But according to our rules they would have to go back, as we have made them go in such case, and advertise in some little local paper which had no material effect except to delay proceedings before the House. It is difficult to determine which is the principal village in a district, and it is also difficult for the Standing Orders Committee to know where papers are published at the time they are considering the petition, in order to be certain that the notices have been published in all the papers as the rule requires. If the municipalities were notified in sufficient time to enable them to take action, and I think possibly three weeks time before the consideration of the petition would be enough—then if the work was of such a character as to interfere with municipal rights or with municipal ambitions, they could put in their protest before the petition was considererd, or at least before the Bill passed through all its various stages. It is with a view, as the hon. leader of the opposition has suggested, of making the notice effective, so that it will reach the people who are affected in time to permit them to present their case before parliament and have the proposed legislation either rejected or amended as the case may be, if it interferes with their interests. Any suggestion which will render the proceedings more effective will, I am sure, meet with hearty sympathy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Could not the hon. gentleman's object be accomplished by leaving out the words 'principal' and 'villages.' I can understand the difficulty which would arise in a county where there is a number of villages; but if the notices were given in the city or towns in each county that would be sufficient.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—There is another point ; in the new provinces in the west we have no counties at all. How are we going to meet the conditions there ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I understand that the hon. gentleman finds that the notices which have to be published under this rule are too cumbrous, and I quite agree with that idea. I have gone through the experience of publishing these notices for a railway of about 200 miles in length. These notices, to comply with the rule, had to be published in each county, village and municipality, and had to be published in more than half a dozen small papers. This makes the proceedings very expensive and no adequate result is achieved. It seems to me that it would be sufficient to publish the notice in the official 'Gazette' and in a paper published in the principal city, town or village in the territory through which the proposed work is to be constructed, also sending the notice to the provincial secretary and the secretary of each municipality, I would suggest at least four weeks, or perhaps five weeks in advance. The notice has to be published in the newspapers for five weeks, and it might be given five weeks in advance to the provincial secretary and to the municipality. Surely anyone who has any adverse interest would then be notified in time to protect his interest; but if it is the sense of this House to change the rule I would suggest that we suspend this rule for the present in order to consult with the committee of the other House. The present rule was framed after consulting with the other House two or three years ago. I happen to be on a committee appointed by this House, and it is important that the rule, whatever it is, be the same for both Houses. The committee appointed by the other House are to meet to-morrow, I believe, and it will be easy to take the sense of that committee as to what we propose to do.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The publication of a notice of this character in the official 'Gazette' is of no use whatever, so far as the public are concerned, unless the local papers copy it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Excepting for record.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a mere matter of record. The object would be accomplished if we leave out the word 'principal', then if the notice is published in either one or other of the various places the rule is complied with.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—As I understand, the hon. gentleman wants to get rid of the words 'In each' in the principal city, town or village in each county—that the notice be published only in some large centre. As to the notice in the official 'Gazette', it has this utility not only for a permanent official record, but as a matter of fact the leading papers in each province copy these notices from the official 'Gazette' as local news.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not unless the official 'Gazette' is sent to every newspaper in the county.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It is sent to every paper I believe, and, as my hon. friend has just said, they frequently publish as an item of news that such and such an enterprise is contemplated; but as a rule they do not give very definite information as to the privileges and powers which are being asked for.

But with reference to the uniformity of rules as between the two Houses, the advantage of that cannot be overestimated. We find in the past that applicants for charters would comply with the rules of the House of Commons, and when they came before this House they found they were out of court because they had not complied with the more stringent requirements of the Senate. There should be uniformity, if it can possibly be arrived at, and this discussion will have the effect of giving those who will meet the committee in the other House an idea of what the Senate consider to be proper notice to be given in the case of applications for private charters. I suggested that in regard to all applications for railway charters, whether the works were declared to be for the general advantage of Canada or not, that these notices to the municipality should be given. By our present rules that is exacted only where the applicants ask that the work be declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, and I was suggesting that it would be just as well to make our rule general in that respect, that every application for a charter of this kind, before the petition is considered, be preceded by a notice to the municipality, as in the case of an application for a charter which is to be declared for the general advantage of Canada. This would be going further in the direction of notifying the municipalities than we go at present, which I am sure will meet with the hearty approval of this House. In view of a conference with the committee of the other House, the Senate should make some suggestion by which the matter could be taken up in definite form and dealt with at the proper time, when the meeting with the other committee is held.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Do we understand that the chairman of this special committee will meet the members of the other committee ? Who is going to do the work ? If it is left to everyone it will not be done at all.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—An informal meeting might be held, and afterwards the House could decide.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before undertaking to hold a conference with the committee of the House of Commons, it would be necessary that those who represent this House should know what the feeling of the Senate is. Not having been on the Standing Orders Committee, I do not, perhaps, fully realize the difficulty which has arisen, but it comes to this : At present, if a company ask for a charter to build a railway, say from Montreal to Sault St. Marie, they have to go over all the municipalities which intervene between those two places and find out whether any newspapers are published in each municipality or not, and, having done that, they have to publish the notice in a paper published in each municipality, if there is one, and, when all that has been done, and a great deal of money has been expended, the same work has to be done over again, to a very great extent, to meet the requirements of our committee. It is not desirable to put difficulties in the way of getting these petitions before the Senate. I did make a rough draft of what we might submit. It is substantially in the line indicated by the hon. gentleman from Killarney that there should be publication in the 'Gazette'. A publication in a newspaper issued in the capital of the province (as a rule the newspapers published in the capitals of the various provinces circulate throughout the province)——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—To a very small extent in some places.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then the proposal is that a registered letter shall be sent to the secretary of the province, which is perhaps the most important notice of all, because the provincial secretary is responsible for the well-being of his province and it is his duty to see that nothing is done which shall interfere with the rights of the province in any way or with the municipalities composing it. In addition to that, notice is sent to the clerk of each municipality. I think that is really a more effective mode of giving notice than the present one, and not so cumbrous or expensive. Four or five weeks notice could be given.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That would be more effective than a newspaper advertisement.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would propose then, in paragraph five, under the heading 'A,' of rule 114, to come to a full stop after the first word 'notice' and then go on to say :

In such case, and in the case of any railway, canal, telegraph or telephone company, the applicant shall cause a copy of such notice to be sent by registered letter to the clerk of each municipality which may be especially affected by the construction or operation of such works, or through which such railway, canal, telegraph or telephone line is to be constructed, and also to the secretary of the province in which such works are or may be located or in or through which such railway, canal, telegraph or telephone line is to be constructed, and proof of compliance with this requirement by the applicants shall be established by statutory declaration.

A similar change will be made in the first paragraph 'B.' At the end of this rule there is to be an addition to the following effect:

Every notice or registered letter shall be mailed in time to reach the secretary or the clerk of the municipality, as the case may be, not less than five weeks before the consideration of the petition by the Committee on Standing Orders ; and the giving of this notice shall be substantiated by statutory declaration.

If that meets the views of the House we can try to arrange it with the committee of the other House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I would suggest that the word 'and' should be substituted for the word 'or' so that it may read the secretary of the province, 'and the clerk of each municipality.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would suggest that the clauses to which amendments have been suggested be allowed to stand, and that the chairman of the special committee, the senators from Killarney and DeSalaberry, and any one else who wishes to go to the committee of the House of Commons should come to an understanding so as to avoid the difficulties that have arisen in the past because of conflict of opinion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no difference of opinion on that point. My desire was simply to ascertain whether, if the committee of the other House agree that this rule should be modified, the Senate would concur in the agreement.

Rule 114 was allowed to stand.

On rule 115. Maps filed with Standing Orders Committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—This clause is rather vague in its application to the west, where, as I have already said, we have no counties.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Would not the word 'district' meet the case ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That would apply to unorganized territories. We have townships, each of which is six miles square, but they are not each a municipality. 'Electoral division' might suit.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Would the electoral division' be federal or provincial ? The moment you make use of that term, you give an opening for the courts to come in and decide whether the division is provincial or federal. As I have often said, we should make our laws perfectly clear, and not give the courts an opportunity to interpret them. If it is to be a federal electoral district, why not say so ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Another matter I wished to mention is the vagueness of some of the petitions which come before the House. For instance, petitions are presented applying for a charter for a railway from Ottawa to the St. Lawrence river. How is the Standing Orders Committee in such a case to say that the municipalities have been properly notified ? Last year a petition was presented for leave to build a road from Ottawa to the Georgian Bay, and it was very difficult for the committee to decide what particular direction the road was going to take. I must plead for more definiteness in petitions as to routes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest that the word 'township' be used. There can be no two opinions as to what constitutes a township. That is established by the Dominion Lands Act, and, although the word is commonly used to represent a portion of a county, yet, it could not possibly in view of the Lands Act, be confused. If each township is shown on the map, the committee will have before it the most definite information possible. It might be provided that in all the western country, say in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, the term township should be used. No confusion could result from that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—With regard to the province of British Columbia, I may say, that there is a great deal of territory there which does not enter into either a municipality, a county or a township, on account of the way in which the provincial surveys were carried on. These surveys are tied on to various points in the most heterogeneous kind of way and it is an exceedingly difficult thing to describe the lands. I should like to see some provision made here which would cover the condition of things existing in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This rule provides that a map or plan shall be supplied to the Standing Orders Committee, but we have no rule, as far as I am aware, for the furnishing of a map or plan to the Railway Committee, which I think is a still more important matter. If any such rule exists I cannot find it, and I may say here I think that it is even more important than the rule of the Standing Orders Committee. In the Railway Committee we had continual trouble on this very subject, and not only that, but even where a kind of map was prepared and on hand, there was no place to hang it up. We might have half a dozen railway propositions coming before us on the same day, and the wall would be covered with one map and no place to hang up the maps covering other railway propositions coming up the same day. There are two points to which I wish to call attention: I think that this rule should be so amended so that the map or plan shall be furnished for the Railway Committee of this House as well as for the other House, and that should be followed up by some provision for the hanging up of the map or plan. The other day while visiting the observatory I saw in one of the rooms there a kind of rack by means of which half a dozen or more maps could be exhibited, and they could be run up or down by pulling a rope. By the use of such a device in the Railway Committee room a map for each of the Bills to be considered that day could be exhibited. A messenger could pull the rope and bring down the one that was required at a moment's notice. The device did not seem to me to be at all costly, and while a simpler plan might suffice for the Standing Orders Committee, that is what we require for the Railway Committee. Every one who has had any acquaintance with the Railway Committee knows that we have continual trouble on that ground. Some of the petitioners did not furnish maps at all, and those who did had no means to exhibit and explain them so as to be useful to the committee. My hon. friend from Brandon has charge of the Internal Economy Committee and that is a matter he might bring before his colleagues. I ask, in the meantime, that consideration be given to this rule with a view to exacting from all railway promoters the necessity for furnishing proper plans and maps. We have been talking about it in committee, and sometimes have refused to go on without a map, but it appears there has been no rule for it, and even if there were, we had no accommodation for hanging up a map.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (De Lanaudiere)—The hon. gentleman has not noticed that we have already in the committee room one of the devices he speaks of for exhibiting maps so that a messenger can run them up or down. It covers all one side of the committee room.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Was that put in since last session?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—No, it was there all last session, and all plans can be fitted to it. Before leaving rule 115, it should provide that the map or plan should also show the principal rivers and railway lines, to indicate whether existing railways are to be paralleled by the railway that we are asked to charter. That is for the Railway Committee. I understand that the same plan could be used for the Standing Orders Committee and the Railway Committee. I notice that these other railway lines are often omitted in the plans submitted to the committee. If he would make it a rule that the plan should be a correct plan, showing the principal cities, large rivers and lakes, the general topography of the country, and existing railway lines, it would be more satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—A much simpler plan would answer the purpose of the Standing Orders Committee than the one we require for the Railway Committee, but it might not be proper to put the petitioners to the trouble of getting up two expensive copies when one might answer both purposes. We should see, however, that the plan we call for is one that answers the purpose of the Railway Committee, and if it did that it would answer the purpose of the Standing Orders Committee.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On rule 123. Bills may be referred to Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My recollection is that the Senate cannot of its own authority make a reference to the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This rule has been inoperative in the past. An attempt was made on one occasion to procure from the Supreme Court a decision and it was refused. I am afraid we have not the power by simply a rule of our House to make the Supreme Court take up a case and give a decision. It will require the action of both Houses of parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have a recollection of one case, but I cannot now quote it from memory, where we referred some matter to the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have the case before me. It will be found at page 725 of Bourinot. The first case was apparently with reference to the incorporation of the Christian Brothers' schools of Canada. Four of the judges expressed the opinion that the measure was of a class coming under provincial jurisdiction, and they apparently did not hear it. There was another case, on the Companies Act, 1862 to 1880. In that case the judges excused themselves from answering the first part on the ground that it related to private rights. Apparently the court took cognizance of the reference.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Since then they have declined.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If they have refused to hear a government reference recently, it seems to me that it is equally obvious that they would refuse to hear a reference from either House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The rule does no harm there.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It might be left for further consideration, having due regard to the refusal of the court cited by my hon. friend.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It might be amended so as to provide for a reference from the Governor in Council, with a request that they have it referred for the opinion of the Supreme Court. That seems to be the only way we can get at it.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On rule 125. Bill from Commons referred to Standing Orders Committee, where no petition.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The language of this rule does not appear to be very clear.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—On several occasions where no petitions had been presented to this House, the Bills in the meantime had come up from the House of Commons and the Standing Orders had both the Bills and the petitions before them. This is to obviate that duplication, and provide that in cases where the petition had already been referred to the Standing Orders Committee, it should be dealt with by that committee, and the Bill would lie on the table, until the petition was reported on by the committee. It is to obviate having both the petition and the Bill before the Standing Orders Committee at the same time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This refers to any private Bill from the House of Commons for which there is no petition.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the Senate. As the hon. gentleman from Killarney says, last session it happened twice that a Bill came up here and the Committee on Standing Orders had not reported on the petition, but the petition had gone to the committee, and it seemed absurd to refer the Bill to the committee as well as the petition. This just provides that if a petition has been referred to the Committee on Standing Orders, even though they have not reported on it, the Bill does not go to the committee, but remains on the table until the report comes from the committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a case where the Bill is based on a petition.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—You see here it says, 'Any private Bill from the House of Commons, not being based on a petition.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—The impression was that there was no petition. There was no report as to the petition and the House was under the impression that there had been no petition, and for that reason referred the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That was a false impression. You cannot make a rule to cover a false impression. I suggest that this should be modified to read 'Any private Bill from the House of Commons for which no petition, has been received by the Senate, &c.'

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The clause is very plain, and the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Stadacona should not be accepted. There may be a petition, but the petition may not have been referred to the Standing Orders Committee, and then if the petition has not been referred, it has been before the Senate and it is the Bill which is to be referred instead of the petition.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But that is not the case here. This deals with a Bill 'not being based on a petition.'

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—That is only part of the phrase, 'not being based on a petition which is before the Standing Orders Committee.' It is merely providing for a case where there may be a petition which has not been referred to the Standing Orders Committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If there is a petition, the Bill is based on that petition, but you are providing here for a Bill which is not based on a petition.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The rule is perfectly clear.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—It is the old law.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is the old law, but the old law is not clear.

Hon. Mr. SPEAKER—There is no question the clause provides for a Bill being sent to the committee and reported upon, instead of the petition.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—You declare that it is not based on a petition which has already been received. You declare that there is no petition, and at the same time you declare that there is a petition. My suggestion is to use the words 'For which no petition has been received by the Senate'.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I object to the amendment. I think the rule is as clear as it can be made, and the amendment would not meet the requirements at all.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In what way ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Because it would not provide for the case for which we want to make provision. We want to provide for two cases ; either that there may be no petition at all, or there may be a petition which has been presented at the time the Bill came here, but which petition has not been referred to the Standing Orders Committee. It would not be logical to ask the Standing Orders Committee to pass upon a petition and a Bill, and this is intended to merely cover that case. The words between brackets are as clear as can be. They must be read together. The hon. gentleman throws doubt on the meaning of the clause by stopping after reading three or four words, but there is no comma ; you have to take in their entirety the words in the brackets; 'Not being based on a petition which has already been remitted to the Committee on Standing Orders'.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What does the 'which' refer to ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It refers to the petition.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not see that there is any special objection to the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, because if you say any private Bill from the House of Commons for which no petition has been received by the Senate, you cover the whole ground, and the Bill is to be taken into consideration. That covers the case we intended to provide for. The old expression was 'Not reported on by the committee,' and we found that was objectionable. In this case the Bill would go to the committee only when no petition had been received. At any rate, the meaning of that is clear. The hon. gentleman from Stadacona, is a pretty acute and astute gentleman, and if he thought there was some doubt as to the meaning of the present rule—although it does not strike me there is any doubt—still if it strikes him that way, I think we should make it perfectly clear.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Suppose a petition is presented to-day to the House and not received to-day, and the Bill to which it relates comes from the House of Commons, we then have both the petition and the Bill; is it understood that the petition will be dropped, and that the Committee on Standing orders will deal with the Bill only ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They will both go to the Standing Orders Committee

Hon. Mr. POWER—If you say instead of 'received', 'presented to the Senate', you have got it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—But, suppose the Senate refuses to receive it ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This is to cover a case where there is no petition.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The time might have expired for receiving petitions.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But if the Standing Orders Committee reports that the time shall be extended, the time will be extended.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—But in the event of the time expiring, the door is then locked, because the petition may be presented and not received, and then you shut off the Bill from going before the Standing Orders Committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It covers the case where there is no petition at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Well, we shall leave it 'received by .

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—There is nothing to prevent the presentation of the petition, but the rules of the House may prevent its reception.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—In that way all Bills could come from the House of Commons without any petition being presented to the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

On rule 3. Existing rules repealed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I move that the following proviso be added to the clause :—

Provided, however, that this repeal does not extend to the rules and standing orders adopted on the 22nd day of March, 1906, which are declared to be in full force and effect and to form part of this codification of the rules and standing orders of the Senate, being rules 140 to 159, both included thereof.

That is to prevent any difficulty arising from our having adopted the divorce rules at an earlier date.

The amendment was agreed to and the rule as amended was adopted.

On rule 5. When rules go into operation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I propose to alter rule 5 so as to read :

These standing rules and orders shall go into operation on the 31st day of March in the year of Our Lord, 1906.

We shall have adjourned then, and the rules will be in operation when we come back.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What is the reason for bringing the rules into force immediately ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no particular reason, except that while these rules make no radical change in our practice, they make some changes which most members regard as desirable, and it is just as well that we should have the benefit of the amendments when we come back after the Easter recess.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have been asking for a long time to have these rules printed in French so that we might see their exact significance before they come into force. I asked that the report of the committee should be printed in the Votes and Proceedings of the Senate, then it would have been immediately translated into French, but I could not get it. The other day I threatened to raise an objection if we proceeded further, but I yielded on the promise that the disputed clauses would be held over.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am informed that the type is now being set for the French copy. These rules, when adopted, should be included in our minutes. That is the practice elsewhere. Then they will appear in the minutes both in English and French.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We are not altogether sure yet when we shall adjourn, we might possibly not adjourn until the 31st of March, and in that case we would not have printed rules to go by. In any event, we could hardly expect when we return on the 18th of April to find these rules completed, translated, printed and bound in volumes available for use. There is no hurry, we can work under the old rules for another month or even until the first of July. It would be a mistake to attempt to bring them into operation so soon.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is another objection. The committee had decided to wait for a conference with the Commons, and it is utterly impossible to say when that conference may take place.

The SPEAKER—We need not fix a date now; it might stand over until we see what progress is made.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask the hon. Secretary of State if he would be good enough to see that we get copies of these rules in French.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand the French edition is now in type.

The rule was allowed to stand.

On rule 16. Power and duty of Speaker.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—For my part I cannot accept this rule. It is entirely new, and gives the Speaker a power which he has never before had, nor has the Lord Chancellor ever had such power in the House of Lords. May states, although I could not cite the page, that each member of this House is equal one to the other. Nobody can command any member of this House. It is only the Senate that can call a member to order. By this clause the Speaker would have that power. Another thing; in England sometimes quarrels have occurred in the House of Lords, although not often. There was no other way of stopping the quarrel except by having the Clerk read a clause resembling rule 25, or rule 27, forbidding quarreling in the House. It happened twice only, and this proceeding had the effect of stopping the quarrel in each case. The Lord Chancellor had no right to call the parties to order. By this amendment we are putting ourselves in the same position as the members of the Commons ; we are putting ourselves under a chief, under a man who will be superior to us. For over two hundred years it has been the rule that the members of the Upper House are all equal; amongst themselves they have no superior. For that reason I object for my part to this clause, and ask that it be struck out.

Mr. SPEAKER—When the Clerk of the House read the rule, did he do that of his own motion or who commanded him to do it ?

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—In the House of Lords there are two rules, both of which are very old. When this quarrel happened it was about 1832 or 1833 on the Reform Bill. Some very hard words were used and the other peers became excited. One of the two rules I have referred to was that any member could rise and ask that the Clerk, not the Speaker, read the other rule—by which violent language is forbidden.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The committee understood that the practice in England is as has been stated by the hon. gentleman, but the committee, I think, were unanimous in adopting this wording. Heretofore the President of the Senate has been deprived of the rights which belong to any honourable member. It is open to any member, and it will remain open to any member, to raise a question of order; but heretofore it has not been open to the Speaker to call a member to order, which infringes upon the principle which has been enunciated by the hon. gentleman, that all members have equal rights.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The hon. gentleman says that the Speaker should have the same right as the other members to call a member to order. He has the same right. He is a member, and when he wants to speak, when he is not acting as the mouthpiece of the Senate, he must leave the Chair. In England, the Lord Chancellor must leave the woolsack and go to his seat, and there address the House. Therefore, he has already the same right as any other senator, but no member has the right to call out order. He may rise to a question of order, but he must make a motion, otherwise there is nothing before the House. When a member calls out 'order' and does not make a motion he is out of order himself.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Rule 28 of the House of Lords is as follows :

To prevent misunderstanding and for avoiding of offensive speeches, when matters are debating, either in the House or at committees, it is for honour sake thought fit, and so ordered, that all personal, sharp, or taxing speeches be forborn, and whosoever answereth another man's speech shall apply his answer to the matter without wrong to the person ; and as nothing offensive is to be spoken, so nothing is to be ill-taken, if the party that speaks it shall presently make a fair exposition, or clear denial of the words that might bear any ill construction ; and if any offence be given in that kind, as the House itself will be very sensible thereof, so it will sharply censure the offender. and give the party offended a fit reparation and a full satisfaction.

That seems to be the only rule they have.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—It is a confession of weakness on the part of the Senate to say that they must concede their good conduct to the charge of one individual. Heretofore the members of this House have been able to restrain themselves, but for some years past the debates have assumed such acrimony that members have used improper language to each other, and there should be some mode of dealing with cases of that kind. A very eminent member of this Senate, a few sessions ago, made use of a term which was most offensive and uncalled for. I brought it to the notice of the House at a subsequent meeting, and made a complaint, but there was no one to take notice of it. I sought to defend the rights of the Senate, but not a single member, not even the Speaker, said that I was right or wrong. That is a condition of affairs which should be remedied. I do not think there is anything unreasonable in confiding this duty to the Speaker, who is supposed to do his duty honourably, and I trust that no Speaker, no matter how strong a partisan he may have been prior to his appointment, will ever hesitate to do what is right and just here ; therefore I have no hesitation in conceding to him this privilege. Because in any case of gross misjudgment on his part, an appeal lies to the Senate. Repeated offences have been committed in the Senate in the past with regard to want of decorum, and it has brought discredit and dishonour upon us. I think this is the time to stop that condition of things for ever.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON. It will still be proper for a member to arise and call attention to a point of order. We are not going to throw the whole onus upon the Speaker.

This was a matter in regard to which the committee were unanimous. We are not giving any very great power to the Speaker, although the practice in the House of Lords, as stated by my hon. friend is, that the Speaker shall not preserve order or take the initiative in any way in doing so, and if we had no rule on the subject we would of course fall back on the rule of the House of Lords. The reason why the House of Lords have had no rule on this point is because of the anomalous position of the Speaker of that House. Lord Brougham was Speaker of the House when he was not a peer.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Lord Brougham was the last. Every Lord Chancellor since that has been a peer.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I presume that would be one good reason why the Lords would not give that power to their Speaker, when, under the constitution, it was possible that he might not be a peer. However, with us no such condition of things as that could obtain ; our Speaker, though nominated by the Crown, becomes a member of the Senate forthwith, and I do not think any harm could arise from adopting this rule which is couched in fair and reasonable language.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 20. Unfinished business.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It was I who asked to have this rule stand because rule 73 seemed to conflict with it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I suggest that the words 'subject to the provisions of rule 73,' be inserted. It would be well to have both rule 20 and rule 73 retained because rule 73 is in the middle of a number relating to private Bills.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suggest that we put a marginal note opposite rule 20, saying 'see rule 73.' The reader would then observe that there is another rule bearing on the same point.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 26. Objectionable notice disallowed by Speaker.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The only question that arose in discussing this rule was the difficulty of the Speaker knowing when he would find out that a notice contained objectionable words. He could only know that from hearing it read, and, in many cases, I am sure he does not hear the notices read. The Clerk could, when the motion is handed in, run his eye over it and see if it contains objectionable words, and then could call the Speaker's attention to them, but it is just possible that notices might appear on the paper without the objectionable language being discovered.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The officers of the House who would allow a notice of that kind to go without calling the Speaker's attention to it, would deserve the censure of the Senate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who is to judge whether it is objectionable language or not? That which is considered offensive by one might not be considered offensive by others.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It puts the responsibility on the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I suppose it is the duty of the Clerk or the Speaker to carefully read over every motion. The Speaker would have the discretion to decide.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—My recollection is that the committee desired to leave this rule as flexible as possible. In practice it will work out this way ; a notice may be given which the clerk may think irregular. He calls the Speaker's attention to it. We are fortunate in having a clerk who is well versed in parliamentary usage, and I am sure he will not allow an irregular motion to pass without bringing it to the attention of the Speaker. If, by any inadvertence, a member should put in a notice of that kind, his attention will be called to it, and the irregularity will be corrected.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That might apply to unbecoming words, but who is to judge when it offends against a rule of the Senate ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I am sure the hon. member from Stadacona would be the first to call attention to it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It might involve a discussion of two or three days on a simple notice of motion. If there is nothing unbecoming in the language of the notice, it should be allowed to go on the paper, and if there is anything objectionable otherwise, it could be dealt with in the House.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—We say that a motion shall not contain a preamble. A preamble would not be 'unbecoming words', and yet it would be contrary to the rules of the House.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 32. Certain motions may be reconsidered.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—This is the rule to which I took exception the other day. I am unconverted; I am still of the opinion that that rule should not be adopted. We are a deliberative body and our judgment of to-day is likely to be as good as our judgment of to-morrow. I do not think we can change in twenty-four hours so much as to reverse the decision of the House, and we have in rule 25, another method by which the decision of the House can be reversed, and in reversing we would reconsider. I am strongly of opinion that this rule No. 32, is one not calculated to raise the dignity of the Senate as a deliberative body.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why not move to strike it out?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I move that rule 32 be struck out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I trust the committee will not strike out this rule. It is one which is in use in every legislature in the adjoining republic, from congress down to the smallest state, and it has been found to work satisfactorily there. We have had occasions here, within recent years, when it would have been a very good thing to have had some provision of this kind. We discussed the matter a little the other evening, and there is this case—to put the simplest one,—that in a very thin House, say on a Friday afternoon, some report of a committee may be adopted or voted down which members might feel would not have been the case had the House been full. Surely it is not unreasonable that there should be a chance to revise and reconsider that decision of the House, so that you will have the sense of the whole House, or of a reasonably full House? Then there are resolutions occasionally adopted without due consideration. That may happen in any legislative body, and there should be an opportunity to reconsider these. Honourable gentlemen are under the impression that this proposal makes a very serious change, and that it diminishes or interferes in some way with the procedure of the House; that it makes it possible to do things which could not have been done before. It is just the other way. At the present time, on the day after any resolution is adopted, or two days after, any member can rise and move a resolution to the effect that the action of the House on a previous day be rescinded. He can do that without giving any notice. That is a much more objectionable state of things than we would have under this rule. If this is adopted, the reconsideration cannot take place unless the notice is given on the day on which the action of the House has been taken, so that no one is taken by surprise. I remember more than one case; but there was one case to which I can refer in the Journals. In the session of 1900 this House passed a resolution at one sitting with respect to a Bill which was passing between the two Houses, and, at the next sitting, the House rescinded the resolution which it had passed at the previous sitting. It is highly objectionable that we should be in such a position, that you can solemnly adopt a resolution to-day, there is no objection taken to it, no notice of reconsideration given, and you can, two days after, move to rescind that action of the House. This amendment is really a conservative step. It points out how the House can reconsider its action. When it comes to rescinding where no preliminary notice has been given, you must have seven days' notice of the intention to rescind, and you must have a majority of all the members of the House to vote for rescinding. In England they rescind, and as I say we have rescinded here. In England they have to resort to all sorts of expedients to reach the result which is arrived at by the reconsideration. These are the reasons given by 'Cushing's Manual' for this rule for reconsidering:

> The inconvenience of this rule, which is still maintained in all its strictness in the British parliament (though divers expedients are there resorted to, as an explanatory or amending Act, to counteract or evade it), has led to the introduction into parliamentary practice of this country of the motion for reconsideration; which, while it recognizes and upholds the rule in all its ancient strictness, yet allows a deliberative assembly, for sufficient reasons, to relieve itself from the embarrassment and inconvenience which would occasionally result from a strict enforcement of the rule in a particular case.

It has now come to be a common practice in all our deliberative assemblies, and may consequently be considered as a principle of the common parliamentary law of this country, to reconsider a vote already passed, whether affirmatively or negatively.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Does not my hon. friend think this House has an inherent power to reconsider, without a rule at all ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It has the right to rescind, and that right should be regulated. What we are really doing is regulating and controlling the power to rescind. I think it is an unseemly thing that a body like this should to-day solemnly decide something, and to-morrow, without notice, reverse that decision. If notice of reconsideration is given, you have not that spectacle. The House is warned that an attempt will be made to reconsider what has been done, and every member has an opportunity to be present.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is the hon. gentleman of the opinion that this rule takes away the right of reconsideration except in the way provided here ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Or do they both exist simultaneously ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It means that if you wish to reconsider the action of the Senate you have to give notice that you propose to ask to have that done.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But you must give that notice on the same day that the action of the House is taken?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does it deprive one of the general right?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, because if you will look at rule 35 you will see that an order may be rescinded, but you must give seven days' notice.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I would understand that if the two rules are adopted, 32 and 35, no reconsideration could be taken unless under clause 32. Therefore, notice would have to be given at the same sitting. A reconsideration of a motion and a recission of a motion are two different things. Reconsideration does not necessarily imply recission. The question is opened up again and the motion may be amended and adopted in an amended form, or negatived entirely, which would amount to a recission. With that exception I am perfectly in accord with the hon. member from Halifax. I think there is an inherent power in the Senate to reconsider, unless we adopt a rule to the contrary. Therefore, if you were to strike out rule 32, the Senate would have the right to reconsider and without any regulation of the matter. It is better, in my opinion, to regulate it and state, as is stated here that a notice must be given at the same sitting. Therefore I am in favour of maintaining rules 32 and 35.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The rule appeals to my judgment, inasmuch as I have known very many cases in the Senate where a snap decision has been obtained in a very thin House, and I feel it would be very wise if the House could have preserved it sub-judice. If a notice is given at the same sitting it is equal to a postponement of a consideration of the question, and it comes up immediately while it is fresh in everybody's mind. No harm can arise under it. Every hon. gentleman must know that cases have occurred in this Chamber of resolutions being adopted that really did not represent the sense of the Senate. This, at all events, preserves to the Senate the power to have a more formal and just decision in a matter that may arise.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The arguments advanced in favour of this rule by the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. member for Halifax are simply in favour of legislating for the benefit of those who absent themselves from their duties. Every Senator knows that his duty is to attend to his business here. If we are legislating to provide for absentees, it is only an encouragement to them to stop away. There is no objection to this rule unless it is restricted, as I have seen it restricted in other places where the rule prevails, to giving an opportunity to a member who has inadvertently voted in favour of a motion and who desires that it should be reconsidered. He would have a right to move for a reconsideration. You have this difficulty : The hon. gentleman says in a very thin House a motion may be brought up, considered and carried.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—Unanimously.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Unanimously if you like.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There would be no re consideration in that case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Any Senator who disagrees or is opposed to it could at once give notice for a reconsideration, and there would be an interminable difficulty on every occasion when a Senator was dissatisfied with the decision of the majority. He can give notice of reconsideration and that may occur every day in the week. I do not anticipate that it will occur, but it is opening the door for that kind of trouble. With the power we have to reconsider any question which comes before us, it seems to me this is a rule that ought not to be adopted, unless you put after the word 'adopted,' 'by a senator who has voted in the affirmative.' In that case any senator when a question comes up which he may not thoroughly understand and which, having been explained to him, he thinks he would have voted against had he previously understood it, he would have the right to say: 'I should like to have it reconsidered,' but if you leave the rule as it is now proposed it will open the door for interminable trouble.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—As applied to a Bill I do not think the rule is as important as it first appeared to be; but it appears to me there is great danger so far as it applies to motions. The hon. gentleman says that if a substantive motion is carried, then, unless at that very sitting on which the motion is carried, notice of reconsideration is given, he cannot move. Supposing it happens in a thin House, and the motion is carried unanimously, I should like to know how anybody could find a Senator who would give notice of reconsideration since all present favoured it? That would be very dangerous; whilst if we strike out this clause and keep rule 35, I could understand after giving seven days' notice if a majority voted in favour of the decision, it might be finally decided for the rest of the session, but under rule 32 it is proposed to make it possible to take action which shall be final.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—That power would, naturally, not be exercised if there is unanimity.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Our present rule, number 43, relates to re-consideration with regard to Bills.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The proposed rule 32, does not apply to Bills at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a constitutional principle that you cannot consider the same question twice during the same session, which is a very wise rule, and it is laid down by all the authorities and for this reason: you might be defeated to-day and bring up the same question to morrow; you might in that way bring it up every day, and practice has taught the legislators in England to adopt the rule that after a legislative body has decided a question it cannot be brought up again during the same session. The Hon. Senator from Victoria, B.C., two years ago, moved a resolution for an amendment to a Bill then before the House, relating to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, that the work of construction should be commenced at both ends of the line simultaneously. For some reason or other that was voted down. Some days afterwards, Senator Templeman, then a minister without portfolio, moved a similar motion, but it was ruled out of order because that question had already been decided. Under this rule he could have moved for reconsideration. I think we are opening the door for a great deal of trouble.

Bourinot deals with that question on page 414. I was under the impression we could reconsider a motion and practically reverse what we had previously done, but, according to the authorities laid down, we apparently have not that inherent power. Bourinot says:

> When a question has been once and sufficiently considered, the House will not agree to its renewal. In 1880——

And this, apparently, is a decision of our own House——

> In 1880 a senator rose and gave the usual notice of proposed resolution, but objection was at once taken on the ground that the matter had been already disposed of otherwise. The Senate finally resolved that, 'the notice should not be received by the clerk,' inasmuch as the subject-matter thereof 'had already been considered during the present session and referred to the Committee on Contingent Accounts.'

Under note C, on page 415, are a number of authorities of an analogous character deciding that we cannot reconsider a matter, once having taken action, during the same session. I must say as I remarked the other night, I am a little in doubt as to these two rules. I think that a statutory rule might be evolved out of the two, 32 and 35, and that they should not be included as they stand. With proper safeguarding, a kind of compromise rule between the two might possibly be adopted, safeguarding any reckless action of the House during a small attendance of members.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—With reference to rule 32, I have no sympathy with the thin House argument at all. I do not think it should be taken for granted if the House contains only a few members that it is the members who possess the wisdom of the House who are away. Those who attend to their work diligently are more apt to form a correct judgment than those who drop in occasionally and dip into the work of the Senate.

Rule 32, proposes that any substantive motion which has been adopted by the Senate other than a motion relating to a Bill, may be reconsidered. That is all the action that is proposed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The proviso which follows, is really the important part of the rule. The matter is practically sub judice, it is under the control of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—May, on page 286 lays down the following principle:

It is a rule, in both Houses, which is essential to the due performance of their duties, that no question or Bill shall be offered that is substantially the same as one on which their judgment has already been expressed in the current session.

The authority given to us for years past is merely to reconsider. What is contained in the word reconsideration? If we reopen a question the next day, and decide something different from what was concluded the day before; if our decision happens to be to rescind, we are confronted by rule 35 which requires seven days' notice. While it might be wisdom, you cannot rescind under this rule. It seems to me we are making a rule which in many circumstances cannot be worked out to a logical end. After we have spent the second day in backsetting what we did the day before, we come to the conclusion that we are going to rescind our decision. Then immediately, the point of order is raised, under rule 35, that you cannot rescind. Now, I submit that rule 32 is not one which should commend itself to the judgment of the House.

The SPEAKER—I cannot admit the conclusion of the hon. gentleman as to the two rules clashing. My hon. friend could, I think, easily qualify for practice at the bar after the reasoning which he has just given us, but there are two ways of reconsidering, and two ways of rescinding a vote. The first one is given under rule 32 which says that if a notice be given at the same sitting the matter may be reconsidered the next day and dealt with either by readoption or by rescission. There are two modes of rescinding, in one of them notice can be given the same day, the other mode is found under rule 35, but there can be no question that the power to rescind under 32 is complete under the ordinary rules of interpretation which prevail before the courts, and which would prevail here. If the power is given to reconsider, power is given to alter the decision and to rescind if necessary. There are two ways of reaching this conclusion.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I have to thank the Speaker for giving us a clear interpretation of rule 32, and, from that interpretation, it appears that the rule is more dangerous than we thought it was. We can rescind on one day's notice, a thing which I think ought not to be possible.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the hon. gentleman puts the matter fairly. The object of giving notice of reconsideration is to keep the question open. While this reconsideration is pending the matter is not closed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We could keep it like that all session.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Rule 34 disposes of that argument. It is really most important that we should have the opportunity of reconsidering. It does not apply to Bills, where it might be mischievous. The rules with respect to Bills provide ample opportunity for re-consideration before they finally become law, but sometimes the adoption of a resolution, for instance with regard to the report of a committee, or some other matter about which there has been no time for consideration, may be really just as serious as any other.

It being 6 o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole :—

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend from Calgary, at an early stage of this discussion on rule 32, pointed out that, in his opinion, rules 32 and 35 might be embodied in one. I do not think you require these two sets of remedies to reconsider and to rescind. I find nothing in English practice about reconsideration, but there is a great deal about rescinding. My hon. friend from Killarney (Hon. Mr. Young) read a paragraph from 'May,' but had he read on further he would have found that there is ample provision for rescinding, the English arrive at the same conclusion as the Americans reach by reconsideration. One of three courses is open to us, either to depend upon the inherent power of parliament to reconsider or rescind, of which I have no doubt whatever, or follow the English practice, or make a rule for reconsideration or for rescinding, and have only one; but this double set is not necessary and will prove embarrassing. If a snap vote should be obtained at any time, and it is desirable to change the decision of the House, we could do so either by reconsidering or by rescinding. If hon. gentlemen will look at pages 286 and 287 of 'May,' they will find precedents there for effecting the object in almost any case, and the result, according to 'May,' has been practically what we mean by reconsideration. If the chairman of the committee who has charge of the rules would take this matter in hand and give us one rule which would meet our needs, I would be satisfied, or would not object if both were stricken out and we were left to depend upon the power of parliament to do what we want to do.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The better plan now is to adopt rule 32. We have not that practice here, and it is much better than the practice of rescinding. We have the power to rescind, apparently without giving notice, but even supposing notice were given, a notice of a day or two, where a resolution has been adopted by the Senate, and no notice has been given of any intention to move against it, it seems to me would be objectionable if that resolution can at some later day be rescinded without a prolonged notice. If we are to do without either practice, I think the better thing would be to do without the power of rescinding.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This applies to all substantive motions, does it not ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Suppose the leader of the House gives notice that he will move for the appointment of the Striking Committee, and moves that motion the next day and it is carried, and some one gives notice of reconsideration that throws it over to the next day; and then if you want to rescind it, it will take seven days more under rule 35.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not see why we should mix up 32 and 35.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The one follows the other. The whole three are placed in the rules, I take it, for a certain purpose. One is to reconsider, the next paragraph declares that you shall not do that twice; then the next provision is for giving seven days' notice to rescind. I do not anticipate that anything of the kind will ever occur, but it might happen if any one desired to obstruct the House. You could do it under this rule without any difficulty and we could not help ourselves.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If we were to strike out the proposed rule with regard to rescinding and make a rule for reconsideration it is very doubtful whether we could adopt the English practice as far as rescinding goes, because it would require a Philadelphia lawyer to distinguish between them. It would be held that we had a rule for reconsideration and therefore could not follow the English practice.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—We lock the door.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If we are going to have a rule at all, I think it would be better to follow the English practice, but that practice would be quite good enough for us without any rule.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—If either rule is to be sacrificed, I would rather strike out 32 and keep 35.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We do not want to sacrifice anything; but we may amend 35.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It is understood that 32, if passed, will refer to all reports of committees.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Every substantive motion.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—In fact every motion passed by the House may be reviewed in this way excepting motions referring to Bills.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no doubt about that.

The committee divided on the motion to strike out rule 32, which was rejected. Contents, 11 ; non-contents, 16.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Can I give notice to reconsider ?

The rule was adopted.

On rule 35. Vote may be rescinded under certain conditions.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If the House has swallowed rule 32 it may as well swallow rule 35.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We should strike out rule 35.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It applies to an entirely different condition of things. It requires a majority of all the Senate to make the change, and requires seven days' notice.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is a different way of getting at it, but after all you are aiming to effect the same thing, and you will have our rules encumbered with two processes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I fancy this is a very safe rule. If you carry it out, you will scarcely ever be able to get a majority of the Senate. You must have a majority of all the senators, whether present or not.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 45. Motions for ajournment of Senate, how made.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am entirely opposed to this rule. It contains a great many absurdities. It opens with a provision that no motion for the adjournment of the Senate may be made without notice, except by or on behalf of the Minister of the Crown, unless a certain action is taken by some senators in bringing up a matter of urgent public importance. What would happen if a minister, having made a motion to adjourn, was defeated by the House ? It would not be competent for any one excepting a minister, or some one on his behalf, to move the adjournment. The minister might leave the House, and there would be no one present to move the adjournment. That is one objection. There is another objection that no member may rise, when the orders of the day are called, to bring a matter of public importance before the Senate unless five senators thereupon arise in their places indicating their approval of the proposed discussion ? By the common law of parliament, it is quite proper for any member to rise when the orders of the day are called in this House. It has been the practice that any member might do so in order to call attention to a question of public importance, and a discussion might arise thereupon, and it would be competent after he had completed this discussion for another member to rise and bring up another subject. Although hon. gentlemen might differ from some members who have used that privilege, I do not remember in the history of this House that any serious abuse has arisen from that practice. As a rule we do not have discussion enough. It would be better for the credit and standing of this body before the country, if we had more discussion of public questions, rather than to restrict and make it impossible for us to have such discussions as have taken place in the past. I think it would be manifestly unfair if a member of this House should not be allowed to rise and bring a matter of public importance before this body without canvassing and securing beforehand the support of five members of the House to give him that right. The practice of this House has always been that any member could bring a question of importance before the Senate. We are going to restrict, to a very great extent, that privilege under this rule. I can imagine a case—I am sorry to see that my hon. friend from Richmond is not in the House—but we have a third party in this House, and it is to be expected that that gentleman will from time to time ventilate views not in accord with the regular opposition—if we can be said to have a regular opposition here—or the supporters of the government. If he wants to bring up a matter of urgent public importance, which, from his point of view, should be attended to, he will have to go to those who are politically opposed to him and ask them to stand up and get for him that privilege. The second subsection says that when speaking to the motion :

> The mover and the minister first speaking shall not exceed thirty minutes each, and any other senator or the mover in reply shall not exceed thirty minutes each, and every senator shall confine himself to the subject in respect tp which the motion has been made.

By implication it is quite proper and regular to speak irrelevantly on any other question coming before this House, but on speaking on this particular subject, and rising at this time, you are expected to confine yourself to the rules of the House, and strictly to the subject under discussion, which, as I said, by implication, would lead to the belief that you are free to violate all the rules of the House on every other question coming before the House. The subsection continues :

> And the whole discussion on the subject shall not exceed three hours.

I do not know what object there can be for this. These rules are taken from the rules of the Australian parliament. There may be circumstances there that call for them, but there is no necessity for placing that restriction on debate in this House. I hope that the House will refuse its assent to this rule.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What led to the adoption of this rule ? I was not present, and did not hear that portion of the discussion. Had it been considered that an ordinary motion to adjourn the House with a view to discussing any question has ever been abused by this House ? Within my memory it has not been done on more than three or four occasions within the last ten years. It certainly has never been the subject of abuse in the House, and why a well established practice of that nature should be wiped out, I am at a loss to understand.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We got along for a great many years in this Senate, and suffered no serious inconvenience from the absence of various rules, but as time goes on, in this House, just as in other bodies, we find that we require more rules. For instance in the English House of Commons, when the first edition of 'May' was published, there were only 14 rules. When the tenth edition was published there were considerably over one hundred rules. There was no special history in connection with this rule. It was put in the draft rule submitted to the committee, and as far as my memory goes there was no very serious discussion over it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There was no prolonged discussion. At the final meeting, the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, very properly and very courteously, said something to this effect : 'I entertain very serious objections to this rule, and shall bring the matter up in the Senate,' and he is very properly exercising that right now. At that meeting, I think the hon. leader of the opposition was not present, but he had previously intimated that he did not approve of this method. Let us look at the position ; without these rules there is nothing to hinder the adjournment of the House from being moved three or four times in the same afternoon, and nothing to prevent the whole time of the House being taken up with motions of that kind, which would seriously obstruct the regular business of this Chamber. There is another thing to be considered ; when an hon. member rises and moves the adjournment of the House, those to whom he may not have communicated his intentions, are taken by surprise, and they are not in a position, perhaps, to deal with the motion in as satisfactory a way as they would be if they had notice. Now, there is nothing to hinder any hon. member who wishes to bring a matter before the House from doing so, by giving one or two days' notice, and I think that is no great grievance. If the hon. gentleman has a matter to bring before the Senate, he should let his colleagues in the House know that he is going to bring it up. Then, if the matter is one of urgent importance, as to which there has been no chance of giving notice, surely any hon. member who wishes to bring an important public matter before the House can secure the assent of five of his colleagues to endorse his action. That is all that is required. If we were exacting anything unreasonable, I could understand an objection to the proposed rule. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield seems to have a very unfavourable opinion of the rules of the Senate in Australia. I do not know just why. The Senate of Australia is a respectable body—a representative body. It is a body composed of only thirty-six members, whereas this Senate is composed now of nearly ninety members, and there is more occasion for a rule of this kind in a body of ninety members, than there is in one of 36. The Australian rules are, I assume, the work of Mr. Blackmore, who is the Clerk of the Senate of Australia, and Mr. Blackmore is one of the highest living authorities on parliamentary procedure. They were laying the foundation of their new commonwealth and great care and pains were taken in preparing these rules, and this rule which the hon. gentleman from Marshfield thinks is absurd, is almost word for word the same as the Australian rule. This is the Australian rule No. 60 :

A motion without notice that the Senate at its rising adjourn to any day or hour other than that fixed for the next ordinary meeting of the Senate for the purpose of debating some matter of urgency can only be made after petitions have been presented and notices of questions and motions given, and before the business of the day is proceeded with, and such motion can be made notwithstanding there be on the paper a motion for adjournment to a time other than that of the next ordinary meeting. The senator so moving must make in writing and hand in to the president, a statement of the matter of urgency. Such motion must be supported by four senators rising in their places as indicating their approval thereof. Only the matter in respect of which such motion is made can be debated. Not more than one such motion can be made during a sitting of the Senate.

The rule is almost identical with the rule in the House of Commons and even out in the comparatively young colony of New Zealand, I find the same rule amongst the standing orders of the Legislative Assembly.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The same rule ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Substantially.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I should like to hear it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Rule 110 :—

The adjournment of the House may be moved at any time after the questions are disposed of, but the debate on such motions must be confined strictly to the question of adjournment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Are not these portions of the rules that were adopted in order to enforce the closure ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—These are the rules of the New Zealand Legislature. The English rule is No. 10 :—

109. No motion for the adjournment of the House shall be made until all the questions asked at the commencement of the business of the afternoon sitting are disposed of, unless by leave of the House.

110. The adjournment of the House may be moved at any time after the questions are disposed of, but the debate on such motion must be confined strictly to the question of adjournment, unless seven members rise, and then any specific question alluded to in the replies of ministers to questions on that day may be discussed.

111. In speaking to such motion, the mover shall not exceed thirty minutes, and any other member shall not exceed fifteen minutes, and the whole discussion on the subject shall not exceed two hours.

It is not a matter of very urgent importance to us, but it is just as well to have rules laid by, so to say, which can be used if necessary. This Senate never rigidly enforces its rules. There is always a disposition to let hon. members have as much fair play as is consistent with the comfort of the remainder of the House. I suppose this is a rule which probably would hardly ever be put into operation, but it is well to have a weapon in our armoury in order that the House may protect itself.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The rules read by my hon. friend, taken from the Australian commonwealth, and also from New Zealand, and even the rules adopted in the Imperial parliament have all been the outcome of exceptional conditions that have no parallel whatever in this parliament.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What are the exceptional conditions in Australia ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is an excitability prevailing there that has no parallel in this country. We know that Australian governments have averaged a change every two years. The labour and other troubles in New Zealand have contributed to the adoption of the rule which my hon. friend has read. The obstruction which has prevailed in the Imperial parliament for many years past has led to rules of closure such as my hon. friend has read, but I would challenge anybody to point out any abuse of that well established rule that a motion to adjourn, is always in order, in the Canadian parliament. As I have already said, I have no recollection, during the fourteen or fifteen years I have been in this House, that a motion to adjourn the House has been invoked on more than three or four occasions. It has been invoked this session, but I do not think it was last year, or during any recent session. It is the outgrowth of necessity, of well established parliamentary practice, and it is never invoked except some exigency arises which one might say on the spur of the moment demanded a public discussion on a question of public importance. Then, how can one foresee that such a condition of affairs is to happen to such an extent? Must this foresight be carried so far that a day's notice has to be given and five or six members approached to support the member who moves the adjournment of the House.

In my judgment, the passage of rules of this character should only be the outcome of necessity. I think that is a well established practice that rules of procedure have been the evolution of practice and of experience and of the requirements of conditions which from time to time arise, and to say that we should forestall the future and anticipate difficulty by adopting a rule of this character is, in my judgment, not only unwise but inexpedient and tends to the suppression of free speech and of that liberty which should characterize all representative institutions. I certainly am entirely opposed to this innovation. It is unwarranted. Nothing has arisen either in the House of Commons or in this Senate which would warrant us in circumscribing the liberty which each member has of moving the adjournment of the debate for the purpose of discussing some public question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Unless there is a general expression of opinion in favour of this rule, I hope my hon. friend will not press it. To my mind it is not called for by any circumstances which have arisen in the Dominion Senate. I notice that in the House of Commons there used to be a sort of conference between the two parties with a view of adopting some rule of this kind, but the conditions existing there are not the same as in this Chamber, and unless the sentiment is remarkably strong in favour of it, I think it is a rule that might stand until the necessity for it arises.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The chairman of the committee intimated that no objection was taken to this rule in the committee. He must have forgotten that I fought it there for over half an hour after which it was allowed to stand. When I advocated postponing the consideration of these rules until the present session, this was one of the reasons I gave; that the provision we are now discussing was so important that it should be delayed for further consideration, and I accused the hon. gentleman at the same time of attempting to introduce the closure into this country, which he repudiated very strongly. I think the hon. gentleman should accede to the request made by the Secretary of State. I have no recollection of anything approaching real obstruction occurring in the Senate since I have had a seat in it, except once, and that was caused by the hon. gentleman himself aided by the Secretary of State when they sat on this side of the House. They opposed the passage of the Hudson Bay Railway Bill, alleging that they thought there was some ulterior object and although they did not go the length of saying so, I fancy they thought there was a little boodling in connection with it. But two or three years ago the hon. gentleman introduced a Bill to extend the same privilege to the same parties for the construction of that Hudson Bay Railway. That is the only time I can recollect anything like real obstruction, and I do not see why, in a body of this kind, the right to move the adjournment should be confined to a Minister of the Crown, or that any one desiring to speak thereon shall be confined to so many minutes. I think it is altogether uncalled for. It implies an abuse of rules, which has never existed in this House except upon the occasion to which I refer. If hon. gentlemen look at Rule 50 it will be seen that during a debate no motion is received except to amend the question, to commit it or to postpone it. You can move the previous question, or you can move that the orders of the day be read, which virtually kills the question under discussion, or move for the adjournment of the House. How far would the adoption of this rule go to prevent a gentleman from rising in his place to make an explanation ? I remember last session or the session before I was, as I thought, misrepresented by the hon. gentleman from Toronto who is not here, I arose at once to make a correction, but I was called to order on the ground that I had spoken and consequently I had to sit down. I recollect whispering to my hon. friend on my right to move the adjournment of the House in order to enable me to put myself right. I was thus enabled to make my explanation. Is that right to be cut off?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend says no, but where is the rule ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The last paragraph of the rule says that this rule does not apply to the adjournment of the Senate under rule 50.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Rule 50 applies only to a question which is under debate. It declares what motions can be made, and among them is a motion for the House to adjourn. That does not provide for moving the adjournment of the House under any other condition. It must be during the time of a debate upon some question. I opposed this, from the beginning, and the more I think of it the stronger my feeling grows.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As the feeling of the House seems to be against it, and particularly after the expression of opinion from the Secretary of State, I move that rules 45 and 46 be struck out.

The motion was adopted.

On rule 51. Senator called to order.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I should like to have an explanation as to how a senator is to be called to order ? He cannot be called to order by another senator saying 'Order, order'; he must be called to order by the Senate and there must be a motion. I think it would be well to make this rule a little clearer.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Under the new rules it will be the duty of the Speaker to call a member to order, and when a member is called to order, he always sits down. I have understood that the hon. gentleman from Montarville (Mr. DeBoucherville) was an exceedingly conservative gentleman. This rule is one which prevails, I think, in the legislative council of Quebec, and prevailed for 20 years in the Legislative Council of Canada before confederation. When a member is called to order, no matter what process you have to go through, it is his duty to sit down.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Called to order by whom?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not matter by whom. In future I assume it will be the duty of the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I merely asked an explanation, and the hon. gentleman rises at once with a personal question as to my being a Conservative. It does not follow because this rule has been on our books for such a long time that it is clear. I think it is not clear. It is only the Senate who can make me sit down. No one has a right to tell me to sit down, though he may be impolite enough to shout at me; the Senate alone has that power. Now, I ask if this is made clearer, because it seems to me that the hon. gentleman thinks it is enough for any senator to call out order to another, and that thereupon that other must sit down.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The practice has grown recently in this House of calling out order in the most vociferous manner. That is not the proper thing to do. The proper course is to arise to a point of order, and then the chair, under rule 16, will take cognizance of it. My hon. friend is quite right in calling attention to this subject.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Another inconvenience that will result from the adoption of this rule will be this : the rule says any senator called to order shall sit down and shall not proceed without the consent of the Senate. The consent of the Senate, that is, I presume, the leave of the Senate. According to the definition in paragraph four, the leave of the Senate is leave granted without a dissenting voice. I may call some one to order, and he will sit down, but any other member may stand up, and prevent me from speaking by saying '1 shall not give my consent.' The consent of the Senate is not given, and I must stop.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Our practice has been abrogated by the adoption of rule 16, to which my hon. friend objected when it was before the Senate. Rule 16 gives the power to the Speaker, and makes it his duty to call a senator to order. There is a rule that senators must, in debating a question, adhere strictly to the subject under discussion. If a senator is beginning to ramble, it is the duty of the Speaker to call him to order. Rule 16 will give to the Speaker of the Senate, as I understand, the same power as is exercised by the Speaker of the House of Commons. The rights and privileges which senators have exercised in the past in this House are taken from them and placed in the hands of the Speaker. We are destroying the ancient usages of the House of Lords by these rules, and the usages of this Senate also.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I take rule 51 to mean that when a point of order is raised the senator who is called to order must sit down, otherwise we would have any number of gentlemen speaking at the same time. It is only pending the decision, so that the point raised by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) does not apply. After the decision is rendered of course the discussion may go on. As to the consent of the Senate, it is of course the unanimous consent, it is a way of stating that unless the point of order is abandoned it is not persisted in. There should be no bracket in the sentence.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He is deprived of discussing the point of order.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—The one out of order is deprived of speaking, certainly.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—A decision has been given on that point already. My hon. friend from Richmond raised that objection once and he succeeded.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When we speak of being called to order, we mean properly called to order. The proper way to call to order is the mode adopted by the hon. gentleman himself on a good many occasions when he has risen and stated that he raised a question of order. It is then the duty of the member who has the floor to sit down until that question is decided. The House has always allowed the member who was out of order to make an explanation and defend himself, and it would continue to do so in the future. While the Speaker will have more to say in dealing with questions of order than in the past, the members of the House will still have the same right as members of the House of Commons possess.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If I rise to a question of order connected with something which my hon. friend has said, he will sit down while I discuss the point of order. As soon as I have stated my views, if the hon. gentleman wants to get up and defend his position and show that he is right, he will be deprived of the opportunity of doing so, because pending the decision of the Speaker he has no right to speak.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He has a right to speak on the point of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If you read the rule you will find that he has not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He cannot proceed with the subject matter of his speech, but he can discuss the point of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. Secretary of State is making a distinction that is not in the rules.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Leave of the Senate is defined by the rules to be leave granted without a dissenting voice; but the consent of the Senate, I take it, could be given by a majority of the Senate; at least that is the interpretation I put upon it, and that is the interpretation put upon it by the committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What is the difference between 'consent' and 'leave'?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The only difference is, as my hon. friend will observe, that by the interpretation clause we put a special meaning upon the word 'leave' and not upon the word 'consent.'

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Two things equal to a third are equal as between themselves.

Hon. Mr. POWER.—We have never had any trouble in this connection.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 52.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I suggest that the only portion of this rule which should be kept is the first portion: 'All personal, sharp or taxing speeches are forbidden' and that the rest should be struck out. If the remainder is retained it should be an independent rule, because it is not germane and it is not intended to be germane to the first part. Let us make a rule of the first sentence, and make the remainder of the present rule 52 into a new rule.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have no objection to accept the amendment of the hon. member from de Salaberry. It will have this beneficial effect, that this sub-division of the rule will fill up the vacant numbers.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And it will not conflict with the power given to the Speaker.

The rule was divided and adopted.

On rule 58, 'Senator with pecuniary interest not to vote.'

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—How are you going to make senators observe that rule? I know of two senators who voted upon a Bill in the railway committee, who had a direct interest in its defeat, and if they had not interfered the Bill would have been carried.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was responsible for having this rule stand over. The hon. member from de Salaberry will remember that while I was not satisfied, I did not feel prepared to draft anything to meet the case. I knew that the rule did not seem to be efficient in the past. I have myself seen notable instances of transgression of the principle on the part of hon. members. It cannot be denied for a moment that it is a serious transgression of the principle of this rule and of parliamentary propriety for senators to appear as promoters of charters, say for railways. The hon. senator from Toronto, when the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill was before the House, very properly took that position and did not record his vote. I thought he acted properly on that occasion, but I am sorry to say I have observed instances in this House, and very many more in the other branch of parliament where members have advocated Bills for charters which they were trying to put through committees, Bills in which their own names appeared as the original charter members. If possible we ought to endeavour to strengthen this rule so that this practice should be prevented. I have known members of both Houses to go among their colleagues and ask their help to get such Bills through. In many cases, members of parliament who have put themselves in that position, are not railway builders at all, and everybody knows they are not, that the purpose is to sell the charter, to use their influence in parliament in order to get a charter for a railway which they do not intend to build, but which they intend to sell to some railway company. It is a very great abuse and, in some way or other, we ought to get at it and prevent it. Not only that, but in the application for such a charter as that, a block is interposed in the way of giving a charter to actual railway builders over the same route, who are thus driven to buy out these charter mongers. It is clear to me, that we should have some rules to prevent a member of parliament from doing that which is not proper to be done even by citizens outside of parliament—that is, applying for charters where they never intend to build a railway, for the purpose of placing themselves in the position of charter mongers to sell their charters to actual railway builders.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—Would it not be well to construct the rule so as to prevent members of parliament from being promoters of charters?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. member from de Salaberry will remember that I put my views before him and he gave me his assurance that he would try to improve this rule. He was not present in the committee when the matter came up and I did not feel myself competent to draft a rule which would cover the case. Railway charters, I know, furnish much more flagrant instances of violation of this principle than banks. In the latter case, men invest their money substantially, and the interest of a bank director or a bank shareholder is not in the same category as those others are. That is just the difficulty of dealing with these different classes of men, and I felt it was so great a difficulty, that I could not myself undertake to do anything in the matter.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Will not a proper interpretation of this include shareholders of banks or stockholders of any incorporated companies as well ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The construction placed upon this rule by many is that it applies to individual interests. I would suggest that these words be inserted :—' Or any firm or corporation in which he has a direct or indirect pecuniary interest.' In that way he would be precluded from voting for any corporation or firm in which he was interested. That has been the weakness of this particular rule in the past. Any court would construe it that a senator must be individually interested, and it would not follow because he was interested in a company that he had a direct pecuniary interest.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have a distinct recollection of this question being discussed for many hours and many days in the House of Commons at a time when exception was taken to violations of the Independence of Parliament Act, and a good many gentlemen had to resign on account of it. If the suggestion of the hon. senator from Calgary be adopted, would not that shut out every man who holds a dollar's worth of bank stock, in case there was an amendment to the Banking Act ? There is where the difficulty comes in. If you own stock or shares in a loan company or any other company you are in precisely the same position. In case a Bank Bill came up for our consideration, how many members of this House would be precluded from voting upon it, if the suggestion of my hon. friend were acted on? If legislation affecting insurance companies were to come up, how many members of this House would be free to vote upon it ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would apply only to the particular company in which the member was interested.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The latter part of the clause is supposed to cover the point I am endeavouring to make. It says that a senator having a direct pecuniary interest shall not vote, that is if that interest is not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown. Any Bill that deals with a general question may be voted upon by every senator, and the same applies to railway legislation. I quite agree with my hon. friend as to the abuse of railway legislation. Anyone in introducing a Bill asking for a charter to build a road which he never had the slightest idea of building, may be acting for his constituents—endeavoring to meet the wishes and desires of his constituents.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Then he has no interest.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He would argue, supposing he was on the directorate, that it was in the general interest of the whole people that the railway should be constructed. I think you will find very great difficulty in drafting an amendment, to remedy an evil that we all would like to deal with. I remember Sir John Macdonald, Mr. Blake, Mr. Mackenzie and others debating for hours in the House of Commons because, under the old Independence of Parliament Act, if you sold $5 worth of lumber to the government you violated the Act. I remember a number of illustrations. Mr. Currier, who represented Ottawa in the House of Commons, was a member of the firm of Batson & Currier, who had a saw mill across the river. Mr. Batson sold a small quantity of lumber to the government. Mr. Currier knew nothing about it, and when the matter was brought before the House he had to resign. You will remember that only a few sessions ago, when Mr. Harry Corby was a member of the House of Commons, his traveller sold some methylated spirit to the Inland Revenue Department. He knew nothing about it, but when attention was called to it in the House of Commons, he rose and said, 'I resign,' and walked out of the Chamber. It is very difficult to deal with the question.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The arguments to which we have listened only strengthen the position that I have taken. Am I to rise in a committee and say to any member, 'I charge you with being interested in this Bill and I demand that you refrain from voting.' Should it not be the duty of the Speaker of the House to prevent these violations, if his attention is called to them? I would have called his attention on several occasions to violations of the spirit of this rule only for the meanness of challenging a man's vote. In the House of Commons, where party spirit is strong, men will do that, but in the Senate there ought to be some tribunal to go before in such matters.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I feel as strongly as the hon. gentleman from Marshfield on the subject of this rule and we should all agree that the rule must be made strict if we want to enforce it, and it is very proper that it should be enforced. I would suggest the incorporation of these words: 'No senator is entitled to vote, either in the House or in a committee, upon any question in which he has any interest whatever not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown, or on a matter of state policy'.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It must be a pecuniary interest.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—If he has any interest which is not common, he has some interest which should debar him from voting on the Bill. I do not think any harm will result from accepting this amendment. The rule is one which will be difficult of enforcement. I find the following in 'May,' page 420:

> In the Commons it is a distinct rule that no member who has a direct pecuniary interest in the question shall be allowed to vote on it; but in order to operate as a disqualification this interest must be immediate and personal and not merely of a general or remote character.

On referring to precedents I find that as a rule they were not disqualified from voting even as shareholders or directors in the application of this rule. Therefore we have to depart from that wording or we shall not attain our object.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—What does the hon. gentleman mean by 'immediate or personal'?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Let me read from 'May':

> On the seventeenth July, 1811, the rule was thus explaned by Mr. Speaker Abbott: 'This interest must be a direct pecuniary interest, and separately belonging to the persons whose votes were questioned, and not in common with the rest of His Majesty's subjects or on a matter of state policy.'

I suggest these last words, they are borrowed from Speaker Abbott, to meet the objection of the leader of the opposition, where he says it might be considered to disqualify a member, who happened to be the director of a bank, from voting on a Bill having reference to the Bank Act. It would be covered by these words 'Or on a matter of state policy.' It would be a question of general interest, and there the disqualification could not arise.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct attention to one fact in connection with this rule which does not appear on the face of the draft, and that is that the rule is not exactly identical with our present rule, No. 31. Rule 31 is as follows:—

> No senator is entitled to vote upon any question in which he has a direct pecuniary interest; and the vote of any senator so interested will be disallowed.

In the draft these words are inserted: 'Not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown.' I think that strengthens the rule considerably, and makes it easier to catch the interested members.

I wish to call attention to this fact, that it was only in 1894, when the committee of which the hon. leader of the opposition and myself were members, reported, that this rule not allowing a senator, who is interested to vote, was first put in our rules. I think the change proposed in the draft will strengthen the rule. With respect to the suggestion made by the hon. member for de Salaberry, I have this objection to make. He says: 'Any interest whatsoever.' There have been many Bills before this House in which I had a very keen interest, but no pecuniary interest. If for instance, there is before us a Bill respecting the militia, that is a matter in which I should be very much interested, and under the amendment proposed by the hono. gentleman from de Salaberry, I should be disqualified from voting. It must be a pecuniary interest. I have no objection to striking out the word 'direct.' That would strengthen the rule. The matter has come up in our own parliament on various occasions. Here is a decision with respect to a general bill, as to permanent building societies in Canada. The objection was raised that one member who was a shareholder in a society was interested in this general bill. Speaker Walbridge ruled that he was not, that a disqualifying interest must be one separately belonging to the person whose vote is questioned and not one in common with Her Majesty's subjects. 'Bourinot' goes on to say that this decision is in accordance with that of Speaker Abbott, that votes of members on questions of public policy are allowed to pass unchallenged, but when it comes to private Bills, it is a little different. This is one of the excuses, that their interests are only in common with those of His Majesty's subjects in Canada, and that is what we have put in here. This perhaps is the substance of 'Bourinot's' decision on the matter :—

> While members may properly vote on any question in which they have have no direct pecuniary interest, they will not be allowed to vote for any Bill of a private nature if it be shown that they are immediately interested in its passage. . . A member of a committee on an opposed private Bill will be discharged from any further attendance if it be discovered after his appointment that he has a direct pecuniary interest in the Bill. . . The Lords have never formally adopted a resolution on the subject, because it is presumed that the personal honour of a peer will prevent him from forwarding his pecuniary interest in parliament.

Speaking for myself, I have no objection at all to strike out the word 'direct,' but my hon. friend will see that he must leave in the word 'pecuniary.'

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not see that, because if we leave in the word 'pecuniary,' we open the door to Bills of this kind, where the promoter of the Bill has not subscribed any stock in the company. As a rule, stock is not subscribed until after the company is incorporated, and he could say when the Bill was before the House: 'I have no pecuniary interest.' The objection raised by the hon. gentleman from Halifax will not hold if his attention is called to this fact, that the interest in the case which he put, a Militia Bill, is an interest which is presumed to be common to everybody. These words are very wide, but they are qualified by 'not held by the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown.' They are still further qualified by the words 'matter of state policy,' which make the exception wider still.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Even when senators' names appear in a Bill as charter members they could say very truly they had no pecuniary interest in it, although they were looking forward to having such interest. In many cases we know that promoters of Bills do not have a cent in the venture, but they expect later on to have an interest.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (De Lanaudière)—Do I understand that in future members of parliament must not be applicants for charters? In the past it has been the rule with promoters to get members of parliament to co-operate with them in order to strengthen their chances of getting their Bills through. I have always declined to lend my name in that way, but others, to my knowledge, have given their name, and it should be made clear hereafter that no member of this House should be asked to become a charter member in any application for legislation. If people wish to be incorporated they should come before our committees and ask for charters on their own merits. It should be made plain hereafter that senators' names shall not figure in applications for charters.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then the rule should be changed, because as it stands now in the draft, it only prevents members from voting under certain circumstances.

Mr. SPEAKER—I would not be disposed to debar a member of parliament from being an applicant for a charter. The application is made openly and his name is on the face of the Bill, and all that we should require is that he shall abstain from voting on the measure. There may be cases where it would be a hardship to prevent a member of parliament from being an applicant for a charter. He should know enough, apart from this rule, to understand that it is a moral obligation on his part to abstain from voting in a matter in which he is interested.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I would call attention to this case; some time ago I bought a small railway which I cannot operate under the Railway Act. It was incumbent on me, at the ensuing session, to apply for a charter to operate that railway. The case shows that we cannot go as far as the hon. gentleman proposes.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Not in the hon. gentleman's case anyway.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I presume it will be the duty of the Senate to take part in the renewing of bank charters in 1909. A great many members of this House are holders of stock, directors, and in many other ways connected with banks, and having pecuniary interests in banks. Will this debar them from taking part in such legislation ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The rule as it stands would not, because it has been held that an interest in a public measure does not disqualify a member from voting.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It applies only to the voting.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I regret that the hon. member from de Salaberry will not agree to let the word 'pecuniary' remain. 'Any interest whatsoever' is about as broad language as can be used. The hon. gentleman said with respect to the Militia Bill that it is an interest which one possesses in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown. That perhaps is true, but there are one or two institutions which have been incorporated here, not institutions constituted with the object of making money—I speak of myself now—in which I take a special personal interest, and, under the wording of my hon. friend's amendment, I should be excluded from voting for those measures. What you want to prevent is a member of this House who has pecuniary interests in a measure from voting upon it, not to prevent a man who has any interest whatsoever from voting.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What objection has the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry to inserting the word 'pecuniary' ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I stated the objection. It would not cover Bills of this kind, where no stock is subscribed. I might be a promoter of a Bill and as such would have an interest.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It would be a pecuniary interest ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—If I have not subscribed any stock it would not be a pecuniary interest.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Well, that has been the tendency of decisions in England. If we include that word 'pecuniary,' I am afraid it will be shown that it does not mean anything.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How would it affect a senator holding property in a locality that would be improved in value if a Bill which is introduced here should pass ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He would have an interest certainly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then he could not vote for it. I think the clause as it stands is better than the amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What is the meaning of the words 'matter of state policy' ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That means he cannot vote at all.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I take that wording from Speaker Abbott's decision.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It strikes me that clause is a very arbitrary one. It would put almost every senator in a position where he could not vote for any public Bill. So far as the remarks of the hon. senator for Marshfield are concerned, I would say this: Are we to treat the whole Senate as though they would deliberately do what is contrary to the rules? I do not think it is necessary to do so. Then again how could I or any other man vote in the committee upon any measure unless I have some interest in it either one way or the other ? I do not think the clause is required, and I shall vote against it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The far reaching effect of this provision has been pointed out by my hon. friend, and it is evident that it will result in the defeat of the rule itself, because it will be unanimously agreed that the Bill under consideration shall go through without any vote.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am sorry not to be able to agree altogether with the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry, but I really cannot. I move in amendment that the clause read :—

No senator is entitled to vote upon any question in which he has any pecuniary interest whatsoever not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown, and the vote of any senator so interested shall be disallowed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is repeating the principal motion as an amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not move the adoption of the rule.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He cannot himself propose two motions.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (DeLanaudière)—I will propose what the hon. gentleman from Halifax desired to bring before the committee.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It appears to me that this question of who is entitled to vote presents considerable difficulty. As a member of the striking committee, I know that that committee were supposed to select men for the purpose of dealing intelligently with the different classes of private bills, railway bills, banking bills, &c. We found the members anxious to be placed on the railway committee because they said we have large railway interests, and others wanted to be placed on the banking committee because they had large banking interests. The hon. gentleman from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen), for instance, wished to be a member of the banking and commerce committee because he was largely interested in banks, and I think probably those who have such interests are the best class of men to discuss these questions; at the same time I do not think a man who is largely interested in railway matters should have a vote on the railway committee, nor should a man who is largely interested in banks have a vote in the banking committee, because it is a well known fact that presidents of banks are of opinion that there are too many banks in the country already, and that no additional charters should be given. We ought to be careful not to place men on the committees who are directly interested, and who might personally benefit by the legislation considered by the committee.

Hon. Mr. SPEAKER—That will be an easy way of reducing the number of the committee.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Does the question of voting apply both to committees and to the House as well?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 83.

The SPEAKER.—If it is to be understood that no senator interested in railways will have a seat in the railway committee, we can perhaps reduce it even below 35 members.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Even if a man is interested he may sit on the committee, and may speak, but he cannot vote.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I move that the number of members on the railway committee be 50, as at present.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As regards the library committee and the printing committee, I think we should make them equal in numbers to the committees selected by the Commons. During the last two or three sessions, the Commons have had one or two more on the committee than the Senate.

The SPEAKER—Have we not held over certain questions to be decided by a conference with the other Chamber? If we have, these joint committees could be settled as to their number at the same time.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—That relates only to the library and printing committees, but as far as the railway committeee is concerned, I would support the motion that the membership be fifty. We increased the number from forty to forty-five and afterwards to fifty because a great many were anxious to be members of it. It is the most important committee belonging to either of the Houses, and every member is anxious for a seat upon it. It is just as well that matters should be discussed in the committee rather than on the floor of the House, and, consequently, I do not think the number should be reduced. Sometimes it has happened that there were some members directly interested in the Bills before the committee, but they all voted just the same; and for that very reason it should be a large committee. We are constantly receiving new members in the Senate and they are looking for places on the committees. The old members do not wish to drop out, and the tendency is constantly to increase the membership.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I am entirely in favour of a membership of fifty, as at present, we have nearly ninety senators in the House, and besides that our committee is small as compared with that of the House of Commons. Out of 213 members in the House of Commons there are 175 on the railway committee, nearly three-quarters of the whole House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am surprised at the reasons expressed by the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie for advocating a larger committee. It should be our object to provide that the railway committee should be made up of gentlemen who have no pecuniary interest whatsoever in railways; and one of the duties of the striking committee in another session will be to carefully exclude those who are looking for railway charters or promoting Bills to provide for the extension of railways. The hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière gave as a reason why we should increase our committee that it is not yet as large, proportionately, as the committee of the House of Commons. I think the hon. gentleman gave us perhaps the best possible reason why we should not increase it. Ours was a much better committee before it was increased ; I say it without fear of contradiction. I do not mean that those who have been lately appointed are not as good members as the others, not at all; but the mere fact that our committee is composed of fifty members means, of necessity, that it cannot properly do the work of the committee. The old committee of thirty or thirty-five could sit round the table and put their heads together and talk quietly without making speeches, and the business was done in a satisfactory way. It is very much to be regretted that we should insist on destroying the valuable characteristics of our committee.

Hon. Mr. WATSON. One of the reasons I gave for supporting the increase, is just what the hon. gentleman has said now—because thirty or thirty-five members could sit around the table and put their heads together and fix the Bills to suit themselves.

Hon. Mr. WILSON.—I think it is a very strained argument that fifty members would not put their heads together as well as thirty-five. There is no justification for making such a distinction. I agree with those who have spoken in favour of reducing the number. I am satisfied that a small, efficient committee will do much better work. In some of the smaller committees of the House of Commons, the work is well done and satisfactorily done, but if we go into the railway committee we find no order there. Everyone seems to have a special interest to get his Bill through, or to get his views expressed, and they are all talking together and you cannot tell what they are advocating. The fact that in the House of Commons they have a large committee does not prove the efficiency of that committee. Have we not, every day, coming from the railway committee to the Senate, Bills that interfere with provincial rights ? That is on account of our having such a large committee. If we had a small committee of efficient men, the Bills would come back in a form in which they could be more easily disposed of. If we have a large committee these railway Bills, when they come back to the House, are not referred to a committee of the whole House, and, consequently, it is only those who are upon the committee who really know anything about the matter. That may be said to be in the interests of retaining a large committee, but it is not. Other members feel that they are being made to take a back seat, and, not understanding what was done before the committee, when the measure comes to the House they allow it to go through without any explanation. The chairman explains the amendments made in the committee, and, as a general rule, those amendments are adopted without anyone giving them real consideration in the House. That is the result, to a very great extent, of having a large committee, and it would be better, therefore, to submit private Bills to a committee of the whole House instead of merely dealing with them in the way I have mentioned, when they come back from the Private Bills Committee. I am, therefore, strongly in favour of a reduction in the number of the committee, and I think it will be in the interests of the efficiency of the committee, and of better legislation.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I agree with my hon. friend that a reasonably small committee is preferable to one that is too large, providing you have the right men; but the difficulty which we will have to face is that we now have a committee of fifty members, and I do not envy the striking committee their task if they undertake to cut off fifteen heads. The uncomfortable and undesirable arrangement of our committee room last year was responsible, to a large extent, for the want of order which existed. The room is now in excellent shape, and there will be no trouble in conducting a good deliberative meeting. The full membership will never be present at any one time—thirty will be about all who will be present—and I think we should keep the membership at the present figure.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I think I may say that I understand something concerning the working of these committees. None of the gentlemen who have spoken have struck at the real cause of the difficulty. That cause is politics. Politics came here with a great deal of violence some years ago, and I am sorry to say it still maintains its position. In all deliberative bodies where there is freedom and independence, those members who exercise most talent and assiduity are rewarded by being placed on the chief committees. That has not been the case in the Senate. New members are immediately elevated to the highest position. The United States Senate is one of the most democratic bodies in existence, and it does nothing of the kind. The members who come into that House have to wait until they give evidence of their ability and their common sense before they are placed on these committees. Two committees in this Senate are supposed to absorb all the talent of the House. The railway committee is the blue ribbon committee, if I may so term it; no member is considered of any account unless he attains to a position upon it. Who are appointed to that committee? Not those members who attend best and work most diligently. If the membership of that committee were subjected to an examination, it is questionable whether they would be found to be remarkable in any way for their knowledge of things relating to railways. If the principle of fair-play is to be observed, we will place men on committees who are entitled to membership whether there be fifty of them or twenty only. I think there should be as many as possible on the railway committee, because it does not injure the committee in any way, and I hope nothing will be done to remove any hon. gentleman who is now a member. If the striking committee would throw aside politics and not make any appointments from that point of view, there would be no difficulty. When a new member enters the Senate he should understand that he has to take a while to hang up his hat and show by his conduct that he is fit to be placed upon a committee. I hope that will be the basis of action in the future—it certainly has not been in the past.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Apart from the reasons which have been assigned against retaining the larger number of members on committees, I should like to point out that it does not make for uniformity of action. If the committee is too large, a rule will be adopted with regard to one Bill which will not be applied to another Bill, and it seems to me it would make for the dignity of the Senate and for the effective working of the committees to reduce the number to twenty-five for the banking committee and thirty-five for the railway committee. It is perfectly well known that the committee of the House of Commons is not as effective now as it was formerly. We cannot fail to recognize the fact that when the committee is large, if it is in good humour and has plenty of time to consider a Bill, all goes on smoothly; but it the committee is not in good humour and is short of time, then the Bill will be passed or thrown aside without much consideration; whereas if the number of the committee is limited, each member feels more responsibility and will pay greater attention.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Possibly the hon. gentleman from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Sullivan) and I are of the same mind as regards the fighting we had for positions on these committees. I took a little part in that some years ago, when the party with which I was connected was in a minority in this House, One of the reasons why the membership of the committees was increased was the fact that those who had been serving for a number of years on the committees were unwilling to be dropped from them, and that new members coming in here could not possibly be on that committee until the older senators disappeared. That was the rule laid down some years ago. The number of members was increased in order to meet that difficulty, and I do not think it is the intention of the Senate that new members should not be appointed to committees. They should have the same rights as old members. That is why the membership of the railway committee was increased from 40 to 50, and the railway committee is one of the best working committees in the House. I never saw any difficulty in preserving order in that committee. Legislation which they report generally passes this House with very little discussion. It is a much easier place to thresh out Bills than in the House. Any senator who is not a member of the committee can be present at its meetings, and even take part in the discussions though he cannot vote. We have a railway committee room comfortably fitted up, and large enough to accommodate all the members who wish to be present at the meetings. The striking committee's work would be a very disagreeable job if we undertook to strike fifteen names off the railway committee. It has been suggested this session that the number should be increased for the purpose of allowing two or three more members to be put on that committee, gentlemen who thought they ought to be there. It might be advisable to drop the names of members who do not attend the meetings regularly, and it would be well to let it be understood that next year they will be dropped, and the committee shall consist only of members who will take an active part in the work of the committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am in favour of large committees. The work of the Senate is largely done in committee. If it were not for the work which engages the attention of members in the forenoon, they would feel like lost spirits wandering through space. It is a labour of love to most of them to attend committee meetings in the morning, and they would feel as though they had missed their destiny if they had no committee meetings to attend. This Chamber is very different from the House of Commons, and I am heartily in favour of large committees here. With regard to the manner in which the work is done, my observation is, that no matter how large or how small a committee may be, the Senate will leave the work entirely to that committee, and their work is very seldom discussed in this Chamber. We accept the result of a small committee as readily as the result of a large committee. Numbers have very little to do with the character of the work done, and this Chamber is not given to entering into the details which are dealt with by the committees. Therefore, I do not see why the committees should not be as large as anyone desires them to be.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Some few years ago the Senate in its wisdom, thought proper to increase the number of senators on the railway committee from 40 to 50. Now the suggestion is that a reduction be made, not back to forty, but below forty. The wisdom we showed in increasing the committee does not appear to be very consistent. Even with stronger reasons than any which have been advanced for reducing the number, I say it is better to leave the committee as it is to-day. It would be invidious work for the striking committee. to strike off the names of senators who have been on that committee for years, and who have, as it were, a vested right to sit there. On the other hand, there are many new members who are anxious to be appointed to committees and especially to the railway committee. I am in favour of leaving things as they are now. I have been on that committee for twenty years, and notwithstanding what has been said by hon. members who have not been here unfortunately for the Senate, as long, the work is certainly as thoroughly gone through and sifted now as it was then. That being the case, I for one shall have a good deal of sympathy for the members who are to be dropped from the committee, and especially for the striking committee.

The committee divided on the amendment, which was adopted, contents 12, noncontents 9.

Hon. Mr. SPEAKER—The character of the work of the Senate will be largely established by the work done in our committees. We have been inclined to boast that every Bill which comes to the Senate is thoroughly considered. We are retaining the larger number on the committee, and should we find hereafter that the work of the committee is not so good as it formerly was, it will be in order for some of its members to manifest their patriotism by sacrificing themselves and retiring from the committee.

Sub-clause 5 was amended by striking out 'thirty-five' and substituting 'fifty.'

The clause as amended was adopted.

On rule 96—'Payment of witnesses before committee.'

Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The word 'attendance' may include almost anything. I move to substitute for that word 'living.'

Hon. Mr. SPEAKER—Is nothing allowed for loss of time ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (deLanaudière)—Parliament does not pay any fee to witnesses for attending here. Witnesses are allowed four dollars a day for living expenses, and railway fares to and from the capital, and that is supposed to cover everything. Parliament has a right to summon anyone here and compel him to give evidence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is going a little too far. If an expert witness is required, say a distinguished physician is summoned here from Montreal to give evidence, and is kept here for two or three days, his time is worth probably $50 a day.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Then it would be wrong to give him $50. He should get the standard allowance and nothing more.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was not saying that we should give him $50, but to pay him nothing but his travelling expenses, is inflicting rather too serious a tax on him.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You cannot draw a distinction ; the sacrifice might be as great in the case of a poor man as in that of a rich man.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—You are restricting the amount that the clerk shall pay, but further on you could provide that the committee might pay a further amount.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I think the last three lines should be struck out. If a physician residing in Ottawa is required to attend, he should have his allowance. To treat him otherwise is to treat him scurvily.

The rule was adopted.

On rule 108,

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I should like to be excused from discussing the amendment of which I have given notice, as I am not feeling well to-night.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is an important amendment, and should be discussed carefully. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. SPEAKER—As between the amendment and the draft, which is nearest to the Commons form ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This is mainly taken from the words of 'May.' It is nearer the Commons rule certainly than the draft.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS from the committee reported that they had made some progress and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

LIEUTENANT GOVERNORSHIP OF NOVA SCOTIA.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the adjournment is moved, might I ask the leader of the House if any gentleman has been appointed yet for the Lieutenant Governorship of Nova Scotia ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I think not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will he give the House any information as to when the appointment will be made ? I don't think I got a full answer from the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I answered all that could be said. No appointment has been made, nor can I say that any progress has been made, because when any progress is made the Act will be effective.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The government are trying to find one I suppose ? It is a most extraordinary thing that a governor cannot be found for a province.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been offered to a good many.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is extraordinary that the office should go begging, and that the legislature should have to be postponed or adjourned from time to time in order to get a gentleman to occupy the position. Is there nobody here who would take it if it were offered to him? Let me ask the hon. gentleman another question: It has been the habit, and the constitutional practice that when ministerial changes have taken place, an explanation was given not only in the House of Commons but, as the constitution provides, simultaneously here. If the hon. gentleman will give it to-morrow that will do.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—To-morrow.

The Senate adjourned until three p.m. to-morrow.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Tuesday, March 27, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

ALLAN DIVORCE PETITION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg) presented a petition from James Allan, of the city of Toronto, praying to be allowed to present a petition to the Senate praying for the passing of an Act to dissolve his marriage with Margaret Jane Allan, notwithstanding his inability to pay the fees required by rule 108.

I wish to make a remark by way of preface to the motion which I am about to submit to the House, which is that the petition just presented be referred to the Committee on Divorce to inquire into and report upon the means and circumstances of the petitioner, so that this House will be in possession of all the information necessary to say whether he shall have the relief for which he prays ; that is, whether he shall be relieved from the payment of fees and be permitted to present a petition for divorce. The House by consenting to this motion commits itself to nothing. I, therefore, move that this petition be referred to the Divorce Committee.

The motion was agreed to.

FRED. W. WIGHT DIVORCE PETITION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I present a similar petition from Fred. Wm. Wight, of the city of Toronto, praying that he may be relieved from the payment of prescribed fees and for leave, at the proper time, to present a petition for a Bill of divorce. With regard to the petition just presented, I wish to make a motion similar to that which I had the honour of making in the former case ; that this petition be referred to the Committee on Divorce to inquire into the means and circumstances of the petitioner, and to say whether he can be allowed to carry on these proceedings in forma pauperis. Of course, if the Divorce Committee find that he is able to pay I presume that they will rigidly insist upon the payment of the fee. At any rate that committee will simply report to this House the facts and circumstances and make a recommendation either for or against the petition. I, therefore, move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Divorce.

The motion was agreed to.

FRANCES FIELD DIVORCE PETITION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I have a similar petition from Frances Field, of the town of Oshawa, praying for the same treatment as is asked for in the last two petitions, and for the reasons given in the former cases. I move that this petition be also referred to the Committee on Divorce.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Are we to understand that these are three petitioners appealing to the Senate for divorce without payment of any charge ? I think it would be setting a very serious and dangerous precedent, and I hope the Divorce Committee will consider the subject carefully and remember that even if they make a report, unless it is based on the very strongest grounds, the Senate is not likely to accept it.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I hope the hon. Secretary of State will allow me to explain ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The explanations should be made to the committee ; they will have to report.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—These petitions do not ask for Bills of divorce but for leave to present petitions.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—These petitions are evidence that we have one law for divorce for the rich and another law for the poor. Before coming here a petitioner for divorce must pay $200 to begin with, and have funds in addition to go on with the necessary evidence before the committee. I think I may assume that the Committee on Divorce is not going to accept those petitions; that they will rather abide by the law as it exists at present. I think it is high time that this House should change its system of granting divorce, and that the system in practice in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick should be adopted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, no.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—You will continue to spread about the filthy literature to members of both Houses of parliament and in the city of Ottawa, publishing the dirt that is exposed by the evidence in certain cases. That is what you want done. In Nova Scotia a case is tried before a judge of the Supreme Court and the evidence is never printed. Nobody outside the court ever knows what the evidence in the case is. The judge who tries those cases in Halifax, Judge Graham, informs me that not more than six of the men or the women who get divorce in the province of Nova Scotia could afford the expense of obtaining divorce under the system that prevails here. As I said before, we have a divorce system for the rich, but where does the poor man come in? If divorces are allowed by the statute of Canada, then the rights of the poor should be respected as well as those of the rich.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They have no right to divorce.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—The rich have.

UNITED STATES EMIGRATION OFFICIAL AT ST. JOHN.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to direct the attention of the hon. Secretary of State to a paragraph which appeared in the newspapers of Saturday last as follows:—

Another high-handed piece of pettiness on the part of American immigration officials occurred here on Thursday, when seven people from St. Pierre with through tickets for New York were held up. Among the passengers on the train from Halifax, were three men, one woman and three children bound from St. Pierre for France. The men were soldiers or constables of the French government and wore their uniforms. They had tickets through to New York, and intended taking a steamer from there for home. In their possession they have official papers showing their recall, and the necessity of reporting in France on a specific date. Their trip was arranged to make close connection at New York with a steamer sailing for France. Inspector Bridges, of the United States staff, ordered them not to go by yesterday morning's train, telling them they would be turned back at McAdam. The party cannot speak English and were unable to make themselves understood. After sitting in the railway station all day, they were allowed to resume their journey on Thursday night. The inspector declines to state why he detained them.

I should like to make the statement that while it is important those immigration officers should save people the trouble of going across the border when they would be sent back, it seems to be a bad use of the authority which they possess to stop people of that kind and it is possible that the Dominion government, or some person, should send a warning to the United States government that they should send officers there with greater discretion than these men appear to exercise. It is not the first time that people have been stopped, possibly for a cause, but in this case it seems an improper proceeding. If I might add a word, I think we should have somebody at Washington to represent this government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The attention of the government has not been called to it, and we know nothing of the case except the paragraph in the papers, a copy of which the hon. gentleman sent me a few days ago. The people who were detained at St. John, were, I understand French residents of St. Pierre, and were on their way to France, passing through Canada in transit. As a matter of convenience the convenience of which, I believe, the officials of the United States recognize, is they often mark baggage at points like St. John or Halifax, for people who propose going to the United States, in order that they may not be stopped at the border. I inquired of the Minister of the Interior as to whether there was any understanding between the officers of that department and the United States officials connected with immigration to the United States, and I understood from him that there was none, at all events none that was officially recognized. Assistance is mutually rendered to each other, because it is well known that passengers passing through Canada to the United States who are objected to there for cause, either being paupers or afflicted with particular diseases, are returned; but, beyond that, I do not know that we have any jurisdiction or authority. It is a matter of convenience often to have passengers' baggage examined before the owners of it leave Halifax or St. John. It is not a parallel case to what occurs at Niagara frontier, where persons going through are obliged to pay a tax of $2. This is a case where they stop immigrants for other causes. The male travellers, I understand, were in uniform, and possibly that may have had something to do with it.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—There is a difference between the customs officers who mark the baggage and the officers of the immigration department. I understand they are allowed in the port of St. John and perhaps other places in Canada, to stop persons who are going through to the United States if they are not persons who would be admitted to that country under the immigration laws of the republic. The reason they are stopped at St. John is that it saves them the cost of going from St. John to United States points, but these officers appear to have gone beyond all discretion. This is one of the cases for which Canada ought to have a representative at Washington.

MINISTERIAL CHANGES.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the Orders of the Day are called, in accordance with the request made by my hon. friend opposite, and of constitutional usage, I desire to make some reference to the vacancies which have occurred in the government since last session. The first one was the retirement of the Postmaster General. In 1901 he had been deputed to represent Canada at the inauguration of the commonwealth of Australia, and in the journey there he took ill and was severely afflicted with neuritis. Perhaps I can best explain the character of his affliction by reading a letter of his to the premier, which has been read in another place. In this letter Sir William Mulock says:

Ottawa, October 7, 1905.

My dear Sir Wilfrid

The time has at last arrived when I must without further hesitation withdraw from public life. As you may remember, I made known to you on my return from Australia, which country I visited in 1901, at the request of the government to represent Canada at the inauguration of the commonwealth parliament, that I contracted during the somewhat severe Atlantic voyage, a serious attack of neuritis which for nearly a year caused me continuous suffering, the pain at times being almost unendurable. After a while, it gradually yielded to treatment, but left my nervous system seriously imparied, and in consequence less able to stand the strain inseparable from the public life in which I have been engaged for nearly a quarter of a century. Several times since, there have been partial recurrences of the attack which, I have been advised, are but premonitions that if I am not to succumb entirely, I must seek a less wearing life.

During the last two or three years, I have on several occasions informed you of my condition, and requested your permission to my retiring into private life, but you have always been so anxious for me to remain, and I myself have felt so interested in my public work, that until now I have postponed reaching a final conclusion.

The last occasion of my speaking to you upon the subject was in June last when about to leave for England to attend the Pacific Cable Conference. I then mentioned to you that the pain was constantly returning and that I was assured it would continue to do so as long as I was engaged in my present strenuous occupation, and therefore again made known to you my earnest desire to retire. With your invariable sympathy and kindness, you renewed your expressions of regret at the prospect of my withdrawal, urging me to postpone reaching a final conclusion until my return from England, adding the hope that perhaps the change would prove beneficial.

Realizing your very strong desire for my continuance in the government, I again defered to your wishes, and have thus had advantage of the interval in which to give further consideration to the matter.

Taking a deep interest in public affairs, being in entire political harmony with the government, on the most friendly and intimate relations with each minister, and being deeply attached to the constituency of North York, which has unswervingly reposed its confidence in me ever since my entry into public life, it is with the greatest regret that I have now to inform you of my having reached the final decision, that I feel myself compelled without further delay to give up the public career into which I have for so large a portion of my life thrown my whole heart and energies. Nevertheless, it is, I feel assured in the public interest that I should take this course and I therefore now tender my resignation as a member of your cabinet and would ask you to kindly submit it to His Excellency at the earliest moment for his acceptance.

It will, I know, be a great satisfaction to you to learn that my nervous system alone is affected and that with proper care and under more peaceful and restful condition, I may reasonably hope for a gradual and complete recovery.

Believe me, my dear Sir Wilfrid,

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) W. MULOCK.

The Right Honourable
Sir Wilfrid Laurier G.C.M.G., P.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada, Ottawa.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the date of that letter ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—October 7, 1905. The date of the first attack was in 1901 on the voyage to Australia. It will probably be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen who took any interest in that visit, that he was laid up for some considerable time in Australia, suffering from the effect of this nervous disease. Since that time he had repeatedly requested the premier to allow him to withdraw from the government. However, his presence was extremely important; he had been a most successful administrator, having improved the department over which he presided from a condition in which there was a long series of large deficits, sometimes amounting to $750,000 a year, to what was practically a paying department, and in addition to that reducing the cost of postage to the people of Canada. I need not enlarge on the many improvements which Sir William Mulock made in his department; they are known to every one, and the public, I think, fully appreciate them. In October last, Sir William Mulock pressed the premier to accept his resignation. It was placed on such reasons as could not be entirely ignored. That he left the cabinet with very great regret will be gathered from his own statement in answer to the extract from a letter which I have just read. I will read a part only of Sir William Mulock's letter to the premier :

My dear Sir Wilfrid,—Yesterday I received your extremely kind letter of the 11th instant, in acknowledgment of mine of the 7th October in which you with great reluctance have agreed to submit to His Excellency my resignation as a member of your cabinet. I assure you that words fail to express my pain at withdrawing from public life, and from associations in the ministry with yourself and my other dear friends there. One of the happiest memories of my life will be the recollection of your unfailing kindness to me beginning in 1882 and continuing without interruption and increasing with years until the present moment.

It is quite evident that Sir William Mulock felt very great regret in giving up public life. He was appointed, on his retirement, to the presidency of the Exchequer division of the High Court of Justice for Ontario. Possibly some comments may be made on the fact that Sir William Mulock himself, on many occasions, in another place, publicly announced that he did not approve of members of parliament retiring to soft seats outside immediately on their resignation as members. Sir William Mulock's advocacy of that doctrine did not find favour; it was not supported even by his own friends in the other House. The premier disapproved of it entirely, and there is abundance of evidence in the parliamentary history of Great Britain to show that it is the practice there constantly for ministers holding high positions in the government to accept retiring positions either on the woolsack or elsewhere in the courts. On Sir William Mulock's resignation having been accepted, the Honourable Mr. Aylesworth was named as his successor, and, as hon. gentlemen know, he was elected by a large majority for the same constituency for which Sir William Mulock sat.

The next vacancy that arose in the government was due to a very sad event, the death of the late Mr. Préfontaine who, as hon. gentlemen know, died in Paris on the 25th December last. Mr. Préfontaine had been a very valuable official in the department in which he administered. He was highly popular, took a great interest in the administration of his department, and had made very considerable improvements in the navigation of the lower St. Lawrence, studying the danger points and erecting lighthouses at those points. There was a gentleman in the cabinet, without portfolio, who occupied a seat on the floor of this House. In the natural order of things it was only reasonable and proper that he should be accepted as a member of the government. As the work of the Marine and Fisheries Department, particularly the marine section of it, had largely to do with the development of the lower St. Lawrence channel from Montreal to the ocean, it was felt desirable that a gentleman from one of the eastern provinces should occupy the position, and the Minister of Inland Revenue was named for the office, and Mr.

Templeman succeeded him in the Inland Revenue Department. As announced elsewhere, the intention of the premier was, and I presume is, to withdraw from the Department of the Interior one or two of the many branches now connected with it. It now has the Indian Branch and the Geological Survey Branch, as well as the control of mines, and I presume legislation will be brought down this session transferring to the department that Mr. Templeman has charge of, some portion of the duties which have hitherto been attached to the Department of the Interior.'

THIRD READING.

Bill (A) An Act to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act.—(Hon. Mr. Scott).

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being called :

Bill (B) An Act further to amend the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In moving the third reading of this Bill, I desire to explain a question put to me by some hon. gentlemen as to what might be the meaning of subsection four. The husband or the wife may be called as a witness one against the other in a number of common law cases. It is a very common thing for a wife to take legal proceedings against her husband for support, and, unfortunately, there are cases which arise where a woman has to bring her husband up for assault. These are cases in which the husband and wife may have to give evidence against each other.

I move the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

The Order of the Day being called :

House again in Committee of the Whole to consider and report on the third report of the special committee appointed during last session to consider and revise, and if deemed necessary, to add to the rules, orders and forms of proceeding of the Senate.—Hon. Mr. Power.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

On rule 108. Document quoted by minister.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When we were in committee upon these rules, I confess I did not hold exactly the same view in regard to rules 108 and 109 which I now hold. However, I have given notice of my present view in regard to rule 108, and as my hon. friend from Halifax has not intimated his willingness to accept the amendment I have suggested, I will make a brief statement to the House of my view in regard to it. This is one of the most important rules that we could possibly deal with. Up to the present time we have been governed by the English practice as we learned it from the English Journals, and 'Bourinot' and 'May,' but now we propose to make a rule of our own by which we shall be bound instead of by the British practice. It is, therefore, most important that this rule should be according to the practice that prevails in the mother country. After a very careful investigation into this matter I have come to the conclusion that rule 108 is not according to the correct British practice ; it is taken from the Australian rules, and, I say once again, that many of these Australian rules may be very good for the commonwealth, but they were brought into existence almost impromptu and I am afraid some of them will not bear the stress and wear and tear of experience. When we turn to British practice, we have something before us which has stood the stress of time. It has been found through the operation of centuries to be radically and essentially right. This rule 108, as it stands, deals with an offence after it has been committed. The true British practice is to prevent the occurrence of the offence. Rule 108 says that a public document, quoted from by a minister of the Crown, may be ordered by the Senate to be laid upon the table, that is, having been quoted by the minister, having been read in the House, it may then be moved that it shall be brought down. Of course that motion could be made regarding any document. In 'May,' page 321, we find the following :—

Another rule or principle of debate may be here added : A minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House unless he is prepared to lay it on the table.

Rule 108, as drafted, is simply a remedy for a breach of the British practice after the harm has been done. On the 7th July, 1864, the British House of Commons was discussing a motion of censure by Mr. Disraeli, a censure of the government and especially of Earl Russell as Foreign Minister with regard to the Schleswig-Holstein question, or the Germany and Denmark question. Earl Russell was severely condemned by Mr. Disraeli and others for the character of the negotiations which had been conducted between Germany, Denmark and Great Britain. Mr. Layard, who was the Under Secretary of State for the Foreign Office, undertook to defend Earl Russell in the commons. In the course of his speech Mr. Layard proposed to read extracts from despatches in the Foreign Office, which passed during the administration of the department by Lord Malmsbury in justification of Earl Russell's course at the time of the discussion.

Lord ROBERT CECIL. Sir, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is referring to despatches which are not on the table and his extracts from which we are not able to verify. That is, I submit contrary to the practice of the House.

Mr. LAYARD. I have expressed my willingness to lay all these despatches on the table. I beg to ask whether, in that case, I may not refer to them ?

Mr. SPEAKER. The despatches should be laid on the table before the hon. gentleman can quote from them.

There is no question that the practice is, that if the minister announces that he is going to read a public document, and a member of the House observes what he is doing and raises the point he cannot proceed to read it until it has been laid upon the table.

The rule in the draft, as I pointed out, takes the matter up after the breach has been committed. After the minister has read the paper, it provides what is not necessary to have a rule about at all. Any member may move for the production of these papers. The House will see what a great inconvenience would arise in that way. The minister has read his extracts, whatever effect they are calculated to make has been made, and other gentlemen are not able to quote from them evidence, perhaps, of a different nature, and time has passed and all the remedy would be to move for the production of papers, which might be brought down a week or ten days after the debate had closed and the incident was over. My hon. friend from Halifax, and other hon. gentlemen, will see that we must adopt the rule which 'May' sets down and which I have already read—'A minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House.' I have given notice of the following amendment in which I have quoted the exact words of 'May':

108. A minister of the Crown is not at liberty to quote from or read any public or official document not before the House, unless he is prepared to lay it immediately on the table. such document, if referred to, but not quoted from or read by a minister, ought to be laid on the table of the House forthwith, unless such minister assumes the responsibility of stating that it is of a confidential nature or cannot be produced without prejudice to the public interest.

Perhaps I have said sufficient to establish my point with regard to the first clause of my amendment. It stands on the authority of 'May'; it is the exact words of 'May' with the exception of two changes necessary to make it fit in with the concluding paragraph and it is supported by the extracts which I have read to the House. Mr. Layard proposed to read certain despatches, and was stopped and prevented from reading them unless he had previously laid them on the table of the House. The concluding part of my amendment, says that 'such document, if referred to, but not quoted from or read by a minister ought to be laid on the table of the House forthwith, unless such minister assumes the responsibility of stating that it is of a confidential nature, or cannot be produced without prejudice to the public interest.' I find that the English practice invariably is that it is quite competent for a minister to refer to the document, dispatch or official communication between the minister and his officials, in parliament, but he must not read from it, and he must not quote the exact words. To use the language of Gladstone on one occasion, when he said 'I gave the impression, received on my mind from the perusal of a document. I did not quote from it or read any part to the House.' I think it is quite possible to cite a number of incidents where that has been done, and where the conduct of the minister was sustained by the Chair. I shall refer to just one very interesting case which occurred in 1858 when Gladstone gave an explanation to the House, of a communication he had received from Lord Dufferin in reference to the administration of Egypt. I will read what he said, in order to show how far this practice is carried of giving an impression of what is contained in a communication and still refusing to produce the communication on the ground that it was of a confidential nature :

Mr. GLADSTONE. I stated yesterday, Sir, that I had a communication from Lord Dufferin, which was somewhat of a formal character, and, as I thought that Lord Dufferin had a better cognizance of the actual progress that had been made in Egypt than any one else, I asked him to give me, in a very few words, a note of the progress which he conceives to have been attained with respect to several of the most interesting questions in the reorganization of the country. With respect to the army he considers that work to be almost completed, and in quite a satisfactory condition. With reference to the plan on which it is devised. With respect to the constabulary, that is not so forward. The constabulary proper is reorganized, but with respect to the police, there is still a good deal to be done, though a good deal has been accomplished. With regard to the judiciary, he believes that a fair body of judges, presumably competent, have been secured, but it has been found necessary to translate the Judicial Code into Arabic, and that has caused some delay With respect to the legislative bodies, Lord Dufferin is not now aware how far nominations have been made with regard to a portion of them that are to be nominated ; but all the arrangements with reference to the elective body have been made and have been published With respect to irrigation a plan has been made by Mr. Moncrieff, the engineer for the irrigationof the Delta, and Lord Dufferin believes that that is favourably regarded by the government. But no positive decision has been taken in respect to it. And lastly, with respect to the taxation of foreigners a plan has likewise been submitted for the attaining of that very important matter. These are the points on which I asked Lord Dufferin to give me such information as he could.

Hon. gentlemen may think it remarkable that Gladstone could give that much of the contents of the letter and still claim that he had not read it or quoted from it. Sir Wilfrid Lawson asked 'Will Lord Dufferin's communication be laid on the table ?

Mr. GLADSTONE. Certainly not. I have mentioned that this information is conveyed in a private letter.

Subsequently Mr. Raikes, member for the University of Cambridge, rose and said :—

Mr. RAIKES. A question, Sir, arises out of the statement of the right hon. gentleman, and I therefore wish to ask if you will inform the House whether the rule which requires that any official document cited by a minister in debate shall be laid before the House, does not apply to communications addressed by official personages to members in this House to be used by them for purposes of informing the House in reply to questions ?

Mr. GLADSTONE. Before the question is answered, perhaps you will allow me, sir, to make a little more clear what I thought I had made sufficiently clear before, as to what my answer was with respect to Lord Dufferin. Before Lord Dufferin left London, I desired to see him, to inform myself as well as I could, from conversation, on the point which has been given me roughly in private letter. But Lord Dufferin unfortunately had left, and therefore I sent after him, and, informally, he said in a private letter what he would have given me in conversation, and I am afraid the question will arise whether it is lawful to have conversations with officials for the purpose of obtaining information, inasmuch as conversations cannot be laid upon the table.

The Speaker did not reply to the question of the member for Cambridge University. A day or two later, however, Mr. Raikes raised the question in the House and made rather a long speech which called for the Speaker's ruling :

Mr. RAIKES. Begged to ask Mr. Speaker whether he will still lay down the rule as interpreted by his predecessor in the chair, that public despatches, documents and papers relating to public affairs, if read, and quoted by ministers, may be called for to be laid on the table ; and whether he will also inform the House whether in his opinion, a memorandum upon a public topic, composed, not by a colleague of a minister, but by an ambassador in Her Majesty's service and relating to a mission in which he had been expressly employed by the government and communicated to a minister, did not, if cited by a minister, come within the range of that ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. As to the latter part of the question of the right hon. gentleman, the member for the University of Cambridge, my answer will depend upon the character of the memorandum in question. If it was of a private character, I should say it could not be called for in order to be laid on the table of the House. My predecessor has laid down very distinctly the rule of debate in this matter as quoted by the right hon. gentleman. I have only to add that it is a well-known rule of the House that, when a despatch or other state paper is cited by a minister it should be laid on the table of the House ; but it has always been held that that rule does not extend to private communications. Such documents are never ordered to be produced by the House, or presented by a command of Her Majesty. I did not answer the question of the right hon. gentleman on Tuesday last, because the explanation of the right hon. gentleman, the First Lord of the Treasury, as to the character of the paper to which he referred appeared to me to be satisfactory, and I thought that the right hon. gentleman himself would accept that explanation and see that it was such a document as could not be properly laid on the table of the House.

Mr. GLADSTONE. Sir, there is no memorandum in my possession. There was a letter, but I quoted nothing from it. I merely confined myself to giving to the House a general impression of my own founded upon it, which I thought would be interesting as being the best intelligence I had, embodying Lord Dufferin's opinion.

Now I think, from the authority which I have quoted, from May, and the practice in the British House of Commons, which I have cited with regard to both these points, first the propriety of a minister reading despatches, or documents to the House which have not been produced, has been emphatically settled in the case of Mr. Layard. The practice with regard to papers merely cited is clearly established by many other cases, and it is not necessary for me to take up the time of the committee to show that it is quite proper for a minister to refer to an official document in his possession which for either one or two reasons he can decline to lay on the table of the House, first that it is confidential, or second that its production at that time would be prejudicial to the public interest.

These are the grounds on which I submit this amendment to the rule as it appears in the report of the committee. I find in my reading or investigation of the subject that a distinction is drawn between a despatch and the official communications which pass between a minister and his deputy, or any important functionary under the minister. I am very confident, if hon. gentlemen will go into this matter as I have done, that the amendment I am submitting to the House is one that comes as near the present British practice as can very well be done by any rule.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Will the hon. member permit me to ask what objection he has to rule 109 ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I shall state that when we reach it, I have no objection, however, to do it here.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It seems to me that we had better deal with the two rules at the same time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Perhaps my hon. friend is right. When we were discussing this subject in committee, gentlemen of the committee may remember that I saw nothing wrong with the rule 109 at that time. From the limited investigation I had given of the subject, I thought that rule 109 was all right. When investigating the matter of rule 108, I came across information which altogether changed my view with regard to rule 109, which is, in my opinion, altogether wrong :

109. A document quoted from by a senator, who is not a minister of the Crown, may be ordered by the Senate to be laid upon the table; and such order may be made without notice immediately upon the conclusion of the speech of a senator who has quoted therefrom.

Such a document might be of one or two natures ; one might be a public document, and the other a private one. As far as a public document is concerned it should never reach the House through the hands of a private member. It must reach parliament from the government, its proper custodian. Hon. gentlemen will see that a public document should not be placed on the table in a surreptitious manner, I shall give a case which illustrates that point, which occurred in the parliament of Canada in 1880. Mr. Cockburn, of Northumberland, brought a question up in the House in relation to fishing privileges on the Ottawa river, and he had been supplied with official documents, from a fishery overseer or official who had got into trouble with the Department of Marine and Fisheries. These documents be used in the progress of the debate. Mr. Patterson, of Essex, replied to him from the other standpoint, and also produced public documents, none of which had been laid on the table of the House. Mr. Mackenzie raised a point of order, that, these documents having been quoted, must be laid on the table of the House. That was not disputed, and Speaker Blanchet, decided that when a member reads a document it must be laid on the table of the House, and it was laid on the table.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—By whom ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—These gentlemen produced the documents they had read from, and they were laid on the table of the House. 'Bourinot,' page 461, after laying down the rule with reference to public documents generally, comes to this point :

It does not appear that the English Commons have ever applied this rule to the case of private members citing public documents not in the possession of the House.

The foot note in 'Bourinot' on page 462 reads this way :

The English authorities do not support a decision of the Speaker in 1880 (Can. Com., J. 200) to the effect that a private member who quoted from public documents ought to lay them on the table.

He refers to the case which occurred in the British parliament, in regard to operations in the Baltic, when Sir Chas. Napier had given away public documents, and he adds this :

Since 1880 the opinion of Speaker Blanchet has not been followed. It arose from a mis understanding of the correct practice.

So, in Canada, from 1880 to the present time, that practice has never been followed; that is, of the House insisting upon the production of public documents in the hands of a private member and the laying of them on the table. There is another extremely inconvenient circumstance which would arise from the production of private letters in the hands of any member, and rule 109 goes that far, if hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to read it.

A radical objection to that practice is, that if a member reads a private letter or any part of a private letter to the House, and that letter is bound to be produced, such a letter might contain public reference, and have private matters contained in it also. It might contain things making it very absurd to produce it in parliament, and under rule 109 it would be proper for any member to make a motion and the House to order the bringing down of that letter, and the letter would become a record and have to go to the Printing Committee to be entered in the Sessional Papers. That would be the course that would be inevitably followed if any such rule as that were to be adopted. 'May,' at page 322, refers to the case of Mr. Ferrand which occurred on May 18, 1865.

Mr. FERRAND demanded that the Attorney General do lay on the table of the House written statements and letters used by him regarding the Bankruptcy Court at Leeds. The Attorney General absolutely refused.

Mr. SPEAKER sustained the Attorney General.

Then 'May' laid down this principle :—

Indeed it is obvious that, as the House deals only with public documents in its proceedings, it could not thus incidentally require the production of papers which, if moved for, separately, would be refused as beyond its jurisdiction.

That is as clear as anything can possibly be. A private member, or a member of the government who reads a private letter in the House would be compelled by this rule to lay it on the table. In dealing with rule 108, we are dealing with official documents, but in rule 109 with all documents, and it is absolutely impossible that parliament could order the production of a private letter. Such a motion would not be entertained if it was dealt with separately. Such a document could not be brought down, because it would not be in the custody of the government, and parliament could not enforce its order. 'May' goes on to say :

Members not connected with the government have also cited documents in their possession, both public and private, which were not before the House, but though the House is equally unable to form a correct judgment from partial extracts, inconvenient latitude has sometimes been permitted, which it is doubtful whether any rule but that of good taste would have restrained.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think all the hon. gentleman desires could be met by a much shorter modification of the proposed rule. The practice, as he is very well aware, in the House of Commons, has been always that when a public document is quoted by a minister of the Crown it must be produced and laid on the table unless the minister is prepared to take the responsibility of stating that the public interest would suffer by its production. I understand that the hon. gentleman does not object to that proviso. Now, here are the words :

A public document quoted from by a minister of the Crown may be ordered by the Senate to be laid upon the table.

If these words were used—a public document quoted from by a minister of the Crown shall be laid upon the table—it would make it a positive rule unless, in the event of the exception to which we have alluded, and to which apparently the hon. gentleman does not object. I think that would meet his views, and, probably, be more consistent with the general practice. I suggest this amendment for his consideration and for that of my hon. friend from Halifax who has been taking great pains framing these rules. It is not altogether expedient that when a public document is quoted it should be open to the Senate to order it to be produced. It should go as a matter of course on the table, unless the minister makes such a statement as is contemplated by the exception.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the hon. gentleman failed to grasp my main objection to rule 108. It is that it only provides a remedy for the offence—perhaps offence is not the exact expression to use, but I use it in default of better—after the offence has been committed, while the English practice is that the minister may be prevented from reading if any member raises the point. The first clause of my amendment is exactly in the words of 'May.'

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am speaking from my recollection of the practice and habits of the House of Commons, and also with regard to public convenience, I do not think it is desirable that ministers should be prevented from quoting from public documents. On the contrary, I think it is often very desirable they should do so even if those documents have not previously been in the possession of the members. But I also think that when they do so the documents should without further motion, be laid on the table, unless in the case of the exception provided for. Probably my hon. friends opposite may remember cases when it has been in the public interest that ministers should quote from public documents, but there is a check upon that—these public documents should be laid upon the table unless the minister on his responsibility declares that it is not in the public interest to do so. I think rule 108 is a good one, only that it is not consistent with the practice to require a formal order of the Senate to compel a document quoted by a minister to be laid on the table.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In the majority of cases where this question has arisen, both in our parliament as well as in Great Britain, it has arisen just as stated by my hon friend. After the minister has quoted these documents, after, as I have said, the offence has been committed, then the question arises how to get these documents into the hands of the other members. Since we are going to frame a rule, and will no longer refer to the British practice for guidance, is it not desirable that our rules should be in accord with the practice?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Not necessarily in that respect. Perhaps I am a little more radical than my hon. friend. I think we are quite as capable in many respects of forming rules for our guidance as is the British House of Peers.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The Speaker of the British House of Commons ruled—and it is a ruling which has never been impeached—in the case of Mr. Layard, that he could not proceed to read extracts from public documents until he had produced the documents from which they were taken. 'May' lays down the principle, that a minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read from the documents until they are produced. No doubt my hon. friend's memory goes back to a great many cases in the House of Commons where a minister proceeds to read extracts of this kind. In probably nine-tenths of the cases no notice is taken of what is happening until the extracts have been read; then an hon. gentleman rises and demands that the documents quoted from shall be produced. The rule is that they must be produced unless the minister takes the responsibility of saying they are of a private nature; but I hold that a minister should be prohibited from reading from documents to the House. He has the fullest liberty to summarize them, but he should not be permitted to read or give extracts unless he submits the documents to the House. If he gives a summary and takes the responsibility of stating that the papers are of a confidential nature and that their production would be prejudicial to the general interests he would be excepted from the rule. I have in mind a great many cases in which the plea has been accepted. On that point 'May' goes on to say:

Another rule or principle of debate may be added. A minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he be prepared to lay it upon the table.

Mr. Layard, in the case I have reported, said 'I am prepared to read, I want to go on reading, but the Speaker said you cannot do so, you must not go on reading until you have produced the document.' May goes on to say:

The restraint is similar to that rule of evidence in courts of law which prevents counsel from citing documents which have not been produced in evidence.

This illustrates the point perfectly. A lawyer would not be allowed to read extracts from a document not produced in evidence. It must be in the possession of the other side, and the point would be very quickly raised in a court of law. No lawyer could read one word from such a document unless it were produced.

The SPEAKER—There does not seem to me to be a very great difference between the wording of the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield and that proposed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I note the point made by the decision just read, that the minister quoting should not be allowed to continue to quote unless he lays upon the table of the House the document itself. Of course, if he is quoting from a document he has it in his hands. If the minister who is reading declares that he is prepared to lay the document on the table when he is through reading from it, I suppose that would be compliance with the rule. Then under 108, as amended by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the result would be exactly the same, because my impression is that he would not object to adding one more word which would make it read as follows:

Shall forthwith be laid on the table.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Certainly.

The SPEAKER—I think it would then be similar to the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield; the two phrases mean about the same thing.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My recollection does not accord altogether with that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. This question has been, as my hon. friend well knows, discussed frequently in the House of Commons on many occasions. Instances have arisen when a question was before the House, and there were official documents in the possession of the government, a minister would refer to these documents and to a certain extent give their contents for the information of the House. The question would then be asked: 'Is the hon. gentleman prepared to lay the document on the table?' His answer would be: 'No, I am not quoting from them, and it is not in the public interest that they should be laid before the House.' On other occasions the answer would be: 'The correspondence is not complete and therefore it is not advisable or expedient in the public interest that it should be laid before the House.' If he is reading from a private document the objection would be taken: 'No, there are other matters in this letter which are not of public interest, I do not desire, it being private, to lay it on the table.' I have a distinct recollection of a demand being made upon myself on one occasion of this nature and the answer I gave was exactly what my hon. friend from Marshfield has indicated. I remember distictly in this House reading from a number of documents in reference to the construction of the Teslin Lake Railway, letters which I had received from prominent gentlemen in Victoria. I was asked to lay them on the table. I declined to do so, for the reason given by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield; but I said to the members who asked for them: 'I have no objection to handing these papers to you so that you can read for yourself and you can judge then of the character and reliability of those who are making the statements.'

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The hon. gentleman is referring to rule 109 and not to 108.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am combining the two. To my mind rule 108 opens the door for very great abuse. I do not desire to intimate that these things have been done, but it is evident that if a public document is read by a minister, he may read such portions as will suit his purposes for the time being. I am not going to illustrate by referring to any cases which have come to my knowledge, but I have known them to occur. A public document is taken by the member who has it in his possession and he reads just such portions of it as he pleases. Then the demand is made to lay it on the table and he says 'no, I cannot lay it on the table, because the other portions of the document would be detrimental to the public interest.' When that is done, the House is misled and comes to a conclusion that it would not arrive at if the full document were laid on the table, and I see no reason why a minister should have a privilege which is not enjoyed by any other member. He can refer to the fact that correspondence is going on on the subject under discussion and can also inform the House that a certain portion, if read, would lead to certain conclusions, but in the public interest he does not think it advisable to lay it on the table at present, but probably in the future it might be produced. The motion made by my hon. friend would meet the case much better, and it would be more in the interest of legislation than to leave the matter open. If the House decided that the draft of the rule as it appears now should not be adopted, I certainly would support as strongly as possible the suggestion made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and also by His honour the Speaker, that if it is to be retained it should include the words 'shall forthwith lay it on the table,' but, considering the whole question, I think it much better that we should adopt and adhere to the practice which has prevailed in England for scores of years, and which has never been found, so far as my reading is concerned, or my knowledge of parliamentary procedure goes, to have any other effect than that which is in the general interest of the public. I am opposed to allowing any one, particularly a minister, to read from an official document and then refuse to lay it on the table, and for the reasons which I have given. I should be very sorry to intimate that it would be done, but it is open to that. I have known cases of that kind, and we should prevent it in the adoption of any rules.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I should like to ask my hon. friend if he does not think that there would be quite as much danger of the House being misled by a minister making a kind of summary or precis of the contents of a document as by quoting the exact words? In point of fact, I think there would be rather more danger of the House being misled from a summary such as he describes, than if the exact words were quoted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think I went quite so far as to say a summary.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend knows very well that it would not require much dexterity to make references to a document which would be a good deal more likely to mislead than quoting the exact words, and he also knows that, as a general rule, the document is ultimately produced. The reasons which induce a minister to refuse to lay a document on the table are usually temporary inconveniences which might accrue from production. My experience has been that after a while the document quoted is produced and, I think, my hon. friend will not contradict me, that ultimately anything that is quoted from in the House, comes to light, though occasionally it may be of such peculiar character that it is not brought down. I would just say to my hon. friend, I desire as much as he does that in amending any of these rules, we adopt something which will stand on its merits. I do not want, and I am quite sure my hon. friend the Secretary of State, and the hon. member from Halifax, do not want to impose any unfair rules; but I really think all the ends he desires to attain would be attained if he introduced such an amendment as I spoke of, that if a minister quotes a document it shall be forthwith laid on the table.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I hope I was not understood, in any remarks I made, as advocating the giving even of a summary. I was giving to the House what my recollections and experiences were.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think the hon. gentleman will remember that some summaries have been made.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that a summary might be as misleading as a false quotation, and I would go this far, that no reference should be made to the contents of any public document unless the minister is prepared to lay it on the table, not even a summary. He might intimate the fact that such documents were in the possession of the government, and such correspondence was proceeding, but he might make a summary which if I or some one else were to make it, might come to a different conclusion altogether.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the discussion we have had has been very illuminating, and if the committee which was charged with the duty of revising the rules had had the benefit of this discussion, the probabilities are these two rules would have been reported in a different form. The House is under an obligation to the hon. member from Marshfield for the trouble he has taken to inquire into the matter. Now as to the practical result of the discussion, speaking for myself, I may say that I am perfectly satisfied to adopt the sugestions made by the Right Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and by His Honour the Speaker, and that this rule shall be amended so as to read as follows :—

A public document quoted from by a minister of the Crown shall forthwith be laid upon the table unless it is stated by the minister to be of such a nature that its production would be inconsistent with the public interest.

The leader of the opposition, went so far as to intimate that under no circumstances should a minister be allowed to quote from a public document if he was not prepared to lay it on the table. There might be an important despatch, involving great public interests, as to which it was most desirable that parliament should have information, but portions of which might not, with due regard to the public interest, be laid on the table at the moment, and surely no one would contend that the minister should not be allowed to quote from it. One of the very earliest pieces of parliamentary practice that I remember having heard of, was one which occurred some fifty years ago. Mr. Howe, who was at that time Provincial Secretary of Nova Scotia, quoted from some public document and it was insisted that it should be laid on the table, but he resisted the application and the motion to have the document laid on the table was voted down. Then, having asserted the principle that a minister had the right to discriminate, Mr. Howe laid the papers on the table. The wording of the amendment which the hon. gentleman proposes is not altogether suitable. A minister is not at liberty to quote a word or line from a despatch unless he is prepared to lay the whole despatch on the table ; that would be carrying the rule altogether too far.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—They are the words of 'May.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, but you take a particular case and you find language there which, when you come to construct a rule, you cannot use. In making a rule you have to look all around ; you cannot be guided by the circumstances of any particular case. I do not think we should lay down that rule, that a minister of the Crown should not have liberty to give information to the House even though he is not prepared to lay the whole document on the table. Then the further portion of this proposed rule, that if such public document is referred to but not quoted or read from by the minister it ought to be laid on the table forthwith—the hon. gentleman must see that in suggesting that amendment he is going directly against the British practice which he quoted himself.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was laid down by the Speaker that when Gladstone referred to Lord Dufferin's letter he could not be compelled to lay it on the table, and the decision was the same in the other case also.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He did not quote from it at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has not limited himself to quotations. He says : 'Such public documents if referred to.' Gladstone referred to a document.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was not a public document.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the reference to a public document does not involve its being laid on the table, if the quoting from it does not involve that. I should like to call attention to another passage in 'May.' I am not undertaking to question generally the rule laid down. The hon. gentleman thought he ought to add, 'official' after 'public,' but I do not think so. Now, I quote from the tenth edition 'May,' page 510 :—

The opinions of the law officers of the Crown, given for the guidance of ministers, in any question of diplomacy or state policy, being included in the class of confidential documents have generally been withheld from parliament.

Then there is a sentence which shows that this rule was departed from in one particular case. This is what I wished to call attention to :

But, however ample the power of each House to enforce the production of papers, a sufficient cause must be shown for the exercise of that power ; and if considerations of public policy can be urged against a motion for papers, it is either withdrawn or otherwise dealt with according to the judgment of the House.

I wished to refer—although I do not think it is necessary—to a case which arose in the English House of Commons in 1878. It will be found in the English 'Hansard,' volume 243. Mr. E. Stanhope, who, I think, was Secretary for India, had referred to certain telegrams :

Fawcett rose upon a point of order. The Under Secretary of State for India, in his opening remarks, had made certain statements with regard to Indian finances from private information derived from telegrams. He had always considered it to be the rule that ministers were not allowed to quote from documents which were in their possession, and not in that of hon. members, without producing such documents, in order that they might be compared with the statement made. It was absolutely impossible for them to arrive at any clear opinion of this matter, however anxious they might be with regard to the position of the India finances. The Secretary of State for India on Monday last made certain statements as to the Indian finances, and then the Under Secretary, without presuming to lay a single document on the table, came down to that House and stated that he had received a series of telegrams, the effect of which, as he understood, was to reduce the anticipated surplus of Monday last from £2,100,000 to £1,500,000. He wished to ask whether it was not the invariable practice that, in financial debates, ministers should lay upon the table of the House the documents from which they quoted.

Mr. SPEAKER. The practice of the House is, that if an official document is quoted by a minister it should be laid before the House. At the same time if the public interest should be opposed to that proceeding, that would be accepted by the House as a reason for withholding the documents.

And the documents were withheld. If we get this rule in the shape in which it will be when the amendment suggested by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Speaker is made, it will go as far as we ought to go.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I wish to direct the attention of my hon. friend the Speaker, and also the Minister of Trade and Commerce to a fact which they have apparently lost sight of, that the suggestion made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and referred to by the Speaker might fairly meet the case as covered by the first part of my amendment, but it fails altogether to meet the second case. I could quote a great many cases showing the English practice. One I quoted with regard to Egypt, and one has been quoted by the hon. member for Halifax with regard to the Afghan war. In the latter case, the question was raised that a telegram referred to must be produced. It was raised again and again during the progress of the debate, and members demanded the telegram. Finally a satisfactory solution was arrived at—the substance of the telegrams was communicated to the House, as the statement was made that they dealt with a great many matters. My amendment deals with two distinct situations, one when a minister proceeds to read from a public document, and my view is that if he reads from a document, it does not rest with him afterwards to say that the document is of a confidential nature and he cannot produce it. It is not reasonable for him to say that its production would be prejudicial to the public interest. If these conditions existed he certainly should not have read from the document at all, and my view is, and I know it is strongly supported by English precedent, and not by reading one word here and there but by following a case from beginning to end, the British principle is, that if a minister reads from documents, quotes from them; he is bound to produce them. And that it does not lie in his mouth afterwards to turn around, having made use of that for his own purposes, and tell parliament that they are confidential or that their production would be prejudicial to the public interests. When a minister rises and proposes to read from these documents, if he is called to order, as Mr. Layard was in the case I have quoted, he cannot be allowed to proceed to read until he has produced the documents. That was the decision in his case and there is nothing at variance with that. But if a minister proceeds and reads and the attention of the House is not called to it until after he has read his extracts, then I do not think it lies in his mouth to say that the document is of a confidential nature, or that its production would be prejudicial to the public interests. If he has only referred to a document in order to make himself clear by giving a summary of it I use the word summary—and certainly Mr. Gladstone's reference to his letter from Lord Dufferin was somewhat in the nature of a summary—the English practice is that a minister when he refers to a letter, without quoting from it, is still bound to produce it, but then he may say, 'I did not quote from it, I gave my impression of its contents, because I was not prepared to submit it,' and he then can say it is confidential and its production would be prejudicial to the public interest. We are now taking away from this House the protection and privileges which are vouchsafed to us under the English practice, and are proposing to make a rule which will do away with that protection. It is a serious thing for those who are not in sympathy with the government, but it may some day be just as serious for gentlemen opposite, and if we are going to wipe out the British practice and set up a practice which will give the government power to do pretty much as they choose in the House with regard to public documents, the day may come when the rule may be turned against gentlemen on the other side. I presume gentlemen opposite are determined to carry this rule by the strength of their majority, and I can do nothing but protest that in so important a matter as this is, ill considered, ineffective and inefficient rules are adopted here that will deprive us in this House of the protection we would otherwise possess under the British practice. Leave these rules out altogether if you like. We are quite safe, with 'Bourinot' and 'May' and the British 'Hansard,' and in our expectation of justice from the Speakers in this House. We have no fear in that regard, but we do fear and I believe that if gentlemen on the other side of the House were to look carefully into the matter they too would fear, when they look forward to the future, that the day will come when under rules of this kind they themselves may suffer. There is no use in prolonging the discussion. I feel strongly on the matter, and I think the proposed action is unfair to the opposition in this House.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I protest against the imputation that there is any one here who is going to vote down or compel others to submit to this rule. Each one here is entitled to independence of thought and action. For my part, I am utterly opposed to rule 108, and I will give my reasons. It is an absolutely unnecessary rule, and so far from conferring privileges on the Senate it is depriving members of a right which they now have under the practice. Under the present practice the rule is perfectly plain. All that is covered by this rule can be accomplished by simply calling for the production of the document, and the practice, as laid down in 'Bourinot,' is so much more definite and satisfactory than the proposed rule that I prefer it. If there is protection to the House as a whole, and to the individual members to enable them to get at a document fairly and properly, then it is not necessary nor is it expedient to frame a rule. By doing so in order to get at the document you have to act within the four corners of the rule, but by leaving the matter alone the rule of practice which is more or less elastic, but which is very powerful, gives this House and every member of it well defined rights. What is the rule with regard to a public document? It has been laid down by the highest authorities that when a Minister of the Crown quotes a public document in the House and founds upon it an argument or assertion, that document, if called for, should be produced, and it is invariably done. Is there any reason why that should not be so? What is the rule you are proposing to substitute for it? A rule that he is to produce the document, not if called for, but when ordered by the Senate; so that the majority of the Senate can say that a Minister of the Crown need not produce a document although the public interest as represented by the minority in the Senate might demand it. Under the old practice, when the minister takes the document in his hand to quote from it or read it, he takes the responsibility of saying 'I have a document here which if called for is to be laid on the table,' so that anybody can see it, and therefore, when he quotes from it it is at the disposal of every member of the Senate. That is a very valuable privilege which it is now proposed to curtail, and I do not think it should be done. I am opposed to the proposed amendment requiring the document to be immediately tabled. While it may be necessary for a minister to quote from a public document; while it may be important that the public mind should be set at rest on a point which may be of a serious nature, it may also be important that the document should not be produced. If a minister clothed with the responsibilities of a Minister of the Crown, and in the practical discharge of his duties, assumes the responsibility of saying before the House that in the public interest the document as a whole should not be produced but it is in the public interest that he should make a statement and cite this authority, though it contains matters which make it expedient that he should not produce it he should have the power to do so. The only person charged with responsibility in a matter of this kind is a Minister of the Crown, and if we cannot trust ministers in such a manner, we had better not have them at all. The proposed amendments are all in the direction of calling for an immediate production. The rule protects also in this respect, but I say, in answer to the argument advanced by the other side, a document should not be used unless the minister is prepared to lay it on the table. If a minister should feel called upon to quote from or make a statement founded upon a public document which he is not prepared to produce, he should accompany it by a statement that the public interest requires that the document should be withheld. That is a principle of British fair play in a debate and it is in the interests of the public. I am utterly opposed too to the amendment requiring that the minister must immediately lay the document on the table. There may be many reasons why that should not be done; there are many reasons practically why it could not be done. Many of our official documents are in print, and it would be neither convenient nor sensible to require that the original should be produced. As to rule 109, I take a different view, I think that 109 is a case in which it should be vested in the Senate to say if a member, other than a Minister of the Crown, refers to a document, whether or not that document should be placed at the disposal of members. It seems to me in that respect that rule 109 is a good one, but for the reasons I have given, I am opposed to rule 108.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend's view is my own view. I do not want to lay down a rule with regard to this subject at all, but as there was a determination to make a rule on the subject, it should be framed as nearly upon the British practice as possible. My complaint was that we were taking away from this House the protection which the British practice gave us, and I would very much prefer no rule at all than anything which could be drafted in the direction indicated. If the hon. gentleman is moving that rule 108 be struck out I will withdraw my amendment and support his motion.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Since the amendment has been withdrawn, I move that rule 108 be struck out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the motion now made is lost, then a motion will be made to amend the rule in the direction suggested by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The hon. gentleman from Toronto has taken the ground that we know what the practice is, and we do not want any rule on the subject. Now, the hon. gentleman himself has taken one view; the gentleman from Marshfield has taken another, and other gentlemen have taken other views, and it is desirable that members of this House who, like myself, do not assume to be authorities on the subject, should have something to go by.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I desire to say, as supporting the motion of the member from Toronto, that I think it unnecessary to make a rule for the reason that he has stated; that the rule is sufficient as it is, and that it would lead to very serious inconvenience in a number of cases to have the document forthwith deposited on the table. I think we would be better without a rule than with the proposed rule.

The SPEAKER—I do not remember now if the hon. gentleman from Marshfield has cited a case found in Denison's and Brand's Speakers' decisions, which is as follows :

Afghanistan, expenses of military operations.

The Under Secretary of State for India having referred to a series of telegrams which seemingly altered the financial statement, and Mr. Speaker being asked whether it was not the invariable practice in financial debates that ministers should lay upon the table of the House the documents from which they quote.

Mr. SPEAKER. That practice of the House is that if an official document is quoted by a minister it shall be laid before the House. At the same time, if the public interest should be opposed to that proceeding, that would be accepted by the House as a reason for withholding the documents.

There is a decision from the Speaker of the House of Commons in England which seems to fairly cover the case of rule 108 as amended. It seems to show that the practice is not a very settled one in the British House of Commons, because a decision cited by the gentleman from Marshfield is contrary to this decision.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If my hon. friend will look at the report of the debate on the Afghan war he will see that Lord Stanhope did not quote the telegram at all; he only referred to it and to a number of other telegrams, and the rule was laid down accordingly. If the hon. gentleman will look again he will find that there was nothing read from the telegram, but merely a statement made that a telegram had been received that morning to the effect that the Indian surplus was to be very much less than had been previously announced, and then it was stated that there were several other telegrams which it would be inconvenient to produce.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Rule 108 is especially interesting to whoever may be in opposition. The majority, having the ministers on their side, are naturally not so much interested in this rule as the minority are. The rule is especially for the protection of the minority, so that they may get fair play in debate and have at their disposal the same advantages as the ministers have who are taking the opposite side of the question. When this rule was considered by the committee, the object they had in view was to place the minority in such a position that they would get fair treatment. Apparently the result of their endeavours has not been satisfactory to the minority, and from the motion which has been made by the hon. gentleman from Toronto it would appear that the minority feel that they are safer to rely on the well established practice. There is a good deal in that which commends itself to my mind. They think they would be safer to rely on the British practice—we thought we had embodied it in this rule. If they prefer to rely on British practice, I think this House should accept their views and say, if that satisfies you, take it. I am prepared to vote for the motion of my hon. friend from Toronto just for that reason.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman made one statement, that the action of the committee was based on a desire to protect the minority, but he will remember that I opposed it then, as strongly as I do now, in the committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I admit that. Like all great minds, though we were not exactly all of one mind, we were nearly so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think British practice is good enough.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The rule as suggested by the hon. member for Marshfield would entirely defeat his object. It would place the minority in every case at the mercy of the majority, and that would be very unfortunate.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—And very unfair.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The British practice is good enough for us.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—British practice is good enough for me.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—If we strike out rule 108, we might as well strike out all the rules. The reason alleged is that we might rely upon precedent and usage. It is precisely for the purpose of crystallizing what is usage that these rules have been so laboriously prepared, and therefore I see nothing logical on the part of my hon. friend—who in my opinion is nearly always so logical—in moving to do away with clause 108 simply because we can fall back upon obscure, contradictory or at least contradicted precedents. I shall therefore emphatically vote against the sub-amendment, reserving to myself the right to say a few words on the amendment of the hon. minister.

The committee divided on the motion to strike out rule 108. which was agreed to, contents 25, non-contents 13.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved to strike out rule 109.

The motion was declared carried.

Mr. SPEAKER—The rule ought to be struck out, but I thought some few words should have been said before it dies. The practice which has prevailed in this Chamber, at all events since I have been here, has been very objectionable to a number of senators. It has gone against my grain to hear private letters from highly respectable or prominent people or from most important citizens, from a certain corner of Canada, cited here with no information given as to the identity of the writers. I remember when the first discussions took place, after I came to this Chamber, on the Yukon Railway Bill, numbers of letters were cited as coming from important people and answered by similar letters from equally important people, but we were not informed of the names of those who wrote the letters. I thought something could be said in favour of rule 109, although perhaps it could have been amended, as I see the practice in England at all events, is against allowing a private member to lay on the table public documents. I wondered if we could not have ordered the production of private documents which are cited. The suggestion of the hon. member for Marshfield did not absolutely meet with my approval, but when we are making rules we should devise some means by which members would be prevented from reading private letters which are only of value if the signatures are worth something, and yet the signatures are withheld from the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My hon. friend the Speaker will have an opportunity, if the remainder of the rules are adopted, of following the regular British practice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would remind the Speaker that he is out of order, and since we have given him extraordinary powers to keep other members in order, he should respect the rules himself.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER.

On rule 114. Publication of notices.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was suggested when this was laid over that there should be a conference with the committee appointed to revise the rules of the House of Commons so as to make them uniform. Are these rules the result of that conference ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—They are not. The hon. member from de Salaberry and myself were present at a meeting of the standing orders committee of the other House to-day, and it does not seem probable that there will be any general revision of the rules of the other House for some considerable time ; but the impression was made, upon my mind at any rate, that if we agreed here upon a rule with respect to these notices, the standing orders committee of the other House would be very likely to adopt the same rule.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I desire to say that after having been heard by the members of the committee of the other House, it was suggested by them that we put our suggestion in writing, and they would consider it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This rule reads 'also by registered letter to the secretary of the province and to the clerk of each county.' What is to be understood by the clerk of each county ? I do not know any official in Ontario with such a designation. There is a clerk of the county council or clerk of a municipality, but there is no such officer recognized in Ontario as the clerk of the county.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Nor in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Say county council.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto). You might as well say fasten it up in the basement as send it to the clerk of the county council.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In most counties of Ontario the county council meets twice a year. The clerk would receive the notice, and he certainly would not put the county to the expense of calling the council together for the purpose of placing the document before them. I see no objection to it, though I do not think it is of much use.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I suppose the idea is to give some reasonable notice to the parties affected. This proposition, which I have now seen for the first time, provides that notice is to be given in some leading newspaper published in the principal city of each province, in or through which the proposed work is to be constructed. Publication in the 'Gazette' might give some notice, because the local papers would copy that; but we may assume, take the province of Ontario, that railway development is more likely to occur in the new part of the province than in the old settled part. Take for instance a railway in Northern Ontario; publication in a newspaper in the principal city of the province would probably mean a newspaper in Toronto, and it may be a weekly paper with a circulation of 500.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You could not call that a leading newspaper.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Why not, it would be a leading one probably on some fad. If you say the one with the largest circulation, you will have trouble to find out which one it is, because they are all disputing that question. I suggest that it should be published in some paper in Toronto, the principal city, and in some paper in the locality where the proposed railway is to run, and then you have a notice which will be read. I am afraid if you do not want parties to come before the railway committee complaining that they have not received notice, that you will have to change this rule.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Under the old arrangement in the province of Ontario, when the county council was composed of the reeves and deputy-reeves of the municipalities, the county council was a part of the machinery of the municipalities, but the county councils now are elected at large by the county and are distinct altogether from the municipal corporations. In many counties, a large portion of the public highway is vested in and under the control of the county council. If a railway proposed to go down a public highway it would be held that the county council had not received proper notice of the intention of the company, and I would caution the committee against dropping the term 'county council.' It is true, the county council meets only twice a year, but it is within the power and province of the warden for the time being to call a special meeting of the county council at any time. A matter of importance is coming before the county council and the warden does not feel disposed to go to the extra expense of calling an extra session, and it is often the case that those who are interested in this special legislation will go so far as to intimate to the warden that they will bear the expense of this meeting. In Ontario, the county council possess powers almost next to those of a legislative assembly, and I would therefore ask the chairman and members of the committee not to drop the term 'county council.' The clerk of the county council, or the warden of the county should be notified. Every county council has a clerk, and it would be his duty on receipt of a notice of this kind to take some notice of the legislation proposed, and the council could either oppose or aid the legislation as they deemed best in the interest of the county.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not see any clause in these rules which imposes any obligation on the clerk of a council to take notice of such matters. He receives the notice that is all. He has no duty to perform.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I understood it was the desire of the committee to omit the words 'county council', and I have tried to point out that that would be a mistake, as the county council in Ontario is a very important body and in close touch with the people. Any infringement on the rights of the county council would be a serious matter for this House to undertake. It would be a mistake to declare that no notice should be taken of the county councils.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no proposition to strike out the words 'county council'; the proposition was to add the words to make it distinct.

The motion was agreed to.

On rule 114, 'Publication of Notices'.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I suggest that paragraph five of section ('A') of rule 114 be amended by adopting a similar wording—

Through the clerk of each county council and of each municipality.

The paragraph as amended was adopted.

On rule 115, 'Maps filed with Standing Orders Committee.'

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It was suggested by the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière yesterday that the plans filed should be more specific than in the past. If we require that the applicant shall notify the municipalities, we must know that we have done so through what municipalities the line of railway is proposed to be constructed, and we should have a plan which would show the municipalities.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There are no municipalities in the Northwest. I moved yesterday that the word 'township' should be inserted here.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it would be unreasonable to exact from a railway company that they should furnish a map showing each township through which the line shall run.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Any government map will show the township in outline.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand the object of having this requirement for the plan here, it is that the committee on standing orders may be in a position to see whether or not notice has been given to the proper parties. If the township is not a municipality, there is no person in the township to whom notice need be given.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As I understand, the plan is for the purpose of showing the district through which the road is to be run, so that the House may be seized of the interests which may possibly be affected by the construction of the railroad, the expropriation of lands, &c. How will the people of any section of country through which that railroad is to run, be made aware of where the road is going unless it is shown on a plan that they propose to build through certain townships.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—We used the word district not as indicating a municipal district but as a section of the country. This rule is intended to provide for a plan to be laid before the standing orders committee in order that it may see that a reasonable notice has been given to the parties whose interests are likely to be affected. When you come to deal with the matter in the railway committee, if the map is not sufficiently definite, another map can be called for.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman practically requires the railway company, before they get their charter to make a location survey.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Not necessarily. If you use the term district, it is so general a term that it may mean anything. You cannot use the word county, because there are no counties in the west. You cannot use 'municipality', because there are no rural municipalities in the west. I suggest to the committee that some word with a legal meaning should be adopted, defining certain boundaries. I do not care whether you use the term electoral district or not, although a term of that kind could not be relied upon as possessing any permanency, while township lines are fixed. The map before the standing orders committee will be the same map as that to be produced before the railways committee.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It ought to be the same map, it would serve all purposes and it would be but fair that the plan should give in a general way the proper information. I cannot see any objection to using the word township.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The first thing the promoters of a railway would do would be to obtain a map of the Dominion government survey of the Northwest, which shows every township surveyed in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta; they would thus be enabled, without the slightest difficulty, to show the particular townships through which they propose to run their lines. Of course if the survey has not been made yet, we will have to judge approximately where the line runs, but that could be indicated by reference to the lakes, rivers, &c.

Hon. Mr. McKEEN—Two or three years ago we had a Bill introduced here along these lines. The contention was then made.

that under the present conditions parties were anxious to secure charters for no other purpose than to exploit them. They applied here for charters, but they had no maps, no surveys, nothing to show the localities through which they wanted the right—and no money to build. I think the ground was very well taken, that a new system should prevail, and that no charter should be given by this House excepting where surveys have been made—that is, preliminary surveys, and also accompanying maps of the same. To my mind it is a great pity that that Bill did not become law, because it is the experience of everybody here that applications have been made to this House for charters where there was no real intention by the parties applying to do anything more than to make money out of the charter. Charters granted by parliament have been put on the market and sold time and again, and in this connection it would be a very wise proceeding to have that matter understood, that when a charter is applied for, the committee on standing orders shall be made perfectly aware of the proposed location of the railway. It is impossible for any body of men to understand the effect of a proposition of this kind unless there are maps to define the route, because it relates to a country which the committee may never have seen, and which is possibly more or less unknown.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Supposing a line of railway is projected from, say Toronto to Georgian Bay. The conformation of the country might possibly force the company to build, perhaps, 25 miles to one side or the other of their line as originally projected. Unless they had beforehand an absolutely accurate survey, they could not lay down their line upon a map within six miles—within three miles in fact, for that is what the proposition of the hon. gentleman from Calgary amounts to. You would make it impossible for them to come before the committee unless they had an absolutely accurate survey before giving notice at all, which cannot practically be done. It seems to me if the general locality is given, and notices are sent to the different municipalities in each locality, it is sufficient for the purposes of the committee on standing orders. When you come to consider conflicting interests and the rights of parties along the line, then the railway committee may have to require further notice, but that is not the point we are considering now.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The committee resumed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In the preparation of a map, under this rule, a series of townships might be shown through which the road would run, but using the word already suggested would have no meaning in the Northwest. There is no such thing as a county, no such thing as a district in the legal sense, nor would the term municipality be appropriate. I think, therefore, that no difficulty would arise by using the word township. I do not think it would impose on the railway companies any extra expense in completing their map to show the townships through which the railway would run. The route shown on the plan is simply approximate, and if the company wants to deviate, we never think, when those plans are submitted to the standing orders or the railway committee, of imposing on the railway company, particularly where the route is a long one, that they shall be confined to any belt say within fifty or sixty miles The best illustration of that was the Grand Trunk Pacific. When my hon. friend, the leader of the House, held up the literature issued by the Trans-Canada Railway Company showing that road to be several hundred miles north of the Saskatchewan and running through the Peace River country, we did not at that time confine the Grand Trunk Pacific to any particular belt, and now we find it, I suppose, four or five hundred miles south of the route pointed out by the leader of the House. By using this term "township," it certainly would not have the limiting effect pointed out before the House rose for recess.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend concedes that the railways would have the right to deviate from the plan shown to the railway committee. To give the townships it was proposed to run through would be misleading. It is an assurance to the people of that section that the line is to pass there. We know that from the time a line is first surveyed until it is finally located and built, there are great deviations. Under the Railway Act, the route that is approved by council does not show the townships. It is on such a small scale that they can only show the general direction, and that is all that should be shown on the plan for the railway committee. Otherwise you are misleading the public, because it is unlikely the route will follow the first line shown. After the surveys are made, the line departs from the original location always to a considerable extent. So long as the objective points, and intermediate towns likely to be touched, are shown on the plan, that is all that could be asked.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How will the standing orders committee determine whether the rule which we passed before recess has been complied with, namely, that notices in the leading newspapers of the territory through which it passes as well as to municipal corporations through whose territory it passes have been given.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is quite a mistake.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the two objective points are simply to be shown on the map or plan it would be utterly impossible for the standing orders committee to determine whether the rule has been complied with.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is impossible, because you cannot tell. Moreover the railway committee have power to change the route. It is impossible to determine in advance the route of a railway. I have had a good deal of experience with railways the last fifty years, and I know that no railway conforms to the first line shown.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If that be so, why require a plan at all? If the railroad is to be chartered, say from Winnipeg to Edmonton, why not say Winnipeg to Edmonton? It looks like imposing needless expense on a railway company to require elaborate maps and plans. I am not arguing that this plan is desirable; that is not the point. The point is, what kind of plan shall we prepare to adjust itself to the rules and standing orders to furnish to the House the information required by the rule?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The termini and the intermediate towns it is projected to touch. Take the line, approved only a few months ago, the Grand Trunk Pacific from the point of intersection down to the Kaministiquia river, a distance of over 400 miles, the plan certainly was not any longer than that table. Of course the company must have a wide margin in particular sections of Canada. In the Northwest, I admit, it is a good deal easier to lay down a line that is likely to be followed, but in other parts of the country you cannot do that. Proper grades are the great object, and facilities for crossing rivers, and therefore deviations sometimes of 40 and 50 miles take place.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Rule 115 refers to the map which must be supplied to the Standing Orders Committee, and the question is, what information can we reasonably ask in a plan so that the rules laid down by the House for notification to municipalities and so on, may be checked up by the committee? If we get fair and reasonable rules, then we can insist upon a compliance with them by applicants for charters. If you insist, and I think reasonably so, that when a railway is to be declared for the general advantage of Canada, that municipalities should have notice that such an application is being made, you must also provide your committee with some reasonable method of checking up the applicants, to see that they have complied with that notice to which the municipalities are entitled. It has been suggested that they come before the Standing Orders Committee with a plan showing the line from the starting point to the finishing point, and indicating some of the towns here and there; but how are the Standing Orders Committee to determine what municipalities should be notified according to the rule we have just passed; and let me add, a rule that we have had in force for the last couple of years. The applicants should furnish the committee with a map showing, not only the route, but the municipalities through which the projected line is to run, and the committee can then see whether their notices comply with the rules; but when they come before the Railway Committee it may be clear and reasonable for the committee, if they see fit, to insist on another and a more accurate map altogether, a map showing, for instance, existing lines of railway, the rivers, lakes, &c., as the information which the Railway Committee require may be altogether different in character from that called for by the Standing Orders Committee. We are not asking too much when we demand that the applicants should indicate as closely as possible the municipalities through which it is proposed to run their line. It cannot be absolutely the route, because the Railway Committee may force them to deviate from the location they proposed to take, for one reason or another, which I need not discuss. We are not asking any more than is absolutely necessary to enable the Standing Orders Committee to see that the rules of the House are observed, and if we make the rules reasonable we should insist on them being carried out in their entirety.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The rule which we have just passed provides that a company making application for a charter must give notice in the Official Gazette and some leading newspaper published in the principal cities of the province through which the proposed work is to be constructed, and also by registered letter to the secretary of the province and the clerk of each county council and of each municipal corporation in or through the territory where such work is to be constructed. The logical outcome of this must necessarily be, if the Standing Orders Committee is to inquire into and satisfy itself that the rule has been complied with, namely by the necessary notices being sent to the clerks of municipal corporations, that they shall have a plan before them showing where the proposed line runs. I am not captious, nor am I anxious about this matter. I believe in free trade so to speak, in railway charters and railway legislation. I am in favour of giving a charter to any one who wants it, and I am not anxious that they should be compelled to produce plans or furnish any particulars of their lines. The more railways we have the better, but if we pass a rule, let us be logical and have information before the committee such as the rule calls for; otherwise, let us wipe out the rule. I am not moving any amendment; I am simply presenting the case to the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It has been suggested that the word 'municipality' be inserted after 'county', and that is as far as we can go. As I understand, a township in the west has no corporate existence; it is simply a block of land six miles square, and there is no one to whom you can give notice there. If every municipality gets notice that should be sufficient.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is not a question of notice that we are dealing with.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes it is.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, it is the plan called for under rule 115.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is the same thing.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That plan should show the townships through which the proposed route will run, and, if that is not done, you cannot have even an approximate idea as to where the line is going to run, and in the new provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta there is no use in employing terms which have been suggested, municipalities, counties, and districts. Those terms might be applicable to the other provinces, but not to those new provinces and the only way you can get even approximately accurate information is to mention the township and ranges where the route is to be.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—This plan should be also the plan which will meet the requirements of the railway committee. It is well known that it is usual to have such questions raised before the railway committee as damage to parallel lines. It is the main ground of opposition. Surely the committee must have the means of dealing with an objection of that kind. The committee may be disposed to protect a parallel railway already established, or having a charter, and the railway committee I am sure, from the experience of the past, will be anxious to have the necessary data to pass on an objection of that kind. Therefore it is necessary that a map should be furnished, not necessarily a survey map; it may be a rough map or plan, but it should give the approximate location of the railway in order that the committee may be able to know what they are dealing with. Therefore it seems to me that we might accept this wording: 'In each county, township, district or municipality.' It will be easy to satisfy this requirement, and it may not be a hardship on any railway promoters? I therefore move that this rule 115 be amended by adding these words.

The clause was amended and adopted.

On rule 123. 'Bill may be referred to Supreme Court.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The point which we reached last evening was how we were to get the reference to the Supreme Court so as to have it entertained. It was suggested by some hon. gentlemen that we should apply to the Governor in Council to authorize the reference. It is claimed that the Supreme Court are not bound to take cognizance of our reference, but they are obliged to take up any matter referred to them by the Governor in Council, so the proper thing to do here would be to provide that the application could be made to the Governor in Council for a reference to the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The section of the statute which deals with that particular matter is section 38 of the Supreme Court Act which provides for a reference of any Bill to the Supreme Court or any two judges thereof for their examination and report. It would look very much as if that section were sufficient.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5. 'When rules go into operation.'

The CHAIRMAN—I have a memo. here that these rules shall go into operation on March 31.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That cannot be. You must first have a conference with the House of Commons so as to ensure uniformity in the rules requiring notice to be given of applications for legislation. Besides that, they must reduce the quorum of their committees.

The SPEAKER—I understand we have abandoned the idea of proclaiming our rules at the same time as the House of Commons and that we are adopting our rules without regard to the other Chamber.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then we have not yet been furnished with French copies of the rule. and I ask that the French copies be distributed before proceeding further.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is suggested that they go into operation on the first of May, and I assure my hon. friend that we shall have French copies long before that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—These rules, when adopted, will appear on the minutes of the Senate in French as well as in English and besides we shall have the French copy.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When I spoke of this matter before, I was told that the French edition was actually in type, and that it was only a matter of getting it printed—that it was delayed only for the purpose of incorporating any amendments which might be made, so as to have it appear in due form immediately.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am just suggesting that we shall have two French editions, one in our minutes, and the other in the regular form.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If we have our rules completed, and only the printing is to be provided for, and as we are likely to adjourn to-morrow until the 18th April, it seems to me that if these rules are to be enforced this session they should go into operation without delay. With the probability of a short session, if we put it off until the first of May we might as well let them stand until next session. I do not see why, if the French edition is in type, we should not have the rules printed in both languages and ready for us on the 18th April. My hon. friend's request is reasonable. He has been patient and lenient in consenting to proceed with only the English edition before us, and he certainly deserves the thanks of the House. Fair play is a jewel, and I give him that credit—it is not often I have occasion to do so. I would suggest that the rules should go into force on the 31st March, and when we meet on the 18th of April they will be printed in both languages and in the hands of members.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to see the rules in French before adopting any of them. There is no necessity for hurry. We have rules now which have been in force for years. All the notices that have been given were under the old rules, and why is it necessary to make this change in the middle of the session ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I would appeal to the hon. senator from Stadacona not to dispel the illusion created by the hon. senator from Manitoba about his good nature.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I agree altogether with the hon. senator from Stadacona. I cannot see any reason why we should be in such haste to put these rules into operation. The chances are altogether against these rules being printed in both languages and ready for use on the 18th April. And my hon. friend will not be very well pleased if the French edition is not ready, and he will have good reason to be displeased. I cannot see any necessity for putting these rules in operation so soon. When we come to examine the revision, it will be found that the difference between the new rules and the old rules is almost imperceptible, and I doubt if it was worth while to subject the hon. senator from Halifax to the immense amount of labour the preparation of these new rules has imposed upon him. We can continue the old rules for this session and let the others come into force next session, and the world will move on in the same way. The hon. the Secretary of State will be as bland as ever, the hon. senator from Halifax as wise and studious, and all will perform their functions as before and no difference will be perceptible. Why not, therefore, put off the adoption of these rules until next session ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman's argument is a good argument against doing anything at all. It must be remembered we are not now dealing with these rules for the first time. The motion was made in the early part of last session, I think in the month of February and there was a great deal of work done. The rules, as submitted to the committee now were completed before the close of last session, and it was thought desirable by some hon. gentlemen, and the House accepted that view because we were in a hurry to get away, that we had better postpone action until this session. Now the hon. gentleman suggests that we had better postpone it until next session. It is an argument against having the rules revised at all. The work has been done, and, as the hon. gentleman says, these rules do not make any radical change in our way of doing business, except that they give the Speaker a little more power than he has now, and I think that is a desirable thing that we should have.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière) moved that these rules go into operation on April 17 next.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I shall certainly take objection when the committee rises. The rules cannot go through now. I want the French copy before they do. And we cannot get it before April 17 or 18.

The SPEAKER—If we order the printing of them in the minutes, then they will appear naturally in French and English.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I understand that the hon. Secretary of State ordered the French copy long ago, but we have not got it yet.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I appeal to the hon. senator for Stadacona. We have, as the hon. senator for Halifax has said, had these rules under consideration all last session. Now we have been a considerable time discussing them this session, and surely they should go into operation some time during the present session ; and the most opportune time will be after the long adjournment. I would have been inclined, at first sight, to accept the suggestion that they should go into operation on the 1st May, but that might be in the middle of the session, and it is much better to bring them into force at the expiration of a long adjournment.

The French version will surely be ready then. The French translators have not much to do, and it will be their duty to complete the translation at once. I may say, as chairman of the committee, I shall see that it is done with the least possible delay. The hon. member may be assured that in a week at most the rules will be printed in French.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—There is one fatal objection to putting these rules in force during the present session. They make a very material difference in the applications to parliament for Bills coming before the Standing Orders Committee. All the applications up to the present time, and to be made during the early part of this session, come under the existing rules. When these new rules become the fixed rules of the House, the Standing Orders Committee will find that the applications for these Bills do not comply with every requirement of the law, and there will be a difficulty in consequence of that. It would be better to let the new rules go into operation at the beginning of next session.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is not as much force in the objection of the hon. gentleman from Charlottetown as might at first appear, because the notices have been given in accordance with the rules in force when they were given, and they are, of course, good. There will not need to be any notice given after we come back; all the notices will have been given by that time. With respect to the French version, I have ascertained from one of the officers whose duty it is to see to the translation, that not only has the translation of these rules been completed but some of the proofs have already come to the translators, and with respect to the printing the difficulty suggested by the hon. senator from Marshfield does not arise. These rules can be printed and ready for distribution in pamphlet form in a week.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Rule 5, provides that these standing rules and orders shall go into operation immediately on the prorogation of the present session of parliament.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That was last year.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why did you not put it the first vacation we had ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Because the work of the committee was done, and this report was submitted only a few days before prorogation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It would have been the same thing this year if I had availed myself of my right to have a French copy before consenting to go into committee. We would not have got that copy before the recess, and it would have amounted to the same thing. The only reason given by the hon. gentleman is that he wants to clothe the Speaker with more authority. That could be done without putting these rules in force. Let us give him a sessional order for that special purpose and he can have all the power he requires. For the rest, why does he want the rules to come in force so soon ? It cannot be for the railway bills. He says they will be considered under the operation of the existing rules.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The notices will be.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I can see nothing to be gained in pressing for the adoption of these rules immediately.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I really cannot understand the attitude of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There are many other things that the hon. gentleman cannot understand.

Hon. Mr. POWER.—The hon. member for Stadacona was a member of the special committee to which this duty of revising the rules was referred, and he was a very useful and satisfactory member of that committee. He did valuable work on the committee. All the members of that committee, I think, tried conscientiously to do their reasonable best to get those rules into shape. Having got them into shape, I cannot understand why the hon. gentleman should be so particularly anxious that we should not have the benefit of them until some remote day when, probably some members of the committee will no longer be in the Senate. We had better have the use of the rules while we are alive. I have not heard any reason why we should not. If the rules are a good thing, let us have them as soon as we can ; if they are not a good thing, let us drop them.

The Senate divided on the motion that the rules go into operation on the 17th April, which was adopted, contents 29, non-contents 10.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Before the committee rises, I desire to say that the clerk of the House has placed in my hands his copy of the rules with certain suggestions which he thinks it would be well to consider. The first is in regard to rule 24, paragraph 10 : the clerk suggests that the words 'twenty-five or fifty' be added. No notice is required under rule 50 of a motion for adjournment, and the same applies to rule 25.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would move to amend rule 24 as suggested.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The next relates to rule 67; the clerk's suggestion is that the words :

—and translated, and placed on the orders of the day for second reading on a future day.

should be added.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think that is necessary.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—In rule 68, the clerk thinks it would be well to omit the words —when any amendments have been made in committee.

as they conflict with rule 24. I may say that our practice has been that when a Bill has not been amended in committee it may be read a third time. This is the practice in the other House also.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—It can only be read the third time with the consent of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it is better not to make any change there.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Why not except rule 68 from rule 24.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If you except rule 68 from the operation of rule 24, that will apply to committee of the whole, to second readings, to third readings, to every part of rule 68.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is the same rule we have worked under since 1894, and there has never been any trouble.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I simply submit these suggestions as coming from an able parliamentarian, one who is, perhaps, better qualified to speak on a question of this kind than almost any member of the House and it is for the House to consider whether what he proposes should be done. Our present rule 41 is the same as draft rule 68, but we did not have that section in rule 24, which is a new rule.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I move that the words, 'When any amendments have been made in committee,' be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As regards rule 24 I should like to ascertain whether the view which I hold is that which is entertained by the other hon. gentlemen. The practice in this House has been that an hon. gentleman may rise before the orders of the day are gone into and make a speech on any subject of urgent public importance without requiring, as in the Commons, that he should before sitting down make a motion for the adjournment. I should like to be sure that by adopting rule 24, as we have done, we do not take away that privilege. I do not think we have done so.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Look at rule 50.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Rule 50 has no bearing on this point. When an hon. gentleman rises before the orders of the day are called, there is no question under consideration; there is no debate at all.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—You will find the point dealt with in rule 25: 'No notice is required for any of the following motions.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend will see that that does not cover the point as this is not one of the situations provided for in that rule. The practice of the House makes it all right, if it is understood. The past practice has been that a gentleman may rise and make a statement, before the orders of the day are read, without intimating that he would move the adjournment of the House before he sat down; and I want it to be clearly understood that we are not, by this rule, impairing the practice in that respect.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That was not the intention of the committee. The intention of the committee was to provide for a case, which very often arises, when some hon. gentleman gets up and moves that on Friday next this House do adjourn for, say, three weeks.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I have one more suggestion to offer on behalf of the clerk of the House. He suggests, in regard to rule 92, adding the following words: 'Or may be placed on the orders of the day for future consideration or laid on the table.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is provided for by a previous rule. The second paragraph of rule 92 declares that it shall not apply to the reports of select standing committees upon private bills referred to them in the ordinary course of business. I think the proposed addition would lead to conflict.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I will read the suggestion from the same authority regarding paragraph two of rule 92:

This rule does not necessarily apply to the reports of select standing committees upon private bills which may be referred to them in the ordinary course of business which may be disposed of forthwith.

That is a case where an unopposed report comes from a committee and the House is prepared to deal with it at once. It may be dealt with at once, if the House sees fit, without any delay whatever.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I doubt the wisdom of the last words, because the Select Standing Committee may make a report as to which there is considerable difference of opinion in the Senate. If there is no difference of opinion, then the rule may be suspended. If there is a difference of opinion, then the report should not be dealt with forthwith. I think we had better not adopt the second amendment.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Before declaring the rules complete, and reporting to the House, I move that rule 32 be reconsidered. This is a very dangerous rule, and a great deal of mischief may arise from it. For instance, on Thursdays we have usually a very large attendance of the House and a measure might be brought before the House at that time and receive a great deal of consideration and be carried on a motion. The gentlemen who might be in the minority might feel disposed to give, at any time during the day, a notice of motion to reconsider on Friday. We all know that on Friday the House is usually very thin, and taking advantage of a thin House for the reconsideration of the principle or motion that had been adopted by a full House the day before, we are leaving the door open to a very dangerous practice that may be followed. What would be thought of a judge who would reverse to-day the judgment which he gave yesterday? That is practically the position the Senate would take under rule 32. This rule should not be hastily adopted. The rules are for our guidance, and if there are any loopholes in them we know, from past experience, that advantage will be taken of them. I therefore, move that rule 32 be reconsidered.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I submit that the motion is out of order. The good old British practice, which the hon. gentlemen behind me have been maintaining, forbids such a motion as that.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Reconsideration does not seem to work very well except when a rule is suggested.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—It shows that what is sauce for the goose is not sauce for the gander. The hon. gentleman is willing to allow somebody next week, or the week after to reconsider what we did before, but we are not to reconsider what we have done in connection with the rules now under discussion. I ask is reconsideration to apply only to certain things to which certain members give their assent? I want to test the feeling of the House and I, therefore, move that rule 32 be struck out entirely.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This rule was very thoroughly threshed out in the House yesterday. It was discussed ad libitum and a vote was taken on it, and the rule was adopted by a very considerable majority. It seems extraordinary that we should be asked to-day to change a rule which we adopted yesterday. No notice of reconsideration was given yesterday.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The rule itself provides that notice of reconsideration must be given at that very sitting.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not the rule yet.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—My hon. friend has forgotten the fact that our rules have not yet been adopted, and that they are still open for discussion. You can see that once they are adopted what a bad precedent will be established. My hon friend says I cannot move this motion without notice; very well, I abide by that decision, and give notice that, when the rules are brought up again, I shall move that rule 32 be struck out; but I think I am in order. I ask the ruling of the Chairman as to whether I am within my right or not.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman would be perfectly within his right, when the report of the committee is presented, in moving that it be amended by striking out rule 32, and the two following rules.

The CHAIRMAN—I think it would be better for the hon. gentleman to consent to take it up when the Speaker is in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I have not taken much part in the discussion of these rules. I voted for the striking out of rule 32, but the committee has been reconsidering and practically wiping out rules already adopted without any notice whatever. Why should an exception be made of rule 32 ? I agree with the hon. senator for Welland in his objection to this rule. Any rule which will permit a member of this House to bring on a discussion on a subject already decided, is fraught with danger. It will lead to a great deal of trouble. I can understand members taking exception to things done in their absence, and giving notice of reconsideration, but I do not think it is fair to those who stay here and attend to their work, that they should be interfered with in that way at the suggestion of any member.

The CHAIRMAN—So far as the Chair is concerned, the committee has decided that the rules go into operation on April 17 and I should prefer that this matter should be brought up with the Speaker in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The matter should be disposed of in committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This particular rule was discussed by the House and a vote taken upon it, and it seems to me an absurd position to take that we should reconsider it. The rules that we have gone back to were ones that were allowed to stand and were subsequently taken up by unanimous consent. They were not like this, which was debated and adopted yesterday.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I understand the point of order is withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not withdraw the point of order.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I voted for this rule for this reason, that sometime this body, like other bodies, may be surprised to a certain extent, and it may be found that a different conclusion should be arrived at. From the experience we have had of this practice, which has obtained in all municipal and deliberative bodies, except parliament, it has not led to any inconvenience or abuse. I can speak with some knowledge of the city of Montreal. Instead of leading to any abuse or inconvenience there, it has been of considerable service in that city. On the other hand, I admit that there is no such necessity for this rule in the Senate, because a municipal body is liable to be bound towards third parties, whereas a body like this is not liable to be bound at all, and remains always master of its own decisions. If I were in the city council of Montreal I should assuredly insist on maintaining a rule of this kind. For the present, I cannot see that there is much ground for changing the decision at which we arrived yesterday. I am, however, open to conviction.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Does the hon. gentleman compare this House to the city council of Montreal ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No, I have explained the difference. The argument which I confess has appealed somewhat to my mind is this : I understand there is a fear that at the last moment, when the House is going to adjourn, some member may give notice of a reconsideration for the next day and, perhaps, spring a surprise on the House. There may be a good deal in that. The question is worth considering.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I understand that without this rule at all, the Senate can at any time reconsider a motion, but it must be of importance, and it cannot be sprung on the House by one member.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, unless you get a majority of the whole Senate and then it must be on seven days' notice.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If you have not a majority of the whole Senate there is no use reconsidering it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—As I stated yesterday, reconsideration and rescission are two different things. Reconsideration does not necessarily imply rescission, and I think we could meet the difficulty if we dropped clause 32, and make clause 35 read 'to rescind or reconsider'—add the word 'reconsider' in clause 35.

Hon. Mr. POWER—These rules are not under consideration now. As I understand, the hon. senator from Welland proposed to give notice when the report comes up in the House that he will move that rule 32 be stricken out. We spent the greater part of yesterday discussing rule 32, and I do not see why it should be brought up again.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I only stated that intention in case I had not the right to do it now. It is the opinion of a number of hon. gentlemen around me that we have a right to reconsider the rule now. If that is so, it should be done now. We are going to adjourn to-morrow, and we shall have no time to consider it. I will test the feeling of the House by moving that rule 32 be struck out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I persist in the point of order which I raised, that under the British practice you cannot reconsider a decision solemnly arrived at.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—There has been no such decision arrived at. The House is in committee now and has only been debating this matter in committee. It is all tentative, and what we adopt does not necessarily go into operation, not until a formal motion is carried that the rules go into effect. There has been no formal decision on this at all. If a majority of the members are of opinion that the decision of yesterday was ill-considered, or that they were ill-informed, or had not sufficiently considered the matter, and think that the rule should be changed, surely we are arriving at a better solution of the matter by deciding it now, and not putting it off.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That would be perfectly true if the members who were present yesterday were made aware that there was an intention to raise the question. The hon. senator from Toronto is probably aware that we have a rule which provides that the rules of the House shall apply in committee, except certain specified rules about previous questions; so we cannot reconsider, and there is no such motion known.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Rule 43 of the existing rules provides that a senator may at any time before a Bill is passed, move for the reconsideration of any clauses thereof already passed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is not a Bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There can be no doubt that before this committee rises we can go back to any clause. As the hon. gentleman from Toronto says, it is all in a tentative position, and we can go back to any clause without notice. I agree with the hon. senator from de Salaberry, and it has been my opinion all through, that it would have been better to have one rule only with regard to reconsidering and rescinding, and if we struck out clause 32 we would have the power to rescind, which is somewhat similar to the power existing in the British parliament.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The very fact that the old rule is headed 'reconsideration of clause,' shows that we possess the power. What are we doing now? Reconsidering clause after clause. I have moved for a reconsideration of this clause just the same as other members of the committee have asked for certain changes in other clauses of the rules now before the House. As this rule has not become law, we can this evening amend or strike it out as we please. I am satisfied had this matter been thoroughly considered yesterday, the door would not have been left open for any question to be discussed a second time in the House after the judgment of the House had been taken upon it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is now doing the very thing which he says should not be allowed to be done. We discussed this matter in committee, and we discussed it in the House, and came to a decision by a reasonable majority; and now the hon. gentleman wants to upset the decision of the majority.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The vote shows that there were only twenty-six members present at the time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Rule 43 deals with the proceedings in Committee of the Whole on a public Bill; that is entirely analogous to what we are doing now. There is no doubt we have the power to do what is proposed to be done.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Then I move reconsideration of clause 32, and, if the House adopts the motion, I shall then move that the clause be struck out.

The CHAIRMAN—I expressed to the hon. gentleman a desire that he would hold his motion until the Speaker is in the chair, but I am satisfied that it is perfectly competent for him to make a motion on any of the rules.

The committee divided on the motion to reconsider clause 32, which was adopted contents 26, non-contents 16.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The motion having been adopted, I move that rules 32, 33, and 34, be struck out.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It appears strange that we should within twenty-four hours have so completely changed our minds, after having carefully considered and deliberately arrived at a sane conclusion yesterday.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We are older and wiser.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We are doing better.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Some people improve with age, others do not. If we have a right to proceed in this way, we have a perfect right to do the same with all the rules and cancel them one after another.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Are we not making children of ourselves to reverse our decision in this way? There is no reason or justification for it. The hon. gentleman from Lincoln (Hon. Mr. Gibson) says we had a small House yesterday, why were not the members here? We can under such practice, come here to-morrow and proceed to reconsider and cancel what we are doing to-day. Is not that a strange course for a deliberative body to pursue? I would call attention to the fact that nobody gave notice of reconsideration yesterday, although this rule makes provision for it. I raise a point of order that no notice has been given in accordance with the rule which we are now asked to repeal.

The CHAIRMAN—That rule is not governing us now.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved that clause 35 be reconsidered for the purpose of inserting before the word 'rescinded' the words 'be reconsidered.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—I object to that as being totally contrary to British practice. It is most irregular. You propose to reconsider a thing and you have to give seven days' notice of your intention to reconsider. That is irrational on the face of it. Rule 35 is to deal with the matter on which action has been taken finally by the House. We have decided not to have reconsideration, and the hon. gentleman had better stick to the rescission which is used in the British parliament. Rule 35 as it stands is useful, because it will prevent rescinding a decision of the House unless there is a proper majority, but to say that you merely reconsider, with this notice provided for in rule 35, is objectionable. Rescission is wiping out completely a previous action of the House; reconsideration is simply talking it over again and possibly modifying it. You may debate it again, but you do not necessarily abolish it; but when you rescind you strike out and abolish the previous action.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am surprised that the hon. member objects to this as being contrary to British practice. I understand that British practice is, that the same question cannot be raised twice during the same session, and he suggests our departing from that practice by rule 35. If the principle of rescission is sound, surely it is logical to apply it to reconsideration. I voted for the striking out of clause 32, as I stated before, in the expectation that it would be covered by an amendment to rule 35. I therefore insist upon my motion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am surprised that a gentleman of the parliamentary experience of the hon. senator from de Salaberry does not know that rescinding is in accordance with British practice. At page 236 of 'May,' I find that a resolution may be rescinded, and an order of the House discharged, &c. There are provisions there with respect to rescinding, but they have no provision for reconsidering, and I say if we are to have reconsidering let us have it, without adopting a practice which does not prevail in England.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. member was in favour of retaining rule 32, and, therefore, departing from the English practice; now he is complaining that I am applying the very principle in clause 35. That is not logical.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is perfectly logical. The two things are unlike. I venture to assert, without fear of being contradicted, that no such provision as this will be found in the rules of any legislature under God's heaven.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think it would be better to move that the committee rise.

The committee divided on the motion to amend rule 35, which was agreed to, contents 22, non-contents 18, and the rule as amended was adopted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would ask the committee to turn to rule 25, which contains two provisions relating to adjournment of debate and adjournment of the Senate. We have been looking over the question, and are a little doubtful as to whether the right remains of rising before the orders of the day and calling attention to a subject of general importance.

Now, under rule 25, we are dealing with motions for which there is no necessity of giving notice, and I move that a paragraph be added to the following effect: —

For the purpose of bringing up a question of urgent public importance before proceeding with the orders of the day.

By putting that in, no question can arise in the future.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I think the hon. gentleman is raising a new question and opening up one as to whether a matter may or may not be one of public importance. We cannot decide that point until we have heard the whole story. He would not surely intend to allow a member to force upon the House a speech on something which was merely of importance in that member's private opinion? The member is left to be the only judge on that point. We had better stand where we are, on British practice.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It must be a matter of urgency because you can always bring a matter up by giving one day's notice.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The question which the hon. gentleman from Toronto has raised as to who shall determine whether a matter is of public importance or not, would, I think, be covered by words which were struck out of our proposed rule 45. I suggest that my hon. friend add to his proposition the words:

Which he will then state in writing and hand to the Speaker.

The House would thus be seized of the subject on which he is going to speak.

The SPEAKER—I am afraid if we depart from the practice it may lead us into extraordinary and unknown fields. We have two ways by which a matter can be brought up—in fact, we have three. The adjournment can be moved; a question of privilege can be raised——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The adjournment can only be moved for certain specific purposes, and this is not one of them.

The SPEAKER—In practice any question can be raised before the orders of the day are called, and a certain amount of latitude is given, but we all know at such a time that there is no question before the Chair and the discussion can always be stopped. As a matter of privilege a member may raise a question before the orders of the day are called, or put questions to the ministers, or direct attention to an important event that has taken place. That practice is quite elastic, but it is simply permitted in virtue of the past custom of the Senate that such questions may be raised and discussed at length. I do not see that we shall gain anything by adding to the rules in this matter. You have the question of privilege or you can raise a discussion on an important question by moving the adjournment, and, in addition, it is possible at the present time, before the orders of the day are called, to draw the attention of the House to any important question. I do not think a rule should be made.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—An hon. gentleman could not put himself in order by moving the adjournment unless we provide in the way I am proposing, because the question of adjournment is hedged in by the rules we have now made, and no motion of that nature can be made, except for certain specific objects, and this is not one of them. The practice warrants an hon. gentleman rising before the orders of the day are called and bringing up a matter of urgent public importance, but hereafter we may have some trouble if no specific provision is made. I do not think myself that any hon. gentleman has a right to rise at that stage unless it is to ask some important question of a minister, but if he discusses any question of public importance it should have the merit of urgency in it, because, otherwise, he can always give one day's notice. The element of urgency must come in before the member would have the right to rise.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I made the suggestion to my hon. friend: is he willing to add these words :

Which he shall state in writing and hand to the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is it necessary to do that when he announces that he will conclude with a definite motion ? That is not the practice, and has never been the practice. Let the proposed rule be confined to what has been distinctly our practice.

The SPEAKER—That is just the reason why I said it was by tolerance that these discussions are permitted to take place. If two or three or four senators have spoken, the question of order may be raised that there is nothing before the chair.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—A motion to adjourn would put the member perfectly in order.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Therefore the hon. gentleman is not without remedy, as he has been suggesting. The introduction of these words, to my mind, may seem to give colour to a right to bring up a matter which is obscure, and of which the House has no notice. We have known discussions in parliament where a subject has been opened up in a very large way because it struck some particular member as being of vital importance, and we had a long speech which turned out, after all, not to be pertinent in its nature. The present system enables such a proceeding to be stopped.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The motion to adjourn is always in order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to know what the motion of the hon. gentleman is. I was at first under the impression that he proposed that he could move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a matter of public importance ; but that is not his motion as I now understand it. As I now understand, the hon. gentleman says no notice shall be required to enable a member to rise and call attention to a matter of public importance without moving any resolution whatever.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If the hon. gentleman from Halifax had been following matters as closely as he usually does, he would have noticed that I am proposing to amend rule 25 which deals with motions that may be brought up without notice.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman does not wish any notice to be given.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is a motion for the adjournment of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He does not say that. I do not see that the amendment he proposes requires any motion of adjournment at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The words 'for the adjournment of the House' have been accidentally omitted ; they should have been included.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I think the proposition should be stated at the beginning of the discussion. I might conceive that the matter was of great consequence, but if I were to state what it was beforehand, the government might very quickly show me there was a reason why it should not be brought up at that time. If this is not provided for, we might have a long fruitless debate, one which is positively injurious on a great public question. The House should be informed of the subject matter of the discussion at the opening of the observations and not at their close.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The clear understanding is, no matter what the wording may be, that when an hon. gentleman moves the adjournment of the House to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, he shall state the subject upon which he is going to address the House by placing it in the hands of the Speaker in writing before he proceeds to address the House.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Why not then insert the word 'previously.'

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I do not understand the object which the hon. gentleman has in view. Does a member who moves the adjournment, under such circumstances, require a seconder ?

Some hon. MEMBERS—No.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It gives him the right to move a resolution and talk as long as he feels disposed, taking up as much of the time of the Senate as possible, and then he can withdraw his motion without having a vote taken. The object simply seems to be to get an opportunity of speaking longer than our rules would otherwise permit.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no limitation of the right to speak.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—We have rules on that point. I therefore think that the proposed amendment is uncalled for and unnecessary, and that it will create a great deal of trouble and annoyance.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no need of a seconder when the adjournment of the House is moved—that has always been the rule. There is no rule either limiting the length of the speech which may be made.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—A good committee was appointed last year to overhaul these rules. That committee sat for a great length of time and we concluded when they tabled these rules that they had them perfect, but what do we find ? The very members of that committee are the members who are moving amendments and resolutions and cavilling amongst each other after sitting all last winter.

Some hon. MEMBERS—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—The chairman has sought to present the results of the committee's work as clearly as possible, but he has been obstructed in every possible way. We are kept here discussing these rules until they are a jumble.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I will amend my resolution so that it will contain the following words, which I propose should be inserted in rule 25 :

For the adjournment of the Senate, for the purpose of bringing up a question of urgent public importance, which the mover shall state before proceeding to speak, before the House proceeds to the orders of the day.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, from the committee, reported the rules with amendments.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I move that the report of the committee be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Would it be in order to move that the House be specially summoned to-morrow for the consideration of Standing Orders. We propose to adjourn to-morrow, and it would be necessary that we should deal finally with these rules in order that they may come into force before we meet again.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I desire to give notice that I will move to amend rule 148. Under rule 16 I should give one day's notice, unless the House will accept notice now. It is simply a formal amendment which the Divorce Committee wishes to make, providing that the petitioner shall file copies of all proceedings with the committee. No expense will be attached to this. It is proposed to amend rule 148 as follows :

A copy of petition for a bill of divorce or relating to any matter arising out of said petition and of every document and paper accompanying such petition, or produced in evidence before the committee shall be furnished to the committee by the person on whose behalf the petition, document or paper is presented or produced.

We adopt this as a rule of the committee, but so that the public may have notice of the requirements of the Senate, it is desirable that this should be embodied in the divorce rules as well as in the rules of the committee. I therefore give notice, with the leave of the Senate, that such amendment will be moved to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—With regard to the motion that the Senate be specially convened to-morrow afternoon for the consideration of the rules, I would object to that motion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The rules have not been adopted by the House. That motion can only be made after the report of the committee has been received and adopted by the House.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—In that case, if hon. gentlemen will not facilitate the perfection of our procedure in so far as the rules are concerned, they will be out of joint in coming into force on April 17, if we adjourn to-morrow. The rules would come into force at that time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They will not come into force as soon as that.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If they were passed they would come into force then; but if not, they will not. If the rules are good they can easily be put through to-morrow, because we have had enough discussion already.

A SUPPLY BILL.

1ST, 2ND AND 3RD READINGS.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons by the Clerk, with a Bill (56) intituled : 'An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 30th June, 1906.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certain urgent payments have to be made, and most of you probably know that when parliament is sitting it is impossible to get a Governor General's warrant. We must apply to parliament for the money. The payments to be met under this Bill are some six items. The House of Commons has passed this to-day, and, as the money was urgently required, arrangements have been made to have the Bill assented to at our next sitting. I move that rule 41 be suspended so far as it relates to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I object to the suspension of the rule. We have been making a number of rules, and the very first motion that is presented to the House is that we should suspend one of our rules.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Because the Governor is coming here to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—The Senate has certain privileges of its own, and I am disposed to stand up for them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In my experience of thirty-four years in this House, I am not aware that any exception has been taken to suspending the rules for passing a Supply Bill. As a rule, the Supply Bill has come to this Chamber a few hours before prorogation, and no exception has been taken to the suspension of the rules. It has been accepted by both political parties. The House of Commons passed the Bill to-day and it has been pressed for the convenience of hon. gentlemen, many of whom wish to leave to-morrow. Of course, if it is the desire of any one that we should stay for another week to pass this Bill I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The items are so good, I am sure my hon. friend will not insist upon his objection.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I have no objection to the items in the Bill, but it should be the duty of the government, in the first place, to submit their Bills to the Senate before they summon the Governor General to give his assent to them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I hope my hon. friend will not press his objection.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—No, I shall not press it.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill passed through all its stages.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière) moved that when the Senate adjourns to-morrow it stand adjourn until Wednesday, the 18th of April next, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I object to the motion. These adjournments will lead to just the same difficulty we have had in former sessions, that, towards the end of the session, we shall have quite a number of important Bills submitted to us and not have time to consider them. Within the last three or four days of last session, upwards of twenty Bills were introduced. There was no time to consider or discuss them properly. If we have these adjournments when we have a large number of Bills coming up from the House of Commons within a few days, it will cause a repetition of the difficulty. The number of the Bills before us at present is fifty-six. That shows that there must be a number of Bills which have been advanced in the other House and it is not in the public interest that we should adjourn at the present time. Senators who come here from a long distance are under great disadvantage because of these adjournments. We come here at the opening, and engage our quarters for the whole session, and here within two or three weeks after the opening of parliament we are to have an adjournment of three weeks, though before we reassemble there will certainly be a number of Bills ready for discussion. Those Bills will perhaps be hurried through, just as the Bill we passed a few minutes ago, under a suspension of the rules, and without proper consideration or discussion. That is certainly not to the credit of the House.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

THE GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the adjournment of the House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Can the hon. gentleman tell us whether an appointment has been made of a director for the Geological Survey ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was not in council to-day, and cannot tell whether anything has been done, but I know it was in contemplation.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is rumoured on the street that Mr. A. P. Low has been appointed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is very likely, but I do not know. I went into council, and there happened to be only one or two there and having some business to do before coming to the Senate, I left, so that I was not present at the meeting and cannot give my hon. friend any information on the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Wednesday, March 28, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILL ASSENTED TO.

The SPEAKER informed the Senate that he had received a communication from the Governor General's Secretary announcing that the Honourable Mr. Justice Sedgewick, acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, would proceed to the Senate Chamber this afternoon at 3 o'clock, for the purpose of giving assent to an interim Supply Bill, which has passed the Senate and House of Commons during the present session.

The Senate was adjourned during pleasure.

The Honourable Mr. Justice Sedgewick, acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, being seated on the Throne, gave the Royal Assent to the following Bill :—

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending 30th June, 1906, to which Bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Deputy Governor was pleased to retire, and the House of Commons withdrew.

The Senate resumed.

THE LIEUTENANT GOVERNORSHIP OF NOVA SCOTIA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to draw the attention of members of the government present to a short article which appears in the Ottawa 'Citizen' of this morning, in reference to the appointment of the Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia. I notice that the paper, after referring to a number of gentlemen to whom the office had been offered and declined, winds up the article with the following words :

Relief loomed in sight in the person of Judge Fraser, and as a compromise candidate Judge Fraser was finally accepted, but only with the stipulation that he should hold the lieutenant-governorship for a second term, in the event of the Liberal party retaining power. Judge Fraser's conditions were accepted and his appointment went through at yesterday afternoon's cabinet meeting.

I should like to ask whether the government are in the habit of making appointments of this kind with the promise and pledge that they shall be continued in office after the expiration of the first term of five years ? If so, the House and the country will be somewhat surprised. It is just possible that the hon. gentlemen may not be there five years hence, and, if they are, would the incoming government consider themselves bound to carry out such a pledge made by the present government? An hon. gentleman says 'no.' When Lord Salisbury came into power a pledge that had been given by the outgoing premier of an appointment to the House of Lords was carried out, by Lord Salisbury's government. The pledge made by the preceding government was respected on the ground that the government was a continuity, and that the pledges of a government of that character, should be adhered to. I should like the hon. Secretary of State to inform the House as to whether any such pledge was necessary in order to secure an occupant of the gubernatorial chair, in Halifax ? The hon. gentleman told us the other night, in reply to a question which I put to him myself, that they could not find anybody to accept the position, and not being able to find any available timber for an office that in the past had been considered a very enviable one, it appears by this statement that it was stipulated with Judge Fraser that if he would accept it he could have it for ten years. Can the hon. gentleman tell us if that is the fact ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—After my hon. friend's long experience I think he ought to know that it is not the habit of the government to communicate their intentions to opposition newspapers, and I should say that he could hardly have a much worse authority for making any statement of the kind that he has inquired about, than the class of authority that he has supposed may represent the views of the government. Judge Fraser was appointed Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia, and that is all the information I have to give the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am quite aware, as is also the hon. gentleman, that ministers are not in the habit of communicating to opposition newspapers, whether respectable, reliable, or unreliable in character, the events which take place in council ; but my hon. friend knows, from his long experience, that there are very often leaky vessels through which the proceedings of the Cabinet filter, and opposition papers are very apt to pick them up, and in this case I am very much inclined to think the report is correct.

MR. CHARLTON'S SPEECHES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the government if the book which I have received and which, I presume, many other Senators have received through the post office, containing the speeches of the Hon. Mr. Charlton, was issued by the government, and, if not, by whom ? No memo accompanied the volume and I do not know whether I have to pay for it or whether it is a gift. Does the government know who has distributed these volumes ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I had the pleasure of receiving a book of the same nature. I know nothing of its source, but I presume it came from the author from the way in which it was gotten up and the delicate way in which it was sent. The government know nothing about it.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The Order of the Day being called,—

Consideration of the amendments made in Committee of the Whole House to the third report of the special committee appointed during last session to consider and revise, and if deemed necessary, to add to the rules, orders and forms of proceeding of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As to this motion which stands in my name, I wish to say a few words of explanation. The draft rules which were referred to the Committee of the Whole House some time ago have been discussed, as hon. gentlemen are aware, at very considerable length. The draft which was referred to the Committee of the Whole has been very considerably changed. If one may compare this body of rules to a ship, during the voyage through the committee the ship has been subjected to a good many casualties. I am afraid that perhaps these casualties were due to the fact that the acting captain was not the one who ought to have been in command of the ship. She has now got within what one may call the pilotage district, close to her home port, or her port of destination, and I have a dread that if the same master were to undertake to bring her into port some mishap might befall her. I think the better way then is that the ship should be left in the hands of the pilot who is supposed to take charge of her when she reaches the limits of the pilotage district and that the captain should be relieved from command and responsibility for the time being. Any hon. gentleman can take charge of the measure. It occurred to me that perhaps the hon. gentleman from Beamsville (Hon. Mr. Gibson) who has shown recently promise of great future excellence as an expounder of parliamentary law and practice, might act as pilot and bring this craft safely to anchor.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the reflection which has just been cast upon the members of the committee is altogether unwarranted. It does not follow that because one member of a committee disagrees with the captain as he describes himself, who is commanding the ship, or the chairman, that therefore he is inimical to the opinions of the chairman. For myself, I repudiate in the strongest possible language the insinuation which the hon. gentleman has thrown out, and I appeal to every member of the committee whether anything has been said either by myself or by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry or others—although we differed from him often—which would exhibit or manifest any disposition towards him as chairman such as he has indicated to the House. I do think it is going a little too far when a gentleman assumes the responsibility which he assumed that he should speak as he has spoken. Both in this House and in committee I have given the hon. gentleman every credit, in fact I have gone out of my way to give him credit, for the assiduity with which he has performed his duties as chairman; but it does not follow that because he spent a week or a month or a year in the framing of a rule that it must of necessity meet the approval of those with whom he is associated. I think it is about time that gentlemen who assume such a position should learn to respect the opinions of others. Members may get credit at least for expressing their opinions although his may be in opposition to them. I should not have made these remarks were it not for the intimation which has been given that those who differed from the hon. gentleman were actuated by other than proper and sincere motives. I allow other gentlemen of the committee to make their own statements; I am speaking now exclusively for myself. I never have in the past, and, I trust never will in future, however strong my own views may be, and however strong the language I may use to enforce them—be supposed or be accused of opposing a measure from a feeling of disrespect for or any personal animosity toward the hon. gentleman who opposes me. As I understand, the hon. gentleman has sat down without moving the adoption of the rules, thus throwing the responsibility upon the hon. gentleman from Beamsville. The hon. gentleman is quite capable of taking care of himself; but it is strange that because he thought proper to differ from the chairman upon the propriety of allowing certain of the proposed rules to go into effect, he should be treated in this manner. I think the Senate, upon reflection, will come to the same conclusion to which I have come. As far as I am concerned, if I am proposed on a committee of this kind in future, where the chairman is supposed to be paramount, an emperor, or an absolute ruler, and I am to have nothing to say other than to acquiesce in what he proposes, I shall decline the appointment.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am very sorry that I should have been absent from the Chamber, at the request of the Postmaster General, even for a few moments, and to have missed the opportunity of listening to the character which I believe has been given to me by the senior member for Halifax. I believe he calls me a pirate. If I am a pirate I am a successful pirate.

An hon. GENTLEMAN—Pilot.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I accept the correction, I have nothing to take back from what I stated last night, that I thought the rule in question was a dangerous one. The majority of this House felt that it was so, and supported me in moving to have it erased from the draft.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order; the hon. gentleman is referring to a past debate in this House to which I did not refer at all.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—My hon. friend need not be so thin skinned.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not thin skinned. I insist on the point of order.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—If he had not referred to a former debate, he could not have called me a pilot; and I think that people who live in glass houses should be the last to throw stones. I have no feeling in the matter. I believe I was legislating in the interests of the Senate, and in the best interests of the country in the course that I took, because I honestly believe that if that rule had remained in force it would have been a dangerous one. A subject might have been passed upon to-day and on a following day a thin House might upset the whole of the proceedings. I have no desire to take the job out of the hon. gentleman's hands and I agree with every word which has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. I have no desire—no member of the committee has any desire—to detract one iota from the work done by the senior member from Halifax towards getting the revised rules in shape, but I do say that, notwithstanding all the good work, and all the hard work he has done, he certainly must allow other people to do a little thinking for themselves; that is all I claim. I stated my views yesterday as I do now, believing I am right, and I had the support of the Senate. I have no feeling against the hon. gentleman. I have admiration for everything he has done in connection with the rules of the House, and congratulate him on the work he has done as chairman, and I have no desire to become pilot or take the wheel from the hon. gentleman. He navigated the vessel through the stormy seas of the committee, and I have no desire to act as pilot, but rather wish to see him complete the work he has bestowed so much time upon.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am sorry that the senior member for Halifax has taken the view he has of what occurred with regard to these rules. I feel bound to say here what I stated in the committee, and what I have already partially stated in this House, that the hon. gentleman deserves a great deal of credit indeed for the work he has put upon these rules. He brought them before us in such a shape as to facilitate our work in a very great degree. But I thought I gleaned this impression very early in the work of the committee, that my hon. friend had his heart very much set upon carrying through the committee in its entirety everything he had prepared. He seemed to be extremely tenacious of any work he had done. I submit, however, that others although they may not have given the same time or skill to the work, are entitled to their opinion, and, although I have differed from the hon. gentleman on some of these rules, and failing in carrying my point in the committee, have brought it before the House and have succeeded here, that is no reason why there should be any feeling with regard to it. The hon. gentleman had infinitely more of his own way in regard to the rules than any member of the committee. Why should he then begrudge to the rest of us some little opinion of our own? Were it not that I know the hon. gentleman is under a little irritation at this moment, I would be inclined to resent the imputation that other hon. gentlemen, such as the leader of the opposition, only rank as pilots while he ranks as captain. I am reminded of the story of two of my fellow countrymen who were having a little argument over a glass of whiskey. As the argument advanced, one of them, named Alexander, said to the other, 'Angus, I am a philosopher and you are a fool.' My hon. friend almost went so far as to characterize the other members of the committee as of a lower rank of intelligence as compared with himself. He did not mean it, but nevertheless hon. gentlemen could not fail to glean that impression. No member of the committee ignores the important work which my hon. friend has done on these rules. His work will remain, and this House will get the benefit of it. We have said it before, and we say it now; but we felt like having a little of our own way—only a little as compared with what he has had—and he should not grumble.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to say a few words in explanation. Perhaps I have not the gift of making a clear statement; it must be so, because the two hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House have completely misrepresented what I said. I never found the slightest fault with any criticism, never referred to what took place in the committee at all except in this way. I said I had been in charge of the ship, in a way. I did not even claim that I was as intelligent as the other officers of the craft, but I said I had not been very successful in navigating the ship, and now that she had got within pilotage limits it was better that I should let the ship be brought in by a pilot. I did not specially single out the hon. gentleman from Beamsville (Hon.Mr.Gibson) but I mentioned his name as being a gentleman who had shown promise of being an authority on parliamentary law, and practice. If there is anything wrong or offensive in that to the hon. gentleman from Beamsville, or if anything I said is calculated to offend any hon. gentleman in this House, I withdraw it; but it is only expounders such as the hon. gentlemen opposite who could distort my language to mean what they have made it mean.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman is a little unfortunate in the simile he has used in comparing himself to a captain of a ship, because nothing will justify a captain in deserting his ship. I understand in nautical law that is most clearly laid down.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am prepared to stand by the ship, but I am not taking charge.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman misconceives the position of the committee and of himself with reference to this code of rules. It is not a fully equipped ship that my hon. friend is in charge of. We proceeded to build a ship, to lay it on the stocks, and because some of us thought fit to change the lines from those laid out by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, it has not in any way weakened the construction of the craft. I hope my hon. friend will reassume the charge he had of piloting this celebrated ship into port, and will, under even the most adverse circumstances, stay with the ship. The rules as we have them now are in a very desirable shape, and, when printed and acted upon in practice hereafter, I am sure whatever credit may be due to any one, will be awarded to him.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am sick and tired of hearing that word 'credit'. I do not want credit; I simply did my duty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman objects to what he terms the distorting of his language and misrepresenting it. It may be just possible that I do not understand what the English language means, but I took down the words when he uttered them, and in giving a reason why he deserted the ship, it was because he could not have his own way.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I never said a word about having my own way or deserting the ship.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He insinuated that he as captain was not the one who should have attempted to command the ship. That implied that those who differed from him on the subject of the rules were influenced by personal feeling against him.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It means that or nothing at all. His last language, attributing to me a distortion of his words, is unwarranted. I have no desire to assume the position of 'pilot' of the ship, but since the captain has deserted it, whether he desires to scuttle it or not, it should be brought safely into port. He not only deserts his post as captain, but pirate like would scuttle the ship, and drown us all. I have no objection therefore to move, seconded by the hon. gentleman from Beamsville, the adoption of this report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Under what rule?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The report of this committee has not been printed in French. I find in 'Bourinot,' 3rd edition, page 554, speaking of reports of committee, the following:

> When the Speaker has called for reports of committees during the progress of routine business, the chairman or, in his absence, a member of the committee, will rise in his place and having briefly stated the nature of the report, will send it to the table where it is read by one of the assistant clerks. If it is long, the House generally dispenses with the reading, as all reports are printed in the votes and proceedings for the information of members as soon as they are laid before the House.

There are two points of order, one that the report has not been printed in the votes and proceedings, and the second is covered by the following words:

> The reports should be in English and French like all other proceedings of the two Houses.

That question came up in the Senate on the 23rd April, 1868.

The committee appointed to examine and report upon the contingent accounts of the Senate for the present session, to whom their fifth report was referred back for further consideration, have in obedience to the order of reference of the 22nd instant, further considered the subject matter of the said report and now beg leave to report thereon as follows.

Then follows the report.

The Hon. Mr. Seymour moved, seconded by the Hon. Mr. McCully, that the said report be now adopted. After debate, on a question of order being raised, that the said report not being in the French language cannot now be taken into consideration, the Hon. the Speaker being appealed to ruled that a report received by the House is a record according to the meaning of the 133rd section of the British North America Act, 1867, and that the report before the House being in the English language only cannot be now taken into consideration.

The two points are first that this report has never been printed in the minutes of proceedings of this House, and second it is not in French.

The SPEAKER—I think the point is well taken.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then I move that this order be discharged and placed on the orders of the day for the 18th of April next.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—That will not give two intervening days.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then I make it the 19th and that will give the two intervening days.

The order was discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for the 19th April next.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved:

That the senators be summoned, under rule 16, on the 19th April next, for the purpose of making standing orders the rules, reported from the Committee of the Whole House yesterday.

If there should be a discussion on the 19th which would render this inconvenient to members, the order can be discharged and fixed for the 20th.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I object to that motion on this ground; the notice is premature. It cannot be given before the adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Oh yes it can.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—At all events if it be given there must be one clear day intervening. under rule 17.

The SPEAKER.—I would suggest to the hon. gentleman to continue it as a notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I wish to meet the convenience of the House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The motion of which I have given notice would be in order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I make no objection to that.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—My hon. friend from Calgary is in exactly the same boat as I am.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not the same, because the rules he wants to amend have been adopted by this House.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman is moving the adoption of a new rule.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He wants to make a change in a rule which is already the rule of the House, and it is urgent that it should be done, but there is no urgency in the other case.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—My hon. friend did not raise the point of order as to urgency, but on the point of time, that I had not given sufficient notice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In this case what is asked for is urgent. I could raise a point of order, but I do not care to do so. I do not insist on all my rights.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Then it is understood that my motion stands over until the 18th.

The SPEAKER—Yes.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday the 18th April at 8 p.m.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

ORDERS OF THE DAY DROPPED.

The Order of the day being called:

That the senators be summoned under rule 16 for the 19th April instant for the purpose of making the rules, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the 27th March last, standing orders of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I think I had better ask to have this motion discharged, because I have got out of line with the date, and put in a new notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is with the permission of the House, I suppose?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Not necessarily. It has not been moved from the Chair.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would call the attention of the House to a circular dated the 18th of April, but which was mailed on the 15th, addressed to all the members of the Senate, which reads as follows:

Sir,—In compliance with rule 16, you are hereby notified that the proposed revised rules and orders of the Senate are on the Orders of the Day for consideration on the 19th instant.

That is to-day.

With a view of making them standing orders of the Senate.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) SAMUEL E. ST. ONGE CHAPLEAU,
Clerk of the Senate.

I do not see why we are summoned here to-day in this manner if the preliminary motion has not been adopted and if the hon. gentleman is now going to withdraw that motion.

The SPEAKER—I have to inform the Senate that the notice which has been read was sent out by error.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Perhaps my hon. friend will allow this to stand as a notice of motion for the next meeting of the Senate? In any case it will have to be dropped, because my notice is out of line with the date.

The SPEAKER—The Order of the Day is dropped.

DEBATES OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE presented the first report of the Standing Committee on Debates and Reporting, and moved that it be taken into consideration on Monday next.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask the Chairman of the committee who the gentleman is who has been recommended by the committee and what his experience is ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The gentleman who is mentioned in the report is the reporter of the Montreal 'Herald' in the press gallery of the House of Commons. I inquired personally of Mr. Kidd, the chief editor of the Montreal 'Gazette' and was told by him that no better man could be chosen. His services are subject to be dispensed with on a week's notice in case he does not give entire satisfaction.

The motion was agreed to.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

The Order of the day being called.

Consideration of the amendments made in Committee of the Whole House to the third report of the special committee appointed during last session to consider and revise, and if deemed necessary, to add to the rules, orders and forms of proceeding of the Senate.—Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved that the amendments made in Committee of the Whole to the third report of the committee charged with the revision of the rules of the Senate be now taken into consideration.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As hon. members will observe, I have given notice that when this stage of the proceedings is reached I would move that the amendments made to the report be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering some other amendments which I think are necessary to be made to the rules before they finally pass out of our hands. I therefore move the motion which stands in my name, as follows :

That when the Order of the Day is reached for the consideration of the amendments made in Committee of the Whole House to the third report of the special committee appointed during last session to consider and revise, and if deemed necessary, to add to the rules and forms of proceeding of the Senate, he will move that these amendments be not now agreed to, but that the said report be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of reconsideration forthwith.

I may explain that during the recess, having some time on my hands, the Clerk of the Senate called my attention to some incongruities which he had observed in the rules and I went into an examination of them partly with the clerk and partly on my own account. As might reasonably have been expected, I found that there were many incongruities and verbal slips in the rules. This is only what might have been looked for. When rules are largely made up as one might say of patch work—the old rules recast with some new ones added, and numerous changes made in Committee of the Whole, it would almost inevitably happen, that many amendments would not exactly fit into their place, and that a careful revision of the whole thing would be necessary in order to find how far, to use a common expression, they were out of joint. Nearly all the proposals which I have made relate to verbal changes or to cases where it is found that the same thing is provided for under more than one of the rules, and an effort has been made to remove the surplusage and make the rules as concise as possible.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—There is a little confusion in my own mind now with regard to this whole matter. As I understand it, the House, in Committee of the Whole, has agreed to certain amendments, and they have been reported by the Committee of the Whole House. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield, as I understand, proposes to amend the rules as they are proposed to be amended by the committee, and he proposes to strike out some of the rules which we have amended. It does not appear to me that the matter is in very good shape and it would be better if the rules could be printed with the proposed amendments indicated at the proper place. The Committee of the Whole of this House has agreed to certain amendments which they recommend the House to adopt and there is a motion before the House made by the hon. gentleman from Belleville to adopt them. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield proposes that they shall not be adopted but that further amendments shall be made. To what?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If I may be permitted to explain, I do not think that in more than one case the changes which I have suggested relate to the amendments made in Committee of the Whole. They are changes in the rules themselves in order to make what has been done fit together properly.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Others may not be in the same confusion of mind as I am, because I sat in the Chair of the Committee of the Whole, but it seems to me now that we are in an awkward position. We are called upon to amend that which we have already amended, and which there is a motion before the House to adopt in the amended form.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When we go back into Committee of the Whole the committee will have entire charge of the rules and will be able to deal with my suggestions as they see fit.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The hon. gentleman has stated to the House that during the recess he had some opportunity to go over these matters in a calmer way apparently than was done before. I might remind the House, that when the committee was appointed a year ago to deal with this matter it gave a considerable amount of attention to it; but a great deal of the work was, no doubt, left in the hands of the chairman of the committee himself, who was as capable as any man on the committee. After sitting for two or three hours, the committee was only too glad to avail itself of the opportunity of referring to the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Power) the task of amending and putting into proper shape all that had been agreed upon. There were only one or two serious differences of opinion in the committee. The hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Power) devoted a great deal of time and brought his best talent to bear on the subject and it did seem to me when we were last discussing this matter, if the House will excuse me, that he was rather looked upon as an offender, and he was thrown upon his defence in regard to a matter in which he had actually acted in the best interest of the House. Now, whether the propositions which the hon. gentleman from Marshfield is submitting are better or not I do not know, but I think there is a difficulty in approaching them now in view of the fact that we have amended some of the rules. I think it would be better to have the whole document printed again with the amendments suggested by the hon. gentleman indicated at the proper points.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have no particular objection to referring the report back to the Committee of the Whole, but it seems to me that that is not the whole case. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield does not move in a general way that the report be referred back for the purpose of reconsideration generally, but, as I gather, that the committee may adopt certain changes in the rules, as they now stand, which changes the hon. gentleman thinks will very considerably improve them. Now, while I am quite willing that the report should be referred back for reconsideration, I am not willing that it should be referred back with the understanding that it is for the purpose of inserting the amendments which the hon. gentleman proposes. The hon. gentleman told the House that he had some leisure during our recent adjournment and that he devoted it to the work of considering these rules. It strikes me that this has happened to the hon. gentleman: We know that in athletics when a man over-trains he becomes what is called 'stale'. I think the hon. gentleman has been devoting too much attention to these rules and that he has become, in the phraseology of athletics, stale. I propose, with the permission of the House, to demonstrate that from the nature of the amendments which he proposes. I do not propose to discuss all the suggested changes, but some of them only, in order to indicate to the House what their general character is. The hon. gentleman proposes the following:

2. That paragraph 7 of rule 4 be amended by striking out the word 'select' in the first line and inserting the word 'standing' in lieu thereof, and by adding the following words at the end of the said paragraph 'appointed for the session.'

3. That the 8th paragraph of the said rule be amended by striking out the word 'select' in the first line, and inserting after the word 'Committee' at the beginning of the second line, the words 'embracing less than the whole number of senators and.'

4. That rules 89, 90, 91 and 129 be amended by striking out the word 'select' wherever it appears in these rules, and inserting the words 'standing or special' in lieu thereof.

5. That rule 92 be amended by striking out the word 'select' in the second line of the second paragraph.

It strikes me that these suggestions are based upon a misconception by the hon. gentleman of the meaning of the word 'select', that is the meaning of the word as used in the books of practice. The hon. gentleman seems to be under the impression that there is no necessity for defining the word 'select' in our rule. The rule which he proposes to alter, says: 'Select committee'—a committee embracing less than the whole number of senators.

Now the report of the committee was intended to put the matter in logical shape. The rule, as we have it here, divides committees into two classes, committees of the whole and committees of a less number than the whole, and to those committees of a less number of the whole number of senators, the name 'select' is applied. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield appears to be under the impression that that is already the meaning of the word 'select'; but if he will refer to May he will find that is not the case. In England the word 'select' is used as we in this report propose to use the word 'special'. The 'select committee' is distinguished from a standing committee. It is not distinguished from a committee of the whole so much as from a standing committee, and consequently the amendment which the hon. gentleman proposes would simply introduce confusion. May, on page 378, (tenth edition) says:

A select committee is composed of certain members appointed by the House to consider or to take evidence upon any matters, and to report their opinion, for the information and assistance of the House.

That description of the select committee would cover a standing committee, or a special committee; but on page 382 at the bottom of the page you will find this language:

Sessional committees——

You see, our standing committees——

—also are appointed, such as the Committee of Public Accounts under standing order No. 77; The Committee on Standing Orders, the Committee of Selection, the General Committee, on Railway and Canal Bills, the Committee of Police and Sanitary Bills, and the Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms Committees.

Any one who reads this chapter carefully will see that May distinguishes between standing committees and select committees, and that select committees are looked on in England as corresponding with what we propose to call 'special committees.' I have given two authorities but there is another. At page 469 of May, we find:

Notwithstanding the facilities for discussion afforded by a Committee of the Whole House, the details of a Bill may often be considered more conveniently by a standing or by a select committee.

May distinguishes there between standing committees and select committees, and the report of our committee is, if we wish to have things in a logical form, the proper report. The select committee we define to be a committee less than the committee of the whole, a committee consisting of less than the whole number of senators, and a special committee is a select committee other than a standing committee. The hon. gentleman proposes also to define standing committee. Now there is no object in defining a thing which is perfectly clear already. I do not think that any hon. gentleman has ever had any doubt as to what a standing committee is. Everybody understands that a standing committee is one of the committees appointed at the beginning of the session and for the whole of the session. Consequently, these amendments with respect to the use of the words select committees are not amendments at all, but would be calculated to damage the report instead of improving it. It must be remembered that one of the objects of having these rules, and of having the practice codified is, that hon. gentlemen who do not habitually devote a great deal of attention to the subject of practice may be able to tell readily what the rule of the House is, and what the practice is on any given point. The hon. gentleman proposes to strike out subsection 2 of rule 30 to strike out the words 'unanimous consent' in the third line and insert the word 'leave' in lieu thereof. I quite admit that that will not alter the meaning of the rules, but I wish to direct the attention of the hon. gentleman to this point, that members of this House other than those who give a deal of attention to the practice, do not carry all the words of the interpretation rule in their heads at all times, and when they find in rule 30 that a thing can be done only by the unanimous consent of the House, they know without referring to any other rule what it means. It is quite true that 'leave of the House' would mean the same thing but still it might involve a little difficulty on the part of some hon. gentleman to be quite sure of that, and I must say that I look upon suggestions of this kind as being of an exceedingly microscopical character. It is a serious and important step to refer this report back to the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of making amendments, and unless the amendments are of very considerable moment, it is a step which I do not think the House should take.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he did not object to the House going into committee, for the purpose of dealing with the matter generally.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I said that I objected to going into committee for the purpose of dealing with the rules as he suggests.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When the House goes into committee it will be open to the committee to deal with the rules in any way that may then be thought proper. Some of the suggestions I am not very anxious about, and if any strong views were expressed against them I would not press the point; but I thought if we were going back into committee we ought to deal with them all. If the hon. gentleman will allow the House to go into committee, we can very quickly come to a conclusion with regard to many of them. For instance, with regard to this very matter of 'unanimous consent', there is a group of amendments in which this expression occurred, and by dealing with one of them separately, the hon. gentleman is not receiving the proper impression, the impression which I intended to convey. If we were in committee I would show what I mean by this group of amendments and my hon. friend would know better what was intended.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have gone over the proposed amendments and I think I grasp their meaning fairly well. I have given them the best attention I have been able in the short time at my disposal, and I have come to the conclusion that there is not one of the proposed amendments which is at the same time in the right direction, and of sufficient consequence to justify the proposed action; but I am not going to oppose the motion to go into committee to deal with the whole question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think if the motion of my hon. friend from Marshfield is read carefully it will not be found to bear the construction which the hon. gentleman from Halifax has put upon it. If the House goes back into committee it is only for the purpose of reconsidering what has already been done, and we can reject any of the hon. gentleman's propositions for the amendment of the rules, or for the changing or omission of words. When he moves the amendments in committee they can be fully discussed, but we do not commit ourselves, if the Senate consents to go back into committee, to a single proposition which the hon. gentleman from Marshfield has made. If that were the case, then I could understand the force of the argument of the hon. gentleman from Halifax. I should take the same position myself. I have gone through these proposed amendments—very casually, I must frankly admit. Some of them, I think, would be of advantage and others I should not be inclined to adopt unless a good explanation were forthcoming; but in voting for the motion to go back into committee for the reconsideration of what has already been reported, the Senate does not commit itself in any way. If the House is under the impression that the rules are perfect as they come from the committee they should reject the motion. If, as the hon. member from Halifax says, he has no objection whatever to going back into committee, he should be prepared to oppose a good many of the propositions made, which he has already done. He has very lucidly explained his views upon certain points. Every member of the Senate who has paid any attention at all to the rules knows that there is a difference between a select committee and a standing committee. Select committees are appointed very often for special and specific purposes, and they report. The standing committees are appointed at the beginning of the session to deal with certain subjects. I have noticed also in my hurried reading of the amendments that the hon. gentleman does not propose in many cases to strike out the word 'select.' He leaves the word 'select' in many of the rules as reported to the House so that I do not think it would do any harm or that any bad effect would result by going back into committee. Then we could discuss the different propositions made in these resolutions and the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, who has given a great deal of attention to the subject, could give his reasons to the House why he makes the various propositions. If the House approve they can adopt them; if not they can reject them.

A motion to postpone consideration of the report until Monday next was agreed to.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON asked:

The government to furnish the Senate with the following particulars regarding the ice-breaking steamer now in course of construction in Great Britain for the Department of Marine and Fisheries:—

1. Dimensions.
2. Tonnage.
3. Horse-power.
4. The date of contracts.
5. The date fixed for completion.
6. Cost. Also, if an additional ice-breaking steamer is under contract.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have received the following reply from the department:

1. Dimensions, length between perpendiculars, 172 feet; breath moulded, 32 feet; depth moulded, 18 feet; draft mean, 12 feet.

2. Tonnage, displacement in tons, 1,030 tons.

3. Horse-power, 2,250.

4. The date of the contracts, March 13, 1906.

5. The date fixed for completion, September, 1906.

6. (a) Cost, £44,260.

(b) Also, if an additional icebreaking steamer is under contract? No.

The Senate adjourned until three p.m. on Monday next.

OTTAWA, Monday, April 23, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

DIVORCE COMMITTEE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—With the leave of the House, I would ask that the Divorce Committee be allowed to sit this afternoon while the House is in session. We have a great deal of work on hand and a number of witnesses in attendance, as well as counsel for the parties interested, and the committee is perfectly willing to carry on its proceedings if allowed to sit while the House is in session.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That would require the unanimous consent of the Senate, would it not? We have, I think, very much more important work to do in the House than that which is before the Divorce Committee. We are to determine finally the form of the rules which will govern this House for perhaps twenty years to come, and that is surely of more consequence than to finish up divorce proceedings.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—We feel that the rules will be safe in the hands of the hon. gentlemen, and we would like to have the leave of the House to sit. I hope the hon. gentleman will not object.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If there is any objection, that settles it.

The SPEAKER—Does the hon. gentleman from Marshfield object?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do.

The motion was dropped.

ALEXANDRIA POST OFFICE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN asked:

Has the government caused an inquiry to be made as to the origin of the fire that destroyed the post office at Alexandria, and if not, do they intend doing so ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, the government have instituted an inquiry.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Could the hon. gentleman state what has been the result ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think we have a statement yet, but I will find out from the department.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The reason why I put the notice on the paper was that according to prevailing opinion in our town, the fire was caused by defective electric wiring. It is about time that this should be widely known, because I am satisfied that a great many fires originate through defective wiring. I think it would do a great deal of good throughout the country if the matter were made public.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will have an inquiry made at the department.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

MOTION TO AMEND RULE 148.

The Order of the Day being called,

That the following be added to divorce rule 148 as paragraph 2—

2. A copy of every petition for a Bill of divorce, or relating to any matter arising out of and of every document and paper accompanying such petition or produced in evidence before the committee, shall be furnished to the committee by the person on whose behalf the petition, document or paper is presented or produced.—Hon. Mr. Lougheed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I gave notice of the first motion on the paper and desire to move accordingly. With a view of making this a standing order, it is necessary that the House should first pass the motion making it an order of the House, the object being that there should be a copy of all documents filed with the committee, and thus with the Senate in all divorce applications. I think the desirability of this is obvious, and it does not entail any additional cost in the proceedings. I therefore move that the subclause of which I have given notice be made an order of the House. I would however, propose a slight amendment, namely on the second line, instead of the words 'such petition,' these words be inserted, 'an application for divorce' in lieu thereof.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE.

AGAIN IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of the third report of the Special Committee appointed during last session to consider and revise, and, if deemed necessary, to add to their rules, orders and forms of the proceedings of the Senate.

(In Committee.)

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My first motion is that paragraph 4 and 5 of rule 4 be struck out. I am not particular about this amendment, but the point I take is this : as far as I have been able to investigate, I do not find that these words 'incidental questions' and 'subsidiary questions' occur in the rules. If they do not occur, there is no need of our putting an interpretation upon them. There is no need of loading the rules unnecessarily.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman could not have made as careful a study of the following rules as he ought. If he will turn to rule 21, which is a very important rule, he will find that it reads as follows :

When a senator wishes to give notice of an inquiry or motion, he reduces the notice to writing, signs it, reads it from his place during a sitting of the Senate, and hands it in at the clerk's table.

This rule does not apply to motions with respect to Bills, nor to motions dealing with reports of committees, nor to formal, routine, subsidiary or incidental motions, notice of which, when necessary, may be given by word of mouth, or by any means which places such motions among the orders or on the notice paper for any day.

Now it is clearly desirable, as this is one of the rules which will be used very frequently, that the language used shall be defined, and that is why the special committee to which the rules were referred undertook here in this rule 4, to define 'subsidiary' and 'incidental' motions. The definition is necessary, and, even if it were not necessary, it cannot do any harm.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It occurs only once.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But it is in a very important place. The hon. gentleman said it did not occur at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think it is necessary to define a word which occurs only once.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are certain drawbacks to any hon. gentleman, no matter how astute he may be, constituting himself a sort of court of appeal to which the decisions of the committee are to be referred.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend, in the few observations he made the other day tried to be sarcastic and to sneer. It takes a much more clever gentleman than himself to sneer successfully, and I would advise him hereafter to practice something which will do him a little more credit. The hon. gentleman, in connection with these rules, reminds me of a male bird that is very well known in the barn yard about this time of the year. A process of incubation is going on, and this bird attacks every person or animal that comes near the place, supposing them to have sinister designs on that process of incubation. That is what my hon. friend is doing with regard to the rules, which, I assure him, no one has any sinister designs upon. We want to be reasonable about them, and, if they can be in any way bettered, to improve them, and though he is a wise man, he does not carry all the wisdom of this House, and some of us might blunder upon something which would be an improvement. If there is any reason in an amendment, proposed at this late stage, let us adopt it, and endeavour to make the rules, which we are likely to work under for a great many years, as perfect as we can. I am not going to press this point, but I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that there is no necessity for an interpretation clause which is to define only one rule. It would be much better to revise the rule itself and make its language clear. However it is like a chip in porridge; it cannot do much harm, and it certainly will do no good.

Hon. Mr. POWER—These rules are not my rules. I am not specially responsible for them, and in undertaking to amend the rules the hon. gentleman is undertaking to revise the work of the committee. These rules are the work of the committee. The committee has reported these rules. I do not claim any credit about it. If the hon. gentleman's barn-yard comparison were accurate, one might suppose that he had been the incubator himself.

The motion was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved:

That paragraph 7 of said rule be amended by striking out the word 'select' in the first line and inserting the word 'standing' in lieu thereof, and by adding the following words at the end of the said paragraph: 'appointed for the session.'

This deals with the names to be given to our committees. We have three committees —Committee of the Whole, Standing Committees and Special Committees. In our rules heretofore and in our practice we have used these three expressions as covering all the committees. In our old rules the use of the word 'select' occurred only once. In these four rules, 89, 90, 91 and 92, the word 'select' appears several times. These rules have been borrowed from the rules of the Australian commonwealth where the word 'select' is applied in precisely the same way that we use the word 'special' in our practice. I might say that this question did not originate with myself. The Clerk of the House called my attention to it, and it seems to me that it would be very much better to stick to our old designation of our committees. If amended in that way the first paragraph will read 'Standing Committee,' a committee embracing less than the whole number of senators and appointed for the session.' That is a definition which every one would understand, and if there is any necessity for a definition at all, I would amend the 8th paragraph to read 'Special Committee, a committee embracing less than the whole number of Senators, and other than a Standing Committee.' By making that amendment, we would just have the two committees, Special and Standing, and thus we would harmonize the rules from beginning to end.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Unnecessary definitions are very undersirable things. I doubt if there is a member of the Senate who does not understand thoroughly what a standing committee is, and, consequently, there is no necessity for defining it; but there are several hon. members, I have no doubt, who are not quite clear as to what a select committee is, and that is why the committee who had this matter in charge undertook to define a select committee. In England the select committee means substantially the same thing as the hon. gentleman from Marshfield has spoken of as a special committee. The plan adopted by the special committee here was a logical one. Committees are divided into two classes; those which embrace the whole number of senators, that is the committee of the whole, and the Committee on Privileges, which is a Committee of the Whole, and committees consisting of less than the whole number of senators.

I think the reasonable and logical plan is to call the second kind of committee, which embraces fewer than the whole number of senators, a select committee. It is a committee selected out of the whole body. When we come to deal with select committees, that is committees embracing less than the whole number of senators, they are divided naturally into two classes. First the standing committees, which are appointed at the beginning of every session. These are provided for in the rules; we have a list of the standing committees, and the statement of the number of members of which each standing committee is composed. Every one knows what they are, and there is no necessity for defining the term. Then in addition to these standing committees, which are appointed every session as a matter of course, there are special committees appointed for special purposes, which may be called into existence at any time during the session, and these the committee on the revision of the rules decided to call special committees. I think the phraseology must appeal to every one's common sense. I pointed out the other day, and I think I made it clear to the House, that in England this term 'select committee' is really almost equivalent to our special committee, and it is not desirable that there should be any confusion. I may say that until I came to investigate the matter in connection with these rules I was very doubtful as to what a select committee was, and the object of having these definitions is to remove such doubts from the minds of hon. members of the House. The ordinary member—and I speak of myself in that connection—finds it much more convenient to have definitions set out in the rules than to search books of parliamentary practice to find out what the meaning of the word is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What real difference is there between the two kinds of committee? What are the duties which are specially assigned to one and not to the other? Under the interpretation clause, it is declared that a select committee is a committee embracing less than the whole number of senators. I suppose every member of the House, no matter how little study he may have given to the subject, would understand that. Then you define a special committee and declare that a special committee is a select committee other than a standing committee. It seems to me that the words 'special committee' would cover all that is necessary. If a special committee is declared to be a select committee, what necessity is there for saying what a select committee is, unless it be simply to say that it is one other than a standing committee, for the fact of being called a special committee would imply at once that it is different from a standing committee. The simplest way would be to have one kind of committee either special or select particularly as the special committee is declared to be a select committee, and we know that a select committee is any committee other than a standing committee and that special committees are appointed for special purposes. I really do not see the object of retaining both terms.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Bourinot, pp. 528 and 529 defines the committees of the Senate. He says:

> Standing and special committees now form a most important part of the legislative machinery. They possess the obvious advantage which a small number of persons, &c.

And then he speaks at length of these committees. After describing standing committees he goes on at pp. 532 to speak of a select committee as follows:

> Select or special committees. In addition to the standing committees there are certain select or special committees appointed by the two Houses in the course of the session.

And then he goes on and describes them, either standing or special. The hon. gentleman is trying to find a distinction between these two; the simple fact is that in the English house of parliament they use the select. In the Australian legislature they have adopted that phraseology, while we have always used the word 'special,' meaning precisely the same thing. We have just the two committees, standing and special, and I think we ought to prevent confusion, to stick to that classification. The word

'select' is not as good as 'special' because it would not be distinguishing it from a standing committtee, which is also a select committtee. I think I understood the hon. gentleman from Halifax to say a standing committee is not a select committee. If he will turn to May he will find it there stated that the nomination of standing committees is entrusted to a committee of selection.

The SPEAKER—I think the hon. gentleman from Marshfield is in error. What the hon. gentleman from Halifax stated was that there were two kinds of select committees, the standing committees and the special committtees.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The word 'select' is not used frequently, but, because it appears once or twice, we require to make an interpretation clause drawing a distinction between select and special. It is the difference between tweedle-dee and tweedle-dum. Either word will do but we should adopt it all round, and not employ both expressions. I think it would be very much better to adopt the clerk's suggestion and adhere to the wording of the old rule, under which there has been no confusion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Do I understand that this amendment is to define the word 'standing?' If so, that is quite unnecessary.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It would be entirely unnecessary if my hon. friend had not, in drafting the new rules, adopted the word 'select committee,' defining it as one other than a standing committee. When he puts that in, it then became necessary to obtain a starting point. That is where the confusion arises.

The motion was declared lost.

Contents 13; non-contents, 15.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The next amendment I propose is that the last paragraph of rule 25 be amended by striking out the words 'unanimous consent' in the second line and inserting the word 'leave' in lieu thereof. We have been using the words 'unanimous consent' in this House as meaning precisely what is meant by the interpretation clause when it describes that the leave of the House shall mean the consent of the House without a dissenting voice. We have a variety of phrases, 'consent of a majority' in one case, 'consent of the House' in another place, and 'unanimous consent' in another place. It seems to me that the right thing to do is to allow 'leave of the House' to stand as an interpretation, although it only occurs once; still it seemed to me to be a very neat way of describing what has been our practice. The interpretation clause which the hon. gentleman has been at so much pains to draft, would, I think, be improved by harmonizing these other expressions throughout the rules.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Marshfield is quite right in saying that the amendment he proposes does not make any change in the meaning, and there is no special objection to it except this: The paragraph which is proposed to be amended reads as follows:

> Nor where notice is dispensed with by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

The hon. gentleman proposes to make that read 'with the leave of the Senate.' These two expressions mean the same thing. If some outside party interested in a bill looks at this rule and finds 'leave of the Senate,' he is liable—and any hon. gentleman coming in here for the first time is liable—to think that leave means what it would naturally mean— leave of the majority of the House; but when he finds the words 'unanimous consent' then he knows that one member can stop the action. Looking at it as a matter of business and convenience, the words 'unanimous consent' are really preferable. The words have been used in our Senate since the Senate was a Senate.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Of what use is the interpretation clause then? My hon. friend seems to think there is some great virtue in an interpretation clause with a long string of interpretations which interpret nothing. We are not making a dictionary. We are merely defining the meaning of words as employed in our own rules. The words 'consent of the Senate' have been interpreted by many decisions of our Speakers as meaning the majority of senators, and I propose to put in a definition of that in order to harmonize all the different expressions. The words 'consent of the Senate' are used a good many places in the rules, and, in my opinion, they ought to be made clear, because in some places they will be regarded as meaning a majority of the House. In other places it may be taken to mean a majority of the Senate present. Unless under very special circumstances, it should, I think, mean a majority of the senators present, and I propose to make a new definition that will explain these words, but I do not wish to press the matter. I make the motion nevertheless.

The motion was declared lost.

Hon. Mr FERGUSON moved that :

Rule 20 be amended by inserting the words 'next after third readings' after the word 'day' in the fourth line of the second paragraph.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I would suggest that in lieu of rules 20 and 73 the following be adopted :

20. Unless the Senate directs otherwise, orders of the day take precedence in order of priority as follows :
1. Orders of the day for the third reading of Bills.
2. The order of the day which at the time of the adjournment was under consideration.
3. Orders of the day which at the time of the adjournment had not been reached.

I think that would be neater and would cover both rules.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I accept that. I think it is very much preferable, and I withdraw my own motion in favour of it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think there is any serious objection to the amendment which the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry has proposed, but it does not cover the whole ground ; because there are the orders of the day proper. These are not provided for.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I would add the words :

4. Remaining orders of the day.

The SPEAKER—Does that do away with rule 73 ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My amendment is to strike out the words 'notwithstanding anything in rule 20' from rule 73.

The CHAIRMAN—It is understood also that it strikes out the two paragraphs of rule 20.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I move that rule 23 be amended by inserting the following words at the end of the 5th paragraph. 'Other than committees appointed under rules 71 and 100'. He said : This change makes that overrider unnecessary.

Hon Mr. BEIQUE—Do you propose to strike out the whole rule ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct attention to this fact that we should not lose sight of. We must consider the convenience of the gentlemen who use these rules.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved that the following paragraph be added to rule 88.

This rule shall not apply to any committee appointed under rules 71 and 100.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think it would be supposed to apply to a special committee of that kind.

The SPEAKER—There is a safeguard that it must be voluntary and asked for by two senators.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It would be very inconvenient if two senators should rise and ask for the appointment of a committee in that way to prepare a message or conference. The question might be raised that the motion could not be made without notice.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have no strong feeling about this matter, but the Senate as a general thing, is a fairly reasonable body and this rule 88 says simply that senators serving on a special committee may be nominated by the mover. If there is strong feeling about the question in the Senate; if three senators so demand, they shall be selected in the manner provided for in this rule. I am not clear that it is not desirable to retain that, even in drawing a committee to meet the House of Commons. If three senators wish to make the selection that way there is no special reason why we should not have the power to do so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why should not the committee which prepares the message be the same committee to hold the conference ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—There will be no conferences in future, as a matter of fact.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The real reason for adopting a rule of this kind is to protect the minority. A very important question might arise partaking of a party character, and the majority might exclude from that committee any member of the opposition ; but under this rule, which provides for a ballot, you insure representation of the minority in proportion to their strength. I would suggest to leave it as it is ; it protects the minority.

The motion was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would like to have the judgment of the House on this amendment :

21. That the following be added as an additional paragraph to rule 25 : For the reconsideration, while in the Committee of the Whole, of any clause of a Bill already agreed to.

Our practice has always been that when we are in Committee of the Whole we can pass to and fro among the various clauses, pass over a clause and return to it, although it may have been agreed to. But we are now establishing very rigid rules about notice of motion, and I am not very clear that unless we make this provision we shall have the power to reconsider when we are in Committee of the Whole. Rule 43 of our old rules gave us that power in dealing with Bills, but not without notice. In practice, as hon. gentlemen know, we have always had the liberty of reconsidering a clause that we have already passed, but if there is any danger of a strict interpretation taking away that privilege in Committee of the Whole, I think we should insert something which would prevent its being taken away.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think we have a rule now which makes the provision the hon. gentleman speaks of.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That would be our old rule 43.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I would direct attention to rule 70 of the present draft as to reconsideration of clauses.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is in regard to Bills. It does not say that a senator may move for the reconsideration of a clause already passed without notice. It is true he may do it at any time, but the rule does not provide that it may be done without notice.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved that rule 68 be struck out. He said: I am open to conviction with regard to this amendment, but if it is considered desirable to retain rule 68 it would require to be slightly changed. My view is that rules 23, 24 and 25 should cover all that will be in our procedure with regard to the question of notice. Under rule 23, two days' notice is required ; under rule 24 one day's notice is required, and under rule 25 there is no notice necessary. Rule 68 deals with precisely the same questions as is well dealt with, in rules 23 and 24, and I think rule 68 is calculated, unless it is amended, to weaken the effect of one of these rules. Under rule 23, where there is a motion for a second reading, there must be two days' notice. Under this rule no Bill shall be read twice the same day. That would, by implication, carry the impression that you could read a Bill the second time the following day. The rule is explicit on that point, while rule 68 is not; that rule, being unnecessary, I think it might be stricken out altogether. At all events, it should not be allowed to remain as it is, because it would create an uncertainty as to whether two days' notice was required in regard to the second reading of a Bill. That is provided for under rule 23. This would leave it open to argument. All that is here is provided for between rules 23 and 24.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps I am usurping the place of the hon. gentleman from Belleville to a certain extent in undertaking to defend the report of the committee ; but, as I remarked with regard to another rule, we are at that part of the rules which deals with Bills under the subheading 'Public Bills'. This is our existing rule, and it has been in operation for a great many years. There is hardly any rule which is referred to more frequently. I do not see what harm can be done by leaving it there ; I think it does good service. Anyone looking over the rules and reading No. 68 finds information which is of value to him. If you strike it out, he is liable not to look at any of those long rules about notice. It will not occur to him to do so and I think it is better left as it is.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It surely would not be proper to leave it without making the meaning clear. It would raise a doubt as to whether the second reading of a Bill could not be proceeded with on one day's notice. If the rule remains, I think something should be done to remove the haziness which exists. There is a great deal of force in the statement that it does no harm to have a thing stated twice, but we must be careful that the two statements do not conflict or leave room for argument. We fix, by rule 23, two days' notice as necessary for a second reading, this does not go that far at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This does not affect rule 23.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Again, when you are suspending the rules, you will have to state both this and rule 23. You cannot be in order by merely suspending this rule as formerly ; we must also suspend rule 23.

The SPEAKER—The complaint of the hon. gentleman is that the repetition is not in the same terms.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—How would it be supposing I were to give notice that I would move the second reading and the third reading of a Bill, giving the two days notice in the one case and one days notice in the other ? I really give two days notice in each case. Without rule 68, how would the Speaker decide whether I was in order or not ? The intention is, undoubtedly, that Bills shall not be advanced more than one stage without an intervening sitting or two sittings, but I am supposing a case—I give notice to-day that on Thursday next I will move the second and third reading of a Bill. I could give that notice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would not the latter portion of 68 prevent that ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If the hon. gentleman reads the whole of this rule, he will see that it will certainly prevent that ; but I think we need not entertain his supposition seriously.

The amendment was declared lost.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved 'that rule 136 be struck out.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—I hope the hon. gentleman does not intend to press this. Rule 136 deals with private Bills after they come from a sub-committee. It is our present rule 70—a very important rule, and no fault has ever been found with its operation.

The amendment was declared lost.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved 'that rule 137 be struck out.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is our present 71. Whatever rule has been made as to notices will apply to Bills under rules 135, 136 and 137, but it is important in dealing with the Bills after they come from the committee to have the procedure set out in a clear and succinct way so that professional men may be able to learn what it is without difficulty.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have no desire to press the point.

The amendment was lost.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Before we pass on, I would like to call attention to rule 135, which says :

> Unless the Senate otherwise orders, a private Bill reported from a standing or special committee is not committed to a Committee of the Whole.

I would suggest that we have plenty of opportunity to consider private Bills in the Committee of the Whole, and that if you will amend rule 135 by striking out the little word 'not' it will come within the scope of the whole House to consider these Bills, and we shall have a better opportunity of discussing the various questions coming before the Private Bills Committee. Those who are not on these committees will then have an opportunity of hearing the discussion as it takes place in the House. We should consider this point, and give everyone an opportunity of becoming thoroughly acquainted with the question under consideration. I therefore would move to strike out the word 'not' in rule 135.

The CHAIRMAN—The special work committed to this committee was to consider the propositions of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield. We had better go through these and bring anything else up afterwards.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think we have the right to consider any amendment which may be proposed. It was so stated this afternoon, and, that being the case, we should have an opportunity of discussing rule 135.

In the House of Commons, every private Bill goes through the Committee of the Whole House in the same way as public Bills. Are our committees so good, so pure and upright, so careful and considerate—are they any better than the Committee of the House of Commons ? I think not. If the matter cannot be discussed now under the Chairman's ruling I shall leave the matter until we come to the question of concurrence and then will move my amendment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that any senator has a right to discuss the report of the committee upon any private Bill so that there is no special need to refer a Bill that has already gone through a Private Bill Committee to the Committee of the Whole to discuss the work which the committee may have done on that Bill.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—That may be very true, but we do not have the opportunity of going over a private Bill clause by clause. We cannot take exception to the provisions of private Bills on the third reading. It is only on the second reading that we have the opportunity of fully discussing the nature of the Bill. It goes then to the standing committee, and, when it comes back, it is moved for third reading. Some of the amendments which may be important are explained briefly by the chairman of the committee, but we have very little opportunity of understanding the nature of the amendments which have been made. We find very frequently that these amendments convey a very different impression when compared with the original intent of the measure.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I move that rule 47 be struck out. I cannot understand how this rule escaped my scrutiny when it was before the committee. I do not remember any discussion taking place upon it, but upon later examination I find it is altogether out of accord with the practice of the Canadian parliament. Hon. gentlemen will notice that in the very outset of the new rules we have a very proper provision in rule 2, as follows :

Except as far as is expressly provided, these rules shall in no way restrict the mode in which the Senate may exercise and uphold its powers, privileges and immunities.

All powers, privileges and immunities are conferred on us by the 18th section of the British North America Act and the new rule too provides that notwithstanding anything in these rules, unless some provision is expressly made to the contrary, we will have all the means given to us under the British North America Act of upholding our privileges, powers and immunities. Rule 47 is calculated to infringe most seriously on the privileges of the Senate as they have been enjoyed in the past. The most important respect in which the change made restricts the question of privilege is in the words ' has arisen since the last sitting of the House.' I have turned up May on this question, and have taken the trouble of looking over all the discussions to which he refers in English Hansard, and although I found many cases in which a question of privilege was refused to a member rising and stating it, yet I have found no case at all wherein the principle is laid down that what had happened was something which had not arisen since the last sitting of the House. This would tie it down so much as to render it almost impossible to raise a question of privilege. It is quite true that, when an hon. gentleman rises to a question of privilege, it is not sufficient that he shall say it is to make it a question of privilege ; he must state what the subject is, and the Chair, and, ultimately perhaps, the House must decide whether it is so or not. I have noticed, when such cases have arisen in the British House, that the Speaker has ruled one way or the other. In one case he ruled that a question which was in its nature a question of privilege could not be treated as such, because it had already been disposed of in the House. Various other reasons have been given, but in no case was it held that it was not a question of privilege because it had not arisen since the last sitting of the House. Urgency is the essence of a question of privilege, and that urgency may be in the subject itself or as a matter of time. Recently origin is a matter of importance. The subject of the question is the all important one, and its being a recent one is an important element in considering that, but we propose in this rule to tie it down absolutely to something which has arisen since the last sitting of the House.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Does my hon. friend simply wish to omit these words 'Arisen since the last sitting of the House.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend who has had great experience in parliament will understand that the removal of these words would be an improvement. After all, the question of privilege should be, and is precisely the same in both Houses. I think there is another provision later on that has a tendency to materially weaken the right with regard to privilege that parliament has previously possessed, and it is this; after the words 'has arisen since the last sitting of the House' that a motion to take action thereon 'may be moved without notice and shall, until decided, unless the debate be adjourned, suspend the consideration of other motions as well as orders of the day.' Now, the practice of parliament is that once a question is admitted to be one of privilege it maintains its priority on that day and all subsequent days until it is disposed of. I have only to refer to one or two cases familiar in the minds of hon. gentlemen in the parliament of Canada; one where my hon. friend from Belleville moved for the expulsion of Louis Riel from the House of Commons. Riel had been elected a considerable time; the return had been received in Ottawa some time before the meeting of parliament, and yet it was not until twenty days after the meeting of parliament, Riel having in the meantime been summoned to appear before a committee to investigate the troubles in the, Red River country, and he refused to attend.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was a committee of the whole House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Riel was a fugitive from justice and did not appear, and though my hon. friend's motion was made some two months after Riel's election and nearly twenty days after Riel had come to the House and taken the oath, nine days after he had failed to answer the summons to appear before the Committee of the Whole House appointed to investigate the Red River trouble, my hon. friend rose to a question of privilege. It is true he put a notice on the order paper, but he did not wait for the maturity of it. He rose in his place and made the motion, and it was admitted as a question of privilege and the debate went on and was given priority every day until disposed of. In Prince Edward Island a double return was made for King's county in 1882. My hon. friend from Montague was at that time one of the two gentlemen included in that double return. After parliament had been in session a considerable time—about two weeks— Mr. M. C. Cameron rose in his place, without notice, to a question of privilege. It was not a matter which has arisen since the last sitting of the House, for the election was on the 20th of June and the double return was made in the usual time, and the session had been opened some two weeks before that, yet Mr. Cameron, of Huron, rose and made a motion without previous notice. It was admitted as a matter of privilege and given priority until disposed of. These two cases are clear enough as to what has been the practice of our parliament on the subject. My objection to the 47th rule is two-fold: first, it says the question of privilege is limited to something which has occurred since the last sitting of the House, and, second, throwing doubt upon the priority of a question of privilege after the House adjourns that day. Both objections are fatal to the clause as it stands. Since I have been in the Senate I do not know that I remember one first class question of privilege being admitted. Many senators have risen to call attention to a question of privilege, but it did not turn out to be one. I do not remember one first-class question of privilege that has arisen here. It shows that there is no necessity for this rule, but I do say that when emergencies arise in which the privileges of this House or any of its members are affected we ought not to bind ourselves by a hard and fast rule which would prevent the assertion of our privileges. The British practice on the subject is so clear that I think we might well strike out rule 47 and fall back on British practice where we would have more elasticity and under which we would not be hampered when any genuine question of privilege arises. This rule has come from the Australian Commonwealth, but we have to remember this when dealing with the Australian rules, that they propose actually to cut loose from British practice and make for themselves some four hundred odd rules which will govern everything. I think the Australians will see that they have made a great mistake. We have in the British practice the result of centuries of hard experience, and we may rely upon this, that if we only understand these rules they are logically correct in almost every single case. We should rely upon British practice in a matter which may affect the honour of this House or of some of its members. In the British North America Act we have all the powers and privileges of the British parliament conferred on us, and we should take care not to throw away these thoughtlessly, as we do under rule 47, and cut ourselves clear from the protection which parliament has under British practice. I move that rule 47 be struck out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Marshfield has said that he has never known a case of privilege to arise in this House, though one might imagine from the warmth he shows that such cases very frequently arise. The better way is to look at the thing in a calm and businesslike frame of mind. In the first place the hon. gentleman has on this, as on several other occasions, uttered denunciations of the Australian rules, and has spoken of them as being in no sense guides for us; and he has told us that our circumstances are not the same as those in Australia. As a matter of fact these Australian rules are based on the British practice. The attempt in Australia has been to adopt the English rules with certain modifications which were found necessary in applying them to the cases of the colonies. We know that in England, they are very conservative, and will suffer a great deal of inconvenience and even serious injury rather than alter an old rule; but they have altered their rules of late a good deal. On the question of privilege I find the English rule is this: Rule 46 provides that 'a motion on the question of privilege suddenly arising is entitled to immediate precedence over all other business' and then this manual goes on, 'a motion on a question of privilege may be made before the commencement of public business, although the question does not suddenly arise, but any such motion should be made on the earliest opportunity.' Then the rule giving precedence—and this is the point to which I desire to call the attention of the committee—to privilege motions is strictly construed. It has been the practice of the House 'to restrain privilege under great limitations and conditions.' I have known a great many cases in which questions of privilege were brought up in this House, or at least in which hon. gentlemen brought up questions which they said were questions of privilege, but which were not in any sense privileged questions, and I think that is an abuse. An hon. gentleman will get up and read something which has appeared in a British Columbia or a Nova Scotia newspaper, expressing, perhaps, the opinion of someone in the province about some action of the Senate or about some member of the House, and a long discussion may arise on the subject. Now look at this rule which has been adopted by the Senate of Australia under, I fancy, the recommendation of Mr. Blackmore, the clerk of the Senate, who is one of the highest authorities now living on parliamentary law and practice—'Whenever a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate or any committee, or member thereof has arisen since the last sitting of the Senate'—that is not unreasonable. If the question arose before the last meeting of the Senate then the member who wishes to bring the matter up has an opportunity to give notice and every member of the Senate will be in a reasonably fair position to discuss the question. An hon. gentleman is aware of some question which he thinks he can bring up as a question of privilege; he says nothing about it, gives no notice of his intention to bring it up, and then he springs it on the House without notice. Is that fair to the other members of the Senate? If an hon. member proposes to bring up a question of privilege, it strikes me that, if he has the opportunity to do so, it is his duty to give notice to the House so that his brother members will be in a position to discuss it as well as he. It is unfair to the other members of the House, who do not know of his intention to bring this question up, to spring it on the House. The gentleman who brings up a question of privilege deserves consideration, but the other members of the House deserve consideration also; and no very serious danger is going to arise to the constitution if this rule is adopted. It has gone through the special committee, and the committee of the House and it is rather late to undertake to strike it out now. Any hon. gentleman has time to give notice if the question has arisen before the last sitting of the House, and if it has arisen since the last sitting, then he can bring it up without notice. That is all that need be asked. You see it gives a member an opportunity to obstruct all other business of the House no matter how important. The discussions of important questions of public policy may be pushed over for days by some comparatively frivolous question of privilege.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It might occur that a gentleman whose character had been attacked might be away and unable to bring it up since the last sitting of the House. One point we ought to consider is this; has any difficulty or ill effect ever arisen from the practice that has prevailed both in England and Canada in the past? If no wrong has arisen from the principle that has been laid down with reference to questions of privilege in the past, what necessity is there to deviate from the long established rules and practice of parliament both in England and in Canada? The point has been raised by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield in reference to the expulsion of Riel from the House of Commons. The events which led to his expulsion occurred between the two sessions of parliament, and after an investigation had taken place in the House of Commons with the Speaker in the Chair, lasting over a number of days, then the motion for expulsion was made without giving any notice. By referring to the record you will find that when I rose to make that motion, I raised a question of privilege, and stated what had been done in the House of Commons, and what had been proved before a committee of the House, and referred to precedents which had taken place in the imperial parliament, and then made the motion. Referring to the rules of Australia, all those who have given any attention to legislation in that country, and more particularly in the colonies of Victoria and New South Wales, know that the democratic element, the socialistic element, prevails to a very great extent in that portion of the empire—to a greater extent than in any of the other colonies or any other part of the British empire. And, I have no doubt, that in the drafting of the rules, many of which we have copied, that fact should not be lost sight of. Some of the rules are not only practical but good; others are not of the same character, and if senators will consider this question for a moment they will come to the conclusion there is no necessity whatever for changing the system which has prevailed here in the past. The practice of the British parliament is sufficient. We are governed by the rules of the House of Lords on all points for which no provision is made here, and this is a question which everyone who has studied the British constitution at all understands perfectly.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand it, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce suggested that these words be stricken out of the rule 'since the last sitting of the Senate.' I have no objection to strike out these words, and I therefore move in amendment, that they be struck out.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That amendment can hardly be received. My motion is to strike out the whole, and the hon. gentleman's amendment is to strike out a part. Would it not be better to take the sense of the House on my motion, and if that should fail, the hon. gentleman can move his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN—I consider the amendment to the amendment is in order.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would suggest that the words 'unless the debate be adjourned to suspend the consideration of other motions as well as the orders of the day' be struck out, and that the following be substituted therefor: 'Take precedence over all other business.' That will leave our rule in the same position as at present, and we will be adhering to the practice which prevails to-day.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me that this amendment does not alter the meaning of the rule. The rule is that this motion may be made without notice, and the discussion shall continue until the matter is decided, unless the debate be adjourned. Will the hon. gentleman undertake to say that the Senate has not a right to adjourn the debate on a question of privilege for the purpose of taking up other urgent business ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is just what I propose to do if you say, 'The adjournment of the Senate.' It might be another thing, because we could take it up immediately on the re-assembling of the Senate, but any majority of the House desiring to frustrate the action of a senator who makes a motion, could do so by adjourning the debate, and that might put it off for the whole session. The object might be met by striking out the words, 'Unless the debate be adjourned.'- I move that these words be struck out.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Supposing the question before the House is one which requires time to get some information and an opinion cannot be given until you have that information, shall the Senate be precluded from going on with other questions ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Under the British practice and our practice, as was shown in the case of the King's county election to which I have referred, the debate may be adjourned without any day being fixed for its resumption. Mr. Blake suggested that that was the better course, because it would not necessarily go on the order paper, but would remain as a matter of privilege, and Speaker Kirkpatrick, who was then in the Chair, ruled that that secured the question of privilege more safely, because it did not require to go on the order paper at all, but would come up at any time when the hon. gentleman in charge required it. The amendment of the hon. member from Belleville removes all the objection I have to the clause, although I think we would be just as well without the clause.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It just means that all the business of the House is blocked in every way. As the hon. member from Montarville said, if information is needed for the purpose of the debate on the question of privilege, you could not adjourn the debate under the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman from Belleville. At any rate, you could not go on with other business ; but the question of privilege would always come up as a question of privilege and have precedence in that sense. If the debate is adjourned to-day it can be brought up to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Under our practice you do not kill the question of privilege unless you do it by a rule of this kind.

The committee divided on the amendment to the amendment, which was rejected, contents 9, non-contents 11.

The committee divided on the motion to strike out clause 47 which was rejected, contents 9, non-contents 12.

The clause as amended was adopted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved that rule 72 be amended by striking out the words 'At any subsequent stage of the proceedings' from the second and third lines.

He said :—Rule 71 provides for disposing of differences between the two Houses respecting Bills by message instead of by conference. Rule 72 declares that a conference shall not be necessary at any subsequent stage of the proceedings as to any such Bill. A message dealing with the amendments by the House of Commons must be the latest and last stage of a Bill, and to make a provision solemnly that there shall be no conference held after you have dealt with it in its last stage, appears to me superfluous. The conference, if it comes in at all, would have to come earlier than the stage dealt with by way of message.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think there is a serious objection to making the change proposed. Rule 71 does not cover the whole ground with respect to Bills as to which the Senate and Commons differ. Under the old practice we had the system of sending the Bill to the Commons and sending our reasons for not agreeing to their amendment. It was only in case the Commons adhered to their amendments that a conference took place, and that is what is provided for by rule 72. After getting through with 71 then you had a conference, so that the conference was necessary at subsequent stages of the proceedings as to the Bill, not at the subsequent stages of the Bill itself, because the Bill is supposed to be at its third reading in this House, or after having been read a third time, to have come up from the other House ; but it is a subsequent stage of the proceedings. Under the old practice when you got through with rule 71, you would have a conference. The House of Commons have adopted a rule similar to this at our instance, and I think that the words not only do no harm, but are actually necessary.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I thought the idea was to do away with the necessity of a conference; that an exchange of messages should be substituted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Then these words if they are retained in clause 72 would imply that it would not be done away with except at certain stages of the proceedings.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are two points about it. We are not precluded from having a conference now. The conferences, as I have already pointed out, would only begin after you had gone through the proceedings mentioned in rule 71. Then this rule goes on to say that the conference shall not be necessary at any subsequent stage of the proceedings. We can have a conference if we desire, but it is not to be necessary under the rule in force up to last year. Conference was necessary for the subsequent stages of the proceedings. I fail to see any reason why we should strike out these words.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Does the hon. gentleman from Halifax understand that the conference will be necessary at any stage of the Bill?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, it was not necessary before at any preceding stage, but it was necesary at the subsequent stages. You bring the procedure up to a certain point. Under the old rule a conference became necessary for the subsequent stages. Under this rule a conference will not be necessary; it may be held, but it is not necessary, because the communications may be conducted by means of messages. I fail to see that the words are in any way objectionable.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I don't see how you could get a conference in after the final stage of the Bill had been disposed of by messages. How, after that you are to bring the Bill into any shape where you could resort to a conference I do not understand. The suggestion of the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry is a good one. My hon. friend has told us, and I quite agree with him, that it is much more convenient to deal with this class of difficulties by messages than by the old fashioned conference.

The SPEAKER—If the word 'subsequent' was withdrawn, would that meet the hon. gentleman's views?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have no objection to striking out the word 'subsequent'.

The word 'subsequent' was struck out of the rule.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS from the committee reported progress and asked leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (C) An Act further to amend the General Inspection Act.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

THE DIVORCE COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved

That in view of the pressure of business before the Divorce Committee this session, and in order to expedite the despatch of that business, the Divorce Committee shall for the remainder of the session, have leave to sit during any sitting of the Senate.

He said : Those members who were in the House yesterday may recollect that I asked leave to move here without notice that the Divorce Committee be allowed to sit while the House was in session. I pointed out then that there was a great deal of business before the committee this year, and we have a number of witnesses in attendance from New York and elsewhere, at a great deal of expense, who were detained by reason of our not being able to go on with the business of the committee, and that it would facilitate the hearing of those cases if we were allowed to sit while the House was in session. I was very much surprised, and I very much regretted, when my hon. friend the member for Marshfield, raised an objection to that motion, I do not know exactly what his idea was, but he said it was because the House was about to go into committee on the new rules. If the subtraction of half a dozen members would have had the effect of reducing the attendance so there would not be a quorum, I could sympathize with his anxiety to see that such a thing did not occur——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON —The hon. gentleman is out of order in refering to what took place in the House yesterday.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER —I am only giving an explanation.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON —The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I say I would have sympathized with the hon. gentleman, if the House would have been left without a quorum, but there was no danger of anything of the kind. I did not wish to put myself in the power of any hon. gentleman making the objection again when I was very anxious indeed that we should go on with the business of the committee, and I therefore gave notice of the motion which I have moved to-day.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN —Really the hon. gentleman is pressing the matter too far. Among the hon. gentlemen composing that committee are some of the ablest senators in this Chamber, and it is a question whether we should be deprived of their assistance in dealing with the legislation brought before us. It is a question whether the business of the Divorce Committee or the general legislation of the House is to take second place. The gentlemen who are on that committee, are required in this House, particularly the recently appointed leader of the Conservative party in the Senate. We do not want to be deprived of his services.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The first official announcement.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I am very glad to have the honour of making it. There may be a great many cases before the Divorce Committee, but this session is not likely to close very soon, and there will be plenty of time to hear the whole of them.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. Rule 13 says that one intermediate day's notice in writing must be given of all motions deemed special, and any motion is deemed special which originates a subject of discussion. This motion brings up a subject which might initiate discussion, and I claim therefore it should have another day to rest.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Has not the rule been complied with ? There has been one day's notice ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not one intervening day as required by rule No. 13. There is quite a difference between the two expressions, a previous day and an intermediate day, and that difference is illustrated by rule No. 71 which deals with important amendments to pivate Bills. The rule provides in that case that notice should be given on a previous day, but rule 13 provides that an intermediate day must intervene between the giving of the notice and the moving of it?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if he really wishes to press any such objection.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—We are not asking for a holiday, we are asking to be allowed to work.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman wants permission to work, he should ask for that permission in proper form.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The case we have before us commenced on Friday morning at ten o'clock. We sat until one. The House rose early Friday afternoon, and we were able to sit from four to six, and that same evening we sat from eight until near midnight. Yesterday morning we met at ten and sat until one. If we had been allowed to go on without the objection raised by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, we might have been able to dispose of that case yesterday. As it was, we sat from eight until after ten, and started this morning at ten and sat until one. We could get through with the witnesses to-day if we had been allowed to proceed. The objection is facetious.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is out of order. He should confine himself to the point of order.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I know that. I am throwing myself on the mercy of the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has no right to do that.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Does the hon. gentleman really persist in his objection ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Certainly I do.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I submit that the point of order raised by the hon. member from Stadacona is not well taken. If the hon. gentleman will turn to rule seventeen he will find that it provides that no motion to suspend, modify or amend any rule or part thereof shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule proposed to be suspended, modified or amended, and the purpose of such suspension. Now, the resolution states the purpose of the suspension and it lets the House know just what rule is proposed to be suspended, although it does not give the number of the rule. In my judgment the motion is in order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The motion is not to suspend at all. Rule 17 applies to a motion to suspend a rule, but in this case there is no rule. How could a motion be made to suspend a rule which does not exist? This is not a motion to suspend, it is a motion in general. If it was a motion to suspend, it would be equally out of order, because it should then cite the number of the rule it purposes to suspend.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I am not going to argue the point of order, but I take it for granted that the hon. gentleman from Halifax, who has been studying these matters lately, is probably correct ; but I would just say that as we have had an announcement from the hon. gentleman from Glengarry (Hon. Mr. McMillan) that a new leader of the opposition has been chosen, and as I presume this quarrel is among his followers, it affords a grand opportunity for him to exercise his authority. He should at least give us his opinion and settle the differences among his followers.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The point of order I think is well taken. The hon. gentleman from Halifax points to rule 17, but this is not a motion to suspend a rule. It is simply that the House should pursue a certain policy in dealing with divorce proceedings.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Surely there can be no objection to allowing the motion to stand until to-morow. We are not in such an extreme hurry for its adoption that it cannot wait 24 hours. I am not disposed to accept the objection raised, but whether it is in order or out of order, I think the better plan would be to let it stand as a notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I do not want to press it if it is going to be declared out of order. There are a great many witnesses and an array of counsel attending at the Divorce Committee, and if the hon. gentleman thinks he has carried a point by making them wait for another day, he is welcome to it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not quite fair.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman from Brandon says he will let his notice of motion stand until to-morrow, then it will be absolutely in order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It will not. We see his little game. I want the ruling of the Chair. If not in order the hon. gentleman will be obliged to give notice of another motion which will require two days' notice.

The SPEAKER—Before the end of the sitting I shall give my decision.

TRANSLATION OF MILITIA ORDERS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Does the government know that the 9th and the 20th brigades of infantry each five regiments strong, and the 10th, the 11th and the 18th brigades of infantry, which each number four regiments, making a total of 22 regiments, all in the province of Quebec, are composed in great part, not to say totally, of men of French origin, of whom many, especially among the rural regiments, do not understand a word of English ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer to that question is, yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Impressed with the importance of affording readily military instruction to the volunteers who engage in the service of the country,

2. Does the government intend to procure in good time, for those who do not know English, facilities for at least finding, in books put at their disposal, the meaning of the words of command which are given them in a language of which they are ignorant ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, in as far as it is possible to do so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Where there is a will there is always a way. I would inquire also :

3. Is it the intention of the government, for the benefit of those rural regiments, and in view of the next training of the militia in the annual camps, to order the immediate translation into the French language of the military drill books, known under the titles of 'Infantry Drill, 1905,' and 'Combined Training, 1905.' ?

4. Is it the intention of the government to take the necessary measures for having the distribution of the French version of the military drill books made before the date fixed for the holding of the next camps of training ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am instructed to answer questions Nos. 3 and 4 in the following words: This matter will receive the careful consideration of the department.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How long ?

COMMANDER SPAIN'S CERTIFICATES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Whether it is a certificate of English origin or of Canadian origin which Commander G. O. V. Spain holds ?

And is this a certificate as to competency or as to service ?

Has Commander Spain ever undergone examination in Canada ?

What is the date of his certificate ?

Before the date of his certificate, what was the duration of his service and what documents or evidence are there testifying to it ?

What statements are there of the service of Commander Spain from the date of his cerificate up to this date?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In reply to my hon. friend's question, whether it is a certificate of English origin or of Canadian origin which Commander G. O. V. Spain holds, I am informed that he holds royal naval certificates, obtained at the Royal Naval Colleges at Portsmouth and Greenwich, in pilotage, seamanship, navigation, torpedo, gunnery and mathematics as a commissioned officer in His Majesty's Royal Navy ; and that he also holds a Canadian master's seagoing certificate.

The certificate as to competency or as to service which he holds, is a merchant service certificate as master, sea-going, granted for above named services in the Royal Navy.

Commander Spain has undergone examination in Canada.

The date of his certificate is February 1, 1893.

Before the date of his certificate, the duration of his service was 13 years in the Royal Navy ; testified to by Royal Naval documents. Fifteen years service in the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

The statements of the service of Commander Spain from the date of his certificate up to this date, are sailing master of the cruiser 'Acadia,' captain of the cruiser 'Acadia,' acting commander fisheries protection service, commander fisheries protection service, commander marine service of Canada, wreck commissioner for Canada, nautical member of the lighthouse board.

ROSS RIFLE COMPANY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. Under what statute was the Ross Rifle Company constituted a corporation ?

2. Who are its present directors ? Who were its first directors ?

3. What is the capital stock of the company ?

4. Is this capital composed only of ordinary shares, or does it also comprise preference shares, and, if so, in what proportion ?

5. How many ordinary shares have been subscribed for and also how many preference shares ?

6. What are the privileges attached to this last category of shares ?

7. Has the company at any time made a report to the government of its operations ?

8. Was it stipulated in the contract entered into between the government and Sir Charles Ross that the latter should furnish the government between the 1st of January, 1903, and the 1st January, 1904, the quantity of 12,000 rifles of 1,000 per month ?

9. Was the government held, on its side, after this delivery of 12,000 rifles, to accept afterwards during the following years, 10,000 new rifles a year ?

10. How many rifles have the government received from the 1st June, 1903, to 1st January, 1906 ?

11. Are all the rifles received of the same pattern, and if they are not of the same pattern, what is the number of different patterns adopted by Sir Charles Ross, and how many rifles of each pattern has he delivered to the government up to the 1st January last ?

12. What is the price given for each of these rifles, and how much has the government paid up to the 1st January last ?

13. What amount remained due on that date ?

14. Has this rifle as a complement a bayonet or a sword bayonet ?

15. How much has the contractor asked for this addition ?

16. Has Sir Charles Ross manufactured other things than rifles for the government, and, if so, what are these other things, their quantity and their price ?

17. How many regiments have been provided with the Ross rifle and how many regiments remain still to be provided ?

18. When will these latter regiments be provided with the rifle in question ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The following is the reply furnished by the Department of Militia :

1. It is not incorporated under any statute. The name is a declaration of partnership by Sir Chas. Ross, Bart., as sole proprietor.

2. Answered in No. 1.

3. Ross Rifle Company not incorporated ; capital unknown.

4. Answered in No. 3.

5. Answered in Nos. 1 and 3.

6. Answered in Nos. 1 and 3.

7. No ; none was asked for.

8. Yes, but as modified by clause 11, of the contract wherein it is provided that the contractor shall not, in the case of strikes or in the event of unforeseen occurrences beyond his control preventing manufacture, be bound to make delivery at the time specified.

9. The government, considering that it was in the general interests of Canada that the rifles required for purposes of militia and defence should be manufactured in Canada, agreed that it (the government) should be bound and entitled to purchase from the contractor all the rifles which might be required for the government from year to year in lots of not less than 10,000 per year, subject to vote of parliament.

10. 10,500 rifles mark 1 were received.

11. No. The government has adopted two patterns—the first known as mark I and the second as mark II ; the latter differs from mark I in only a few details. All delivered up to January 1, 1906, were mark I pattern.

12. $25 each, $631,052.51.

13. Nothing remained due.

14. A bayonet and a scabbard will be provided for each rifle.

15. No price has been fixed pending the adoption of a pattern.

16. Yes ; two sets of inspection gauges have been nearly completed at a cost of $26,-237.63 and 405 rifle boxes have been supplied at $2 each.

17. The 3rd and 6th Regiments Canadian Artillery and the 67th Regiment.

18. Under consideration.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I understood the hon. minister to say the company was not incorporated by statute.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—By a declaration of partnership. By Sir Charles Ross as sole proprietor.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Some years ago we passed a statute in this House incorporating that company.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then the hon. gentleman has better information than the department.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then we should take the place of the hon. minister in the department. I know there was an Act pased in 1902 or 1903 incorporating the Ross Rifle Company. I think the hon. members from Beamsville (Hon. Mr. Gibson) and De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) were directors.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the hon. gentleman is correct, the answer which was prepared by an official in the Department of Militia is wrong. I will draw the attention of the Department to the matter.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think the answer given is quite correct. There was an Act passed, but it was not put into force, the company did not organize. I was one of the provisional directors, but, as far as I am aware, the company was never organized. Sir Charles Ross chose instead to carry on business under his own name.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The question I asked was under what statute was the company constituted a corporation ? The government says it is not incorporated under any statute. As a matter of fact it was incorporated.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The hon. gentleman is so impatient that he wants to ask the questions and answer them himself. Both the member for De Salaberry and I were named as provisional directors, but as far as I know there has never been a meeting of the company. While an Act of parliament was passed authorizing the incorporation of the company, Sir Charles Ross became the company himself without, as far as my knowledge goes, asking any one to put any capital in it. Consequently it was never incorporated as a corporate body. Sir Charles Ross, I suppose for reasons of his own, never thought it necessary to call the incorporators together and form a joint stock company under the Act. I never paid any money into it, and never took any money out of it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Where did the capital come from ?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I suppose the only gentleman who could answer that would be Sir Charles Ross himself. I know nothing about it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The statute I refer to is chap. 96 of 2 Edward VII. The first section names Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, Sir Charles Ross, Hon. W. Gibson, Hon. F. L. Beique, D. D. Mann, Frederick Nichols and Wallace Netbitt, who——together with such persons as become shareholders in the company are incorporated under the name of the Ross Rifle Co., Ltd.

Is that an incorporation or not ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No contract was made with the company, it was made with Sir Charles Ross.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I did not ask that. I asked under what statute the company was incorporated, and the answer was that it was not incorporated under any statute. I say that declaration does not reconcile itself with the law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not catch the answer of the hon. Secretary of State as to the parties with whom the government entered into a contract for the supply of these rifles. Was it with the company or with Sir Chas. Ross himself ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—With Sir Chas. Ross himself, I understand, not with the company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not so understand it. This seems to be a similar case to that of the North Atlantic Trading Corporation contract. The government entered into a contract with a company that had no existence, because it cannot have an existence, if the statement of the hon. member from Beamsville be correct. An Act was passed incorporating a company, in which certain provisional directors were named. The provisional directors were never called together or asked to subscribe to stock, and no directors were elected, and consequently there can be no company having a legal existence. If that be the case, the government have entered into a contract similar to that which they entered into with the North Atlantic Trading Company. If the government entered into a contract with Sir Chas. Ross individually, then we can understand it. We ought to have more information as to what this contract really is, and with whom it is made. If the hon. Secretary of State has not the information before him, will he ascertain whether the contract was made with the rifle company, or with Sir Chas. Ross himself ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The contract could not have been entered into with the rifle company, because the company never came into existence. We have the evidence of two gentlemen who were named as provisional directors that they never heard of a meeting taking place and that no organization existed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not answering the question. The government entered into a contract with a company that had no existence, and paid them $5 a head for every emigrant brought into the country for two years before they had an existence. Is this Ross rifle contract a repetition of the same thing ? I have asked the hon. gentleman to ascertain the names of the parties with whom the contract was made.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have answered that, but I will get further information. I shall bring down the contract with Sir Chas. Ross.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The only desire of hon. gentlemen opposite in opening up this question is to find that the hon. member from De Salaberry and myself, members of the Senate, were brought under this corporate body.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right and no reason to impute motives.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I have my own way of making my explanation, and the hon. gentleman should keep his seat. The object is to show that my hon. friend and myself have been infringing the rules of parliament. My hon. friend opposite says that this company has no corporate existence, because Sir Chas. Ross continued to carry on the business as the Ross Rifle Company. We know that our hon. friends on the other side of the House had a company which is in existence to-day to which millions of the country's money was paid, and the chief man of that company was a member of the House. I refer to the W. E. Sanford Manufacturing Company, of the city of Hamilton. Under the Joint Stock Companies Act, the independence of parliament Act could be got over. As I said before, I know nothing about this company, I was simply asked to join it in the usual way, expecting that a meeting would be called and stock subscribed in the usual way. To the best of my knowledge such a thing never occurred. The man who manages the Ross company is to be seen here very frequently and the product of his factory has been approved by the military authorities. Therefore it is not a company that is without a body corporate. It certainly is a company, and if one man chooses to make himself that company, I do not think it comes within the purview of this House to criticise Sir Chas. Ross. We have given our explanation and the matter rests with the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

FRENCH VERSION OF THE IMPERIAL ARMY REGULATIONS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to direct the attention of the government to the following clause of the Militia Act:

74. The Army Act for the time being in force in the United Kingdom, the King's Regulations, and all other laws applicable to His Majesty's troops in Canada and not inconsistent with this Act or the regulations made thereunder, shall have force and effect as if they had been enacted by the parliament of Canada for the government of the militia, and every officer and man of the militia shall be subjected thereto from the time of being called out for active service, and also during the period of annual drill or training under the provisions of this Act, and also at any other time while upon military duty or in the uniform of his corps upon or within any rifle range or any armoury, or other place where arms, guns, ammunition or other military stores are kept, or any drill shed or other building or place used for militia purposes, or during any drill or parade of his corps at which he is present in the ranks, when going to or from the place of drill or parade, and also whether in uniform or not at any drill or parade of his corps at which he is present as a spectator.

2. Officers and men of the permanent force and members of the permanent staff of the militia shall at all times be subject to military law.

97. The regulations for the composition of courts of inquiry and courts martial, and the modes of procedure and powers thereof, shall be the same as the regulations which are at the time in force for the composition, modes of procedure and powers of courts of inquiry and courts martial for His Majesty's regular army, and which are not inconsistent with this Act, or the regulations made thereunder.

And inquired of the government:

As the Army Act and the King's Regulations of the United Kingdom become, by these legislative enactments, laws and regulations having force and effect in Canada, does the government intend, in the interest of the militia and for its better government, to provide each commanding officer of a division, of a brigade, of a regiment, of a squadron, of a battery, of a company, or of any corps whatsoever, with a copy, in the English version or in the French version, as the case may be, of these imperial laws and regulations?

If such is the intention of the government, can the distribution of these books, which are indispensible since they are made imperative, be made before the date of the next training of the volunteer forces?

Can the French translation of these books be begun at once so that the officers of French origin may have the benefit of these laws and of these regulations at the same time as their English comrades?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The matter is receiving the consideration of the department.

THE APPLE EXPORT TRADE.

MOTION,

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that he will be pleased to lay on the table of the House, a statement showing :—

1st. The number of barrels and boxes of apples (stated separately) exported from Canada to foreign countries, including those shipped through United States ports.

2nd. The number of packages of Canadian apples (stated aforesaid) delivered at the following European ports : London, Liverpool, Glasgow, Manchester, Bristol, Belfast, Hamburg, Havre and Antwerp. The number of barrels and boxes (stated separately) and to be given separately, for each of the aforesaid ports.

3rd. The number of packages as aforesaid, bearing the marks required by the Fruit Marks Act, stating separately the number of packages bearing each of the different marks authorized by the said Act.

4th. The number of packages, as aforesaid, which were found by the inspectors appointed by the Department of Agriculture or the commercial agents of the Department of Trade and Commerce, to be dishonestly packed or falsely marked.

5th. The names of all the inspectors appointed by the government, or the Department of Agriculture operating either in Canada or elsewhere, under the provisions of the Fruit Marks Act, and the salary and other allowances paid to each, and the territory covered by each inspector.

6th. The names of all the commercial agents employed by the government or the Department of Trade and Commerce and operating in the United Kingdom, the British colonies and foreign countries and the salary and other allowances paid to each, and the territory covered by each agent.

The above information to cover the year ending June 30, 1905.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The government will bring down all the information they possess on the subject. If I quite followed the hon. gentleman's motion, there are two or three points on which I doubt whether the information in the hands of the departments concerned, that is my own, and the Department of Agriculture, is quite full enough to give him the details, but as far as our information goes we will be happy to give it. A good deal of it he would find I think in the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce, as affecting the commercial agents, and whatever there is he shall have it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I quite appreciate what the hon. gentleman has said. I was not quite sure myself that some of the information was available, but if it is available we want it.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As to some of the other particulars being found in the reports, we do not want to wade through those. We want to get them in a form that will be valuable for reference.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—A portion of them are placed in detail in the report in that fashion. However, we will give all the information we can.

The motion was agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved the second reading of Bill (No. 22) An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman explain what this is for ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Speaking from memory, I think it is merely for an extension of time for the completion of some minor branch lines in the west. One is on the east shore of Lake Manitoba and the other in British Columbia.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is reading from the House of Commons Bill. It may have been amended, and consequently we do not know if that is the extent to which it goes.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I understand the Bill was not amended at all in the House of Commons, as it simply asked for an extension of time.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—We ought to have more information with reference to this Bill than has been given. There are extensions of time in this Bill, and very likely of land grants and everything. We have no opportunity of getting information with reference to these Bills excepting at the second reading. The hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill should explain fully the scope and object of this measure. It may be said that it will go to committee and there be threshed out, but how are members who are not on that committee to know what the object of the Bill is ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I do not think the powers asked for in this Bill in any way affect the land grant. It is only to extend the time for completion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not object at all, except to the informal and loose manner in which we are conducting the business of the Senate. The sooner that is put a stop to the better.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill says he does not know what the details are. Would it not be better to postpone the second reading until we have that information ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I thought the explanation I made was very clear and plain, that the object of the Bill was merely to extend the time for the completion of certain branch lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway system in Manitoba and British Columbia. It does not deal with the land grant at all.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Truro)—I have serious objection to passing a Bill until it is before us. We have only one senator's word for it, that the Bill is just as it passed the House of Commons. I object to proceeding further until we have the Bill before us.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I move that the order be discharged and the second reading of the Bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have a lot of idle men in this Chamber and there ought to be no excuse or apology for not having the Bills promptly filed as distributed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has not noticed that this Bill is marked printed in French only, and if any one is responsible probably it is the Printing Bureau. I do not undertake to find fault with or criticise them, but the probabilities are that no officer of this House is responsible for its not being on our files, the Bill not being printed in English.

The motion was agreed to.

QUEBEC MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Mitchell) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 23) An Act to incorporate the Quebec Midland Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Explain.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—This Bill is printed in both languages and every senator has a copy on his file.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I do not want to raise an objection to each of these Bills, but we ought to have more information of this important measure than we are receiving. The hon. gentleman who has charge of it, in half a dozen words, asks us to pass the Bill. We have been going on in that manner, and it is time we called a halt. Let us have some explanation why the Senate is asked to pass the Bill. No reason whatever has been given. I therefore think it is unreasonable to ask the House to do anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—The Bill has been printed and is on the file of each member of the House and I think it states clearly what its object is. The names of the incorporators are all given. I am not myself in possession of any information on the subject. The hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill is out of the House, but I do not think it is customary to ask for information beyond what I have stated. If the hon. gentleman is so interested in these matters he has access to the Railway Committee, if he is not already on it, and he will there have an opportunity of hearing the measure discussed.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (De Lanaudière)—It has been the custom in the Senate, I think, to refer private Bills such as this to a committee after the second reading, without discussion. In seven sessions I remember one instance only in which a Bill has been refused a second reading where it was to be afterwards referred to a standing committee of the House. The purpose of the committee is to look into the details of the measure, and the committee room is the place where a private Bill should be discussed on its merits. Afterwards, when the report of the committee has been made, if hon. members of this House wish to have a discussion they can refuse to adopt the report of the committee. If the Senate is going to debate the merits of each private Bill, the usefulness of the committees will practically come to an end. In my opinion it would be better to let these Bills go to committee now as they have in the past.

Both the promoters and those who oppose the measure have an opportunity of being heard, and the committee, I submit, is in a better position to inquire whether the Bill should become law or not.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—The 8th clause of the Bill is as follows:

8. The company may lay out, construct and operate a line of railway of the gauge of four feet eight and one-half inches from a point on the interprovincial boundary between the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, at or near the northern extremity of Lake Abitibi, thence in an easterly and northerly direction to a point on the west shore of Lake Mattagami, in the province of Quebec.

It would appear that the whole of the railway will be in the province of Quebec. If that is so, I do not think we have the right to pass the Bill, and I think it should be referred to the local legislature. We have decided before this that when a railway is entirely within one province it should not be declared to be, as is done in this case, an undertaking for the general advantage of Canada. I think it has been decided that we should not deal with measures which are purely local in their nature.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Lake Abitibi is in the province of Ontario, so that the railway must necessarily pass through a portion at least of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I should like to ask how long is the road? We would like to know whether the company is likely to build it. What is the financial condition of the company organized to construct the road? I see the words ' at or near' are used. We have had difficulty in reference to that expression before this. We are asked to grant a charter to build a road commencing at a point on the boundary line between Quebec and Ontario and extending up north into the new territory. It is unreasonable that we should not have some statement as to the ability of those who are named as incorporators to construct the road. We should know whether they have the ability or whether this is simply an application for a charter which may be used for speculative purposes.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The fact that the line crosses the border between Ontario and Quebec makes it an interprovincial railway, and for that reason legislation is required on the part of this parliament. If my hon. friend from St. Thomas would look at clause 4 he would find that the capital stock of the company is $500,000; that the head office of the company is to be in the city of Ottawa, and that the annual meeting of the shareholders is to be held on the second Tuesday in September. If my hon. friend will take the trouble to come to the Railway Committee he will find there a map giving all the information which is in the possession of this House. The map cannot be brought into the House, but the committee will have the benefit of it, and they will have the opportunity of hearing the promoters. All the information which he seems to be bewildered for lack of, will be brought out in the very committee that he objects to sending the Bill to.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The second reading of the Bill is the time to discuss the principle of it. It is quite true that we have departed from that rule in allowing Bills to go to committee without discussion, but the proper way is to discuss the merits and principle of the measure on the second reading, and I hope the House will not depart from that practice.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Although I am in the minority and although the Bill is evidently going to be rushed through without the information that I desire, we ought to have a more detailed explanation than what has been given before the Bill goes to the Railway Committee, and therefore when the Bill comes back I shall claim the fullest privilege to thoroughly discuss it on its third reading, and, if necessary, move a resolution in reference to it. I think it is our duty to take this course with every Bill that comes up here for second reading. We ought to have the information, and if those members who are not upon the committee, are not furnished with the information they desire, some means of obtaining it will be used in the future.

The motion was agreed to.

SOUTH ONTARIO PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved second reading of Bill (No. 19) An Act respecting the South Ontario Pacific Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We have not the Bill before us. It is not printed.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—It is certainly printed, because I have it on my desk. I admit that this charter has had an extended existence, but I believe a good deal has been done. The object of the Bill is to keep alive the privilege to construct a branch of this line from Woodstock to the town of St. Mary's and I understand it is also the company's intention to build another branch to Stratford. These two points are large manufacturing towns and the people desire to have communication with the Canadian Pacific Railway as well as with the Grand Trunk in order to have shipping facilities over both lines.

The SPEAKER—It appears that the Bill has not been distributed, and from the minutes it has not been printed in both languages.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—In the order paper of yesterday the Bill is set down as printed in English and French.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No one has the Bill, which is the best proof of the objection taken.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I have no objection to moving that the order be discharged and set down for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

CAMPBELLFORD, LAKE ONTARIO AND WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called.

Second reading Bill (No. 24) An Act respecting the Campbellford, Lake Ontario and Western Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg).

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This Bill is in the same position as the previous one.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I would call the Speaker's attention to the fact that on the Orders of yesterday all the Orders from No. 1 to No. 14, page 164, are marked 'E.F.' I should like to know from you, Mr. Speaker, who is responsible for the printing of the Orders of the Day. When these measures come up for second reading, not a Bill is here either in French or English. This is very misleading, and it puts a member of this House, who has charge of a Bill by courtesy in nearly every case, in a very awkward position. Out of 14 Bills on our orders some three or four only have been printed. I think our Minutes at least ought to be correct. Whatever officer has these matters in charge should bear the blame, and those who have authority over him should see that he discharges his duty and not mislead the House, as has been done on this and previous occasions.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—It certainly is very annoying to have this blundering system of presenting on the desk of each member an inaccurate statement with regard to the business of the day. It occurred last session also. We had then virtually to go to our post office and try to get copies of Bills when the matter came up before the House. It is the duty of the officers of this House to see that this is not repeated. If the officer is so negligent he should be removed and some one put in his place who will attend to the matter, because the Bill is undoubtedly printed. There is no question about that. The hon. gentleman from Lincoln has called attention to the fact that it is on the minutes of yesterday and of the previous day as printed. Why is it not on the minutes to-day ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The objection taken now is that we have not the Bill before us. It is not the question of whether it is mentioned properly in the Orders of the Day or not.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—In view of the fact that the Bill is not before the members of the House, I move that this order be discharged and the Bill be placed on the order paper for second reading to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

CRAWFORD BAY AND ST. MARY'S RAILWAY COMPANY.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved second reading of Bill (53) An Act respecting the Crawford Bay and St. Mary's Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I wish to raise objection to Bills going through without explanation. It seems that the custom has been to pass the second reading of measures of this class without any explanation being afforded. Here we have a Bill, and I guarantee there are not ten members in the House who understand its nature, the locality through which the railway runs, or whether there will be any injustice done to any of the districts affected. I protest against this style of legislation, with regard to railway Bills. I shall not oppose the second reading of this measure now, but I hope in future we may have some definite information given us so that we may understand what we are doing.

The motion was agreed to.

VANCOUVER, WESTMINSTER AND YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved the second reading of Bill (41) An Act respecting the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway Company. He said: This Bill is for the purpose of enabling the company to construct and operate certain branches as set forth in the measure. I do not know that I can give a very definite explanation without a map.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Can the hon. gentleman tell us what portion of the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway has been built? These are branches to run from the main line. How much of the main line has been built?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I do not think any part of it has been built.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has it been surveyed?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I think there has been a preliminary survey, locating the line.

The motion was agreed to.

WHITE HORSE AND ALSEK RAILWAY COMPANY.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved the second reading of Bill (31) An Act respecting the White Horse and Alsek Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I avail myself of this opportunity to explain to the House why these Bills which we have been discussing have not been printed. On April 14, the blue print, as it is called, was struck off and sent to the House of Commons for approval. It has to wait there before the printing can be proceeded with, for the order of the law clerk of the House of Commons. All these Bills might just as well have been distributed last Thursday. They were ready to be distributed on the 19th. I understand the Law Clerk of the Commons has been ill and has not been in attendance at his office. The fault lies with his subordinates. There appears to have been carelessness in not returning it. There is a rule that Bills must receive the imprimatur of the law clerk before they are finally printed, which is the sole cause of the delay.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The White Horse and Alsek Railway is in the northern part of British Columbia. White Horse is a point on the route to the Yukon. As far as I am aware, nothing has been done under the charter for this road, which was originally granted in 1904.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman know in which direction this road is to run? Is Alsek in British Columbia or is it intended to carry the road down the Yukon river?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I am afraid I can not give the information at the present time, but I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman that this railway is not the same as the Whitehorse Pass Railway. This is located in a different part of the country.

The motion was agreed to.

ST. CLAIR AND ERIE SHIP CANAL COMPANY.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (46) An Act respecting the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company. He said: This Bill simply provides for an extension of time; that is all the explanation I can make. The project is about to be financed. I am satisfied this House will receive that information with very great pleasure.

The motion was agreed to.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House again resumed:

In Committee of the Whole, consideration of the third report of the Special Committee appointed during last session to consider and revise, and if deemed necessary, to add to the Rules, Orders and Forms of Proceeding of the Senate.—(Hon. Mr. Ferguson.)

(In The Committee.)

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before proceeding further, I should like to reconsider clause 4, that is the clause which defines 'select committee' and 'special committee.' The hon. member for Halifax, if I understand him right, defines select committee, as a committee that is not composed of all the members of the House. Then he subdivides select committees into special committees and standing committees. He defines a special committee as a committee other than a standing committee, but he does not define what a standing committee is. Now, what is a standing committee ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman knows very well.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The first day of every session a general committee of all the members of this House is appointed. Is that a standing committee ? Is it a select committee ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not a select committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is it a committee of the whole ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, in a way.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will the hon. gentleman tell me the meaning of the term used in rule 89, which provides that 'no senator shall sit on a select committee who has a direct pecuniary interest in the inquiry before such committee, &c.' In the opinion of the hon. gentleman the word 'select' is divided into standing and special ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes the definition says so.

Hon Mr. LANDRY—But a standing committee is not defined. In rule 90 it is provided that 'select committees may adjourn from time to time, &c.' Well, what is the meaning of that ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Just what it says.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What does it mean ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is very plain English. The hon. gentleman is supposed to be a somewhat astute gentleman, and I am sure he understands quite well what it says.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not see the difference between a standing and a special committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman had been attending to his duty and had been present yesterday he would have understood it, because we discussed this very question for an hour in the committee. Other hon. gentlemen understood the question after a considerable discussion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I was absent yesterday because of the death of one of my brothers.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend from Halifax reminds me of a man in Prince Edward Island who did not know how to write, who took a sheet of paper and scrawled all over it. He said he was sending it to a friend in Pictou. Somebody asked him what was the use of sending that to his friend ? He replied 'Plenty good scholars in Pictou.' My hon. friend says that the hon. member from Stadacona is astute and could understand the subject if he had been in the House yesterday. No one could understand the explanation of the new member from Halifax. In the first place, you start with a definition of a special committee, which is 'a select committee other than a standing committee,' while you gave no definition of a standing committee. In fact this matter was left in such a way that if we want to have ourselves laughed at we will let it remain so. The English practice is they have just the two committees, select and standing. In Australia they have adopted the system of calling every committee other than standing ones, as they do in England, select committees. We have always called the committees other than standing committees special committees, and it has answered our purpose. Why not adhere to that ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—We are adhering to it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Why introduce confusion by using this form ? Why not adhere to the word 'special ?' The hon. member from Halifax has great faith in an interpretation clause. He has something like the faith Sam. Weller's father had in the word 'alibi.' He thought that was the best remedy in every lawsuit. He had himself escaped by an alibi and he would put up that plea whenever any one got into trouble. My hon. friend thinks if an interpretation clause can be rounded off, there is exceeding virtue in it, although it never touches the matter of the rules. We have four or five of these ornamental appendages, something like the curl in a pig's tail that are perfectly useless, but the hon. gentleman insists on retaining them there, and the House is aparently willing to let the hon. gentleman have his way, even though it makes us ridiculous in years to come.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What the hon. gentleman says in his definition is that a special committee is a select committee other than a standing committee. Well, what is the d fference between the two ? That is what I want to know. It is not because both are less than a committee comprising the whole number of senators. Both have the same qualification as fas as their component parts are concerned and yet a special committee is a select committee other than a standing committee. That is not a definition at all. If you define what a standing committee is, then we will understand what a select committee may be, but if a standing committee and a special committee are both the same thing as to members composing it, what is the difference between the two? The word special committee should be further defined, or we should add another definition and say what standing committee is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Owing to the unhappy circumstance to which the hon. gentleman has referred he was not present yesterday when this matter was discussed at some length. I am not, as the hon. member from Marshfield seems to suppose, so very much in love with definitions that I should go in for inserting a definition for which there was no occasion whatever. You define things about the meaning of which there might be some doubt. Now, neither the hon. gentleman from Stadacona nor any other hon. gentleman in the House has ever had the slightest doubt since he became a member of the senate as to what a standing committee meant.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, nor a special committee either.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman says the same thing with respect to special committee. A standing committee has the same meaning in England, Australia and everywhere that we have given it in the House, but a special committee is a different thing. The special committee is a term, as I understand it, which is substantially unknown in the English practice. The English practice uses the word select where we use the word special. We have for a considerable time used this word 'special.' The hon. member speaks of this report as if it were the report of the hon. member from Halifax. This is a committee report that we are dealing with. In the opinion of the committee the term special was more suitable than the term select, and because this term special was not used in the English practice it was thought well and necessary to define it. Then because we were using the term 'select' in a different sense from that in which it is used in England, it was thought better to define that, but there was no object in defining the word 'standing' because there was no question about its meaning. It means the same everywhere, and every hon. gentleman is familiar with its meaning. I suppose it is not just the right thing to refer to what has taken place before a committee, but it is an unusual course to discuss the details of a matter in this chamber which have been discussed and agreed to without any difference of opinion on the committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me all this difficulty might be got over by simply defining what a standing committee is. The hon. gentleman argues that because every member of the Senate knows what a standing committee is therefore there is no necessity for defining it. I question whether there is a member of the Senate who does not know what a select committee means. A select committee, as every one knows, means a committee other than a standing committee. If it be unnecessary to define what a standing committee is, then logical reasoning would lead to the conclusion that it is not necessary to define what a special committee is. A special committee must be something outside of a standing committee, and a select committee is similar, with this difference, it is not a standing committee. There is nothing in the rules to define what a standing committee is. It will lead to confusion with new members who have no experience in the matter and who have not given the subject much attention. I cannot see what objection there should be to defining the word 'standing' as well as defining the words 'select' and 'special,' then the difficulty would be obviated to a very great extent. It is my misfortune to differ on many occasions from the hon. member from Halifax. The doctrine that he has laid down here, that when a report comes from a committee it is not to be discussed or considered by the whole House is neither parliamentary nor in accordance with usage. A committee may come unanimously to a conclusion and report to the House, and the House can take exception to that and reverse the decision of the committee, or amend it as they please.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I never said anything to the contrary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman is right, the moment a matter is referred to a committee, and the committee report to the House, you must take their report without any question at all. I know the hon. gentleman's parliamentary experience is such that he never could be serious in advocating a doctrine of that kind. In all parliamentary proceedings the rules provide for a number of stages through which a Bill, motion or report of a committee shall pass. The object of that is to enable the House, at every stage, to consider and discuss, amend or reject. There can be no question of that, we have been told a number of times in this House that it is tantamount to an insult to a committee to object to its report, or to any portions of it. I dissent from that, and I am quite sure the hon. member from Halifax will, on reflection, come to the conclusion that, in laying down a doctrine of that kind, he is not acting in accordance with our parliamentary practice. There must be confusion. If you turn to the 89th clause you will find that it says 'No senator shall sit on a select committee who has a direct pecuniary interest, &c.' Then the 90th says 'A select committee may adjourn from time to time, &c.' Now a select committee is interpreted by the interpretation clause to be a committee other than the whole number of senators, and then you have confusion again by saying special committee immediately afterwards. Surely there can be no objection to adopting one or the other word, 'select' or 'special', and make it uniform, or which would obviate the difficulty to a great extent, simply by defining what a standing committee is. A standing committee could easily be defined by stating that it is the first committee formed on the opening of every parliament, declaring the privileges and usages of parliament. That is a committee of the whole House. Then you go on to define what the other standing committees shall be, Contingencies, Railways, Banking and Commerce, and so on. To old members that may not be necessary; but there are others who are not as well acquainted with the rules and practice of parliament, and a simple amendment of that kind would obviate the difficulties pointed out by the hon. senator from Stadacona.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think there is any such substantial difficulty, but if hon. gentlemen think it desirable that a standing committee should be defined, we can arrange to have a definition prepared and submitted. I doubt if we will get through with this matter to-day, and it can be submitted at the next meeting of the committee. I am afraid I did not make myself understood. I judge so by the remarks just made by the hon. senator from Belleville. I did not mean, whatever I may have said, to question the right of any member of the House to make any objection to a report of a committee, or to move any amendment to anything contained in a report. What I said was this: that it was unusual for a member of a committee, which committee had presented a report to the Senate, to attack that report in the House or in Committee of the Whole on points as to which he had not objected in the committee. He has a perfect right to do it, you may say a legal right, but it is not the practice, and the hon. gentleman from Belleville, who is a very old parliamentarian, will agree with me on that, that where a committee, either a select standing committee or a select special committee, deals with a matter and presents a report, any member who has not on the special committee, or the standing committee expressed his dissent from the report, is not expected, at any rate when the matter comes up before the whole body, to attack that report. I appeal to the experience and good sense of the hon. senator from Belleville to say whether he does not think that is a sound parliamentary principle.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Upon general principles I agree with the hon. gentleman, but he must have forgotten that while we are not permitted in the House to discuss questions of difference in the committee, he knows very well that there are several clauses of this report to which I took very serious objection.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are some.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the doctrine laid down by the hon. gentleman be correct, I am not out of order, nor am I transgressing the practice of parliament by objecting to certain clauses.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Certainly not, but this is not one of the clauses objected to in committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know I took very strong objection to the mixing of standing, special and other committees.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The trouble arose from the peculiar view that the hon. member from Halifax has, that if you express an opinion different from his, or suggest—

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman nearly every time he has spoken in connection with this matter, has made remarks personal to myself.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman has been personal all the time himself.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has no right to make personal remarks.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I say the hon. gentleman in his course in connection with this measure, has invariably assumed that any one who takes objection to any word or part of this report is at once attacking the report. Now my position is this: It is quite consistent for me, and proper, although I might myself have drafted a provision in the committee, after the report comes to the House, to change my view on a matter of such great importance as this. I would be candid and frank enough to say I had seen a mistake in what I had done. I did that yesterday in regard to what I had previously done myself. There is no attack in this. The trouble comes in all the time by the hon. member from Halifax whenever a suggestion comes from myself, immediately saying I am attacking something, apparently attacking him or attacking this report. I confess I did not see some of the difficulties that I see now when we were in committee. In adopting rules for the governing of this House for years to come, however late we may be in seeing errors in any particular clause, we should be ready at once to acknowledge that we were mistaken and endeavour to make the clauses as perfect as possible. I know the hon. member from Halifax is not in any mood to take a suggestion, from myself, anyway—he showed that disposition long ago, but I nevertheless, suggest to other hon. gentlemen that I think we could get over this difficulty very easily by taking clauses 89, 90, 91 and 92 and changing the word 'select,' in them into the word 'standing' or into the word 'special,' the terms we have always been accustomed to, and when we have done that and they can be easily converted; because that is what it meant in every case, and when the word 'select' in five or six clauses is converted into the terms we have been using and familiar with, we could strike out the interpretation clauses altogether and never have any trouble.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman from Marshfield should be satisfied with the suggestion which has been made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. He has suggested that the matter be left over for the present, with a view of adopting a wording which would be more satisfactory. Without making any motion, I would call attention to the fact that rule 89 will require to be modified, because it only covers select committees. It would be premature to deal with the matter now, because we must wait until after the definition is finally settled. Rule 89 as it is, would apply only to a select committee, not to a special committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suggest that the hon. gentleman from DeSalaberry prepare that definition.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The difficulty which I have seen throughout this discussion has been this: there are two kinds of committees, special and standing committees, and yet we are making provision for the interpretation of three terms, select, special and standing committee. Inasmuch as there are only two committees,—I am not now including committees of the whole House—why should we deal with three terms, and introduce what appears to me to be an entirely unnecessary factor, namely select committee? It seems to me we are simply confusing the matter by adopting a multiplicity of terms.

The CHAIRMAN—There is no motion of any kind before the Chair. We are really on No. 30, the suggestion that rule 99 be amended.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This was suggested to me by the clerk of the House in consequence of an order originating in the House of Commons, calling upon the Senate as one of the departments of the public service, to give a detailed account of its expenditures. The hon. Secretary of State transmitted the order to the clerk of the House, who pointed out to me that rule 99 does not meet a case of this kind, and that, in his judgment, it would be desirable to insert the amendment which I have proposed. It provides for what does not appear to have been provided for in rule 99.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Has my hon. friend compared the rule with that of the Commons? He will see that it is desirable that in a matter of this kind which requires an exchange of courtesies, that the two Houses should act in unison, and that the rules of both should be in conformity with each other as far as possible. I suggest that it would be well that we should endeavour to make the two conform. The House of Commons have a committee sitting now on the subject of their rules, but I am not advised whether they have taken up this particular point.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not know what the rule of the Commons is. It is no doubt very desirable that we should have the means of complying with such a request as we now have on hand.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Our rule regulates our own action. The Commons asks us to do a certain thing, and we are merely providing the way we should do it. I do not think any possible action on the part of the Commons could be governed by our rules.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not quite catch what I desire to say. Occasionally the Senate, as he knows, has sent for members of the House of Commons to appear before one of its committees. That has occurred occasionally, not frequently. Now he will see that it is desirable that the two Houses should have similar forms of procedure and that there should be no possibility of clashing. It would be awkward if we laid down a rule which was not in harmony with the similar rule laid down in the Commons. If my hon. friend from Halifax has looked into the matter, I have no more to say, if not, I suggest that that point might be considered.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the Commons have any special rule on that point, but this might stand over to be looked into.

The amendment was allowed to stand.

31. That rule 106 be amended by striking out all the words after 'Senate' in the sixth line, and inserting the words 'minister or' before the word 'senator' in the third line.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This is a rule which is taken from the Australian practice. It does not conform with our practice as it now stands. When an order of the House is issued for papers, the minister produces these papers and lays them on the table. But at the conclusion of rule 106, after the order of the House is issued, and the papers are produced, when they are returned, it is provided they shall be laid on the table by the clerk. Further, the rule provides for a situation which we never have apparently, should there be no minister in the House. It might happen that no minister would be present, but some other senator would represent the minister, and therefore my amendment proposes to provide for that case. During the illness or absence from any other cause of a minister, the public business has to go on.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not see that the rule is open to criticism. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield proposes to insert the words 'minister or'. Is not the minister a senator. Can you have a minister in this House who is not a senator? To put in these words would involve a surplusage of the very worst kind. The hon. gentleman has moved several amendments to get rid of much less objectionable redundancies than this. Again, the table of the Senate is the place where all papers are supposed to be found, and I think that it is only proper that the papers should be laid on the table, and be in the custody of the clerk. The minister should not give them to any one else.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Undoubtedly, any minister in this House would also be a senator, but a time might come when there would not be any minister in the Senate. By using the words 'minister or senator having charge', it would provide for such a case. As regards the production of documents, this rule seems to be based on some practice they have in Australia which is not like ours. Our usage is that the documents are produced by a minister, and they are then laid on the table by him, not by the clerk.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The name Australia seems to operate like the traditional red rag in the case of the hon. gentleman. When the minister brings the papers down he says 'I have the honour to lay on the table the papers asked for', and then the rule goes on to say that 'such papers, when returned, shall be laid on the table by the clerk.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would ask what papers could be ordered by the House that would be laid on the table by the clerk? If a minister produces papers and says 'I have the honour to lay them on the table', what has the clerk to do with that? What papers are there to be brought down that would necessitate the clerk of the House laying them on the table, except returns which the law requires to be made every year? What other papers are there?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—From the language of the clause, I would infer that in Australia the return is made to the clerk, who lays the papers on the table. That is evidently not our practice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If we strike out the words 'by the clerk' that will get over the difficulty.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I move that these words be struck out.

The motion was agreed to.

On paragraph 33: That rule 51 be amended by inserting the following words at the end thereof, 'which shall be determined without debate.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This is so apparent that it is scarcely necessary to say anything on the point. It is assumed that where a senator is called to order and sits down, some member might move, while the question of order was pending, that the senator should be allowed to proceed. If such a motion, which is plainly implied there, could be made, it ought to be settled without debate.

The SPEAKER—Does the hon. gentleman mean that, the point of order being raised, the senator making the point of order will not be able to explain what it is, and that the party who is called to order will not be able to answer?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The rule as it stands is our old rule; it did not seem to provide against a debate springing up on some motion of the kind I have described. My intention is simply to provide, as is done under rule 38, that the matter should be determined without debate. I took the suggestion from rule 38, where I found a similar provision was made. It would seem that rule 51 contemplates the possibility of a motion intervening, such as I have referred to, which might lead to a long debate. It is not on the point of order, but, whether pending the decision of the point of order, the member could be allowed to proceed with his speech.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I would move that the parentheses in the rule be struck out, and that the words 'without the consent of the Senate' be struck out. The House is always master of the whole situation.

The motion was agreed to.

On paragraph 34:

That rule 62 be amended by inserting after the word 'Senate' in the fourth line the following words: 'which shall be determined without debate.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The effect of this paragraph is to permit a member to withdraw his protest without debate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a written protest.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think this matter is of sufficient consequence to move an amendment about, or to have much difficulty over. I do not think we have had a protest in this House for twenty years now. I remember that when Sir Alexander Campbell led the House, there were on two or three occasions protests to which that hon. gentleman was a party, but I really do not see why a member who wishes to withdraw his protest should not be allowed to explain why he does so. A member has made a protest or signed a protest, and, after further consideration, concludes that he would like to have his name withdrawn; I do not see why he should be precluded from giving his reasons to the House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is not worth wasting time over.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Such matters are very rarely brought before us. But I do not see any reason for closing the mouth of the member on these occasions.

The paragraph was dropped.

On paragraph 35 :

35. That the amendments made in the fifth and ninth lines of rule 35 in Committee of the Whole be struck out, and also that the words 'seven days notice be given and' be struck out of the sixth and seventh lines of the said rule and also that all the words after 'provided' in the ninth line of the said rule be struck out and the following substituted 'that irregularities and mistakes may be corrected and formal amendments made by way of reconsideration.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think many hon. gentlemen will admit that rule 35 was not left in a very satisfactory way. Several clauses which provide for separate consideration apart from this were struck out, and then the hon. gentleman from DeSalaberry proposed some amendments which appeared at the moment to cover the ground fairly well, but I do not now think that they do. However, I think there ought to be some further change made, in order to harmonize matters ; but I am not responsible for any difficulty that exists just there, and having given the notice and placed the matter before the House I will leave it in that way in more skilful hands than mine, and the hon. gentleman from DeSalaberry who dealt with the matter before, will be able to suggest some way which will be more practicable than the present arrangement.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not think the suggestion of the hon. gentleman which appears in the minutes should be adopted ; but I think we should shorten the number of days required for the notice. I think two or three days' notice is sufficient. It seems to me that is the only change which is called for.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Shorten it to two days.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Part of my suggestion was that we should strike out the seven days.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I understand the suggestion of the hon. gentleman was to make a difference between remedying and cancelling and rescinding. I would not agree with him as to the advisability of making a distinction, because reconsidering any question has the effect of re-opening it for the purpose of either amending or rescinding it, and therefore the same necessity for rescinding it applies in one case as in the other, whether it is to amend a provision or cancel it. I move that the word 'two' be substituted for the word 'seven.'

The CHAIRMAN—In the amendment made the words 'Reconsidered or' were inserted, but I understand the hon. gentleman from Marshfield proposes to strike those words out.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes. It was rather more drastic than the hon. gentleman's suggestion. Reconsidering a matter would open the door, and the rescinding was the more serious matter of reversing what has been done before, and if he wanted to rescind he should give a longer notice, but I have no doubt that if the hon. member will substitute two days for seven it will make it fairly workable. I think it will. I do not see why that would not be a fair remedy. The other provisions requiring a majority of the entire number of senators to rescind a matter is a pretty stiff provision. With a senate of about ninety members it would be necessary to have 46 senators agree to a motion to rescind, and if you can get that number out of the ordinary attendance of the House you have a pretty fair safeguard. I think you might reduce the number of days' notice to two.

The CHAIRMAN—There is a paragraph in 24 which provides for a motion to reconsider and that is the reason why you propose to strike it out of this.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Rule 24 provides that you can reconsider on one day's notice, and my suggestion was that we should insert a paragraph for rescinding in rule 23 that calls for two days' notice, and then, when we take up rule 23, you find among the subjects calling for two days' notice a motion to rescind, and if you are merely reconsidering you could do it with one day; but there is no question if you couple the two together to reconsider and rescind, that would call for a longer notice, but if they were put in separately I imagine that a reconsideration could go this far; to change the form and substance to some extent, but not to reverse. Would it not be better to strike out the seven days and then insert in 23 a paragraph to rescind the motion, and a person inquiring what notice had to be given would find in rule 23 the proper notice to be given for rescinding and he would find in rule 24 the notice for reconsidering.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—But we are losing sight of the fact that a motion to reconsider is necessary before a rescission or an amendment can be made. It is a necessary preliminary step, and, therefore, the motion to reconsider implies the possibility of a rescission or amendment—either one or the other, and rule 24 of course should be made to harmonize with rule 25.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think we should strike out altogether 'for a motion to reconsider' from rule 25.

Hon. Mr. Ellis, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

SECOND READINGS.

THE DIVORCE COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER—I was ready last evening to decide the point of order raised by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, but I neglected to do so before the adjournment. My decision is that the point of order is well taken, under clause 13 of our rules which requires a two day's notice and the motion of the Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer is in consequence out of order.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask if that means that a committee has to obtain leave during a session of the House? I know that unquestionably has been the practice, but I have not found it laid down in the books. As I understand, there is no rule on the subject; it is simply a question of practice.

The SPEAKER—It is the British practice as well as our own.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to call the attention of the Speaker to the entry in the minutes of yesterday's proceedings. It is as follows:

> The Honourable Mr. Kirchhoffer moved, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Perley,
>
> That in view of the pressure of business before the Divorce Committee this Session, and in order to expedite the despatch of that business, the Divorce Committee shall for the remainder of the session, have leave to sit during any sitting of the Senate.
>
> A point of order was raised as to time of publication of notice being too short.
>
> The point of order was held 'en delibéré?'

To-day we have the decision of the Speaker that the point of order was well taken. I claim that the moment the motion was put to the Senate it becomes a question, it disappears as a notice of motion from the Orders of the Day and the clerk had no right to put it back in our minutes and proceedings as a notice of motion to be proposed to-day. The point of order raised by me having been decided to be well taken, the motion falls to the ground ; it exists no more, having been declared out of order. It was put on the orders for Tuesday, brought up in the regular manner, and to-day has been decided out of order. It appears to-day after having undergone a change. I claim that it should no more appear in the proceedings as a notice of motion to be proposed to-day.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—When the question was before the House yesterday, I suggested myself that, under the circumstances, the hon. senator from Brandon should allow the motion to stand so as to give the two day's notice as required and it could be taken up to-day. That suggestion was virtually agreed to, and I presume the clerk came to that conclusion and that is why it appears on the Orders to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was so little understood that way that the motion was put from the Chair yesterday, and now we have the Speaker's decision on my point of order.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The motion was withdrawn on the understanding that the notice should stand for the following day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The motion was not withdrawn, because it was in the hands of the Speaker, and the Speaker has decided to-day that the point of order was well taken. When somebody suggested to let it stand until to-day, I objected, and, as it could only stand by the unanimous consent of the House, the suggestion was not acted upon. I saw the game and did not want it to stand, and I claim that it cannot to-day appear as a notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The hon. gentleman did not object to the proposition that was made. He said he objected on the ground that it would be irregular, not to the resolution standing over till to-day. The motion was not acted on ; there was nothing done, and it stood over till to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The Speaker has given his decision.

The SPEAKER—I do not see anything irregular in the reappearance of the notice to-day, because the matter had not been disposed of. The question is, since the decision has been rendered, can and will the hon. member from Brandon try and avail himself of the appearance of the notice again ? That is another question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is another question altogether. I am not objecting to the hon. member putting in a notice of motion to-day, but I am stating, as a matter of procedure, that the motion which appeared yesterday on the order paper was taken out of the notices of motion. It was put to the House by the Chair, I raised the point of order, and the Speaker took it en delibéré. If it was en delibéré, it was in the hands of the Speaker. The notice of motion is repeated to-day in another form. The word Wednesday appears instead of Tuesday. Supposing the decision had been given yesterday, would the motion have been repeated in the Orders to-day ? I would have the right, in that case, to repeat my objection.

The SPEAKER—I do not see anything irregular in the reappearance of the notice to-day, because the matter had not been disposed of, and could only be disposed of when the decision of the Chair was arrived at. The question is, since the decision has been rendered, can and will the Senator from Brandon (Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer) try to avail himself of the appearance of the notice again ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is another question altogether. I am not objecting to the Senator putting in a motion to-day to do as he likes, but I am stating as a matter of procedure that that motion was taken out of the notices of motion since it was put by the Chair. It was put to this House yesterday.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—While the hon. gentleman from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen) is quite correct that he suggested that it should be allowed to stand as a notice for to-day, it is also true that the member from Stadacona decidedly and emphatically objected. At that stage of the proceeding this was either a notice or it was a question—it could not be both—at the same time. It was a question because it had been proposed from the Chair, and therefore had ceased to be a notice, and it could not therefore stand afterwards.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—In my humble opinion no committee of the Senate has been worked as hard as the committee on divorce. During the past week they have been meeting at ten o'clock every day and trying to get through the work by sitting in the afternoons and evenings. The object of the chairman of the committee was to enable them to get through the work if possible, because there are several witnesses who have been waiting here for three or four days and the committee cannot get time to hear them unless the House will consent to give this opportunity of disposing of the business. Has my hon. friend any particular point to gain by taking objection to the resolution ? It is a mere technicality.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think what has given rise to the objection is the fact that the motion was made too wide. It is hardly proper it seems to me, when we have hardly commenced the session's work that a motion should be made that the Divorce Committee be allowed to sit during the sittings of the Senate for the remainder of the session. I would suggest that motions be made from day to day as the requirements of the business may warrant, and I am sure that no members of the Senate will object. They should appreciate the necessity under which the members of the committee are placed, and they ought to facilitate the disposing of the business ; but for my part I would be against a motion which would be as wide as the one proposed yesterday.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—We are very anxious to sit to-day, and I would ask leave of the House to do so.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I suggest we wait until the Senator from Stadacona is here.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I do not think he is anxious to come back to oppose this at all. I would move the Divorce Committee be allowed to sit during the sittings of this day.

The motion was agreed to.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

AGAIN IN COMMITTEE.

Pursuant to the Order of the Day, the House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of the third report of the special committee appointed during last session to consider and revise, and if deemed necessary to add to the Rules, Orders and Forms of proceedings of the Senate.

(In The Committee.)

The CHAIRMAN—We were at suggestion No. 35 relating to rule 35.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I would move that rule 35 be amended by adding after the word 'rescission' in the ninth line the following :

If a division was taken on what formed the subject matter of the reconsideration or rescission, such reconsideration or rescission must moreover be carried by a larger vote than the one given originally. No discussion of the subject matter of the reconsideration or rescission shall be allowed unless reconsidered. No question shall be twice reconsidered.

I have put in two days instead of seven days, as that has already been agreed upon. I may explain that rule 35 as it stands, provides that the reconsideration shall be voted by a majority of all the senators. I do not suggest any change in this at all, but I do suggest that an additional guarantee be provided. The vote which was taken originally might be a vote larger than the majority of the whole number of senators, and it would be illogical to allow the motion to be reconsidered by a lesser vote than the one which was given originally. That is the reason I suggest that the reconsideration or recission must be carried by a larger vote than the one given originally. This will prevent the motion being rescinded by a smaller vote than was recorded at first. I suggest also that it be not open to discuss the subject matter of the reconsideration on the motion to reconsider. If that motion is carried then the question will be open for discussion. I also provide that the question should not be reconsidered twice. I find this is the rule wherever this practice of reconsidering or rescinding is sanctioned by rules, as in the case of the city of Ottawa, the cities of Montreal, London, Hamilton and other places.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend who has moved this amendment is apparently under the impression that two resolutions would have to be submitted to the House, one for the reconsideration of the question, and after that is carried, the subject would be open, I presume, to debate. Do I understand that is the interpretation placed by my hon. friend on the rule?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I understand the practice is this, that there must be two motions. The first is to reconsider, and, if that motion is carried, then the subject is open to discussion and the resolution may be rescinded or it may be amended, but the first motion is always a motion to reconsider.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out that the rule as it is at present, and as it will continue to be provided the amendments are made, makes provision for the rescission of what has been done by the Senate on a previous occasion. Therefore, if rescission can practically wipe out the action of the Senate on the previous vote, there would practically be nothing to reconsider. If my hon. friend will look at the rule he will find that that will be the effect of a vote. Therefore, if the rescission is to operate in extinguishing what has been done by the Senate, it seems to be a contradiction to say after that we shall reconsider.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The words are used to 'reconsider' or 'rescind,' but I understand it to be always in virtue of this rule that the first motion should be a motion to reconsider, and I think that is what is implied by the wording from the fact that the motion for reconsideration shall not involve the discussion of the merits and that the main question may be discussed only if the reconsideration is carried.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is scarcely necessary to say that it should not be left to implication. As we are now framing those rules we should draft them in such a way as to make them perfectly clear, so that there may be no discussion hereafter as to what they mean. Most difficulties in interpreting rules arise form their ambiguity; consequently we have to imply what they mean. I submit that this rule is so plain that rescission at once operates when the vote is taken and thus extinguishes the act which we seek to rescind.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The difficulty which presents itself to me is this, that according to the explanations of the hon. gentleman who makes this motion, there is to be no discussion upon the question of reconsideration, that the discussion is to take place after the vote has been taken and reconsideration is granted by a majority. Let us be reasonable, and if there is a reason for reconsideration it certainly should be given before the vote is taken, or there may be no reason for reconsideration at all. How are we to know the reasons are good until we hear them? If there is no discussion on the matter there can be no reason why a vote should be taken at all. Some reason should be given to the House why the decision of the majority should be reconsidered.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—I agree with my hon. friend, and the difficulty might be remedied by incorporating in the notice of motion the reason why reconsideration is sought. Then with the notice on the paper we will have two days to think over it. Otherwise we will be called upon to vote without knowing what the question is. Does the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry object to that?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Bourinot, in his practice of public meetings, discusses that question and gives the rules in the city councils of Ottawa, London, Hamilton and other cities. He refers also to the work of Cushing where the matter is treated. The Imperial practice is not to allow the discussion to be reopened on the mere question for reconsideration. In fact the motion for reconsideration is as to whether the subject shall be allowed to be opened again. It is only in extreme cases that it is done, where it is clear that there is a strong ground for reopening the question. It seems to me it is hardly logical to allow the question to be debated on the mere motion as to whether the subject shall be opened up again or not, because what would be the use then of the motion? The motion is for the purpose of deciding whether the subject is to be opened up again or not. We may depend, I think, on the good will of the members of the Senate to allow the member who moved the motion to explain in a few words why he does so; but it would be by sufferance and not as a matter of right, because if it were a matter of right it would lead to abuse. As for the point taken by the hon. senator from Calgary, I see that the draft might be improved and if it were allowed to stand for a few minutes I would try to cover the point he has raised.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I should like the hon. gentleman to explain if there is to be a finality? If the decision of the House is against reconsideration, is that decision to be final, or is there to be another chance given to somebody else a day or two later to move again for reconsideration?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—No, it will be a finality. I have before me Bourinot on public meetings and I find the rule in the Ottawa City Council, which is given as the best rule, reads as follows:

62. After any question, except one of indefinite postponement has been denied, any member may, at the same or at the first meeting held hereafter, move for a reconsideration thereof, but no discussion of the main question shall be allowed unless reconsidered and there shall be no reconsideration given at the meeting at which the main motion is carried, and after such notice is given no return shall be taken by the council on the main motion until such reconsideration is disposed of.

63. If the motion for reconsideration be not made until the next meeting the question shall not be reconsidered unless a majority of the whole council vote therefor. No question shall be reconsidered more than once, nor shall a vote to reconsider be reconsidered.

In London it is practically the same.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not altogether agree with the hon. member from De Salaberry that you cannot proceed to rescind without a previous motion for reconsideration. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the tenth edition of May, pages 286 and 287, he will find that by the British practice they may proceed to rescind without any preliminary motion of reconsideration, and there is no doubt we can do the same thing. It is not very safe to draw from the practice of corporations, because they are not likely to found their practice on true parliamentary principles. It is much safer to draw from English practice. I have no doubt if my hon. friend will turn to the pages in 'May' to which I have referred, he will find that it is possible to move to rescind without previous notice of reconsideration. With regard to the double remedy which he suggests it may be all necessary and right, but it might be a little dangerous to put that through without having time to reflect on it, because it might involve some serious complications. I do not say that I am not in agreement with it, but I have not had an opportunity to think it over. My hon. friend from Beamsville appears not to draw the distinction that this House has drawn between the treatment of Bills in all their different stages and resolutions, or substantive motions. This rule only deals with motions and resolutions and orders of the House. It does not deal with the clauses of a Bill, as to which we have given full power of reconsideration. But I do not see why we should not have pretty nearly the same freedom of dealing with a substantial motion as with the clauses of a Bill.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—As far as I am concerned, I have no objection to limit it, if it is the desire of the House, to the rescission itself. It will leave out reconsideration altogether. It would simplify the wording of the resolution.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I would not take that as an improvement on the amendment of the hon. gentleman. On the contrary it would make matters worse. While there is no doubt whatever that we can move directly for a rescission of any motion, still the other way is the one more generally adopted. A motion for reconsideration is equivalent to a motion establishing the principle of a Bill—That is before introducing a Bill or some very important question, as a rule, a motion is made introducing the principle of the Bill so as to feel whether the majority of the Senate is in favour of it. A motion of reconsideration would be something equivalent to that. This would be proposed without discussion, except that the mover might be allowed to offer some explanation, and then the House can, without reopening the whole question, vote yea or no. If the principle is rejected, or if the motion for reconsideration is negatived, then it is done with. If the motion or if the principle is admitted, then the whole question is reopened. Therefore I would not favour the last suggestion of the hon. member that his amendment apply only to the rescission.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The hon. member from Marshfield said the House had come to a conclusion that so far as this rule applied there would be no reconsideration in regard to a Bill, because that is already laid down by me. The proposition that struck me was the reference made by the hon. member for De Salaberry to the rules of city councils. Any one of us who takes an interest in civic affairs will agree that liberty given to city councils is dangerous to the public interest. A resolution to do a certain thing, apart from a Bill altogether—to purchase a certain article or do a certain thing in the interest of the city is carried to-night. Before the next meeting of the council new light and new influences are brought to bear on the members of the council and they rescind the vote adopted at the previous meeting. If this rule is good for Bills, why should it not be good for motions also ? Surely if this House learned that a mistake had been made, or that an improvement could be affected in anything adopted by the House, I am sure that nobody would object to any effort made to correct an error ; but to have a rule of this kind in the House would unsettle the public business. We have discussed this question before, and we are discussing it this afternoon, and the more it is discussed the more apparent it is that if the principle be adopted, it will render the work of the Senate insecure. No one will be satisfied that a resolution which has received the assent of the House cannot be rescinded at a later sitting, if a few members can be talked over and induced to see the subject in a different light.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand the amendment of the hon. member from De Salaberry to give two means of reconsideration ? If I read it correctly, if a greater number of senators vote for a reconsideration than were recorded in favour of the original motion, that would be sufficient for a reconsideration.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It must also comprise a majority of the whole Senate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not so read it. Then provision is made for a majority of the whole Senate, which would be over 40. Does that majority apply under this proposed amendment in both cases ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then if a larger number than a majority will vote for the original proposition, there must not only be a majority of the whole Senate but a majority of those who voted for it, in order to affect the reconsideration. Would that be the effect of this motion ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes it would.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I have no objection to adopting the rule with two little amendments. I have no hesitation in saying that if I am shown to-day that I gave a bad vote yesterday, I am willing to reconsider it ; but we ought to act in this House as we do before the courts, where a party who moves to rescind, must give the reason for doing so. In that way your adversary knows what is coming up. So when I see a motion to reconsider I want to know why it is offered. I like to have in the notice the reason for asking for reconsideration. As the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry has consented to put in two days' notice only, with these two amendments I shall support the motion which has been made.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I think the hon. gentleman from Marshfield cited 'May'. I have not the book beside me, but I think I remember the British rule. If my memory is correct, in England both means are used, the motion to reconsider and the motion to rescind. There is a difference between the two, and that is the reason why both are employed, according to circumstance. Sometimes it may be necessary or expedient to move for reconsideration, the effect of which is only to put the question where it was before, to reopen the question so it may be amended as desired. It is not necessary to rescind the original motion. But in certain circumstances it may be preferable to rescind the original motion and then a motion to rescind is moved. The effect of that is to annul completely the previous vote. This shows that it is important and expedient to preserve both means as is done in England.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I think the whole trouble arises from trying to include the two words reconsideration and rescission in one paragraph. On a former occasion, by motion of the hon. gentleman from Beamsville, we struck out rules 32, 33 and 34 which dealt, I think, very explicitly with the subject of reconsideration. These rules are complete in themselves. Then in rule 35 comes 'rescinding'. The two things are separate, I am a young member of the House and do not wish to put forward my opinion very much, but I think if the rules which have been struck out were retained the matter would be in much better shape.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I have now the volume of 'May' and would cite what is stated there at page 287 in support of my opinion.

> Sometimes the House may not be prepared to rescind a resolution, but may be willing to modify its judgment, by considering and agreeing to another resolution relating to the same subject.

In this case a motion to reconsider would be necessary because the object of the mover would not be to rescind but merely to change or modify; but if the intention is to abrogate and annul he makes a motion to rescind.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I agree with the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island who spoke just now. Under the British practice there is no such thing as reconsideration, and I think the special committee appointed to revise the rules had that in mind, and they thought it was desirable that there should be such a thing as reconsideration. They accordingly inserted rules 32, 33, 34, which provided for reasonable restrictions to the right of reconsidering; restrictions which have been found useful in other legislatures. The hon. gentleman from Beamsville moved that these three rules should be stricken out, and that was the decision of the House at the time; but I submit that the discussion which we are having now goes to prove that in striking out these rules the Committee of the Whole made a mistake. These two things, reconsidering, and rescinding, are totally separate and distinct. In England they have rescission without any special safeguard, and in the United States, as has been pointed out, and in various municipal bodies they have reconsideration. I do not think there would be any great risk in adopting these three rules. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Beamsville that it would not be desirable that there should be any prolonged uncertainty as to the decision of this House upon any matter. But under rule 32 the notice to reconsider must be given on the same day when the resolution which is to be reconsidered is passed. That reconsideration must be disposed of at the next meeting of the House; so that there is at most a delay of one day. It is unnecessary to go into a discussion on the general principle—every hon. gentleman must realize that sometimes resolutions are passed here in a thin House, or without due consideration, and it is only fair and reasonable that there should be an opportunity to reconsider these decisions. The hon. gentleman from Beamsville is opposed to reconsideration, but I notice that he himself moved to reconsider the action of the committee. These three rules were adopted by the committee on Wednesday, I think, and on the next day the hon. gentleman moved practically that they be reconsidered and his motion was adopted. I think he could not ask for a better illustration of the value of reconsideration than his own experience in this matter. I do not raise any question as to the value of the amendments proposed by the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry to rule 35; but I think it would be less liable to lead to confusion if rule 35 were allowed to remain as it was with draft, and rules 32, 33 and 34, were reinserted; and I have the honour to move in amendment that rule 35 remain as it was in the draft, and that rules 32, 33 and 34 be reinserted.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—If the House will allow me, I should like to amend my motion in order to avoid the difficulty pointed out by the hon. gentleman from Calgary, by leaving out this paragraph:

> No discussion of the subject matter of the reconsideration of rescission shall be allowed unless reconsidered.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I think we had better first decide what we will do about rules 32, 33, and 34.

The CHAIRMAN—There is a motion to adopt rule 35 with amendments, suggested by the hon. gentleman from de Salaberry. The hon. gentleman from Halifax has moved a resolution, in amendment, to retain rule 35 as in the original draft and to restore rules 32, 33 and 34.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It cannot be an amendment to move that a resolution stand as it is. That would be simply a negative vote. All you have to do is to vote against this amendment. If the hon. gentleman desires to reinstate the other rules to which he has referred, that should be the subject of a separate motion. The amendment which he has proposed is no amendment at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would suggest that we strike out rule 35 altogether and fall back upon British practice. The more we go into this matter the more difficulty we find in adopting any rule which would really be efficient.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As to the question of order, I do not think that the point is well taken. The position we are in now is this: rules 32, 33 and 34, which relate to reconsideration, have been stricken out. Rule 35, which originally dealt with rescission alone, remains. I think an amendment has been adopted by which the words 'to reconsider' were introduced into rule 35. Now the main motion is the motion of the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry to make certain additions to rule 35 in order to make that rule deal with both rescission and reconsideration. My appeal to the House is that that will lead to confusion and that the better way to settle the question is to pass these four rules as they were in the draft. I contend that my amendment is quite germane to the motion, and that the motion and the amendment could not stand together; and these facts constitute an amendment.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—In answer to the suggestion made by the senator from Marshfield, I may say that the other day I moved an amendment to rule 35 for the purpose of trying to conciliate the two opinions which have been manifested in the House, but I have no special desire to insist on either of these rules.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would move as an amendment to the amendment that rule 35 be struck out.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a question of order. The main motion is not the motion of the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry, but the motion for the adoption of the rules. The hon. gentleman from De Salaberry comes in with an amendment, and the hon. gentleman from Halifax with a sub-amendment. We should dispose of that first and if it is lost the hon. gentleman from Marshfield may come in with another sub-amendment.

The CHAIRMAN—As I understand, rule 35 was an amendment by the committee, and therefore has been adopted. It appears to me that the main motion before the committee is the resolution offered by the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If rule 35 was passed as amendment, certainly a motion to amend the rule as amendment cannot be a substantive motion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Rule 35, it appears to me, has been adopted; and the main motion is not to adopt that rule; it is to amend it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The main motion is for the adoption of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN—Rule 35 was agreed to with an amendment in the original meeting of the committee, and was so reported to the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will cite a similar case. When a Bill is referred back to the committee to be amended is the amendment a main motion? In my opinion it is an amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There can be no question that a motion to leave the rule as it is is not an amendment. I am speaking of the motion made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. He moves to leave rule 35 as it is, and then he adds some other provisions to reinstate other rules which have nothing whatever to do with the matter.

The SPEAKER—I think that the motion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax may properly be regarded as a sub-amendment to the main motion. He moves in effect in amendment that the original clause, without the changes which were made in it, be reinserted. Then he adds two previous clauses. If he were to put his motion in writing it would be seen to be really an amendment. His desire is to revert to the original rule 35 and to have two previous rules, which are not now in the draft, reinserted.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—As the case stands now, the chairman has ruled that the main motion is that of the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry. I would call attention to the fact that we are in Committee of the Whole, and we are considering the rule clause by clause. I submit the amendment offered by the hon. gentleman from Halifax is not in order inasmuch as he deals with two or three rules at once. The procedure is that we must deal in committee with one question at a time. We are dealing with one subject now. Let us finish that and afterwards take up the question of reinserting rule 32. In the meantime I think the proper course is to deal with rule 35, and any amendments made thereto.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If rule 35 were before the committee in its original form, in which it dealt solely with the question of rescission, then the point of order of the hon. gentleman from Killarney would perhaps be well taken. But that is not the case. We have before us now a rule which deals with both rescission and reconsideration; so that it is perfectly in order to move in lieu of that rule, which deals with both these subjects, three paragraphs—they need not be called rules—which deal with both and, as I contend, deal with them in a better manner than does the amendment of the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Rule 35 stands to-day in precisely the same position that the original draft of 35 stood before it was amended, when it came before the Committee of Revision. It came to us including certain provisions: It was amended; the original draft then was of no effect whatever, and the rule, as it stands before us now, is in precisely the same position as was the original clause when it was before the committee, and consequently should be treated in the same way. In looking at the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, I see he uses the words 'in the draft.' If the hon. gentleman had said in the original draft as presented to the Senate, it would have been plainer to my mind. What we have before us in that amendment is simply a proposition to revert to the original draft of rules 32, 33, 34 and 35 as they were before the Committee of Revision, before being struck out on the motion of the hon. gentleman from Beamsville. If we carry the amendment of the hon. member from Halifax—it is declared to be an amendment—we are reinstating the rules that we, by a large majority have struck out. That is really what the hon. senator from Halifax proposes. It is much better to leave rule 35 as it is than to do that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the point of order has been accurately stated from the Chair. The whole question came up on a notice of motion. When it was reached, I declined to make that motion and the hon. member from De Salaberry moved it and that is the main motion. The hon. member from Halifax could then move that the clause stand as it originally came from the committee, but he could not include two or three other clauses that had been struck out, because the point raised by the hon. senator from Killarney was well taken. After carrying his point it would be quite open for him to move in detail that the three clauses be restored. If the motion of the hon. member from Halifax is to restore clause 35 exactly as it was passed by the committee, I think his motion would be in order, and it would be an amendment, but not to embrace two or three other clauses which we could not do as we must discuss the question clause by clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—On the question of order, I must differ from the hon. senator from Marshfield. The rules were adopted by this House. My hon. friend from Marshfield gave notice of an amendment to this rule to which we are now referring. Instead of moving his amendment he relegated the duty to the hon. senator from De Salaberry who moved it or, in other words, that which was proposed by the hon. senator from Marshfield, and consequently it cannot be an original motion.

The CHAIRMAN—Still I hold it is. If I had to put a question to the committee, if there had been another amendment, it would be, shall the resolution proposed by the hon. senator from De Salaberry be adopted? Therefore it is a main motion.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think the hon. senator from Halifax is correct. Rules 32, 33, and 34 have been wiped out. This motion in effect, instead of amending rule 35 as I moved that it be amended, proposes to adopt the whole four rules 32, 33, 34 and 35 and restore the report as it stood before. I think his motion is in order. It can be the subject of an amendment. It is true he asked that rules 32, 33 and 34 be reinstated. That may be irregular, but if he makes his motion that rule 35 be made to read as 32, 33, 34 and 35 were originally printed, his motion is in order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I share the opinion of the hon. member. I think the motion made by the hon. member from Halifax is quite in order. The chairman of a committee, when he deals with a Bill, takes it clause by clause, and the main motion for each clause is this—'shall this clause stand part of the Bill'? Each clause of the Bill is proposed in that way, and if anybody does not want any clause to stand part of the Bill he moves an amendment. Notices of amendments have been given by the hon. senator from Marshfield to the report of the committee. He has abandoned his right to move one of the amendments and given that right to the hon. senator from De Salaberry. Does that change the nature of the amendment? Not at all. It is as much an amendment as if the hon. gentleman had moved it himself. The hon. member from De Salaberry moved in amendment that the original clauses be changed, and the word 'reconsider' inserted. That amendment was carried, and the clauses as amended was adopted, but notice of new amendments was given. The motion made by the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry is really an amendment—it amends. The motion brought in afterwards by the hon. senator from Halifax is an amendment to the amendment, so I think the hon. gentleman from Marshfield has no right to bring in another sub-amendment until the House has decided upon the amendment to the amendment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the hon. gentleman from Marshfield or the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry had not moved this motion what would have been the result as to clause 35? There would have been no motion before the Chair.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, because it had already been adopted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then it is a main motion.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. member from Stadacona loses sight of the fact that that clause was adopted by the committee before. His reasoning would be all right if we were in committee for the first time on the Bill. The motion would be that rule 35 be adopted, and then his reasoning would apply; but when this came before the Committee of the Whole, in the first instance, this motion was disposed of, and now when we go again into committee for the second time, there is no such motion as he suggests. We have before us clause 35, which was reported to the House as having been adopted, and the only motion before the Chair which is a substantive motion is mine, that rule 35 be amended.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I answer to that, it is really a reconsideration. That was referred back to the committee to be considered, and, more than that, the hon. member from Marshfield gave his motion in these words:

> That when the third report of the Special Committee appointed during last session to consider and revise and if deemed necessary, to add to the Rules, Orders and Forms of Proceeding of the Senate is under consideration of the Committee of the Whole House, he will move the following amendments, viz.:

Then he cites them all. My hon. friend steps in, takes one of his amendments and moves it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would hesitate about shivering a lance with the hon. senator from Stadacona on a point of order. We all know he is expert and accurate, but I think he has missed the point in this case. When a Bill goes to committee in the first instance, the motion that any clause stand is the main motion, but the amendment when it is sent back for reconsideration has precisely the same status that the clause itself had in the first instance, and the motion to amend it is the main motion. I agree with the hon. gentleman that the motion of the hon. senator from De Salaberry has no different status from what mine would have had if I moved it. It became the main motion, because it was for the purpose of making that change that we came back to Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The House ought to accept the decision of the chairman which agreed entirely with the view of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield that the amendment was a motion, and that the amendment moved by the hon. senator from Halifax was an amendment to that motion, and then the amendment to the amendment of the hon. member from Marshfield was properly in order. The question is whether the House is prepared to uphold the Chair.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to appeal from the decision of the Chairman; but as to this question of order, after some hesitation, I have come to the conclusion that the hon. member from Stadacona is right. The position was this: the hon. gentleman very properly compared these rules to the clause of a Bill. This rule 35 is before us in its amended form, just as though it was the original clause of a Bill, and the hon. gentleman from Marshfield gave notice that he would move an amendment to that. Consequently his motion, if he had made it, would have been an amendment to that rule standing part of the body of rules, and the resolution which the honourable senator from De Salaberry moved in place of that, which the hon. gentleman gave notice of, is just in the same position. It is an amendment to a motion that the rule adopted the other day be passed. Consequently my amendment was a sub-amendment.

The CHAIRMAN—According to my view there are three propositions before the committee—the propositions of the hon. member from De Salaberry, of the hon. member from Halifax and the hon. member from Marshfield. I accept the three.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The motion we are to vote on is to wipe out the rule altogether.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Before we proceed to strike out rule 35, if we strike out that rule with rules 32, 33 and 34, we have then in the rules no provision for reconsideration or rescinding. We shall then have to fall back on British practice.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—That is all right.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Is there any reason why we should have no rule providing for these important subjects? We have rules for every other purpose for the working of this House, but under these circumstances we will have no rule for reconsideration or rescinding. The extra printing will cost very little, and I think we ought to have rules on these two subjects as well as on all others.

The committee divided on the amendment to the amendment which was adopted, contents, 20; non-contents, 8.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—In my remarks, I said that the hon. member from Marshfield had cited 'May' to show there were two ways of proceeding. I think the hon. gentleman did not go as far as that. I confused 'May' with 'Cushing,' and, as the hon. gentleman from Halifax has said, in the British House they admit reconsideration in different ways, but not directly.

The SPEAKER—Did we strike out of clause 24, which speaks of motions which need one day's notice, the provision for reconsideration?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No it remains.

Hon. Mr. POWER—How can you have a notice for something which we have not in our procedure.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It simply qualifies the English practice to that extent.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no reconsideration recognized by English practice. It is improper to retain a provision to reconsider.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Our rules provide for a reconsideration of Bills at every stage.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But you do not require any notice to reconsider Bills. It would cause the greatest inconvience if clauses of Bills could not be reconsidered in Committee of the Whole without notice. I move that these words in rule 24 be struck out—'For a motion to reconsider'.

The SPEAKER—What have we in these rules similar to rule 43 of our present rules? 'A senator may, at any time before a Bill has passed move for the reconsideration of any clause thereof already passed.'

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Did not the hon. member from Marshfield move an amendment to clause 25 the other day that without notice a clause of a Bill may be reconsidered in committee?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, but if you turn to rule 70 in this report you find the following:

A senator may, at any time before a Bill is passed, move for the reconsideration of any clause thereof already passed.

That is, with the Speaker in the Chair. There is only one thing remaining, that is the assurance that there would be some addition to the interpretation clause.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I think these words 'for a motion to reconsider' should be struck out of clause 24, because we have in rules 70 and 25 provision for the reconsideration of Bills without any notice whatever, and this would be confusing. It would indicate that notice would be required. Clauses 32, 33, 34, 35, being struck out, we no longer require that paragraph in rule 24.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, because in rule 70 we have power to reconsider clause of the Bill at any time, but we must give 24 hours notice of it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It says a senator may at any time move to reconsider.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But it does not say he may do it without notice.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If it is intended by rule 70 that the present practice shall be varied, it should be stated that one day's notice is required.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think clause 24 should be struck out.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If it is the sense of the House that these words in rule 24 should stand and refer to rule 70, we would have something clear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is their only use. They are no use except to operate rule 70.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Then it would be better to amend rule 70 and drop 24.

The committee divided on the amendment to strike out the words 'for a motion to reconsider' in rule 24, which was adopted. Contents 21, non-centents, not counted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have drafted an amendment to be inserted immediately before the definition of 'special committee' in rule 4. It is as follows:—

> Standing committee, a select committee appointed each session for the consideration during that session, of a certain class of matters relating to the business of the session.

That wording is taken from the English book of practice of the House of Commons, and it is substantially the same as the language used in 'Bourinot' and 'Cushing'. The hon. gentleman from De Salaberry has suggested that the definition may be shortened. I do not remember exactly the language of the amendment which he suggested, but I have no objection to accepting his amendment if it is acceptable to the committee, instead of the one I have drafted.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I suggest this instead of the hon. gentleman's amendment—'Standing committee.' 'A select committee appointed for the session.' My reason for it is, according to our practice we have standing committees such as the debates and restaurant. Such committees are not for a class of subjects, but are limited each to one subject; therefore it would not come within the definition of a certain class of matters relating to the business of the session. That is why I recommend this shorter form.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—That means a committee whose existence will be for the whole session.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Would it not be much more simple and convenient to say exactly what committees we have. We have only two sorts of committee, the permanent and the special. Why not confine ourselves to those two words. What is the use of saying 'select'? They are either permanent or not permanent.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I had in mind suggesting that we have as a definition simply 'standing committee', embracing less than the whole number of senators appointed for the session, and 'special committee,' a committee to consider a special subject, but it would necessitate changing several of the rules where the words select committee have been used, and I think it is better to follow the suggestion of the hon. senator from Halifax, merely defining what is a standing committee.

The amendment of Senator Beique was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I wish to call attention to the phraseology of rule 89, I think it should read:

> No senator, who has any pecuniary interest whatsoever not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown in the inquiry to be entrusted to any committee, shall sit on such committee.

and so on. It is merely a matter of grammar. The 'who' might be taken to refer to the committee as it stands at present.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE — This shows the importance of having our rules correctly rendered in both languages. It is somewhat difficult for one like myself, who is not very familiar with the English language, to catch the exact meaning. If the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry is correct, it shows how important it is that we should have an exact translation of the rules in French and before completing this work I think we should name another committee, to compare the two versions, French and English, and see that they convey exactly the same meaning.

The motion to amend rule 89 was agreed to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I wish to call attention to rule 58 and rule 89. In these rules there is no provision to prevent a senator who has a direct pecuniary interest from taking part in a discussion of a question arising in connection with a Bill which comes up from the House of Commons amended, it may be, at the instance of the senator who is directly and pecuniarily interested in the amendments which are made.

While the rules prevent him from sitting on the committee of inquiry in the Senate, and prevent him from voting on such questions, if a Bill in which a senator is directly and pecuniarily interested is sent from the Senate to the House of Commons and comes back to us in a manner which would affect that senator, there is nothing to prevent him from taking part in the discussion on that amendment in Committee of the Whole. Under rule 138, a private Bill returned to the Senate with important amendments made in the Commons, presumably at the instance of the senator interested in the same, can be referred to a committee of the whole here, and there is no provision in the rules to prevent such a senator from sitting in the inquiry before such committee. Rule 89 only provides that such a senator shall not sit on a select committee in such case, and rule 58 prevents him from voting upon a question in which he is directly interested. I think it would be well to make a provision that would prevent the possibility of a senator interested from taking part either in Committee of the Whole on an amended Bill such as I have indicated, or in any other way. I would suggest that rules 58 and 89 be both struck out and that a clause somewhat of the following nature be substituted:

> No senator shall take part in a proceeding nor vote upon an inquiry into any question, Bill, or matter before the Senate, or any committee thereof, in which he has any pecuniary interest whatsoever, not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown. Upon such a question of interest arising it shall be determined forthwith, and the vote of any senator so interested shall be disallowed.

That embraces the principle involved in both rules 58 and 89, and also provides for the omission which, I am sure, was unintentional, in the case of an amended Bill coming from the Commons.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Rule 89, I think, goes quite far enough as far as the committee is concerned. Rule 58 deals with the Senate at large, under all circumstances. Now the hon. gentleman proposes that senators shall not be allowed to take any part in the House or in the Committee of the Whole in the discussion of a measure of that kind. I do not suppose that hon. gentlemen would want to do so, as a rule. If they were directly interested they ought not; but it would be an awkward thing if we were sitting here as a House and a matter were to come up in which some member was interested, say as the director of a bank, or president of an insurance company. He would really be obliged to leave the Chamber, and I think that would be rather an extreme measure. Since we do not allow him to vote on the question I consider that should be sufficient. After all, the capitalists throughout the country who are interested in these great undertakings should, I think, have a right in the House to defend their interests, even though they are not allowed to vote. They should have a right to make as good a case as they can for the interests they represent. I think the proposed amendment would be a very sweeping provision, and that it would lead to unpleasant consequences.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not propose to delay the committee by pressing the idea which is embodied in this resolution. The objection taken by the hon. gentleman from Halifax is not pertinent, if he will permit me to say so. The rules distinctly provide that any senator or member of the House of Commons can vote upon or discuss any question in which, with other subjects of His Majesty, he is interested. That provision was made in the Independance of Parliament Act to cover the very cases to which he refers. A gentleman holding stock in a bank, or a director, has a right to discuss and to vote upon any question coming up affecting that monetary institution for the reason that his interest is held in common with other subjects of His Majesty. There is no doubt about that. If the restriction proposed by myself in that motion went as far as the hon. gentleman from Halifax indicates, it would cut out nine-tenths of the members of the Senate, and, perhaps, more. There are very few of us who do not hold stock in some incorporated institution. It never was intended, nor do these rules contemplate, that a shareholder in a bank or insurance company or in any incorporated company which seeks powers from parliament, should be prevented from voting, provided the interest which he holds is held in common with other subjects of His Majesty. The intention is to meet cases where a senator or member of parliament has an individual pecuniary interest in a measure before parliament not held in common with His Majesty's subjects.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I notice that under rule 58, which deals with a senator voting in the House, he is not debarred from participating in any discussion or debate, but simply from voting. Now, when you come to rule 89 and deal with it, he cannot even sit upon the committtee. Why have we not a uniform practice ? If it is wrong for him to sit on the committee it must be wrong for him to sit in the House. If it is right for him to sit in the House and discuss the matter, he should have the right to sit in the committee.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think the proper thing would be to debar members of this House from either taking part in the debate or voting under such circumstances. The wording which should be adopted ought not to debar them from remaining in the House, but they should not take part in the discussion because they have a pecuniary interest. Other people who are interested are not allowed to come in here, and it would be giving the senators in question an advantage, and opening the door for influencing some of their colleagues by their taking part in the discussion. I think the more dignified procedure would be to debar them both in the House and in the committee from either taking part or voting. Rule 89, which we have adopted, debars them from sitting in the committee, therefore it debars a senator from taking part in the discussion and voting, because he has no right to a seat in the committee. As far as rule 58 is concerned, all that would be required would be simply to add the words—' No senator is entitled to take part in the debate or vote upon any question ', etc.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I had occasion a few minutes ago to speak on the subject of the translation of these rules. It may be that I am not sufficiently familiar with the English language; my impression is that sitting in the committee does not mean to be able to sit in the room. It means that the senator is not a member of the committee, but he may sit in the committee room. A member can sit in the House without having the right to vote. For the time he will be simply availing himself of the privilege of sitting in the Chamber, but he is not sitting as a member of the House, and therefore, I do not see why we should change that rule.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Rule 58 is our present rule 31, which we have had for a great many years, with certain modifications to which I think the attention of the committee should be directed. Our present rule 31 is as follows :

> No senator is entitled to vote upon any question in which he has a direct pecuniary interest ; and the vote of any senator so interested will be disallowed.

The committee thought that that provision was not sufficiently stringent, and they changed it to apply to any senator having any pecuniary interest whatsoever. Reading the rule that way, it is clear that any director of a bank or director of an insurance company or of any other commercial company, or even a shareholder has a pecuniary interest not held in common with the other Canadian subjects of the Crown. I think it would be going a very long distance to say that that senator if a question comes up in which his company is interested, shall not be allowed to express an opinion about it. That would be going too far altogether, and I think it would be an exceedingly unreasonable restriction. Every Canadian citizen who happens to be a member of either House should have the right, if an attack is made upon an organization of which he is a member, to defend that organization.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I venture to submit this question of constitutional law, can we prevent a senator, who is appointed under the British North America Act, from speaking in this deliberative assembly upon any question before us? We certainly could not exclude him by rule. In my judgment we could not prevent him from speaking on any question, whether he is interested or not. This is a deliberative assembly and there are certain rights of speech which, under the constitution every member of parliament is entitled to; and to say that because he may possess a scintilla of interest in the form of stock or shares or bonds he shall not take part in the deliberations of parliament, is something which I do not think can be determined by the rules of this House.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The hon. gentleman covered the ground which I intended to take. I think it would be enacting legislation which would deprive a member of this assembly of something that the ordinary citizen has the right to do in the committee. There is not a joint stock company of any kind or a private individual who is not a member of this House, who cannot appear before a committee, and with the consent of the committee defend his rights as to the application he is making and the legislation he is seeking. I thoroughly believe in the principle that any one interested in any business matter that requires legislation, should not be allowed to vote upon it, but to deprive him of the right to discuss it, you may perhaps deprive the only man who can give a reasonable explanation of the reasons he has for seeking legislation, or meeting an attack, of an opportunity of expressing his views or giving an explanation. You deprive the man most directly interested above all others in the legislation of this right simply because he happens to be a member of this House. There is no doubt as to the position of a member of a joint stock company, but the aim of the hon. member from Belleville is directed against the individual rather than against the company, and I say in that case it is doubly severe.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Then I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. No member of this House should be deprived of the right to advocate or defend any measure coming before this House, whether he is interested in it or not. Where he has a monetary interest in anything he has no right to vote in this House or in the committee.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman's argument is not a good one, and for this reason; the power to speak and argue is much more dangerous than the power of voting. The fact that a member of parliament, who is interested in a Bill, is deprived of the right of speaking in defence of it, does not put him in any worse position than any other person in Canada, who is not a member of parliament, who happens to be interested in the same way in a Bill. There is no reason why a member of parliament should be given an advantage over a citizen who is not a member regarding a Bill in which he has pecuniary interest. Any one who contends that a member, who is interested in a measure should not have the right to vote upon it, ought to go further and say that he has no right to urge his personal interest in parliament. Supposing some gentleman outside of parliament is interested in the same measure on the opposite side, is it reasonable that he should be put at a disadvantage which does not apply to a member of parliament? He has no right to speak, but his opponent in the House would have a right to speak and influence his brother members. This subject was up twice before, and was very thoroughly discussed. The desire there was to go further than is now suggested in order to reach members who had any interest whatever, but it was found you could not go that far without disqualifying nearly every member of parliament, because nearly all are interested as stockholders in companies of one kind or another. After full consideration, and the exercise of the greatest care —and the hon. member from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr), the hon. member from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) and other members gave it a great deal of consideration—the principle was adopted which is now found in rules 58 and 89. I am thoroughly in accord with the resolution which has been moved by the hon. senator from Belleville, because I think it has this advantage: It is clearer than the others, and it comprises all the law in one rule, which is shorter I think than one of them, and not very much longer than the other. There is no necessity for having the two rules, and I do not think a rule could be made which covers the ground better than that which has been moved by the hon. senator from Belleville.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am astonished at my hon. friend's argument. He is usually clear and logical, but he is illogical now when he asks why should a member of this House have a privilege which is not granted to any one outside of it. The humblest subject of His Majesty can come before any committee, and, with the consent of the House, has a right to speak on a subject in which he is interested. It is true he cannot speak in this House, but in the committee of this House he has a right, which my hon. friend wants to deny to members of the Senate. It is a most illogical position to take, that you will allow anybody outside to advocate a measure in committee but because a member of this House happens to be interested in a measure he cannot advocate it in the House of which he is a member or in any of its committees. It is a most unfair rule to lay down. We are led to believe by my hon. friend from Marshfield that all the wisdom of the Senate is in the select committee who had these rules under consideration; that nobody else has any right now to make any suggestions whatever; that everything was so carefully considered that the report of the committee does not require any revision whatever, and yet only the other day he said that he was permitted during the recess, having so much time on his hands, to go over the whole work he had himself done, and to which he had been a party, and prepare a long list of changes which he wishes to make to improve the slip shod work done by the committee. He asks the House to say that because a member may have some monetary interest in the legislation before this House that he should be deprived of the privilege of advocating it either in this Chamber or before any of our committees.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me the hon. gentleman is fighting a shadow. There is no such proposition in the motion I have made.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I did not say the hon. gentleman made that proposition; I spoke of the proposition laid down by the hon. Senator from Marshfield.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In the first place, replying to the hon. gentleman from Halifax, I may say the motion has no reference whatever to shareholders in banks or companies. The right of members has been recognized for years, arising out of difficulties in the House of Commons a number of years ago. The only proposition in this resolution of mine is that you recognize a certain principle set forth in rules 58 and 89. That principle is to prevent interested senators from taking action under certain circumstances; but there is no clause to carry out the provisions of rules 58 and 89 in the cases to which I have referred, that is when a Bill has been amended in the House of Commons and sent back to the Senate and the Senate refers that to a Committee of the Whole. What I propose is this, that when a circumstance of that kind arises, the principles which are involved in clauses 58 and 89 shall apply to the Committee of the Whole of this House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The rule does apply.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no provision at all except to prevent a man, on general principles, from voting, and that is all I propose to do. The point raised by the hon. senator from Killarney was this: If a member has no right to sit in a committee and take part in the consideration of a subject in which he is interested, if this motion was carried he would have no right to sit in the Senate. My proposition is to repeal both 58 and 89 and embody the principles contained in these clauses in this resolution, only I make them apply to a Committee of the Whole in this House. If the Senate wish to simplify the rules in that way, I desire to go no further, or to take any further right from any member of the Senate to discuss any matter than that of which he is deprived of by the two clauses to which I refer.

There is no intention whatever to carry the idea to the extent that my hon. friend from Beamsville (Hon. Mr. Gibson) supposes, because, as I have already said, that would shut out from this Chamber about nine-tenths of its members.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The exception which I take to the amendment just moved is the language which implies that no member shall take part in proceedings relating to any question or Bill in which he has a monetary interest. Now that clearly precludes any member who may have either a direct or an indirect interest from participating in the discussion either in the Committee of the Whole, or to the limited extent indicated. It certainly is the constitutional privilege of every member to discuss any matter which may come before parliament. That right cannot be taken away from him. This chamber can certainly regulate debate. It may say to what extent one may participate in a discussion, but to say that a particular member shall have no right to take part in the proceedings by use of speech, is certainly an invasion of those rights given to every member under the constitution.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You do that in rule 89.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have not had time to look into it, but I would refer hon. gentleman to 'May' in which this matter is very fully discussed, 'privilege of freedom of speech', in which it is laid down that even the King could not suppress the right of a member of parliament to express himself on any subject coming before parliament. The subject is certainly worth looking into, lest it be an invasion of the privileges and usages of parliament, which have been the right of a member of parliament from time immemorial. I would say that the language employed in the rules is susceptible of very mischievous construction —'not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown'. They may be susceptible of this construction, that a member having, say, an interest in bank or railway stock, not held by every other Canadian subject, would be precluded from participating in a discussion or in a vote on measures coming before the Senate relating to such companies. Now if it had been said 'which may be held' that would be better. That was the object we had in view; that is to say, any gentlemen holding bank stock would have a right to take part in the discussion of a subject relating to banking, although that bank stock is not held by the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown. That rule should certainly be amended. The same term is employed in rule 89 and it should be made to read 'which may be held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown'.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This has been the rule for years.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Rule 89 deals with proceedings before select committees. It is better to have all the rules dealing with those matters put together under the heading of committees. The question is chiefly with respect to rule 58, because, as to rule 89, the matter is settled I think in accordance with the views of the hon. member from Belleville. But as to rule 58; as it now stands no senator is allowed to vote upon any question in which he has any pecuniary interest whatsoever. This amendment will say that no senator shall take part in the proceedings of, nor vote upon any inquiry, &c. That precludes members having any pecuniary interest whatsoever from discussing before this House or its committees a matter in which they are interested. I certainly think this is an exceedingly tyrannical and, as I take it, unconstitutional proceeding. I agree with the hon. senator from Calgary there. I doubt if any such enactment will be found with respect to any legislature in the world. I may say that these remarks of mine are entirely disinterested, as I do not hold any stock in any company incorporated by this parliament.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not desire to press this motion. The only question that I brought before the Senate is whether you should apply the same rules to a committee of the whole that you apply to a select committee of this House. I am not particularly wedded to it. The words to which the hon. member from Calgary has taken exception he will find in the Independence of Parliament Act and the interpretation which has been given to those words is not that which has been put upon them by my hon. friend. They have been interpreted as not applying to stockholders in any company whatever, the stock of which can be held by any other citizens.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is easy to meet the view of my hon. friend by striking out the word 'select' in rule 89.

The CHAIRMAN—That clause now, as amended by the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry, refers to all committees.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—With the consent of the committee, I withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was withdrawn.

On clause 99,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I may state that I attended at the other House to-day to see the clerk with respect to this question as to altering rule 99, and I happened to go into his office when the committee which is engaged in revising the rules of the House of Commons was sitting. The clerk told me that he had no reason to suppose that any change would be made with respect to the communications between the two Houses, and he recognized the fact that a mistake had been made when the letter was sent to some officer of this House asking him to give some information. He recognized the fact that communications between the two Houses should always be in the shape of messages, so that there is no necessity for altering our rules. The Commons do not propose to alter theirs.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—And you found them identical ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The message, the clerk told me, had been prepared, and he thought it had been received here already. I therefore move that clause 99 stand unchanged. We adopted last year a standing order with resepct to communications between the two Houses as regards Bills which the House of Commons also agreed to, and it is better, I presume, to preserve in our rules the wording of the standing order which is identical with that of the House of Commons. This would take the place of rule 72 ; the substance is the same. It will be found at page 309 of the Journals of last year. I therefore move that rule 72 appear in that form :—

In cases in which the Commons disagree to any amendment made by the Senate, or insist upon any amendments to which the Senate has disagreed, the Senate is willing to receive the reasons of the Commons for disagreeing or insisting, as the case may be, by message without a conference.

Any conference between the House may be a free conference.

I move that the rule adopted last year, and which appears at page 309 of the Journals of last year, be substituted for rule 72 in the report.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—When shall these rules go into effect.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move that they go into effect on the last day of the present session.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS from the committee reported that they had considered and adopted the rules with certain amendments.

THE BOUND NEWSPAPER FILES.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the adjournment, can the hon. Secretary of State explain why the newspapers usually bound and kept in the library for reference are not there as usual ? I find there have been no newspapers bound since the last day of August, and many of them not since the first of July.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It does not, of course, rest with me in any sense: I presume it is under the control of some committee of the two Houses, the Printing Committee probably.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The state of things I found from the Parliamentary Librarian, is this, that at the end of the year the semi-annual files of papers were sent to the King's Printer, and that he has been unable from that time forward to get them back, and it is now nearly six months.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Changes have been going on at the Bureau. Additional room is required there, and it has been in the hands of the contractor unduly long. We tried to get the contractor out and avail ourselves of the extra space, but have not succeeded so far.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is very inconvenient when parliament is sitting, and if the work cannot be done at the Printing Bureau it should be done somewhere else.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three p.m.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Has any one given notice to call the members of the House together to adopt the rules ? If not I shall take the responsibility of doing so, and I shall give notice for Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Would it not be well to have the rules reprinted as amended and properly numbered before we undertake to consider them ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—One of the reasons which appealed to the House why these rules should not come into force this session was that suggested by the hon. gentleman, that there should be time to print them in the two languages, and number them properly. I fancy that will assuredly take place before the rules will become the law of this House ; but as to reprinting them for Tuesday I am not aware that any provision is made for that. The alterations have not been very material. One or two sections have been struck out, but there has been no radical change made in the procedure by the amendments suggested by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, and adopted by the House. If the rules must be reprinted, I do not know whether they could be ready for Tuesday next. If we do not deal with the report on Tuesday, another notice will have to be given to summon the House for a later date.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We could overcome that difficulty very easily. Certainly the report should be in proper form before we undertake to consider it. The type is standing and the reprinting should not be a matter of more than a few hours. The amendments could be put in proper form and the rules properly numbered, and the references in some of the rules to certain numbers changed where necessary. That should be done before we undertake to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole. If the notice of motion given by my hon. friend to convene the House for the first of May, should be too short, with general consent it could be changed to two or three days later.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If I understand it, on Tuesday the House is to be asked to take into consideration the amendments made in Committee of the Whole, and it may be that serious changes may yet be made by the House. The reprinting of all these rules for Tuesday would be an unnecessary expense. Hon. gentlemen should be familiar with the amendments made in Committee of the Whole, and if these amendments are concurred in by the House, the reprinting and renumbering can be ordered. Inasmuch as the rules are not to go into operation until the last day of this session, the hon. gentleman from Killarney will have ample time to give notice that they be made standing orders.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is impossible for members to follow the amendments unless the report is reprinted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the amendments are printed on a slip hon. members can follow them.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—This should be left to a special committee and that committee should see that the rules are properly reprinted. For two days we have been discussing the rules, and I do not suppose there are half a dozen members of the Senate who know what the amendments mean. If they come before us next week we will be no further advanced.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The suggestion made by the hon. member from Halifax might be accepted and I would ask the hon. senator from Killarney to postpone until a future day the giving of his notice, because those amendments have not been adopted yet by the House, and there is no use in convening the House for the adoption of rules to which amendments may yet be offered.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The suggestion made by my hon. friend appears to me as being a good one, and as there is no rush in the matter I accept his suggestion and withdraw my motion. The report can be considered on Tuesday, and we can adopt the rules later on.

CONTRACT WITH SIR CHARLES ROSS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When the discussion with reference to the Ross Rifle factory was before the House, I promised to obtain for the Senate more definite information of the subject. I have now a copy of the agreement made with Sir Charles Ross which I will lay on the table for to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Only for to-day?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes; I promised to return it.

The report was laid on the table.

AN ERROR IN THE MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I ask to have a correction made in the Minutes of yesterday. A point of order was raised last Tuesday on a motion of the hon. gentleman from Brandon, and the Minutes of the Senate say that the point of order was held en delibéré. Yesterday that point of order was settled and the decision arrived at was announced to the House by the hon. the Speaker. In the Minutes of yesterday's proceedings there is no allusion to the fact that the point of order had been decided, so it will appear en delibéré until the judgment day. I think it should be mentioned that the point of order was decided and in what way.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am quite in accord with the hon. member from Stadacona. I think the entry should be made after the reading of petitions as a part of the record.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It can be entered to-morrow.

INVITATION TO THE KING AND QUEEN TO VISIT CANADA.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called:

Consideration of a message from the House of Commons communicating an address to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, most humbly praying that His Majesty and Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen will honour the Dominion of Canada with their presence at such time as may be selected by His Majesty.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said: I have much pleasure in submitting for the approval of the Senate the address adopted by the House of Commons to the King's most excellent Majesty, inviting His Majesty and his much loved Queen to visit this part of his wide dominions, assuring them that they would receive a cordial and affectionate welcome. An address, couched in language somewhat similar, was adopted by the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly of Upper and Lower Canada in the year 1859. On that occasion the address originated in the upper chamber. In the lower chamber it was moved there as now, by a French Canadian. Sir George Cartier was the mover of the address in the Legislative Assembly. It was forwarded to her Majesty the Queen, inviting herself and Prince Albert to pay a visit to this country.

accompanied by such members of the government as could be induced to come. For reasons of state, that I need not now discuss, Her Majesty was obliged to decline the invitation, but delegated her son, the Prince of Wales, then a youth of nineteen years, to represent her in Canada, or those parts of Canada from which the invitation was extended. In order to give eclat to the reception, a special meeting of parliament was convened and met His Royal Highness in Quebec in the month of August, 1860. He arrived in the country in a battle ship, I think the 'Hero,' accompanied by two frigates of the line. I need not refer to the circumstance of his reception in Canada. It was of the most enthusiastic kind. He was welcomed in all parts of Upper and Lower Canada, and the portion of the lower provinces to which he extended his travels, and left a very favourable impression on the people of this country. He had a very large number of appointments made for him, which he graciously kept. He was asked to leave behind him souvenirs of his presence in the way of laying corner stones, planting trees and acts of that kind. His gentleness of character and extreme graciousness and courtesy won for him the esteem of all with whom he came in contact. As I said, the House was convened at Quebec and the members of the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly met him there on his arrival. Of the one hundred and fifty gentlemen who then received the prince, I am sorry to say that the only two that are now in public life are my hon. friend from London (Hon. Sir John Carling) and myself. The fact of his having been in Canada at that time would give additional zest to a visit on this occasion, the conditions in this country are so entirely different to what they were then. At that time, although he left England on the 11th July, it was the 1st of September before he laid the corner stone of the building in which we are now sitting. The stone, as hon. gentlemen are aware, has often been seen in the basement of this end of the building. The time he occupied in that visit, going over a very small portion of what is now the Dominion of Canada, was more than the time occupied by Prince Arthur of Connaught in his recent trip around the world, including a stay of some weeks in Japan. At that time the prince did not extend his visit beyond the more important towns of the province of Ontario. He did not go beyond the great lakes. The Great Lone Land was then in the possession of the red man and the buffalo. The few settlements in the Northwest were those scattered along the Red river at Fort Garry and at the posts occupied by the Hudson Bay Company in their trading with the Indians. To-day His Majesty would find that the villages he then passed through have since become towns, the towns have become cities, and the prosperity that he would witness on every side is far beyond even the highest anticipation that could have been formed at that time. The progress he made was necessarily slow. Less than a thousand miles of railway existed in Canada at the time; to-day we have twenty thousand miles of railway in the Dominion. The Great Lone Land has since been divided into three prosperous provinces, occupied by a happy and contented population, receiving the overflow of the British isles and also being a haven of refuge for the persecuted and the down-trodden of other lands. He would find there men from many countries in Europe and Asia who were glad to become his subjects. He would find them all pleased and prospering under the constitution of which he is the head. I may also add that he would find a very large body of men coming from the republic to the south of us. The fear has been expressed, as hon. gentlemen will have noted, by many papers published in the United Kingdom that Canada might be lost to the British Crown by the preponderance of people from the United States who were, as they assumed naturally, predisposed to favour republican institutions, and that they would be favourable to the annexation of this country to the United States. Those who have watched the various colonies that have come to Canada from the United States have no such apprehension. They soon find that the conditions in Canada are very much superior to those that they left behind; that the rights and privileges that men hope to enjoy under any system of government are greater and more extended here than in the republic that they left. They find the laws are better observed, and I have yet to learn the names of any citizens of the republic who have come to Canada, and who have invested in this country and made it for a time their home, who have abandoned their places and gone back to the United States. On the contrary, we find that many Canadians who, in former years, had gone to the United States, have declined to become naturalized there, and are coming back to Canada. It would be a gratifying thing to the King to learn that the accession of foreigners to the number of his subjects is rapidly increasing. By actual count, there were filed in the Department of State alone—and they do not all come there I presume—between nine and ten thousand naturalization papers during the past year. That is a very considerable compliment to any country. That ten thousand persons should, in a single year, renounce the allegiance they owe to the country they were born in, and accept the conditions in the country to which they have emigrated, is a compliment, I think, to Canada, and one that would give great satisfaction to His Majesty.

The late Queen, of loving memory, had raised the standard of the duties devolving on a sovereign to so high a plane, and had set such a noble example for the crowned heads of the world, that some of His Majesty's subjects feared he would not rise to the high level attained by his mother. All fears on that subject were, however, soon dispelled by the devotion to duty, tact and diplomatic skill exhibited by His Majesty in discharge of his many important duties.

Loved by his own subjects, and highly esteemed and respected outside his realm, he has attained an influence that has been exercised for the betterment of the world. The alliance with France means much for the peace of Europe, and is gratifying to the King's subjects in Canada, and especially so to those in the province of Quebec.

The growing friendship between the United Kingdom and the republic to the south, that His Majesty has on all occasions favoured, augers well for the development of a peaceful rivalry on this continent, and the alliance with our neighbours would, no doubt, be materially strengthened by a visit of His Majesty to the Great Republic.

I am safe in saying that the entire population of Canada cordially unite with their representatives in parliament in expressing the hope that His Majesty and the Queen may accept this invitation—assuring them at the same time of a warm and hearty welcome.

With these few observations I move, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Lougheed, that the Senate concur in the said address and that it be signed by the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In seconding the resolution which has been proposed by my hon. friend the Secretary of State, I need not say that I concur most heartily in everything which has been so aptly said by him. It is scarcely necessary for the Dominion of Canada to give any assurances of its loyalty and devotion to the members of the Royal family, particularly in view of the many occasions on which this Dominion has had the opportunity of expressing its affection for the British throne during the periodic visits of the members of that family to Canada from time to time. The King, when Prince of Wales, did us the honour of visiting our shores. A few years after that we were favoured by the visit of the present Duke of Connaught, the brother of the King. But four or five years ago, the present Prince of Wales visited the Dominion of Canada, and this visit was followed by that of the present Prince of Connaught, who within the boundaries of our Dominion at the present time, is receiving an ovation which must leave a deep impression not only upon his own mind but upon the mind of the King and other members of the Royal family, as to the loyalty and devotion with which they are regarded by our people. Not only in the expression of loyal sentiments has this devotion been shown to the Throne of Great Britain, but the Dominion of Canada, in a very much more practical and material way, has manifested its love for the empire and its service to the Throne. Only a few short years ago, this Dominion sent its men and poured out its treasures to help fight the battles of the empire on distant battlefields, and to-day we cannot but recall with mixed feelings of patriotism and regret that the bones of some of the most stalwart sons of Canada lie as a monument on South African battle fields to the devotion of this Dominion in the service of that empire of which we are proud to belong. One cannot fail to contrast the interest which has been manifested from time to time in Canada by the members of the Royal family with the indifference shown for the last fifty years by British statesmen as to the colonial possessions. I hesitate to strike a minor note at this particular time, but possibly it may not be out of place to direct attention to the fact that there has been a lamentable indifference on the part of British statesmen with reference to the growth and development of this vast Dominion. I cannot recall that a British Prime Minister has ever visited our shores. I cannot recall at this moment whether a Cabinet Minister of the Imperial Government during his term of office has ever honoured this Dominion with a visit, except possibly Mr. Chamberlain—I cannot at this moment recall whether he was a member of the British government at the time of his visit. There has never been, I might say, any effort on the part of the imperial government to direct the attention of the people of the empire to the magnificent heritage of the sons of the empire which lies upon this side of the Atlantic. They have never shown, I regret to say, that interest even in the development of their dominions beyond the sea which they have shown in the upbuilding of the United States. One cannot fail to be impressed with the fact that the growth and the national greatness of the United States of America have been largely contributed to by English emigration, and by the enlistment of English capital which have gone to develop the national resources and the industrial life of that nation; and one cannot fail to observe the fact that if British statesmanship had by directed effort devoted the same attention to diverting the immigration of its sons to Canada, which for the last 50 years has been flowing at so rapid a rate to the shores of the United States; and thus contributing to the upbuilding of a powerful foreign nation; this Canada of ours to-day would not be so sparsely settled as it is, but would I venture to say, closely approximate in population England herself. It is therefore a very pleasant thought that notwithstanding this indifference on the part of British statesmanship we have had during the last fifty years a deep interest shown by the royal family in the growth of this country. I mention the matter at this particular time in the hope that a visit by His Majesty the King will create a new interest in the affairs of Canada on the other side of the water, where the central government of the British empire at present belongs. I have noticed within the past few days, that the London press in dealing with this subject has pointed out a difficulty in His Majesty's visit to Canada, namely that he would be compelled for reasons of state to likewise visit the United States. This I am bound to say I would not regard as an insuperable difficulty, but one that might be productive of very desirable results. We cannot overlook the fact that the continent of America is to-day the theatre of the activities of the Anglo-Saxon race. Although the race was cradled on the confined shores of Albion, yet we are glad to boast that it required a continent for the expansion of its energy and enterprise; and to-day the continent of America presents to the world at large a civilization higher and better than ever has been. In the natural order of things, our relations with the United States must of necessity be closer physically than with those of any other nation. Living side by side, along an international boundary extending four thousand miles, sprung as we are from the same British stock, speaking the same language, having the same business interests, with social ties that know no geographical boundaries, possessing the same historic traditions, the two peoples must necessarily be very closely identified with each other. Yet I am satisfied notwithstanding these facts that we shall have distinct and separate futures; and thus I say no higher mission could fall to the lot of any monarch than to be charged with the high duty of further strengthening the ties which to-day bind the great Anglo-Saxon peoples on this continent, thus giving to the world hostages which no other monarch could give of the continuance of the amity which at present exists. This is a critical time in the history of the Dominion. It has been intimated by my hon. friend the Secretary of State that owing to the numbers of the foreign population coming to our shores possibly the destiny of this Dominion might be diverted from British channels. He ventures to express himself with confidence that such will not be the case. I hope that confidence will be justified in the future, but we are closely approaching the cross-roads of our destiny. It must not be overlooked that Canada has been peopled by a people sprung from the British race. They have been cradled and nurtured in British institutions, but owing to the indifference which I pointed out a few moments ago, on the part of British statesmen, the large immigration of England's sons which might have been diverted to our shores during the past two generations, has gone to the United States, thus contributing to the building up of a foreign nation; and to-day we are of necessity engaged in the anomalous proceeding of peopling this country with foreign settlers. I think I may venture to say with confidence that within the next decade the majority of the people of this Dominion will be of foreign birth, destitute of British sentiment, of British sympathies, and possibly opposed to British connection. I therefore assert that the very highest possible importance attaches to the duty which falls upon the Canadians of to-day, upon the statesmen of the empire and upon none more so than His Majesty the King of further maintaining in Canada British sentiment. Imperial sympathies and above all British connection. At no more opportune time could this high mission fall upon His Majesty the King; and I am satisfied that no one within the almost boundless limits of his empire could better fulfil that mission than His Majesty. In reference to what my hon. friend the Secretary of State has so aptly said regarding the high offices performed by His Majesty as a peace-maker throughout the world, I might say that the best security the world possesses to-day for the pursuance of a policy of disarmament the reduction of militarism, and the promotion of the arts of peace and civilization, is in the welding together of the ties that unite the Anglo-Saxon people of the world; and I know of no more practical way to bring about this high desideratum than a visit of the King and Queen to the shores of the American continent, and particularly to the Dominion of Canada.

Hon Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is a great deal in the remarks which have just been made by the hon. leader of the opposition, in which I most heartily concur. I have myself had occasion, both in my private capacity, and in my capacity as a representative of Canada, to fully verify the truth of the statement which he has made, that in former years, there was a great deal of ignorance and of neglect displayed by British statesmen, toward the people of this Dominion; but I am also bound to say that I believe within the last few years there has been a great and notable change for the better in the feeling and in the conduct not merely of British statesmen but of the British people at large. There is another point to which the hon. gentleman has called attention, which certainly deserves the most serious consideration on the part of His Majesty and His Majesty's advisors. That is the extreme importance, from every point of view, of doing everything which possibly can be done to strengthen and maintain the good feeling now happily subsisting between ourselves and the great republic to the south of us. I have myself, for a long time, been firmly convinced that the future of the British race in the largest sense—not speaking merely of ourselves, or of the people of the British Islands, but of all the peoples of the English race—is intimately wrapped up in the maintenance of a cordial alliance I was about to say, but at any rate, of the most cordial good feeling between ourselves and the people of the American republic. Personally I would go far to bring about something of the kind, and I am bound to say that the events of recent years have contributed in a great degree to do away with the misunderstanding, and possibly the hostile feelings which at one time subsisted between the two countries. I can say also that I believe there is no man in England or elsewhere who has individually done so much to bring about a good feeling between the people of Great Britain and the people of the United States as his gracious Majesty. I believe that it was a very good thing indeed, for him, for us, and for the British empire, that forty years ago, in his early youth, he had the opportunity of making himself personally acquainted with the enormous resources and possibilities which North America presented for the development of the Anglo-Saxon race, and I can state that no man of his rank has ever been so forward, as he has been personally in every possible way in showing every imaginable courtesy and consideration, not merely to Canadians, but to colonists of every description throughout the British empire and also to distinguished citizens of the United States who from time to time have visited England. And, in so doing, he has rendered, I believe, a very great service to the empire at large, and has shown himself eminently worthy of the high position which he fills so well. Whether it will be within his power to accept the invitation which the parliament of Canada has just tendered to himself and His royal consort, I cannot say, but I do most heartily hope that he will be able at some time or other to accept it. If he does, in spite of the restraint of state etiquette, I hope and trust that he may also find it possible to place himself once more in close connection with the authorities of the United States. The time has come, I think, for setting aside the old restrictions and the old precedents which, in former years, would have rendered it impossible for a monarch of his degree to visit the president of a republic, and we have seen in the case of European governments what an amount of good has resulted to empires of the old world from personages as highly placed as the Czar of Russia, for instance, making a visit to the President of the French republic. If precedent, therefore, is wanted for such an act on the part of His Most Gracious Majesty, the precedent can easily be found. I am perfectly certain that every man throughout Canada will heartily agree with the terms of the address which has just been moved by the Secretary of State and seconded by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and I agree with him and I agree with my hon. friend, the mover of the resolution, in believing that a very great good indeed, if His Majesty were able to accept the invitation, would result from his paying us a visit. I am quite certain, and I can speak, I think, with some degree of knowledge as to that, he himself would experience very great pleasure in revisiting the scenes of fifty years ago, and seeing the extraordinary progress which has been made in every part of His Majesty's North American Dominions.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—(In French). It was a happy inspiration adopted in the House of Commons and now concurred in by the Senate to invite His Gracious Majesty and the Queen to visit Canada. Nothing but good can result from such a visit. It is impossible to predict the extent to which this country will benefit by being brought to the front universally throughout the empire and especially in the mother country itself. It will attract to this country immigration of a superior class when people learn from such a high authority of the great extent and fertility of this portion of the empire.. It is unnecessary to say that he will find everywhere profound loyalty to the Crown, and no where more than amongst the French Canadian people. No citizens of the empire are more deeply and loyally attached to the Crown and to British institutions than its French Canadian citizens. Among the happy results which they may expect to flow from the royal visit will be an influx into Canada of British capital. It necessarily follows the march of the British sovereign. Knowing as we do the conservative tendencies of the English people, we may feel assured that such will be the result. Moreover it should improve our relations with the United States, because it is very unlikely that His Majesty after crossing the Atlantic would fail to accept an invitation from his friend President Roosevelt to visit the great Republic. In the United States that visit should have only the best results, and I am sure it would meet with the unanimous approval of all Canadians whatever their origin may be. Believing as we do that the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria contributed to the peace of the world, and that King Edward VII is following in the footsteps of his gracious mother, we all hope, notwithstanding recent terrible wars, that an era of peace is about to dawn upon the world. We know that His Majesty has on all occasions contributed greatly towards preserving the peace of Europe. His influence was felt during the conference at Algeciras, and the rapproachment between France and England is largely due to his tact and love of peace. His attitude has led to an improvement in the relations not only between France and England, but also of Italy and France, and has helped greatly to bring about good feeling in Spain and Portugal and Belgium; and we may hope that this will furnish a guarantee that war will not be unchained in Europe. A visit by His Majesty to Canada may help to bring about the very best relations between this country and the United States. With this good understanding which prevails between most of the European nations, and the equally friendly relations existing between them and the United States and Japan, it would be a reckless and aggressive nation indeed that would dare to break the peace which happily prevails to-day throughout the civilized world. Not only as our sovereign, but personally he has every right to be regarded with affection and the highest consideration by all classes of his subjects. As a descendent of those who contested for supremacy on this continent with the British people, I to-day acclaim with profound loyalty the sovereignty of the British Empire and trust that he may see his way to visiting at an early date one of the greatest colonies of the empire.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I do not like this resolution to pass without saying a few words. I feel quite certain that every member of this House will cordially agree with the terms of the resolution, and with the loyal, instructive and eloquent words uttered by the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. leader of the opposition. Not only in the British empire and its important dependencies, but by other nations of the world, King Edward is held in the highest esteem as a constitutional ruler, an astute diplomat, a smoother of international differences and a lover of universal peace. His Majesty has shown his confidence in the people of the Dominion by sending the Prince of Wales three years ago to visit this country, and more recently his nephew, Prince Arthur of Connaught. These princes will be able to convey to His Majesty, the loyalty and high respect which has been manifested towards them, and will also convey some idea of the extent and resources of the Dominion. In visiting this country, and travelling through it from ocean to ocean, His Majesty, will find six millions of loyal and contented people, believers in British institutions and of British connection working out their destiny under a system of freedom, a freedom which can be found only under British institutions, a freedom which is inherent in the minds and aspirations of British people wherever they may be found. His Majesty will find that, in this portion of his vast Dominions, the people who emigrate from the mother country can make their homes with every prospect of improving their condition under British sovereignty. The visit of His Majesty would not be complete unless he travelled throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In that way alone could he get a proper conception of the vast extent of this portion of his empire. Whether he will be able to accept the invitation of his loyal Canadian subjects or not, we may rest assured it will be received as an expression of the loyalty and attachment of our people to His Majesty's person and throne.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—The subject now under discussion is one of such great importance, and, as I see it, so far reaching in its consequences, that I do not feel that I will have discharged my whole duty as a member of this House by recording a silent vote. I cannot, however, expect to add anything of interest to what has been already so appropriately and so beautifully expressed by all the preceding speakers. The ground has been well covered, and it would be a pity that it should be marred. If I can avoid even doing that, I shall be able, perhaps, to congratulate myself. It is related in ancient story that an eastern king, hearing of the greatness and grandeur of the Roman empire, sent his ambassador to visit Imperial Rome, and to make a report of what he saw in that magnificent city on the seven hills, the mistress of the world. On his return, his report to his royal master was, that he had visited a city of kings, where every man had as much happiness as he could contain. I am sure that any one visiting Canada at the present time will feel that, although he has not visited a city of kings, he will have visited a happy, loyal, prosperous and contented people, men and women as noble inhabitants as ever lived on this planet, according to my view. It is said that there is a cloud over every landscape, and one instinctively asks himself is the British empire to escape what has happened to former empires ? One cannot rise from a perusal of Gibbon's 'History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire' without being impressed by the mutability of all earthly things, and the question naturally comes, is there not something better in store for the British empire? I contend that there is. I believe that the British empire has the best form of government in the world. A limited monarchy, I believe, is the best form of government that the world has ever seen, and one most favourable to the largest measure of civil and religious liberty, and my view is that the stability, the greatness, and the highest good and grandeur of the British empire, is due to the fact that she retains, in close connection with the parent state, all her outlying dominions.

I believe that they will be not only her glory in time of peace, but her bulwark in time of need, if war should ever come. I am proud, hon. gentlemen, to be a subject of the British empire. A great American has said in describing the greatness of the British empire that her morning drum-beats keep pace with the hours, and encircle the earth in one continuous strain of the martial airs of England. I hope, therefore, that Canada will be forever, may I say, an important part of the British empire. Canada to-day is the princess royal of the British family of nations. To my mind there was a great Providence in the mission of that bold Genoese, Columbus, when he turned his prow towards the setting sun and left a wake behind in that waste of western waters, and called up as it were by a magician's wand this great and glorious western continent on which the millions of oppressed Europe might work out in a large measure their social regeneration. I am very glad indeed that we have the high honour to extend a cordial invitation to King Edward, the peacemaker—that grandest character that can be applied to a human being, especially in the exalted position in which a king moves. King Edward has already, as Prince of Wales, visited this western world, and I am sure that he will be glad to accept this cordial invitation to revisit the scenes which he witnessed and in which he felt such a great interest some 46 years ago. It is not the Canada it was then. Canada was then only in its comparative infancy, but to-day Canada is to all intents and purposes a nation, destined, I believe, to be the greatest and most glorious portion of the British empire. Canada with all its possibilities, I trust, will have the honour of welcoming King Edward VII, and Her Gracious Majesty Queen Alexandra, and before I conclude I would like to say, and to say it from the bottom of my heart, considering what has transpired lately between England and France, that I would hail with pleasure the presence in this country of the president of the great French republic which showed so much consideration and so much sympathy and so much respect to the memory of a late Canadian statesman. It has been said, and said truly, that the effect of that mission will be to cement and to make most cordial not only the feelings between Great Britain and Canada, but towards the United States as well. I am anxious that that should be accomplished. I hope we shall always live in cordial relations with our neighbours to the south and that we may never do anything to disturb these cordial relations, but I am much more anxious, as a Canadian and as a British subject, that the effect of the visit that we suggest shall be to cement, strengthen and draw more closely the bonds of mutual interest and mutual affection between Great Britain and her outlying dominions. That is my chief concern and chief anxiety, and I know of no way by which that can be more effectively accomplished than by the presence of King Edward VII. He has already left his mark upon history as a peace maker, and I should like to see before his great reign comes to a close—and I believe he will accomplish it, for I can see in his every movement a desire to pacify and render happy that little green isle that lies to the west of England, which according to my view—and I have never ceased to promulgate my views upon that question—has been rather neglected for many years. I cannot understand any union between countries or between individuals being permanent except it be founded upon mutual interest and mutual affection, and I hope that before King Edward's reign is over that that will be another gem that will adorn his diadem, and I am sure nothing will be omitted on his part to bring about so desirable a result. My hope for the British empire and its colonies for the future is in the fact that they are united and that they always will consider their interests as one. I am sure that if the present king ever had any doubts of the great and inestimable value of the Dominion of Canada to the British empire, he will leave our shores with that impression increased tenfold, and it will go with him through the remainder of his natural life. So in his coming, and in our receiving, there will be a mutual and reciprocal splendour about the situation. Let him come, and he will get such a reception as five or six millions of loyal subjects only can give —one which will reverberate not only through the British empire, but through the whole civilized world. I think it is the poet Kipling who has said, speaking of England :

A nation spoke to a nation,
A Queen sent word to a Throne,
Daughter am I in my mother's house,
But mistress in my own.
The gates are mine to open.
As the gates are mine to close,
And I abide by my mother's house,
Said the Lady of the Snows.

I believe that there is an overruling Providence in the affairs of this world and I hope the statesmen of the British empire and of our own country, as well as those of the other colonies and of the nations of the world, will not forget that fact, that there is an overruling Providence who, alone, can give stability to human effort, and I will close my remarks by quoting a few words in the form of a prayer, by the same poet :

Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget !

With these few observations, imperfectly expressed, I have the greatest possible pleasure—it is one of the greatest pleasures of my life as a loyal Canadian—in enthusiastically endorsing and supporting the resolution before the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the motion is adopted, I should like to call the attention of the government to the expressions contained in the address as it was brought down in the House of Commons. It was in a different form then. It read as follows :

To the King's Most Gracious Majesty :—

Most Gracious Sovereign :

We, the members of the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg to humbly convey to Your Majesty, with the assurance of our loyalty and devotion to Your Royal Person, the expression of the desire and hope, long and fervently cherished by all British subjects inhabiting British North America, that Your Majesty would be graciously pleased to honour them with Your Majesty's presence, and thereby enable them to offer the personal tribute of their unwavering attachment to the Crown and the government of the empire, of their deep affection for Your Majesty's person, and their profound admiration for those kingly virtues and truly humanitarian deeds which have earned for Your Majesty first place among the great sovereigns of the world.

Nearly fifty years ago Your Majesty, then the heir apparent to the Throne which Your Majesty now adorns, honoured Canada with your presence, on the occasion of the inauguration of the Victoria Bridge. The approaching completion of the Quebec Bridge, the initial step and one of the great links in the Transcontinental Railway of Canada, whilst affording Your Majesty a fitting opportunity to witness the progress and development accomplished in Your Majesty's possessions on this continent, would enable their inhabitants to indulge in the manifestation of their loyalty and devotion to their beloved King and Queen.

We therefore most humbly pray that Your Majesty and Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen will lend their august presence on the occasion of the inauguration of the Quebec Bridge.

The Quebec bridge was the motive of the invitation. In the other House the hon. Premier, with great reason I believe, had that taken out, and the address reads now like this :

Nearly fifty years ago, Your Majesty, then the Heir Apparent to the Throne which Your Majesty now adorns, honoured Canada with Your presence.

We therefore most humbly pray that Your Majesty and Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen will honour the Dominion of Canada with Your presence at such time as may be selected by Your Majesty.

The word ' therefore ' there, means a consequence and the consequence was in the first address, but since the address has been amended I do not see why we should put in this word.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps the phraseology might have been smoother without it, but I doubt whether it is of sufficient importance to take any action. The change to which the hon. gentleman refers was made in the House of Commons; it is for us to say whether we shall cordially endorse the address as it now stands.

The motion was agreed to.

FIELD DIVORCE PETITION.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the adoption of the third report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in re Field petition.

He said : This is a report on a petition to be allowed to present a Bill in forma pauperis. There were three petitions of this nature. Of these three we allowed one and rejected the other two. This is the one we allowed.

The motion was agreed to, on a division.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (S3) An Act to amend the Act respecting the judges of Provincial Courts.

He said: Last session an Act was passed cutting down the travelling expenses of the judges of the courts. After the House rose, on representations made by some of the judges, the Minister of Justice came to the conclusion that the department was not justified in reducing the scale as it had done, more particularly as regards what are called the district judges, taking wide districts such as Algoma, Thunder Bay, Nipissing, remote districts where judges have to travel a great deal. The object of this Bill is, therefore, to restore to the judges a portion of the travelling expenses taken away by the Bill of last session. In committee I shall be able to give additional details.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is this a reinstatement of the former schedule?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not all of it. It restores to the courts of Ontario the five hundred dollars, to this particular class known as the district courts, those I have mentioned, Algoma, Thunder Bay, Nipissing, Rainy River—the remote districts where judges have a large amount of travelling to undergo. It applies to these particularly.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is this a money Bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has passed the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is it a money Bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is in a sense.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We cannot amend it in committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is more than the money part of it included. The explanations are given in committee.

The motion was agreed to.

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (C) An Act to further amend the General Inspection Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to create an inspection for certain grades of hay grown in the limits of the Manitoba Inspection Division. I may mention for the information of the House, that, under the present Act, these grades of hay cannot be graded or classed or examined by an inspector. The Winnipeg board of trade and a number of other boards of trade have represented to us that the Act should be amended to enable these to be graded. That is the sole object of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will the hon. gentleman, when the Bill goes into committee, give us information as to what the government propose to do with regard to inspection in the new provinces? The Manitoba division includes the whole territory west of Lake Superior.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Does my hon. friend mean with respect to this article of hay alone?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, the machinery of inspection has scarcely been thought out.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—There is the Grain Inspection Act.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is machinery under the existing Act for creating inspectors who are examined by the various boards of trade. Bringing these under the general statute will give the facilities that the hon. gentleman refers to. However, we can discuss all that on Tuesday or Wednesday when this matter is brought up in committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three p.m.

QUEBEC MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

REPORTED FROM THE COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (De Lanaudière) from the Committee on Railways, Telegraph and Harbours, reported Bill (23) An Act to incorporate the Quebec Midland Railway Company, with amendments. He said: This amendment was made to the Bill, because the project was entirely within the province of Quebec, and, in order that there should be no doubt as to the character of the charter, it was decided unanimously by the committee, to fix the beginning at the west end of this road in the province of Ontario, making it a road extending from Ontario to Quebec.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—This is rather unprecedented. The committee has made this amendment. The company did not ask to start from the province of Ontario, and I do not see how the committee had a right to make this change of its own motion. If there had been a petition asking for the change, I could understand it, but those who petitioned knew what they were about, and, if the Bill was objectionable, the Senate had the power to throw it out. It seems to me that the committee has taken large powers to itself to declare that a railroad which was intended to start in one province should start in another.

The amendments were concurred in.

ACCIDENTS ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a statement of all accidents that occurred on the Intercolonial Railway during the years 1897, 1898, 1899, 1900, 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904 and 1905, specifying each accident, whether by collision, derailing, fire or otherwise, and the amount of damages of each such accident, mentioning the localities where such accidents occurred.

Also, the amount of losses each year, by theft or otherwise, of goods or freight, in transit, on the Intercolonial Railway, for each year as above.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SONGHEES INDIAN RESERVE.

MOTION.

Hon Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a Statement, showing the conditions on which the Songhees Indian Reserve in Victoria has been handed over to the government of British Columbia—as to the purchase of a new reserve, the building of dwellings, church and school-house, showing also the manner in which it is intended to dispose of the money in the hands of the Dominion government to the credit of the Songhees Indians.

He said: My object in moving for this return is, there are a number of persons, in common with myself, who are anxious to know that the rights of the Indians in the Songhees village are being properly preserved. They have been in possession of the reserve for the last sixty years, and I hope the government have not consented to any harsh treatment in removing those Indians.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the order going through.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Can the hon. gentleman inform the Senate where this new reserve has been purchased?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I cannot tell.

The motion was agreed to.

WEEK END ADJOURNMENTS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that, until otherwise ordered, when the Senate adjourns on Fridays it do stand adjourned until Tuesdays following, at three o'clock.

He said: I find there is nothing on the order paper for Monday, and I am informed that it would be a convenience to about one-third of the members of this Chamber if no sitting took place on Monday.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—These adjournments are coming too often. It would be better to meet on Monday at eight o'clock. We are here to do business, and we should at least meet on Monday evenings.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Some consideration should be given to members who live at the far end of Ontario. I know my hon. friend will sympathize with me when I tell him that I have to leave on the Sabbath day to be here even at eight o'clock on Monday. The proposed rule worked very well last year. If any one is afraid of losing sittings, I can assure him that from the appearance of things in the House of Commons there is no danger that we will not put in our thirty-one days. I think that we shall probably be here until July.

Hon. Mr. MACKEEN—There should be some sympathy for those who live in the far east and west and who are obliged to stay here over every Saturday and Monday. Most of us are comparative strangers in Ottawa, and the only excitement we have is attending the meetings of the Senate. If you deprive us of the sittings for two days of the week you make the time intolerably dull. More than that, these adjournments, although they may not interfere with the general business of the session, place the members from the far east and far west in an unfavourable position, because we feel we are entitled occasionally to an adjournment, and if we restrict the meetings of the Senate to four days in the week we minimize the possibilities of getting any longer adjournments. The country will object to that sort of thing, I think members who live at a distance have very great sympathy for those who are living near Ottawa ; still we think we are not requiring too much when we ask that the Senate meet on Monday at eight o'clock. I do not think it is particularly kind for gentlemen to ask us to stay here from Friday night until Tuesday doing nothing week after week.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Hon. gentlemen are not likely to be kept here a day longer than if we meet on Monday evenings. I would support the views of the last hon. gentleman who has spoken, if it were otherwise, but, when it will not make any difference so far as detention is concerned, while it would be of great convenience to some members, I would ask him to consider whether it is not better in the interests of the Senate, that there should be an adjournment over Mondays when there is nothing to be done, than it would be to meet here and go through the farce of reading prayers. When we meet merely for the purpose of invoking the Divine blessing on our work, having no work before us, I think it would be a great deal better to dispense with the prayer. This practice of meeting on a day when there is no work to do will bring more discredit on the Senate than to adjourn to another day. The Toronto 'News' of Tuesday, April 24th, under the heading, 'Why should we have a Senate' publishes the Senate Debates of Wednesday, April 18th, as follows :

The Senate Debates.

Second session—tenth parliament.

No. 15. Wednesday, April 18, 1906.

Senate.

Ottawa, Wednesday, April 18, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight o'clock p.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at Three p.m.

That is the strongest comment that could be made upon such a proceeding on our part, and it would be better, I think, to adjourn until a day when there is work to be done, whether it be over one day, two days or three days.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I do not agree with the argument of the hon. gentleman from Toronto. He says we have nothing to do on Mondays, and, therefore, no one can suffer by our adjourning until Tuesdays. My hon. friend must know that the reason why there is no work for Monday is because it is so arranged in advance. We have had experience of that practice for several years past. We have no readings of any Bills, or of anything else set down for Mondays, because it is otherwise arranged to enable certain gentlemen who live near Ottawa to go to their homes. We who live at a distance suffer a great deal of inconvenience, and when it comes to a question of adjournment for ten days or two weeks these gentlemen will be the first to oppose an adjournment of that kind, when it would suit the senators from the maritime provinces and from the Pacific coast. I do not think the proposition is fair or just, and I protest against it.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Since I have had a seat in this House I have always observed that members living near Toronto and Montreal have given the utmost consideration to the convenience of members living at a greater distance. In every case where there was a question of a long adjournment we have considered their interest and did the best we could to meet their view. Now we ask in return that we who live west of Toronto, and east of Montreal should have Mondays at home, when business here is not pressing. We can leave home Monday evening, travel all night and be here on Tuesday, but if we must meet on Monday evenings we might just as well stay here, because we would have to leave home on Sunday night to reach here in time for the sitting on Monday evening.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I should like to say that there has never been a case where a member living within the limits described by the hon. gentleman from Wellington has objected to a long adjournment which would suit the convenience of members living at a distance, and we now simply ask that the same consideration should be given to those who can, in this way, secure an extra day at home.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—I would move in amendment that when the Senate adjourns this afternoon it stand adjourned until Monday next at eight p.m.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I shall always deem it my duty, as it is my pleasure to sacrifice my personal convenience for the convenience of the majority in this House, but I have a perfect horror of being kept in Ottawa or any place unless I am very busy, and it seems hard to be detained in Ottawa when there is nothing to be done. I should think the hon. gentlemen who, of necessity, must remain in the capital would rather spend their time in the library building themselves up, than to sit in this House when there is nothing to be done. I am surprised at the objection offered by my hon. friend from Halifax. I thought he would hail this as an excellent opportunity to train for that celebrated foot race we have been promised.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman from Toronto had examined the votes and proceedings of the House of Commons he would have seen that the 'News' of Toronto might have inserted precisely the same notice in reference to the meeting he has mentioned, substituting 'House of Commons' for 'Senate,' and might have argued therefrom that the Commons should be abolished. We all know that for the first week of the session, the Commons only sat for a few minutes each day. I would point out that members living as far west as London would gain nothing by having the adjournment until three o'clock on Tuesdays that they would not have if it were until eight o'clock on Monday. Unless they travel all night they cannot reach Ottawa in time for the sitting on Tuesday at three o'clock, so that it is just as convenient for those living in the localities I have mentioned to have the session on Monday night at eight o'clock. If it is to be of any real benefit to those who live westward as far as London, and eastward as far as Quebec, the adjournment should be until eight o'clock on Tuesday night. I do not exactly agree with the hon. gentleman from Toronto. The business which would be transacted at three o'clock on Tuesday could be done just as well at eight o'clock on Monday. I would suggest to the hon. Secretary of State either to make it eight o'clock on Tuesday or accept the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman from New Brunswick, to meet at eight o'clock on Monday night.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman from Wellington said that, in arranging for long adjournments, consideration has been shown to members from the far east and west. In thirty years experience I have never known it to be done. We should not adjourn to suit the convenience of any section of the country. We are here for business and not for adjournments, and the convenience of members should not be taken into account at all. I support the amendment, to meet on Mondays at eight o'clock, and would ask the hon. Secretary of State, if he intends to drop the words, 'until otherwise ordered,' or merely to adjourn over next Monday? I should like to see him drop the motion altogether, but if he does not do that he might eliminate these words.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As there seems to be considerable difference of opinion, I have no objection to adopting the suggestion to leave out the words 'until otherwise ordered.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think the Secretary of State should drop these words, because this will remain a subject of continuous discussion hereafter. If there is no business on the paper, it is just as easy when moving the adjournment on Fridays to move that the House do stand adjourned until the desired time. That could be done with much less discussion.

The SPEAKER—The motion is :

That when the Senate adjourns on Fridays it do stand adjourned until Tuesdays following at three o'clock.

Does the hon. gentleman from New Brunswick persist in his amendment ?

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—I do.

The Senate divided on the amendment which was rejected, contents 24 ; non-contents 29.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I move that the words 'eight o'clock' be substituted for 'three o'clock.' That will not interfere with the business at all and it will constitute a real advantage to those who live as far away as London.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That, I contend, is a highly objectionable motion to spring on the House, to provide that it shall meet in the evenings of Tuesdays all through the session. The experience of most hon. gentlemen is that when we meet in the evening there is very little business done, as a rule, and if we knock off the Mondays throughout the session, we should at least do a respectable day's work on Tuesdays.

The Senate divided on the amendment which was rejected, contents 14 ; non-contents not counted.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at three o'clock.

THE ROSS RIFLE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired —

Under the contract entered between the government and Sir Charles Ross :

1. How many rifles of mark No. I has the government received, from the 1st January, 1903, to 1st January, 1906?
2. How many of mark No. II., during the same period? Since the 1st January, 1906, to the 1st of May?
3. How many rifles of mark I ?
4. How many of mark II ?
5. And how many of any other mark have been delivered to the government by the same concern ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The reply furnished to me by the department is as follows :

1st. 10,500.

2nd. 136.

3rd. None.

4th. 5,164.

5th. None.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired —

1 On what date were Messrs. Young, Reid, McIsaac and Parent respectively appointed commissioners of the Transcontinental Railway ?

2. Has the government taken cognizance of the following short article published in 'La Presse' of the 6th April, 1906 :

'By the way, I will take leave to say a word about the work of the commissioners of the Transcontinental. To begin with. Messrs. McIsaac, Reid and Young only accepted the position of commissioners on the express condition that Mr. Parent should be the chairman. These gentlemen knew that with Mr. Parent at their head, the chief would do the greater part of the work. I am not prepared to say that they do nothing at all ; but they have leisure, whilst Mr. Parent is at his post from early in the morning till late at night. Those who know Mr. Parent know that I do not exaggerate in saying that he is a glutton for work. He neither drinks nor smokes, and gets through more work in a day than anybody else could in a week. He is never seen at the theatre nor in the clubs ; he knows no other road than that to his office.'

3. Is the government convinced of the truth of the assertions contained in the above article ?

4. If so, does the government intend to dispense with the services of Messrs. Young, Reid and McIsaac, and thus save to the country the sum of $21,000, or to pay Mr. Parent this amount, to which the chairman of the commission would have a right, if really this gentleman alone does all the work ?

Hon Mr. SCOTT—In regard to the first question, the dates are as follows :—

Mr. Parent was first appointed on the 31st July, 1905, Mr. McIsaac on the same day, Mr. Young on the 20 August, 1904, and Mr. Reid on the same day.

As regards the remainder of the question, the government have not taken cognizance of the article in 'La Presse.' They do not even know that such an article has been published. They have no answer to make to the question.

CAPE BRETON PILOTS RETIRING FUND.

DELAYED RETURN.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I would like to ask when I may expect to receive the return which I moved for on the 14th March last, with regard to the distribution of the Pilots Retiring Fund, of the Harbour of Sydney, C.B.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not heard anything about it. I shall make inquiry ; meantime I may say that I gave my hon. friend the report of last year, showing the distribution of the fund, and how it was held.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I received the Blue-book, but it does not contain the statement which I have asked for.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will ascertain if anything further can be brought down. That was all the information the department sent me at the time.

ALLEN DIVORCE BILL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to call the attention of the House to the entry on page 211 of the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate. It reads thus .—

Pursuant to the Order of the Day, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce. to whom was referred the petition of James Allen.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

The Honourable Mr. Kirchhoffer moved, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Baker, that the said report be adopted. Which being objected to, the question of concurrence being put thereon, the same was, on a division, resolved in the affirmative, and ordered accordingly.

This fourth report, to which reference is made appears on page 158 of the Minutes of Proceedings, and is as follows :—

The Senate, Committee Room No. 28,
Friday, 20th April, 1906.

The Committee on Divorce beg leave to make their fourth report, as follows :

In the matter of the petition of James Allen, of the city of Toronto, in the province of Ontario, fireman, praying to be allowed to present a petition for divorce, without the payment of fees required by the rules of the Senate.

Your committee have carefully considered the petition and the statutory declarations submitted to them in support thereof.

Inasmuch as the committee consider that a sufficient case for such relief has not been established, they recommend that the prayer of the petition be not granted..

All which is respectively submitted.

J. N. KIRCHHOFFER,
Acting Chairman.

So the report was to recommend the rejection of the petition. I have no cognizance of any opposition to that report. The House agreed unanimously to adopt it, and therefore the Minutes at page 211 are misleading. The same mistake appears in connection with the following order relating to the fifth report of the Divorce Committee. Both of these reports were accepted, as I understand, without any dissenting voice, and I think these corrections should be made in the Minutes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My impression is that the hon. gentleman who was in charge of the petition thought the prayers of the petitioners should be allowed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that simply an impression ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is my impression.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not think any one objected to either report.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the hon. gentleman from Cobourg, called for a division, but he expressed his dissent.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If the hon. senator from Cobourg were here he could explain the apparent discrepancy. In the first place the papers that were filed with the Law Clerk of the Senate did not come up to what was required as the basis of the report, when the prayer was presented to permit the petitioner to proceed without paying the fee. The committee declined to allow him to proceed without paying the fee and so reported, and also reported with regard to the incompleteness of the application. It appears that he complied with both ; he paid the fee of $200 and supplied whatever other evidence was necessary to lay the basis of his application for divorce.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The details given by the hon. gentleman remind me of another thing which does not appear in our Minutes. I remember well that when the report was adopted by the unanimous consent of the House, the hon. gentleman from Cobourg presented a certificate that the fees had been paid, waiving the objection brought forward by the report of the committee. That certificate does not appear in our Minutes.

The SPEAKER—The appearance of that certificate is dispensed with by the new rules.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon Mr. YOUNG moved the third reading of Bill (22) An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Will the hon. gentleman explain the object of this Bill, so that we may be able to know whether it ought to pass or not ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It is an extension of time for two branch lines, one from New Westminster, and another one from a point on the Stonewall branch extending to the east shore of Lake Manitoba. The Bill also strikes out of the former Act an obligation the company had assumed to build to the shores of Lake Manitoba. I understand that obligation no longer exists, as the road is very nearly completed. Having fulfilled their obligation, the necessity for that clause in the former Act no longer exists. The rest of the Bill provides simply for an extension of time for the completion of two branch lines, one of which is partly built, one in Manitoba and the other in British Columbia.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

ESQUIMALT AND NANAIMO RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved the third reading of Bill (28) An Act respecting the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I should like to have some explanation from the hon. gentleman with reference to this Bill. As I understand this and some of the other measures which have been put through to-day, they are all extensions of time. If that is so, I would like to find out how many extensions of time this company have had. Some of these roads I think I had something to do with in the other House.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—My hon. friend has been in the committee and has heard the explanation which was given there, but if he wants me to go over the ground again I shall be glad to do so. This railway was originally started at the time that British Columbia came into the confederation. One of the clauses in the agreement under which British Columbia came into confederation, was that there should be certain assistance afforded for the building of this road. The line has been constructed from Victoria to Nanaimo, and for a great number of years was worked by Mr. Dunsmuir and his friends. Laterly it was sold to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and they are now operating the line in connection with the rest of their system. This particular Bill is intended to provide for an extension of time for the construction of a part of the road which has not been completed and also to grant a further extension of the line from Wellington, which is the furthest point to the north to which they will go at the present time, up to the northern most point of the island. I do not know that they are going to build this piece of line immediately, but they want to have power to go ahead with it as soon as they see that the country is ready for it.

The motion was agreed to.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called :

Consideration of the amendments made in Committee of the Whole to the third report of the Special Committee appointed during last session to consider and revise, and if deemed necessary, to add to the rules, orders and forms of proceeding of the Senate.—(Hon. Mr. Ferguson.)

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Hon. gentlemen will have observed on their desks a sheet containing all the amendments made to the rules since they were reported from the committee. As this sheet was only distributed immediately before the House met, it is desirable that hon. gentlemen should have an opportunity of comparing it with the rules and with the Minutes of Proceedings. I move, therefore, that this order be discharged, and be made an order of the day for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Before the motion is put, I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that we amended the Private Bill practice in committee sometime ago, in some respects, and the amendments which we made here were informally suggested to those who are considering the matter of amending rules in another place. Some four suggestions have been adopted, and others have not. I saw a copy of those which have been adopted, and of those which have been recommended to be changed, in the other House. I draw attention to this matter now because when it comes up for consideration it would be well for us to reconsider our amendments and endeavour to harmonize them with the amendments which will likely prevail in the other House, so that applicants for private bill legislation will not have one set of rules to comply with in one House and another set in the other House. The matter is not of serious consequence, except in one point : that is, the notice which it is necessary to give to the public. It may possibly be as well to have the notices the same in each case. If we have different requirements here we do not save the applicants any money, because they have to advertise for the other House and they may as well advertise for the Senate at the same time. I do not know whether it would be well to go into committee once more to affect this change, but at some stage, before we finally adopt our rules, it would be well to consider what I have called attention to and endeavour to harmonize our action if possible. It is true the House of Commons have not finally passed these amendments, but it is likely that the amendments which have been suggested will prevail. We might wait possibly and see whether they further amend before we finally adopt our rules here, with the view of preserving the same harmony which has existed for the past two years.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I suggest to my hon. friend that he should communicate with the committee which has charge of this matter in the House of Commons and call their attention to what we have done. We are not exactly called upon to change everything we do because they do not happen to agree with us, and possibly if their attention was called to our work, they would adopt much of it, or a part of it, and then it would be well for us to consider the remaining points on which we differ, because I quite see that it is desirable in regard to the matter of notice, that there should be uniformity.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I suggest that the best way to proceed would be to have a conference with the House of Commons. It would be well to name a day on which some of the members of this House could meet some of the members of the House of Commons and see if we cannot agree. If an agreement can be reached, then we can go on; otherwise, if we pass this and have to change it in a fortnight, or next year, what good will have been accomplished? It would be better to come to a conclusion with the House of Commons, and I suggest that a conference be called.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I might say that every reasonable effort was made to come to an understanding with the committee of the House of Commons. Two members of our committee appeared before the committee of the House of Commons on Standing Orders, which is the committee charged with the amending of the rules with respect to notice, and we submitted to them the work which we had done here, and asked for their concurrence. The Commons committee on Standing Orders took our suggestions into consideration. They adopted some of the changes which we had proposed, but with respect to the notice to be given they did not. They decided that they would not recommend to the House to make the changes which we have proposed. The old rules required that notice of an application for the incorporation of a company to construct a railway or canal should be given in a newspaper published in each municipality or other district through which the railway or canal might pass. We thought that that was a somewhat unreasonable requirement, and our amendment proposed that instead of publication in a newspaper in every district, there should be publication in a newspaper issued in one of the principal cities of the province and then a notification by registered letter to the secretary of the province, and also to the clerk of each municipality through which it was proposed that the work should run. That amendment the Commons committee declined to adopt, and consequently nothing would be gained by our waiting. We know now that that amendment will not be made by the Commons; and the only course open for us, I think, is to go back to the requirements with respect to notice which were reported in these rules in the first instance. This change was one suggested in the Committee of the Whole, and we shall simply have to go back, as regards notice, to the rules as they were first reported by the special committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Informally I was told there was a possibility of further amendments being made to the rules in the other House and one was in the direction of increasing the fees to be paid by applicants after the expiry of the first period for presenting Private Bills to the House. It is just possible they may vary the fees in such cases, and it might be that we should consider that point also later on.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I give notice that I will move that the provision with regard to notice to be given in connection with Private Bills be replaced as it was in the original report.

The Order of the Day was discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for tomorrow.

SECOND READING.

Bill (E) An Act to incorporate the Canadian Handicrafts Guild.—(Hon. Mr. Frost).

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

PROGRESS REPORTED.

Pursuant to the Order of the Day, the House went into Committee of the Whole on Bill (C) An Act to further amend the General Inspection Act.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend opposite I think desired to know who were the promoters of this Bill. This measure was requested to be laid before the House on the part of the Board of Trade of Winnipeg, who submitted it some considerable time ago. I consulted with the Department of Agriculture and also with the officers of the department, Messrs. Horn and Castle, grain inspectors, who are in pretty constant communication with a large number of farmers in the Northwest; and all these persons appeared to think it was very desirable that the new grades of hay herein described should be added to the present Inspection Act, and that inspectors should be appointed. The inspectors, I may say, are appointed by Order in Council, but must pass an examination before certain examiners, which examiners are appointed by the boards of trade. In this instance, they would be appointed by the Board of Trade of Winnipeg. Is there any other information my hon. friend requires in particular about this Bill that cannot be taken up on the several clauses?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I wanted to know whether any inspectors are in that section west of Winnipeg?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They will have to be appointed, there are none at present. They will be appointed, of course subject to passing their examination before the Board of Examiners. Of course the grading of wild hay is something that we are not at all familiar with in this part of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has my hon. friend any information as to the extent of the export of hay west of Winnipeg?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWHIGHT—I think it is more particularly desired for the purposes of internal trade. I do not think any considerable quantity of this hay will be exported, especially as there is a heavy duty on it going into the United States. As I understand it, the intention is to regulate the trade between the different sections of the country. As my hon. friend knows, the Winnipeg section is a very extensive one, extending all the way from Lake Superior, not merely to the Rocky Mountains, but taking in British Columbia as well, if my memory serves.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Will those inspectors be Dominion officers hired and paid by salary only, or paid by fees?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—By fees, and the fees will be subject from time to time to revision by the Governor in Council. They might be either raised or lowered as was found expedient.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I see no provision made in this inspection Act for timothy hay. In what class would that be put?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That would be provided for under the General Act. This is merely intended to refer, as I understand, to what is known as prairie hay. These are grades for which, as my hon. friend knows, we have no corresponding articles in our portion of the Dominion. I presume that in addition to the scrutiny this Bill is to receive here, it will receive a close scrutiny in another place, and probably will be very thoroughly gone into by the Committee on Agriculture.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Though coming from the west, this is entirely new to me, this idea of having an inspection of wild or prairie hay. There does not appear that any consideration has been given to it by western members up to the present time, and I would respectfully submit that the hon. gentlemen, having called attention to the matter, should let it stand for a few days.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Certainly, and in the meantime I will read for the information of my hon. friend and others, the communication which I received from the Winnipeg Board of Trade, which goes at some length into the reasons that actuated them to propose the introduction of this measure. Then I will move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again this day week. The paper is as follows.

Winnipeg, April 13, 1905.

F. C. T. O'Hara, Esq.,
Acting Deputy Minister,
Dept., Trade and Commerce,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—I have the honour, by direction of this board, to submit for the consideration and action of your department the following matter in connection with the proposed inspection of hay at Winnipeg.

1st. This board has elected the following as a board of hay examiners—Messrs. Jos. Franklin, W. G. Douglas, G. Olafson, T. J. Douglas and R. Laing.

I find by section 3 of chapter 99 of the General Inspection Act the Board of Trade of Winnipeg has power to appoint a board consisting of five examiners to act for the city of Winnipeg, but this board would respectfully suggest that in the first instance the examiners be appointed by the government, as authorized in the same section, and the limits of the territory within which they shall act to be made co-terminous with the bounds of the Manitoba grain inspection division. Many contracts made by Winnipeg hay dealers are for hay to be delivered at points between Lake Superior and the Rocky Mountains, and it is considered that, as Winnipeg will be the only place which could possibly support a hay inspector, it would be better to make both the examiners' and the inspectors' jurisdiction cover the same territory as is included in the grain inspection division. It is important that the hay examiners should be appointed at an early date in order that applicants for certificates of ability and fitness may be examined with a view of one of them being appointed as hay inspector.

2nd. Attached hereto, is a schedule of the grades for Manitoba hay, as recommended by the hay section of this board and endorsed by the council. Practically no timothy or clover has, as yet been sent into thte Winnipeg market, but when the time arrives that such hay is grown in the western provinces the schedule already defined in the Inspection Act under section 44 of Chapter 25 will be available and suitable for the inspectors here to act upon. Please carefully consider the two final paragraphs in this schedule, which are really 'provisions relating to inspection.' Our hay merchants consider that, with the cheap price of wild hay in this market, the fee of 20 cents per ton would be too heavy a tax, and while they are quite willing to start inspection at this rate they are satisfied that the inspection fee might be lowered later on, and if the authority to reduce or even raise the fee rests in the Governor in Council, the matter could be much more easily and satisfactorily arranged when the results of the experiment of hay inspection in Winnipeg are ascertained, than if an amendment to the Act itself would have to be secured. As this feature would apply only to inspection in Manitoba, no change would be necessary in the Act relating to the inspection of hay and timothy in eastern Canada. The last paragraph is considered a very important one here, and indeed its omission would very seriously affect the attempt to make hay inspection in the west acceptable or useful to the trade. Experience has proven that country shippers frequently are most careless about properly baling hay, and as there is no official to act between the shipper and the receiver in the city, dissatisfaction and disagreements as to the condition of the baling have arisen. It is believed that if the inspector, when examining the hay, would also make note of broken bundles in a car, the same result would be obtained, as in the case under the grain inspection where inspectors carefully note the condition of cars containing grain offered for inspection and thereby frequently detect leaks which if not noted will occasion loss to the innocent shipper.

Chief Grain Inspector Horn, discussed this schedule with our hay dealers committee, and fully concurs in the representations here made.

This board trusts that the importance of the necessity for hay inspection in Winnipeg will be fully recognized by the hon. the minister, and that the necessary legislation will be secured by him during the present session of parliament.

I have the honour, etc.
Signed. C. N. BELL,
Secretary.

This Bill is very nearly a transcript of the measure recommended—in fact I believe it is an absolute transcript, and, as I say, it has been submitted to the grain inspectors who are in tolerably close touch with the farmers of the western provinces, and also to our own Department of Agriculture.

Hon. Mr. WOOD, from the committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill and asked leave to sit again next Tuesday.

HARBOUR OF NORTH SYDNEY IN NOVA SCOTIA BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (74) An Act respecting the Harbour of North Sydney in Nova Scotia.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time on Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I should like to know what this Bill is for, and whether the money sought for has not been already expended ? I understand the money is intended to pay off a mortgage which the commissioners of the harbour hold on a certain property, and that the Bill further asks for more money than is due on the mortgage. I should like to know whether the second mortgage has been already contracted for ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Bill is a very short one and provides that,

> The Harbour Commissioners of North Sydney may, from time to time, borrow upon mortgage such sums of money as are required for the purchase of real or other property, or for the improvement of the harbour of North Sydney, or for such other works as the said commissioners are authorized to undertake; and for such purpose the said commissioners may mortgage the real property, works, tolls or revenues of the said harbour: Provided that no money shall be so borrowed without the sanction of the Governor in Council, and provided also that the total indebtedness for moneys borrowed under the provisions of this section shall not at any one time exceed the sum of six thousand dollars.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—The provision that no money shall be borrowed except with the consent of the Governor in Council is very well.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is limited to $6,000.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I think provisions should be put in that Bill for the superintending of the work proposed under this measure, by an official of the Public Works Department. A statement of the revenue derived from that, the disbursements and everything connected with it, should be furnished by the government, and an inspector from the Public Works Department, should see that the money is properly expended. There is a good deal of talk and feeling at North Sydney on this very question. It is alleged there that the money which has been collected for several years past has been wastefully expended, and that nothing remains of the works done owing to the force of the sea waves washing it away every year. The work done at that place 15 or 20 years ago still stands, while the improvements made of recent years are washed away. The government should see that this work is properly done.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall call the attention of the department to the remarks of the hon. gentleman.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at Three o'clock.

FRENCH TRANSLATION OF THE DEBATES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to inquire from the committee which has charge of the translation of our debates into the French language what the reason is that we are not supplied with the French copy of the debates of this Chamber ? We have up till to-day, only received Nos. 1, 2 and 3, and I do not see why we should not be supplied each day with a copy, the same as is done with the English copy.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I ask to be allowed twenty-four hours to make the inquiry.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We will give you thirty-six hours.

WEEKLY ADJOURNMENTS.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I understand that there is a feeling among some of the members of this Chamber that the Senate will not sit on Mondays. I understand when the hon. Secretary of State made his motion to adjourn from Friday until Tuesday, that he had a second motion, to the effect that the motion to adjourn from Friday until Tuesday should be made weekly, and that it was not to be a permanent order. I ask the Secretary of State if he intends to permit his motion to be ignored, or if he wishes to place it before the House? I think he intended to change the order, that it should not be a permanent order that the Senate should adjourn from Fridays until Tuesdays, but that the motion for such an adjournment should be made from week to week. I protest against the matter being left in this way. I think it is hardly fair to hon. senators. We have come here to attend to the business of the country, and if some hon. gentlemen want to adjourn for a few days, let them lose those days, and not compel thirty or forty members to lose these days also. I should like to know the intention of the government with respect to this matter—whether they intend that the Senate shall in future meet on Monday or on Tuesday?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think this is a matter which relates altogether to the internal economy of the House, in which the public are not supposed to be interested, and I would respectfully suggest that this discussion might take place, say to-morrow, with closed doors, and that we should not spend another afternoon discussing it.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I do not hesitate to say that I am prepared to discuss all my acts in public.

An hon. MEMBER—Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—If the hon. gentleman wishes to do something he is ashamed of, that is no concern of mine, but I may say that I do nothing that I am not prepared to have discussed in public.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—With regard to the question raised by the hon. gentleman from Wolseley (Hon. Mr. Perley) I think we should dispose of it now, or, if the hon. Secretary of State perfers, it could be dealt with to-morrow. It will be in the recollection of the House, and of the hon. Secretary of State that he offered to eliminate the words 'until otherwise ordered' and I thought, with many others, that the Speaker put the question leaving these words out; but it seems that the motion was agreed to without the elimination and so appears in the minutes of the House. Now, if the hon. Secretary of State will say either at the present time or to-morrow that he wishes these words struck out, no more will be said about it.

The SPEAKER—When the suggestion was made that these words should be struck out, objection was taken to it, and the motion had to be put as it was in the notice which had been given.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

The Order of the Day being called:

Consideration of the amendments made in Committee of the Whole to the third report of the Special Committee appointed during last session to consider and revise, and if deemed necessary, to add to the rules, orders and forms of proceedings of the Senate.—(Hon. Mr. Ferguson.)

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The proper motion to make, I suppose, is that these amendments be now concurred in.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Pursuant to notice, I move in amendment that rule 89, as reported, be amended by inserting the word 'select' before the word 'committee' where it occurs for the first time. Rule 89 occurs under the general heading of standing and special committees. It deals with select committees. When that rule was under consideration the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) objected that the grammatical construction of the rule was not just what it ought to be, and he submitted an amendment. With the permission of the House, I shall quote what the hon. gentleman said:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I wish to call attention to the phraseology of rule 89: I think it should read:

No senator, who has any pecuniary interest whatsoever not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown in the inquiry to be entrusted to any committee shall sit on such committee.

and so on. It is merely a matter of grammar. The 'who' might be taken to refer to the committee as it stands at present.

The hon. gentleman's remarks are not reported fully, but hon. gentlemen will remember that he said it was simply a transposition of a portion of the rule to make the rule more grammatically correct. We were in Committee of the Whole, and were moving pretty rapidly, and possibly hon. gentlemen did not catch the exact wording of the amendment which the hon. gentleman proposed. When I came, after the sitting of the House, to examine the amendment, I found that it was considerably wider in its scope than had appeared, and that in fact it applied to all committees. Rule 89 applied only to select committees, but the amendment applied to all committees. Now, the probabilities are that if a question were to arise with respect to the meaning of the rule as amended by the hon. gentleman, it might be held that the rule was governed by the heading 'Standing and Special Committees;' still it might not, and, in order to avoid any doubt, I think it desirable that the word 'select' should be reinserted in the rule. I understand the hon. gentleman from De Salaberry has no objection to this being done. If hon. gentlemen will turn to page 2 of the sheet of amendments, which has been laid upon our desks, they will find what I refer to. With the amendment this rule will read as follows.—

89. No senator who has any pecuniary interest whatsoever not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown in the inquiry to be entrusted to any select committee shall sit on such committee; and any question of interest arising in the committee may be determined by the committee subject to an appeal to the Senate.

It will be remembered that there was a feeling on the part of some hon. gentlemen that the same rule should apply to the whole House and the Committee of the Whole; but the Committee of the Whole, by a very decided majority, expressed the contrary opinion. I therefore move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Lougheed, that the word 'select' be inserted before the word 'committee' where it occurs for the first time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I object to that motion. The hon. gentleman says that the intention of my hon. friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) was only to amend the phraseology of the clause, yet in the face of the amendment which was brought forward by my hon. friend from Belleville, to introduce a clause dealing with amendments from the House of Commons that would be considered in Committee of the Whole, when I proposed to strike the word 'select' out of clause 89 I was told by the chairman of the committee at the time that that word had been struck out by the amendment of the hon. member from De Salaberry, so the attention of the House was brought specially to that subject, and as it had been disposed of by the amendment of my hon. friend from De Salaberry, we did not proceed further to change the clause, as it had been changed already in the desired sense. I do not think the House was taken by surprise. We discussed the question and that word was struck out deliberately, if not at the proper time, at all events after the remarks elicited by the amendment proposed by the hon. member from Belleville. By striking out the word 'select,' that rule applies to all committees, and that is why it was erased from the clause, because it met the views propounded by the hon. senator from Belleville.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has raised a question of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, I said I objected to the motion, but not on a point of order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to hear from the hon. member from De Salaberry.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The remark made by the hon. senator from Halifax is quite correct that when the question was put to me I stated that it was merely a matter of phraseology. I had not in mind at the time that it applied to all committees. I had drafted the amendment that way because it was uncertain whether the word 'select' would be used; it was pending for consideration, but I recollect that the hon. member from Belleville put a question later on during the sitting to ascertain what would be the bearing of the amendment, and then I realized that the word 'select' had been dropped from my amendment, and I suggested that it would apply to all committees; but as far as I am concerned, I think it would be better to adopt the motion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, because that rule deals with these committees, and we have the other rule which deals with Committee of the Whole House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The reason stated by my hon. friend, that it is because it applies only to committees, does not at all meet my objection. It still deals with all committees ; it does not deal with anything else.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think from the fact that we had approved of the rule dealing with Committees of the Whole House on that subject, and had special rules under the heading 'committees,' it would be ambiguous and would have to be interpreted to avoid conflict, and it would be difficult to interpret rule 89 as applying also to the previous rule, inasmuch as the previous rule is not exactly in accordance with rule 89.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me it is rather a novel position for a member to take, especially with reference to the working of a rule of this House, and I am still at a loss to understand why there should be a distinction drawn between a select committee and a committee of the whole House, so far as it affects the members who are interested in a question before the House. I was not aware, so far as this motion was concerned, that the reason given by the hon. gentleman from DeSalaberry was on account of the ungrammatical manner in which the clause was drawn. When he made the motion to strike out the word 'select,' as the hon. gentleman from Halifax very properly said, there was a great deal of confusion and a good many members speaking at the same time. For my part, I could not understand—because I could not hear what the hon. gentleman said, and therefore was unable to come to a conclusion as to the effect that the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman from DeSalaberry would have upon the two clauses, but I was informed immediately afterwards by the hon. gentleman himself, across the House, that the striking out of the word 'select' would have nearly the same effect as if the suggestion which I had made had been carried out. That was the understanding, and, that being the case, I did not push the motion to which I had called the attention of the House. But, to my mind, no reason has been given why there should be a distinction drawn between a select committee and a committee of the House, so far as it affects the individual member who may be interested in the question before the Senate. To my surprise, I found the hon. gentleman from Halifax presenting an argument that to adopt my suggestion was going to interfere with stockholders in banks, and in other companies, and I was still more surprised to find the leader of the opposition taking the same view. If the hon. gentleman who has made this motion, and the hon. gentleman who has seconded it—that is the hon. gentleman from Halifax and the hon. gentleman from Calgary,—wish to be logical, they should move to strike out clause 89 altogether, because the language used in the clause as it is now before the House, and which the hon. gentleman from Halifax desires to confirm, supported by my hon. friend from Calgary, would have the very effect which both those gentlemen pointed out, as interfering with members who are shareholders in companies and banks. If that be the case, then the clause which he is now desirous of amending should be struck out, because the language used in the amendment that I proposed is precisely the same language that is used in the clause that these gentlemen want to adopt and make the law of the land. The words that I suggested are these : 'In which he has any pecuniary interest whatever.' The very same language applies in the clause which the hon. gentlemen want to make a rule of the Senate. It says : 'No member shall sit on a select committee who has any pecuniary interest whatever in the inquiry before such committee which may not be held in common with the rest of Canadian subjects of the Crown, &c.' I copied those words verbatim in the suggestion that I made, so that if there be any force in the argument presented to the Senate by these gentlemen, then they should move to strike this clause out altogether. I did not propose to change in any way the character of the resolution. I simply proposed to make that provision applicable to the Committee of the Whole to which was referred an amended Bill coming from the Commons, and which would be considered by a committee of the whole in this House. That is all I proposed to do, to simplify the rules by embodying in the one rule the principle embodied in the two ; but to this further extent, that the same prohi-dition should exist with regard to a committee of the whole that exists now, and which they propose to make law in the select committees. That is all I propose to do, and I have heard no reason advanced yet to convince this House that the rule should apply to a select committee and not apply to a committee of the whole House. Neither have I heard the hon. gentleman from Halifax reconcile the position that he assumed in connection with the words used in the suggestion that I made in consolidating the two rules. He has not given any explanation that the wording that is used and applied to a member of a select committee does apply any more to a member of the committee of the whole. If the words used there, that he is to have no interest other than those which are held by any other subject of His Majesty, prevent—and I repeat it—a shareholder in a bank or in an insurance company from acting on the committees, as suggested by himself and the rule as I suggested it, it is equally forcible and applied in the same manner to the select committee in the clause which the hon. gentleman drafted, and of which I may say he is the father, and inferentially condemned in the remarks that he made upon the suggestion which I made when last discussing this question. They are precisely the same; there is no difference. If it is wrong in the one case, it must be wrong in the other, and I do not interpret the clause to go so far as that. The Independence of Parliament Act specially exempts stockholders in banks and so on, but we are told: 'Oh, that applies only to contracts.' If the government makes deposits in a bank upon certain conditions, that is an implied contract and would have the same effect as if it were a written contract for the purchase of any goods. What the courts will decide I am not prepared to say, but I know that the interpretation given to the Independence of Parliament Act is that a clause of this character would not prevent a member who is a stockholder in a bank from taking any course he thought proper in connection with any Bill that might come before him, and if you read the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from DeSalaberry, he goes much further than I did in this matter. Why he has changed his mind on this occasion, I cannot very well understand. When we were discussing this question before, he said:

> I think the proper thing would be to debar members of the House from either taking part in the debates or voting under such circumstances. The wording which should be adopted ought not to debar them from remaining in the House, but they should not take part in a discussion because they have a pecuniary interest.

My hon. friend has changed his mind, apparently, in the last two days, and he is prepared to adopt the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax and allow members, in Committee of the Whole, to take what course they think proper, except to vote. That is the exception, no matter how interested they may be. It is a matter that does not affect me in any way. My only desire was to consolidate the clauses into one and make that one as simple as possible, make the same principle apply to a general committee as is applied in the case of a select committee. If the House thinks differently, and thinks that there is a reason why a gentleman who has a pecuniary interest in a question before parliament should not be allowed to sit on or to take any part on a select committee, but that he should have the right to debate and thus influence the Senate to the fullest extent—the only restriction being that he shall not vote—I am not going to discuss the matter further; but I do think it is a most extraordinary thing that we should have an opinion expressed here strongly one day, and the next day it is turned over just to meet the views of a gentleman who, if I may say so, is wedded to the rules presented by him, no matter how incongruous or complicated they may be, and who seems to have a great desire for the adoption of a set of rules which, in their interpretation and carrying out, will create a great deal of confusion.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—If I may be allowed to add a word of explanation. I am ready to confess that I am always open to conviction, even though I may be accused of being inconsistent. However, in this instance, I may say that what appealed to my mind was the question raised by the hon. leader of the opposition as to whether we had the right to debar any member of this House from sitting in the Senate or sitting in a committee of the whole of the Senate. After that point was brought to my attention, I immediately stated to the hon. member from Belleville that I thought there was a great deal in the ground taken by the leader of the opposition, and the hon. member for Belleville since that time has not heard me supporting the contention that we should do away with the right of hon. members to sit in the House or in the committee of the whole. But this point is not involved in my deciding to support the motion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax. What have we before us? We have two rules. Nos. 58 and 89. Rule 58 deals with the House, whether sitting as a branch of parliament or as a committee of the whole, and this rule says that no senator is entitled to vote upon a question in which he has any pecuniary interest whatsoever not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown. That is the rule that was adopted by this House. We have then the rule referring to the committees, and in that rule we find this wording—

> No senator who has any pecuniary interest whatsoever not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown in the inquiry to be entrusted to any committee——

That is the wording that was adopted at my suggestion—> —shall sit on such committee.

Now it is suggested, instead of the words 'any committee,' to insert 'any select committee.' I think that is a proper change to be made as far as the committees of the House are concerned. It will cover all committees of the House; it will not, I admit, cover the Committee of the Whole. But it must be borne in mind, and I draw the special attention of the senator from Belleville to the fact, that because of this wording which was adopted at my suggestion, a member, although he will not be allowed to sit on the committee, will not be debarred from addressing the committee. He may be the promoter of the Bill and he will, as any other citizen, have the right to address the committee. He is debarred from sitting on the committee. Now if he has the right, either as promoter of the Bill or as an ordinary citizen, to address the members of the committee would it be logical to deprive the same member of the right of addressing the members of the House in the House, if a question of the same nature were to come up there instead of being dealt with in the committee? It seems to me it would not be logical, and I am inclined to think that we would not have the right to go that far. As regards the committee he will not be allowed to sit on the committee, but he will be allowed to speak, not as a member of the committee, but as a member of the senate or as a citizen—with leave of the committee if you like. In the House he will be allowed to speak because he is a member of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask the hon. gentleman, if he contends that a senator cannot be debarred from taking part in the proceedings, as far as discussing the question is concerned, what power have you to debar him from voting, except the rule which you have adopted? Where is the difference?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I have not made any study of the question, but I would be inclined to think there is a great difference between speaking and voting; anyway without entering into that, I recall the fact that we are harmonizing both rules by this wording, because in either case the member will not be debarred from speaking. He will be debarred from sitting on the committee. Why debar him from addressing the House or a committee of the whole House if he is not debarred from addressing the committee?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is not meeting the question I asked him. If the House has no power to prevent a senator who sits here legally from taking part in the proceedings by addressing it or moving an amendment, what power have we to prevent him voting? The motion should be to refer the report back to the Committee of the Whole for correction.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The report of the Committee of the Whole is before the committee for adoption or amendment. Any member can move an amendment. Rule 58 applies to a Committee of the Whole House under rule 78, which provides that the rules of the Senate apply in Committee of the Whole. So when the House is in Committee of the Whole rule 58 applies, and rule 58 forbids a member voting on any matter in which he has any pecuniary interest whatsoever. A member so interested is not allowed to sit on a Select Committee. The contention of the hon. member for Belleville is that the same rule should apply to committees of the whole House. The case which the hon. gentleman took to illustrate his point was that of a private Bill which had been amended in the House of Commons and had come up here as amended and been referred to a Committee of the Whole House for consideration. Apparently the hon. gentleman's opinion is that if the Bill dealt with an insurance company, a bank, or any company of that sort, any member being a stockholder in the company, was not only not allowed to vote on the amendments from the House of Commons but he was not allowed to sit on the Committee of the Whole and had to go outside the bar. It seems to me all right that hon. gentlemen who are interested in companies seeking legislation here should not have too much influence in the House, and it is right that they should not vote where their pecuniary interests are concerned, but it would be going too far altogether to say that a member of a company should not have the right in Committee of the Whole to express his opinion and point out why an amendment made in the other House to this private Bill should be either accepted or rejected, as the case may be. I thought the opinion of the House the other day was in the direction I have indicated.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I made no such proposition, and my suggestion had no application to stock holders such as the hon. gentleman refers to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The House has a right to make rules with respect to the conduct of its own members. The view taken by the hon. member from Belleville, apparently was that the House had no right to make a rule as to the conduct of a member who was interested.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I never argued that way—quite the contrary.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—When I was speaking on the question the other day, the hon. member from Belleville replied to me and said that I was fighting a shadow; that there was no such proposition; that there was nothing but the general principle to prevent a man voting, and, he added, 'that is all I propose to do.' He said further, 'there is no intention whatever to carry the idea to the extent my hon. friend from Beamsville (Mr. Gibson) supposes, because, as I have already said, that would shut out from this chamber about nine-tenths of its members.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I thought it was plain enough.

The committee divided on the motion, which was agreed to on a division.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The other amendment which I have proposed is one which I hope will not lead to very much discussion. It is that rule 114, as reported, be amended by striking out paragraph 1 of subdivision (a) of said rule and substituting therefor the following subdivision:

1. A railway or canal company, in the principal city, town or village in each country or district through which the proposed railway or canal is to be constructed.

I may say that in writing my notice in a hurry the other day I left out some words which are essential. My motion should have read as follows: 'A railway or canal company, in some leading newspaper published in the principal city, town or village in each county or district through which the said railway or canal is constructed.' We discussed the matter at a previous sitting of the House. It was simply this that if we allowed the rule to remain as reported at page 2 it would have been necessary not only to advertise in all those newspapers, but to send the notice to various officers by registered letter. In the House of Commons they have declined to adopt the change which we propose and we had better go back and adopt the rule as it was.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It throws us back on our practice of last year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to express my approval of this amendment, because it is the position I took in the first place, believing the proposition made in the report of the committee was altogether too complicated and could not be carried out.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the motion to adopt the report is put, I want to make two or three general remarks on our work on these rules. A great deal of labour has been bestowed on this report by the hon. member from Halifax and other members of the special committee, as well as by other members of the House, and I think it may be fairly claimed that not very many things have escaped observation, and that a fair expression of the opinion of the House has been obtained upon the whole. I wish, however, to make this remark; I feel as one of the minority in this House who has taken a rather active interest in the revising and framing of these rules, that I should express my appreciation, for myself at all events, of the great degree of fairness with which the consideration of these rules was approached by gentlemen on the government and on the other side of the House. In the matter of the rules, a minority must naturally feel more interested than the majority do, because the rules are their protection. They cannot vote down a proposition, but they can avail themselves of the rules of parliament to protect themselves to a very large extent, and that being so, it is a pleasant reflection to be able to make that in every case during the discussion of these rules there was a disposition shown on both sides of the House to treat the question altogether apart from any party advantage being taken or attempted by any one. I have great pleasure in making these remarks after witnessing the part taken by members on both sides during the discussion. With regard to the rules themselves, I am afraid they are not going to be an unmixed good to us, and for this reason, we have disturbed the old numbering and changed the form of our rules to such an extent as to render them less convenient to the old members than they were in the old form. After going through all this work and trouble I am free to say that if I were beginning the task again I would strongly advise the retaining of the old numbering as far as possible, making a few important alterations, such as experience has proved to be necessary, leaving the form of the rules as unchanged as possible. I doubt if many of these rules will bear the old numbering, and when the older members have occasion to refer to them they cannot do so with the same facility that they experienced in referring to the old rules. A good many of us are getting old and will be getting older and will experience the inconvenience for some time to come. Of course the new members will not find the same disadvantage.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to know if the Clerk of this House will have authority to renumber the rules?

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is understood.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And also to see to the headings and the lettering on sub-paragraphs.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Does the hon. gentleman wish to have the subsections numbered as well?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—These rules will require to be renumbered, because some have been struck out.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would suggest that they should be reprinted before the final adoption—I mean before being submitted to the committee to make them standing orders.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a reasonable proposition.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to have the French version in print. I have read some portions of the translation, and have noticed some defects. For instance the words 'select committee' in French is defined as it appears in the definition by a word that is not French at all. It might be accepted for the moment; but if we refer to paragraph 89 in the French version, we find the word 'select' translated by the word 'special' in French, which is not at all the idea to be conveyed. The word 'special is a subdivision of the word 'select,' and the word 'select' is a subdivision of the word 'committee. Committee is divided into committee of the whole, and select committee, is subdivided into 'standing and special committees.' Perhaps the translator did not grasp the idea in the subdivision of the word select, and he has put in the French translation the word 'special' in place of the word, 'select.' If we had the edition in French, we would be able to find out those defects in translation and have them corrected in proper time.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—A proper index should also be prepared.

The SPEAKER—It is the general understanding, without the necessity of a motion, that the clerk shall attend to the renumbering of the clauses ?

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Everything should be done that can possibly be done to make the rules an easy book of reference. An index should be prepared so that older members will not have the trouble the hon. gentleman from Marshfield anticipated.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose it is understood that an index will be made ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—A very clear and proper index should be prepared.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—A good index will be of great value. I would also suggest that the matter should be broken up into a larger number of headings than appear in the draft we have before us. The old rules were broken up very much that way, and it facilitated reference. because the matter was disclosed in large type on almost every page.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I understand that all that pertains to matters of form would be left to the clerk. and the same applies to the marginal notes, and in some cases the reference to the authorities.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I must say that I think the reference to the authorities would be more properly given to us in the Manual which would follow afterwards. It would not be just the right thing to say that the clerk was to put in the references to the authorities in rules which are to come up for consideration in a few days. That would be imposing an unreasonable task on the clerk ; but when we come to prepare the manual the references to the authorities might be put in.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Is it suggested that that part referring to procedure should be amended as well ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It will be revised.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Who will do the revision ? The Speaker ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Speaker and the clerk of the House and the law clerk.

The SPEAKER—That refers to the forms?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes. the forms of procedure. I notice that on a former revision the forms of procedure were dealt with by the same committee and were approved of by the House in the same manner as the rules were.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Never, never.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Was the manual not approved of ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No. What was approved of was the appendix to the forms themselves—not the general forms.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—Would it not be better to leave this matter to the Speaker ? Let the Speaker be charged with making these corrections.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—When will it be convenient to summon the House to concur in these rules ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—They have been concurred in ; but I think the better way will be to postpone their final adoption until the rules are printed and renumbered.

PRESTON DIVORCE BILL.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer) moved the adoption of the second report of the Standing Committee on Divorce, to whom was referred the Preston petition, together with the evidence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not rise to oppose this motion, but I wish to commend a suggestion to the consideration of the Committee on Divorce. Our practice has been to give a Bill of divorce and leave both parties, the innocent party and the guilty party, equally at liberty to marry again. My own belief is that that liberty should not be given to the guilty party, and I think that if parliament were to adopt the policy of not allowing the guilty party to marry again, we would have fewer Bills of divorce coming before us, and the opposition to those Bills would be much more resolute and energetic than it is now. I think it would save the time of the House and be a good thing for the country.

The motion was agreed to.

VAUGHAN DIVORCE BILL.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Consideration of the first report of the Standing Committee on Divorce, to whom was referred the Vaughan petition, together with the evidence.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer) moved the adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have looked over the evidence and I cannot say that I concur in the report. I observe that the notice is somewhat irregular. It appeared yesterday as being set down for Friday next. In the first place, it was ordered for yesterday but set down for the 4th in error. Last Friday it was set down for Tuesday, but a mistake was made in some way and it was set down for Friday the 4th. I know several hon. gentlemen who were taking an interest in the matter did not expect it to come up to-day, and I think we had better postpone it until to-morrow in order that hon. gentlemen may have more opportunity to consider it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I might say that the adoption of the report is simply an interim proceeding, so to speak. The Bill has not been introduced. It is introduced on the adoption of the report, and of course has to go through the different readings, thus permitting the House to investigate the matter and either support or reject the Bill as may be deemed desirable. However, if my hon. friend wishes, it may stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understood that by adopting the report we would be adopting the recommendation of the committee that a Bill should be passed. That was my view, but if it is clearly understood that nobody is committed to that principle, we might adopt the report now, it being clearly understood that we have the fullest liberty of action when the Bill is reached.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would point out that during the past week this report has always been set down for consideration on Friday. I do not know why it comes up to-day. If you will look at page 228 of the Minutes of Proceedings, you will find it set down for Friday, May 4. On page 215 it is set down for Friday, April 27. Every day it has been advertised for a Friday, until the one which has just passed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Still the order of the House was that it should be set down for Tuesday. The mistake was in putting it down for to-day.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no objection to postponing the consideration of the report. As the Bill has to receive its three readings before the House, hon. members are at liberty at any time to discuss it fully.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (P. E. I.)—I wish to call attention to the fact that the evidence in this case has not been laid before the members of the Senate. I have not received a copy, and many other members are in the same position.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The evidence was distributed, I understand, nearly a week ago.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (P. E. I.)—It has not come to hand.

The Order of the Day was then discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (F) 'An Act for the relief of Mary Emeline Preston'—(Hon. Mr. Perley).

The Senate then adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Thursday, May 3, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

WINTER COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

INQUIRY.

The Order of the Day being called that Hon Mr. Ferguson :

Will call the attention of the House to the vote of $175,000 passed during the last session of parliament for the 'construction of ice-breaking steamers for lower St. Lawrence and Northumberland Straits and also to the promise made by the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Hon. Mr. Préfontaine, to the people of Prince Edward Island in the month of October last, that a powerful steamer of not less than 5,000 horse-power would be built for the purpose of providing continuous and efficient steam communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland as guaranteed by the terms under which Prince Edward Island entered confederation, and also, to the further promise made at the same time and place by the said Mr. Préfontaine that the steamer in question, would be ready for service in November of the present year and also to the statement made to this House on Friday last by the Honourable the Secretary of State that no steamer is under construction, except one of such dimensions, tonnage and horse-power as will be wholly inadequate for the performance of the service in question.

And, will inquire of the government, why no steps have been taken to carry out the promises made by the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the matter herein referred to.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Hon. gentlemen will observe from the notice which I have placed on the order paper, that it is my desire to call the attention of the House to certain matters in connection with winter communication with Prince Edward Island and the mainland. I do not intend to make any extended observations, but wish to lay a few facts before the House and then make an inquiry of the government which will be found in my notice. I need not say that the matter of communication with the mainland in winter is a question of life and death to Prince Edward Island. Hon. gentlemen are aware that for the three winters previous to the last one a great deal of inconvenience, a great deal of interruption and consequent loss and difficulty occurred. The past winter was a very mild one all over Canada, and consequently there was very little trouble, but we need not expect that the past winter will be the average winter. It is much more likely that such winters as preceded it will be the average winter, and therefore it is neither wise nor prudent to judge from the experience of the past season and throw aside all necessary precautions, or change propositions that were decided upon last year with regard to the future of this service. I wish first to call the attention of my hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce to a discussion which took place last year in this House when I brought this question up. On that occasion I made these observations.

I want to warn the government before they expend this money not to be satisfied with getting a boat that will be merely something like the other two boats we had. It will be throwing money away. These two boats, as far as they go, are doing very well but what is wanted is a more powerful boat than either of them. My hon. colleague from Montague, I am sorry to see, is not in the House at this moment, but if he were here he would be able to state the views of Captain Brown, the captain of the 'Stanley.' Those views are in the line of my observations and, if I understand my colleague right, Captain Brown is of opinion that a boat of 6,000 or 7,000 horse-power ought to be procured, and that a boat of that power would be almost certain to effect the desired object. That is his opinion after having had many years' experience of navigating the straits as captain of the 'Stanley.'

Then the Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright, Minister of Trade and Commerce said :

The hon. gentleman has himself called attention to a point that I was going to make ; that is to say, that there was a vote in the estimates for the purpose of obtaining a better service. He has also mentioned the fact that the conditions of last winter were extraordinary, as was very well seen from the extremely prolonged blockade on the mainland. It is hoped that it will not be repeated for a considerable term of years. I shall convey the hon. gentleman's views to the government. I may say that I am myself of his opinion that this is not a case in which a trifling sum of money should be allowed to interfere with procuring better communication.

That was all very well. The matter came up in the other branch of this parliament, on the vote of this $175,000, and we find that the Hon. Raymond Prefontaine, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, made these remarks :

Hon. RAYMOND PREFONTAINE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). It is intended to provide a new steamer to assist the two steamers plying between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. The steamers at present in use are first class as far as they go, but for the last two winters they have not given satisfaction, and it is thought that with the construction of a modern ice-breaking steamer it will be possible to give satisfaction on this service. In this item is also included provision for the construction of a small ice-breaker to help the 'Montcalm' in winter and which in summer will be used as a sweeper on the St. Lawrence route.

The minister was interrogated a little further on, by Mr. Martin, one of the members for Queen's, P.E.I.:

Mr. A. MARTIN. Is this vote of $175,000 for one steamer or two ?

Mr PREFONTAINE This amount would not of course provide for the construction of two steamers. It is not expected that the steamer for the Prince Edward Island route will be ready before a year from next November, so that the extra amount required for her can be voted next session. It is estimated that the steamer for Prince Edward Island will cost at least $250,000 to $300,000.

Then a little further on Mr. Martin asked the minister:

Mr. A. MARTIN. Can the minister give us some idea of when he expects to call for tenders for the new boat?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Within the next two or three months.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Will the boat be on the route for the succeeding winter?

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Yes, so as to have the steamer ready for November, 1906?

Now this is what occurred in both Houses of parliament with regard to this question during the last session. The late minister, the Hon. Mr. Préfontaine, visited Prince Edward Island, and he made a speech on a public occasion in the city of Charlottetown, and I shall now read from the three papers published in Charlottetown, the Conservative paper, the Liberal paper, and an independent organ, which papers publish the summary of what he said there. Two of them deal with a speech delivered on a public occasion, and the 'Patriot', the Liberal paper, deals with an interview which he gave that paper. This occurred on the 11th October, 1905. The report reads as follows:

He detailed the steps taken in regard to the new winter steamer, the inquiries to obtain information and the bringing out of an expert from the greatest building firm in England.

I might remark that this is from the 'Guardian' newspaper. The report continues:

This expert having visited the Island would go west to Port Arthur and Mackinaw and afterward design the boat. He did not think the straits ice so hard as the fresh water ice, and believed a steamer could be built to go through it. The 'Montcalm' did good work in the St. Lawrence with 3,000 horse-power. He expected to make a contract shortly for a steamer of 5,000 horse-power strong in proportion for the Northumberland Straits, with a capacity of 150 tons of freight, with all modern facilities for loading and unloading, and to have the steamer ready by November, 1906. Pictou would be the port on the other side till a better is found. The minister's statements about the new steamer created a most favourable impression and were heartily cheered.

The 'Examiner', another daily paper published in Charlottetown, gave the following report:

He was convinced that with a proper ice breaker there is no difficulty that cannot be overcome. He had canvassed his colleagues with the plea that something must be done for Prince Edward Island. After a good deal of discussion they had consented, and given him a practically free hand. Through the good offices of Lord Strathcona, he had obtained the services of an experienced draughtsman, long in the employ of the greatest shipbuilding firm in the world and this gentleman will go over the whole field, will examine into the conditions, not only here but in Port Arthur and Fort William and the Mackinaw Strait, and so be in a position to plan a boat which will assure success. This boat will be about 5,000 horse-power, have a capacity for 150 tons of freight and 500 tons of coal, and be supplied with all modern facilities. A contract will be concluded in time to have the boat ready for service in the fall of 1906.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What was the date of that speech?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Last October. After making these statements in parliament, the minister visited the island on October 11, and made a speech under the auspices of the Charlottetown Board of Trade, which was reported by the two island papers, one an independent paper, and the 'Examiner,' a Conservative paper, and it is from this speech I am now reading. Now I will come to an interview which he furnished to the 'Patriot' newspaper, the Liberal organ, which interview was published on the following day. It reads as follows:

Hon. Mr. Préfontaine who courteously accorded an interview to the 'Patriot' reporter stated that the object of his visit was to confer with the people of the island regarding the winter service. The expert, Mr. Charles Duguid, of London, who had been sent to the island by the department to study the conditions of winter communication had been recommended by Lord Strathcona, as a very capable man for the work. The department in constructing the new winter steamer will be guided almost entirely by the opinion of the expert. The report presentetd by a local commission composed of Messrs. Horace Hazard, Nelson Rattenbury, and Captains Finlayson and Brown will also be given careful consideration. The new steamer for which $175,000 was voted last year in order to start work would be completed, he expected, about the first of November, 1906.

These were the declarations made in parliament last year, and these were the further supplementary declarations made by the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the Hon. Raymond Préfontaine, in Charlottetown, on the 11th October last. The hon. Secretary of State will remember that I placed on the order paper the other day an inquiry as to the dimensions, cost and other particulars with regard to the steamer that was said to be now under construction in England for the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and I received the following answer:

1. Dimensions, length between perpendiculars, 172 feet; breadth moulded, 32 feet; depth moulded, 18 feet; draft mean, 12 feet.
2. Tonnage, displacement in tons, 1,030 tons.
3. Horse-power, 2,250.
4. The date of the contracts, March 13, 1906.
5. The date fixed for completion, September, 1906.
6. (a) Cost, £44,260.
(b) Also, if an additional ice-breaking steamer is under contract? No.

It thus turns out that, at the present time, the small steamer that was in contemplation for the St. Lawrence is well under way, and that not one step has been taken, notwithstanding these solemn promises made in parliament last year, and by the late minister in Charlottetown during his visit to the island on the 11th October, towards the providing of a steamer for the winter service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. That is the whole case that I have to present, and my inquiry is pertinent to these observations and to the facts I have set before the House. Why no steps have been taken to carry out the promises made by the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the matter referred to.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The only answer I can give is, that parliament did not make the appropriation. Parliament only voted last year the sum of $175,000 for the steamer for the lower St. Lawrence and Northumberland Straits. The late Mr. Préfontaine's suggestion does not seem to have been adopted by parliament, and, therefore, no order could have been given for the work unless there had been a vote in anticipation. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries seems to think that the service will be efficiently performed this year, because there will be practically a third steamer on the route. There are two steamers on now, the 'Minto' and the 'Stanley.' The 'Minto' is a comparatively new vessel, and has shown her capacity on several occasions to cope with the difficulties that intervene in the waters lying between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, and my hon. friend will admit that at all events there has been a very great improvement as years have gone on. When I had to defend the government in the early seventies, after the Mackenzie government came in, the only vessel on that route was the 'Northern Light,' a wooden vessel. She was the only vessel plying in winter between the island and the mainland up to 1888, when the 'Stanley' was put on. Then, in 1900, the present government added to the service the 'Minto.' We have since had two vessels, and the minister informs me that it is the intention to use the ice-breaker that was purchased two or three years ago for the purpose of sweeping the St. Lawrence—that is the 'Montcalm.' She will be employed probably in the lower St. Lawrence up to the early part of the winter, when it is proposed, if her services are needed in addition to the 'Minto' and 'Stanley,' to utilize her also and keep open the crossing between the island and the mainland. Of course, in the past, the attempts to cope with the navigation in those waters has been experimental, as it will probably be in the future also. Up to the present time no one has been able to assume that a boat of any capacity could at times cope with the mountains of ice that pile up in the narrower portions between the island and mainland. All I can say is, it is to be hoped that we will be as fortunate this coming winter as we were last winter, when no serious impediment interfered with the communication between the island and the mainland, and that the addition of the 'Montcalm' may render such efficient service as will, at all events, make the communication as satisfactory as it was last winter, which my hon. friend admits was quite sufficient for the occasion. It was a mild winter, and I assume that the accumulation of ice was not as great as in former years. I shall call the attention of my colleague to the observations of my hon. friend, and remind him of the promises made in parliament by the late minister. No vote was taken on that occasion, and, of course, no order could be given for the boat in the absence of any provision for its payment. I do not know on what authority the statement was made by Mr. Préfontaine, unless he did so without recommending to the government the insertion in the estimates of a sum sufficient to meet the expenses of the second steamer. The $175,000 will not really pay for the present boat because the price given the other day, which I quoted—£44,000 sterling—would amount to more than the $175,000 voted, so it is quite clear that the only explanation is that there was no money voted by parliament for the service.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Surely my hon. friend is not serious in saying that it is impossible to make a contract because there was not sufficient money voted by parliament to complete it? Why, here are the words as reported in Hansard :—

Ocean and river service to provide for the construction of an additional ice-breaker, and steamers for the lower St. Lawrence and Northumberland straits, $175,000.

Then the late minister explains that this, of course, would not provide for the construction of two steamers ; that it is not expected that they will be completed for this amount, and that a further sum will have to be voted at the next session. My hon. friend knows very well that it is a matter of almost daily occurrence to enter on a work and make a contract when there is not enough money appropriated to complete the contract. The custom is to make use of what you have, and then come to parliament for more. and that is what the minister said would be the course pursued. There was enough voted to warrant them in making a contract for the construction of two steamers, and then they could come to parliament for the necessary vote such as Mr. Préfontaine promised last year would be asked for. My hon. friend cannot be serious when he says that we ought to be satisfied if the service across the straits of Northumberland is as good or somewhat better than it was thirty-three years ago. The world is moving, and we should not be satisfied with the present service simply because there has been some slight improvement in it since the days of the 'Northern Light.' We cannot be expected to be denied improvement in this matter such as is going on in every other part of the Dominion and every other part of the world.

APPOINTMENT OF HONORARY COLONELS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

In view of the fact that certain lieutenant-colonels of the active militia who lately obtained their promotion to the rank of honorary colonels have been continued in their commands, and are to go on active service at the next training, which places them, although colonels, under the command of lieutenant-colonels officers commanding districts or officers commanding divisions, do the military authorities intend to do away with or to prevent such anomalies by appointing, as honorary-colonels or as temporary colonels, the officers commanding districts, divisions or camps, when such anomalies may be brought about.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer given by the department is as follows :

1. One lieutenant-colonel of the active militia has been granted the honorary rank of colonel upon retirement. (Authority G.O. 68, 1905).

2. Honorary rank does not carry with it command. So that in event of the officer in question being temporarily employed, he would rank for command according to the date of his lieutenant-colonel's commission.

3. No anomaly would be caused therefrom by the employment of this officer under a lieutenant-colonel senior to him, or under a district officer commanding ex-officio commands all within his district regardless of rank. (See K. and O. paragraph 95).

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is the opinion of the department I suppose ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is contrary to law !

THE ST. THOMAS BANK GAS BUOY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

On the 3rd of November, 1905, what were the characteristics of the St. Thomas Bank gas buoy ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Black spherical iron buoy surmounted by a lantern.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was the light occulting or fixed ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Occulting.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was it white or coloured ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—White.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If occulting, how many seconds was it visible, and how many seconds eclipsed ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Visible eight seconds, eclipsed seven seconds.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was the buoy illuminated with ordinary or with acetylene gas ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Pintsch gas up to October 24, and then changed to acetylene.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What is the length in inches of the focal distance of its lens lantern, if the illuminating apparatus is dioptric ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Lens eight inches diameter, focal distance four inches.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—At what distance, in clear weather, is that light to be seen ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Six miles.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—During the whole navigation season of 1905 was ever that gas buoy out ? How many times ? At what dates ? And how many hours on each occasion ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. It was never out.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—At what distance is that St. Thomas gas buoy from the Crane island light and from the Grosse Isle gas buoy ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Two nautical miles from Crane island light, and three nautical miles from Grosse Isle.

FRENCH TRANSLATION OF DEBATES.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to give to the hon. member from Stadacona the reason why the debates in French have not been distributed, except some 48 pages. I find that there has been translated and sent down to the Printing Bureau—the last part of it on the 19th of April—the translation of 196 pages of the English debates, and the delay is no doubt in the Printing Bureau. The first proof has been sent back only for the 48 pages which have been distributed.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS OF MONTREAL BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (55) An Act respecting the powers of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

He said : Last session an Act was passed authorizing the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal to take from the revenue of the harbour a sum of six thousand dollars, to erect a monument to the late Hon. John Young, within the harbour of Montreal. The late Mr. Young was a merchant of the city and the city people think that there are more appropriate places for the monument than immediately in the harbour, and this is simply to authorize the erection of the monument within the city of Montreal, not confining it only to the harbour. That is the only change.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

HENRY EDMUNDS PATENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved the second reading of Bill (69) An Act respecting certain patents of Henry Edmunds.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend if the patentee has worked under his patent—has put his patent into operation—or what are the circumstances attending its operation ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—By this Bill it would appear that he had not. I am not aware whether he has or not, but I intend to refer the Bill to the Miscellaneous Private Bills Committee where an investigation into the merits of the case will be made.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CHESTER BURNELL DURYEA PATENT BILL.

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. POIRIER moved the second reading of Bill (79) An Act respecting certain patents of Chester Burnell Duryea.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I observe that there are no less than three Bills on the order paper to-day regarding patents.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Four.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—We have come to deal largely with patents by legislation of this kind, and I find that a great many people are disposed to destroy a patent when they expire. As it is becoming a very common and increasing practice I think we should have an explanation of the reason why these Bills are introduced. Of course explanations are usually given to the committee, but there are only a very few members of this House on that committee, and we affirm the principle of a Bill when we adopt the second reading, so that I think we should, after this, have some extended explanation of why it is found necessary to extend or void patents by Bills of this kind. I should like to know what the explanation is.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Not expecting the question to be put to me, I am not prepared to offer an explanation of this patent that would do justice to the Bill. For that reason I will ask the honourable House to proceed in the usual manner and have the Bill sent to the committee, and then the parties interested will furnish the proper explanation, I agree with my hon. friend that they should do so. The Bill will be dealt with in the committee on its merits and will either be returned to the House for the third reading or rejected.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Bill itself shows what is intended. Apparently he has failed to construct or manufacture in Canada within the time provided by law the invention for which he obtained the patent, and this Bill provides in the first clause that the time shall be extended for one year from the passing of this Act. The second clause protects the right of any person other than the patentee who may have manufactured or sold the article. His rights are not to be interfered with.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—They should give some reason for presenting the Bill to us. They cannot expect to pass these measures without doing so. I wanted a full explanation of why the Bill was worded in that form. What are the facts connected with it ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Explanations with respect to private Bills are always given in the standing committees to which the Bills are referred.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

HENRY WURTS PATENT BILL.

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. POIRIER moved the second reading of Bill (106) An Act respecting applications for patents of Henry Wurts, Junior.

He said : I have looked into this Bill, and I may explain that it is a matter of enabling a lunatic who, previously of course to his lunacy, applied for a patent and I believe obtained it. This Bill is to protect his interests and enable his guardians to take care of that patent and make it profitable if possible, in the interest of the confined sick person this Bill is applied for. I am pretty sure there will be no objection to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Did he make his application since he became a lunatic ?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—No, I think it was done before he was a lunatic—although we have instances of lunatics having made some very valuable inventions, as my hon. friend is certainly aware. I believe there are some at Prince Edward Island who have performed such feats.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The application is made in this case by the guardian, because there is no provision in the Patent Act for allowing the guardian of a lunatic to take out a patent.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

LABOUR STATISTICS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (109) An Act to repeal the Act to provide for the collection and publishing of Labour Statistics.

He said : The circumstances under which the Bill was introduced are these : A good many years ago, prior to the existence of the present bureau of labour, this Bill was passed directing the Department of Agriculture to obtain certain information with respect to labour statistics. Since that time other legislation has taken place, and the Department of Labour is now charged with this same duty and with more extended powers. The gentlemen who are engaged in the revision of the statutes have recommended that to prevent confusion this former Act of 1890 be repealed, and this is simply a short Act to repeal it. Practically it leaves the matter now under the control of the department to which it more properly belongs ; that is, the Department of Labour.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say whether the statistical branch was ever organized within the Department of Agriculture ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I do not think any work was done with respect to that. I believe this Act was originally passed in 1890, but no action was taken. Since the creation of the Department of Labour some action was taken, and they appear to have fuller powers then were granted to the Department of Agriculture. My hon. friend will see that it is advisable there should not be two authorities dealing with the matter, that the Department of Labour should not be doing the same work that the Department of Agriculture is expected to do. The special recommendation, however, in the case came from the commissioners who have been engaged in revising the statutes, and they desire to have this Act repealed in order that the statutes, which will be completed at the termination of the present session, shall be made as perfect as possible.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was in hopes, when I saw this notice on the order paper that it meant something different from what I see now it does. I was in hopes that it indicated an intention on the part of the government to repeal the most recent legislation—to repeal the Act creating the labour bureau, which I regard as a waste of public money. I am told that the 'Labour Gazette' is costing the country $20,000 a year and I am certain that it is not of any value to labour or to any other interest. I never saw such stuff put together with any claim that it is of interest to any portion of the public.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am afraid that is out of our purview. At any rate my hon. friend will see that it is not desirable to have two parties wasting the public money, if there be a waste. One would be enough.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CALGARY AND EDMONTON RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (77) An Act respecting the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—As this corporation has been for a number of years in existence, and as the object for which it has been incorporated has not been carried out, and as we are not aware of the terms on which the Act of incorporation was had, or the legislation granted in 1890, 1891, 1898, 1903, and 1905, and as the company is asking that this legislation apply to the extension, I think it would be just as well if the hon. gentleman would explain to us the nature of the extension and whether it affects any land grants or subsidies granted to the corporation under former legislation ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I shall be very happy indeed to give the House the information my hon. friend asks for. If he had acquainted himself with the facts he would not have made the statement that this road has not carried out its obligations—that is the obligations thrown on it by the charter. This road has been constructed. It has now somewhere in the vicinity of 500 miles of line in operation, and the Bill asks, practically, for a new extension. A couple of sessions ago, power was given to the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company to build certain branches. One of them is known as the Lacombe branch. That has been built, and it is desired to extend that branch as provided by clause 1, of the Bill. This Bill simply asks for power to extend the branch further than was at first contemplated.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The hon. gentleman provides in the last clause that all the provisions of the Company's Act of incorporation shall apply to this extension. The hon. gentleman did not tell us how far the extension is to go, and to what extent the existing Act is to apply! He did not say whether under the existing Act there would be any subsidy or whether there is any appropriation, and, if such is the case, would the company have the right to have that appropriation or land grant granted to this branch?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend may obtain a certain amount of comfort from the statement that in these railway charters provision is not made as to land grants. The land grants, or the cash subsidies, which from time to time may be given to railways, are provided for in a general subsidy Bill, which is invariably brought down as a government measure, and by the government, near the close of the session. My hon. friend need not, hereafter, look in these private charters for any provision as to land grants or cash subsidies.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—What is the effect of the last clause then?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend will see that it is desirable to extend the provisions of the general incorporating Act of this company to the branch line, so that there may be uniformity throughout.

The motion was agreed to.

VAUGHAN DIVORCE BILL.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE CONSIDERED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer, moved that the report be adopted.

After debate, at six o'clock, Hon. Mr. Landry moved that the debate be adjourned till Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Pursuant to the Order of the Day the House went into Committee of the Whole on Bill (S3) An Act to amend the Act respecting the Judges of Provincial Courts.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Last session we passed an Act limiting the travelling expenses of the judges of the several courts, and in regard to the judges affected by the first clause of this Bill, there was this proviso:

Provided that the total amount of such travelling allowances shall not in the case of any district or county court judge exceed $200 in any one year.

It is found that that is wholly inadequate for the judges in certain districts in Manitoba and British Columbia and also in the districts courts of the province of Ontario; and that proviso is struck out. The Bill is the result of a conference between the judges and the Minister of Justice some time ago, and he felt that the proviso added to the clause to which I have referred deprived them of money actually paid out of pocket.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think my hon. friend gave notice at the second reading of the Bill that he would substitute some other clause for some of the provisions which are in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was under that impression.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Bill is drawn by the Department of Justice to meet the conditions brought to their attention by judges who, both personally and by letter, have communicated with them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What are we to understand by moving and transportation expenses? Is this $6 simply for meals, or does it include the cost of sleeping-car transportation and so on?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume sleeping-car fares would be in transportation expenses ; the other is in addition.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend will at once observe the disparity between the line which he took a few moments ago as to amending the Indemnity Act and the provisions of this Bill. This would be equivalent to allowing a judge at least $10 a day, if the sleeping-car charges are to be additional to the amount provided for.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My suggestion left it optional. As to the per diem allowance for living expenses, the amendment which I suggested to the Bill affecting the House of Commons and the Senate was that the $8 a day should be optional. They could either take that or send in a Bill of expenses.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My recollection of the Bill as introduced by the Minister of Justice is that it does not contain the optional provision. I think my hon. friend has ascertained that that has been eliminated.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suggested a number of amendments to that Bill, but they have not been printed yet, and they have not been discussed in the House of Commons, so that perhaps it is premature our discussing the matter here. I may say in a general way that I thought provision ought to be made for members or senators who are sick at Ottawa, that they should not be charged the $15 a day for loss of time. In fact I went further, in regard to members who are at home and who have the intention to be at the seat of government, if they should be ill I think they ought not to be docked the $15 a day. That is my own idea, and that is the suggestion which I made.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I point out by way of comparison the provisions of the two sections. The section of the Indemnity Act of last session dealing with the allowances to members reads as follows :

> For each session of parliament hereafter held, there shall also be allowed to each member of the Senate and of the House of Commons his actual moving or transportation expenses between his place of residence and Ottawa, going and coming, once each way.

Now, in this Bill you allow to judges six dollars a day in addition to that ; so that the contrast at once becomes so apparent and so great as to call for comment and to justify members of parliament asking that they should be placed on as good a footing as the judges of provincial courts.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a pretty serious puzzle to get this thing arranged on a basis to suit all localities. In some cases a judge is carried along thirty miles an hour at a three cent per mile rate, and in other cases he has to have a buck-board to travel across the country.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not taking exception to the allowances to the judges. I think that is reasonable enough, but I am pointing out the unreasonableness of the Act of last session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The other provisions are somewhat similar until you come down to (c). That has reference to the district courts in Ontario—the districts of Algoma, Nipissing and Rainy River, where the difficulties of travelling are very great.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I desire to point out an anomaly in this Bill in section (a). The latter part of the section reads as fol lows :

> The sum of six dollars for each day including necessary days of travel going and returning, during which he is attending as such judge in court or chambers at any place other than that at which he is by law obliged to reside.

My attention has been directed to the case of many judges who reside at points other than the points where by law they are compelled to reside. What will be the effect of this Bill in such case ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not prepared to give an explanation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Comment has been made by Quebec members as to judges residing out of the district.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The clause provides that where his residence is not fixed by law the allowance shall not be made for the attendance at the county court or at his place of residence.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. MACKEEN from the committee reported the Bill without amendment.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS OF MONTREAL BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (55) An Act respecting the powers of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is just one clause in the Bill. As I explained before, this Bill gives authority to the Harbour Commissioners to place the monument they propose to erect in memory of the late Hon. John Young anywhere in the city of Montreal, while the former Bill restricted it to the Harbour.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Is it with the consent of the corporation of the city of Montreal ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it is at their instance.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.) from the committee reported the Bill without amendment.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at three o'clock.

THE MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before Senate a statement relating to the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York showing :

1. The amount of life insurances in force in the Dominion on 31st December, 1905.
2. The amount of security deposited with the Dominion government.
3. The nature of the security.
4. If in gold, how much ?
5. If in bonds, how much ?
6. Who are the issuers of the bonds ?
7. Are the bonds given in security taken at par or face value, or at the supposed market value.
8. How is the market value ascertained.
9. What means are taken to know if the makers or issuers of bonds taken as security are solvent from year to year.
10. In the event of the value of bonds falling below that at which they are taken as security, how would the deficiency in the security necessary to be held be made up.
11. Has the security deposited by the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York fallen in value at any time below that necesary to be deposited according to law.

He said : This is a very important motion, and one which touches a great many people in the Dominion of Canada. I desire first of all to commend the government on the action that they have taken in appointing a commission to investigate the standing of the insurance companies. We have seen the necessity of it from day to day in the reports of the investigations that are being carried on. That investigation has already borne fruit, not of a very savory character, but I hope it will prove salutary hereafter. There are many insurance companies in Canada, as there were in England some years ago, that ought to be weeded out, companies with small capital. In that country they were called fraudulent companies and were abolished by acts of parliament. Whether measures of that kind are necessary in Canada or not I do not know. It has been found necessary also in the United States to inquire into the insurance companies of New York, and some of the largest and most wealthy of the companies in that country have been found guilty of the greatest extravagance, the grossest immorality, and perhaps of the greatest dishonesty. It is time that something should be done, and I hope something will be done when this commission reports, to enact the strictest legislation to make those companies conform in every way to the law. The supervisor of insurance ought to be a thoroughly competent man, and, perhaps, an actuary who will fearlessly do his duty and carry out the law of the country. In my motion I refer more particularly to the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, which was supposed to be the wealthiest and best conducted insurance company in any part of the world ; but lately we have seen that this high reputation cannot be maintained. The question of security is a very important one. Suppose the people of this country have policies in force amounting to $30,000,000, what security should be held by the government to meet that large amount? Actuaries, I suppose, would find out what those figures should be. I do not know what they ought to be, but in the Dominion of Canada this one company has now about $30,000,000 at risk, and the deposits with the Dominion government are only about $7,000,000. If that is sufficient I do not know, but if it is not it ought to be increased. If the security is in gold it is perfectly safe, but if in bonds who is to say what the bonds are worth? Are the bonds valued at par, or at what is supposed to be their market value? Companies depositing them say that while their face value is $1,000,000 their market value is $3,000,000. Now it requires a supervisor of marked ability to determine the value of these bonds, and by whom they are issued. I repeat if there is any weakness in the Insurance Act, the government should rectify it, and protect the public from dishonesty and wrong-doing. It is exceedingly important to know whether the bonds are those of solvent companies. There is one class of bonds deposited by the company referred to in my motion, the par value of which is about $900,000 while their present market value is about $3,000,000. At which of these valuations has the security been accepted by the government? I believe at the highest market value, and it is absolutely necessary that there should be no doubt that they are worth the amount at which they are valued. On the other hand, while they may be worth their present high value today they may not be worth as much tomorrow, and I beseech the government, not only in dealing with this company but in dealing with every foreign and domestic company, to adopt the strictest legislation necessary for the perfect security of the policy-holders of this country.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The government can have no objection to giving the information asked for in this return. As to the general question. I suggest to my hon. friend that we would perhaps do well to wait until we are put in possession of the evidence now being taken by the commission before we enter into a detailed discussion of the very interesting and important questions which he has raised. I may state, however, with respect to foreign companies, that the general principle followed is this: that foreign companies must deposit in the hands of the government, or in the hands of trustees, a sufficient amount of money to enable them fully to re-insure all the policies taken out in Canada, so that the Canadian policy-holder, if this is carried out, will be very fully secured. That is the general policy of the Act, and the general policy of the government. As to the special points he has raised, the information will be brought down; but I may say, as a rule I think, in the case of the foreign companies they have all, or most of them, larger sums deposited in the hands of the government than the superintendent of insurance believes necessary to re-insure the policies. In certain cases such as my hon. friend has alluded to, the par value is probably less than the value at which it is taken, but I think in almost all cases he will find that the value at which the securities are received by the government is considerably below the actual market value, that is in such cases as I fancy he has in view.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Ten per cent below par value.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Below market value, but above par value. In certain cases that will be found to be the case. However, the whole of the information will be brought down at the earliest possible moment, and when we have that and the report of the commission in our hands the matter can be discussed, if the House so desires it, at greater length. Meantime I may say that the government are fully alive to the great importance of seeing that the policy-holders in Canada are amply secured, not merely as regards the foreign companies but as regards the Canadian companies also, and that no exertion on their part will be spared to bring about that most desirable end.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If my hon. friend had followed the evidence which was given before the commission in Ottawa by the inspector of insurance he would have seen that, as far as that officer is concerned, no discredit has been cast upon any of the stock companies in the Dominion of Canada. He rather reflected upon the mutual companies, and said that he would advise that they should not be encouraged, but that the stock companies, so far as he knew, and so far as his experience had gone, were all in fairly good shape. Now, my hon. friend must understand that the agents of the different stock companies in this Dominion are out competing for business at this present moment. Is it right that they should be subjected to the inconvenience which undoubtedly they will experience in soliciting insurance? The general reply will be, 'Well we want to wait to see what the investigation will amount to, and see whether it is going to be safe to make an application to your company.' I think we should be extremely careful in casting aspersions upon any of the stock companies, companies which have been in existence for many years, and have honourably met all their obligations. There is not a stock company in Canada to-day which has not met every policy that has matured in the last fifty years honourably and promptly. Since that is the record of the stock companies in Canada, I think we ought to be more considerate and more careful in saying anything that would injure their standing until at least there is some evidence that they are not what they claim to be. I have no desire to restrict in any way the investigation which is going on. I believe it will do good, because it will teach the people of Canada to give their life risks to the home companies which have a stake in the country and have a deposit with the government and which have conducted their business in a creditable way. I believe people will begin to realize that it would be better to put their money into home institutions. So far, they have had a creditable record. They have paid all their obligations and no one has anything to complain of. When the report is brought down I trust that it will show that these companies are well and prudently managed. It has been remarked that the expenses have been somewhat high. Any man who has any idea of what insurance is must admit that the expenses will of necessity be large. A great deal of work has to be done in securing applications for insurance. If the expense is large it is partly the people's fault, because agents have to run back to a man half a dozen times, and sometimes get assistance before they can close an application for a policy. All these things count for money; time is money, and the result is that the cost of business is sometimes large; but take it all in all, I think the companies are fairly well handled, and I do hope that they will get credit at least for honestly dealing by the people of this country, especially our home companies, until such time as it is proven that they have been guilty of some wrong-doing.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman from Wellington will remember that I did not mention stock companies or any other company. My remarks refer to all insurance companies. If the institutions he mentions are so much above suspicion they cannot be hurt by an inquiry. They ought to be proud to come out of it with a clean showing. I will go further than that and say that all the loan investment companies in Canada as well as all the insurance companies should be inspected, and made to give an account of what they are doing.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think the hon. gentleman from Wellington did not interpret the motion made by my hon. friend on this side in the right spirit. He simply asked to have the returns in reference to the New York Mutual—not the stock companies. True we have every confidence in the stock companies. We have just as much appreciation of their work as the hon. member from Wellington, but we have reason to believe that some of the mutual companies are not what they ought to be, and the government of the day should see that the proper securities are in their possession so as to guarantee the safety of those who have been insured if the companies should fail. Is that wrong? He talks about injuring insurance companies. Are we not to consider the poor people who have invested their money, placed their savings for a rainy day in the hands of these institutions? Is our whole anxiety to be that we should say nothing and do nothing whereby we might in any way weaken some of these institutions? While I have every faith in our insurance companies, yet I have not that faith in the policy of some of these mutual companies that we should have. Let us guard the interests of those who are not capable of guarding themselves. That is the purpose for which we are here; we are not here to bolster up any company or class of companies, and therefore I say the hon. member from Victoria is deserving of all credit for bringing this matter before the House.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I wish to add a word of explanation. My hon. friend charges me with not having spoken to the resolution. My remarks were not on the resolution especially, but more in connection with what the hon. gentleman said in moving it.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTRA JUDICIAL EMPLOYMENT OF JUDGES.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

By the Honourable Mr. Ferguson:—
That he will introduce a bill respecting the Extra Judicial Employment of Judges.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I ask that this order stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Are we to understand by this notice of motion that a notice of motion must be given now to introduce a Bill?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, it is not necessary to give a notice. I did it for a purpose. I wished the House not to be taken by surprise. It is quite optional to do it if you like.

The Order of the Day was discharged and postponed until to-morrow.

THE ROSS RIFLE COMPANY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

When did Sir Charles Ross file his declaration of partnership, the declaration in which he constitutes himself sole proprietor in the Ross Rifle Company?
To whom was this declaration delivered?
Has it been published by its insertion in full in the 'Canada Gazette' or in the official gazette of any province of Canada, or by any mention of its contents in the 'Canada Gazette' or in the official gazette of any province of Canada, or in any other document?
When did such publication take place, and where can it be found?

Hon. Mr. WILSON.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am afraid the answer which has been sent to me by the Militia Department will hardly satisfy my hon. friend. The answer of the Militia Department is that the government have no information on the subject of this question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is quite right.

EMPLOYEES OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved:

That an order do issue instructing the clerk of the Senate to lay upon the table of the Senate a return showing:—
1. The number of permanent clerks upon the pay roll of the Senate in 1896, and in 1906.
2. The number of sessional clerks upon the pay roll in 1896, and in 1906.
3. The number of permanent messengers in 1896, and in 1906.
4. The number of sessional messengers employed in 1896, and in 1906.
5. The number of charwomen employed in 1896, and in 1906.
6. The total expenditure of the Senate under the head of 'Contingencies,' for the session of 1895-6 and for the session of 1904-5, not including the amount paid for the leather trunks.

I have added the last clause because it may be possible that at one or other of these periods the expenditure for trunks might be included and not in the other, and consequently it would not be a fair comparison. I do not propose to discuss the question further than to move the motion for the reason that I understand the Secretary of State desires to be present when the report of the Contingent Committee is considered, and if we have this return laid on the table before the discussion of that report we will be better able to deal with it, because then we shall have the different expenditures for the years mentioned in my motion before the House. I may say, however, that I notice in the supplementary estimates which have been laid on the table of the House of Commons that we are asking for $9,000 additional for last year's services, including stationery, debates, messengers, charwomen and miscellaneous expenses. It would be well if we could have details of this before us when we consider the report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to the following entry in the minutes of the 2nd of May:

A message was brought from the House of Commons by their clerk, in the following words :—

House of Commons,
Monday, April 30, 1906.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate requesting their honours to furnish to the Commons a return showing the number of permanent employees at present in the service of the Senate, the names and duties of each, and the salary and length of service in each case ; the number of sessional employees at present in the service of the Senate, the daily pay of each, and the names and duties of each ; the number of employees of both classes who were employed in the session of 1896.

Ordered, That the clerk of the House do carry the said message to the Senate.

Attest.

THOS. B. FLINT.
Clerk of Commons.

On motion of the Right Honourable Sir Richard Cartwright, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Coffey, it was Ordered, That the said message be taken into consideration by the Senate on Friday next.

I do not know if the motion made by the hon. member from Belleville refers to that message. If it has nothing to do with it, I do not know whether we have taken up that question yet.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It was passed on Friday.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If so, I have nothing further to say on that point, but if I understand the English language, I think the House of Commons has used a very singular form of expression in requesting the Senate to deliver certain papers. They should treat us a little more courteously in asking us to hand over certain of our documents.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The suggestion of the hon. gentleman has been carried out as far as the House of Commons is concerned, but my motion has nothing whatever to do with that. It is asking for information which will not be included in the return prepared at the request of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I intended to speak on the motion for the consideration of the last report of the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts, but I may as well say what I have to say now. I have been a member of that committee for a great many years, in fact almost since the beginning of the Senate and for many years sat on that committee with the present leader of the House, the Secretary of State, as representing the opposition, which he did for so long a period in this House, and I should like to appeal to him, and I am sorry he is not in his place to-day that I may do so, if on every occassion while I was a member of that committee, there was any one on it more willing and strenuous than I was in seeking as much as possible to eliminate politics from the distribution of patronage in the Senate and to do justice to every one without regard to party ? If he were here I am sure he would say that I had many a time protected Liberals who would have been turned out of office if it had not been for my opposition, but I am sorry to say that the same courtesy does not prevail to-day that existed in former times. We do not get that kind of courtesy under the present chairman. At all times the committee used to be called together, and, if appointments were to be made, each name was submitted to the committee and acted upon after information was supplied. That is not the case to-day. Now the chairman and one or two others—I do not know who—prepare their list of officers. For instance they have appointed two or three messengers to the Senate. I do not know who they are, I have never been consulted about them, and I do not believe that any member of the Conservative party has been consulted about them. The chairman, I am sorry to say, seems to me now to be running the committee as a political machine, appointing just whom he likes for political purposes. That was not the case formerly. I find now that the chairman, without calling a meeting of the committee, puts men on, giving none of us an opportunity of expressing an opinion, and he comes in at the middle of the session with a report generally approving of everything he does, and gets it carried through by a party majority. The only way in which the Conservative minority in this House can meet that is by refusing in a body to serve under such a chairman. It is an unpleasant thing to do, but it is the only protection we have if we are to be treated as my hon. friend has been treating us ever since he has been called to the chair. I want to direct attention, in connection with the motion of my hon. friend from Belleville to one recommendation as a specimen of the way things are done. In the last report of the committee, at page 272 of the minutes, clause 4, is as follows :

Your committee recommend that Mr. J. O. Bérube be appointed temporarily house carpenter, and that he be paid at the rate of salary paid to his predecessor, namely $700 a year, to date from the 2nd of April last.

Now his predecessor has been on the pay-list for the last year or so, disabled, and this man has been on as a temporary appointee drawing salary. I am told that he is a man who has large claims on the party ; that he is a heeler in Ottawa, and they are bound to put him on us here, and that is the reason this attempt is now being made to put him on our contingencies. I am told that both the clerk and the house-keeper say there is no need of such an officer as this extra carpenter and certainly if the house-keeper says there is no need of him here, he should not be put on. Owing to severe illness I was unable to attend the last meeting of the committee, and I would ask my hon. friend to allow that report to go back to the committee again in order that the matter might be fully reconsidered. When the order is reached I hope that he will consent to do so. The man who is doing the work of the carpenter now is Wetmore, who has special qualifications for his work. He knows everything about the doors, windows, locks and drawers about the House. He is an invaluable man, and I am told we can get along very well with him. We do not want any seven hundred dollar man put on our contingencies, and if it is done it is simply as a reward to a political heeler here in Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not know that this is the proper time to discuss the report which is on the order paper for to-day, but as there is a sort of general attack on the chairman of the Internal Economy Committee, perhaps I should say something at the present time. It is a personal matter, and so far as the hon. gentleman's reference to party is concerned, I do not suppose we shall ever be able to satisfy that hon. gentleman's party. The Conservative members of that committee, were almost all present at the last meeting, but the hon. gentleman not being there himself, his party was not represented, and consequently we cannot expect to satisfy him. The conduct of the Internal Economy Committee has been such as to deserve the confidence of the whole House with probably one exception, and that is they have not increased the pay of the sessional messengers as much as some would like to see done, but so far as the staff is concerned I think it is a good one at the present time. I cannot understand why the hon. gentleman from Richmond finds fault with the appointment of Berubé, because if the son is of the same political complexion as the father, who suited the hon. gentleman for years when he was his body servant although a paid employee of this House, I cannot see why the hon. member finds fault with him now. At the last meeting of the Internal Economy Committee last session it was decided that Gravelle who is certainly too old to attend to his duties, should be superannuated. I was instructed at that time to select a carpenter in place of Gravelle. Two or three names were submitted, among them Berubé, and I was authorized to employ Berubé at that time if I found him to be suitable. I made inquiries and notified the clerk immediately after the meeting, but as the clerk informed me that no provision had been made for the pay of Berubé he was not taken on until two or three weeks ago. He was taken on not simply to do carpenter work, but to be at the disposal of the clerk to do any kind of work—as a sort of handy man around the Senate. We have everything now so arranged in the Senate that there is not the same occasion to keep a cabinet maker here. We have a better class of furniture and we have made other changes, and now the work is really confined to taking up and putting down carpets and putting on and removing storm windows. I claim to be a good judge of carpenter work, and having seen some of Berubé's work I know that it is satisfactory. The housekeeper says he is a first-class man around the building and that no fault has been found with his work. The chairman was instructed by the committee to make the appointment, and I resent the charge that the chairman has attempted at any time to run the committee as a political machine. All appointments have been submitted, and fairly submitted, to the committee. As chairman of the committee, I had certain work to do. I do not think the appointment of the charwomen should be brought to the attention of the committee. A great deal of the selection of the charwomen should be left to the housekeeper. If he is to be held responsible for them, he must be in a position to select and discharge them, and unless we hold him responsible and give him some discretion we cannot have good service. The housekeeper must have practical control of the charwomen. It is too small a matter to be considered in this House. I do not think that on the occasion of any appointment, since I have been a member of that committee, has there ever been a division in the committee, least of all a political division. It has never been suggested that I am aware of. So far as I am personally concerned, the object has been to secure the most efficient people who offer themselves for the service. We have taken on two new messengers this session. They are efficient men and among the best employees we have in the building. We have a good staff of pages. In selecting them I was instructed at the last meeting of the committee, last session, as the clerk had reported that three of the pages were getting too old and would have to leave the service, to select three of the best boys we could get, and to select the sons of widows and the most needy widows at that. The boys are a credit to the Senate and are all deserving cases. I personally resent the insinuations of the hon. gentleman from Richmond that the chairman of the committee has made any attempt to run the committee, and if the hon. gentleman is dissatified and carries out his threat that his party will resign, we will lose one member of the committee. I am satisfied that the leader of the opposition, and those who support him in this House will remain members of the committee, and assist us in carrying on the work as they have done in the past.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I purposely avoided discussing the merits of the motion for the reason that I desire to have the information asked for in my motion before we discuss the report of the committee. There are, to my mind, a good many objectionable points in that report which I will point out, from my standpoint, when the question comes up for consideration.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS moved:

VAUGHAN DIVORCE CASE.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the consideration of the first report of the Standing Committee on Divorce, to whom was referred the Vaughan petition, together with the evidence.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move that this order be discharged and placed on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow. I understand that additional evidence has been given this morning and I would like that the hon. members of this House should be acquainted with this new evidence before we come to discuss the matter.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—It will be remembered that it was decided that this question was to be discussed when it came up again with closed doors. That should be borne in mind at this point.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The evidence may not be printed and distributed by to-morrow, and I would suggest Thursday.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Let us say Thursday, the matter to be taken up as the first Order of the Day before the opening of the doors.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN. Does that imply that we are not to have the debate reported? While I am willing that the doors are to be closed, I think we should have a report of what is said, even though it should not appear in 'Hansard.'

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The very object of having the discussion with closed doors was to provide that no report of the debate should be published.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Consideration of the second report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—May I suggest to the hon. gentlemen that this report should be referred back to the committee for further consideration. If it comes before the House in its present form, considerable discussion will be entailed and I think it would be only courteous for the hon. gentlemen, under the circumstances, to refer it back to the committee for further consideration.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If any other hon. gentleman in the House had asked to have this report referred back to the committee, I would have no objection at all, but after the remarks the hon. gentleman has made, I think it is a little late in the day to suggest any courtesy at my hand.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I have been a member of the committee for years, but I was not given any notice of its last meeting. Under the circumstances, as the hon. gentleman has said he is willing to have the report referred back—

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Is there anything in the report which the hon. gentleman cannot consider on the floor of the House ?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It is the whole report. I had no opportunity to take part in the work of the committee, on account of not receiving any notice.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I understand the hon. gentleman's notice was laid on his desk, the same as was done in the case of every hon. gentleman. He did not happen to be in the House after that was done. If the hon. gentleman has any fault to find with the report it is open to him to ask for explanation. No doubt there are items in the report which require explanation, and I will cheerfully give any information that is necessary. If we take up the report, and, after discussion and explanation, find that it is necessary to reconsider any portion of it, well and good ; but until we do strike a snag of that kind it is not fair that the report should be referred back. The report is practically the unanimous finding of the committee, and if the hon. gentleman had been there he would have concurred in it, no doubt, the same as the other members did. There was really no difference of opinion ; it was one of the most harmonious gatherings we have ever had.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman apparently was getting his own way that time.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Yes, I think I approved of everything that was done.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Leaving a notice on a member's desk is not a proper way to give notice. I had left the House some time before the end of the sitting, and, as a matter of fact, I had no notice of the meeting. Besides, I understood that the hon. gentleman was perfectly willing to have that report sent back to the committee, if the Senator from Richmond desired it, and I take him at his word.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As my hon. friend from St. Boniface had not the opportunity of being present, and as he apparently takes a deep interest in the subject, and the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie referred to the harmonious feeling prevailing on the committee, it is desirable that this should be perpetuated. I suggest that another of these harmonious gatherings should be held. It would comport very much more with the dignity of the House that the discussion should take place in the committee rather than on the floor of the House. I think my hon. friend would thoroughly agree with that, and I have no doubt if this report goes back again the little differences which have been expressed to-day will probably be remedied, and it is to be hoped that there will be unanimity when the report is brought in again.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I will cheerfully comply with the request of the leader of the opposition, and I have no objection to the report going back.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not in accord with the suggestion that the report should be referred back to the committee until its merits have been fully discussed in the House. The matter being one which affects the internal economy of the Senate, it is for the Senate to say whether or not the discussion should take place with closed doors: but, before sending the report back to the committee, the Senate should discuss the merits and demerits of the recommendations, and, if they desire any change made, that would constitute an instruction to the committee. Then the committee would know precisely what to do. I do not hesitate to say that I object in toto to two or three of the recommendations. I do not propose to enter into an extended discussion at this moment, as I understand that the Secretary of State is desirous of being present when this report is considered; in fact I have been given to understand that he asked that it should be delayed until his return. He has taken a very deep interest in this matter, and, I am given to understand, and believe, that he is not fully in accord with the recommendations made in this report. As a matter of courtesy to him, I would suggest that the matter should stand for a couple of days.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am very glad that the hon. chairman of the committee has acceded cheerfully to the suggestion made by the hon. leader of the opposition that this report should be referred back to the committee for further consideration. It strikes me, and it must, I think, strike every hon. gentlemen in this House, that this is the more seemly course to pursue. Nothing except, perhaps, our discussions on adjournments, is more calculated to injure this House in the estimation of the public than discussions on the details of the reports from the Committee on Internal Economy. This is not the place to discuss the merits and qualifications of the various employees of the Senate whose names may be mentioned in the report. If the report goes back to the committee, there will be no doubt, after what has taken place, a very full meeting of the committee, and it is to be hoped that a harmonious conclusion will be reached, one which will be pleasing, at any rate, to the great majority of the committee; but I must say that I deprecate most strongly the practice of discussing unnecessarily the details of these reports before the whole House. A principal object of sending these matters to the committee is to obviate the necessity for the unseemly discussions which are likely to take place in the House.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I can hardly agree with the hon. gentlemen from Halifax. The object of discussing the matters in committee is that a report may be made on which the House must give a final decision. I rather agree with the suggestion of the ex-leader of the opposition and move that the Order of the Day be discharged and placed on the order paper for Thursday. By that time, no doubt, hon. gentlemen will have come to the conclusion that there is no need of sending the report back to the committee. I cannot see why that should be done simply because one member did not receive his notice, when the report is unanimous, and no reason has been given why it should be sent back.

The motion was agreed to.

LABOUR STATISTICS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Pursuant to the Order of the Day, the House went into Committee of the Whole on Bill (109) an Act to repeal the Act to provide for the collection and publishing of labour statistics.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have already explained to my hon. friends opposite the object of this Bill. It is simply to remove an apparent conflict of jurisdiction between two departments.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (G) An Act for the relief of John Albert Peer.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg.)

THE VACANCY IN THE SUPREME COURT.

On the motion to adjourn,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY said: I should like to ask the leader of the House if anything has been done concerning the appointment of a new judge to the Supreme Court? I ask for this reason; the Quebec cases should be going on now and I understand nothing is to be done pending the nomination of a new judge, and I want to know if the government has decided any thing in that line?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—All I can say to my hon. friend is, the matter is engaging the attention of the government. I am not able to inform him what decision is arrived at yet.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE ROSS RIFLE COMPANY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:—

1. What amount has the government paid for the rifles which have been delivered to it by the Ross Rifle Company, from the 1st January last, up to the 1st of the present month ?

4. For what number of rifles ?

5. And in what proportion to the fixed price ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT :

1. $25,000.

2. Yes.

EXTRAJUDICIAL EMPLOYMENT OF JUDGES BILL.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The order being called :

By the Honourable Mr. Ferguson :

That he will introduce a Bill respecting the Extrajudicial Employment of Judges.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I gave notice some time ago, as I explained to the House yesterday, of my intention to introduce a Bill to be entitled 'An Act respecting the Extrajudicial Employment of Judges.' Hon. gentlemen who were in the House in 1903 will remember that I then introduced a Bill on that subject, which was very fully discussed on the floor of this House. That Bill, as I ascertained in the course of the discussion, did not cover all the points which it was necessary to legislate upon. It only proposed to prohibit judges from sitting on commisions and making investigations, either for the government of Canada or for any province of Canada. During the discussion it was pointed out that there were other abuses in connection with the employment of judges with which my Bill did not deal, one of which abuses was their acting as directors on companies. Another had reference to their undertaking arbitrations in connection with suits. In addition to the fact that I found, after I had introduced my Bill, that it did not cover all the ground that should be dealt with by legislation, at that time there was a very acrimonious discussion going on in the province of Ontario over what was known as the Gamey-Stratton difficulty. I found, after some debate in the House, that while the principle of the Bill introduced by me was very generally acquiesced in, the opinion was expressed with a great deal of freedom and generality that the time was inopportune for dealing with the question. I yielded then to the views that were expressed, a specimen of which I shall read. I shall quote first from the remarks made by the present Speaker of the House. He said :

Under the circumstances, I think, even this Senate where the atmosphere is supposed to be more serene will not give that intelligent and impartial consideration to the Bill which the honourable gentleman now presents, because of the present political disturbance and that it would be an act of prudence and common sense and tact to withdraw and re-introduce it next session.

Following up that suggestion, and many others of the same kind, I made use of these observations at the close of the discussion :

After listening to objections made to this Bill by hon. gentlemen, who, I am aware, intend to vote against it, I come to this conclusion, that the one reason has been more than any other the dominant reason for opposing this Bill, it is not because they see anything dangerous or bad in it, but because hon. gentlemen believe in some way or other the enactment of this Bill at this particular time would, in some way or other, be held to have a bearing on some of these serious troubles, that have occurred in the province of Ontario within the last three months. The phrase which has been used by nearly all these gentlemen is this : It is inopportune. Believing the Bill to be a good one—believing that it is one which will find its way, not perhaps exactly in the form in which I have submitted it—it may be more fully and amply considered—but a Bill on the general lines it contains, will certainly before long find its way on the statute-book. I should be loath to do anything which would prejudice the full and fair consideration of such a Bill, now or hereafter. On that account, although I know the Bill would receive at this moment, if not a majority of the votes, a very large number of votes of this House—although I know that is the reception it would get at the present from hon. members, yet feeling that possibly a good measure may be prejudiced in regard to the future by forcing a division at this time, when hon. gentlemen seem to be influenced by fear that it would be taken as in some way a reflection on the government of Ontario I shall with the permission of the House, ask leave to withdraw the Bill with the determination, which I desire to express as firmly as I possibly can, that at the next session of parliament, if I live and am here, I will again present the Bill for the consideration of the House, when I hope this view, which seems now so strongly impressed on the minds of some hon. gentlemen, will have disappeared with regard to its being an inopportune time, and when I trust the Bill will receive the consideration to which it is entitled.

I did not re-introduce the Bill in the two sessions which have intervened, because, to some extent, the strife and the feeling continued to exist in the province of Ontario, and it might possibly be thought that it had still to some extent influenced me in bringing in the measure. However, some important things have transpired since that time. Last year the hon. Minister of Justice introduced a Bill in the other branch of parliament which passed both Houses and is now the law, containing this very important provision :

> No judge mentioned in this Act shall, either directly, or indirectly as director or manager of any corporation, company, or firm, or in any other manner whatever, for himself or others, engage in any occupation or business, other than his judicial duties ; but every such judge shall devote himself exclusivley to such judicial duties.

This clause of the Act of last year covered a part of the ground which it was pointed out during the discussion in 1903 was also necessary to be dealt with in the Bill which I then proposed. That being the law, that part of the subject need not now be dealt with. Then during the present session of parliament an hon. member of the House of Commons, Mr. Lennox, member for South Simcoe, introduced a Bill containing this provision:

> Except at the instance and on behalf of the Crown, or for the determination of actions or suits on questions arising in actions and suits as provided for by the statutes or statutory rules of any province, no judge mentioned in this Act shall become, or act in the capacity of, a referee, arbitrator or umpire, or calculator or assessor of damages or compensation upon or for the determination of any question, dispute or matter in difference of any kind whatsoever, but the provisions of this subsection shall not apply to prevent any judge from proceeding with and completing any reference or arbitration upon which he actually entered before the fifteenth day of March, one thousand nine hundred and six.

This Bill was introduced in the House of Commons, and the Minister of Justice at once accepted the principle of the Bill, and asked the hon. member who had introduced it to allow it to lie over so that it could be dealt with by the government. The principle of this Bill is, therefore, bound to find its way into our law. In regard to these subjects I am bound to say, from close observation of the work of the present Minister of Justice, that he is a decided reformer, and that he has in this, as well as in many other things, shown a disposition to deal with such matters on a high plane. I find that during the present session of parliament the subject more properly belonging to my Bill of three years ago has been discussed in the House of Commons by two very eminent gentleman—Mr. R. L. Borden, leader of the opposition, and Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick, Minister of Justice. I am sure hon. gentlemen will agree with me that no two greater authorities exist in this country when they pass an opinion on a subject of this kind, and when we find these two gentlemen thoroughly in agreement, we may rest assured that they cannot be very far astray.

Speaking on the address in answer to the speech from the Throne, at the beginning of the session, Mr. Borden made use of these words—he was speaking of the appointment of Judge MacTavish to the Insurance Commission :

> If we have to appoint judges in Canada to positions of this kind, if we cannot get men at the bar of Canada, or in business in Canada to assume these duties and to receive the confidence of the people that they will act fairly and upright, then there remains only one alternative ;let us appoint the judges, but let us provide by statutory enactment that any position of this kind shall be part of a judge's judicial functions and that he shall receive no salary or emolument from the government of the day by reason of accepting a position of that kind.

I now come to the opinion of Mr. Fitzpatrick, announced only last Monday evening in the House of Commons and it is in entire accordance with that of Mr. Borden. He said :

> And again speaking for myself, and so far as I am personally concerned, it seems to me there are conditions under which we could well afford to justify the appointment of judges in connection with commissions. But if I had the right to a personal opinion, I would make this statement, or lay down this rule—that if judges are to be appointed in connection with commissions, as far as possible, and except in cases of some great emergency I would avoid appointing them to commissions in connection with political matters. But under whatever circumstances judges might be appointed, whatever services they might be called upon to render the state, I would lay down a rule, from which I would not depart, that a judge's time belongs to the country, and that whether that time be given to the performance of his regular judicial work or given to the performance of quasi-judicial work in connection with the commissions, there should be no remuneration except his salary alone. That, it seems to me, is a rule that might fairly be established and that could profitably be followed.

And the Minister of Justice, at the conclusion of the speech from which I have made this extract, moved the following resolution, which was adopted by the House, and which very fairly covers the point that I am making:

That, in the opinion of this House, public business should have first claim on the time and attention of each and every member of the government and that the permanent officials of the government should give to the performance of their respective offices their whole time and attention.

These extracts, which I have just read, serve now to introduce the Bill, and I do not purpose making any comment at this stage upon it, but just to explain its provisions. The Bill of three years ago was to prohibit judges from acting on commissions. After, however, giving the matter very full consideration and giving the weight which I think is due to such important opinions as those of Mr. Borden and Mr. Fitzpatrick, I came to the conclusion that it would be quite far enough for us to go—just as far as they indicated we should go, and that was not to prohibit the employment of judges in the capacities referred to, but to require that if they are so employed they shall receive no remuneration for their services apart from their salary as judges. I think that the argument in support of that contention is apparent at once, because all the time of the judge belongs to the country, and if he is acting on a commission he is not doing work in the courts and he is only giving the time which the country pays for. I think we may now take this ground with more safety because the judges are at present better paid than they were before. In the opinion of a great many people they are over-paid. I do not say that that is my opinion, but parliament, in its wisdom, has added to all their salaries, therefore, while we should leave the hands of the government free for their employment as desired, we would do a proper and right thing in providing that if the judges do give the country services apart from their judicial duties they should do so without extra pay.

I just make one other provision in the Bill, and that is that if judges are called to act on commissions they should be allowed their travelling expenses. They are paid travelling expenses while acting as judges, and if they are called upon to perform other duties they ought to be allowed for expenses in the same way as when performing strictly judicial duties. I now introduce the Bill and move that it be read a first time. My excuse for introducing it at this stage is that I had made a pledge to this House three years ago that I would deal with this question and had given notice long before Mr. Fitzpatrick made the declaration which he did in the House of Commons. Had it not been for this I should have been content to wait. I propose to defer the second reading of the Bill for considerable time, so that the general principle of it should be—as I think, properly—embodied in the general Bill which the Minister of Justice has under consideration. If the second reading is put off for a week or two weeks it will then probably transpire what the Minister Justice intends to do in the matter.

The Bill was then read the first time.

QUALIFIED MILITIA INSTRUCTORS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. What number of qualified instructors can the different corps of the permanent force at present furnish to the volunteer militia?

2. Out of this number, how many instructors are there qualified to give the required instruction to volunteers enrolled—

1. In the cavalry;
2. In the garrison artillery;
3. In the field artillery;
4. In the horse artillery;
5. In the infantry;
6. In the mounted infantry;
7. In the school of musketry;
8. In the engineers;
9. In the army service corps;
10. In the corps of guides and the corps of signallers;
11. In the ambulance and hospital corps;

3. Amongst all these qualified instructors, how many are there of French origin or capable of giving military instruction in the French language?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT:

1. The number of non-commissioned officers and men qualified to act as instructors in the different corps of the permanent force is 202.

2. Cavalry, including mounted infantry	32
Garrison artillery	5
Horse, including field artillery	5
Infantry	55
School of musketry	3
Engineers	15
Army Service Corps	39
Corps of guides	39
Corps of signallers	39
Army Medical Corps	8

3. The number of non-commisioned officers qualified to act as instructors, who are of French Canadian descent and capable of imparting instruction in the French language, is 19.

CAPE DIAMOND AND DUFFERIN TERRACE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. Was Dr. Ami at any time instructed by the government to make an examination and study the ground on which Cape Diamond and Dufferin Terrace rest ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When did he make that study ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Between the nineteenth of April and the twelfth of May, 1905.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Did he report to the government, and when ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes ; May 10th, 1905.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Has the report been published, and where can it be found ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In brief, what are the conclusions of and suggestions made in the report ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The report indicated the peculiar geological structure at that point of the cliff where the 1841 and 1889 disasters took place, below the King's Bastion, and the decidedly dangerous condition of the upper extremity of the Dufferin Terrace resulting from such structure. I have obtained a copy of the report, which I shall be glad to lay on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

(J) An Act respecting the St. Mary River Bridge Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

(K) An Act respecting the Pacific and Atlantic Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

QUEBEC CASES BEFORE THE SUPREME COURT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the hon. leader of the House if there is any intention to postpone the cases coming from the province of Quebec now before the Supreme Court ? I understand from letters which I have received from different lawyers in the province that the court is to sit on the 14th of this month, but that nothing will be done in regard to the cases coming from the province of Quebec if a second judge from that province is not named to replace Sir Elzear Taschereau, Judge Girouard declining to hold the court in these cases until another judge is named with him. I would ask the government if there is anything decided as to these cases, and if some means are to be taken to have a new judge ad hoc, or something of the kind, so that we may notify these lawyers what is going to be done.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will bring the subject to the attention of the Minister of Justice and inquire whether it is the intention to make the appointment at once, or appoint a judge, 'ad hoc,' in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The Quebec cases have already been twice postponed.

THIRD READING.

Bill (109) an Act to repeal the Act to provide for the collection and publishing of Labour Statistics.—(The Right Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

THE LEPROSY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (115) an Act respecting Leprosy. He said: This Bill authorizes the Governor in Council, by proclamation, to establish a lazaretto for lepers, and to use any institution that may be now available for that purpose or erect a new one. As hon. gentlemen know, we already have a lazaretto in Canada, and I am glad to say that the number of lepers had not, up till a recent period, at all events, increased. The number in the lazaretto at Tracadie, in New Brunswick, is only fourteen ; and a very curious circumstance attracted my attention in looking into the matter that one of the lepers who has been there for over eighteen years is being discharged or rather allowed to go abroad subject, of course, to being recalled, on the assumption that he is nearly cured. The idea that has prevailed in the past has been that leprosy is incurable. An important point which rises in connection with the subject is the question of contagion. One point has been whether there ought not to be absolute seclusion from any other person. In looking over the history of leprosy recently I was rather surprised to find that early in the seventies the College of Physicians and Surgeons in London, had reported to the then Secretary of State that the disease was not contagious. On a reference some ten years after, about 1887 or 1888, they still retained the opinion they had previously expressed, that in no case was it contagious. However, events occurred later on which led them to somewhat modify the opinion, and now the conclusion seems to be reached, that while in the earlier stages of the disease it is not contagious, later on, when fully developed, and so perceptible as to make the subject a repulsive one, they think that contagion is then likely to follow by contact. This Bill gives the Minister of Agriculture, who is the official who will have the administration of it, the power, if anybody is afflicted with leprosy to have him examined by a medical man and, if the conclusion is reached that it would be better if the patient were placed in a lazaretto, the minister may issue an order for confining him there ; but he also has the discretionary power, if the subject can obtain accommodation at his own home where he will not be liable to contact with others, to allow the leper, for a time at all events, to be confined in his own home. These are the main features of the Bill. It gives very ample powers to the minister, which are somewhat discretionary, in reference to confinement.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Is it necessary to have the certificate of one medical man or two as authority for confinement ?

Hon Mr. SCOTT—The language used in the Bill is 'such medical officer or officers,' It may be two.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I wish to ask the leader of the government if any distinction has been drawn between European leprosy, what we call 'button leprosy' and Asiatic leprosy ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, there is no definition of either given in the Bill, but the necessity for the legislation arises rather from the number of persons migrating from Asia. It is believed that it is needed more on the Pacific coast. As hon. gentlemen will probably know, in both Japan and China leprosy exists to some considerable extent ; and the fear of the disease coming to Canada would be from the admission of persons coming from those countries. It is on that account the matter has attracted attention recently because in the eastern part of Canada the number of lepers has not increased. As hon. gentlemen were informed a few moments ago, there are only fourteen at present, and this has been about the average number in Canada for some years.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I may state that having lived in India and practised medicine there, I have had a good deal to do with leprosy. I have also met with what we call European leprosy in the Northwest and there is a decided difference between the two. In my opinion the disease that we call European or button leprosy is not so infectious. It takes an entirely different form and, in such cases, though perhaps it would be wiser if the victims were entirely separated from their own family, they might possibly be allowed to remain with them; but in Asiatic leprosy I think a great mistake would be made if they were allowed to associate with their own household even though confined in a separate room. In dealing with cases in India we found it was necessary always, whenever sensation was lost in any part of the body, that after that point was reached, they should be entirely separated from the members of their own family and household.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The Tracadie lazaretto is really a local institution. It was founded because leprosy there was a local disease, introduced originally, no doubt, from across the sea, but no new cases—except perhaps one which came in some two years ago from the West Indies—have appeared in the province of New Brunswick. That lazaretto has been in charge of a religious institution for a long time and has done a great deal of good. It was one of the institutions which existed when confederation was formed, and by reason of lapse of time, and the rights which grow out of that, it seems to me it would be hardly fair —I speak without having given the matter any consideration except the little knowledge I have of it—to let the Minister of Agriculture or the government use that lazoretto for imported lepers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is under the control of the Federal government at present.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I know it is.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The intention was, though no absolute decision was reached, that it might be found necessary to establish one in the west owing to the migration of the class of lepers that my hon. friend from the Northwest has referred to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is the hon. gentleman aware whether there are any cases on the Pacific coast?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Yes, there are.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I do not know what induced the government to take action with reference to leprosy. I have not had an opportunity to read this Bill. I suppose we will have a chance to discuss it again in the committee of the whole?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I think the action of the government is decidedly judicious if they have any occasion for it. There must have been some outbreak of it to warrant this legislation. Leprosy is a very loathsome disease, and a most contagious disease which destroys the mind as well as the body. Therefore it is in every way horrible, and has no redeeming feature whatever about it. There can be no doubt there ought to be lazarettos if the disease is at all prevalent. The Hotel Dieu nuns were the first to volunteer to take charge of these lepers at Tracadie, and have charge of them still. I am glad to find the disease has not increased to any extent, but every precaution should be taken to make this legislation as stringent and complete as possible so that the disease may be nipped in the bud whenever a case presents itself. It is not every physician who sees a case of leprosy. In my fifty years' practice I have not seen a case that I can remember, and I suppose there is not a physician in Ontario or Quebec who has seen a case of it, so we are largely dependent on the writings of others for our information on the subject.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend seemed to express a doubt as to the advisability of the medical officer releasing the patient to whom he referred in the lazaretto at Tracadie. May I ask who is responsible for the release of that patient? If there was any uncertainty as to such a case being contagious, it seems to me it was very prejudicial to the public interest that he should be allowed at large.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The conclusion reached by experts has been that it is only in severe cases that it is contagious. In the earlier stages it is admitted that it is not contagious. In the case to which I have referred, the officials at Tracadie have this person under surveillance, subject to be recalled at any moment, and he is only allowed to be at large in that vicinity where of course the people take the greatest care not to come in contact with a leper.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understood the hon. gentleman to say that this was a case of seventeen years standing. Therefore it could not be a case of short existence.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The persons confined are lepers, and this is one of the cases quoted where a cure has been effected. The belief in the past was that the disease is incurable. I do not profess to have given the subject very much thought, but I have my own opinions on the subject, and I do not propose to air them now. I was rather glad to find that at Tracadie they had noted an improvement year by year in this particular patient, and after he had been there for eighteen years he was so far recovered that they thought they could safely allow him to go beyond the bounds of the territory.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think medical gentlemen will agree with me that all diseases of a contagious character are liable to modifications through time. Now, it is a matter of history that leprosy was brought to western Europe in the time of the Crusades. It was unknown in western Europe until then. At that time it must have been very contagious, otherwise the Crusaders would not have contracted it and brought it back. I assume the explanation with regard to this leper in New Brunswick is that there may be some question as to whether it was a true case of leprosy at the beginning. I have never heard that leprosy was curable.

Hon. Mr ELLIS—In Tracadie, or rather that district of New Brunswick, the disease has existed for many generations. Its origin is practically lost, although there are theories on the subject. It is supposed that it came into the province by the sea. There was no care of the lepers at all. It was not known absolutely at first that it was this disease, but finally the government of New Brunswick took charge of it, and established a house which at confederation, passed under the control of the Dominion of Canada. There are many interesting things about the disease. For instance it will appear in one generation and may not appear again for two or three generations. The lepers are mostly French families. If it is looked after properly the disease may not spread, and therefore I made the suggestion that, perhaps, it would not be advisable to introduce in that part of the country the foreign lepers. Not very long ago in our own province a man came in from the West Indies, travelling by train from Halifax. Somebody noticed, and observed to a doctor that he had recently seen a man with evidence of small-pox. The doctor went after him and discovered that he was a leper. The steamship company did not know that he had the disease when he landed. The authorities got hold of him and I do not know what was done in the case, but I presume he was sent back to the West Indies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is it the intention, under this Bill, to establish more than one lazaretto ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The preamble says ' The establishment of a ' ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That would indicate that there will be but one. How does that affect the lazaretto in Tracadie ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would be in another part of the country altogether. The attention of the government was drawn to some cases on the Pacific coast, and that is really why the Bill has been introduced. It has arisen out of Asiatic immigration of recent years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In British Columbia they have set apart an island in the sea where they can send all those lepers. I believe they are mostly Chinese.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

MOTIONS.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved that the 17th and 52nd Rules of the Senate be suspended in so far as they relate to the petition of G. F. Carruthers of the city of Winnipeg, and others of elsewhere; praying for the passing of an Act incorporating them as the Colonial Bank of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no notice of motion for that.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It is a petition.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Whether it is a petition or not, notice of motion should be given.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—My only reason for moving for the suspension of the rule is that this Bill originates in the Senate and must therefore go through the House of Commons after passing here, and the parties interested are anxious that its progress should not be delayed. As I am informed, this petition, owing to a misunderstanding, was only received this morning, when it should have been received yesterday or the day before. It was purely accidental that the petition has been delayed until now, and, therefore, comes just one day behind the time for receiving petitions.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The time for receiving petitions has already been twice extended, so that the petition is more than one day behind the time. The petitioner is probably thirty or forty days late in bringing up his petition. I shall not object this time, but, in future, I hope petitioners will comply with our rules.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG from the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills presented their 10th report recommending the suspension of the 50th rule so far as it relates to a petition praying for an Act to incorporate the Pacific and Eastern Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I notice that in the 8th report, which was presented yesterday, the committee recommended a suspension of the 49th rule.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes, the 49th rule refers to the length of time of notice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No motion was made to suspend that rule.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The report recommended it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I know, but it was decided last year that when a committee recommends a suspension of the rules a motion should be made to suspend.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The House concurred in the report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I know that, and it is because the House concurred in the report that a motion should be made to suspend the rules.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Surely if a report recommends that a rule be suspended and the House concurs in that report, that is enough.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, it is not enough. It may be enough for the House of Commons but not for us. The same question came up last year. I brought it to the notice of the Speaker and it was decided that when a committee recommends a suspension of the rule, though the report may be adopted, a subsequent motion must be made to suspend the rule.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—That is the rule.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And that is common sense.

The question of concurrence in the report of the committee having been put to the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move, before that, that rule 49, in so far as it relates to that petition, be suspended. I think we should make our procedure regular and not jump over the rules as we are doing now. That report is based on the assumption that the rule had been suspended. It reports on the petition of a Mr. Blain. If hon. gentlemen read the 8th report they will see that it reads as follows :—

> Your committee have examined the following petitions :
> Of Hugh Blain and others, provisional directors of the St. Mary's River Bridge Company ; praying for the passing of an Act extending the time for the commencement and completion of their work.
> And find the notices of publication short in point of time in each case, but as it will be competent for the committee to whom the Bills shall be referred to provide that no injury to any party shall arise therefrom, your committee recommend the suspension of the forty-ninth rule in so far as it relates to the said petitions.
> All of which is respectfully submitted.
> FINLAY M. YOUNG,
> Chairman.

That was what the committtee recommended yesterday. The suspension of the rule has not been granted, yet they are coming to-day, on the assumption that a suspension has been granted, with this 10th report. I object to the adoption of the 10th report before the suspension of the rule has been granted. To facilitate business I move that the suspension be now granted.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yesterday the Standing Orders Committee met and considered some petitions which they found short with regard to notice. Good reasons were given that leniency should be shown in this case inasmuch as the parties interested in the petition undertook to see that the notices would continue for a sufficient length of time. For that and other reasons the committee decided to recommend the suspension of the rule. In due course I presented the report of the committee with that recommendation. I am not now touching the point my hon. friend has raised. If I understand his point correctly it is to the effect that after the report was received by the House some one interested in the Bill should have moved a special motion regarding each individual Bill and asked the House to further concur in the suspension of the rules. I am not touching on that now at all; I am merely explaining the procedure in so far as the Standing Orders Committtee is concerned. To-day we met again and we found, as in this case, that there were extenuating circumstances, and we have recommended a suspension of the rule. If my hon. friend's contention is right, it would follow that, after this report is received, a motion would be necessary by some one interested in the Bill asking the House to suspend the rule in each separate case. The report of the Committee on Standing Orders is now before the House, in which it is recommended that in certain cases the rule be suspended, and it is for the House to accept or reject the proposition of the committee. Then what my hon. friend has called attention to as a matter of procedure could be dealt with apart from the report of the committte altogether.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If I understand the hon. gentleman, the report of yesterday recommended the suspension of the 49th rule.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Only so far as related to certain petitions.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In so far as related to two petitions, one of a Mr. Blain and another of a party named Shaw. The suspension of the rules was asked for on behalf of these two parties. The suspension was not obtained. If I understand the report presented to-day, it relates to one of these two parties.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—No, no.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I heard the word Blain. The assistant clerk of the House has just informed me that there are two Blains, so that I will withdraw my motion. When the report is adopted, it will be time to move the suspension of the rule.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I think it is necessary, if the committee recommends to the House to do a certain thing, that the House by a formal resolution should do it. It is not done otherwise.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With all deference to the hon. gentleman from St. John, I do not think the hon. gentleman's point is well taken. Where the committee have recommended that certain rules be suspended with respect to certain petitions, his point is that it is then necessary that a special motion be introduced with respect to each of these petitions. The practice in the House, at one time, a very common practice, was that the Standing Orders Committee made a report recommending the suspension of the rule and that no action was taken by the House on the report. The report was simply laid on the table, and in that case any hon. gentleman interested in a petition or Bill with which the report dealt, was obliged to move that the rule be suspended in accordance with the report of the committee. I think it is a much more convenient practice to have the report of the committee concurred in by the House, which renders it unnecessary to deal with each separate Bill or petition.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I call attention to Rule 17:

> No motion to suspend, modify or amend any rule or part thereof shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing specifying precisely the rule proposed to be suspended, modified or amended, and the purpose of such suspension. But any rule may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate; and the rule proposed to be suspended shall be precisely and distinctly stated; and no motion for the suspension of the rules for any petition for a private Bill shall be in order unless the same shall have been recommended by the Committee on Standing Orders.

That supposes that there is a motion to suspend the rule. There are two things there; there is the recommendation of the committee and there is the motion. No motion can be made for the suspension of the rule except it be recommended by the committee. If it has been recommended by the committee, then the motion can be made, ergo a motion should be made.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I think the explanation of the hon. senator from Halifax covers the point exactly. In looking back over the records I found that it was the custom to present the reports of the Standing Orders Committee, without asking the House to concur in them. I looked into the matter, and I thought that where any committee reports to this House their report should be subject to the judgment of the House whether it was the Standing Orders Committee or any other committee. When any other standing committee presents reports to this House they have to be concurred in, and I could not see any logical reason why the same course should not be followed with reference to the Standing Orders Committee. I remember well when the hon. gentleman from Halifax was in the Chair calling his attention to the matter at one time, and suggesting to him that it would be more regular and uniform to treat the reports of the Standing Orders Committee just the same as those of any other committee; and during the time I have had the honour to be chairman of the committee, I have always moved concurrence in its reports, because, after all, any committee is a minor body of this House and, no matter what action they take, the House should have an opportunity of passing judgment upon the decision of the committee when the report is brought before them. I think you will agree with me that it is better to have a uniform practice for all committees, and I agree with the hon. senator from Halifax that if the House concurs in a report, an action which they did not take formerly, if the House takes that action now it would be asking the House to pronounce judgment twice. When they concurred in the recommendation of the committee, they confirmed the suspension of the rule and any further action is quite unnecessary. When the motion is made for concurrence, if the report of the committee does not meet with the judgment of the Senate, it may be referred back to the committee or rejected altogether, and, therefore, when we ask the judgment of the House once on the question it seems to be unnecessary to ask them to repeat that judgment by a formal motion which would have to be made, I fancy, with each petition mentioned in the recommendation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I think there is no doubt that the position taken by my hon. friend from Stadacona is the right one. It is the one which has been followed in this House and in the other House, and I am pretty sure in both Houses in England. Now what is the report of the committee? It recommends that a certain rule be suspended, that is to say, recommends that the House shall move that a certain rule be suspended. When that report is adopted by the House it simply adopts the suggestion made in the report. Then it behooves the House to act on the report, and the action on the report is to move in accordance with the suggestion or recommendation made by the committee. I for one should be sorry to see a new departure taken on this point, because it would be really departing from what has been the custom in this House up to the present time. and what is the custom, if I am well informed—and I believe I am—in all other houses of parliament which follow British precedents.

The SPEAKER—My memory does not carry me as far as last session to recollect what was decided then. However, the hon. member from Stadacona claims there was a decision on this very point. As to the past practice all I have to guide me is our rules and forms of procedure. If the hon. gentleman will look at No. 43, he will find it as follows:—

> If a report recommends the suspension of certain rules with respect to a Bill, the senator in charge thereof moves that those rules be dispensed with in so far as they relate to such Bill.
>
> 44. Should the senator in charge thereof not move during the sitting, 'that the rule or rules be disposed with,' he will have to give notice that on a future day he will move that the rule or rules be dispensed with, in so far as they relate to the Bill intituled &c., in conformity with the report of the committee on &c.'
>
> 45. If the senator in charge af a Bill fails to make the usual motion, the Speaker requests him to do so; and should the Speaker not know who has charge of the Bill he says: Will the hon. senator in charge of this Bill make the usual motion; if no one does so, the Speaker again calls 'Reports of Committees.'
>
> 46. Although the suspension of the rules recommended to be dispensed with, by a committee is generally moved at the same sitting that the report is presented, it is only by sufferance.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is, where we did not formally concur in the report.

The SPEAKER—Concurrence in the report undoubtedly binds the House to the acceptance of the suspension of the rules, and there seems to be a useless surplusage in the second motion, because the House is committed to the suspension of the rule. In fact, if the House had wanted to dissent from that report, it would have to reject it; but on the other hand it seems that technically the point raised by the hon. member from Stadacona is right.

The motion was agreed to.

ANDERSON PUFFED RICE COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN from the Committee on Miscellaneous Bills to whom was referred Bill (45) An Act respecting a patent of the Anderson Puffed Rice Company, reported the Bill with an amendment.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The only amendment made is for the extension of time for the importation of patented articles, and there is a formal saving clause providing that those who had acquired rights, after the expiration of the patent and before the passing of this Act, should have their rights preserved. The amendment was made to provide that those who had commenced the manufacture after the expiration of the patent and up to the time of the giving of notice of this application, which is the form now approved of by the patent office, should have their rights preserved. It has been pointed out to the committee that notice by advertisement of the intention to apply for such a Bill was notice that the patent had expired, and people might start an enterprise between the expiry of the patent and the passing of the Bill, and on that ground the deputy minister, who was present, concurred in this amendment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I can fully corroborate what the hon. gentleman has said with regard to this Bill. I may point out on behalf of this committee, that the Patent Act is very ineffective and defective, especially in regard to this clause, and several other clauses, and we never have a Bill before the committee, but the law clerk points out that the Patent Act, is ineffective and defective. When application is made for an extension of time the clause says it shall take effect when the Act passes. The inventor loses his rights under the Patent Act and makes application to parliament to restore them and, from the moment he gives notice, everybody who is able to infringe the patent is at liberty to do so. Notice may be given in the fall and the session may not terminate until the following summer, and during all that time any one who wishes to infringe on the inventor's rights can do so. This amendment is made to prevent that. It protects the inventor from the time he gives notice of his intention to apply for an extension of his patent rights. I fully agree with the hon. member from Toronto.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is not that a step further than we have been in the habit of going in granting extension to patentees? My recollection is that when a patent has lapsed and an application is made for an extension of time, the Bill contains no provision protecting the manufacturer of the patented article from the time the patentee gives notice until the Bill becomes law. If my recollection is correct, we are going a step further in this Bill than we have ever done before. I recognize the force of the statement made by the hon. gentleman, that any one might begin operations between the time of giving notice and the time the Bill becomes law, but might there not be cases where parties, during that interval between the expiration of the patent and the giving of the notice, have commenced the construction of buildings or contracted to purchase machinery for the purpose of manufacturing the article. Under this provision their rights would be destroyed.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—That was discussed in the committee. The object of giving notice of the application is that any one who has acquired a right may appear and state his case and claim protection. In this case no one appeared, and it is not pretended that anybody else has attempted to manufacture the article, and it has been intimated that it would be a very easy way to hold up a manufacturer who has been manufacturing under his patent, although his patent no longer protects him. In this case the process could be started in two or three weeks time, and so between now and the time of the Royal Assent to the Bill it would be easy for any one to go to the manufacturer and say 'I am about to start the manufacture of this article, and unless you pay me $5,000 or $10,000 you will have competition.' That is something the House will not care to sanction. The deputy minister seemed to think that the amendment which has been made to this Bill was in the line of the better practice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I dissent from my hon. friend's statement. I doubt the soundness of the principle introduced in this Bill. It is practically 'ex post facto' legislation. That is to say, we give legislative sanction to the act of the applicant himself by reason of inserting an advertisement in either the Official Gazette or the newspapers. The mere fact of his making an application should not carry with it legislative sanction giving him rights from that date until parliament intervenes. Now it is clearly owing to his own default that the time has expired. That is to say, we now place a premium on the default which he has made. If he had been diligent he would have made the application in time, but he has not made it. It would amount to this, that the public who have kept trace of this patent ascertained from the record that it had expired and has not been renewed. You must not treat the notice as a renewal of patent until parliament intervenes and until legislative sanction stamps the Bill with the approval of parliament. Consequently he must take the risk of the default or want of diligence which he has shown in not coming to parliament in time. As I say, one keeping trace of this particular patent would, by examining the records, ascertain that it had expired, also that parliament had not intervened to keep it alive, and surely until that point of time is reached the public have a right to manufacture the particular article in question. I am not aware of the many conditions which have been presented to the committee by the deputy minister, but I am speaking in general terms and I have no hesitation in saying that the principle of the amendment is unsound.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—The principle adopted in this amendment is very dangerous. The promoters of this Bill are here asking for relief. When we insert an amendment to the Bill giving them relief from the time they publish their notice, we are going too far. If we establish a precedent like this it will be dangerous to those who start business in the country under any patent. The patentees may come back here, after having allowed their patent to lapse, and obtain legislation which will interfere with the rights of persons manufacturing under the law of the country. Persons may start an industry, or make preparations to do so, and then find parliament coming in with retroactive legislation putting them out of business, and establishing the party who is guilty of the neglect in the same position he would have occupied if the patent had never lapsed. That is a dangerous principle.

Hon. Mr. COX—This particular patent is a very valuable one, and the goods are now actually being manufactured in Peterborough by the party who acquired the patent. It was purchased at a large expense, and all that is asked is that his rights shall be protected from the time the application was made. It would be a very great hardship if some other person now were permitted to have the benefits of this patent, which is a very valuable one, and cost a large amount of money. The building for the manufacture of this article has been erected, and the machinery put in, and altogether it is a very valuable industry and for some person now to take advantage of a technicality or over-sight and be permitted to manufacture these goods would be a very great injustice to an important industry.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand that this gentleman who owns the patent commenced the manufacture of the article after the expiration of the patent, otherwise he would not have had to come here for a Bill?

Hon. Mr. COX—I suppose that is correct. The point I want to make is that this application has not been made simply for the purpose of preventing other people from manufacturing; but the patent has been acquired at a large expense, the building and plant for this work are quite large and the goods are being manufactured. The machinery is expensive and has been in operation for several weeks. Some person watching patents might take advantage of this lapse.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If there has been no attempt to manufacture this article by any other person, then there can be no necessity for adding that clause.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The patent had not expired except by virtue of the clause which declares that through the importation by them of the article without an extension of time for that purpose, the patent came to an end. In other words it was a premature termination of the patent, which would have been in force for many years only for that. Is it to be said that because a premature mistake is made of importing without getting the necessary extension of time that the patent expires and the man shall forfeit all his right? On the other hand he gave notice of intention to apply, and, up to the time of his giving notice, we assume that any person who had acquired rights outside of the patentee should have his rights protected. The question is whether beyond that time, having given notice of his intention to apply here, his patent should not be protected during that interval, or whether any person who chooses to hold up this company after notice of the application, should be at liberty to do so. It is urged by the hon. member from Calgary that that is not a sound principle to act on,—that the Act should not protect until after it becomes law, but I submit with all deference to him that the whole patent law is based on that principle. When an application for a patent is made, it may not be granted for a year, but the patentee is protected during the whole of that year, and if that is a logical thing to do, then you will revive his right under the statute, and is it not equally reasonable that the time should run from the date of the notice?

I am putting that as being what strikes me as a fair proposition, but above and beyond all, notice is given to the public of intention to apply here. No person contends before the committee of this House that there has been any right acquired. No person contends to this day that any person is being interfered with by the act. But the operation of this Bill may be postponed for a month or possibly for six months, and so from now until a date which is still in the future, there is to be protection for those who choose to come in and take advantage of the state of things. I say it is holding out a premium to people to practise blackmail, or to start an industry in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not discussing the merits of this particular case; I am questioning the soundness of the principle laid down in the amendment which has been introduced. I would say in answer to my hon. friend that the distinction which he has just drawn is quite obvious. Under the Patent Act certain rights are given by statute so that when a patentee applies for his patent, notwithstanding the fact that he does not receive it, his rights are protected in the interim, but it is an entirely different case here. The rights have expired and immediately upon expiration of these rights, rights accrue to the public. My hon. friend from Toronto speaks of the public taking advantage or of private parties taking advantage of this particular patent. He must not overlook the fact that the public have rights immediately the patent expires, and the patentee does not become possessed of any rights until he renews the rights for which he has applied. The distinction in that way is obvious. I had not the opportunity of being at the meeting of the committee. Possibly the facts brought before the committee would warrant the amendment made. In my judgment, the principle is unsound of saying that immediately you insert an advertisement in the public press with regard to any act for which application is going to be made to parliament, rights accrue to the applicant. You might as well say that any one advertising in connection with an application for a railway charter, immediately he puts the advertisement in the public press secures rights as against the public; and after that no rights must be recognized as against the applicant. I am not moving any amendment. I do not object to the report, but I simply question the principle, and think it is a bad precedent if we sanction it as a principle and not simply make it applicable to the conditions of each case.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I may say that we went into this question very fully in the committee. My own opinion was along the line which the hon. gentleman has suggested, but, after the discussion had taken place in the committee, I changed my view. I hold that in presenting this report the committee does not ask this House to endorse a principle which is unsound. I certainly would not be a party to it, if I really thought that the principle was unsound; but we went thoroughly into the merits of the question, and we found that the patentee had certain rights under the patent, whether he was a foreigner or a Canadian. In this case he was a foreigner, and knew much less about the law than a Canadian. He forfeited his rights under the law, but the merits of his invention did not fall with his rights as long as nobody else was able to avail himself of the merits of this invention. He had already taken precaution with the department to secure his rights. He got them, but for for want of time, want of money, and want of opportunity, he did not develop his invention and his patent lapsed. The time came when he was able to go on with the work. In the meantime nobody else had infringed on that patent. Nobody had begun to manufacture the goods which he is preparing to put on the market. Now he comes to the department and says, 'I want a revival of my rights.' The department has no objection. The department and the government say: 'You are entitled to a revival of your rights under this patent on a certain condition—that anybody who will have manufactured your goods according to your patent between a certain date and the passing of a certain Act shall be protected.' That has been the law of the department. It is a clause that is introduced in nearly every authority for the revival of a patent; but the clause is not a fair one because when a man gives notice in the press of the country, whether he be an official or a private individual, he exposes his hand. He exposes the value of his invention, and other people have an opportunity of coming in and availing themselves of it. The amendment accepted by the committee, and presented to the House is this: After the publication of his request to the parliament of this country to secure a revival of his rights that he shall be protected from that time and not from the moment when parliament may prorogue. Parliament may prorogue one month after he makes his application, and it may be six months afterwards. We have no guarantee that it will not be a year, before the Bill is sanctioned, thus giving everybody else a chance to infringe on that patent. We, therefore, came to the conclusion that from the 21st December, 1904, to the 4th November, 1905, anybody who, during that period, commenced to manufacture these goods will have the right to do so in spite of this Act, but we ask that from the moment of the publication of the notice in the 'Official Gazette' that we should be protected. In recommending that amendment I think we only did what was right as a matter of justice.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Was the renewal of the patent opposed in the committee?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Yes, it was. The committee was seven to five in number. There was a long discussion.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—If hon. gentleman will look at Bill 79, there is a saving clause in that Bill, put in, I suppose, on the instructions of the Department of Agriculture which looks after these matters. It is in exactly the same form as was used in this Bill before the amendment was inserted. Now the hon. member from Toronto says that they do not know to this day that any one has done so, but he says that some one might take advantage of the notice that has been given by parliament because this Bill does not become law to-day. I have no objection to this Bill. I do not know whether anybody has been infringing on the patent or not, but I do object to the principle of allowing people to come here who have let their rights lapse in that way and ask this parliament to give them retroactive legislation in order to reinstate them in rights which they themselves were too negligent to protect. I object to that. If we give relief in this case we are likely to be called upon to do it in other cases. I do not think it is a good principle to establish, and for that reason I am strongly of opinion that before the Bill is passed, an opinion should be obtained from the Department of Agriculture upon it. I have not yet seen any Bill that I can recollect—although it has been stated that some Bills have been put through containing this amendment—I cannot say I recollect of any such saving clauses being put in any Bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think this is a very unusual provision. The committee may have had information which is not before the House; but this patent, as all others of a similar character, having expired it is open to the petitioner to come to parliament and have an Act passed granting an extension; but the rights of those who commenced to manufacture the goods in question within the period during which the patent was lapsed are always preserved in Acts of this kind, and this clause is the usual one preserving the rights of those who have begun to manufacture in the meantime; but it has been amended and modified so that the rights of parties who may have begun to manufacture in the meantime, are only preserved up to the time at which the advertisement appeared. Now the committee may have had better information than the House possesses and they may be right, but as far as my recollection goes, it is something we have not done before, and I think it would be better to defer the consideration of this amendment until to-morrow. Then the House would have a better opportunity to come to a mature determination. The hon. gentleman from Victoria has pointed out that when the party holding the patent issues his notice he shows his hand. and that this gives an opportunity for others to come in which otherwise they might not have availed themselves of. There may be some force in that. It is a new departure in legislation and we ought to proceed carefully.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—If any parties have acquired rights their rights are continued by the Act. It is only intended to shut out people commencing to manufacture between the time of the discussion and the passing of the Act, because there is no pretense that any person has acquired a right up to this time. Why should any person who may start after the notice has been given obtain rights, why should we save his rights?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When did the patent expire?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Over a year ago, in 1904.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The usual course is to preserve the rights of any person who begins to manufacture from the time the patent has lapsed until it is renewed by parliament. Now we are proposing to preserve such rights only from the time the patent lapsed up to the time the notice was given. That may be right, but it is a new departure.

Hon. Mr. COX—It is only to preserve the right from the time notice of this legislation is given, from the time when the parties gave notice of their application for renewal. I may say that the building in which these goods are now being manufacured is a six story brick building, which has been under construction for the past year and the goods are now being manufactured there. It will thus be seen that this is an important business and an important patent. Any person noticing that this patent had expired by a mere error, might step in and take advantage of it. I think that would be a great hardship. This concern is now in operation, and it is quite an extensive affair, shipping goods all over the world.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend know whether there have been any intervening rights?

Hon. Mr. COX—I have not heard. I am not aware.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—There are none.

Hon. Mr. COX—I am not a member of the committee. I was asked to introduce the Bill, but had forgotten about it until I heard this discussion commenced. I happen to know that the goods are being manufactured in Peterborough, and that a very large amount of money has already been expended in preparations for manufacture and if it were left possible for any person to step in since this notice has been given, and take advantage of the patent on which so much money has been expended, I think that is something this honourable House would not desire.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—While one cannot discuss here what has taken place in committee, yet it would simplify matters very much if we knew whether it is alleged that the notice as it appears came to the observation of any parties who may possibly claim to have secured intervening rights? I should like to know if there was any evidence before the committee of any intervening rights, and if so at what point of time did they become acquainted with the application made for the renewal of the patent?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It was stated before the committee by the gentleman who represented the applicant, Mr. Ridout, of Toronto, that there were no rights acquired at all. There was no notification of any person having either manufactured or commenced to manufacture. I should have said when I was speaking before that the deputy minister stated—not in committee, but stated to Mr. Ridout in my presence afterward, as we were going out the door—when I asked him the question, why was it in this particular form he said: 'That is the way in which some parties prepare their Bills, and as long as they are satisfied with that clause, it is satisfactory to the department; but the view which we have is that there should be a greater protection given, and no premium held out to induce persons to begin to manufacture in this way.' Hon. gentlemen will bear with me while I refer to chapter 106 of the statutes of last session, the Act respecting certain patents of the Ideal Manufacturing Company, page 323. Section 2 of that Act reads as follows:—

If any person other than any licensee in the period between the expiry of six years from the date of the said patents and the 25th day of March, 1905—

That was the date of the giving of the notice. This Act was passed on July 20:

—commenced to manufacture, use and sell, in Canada, any of the patents of inventions covered by the said patents, respectively, such person may continue to manufacture, use and sell such inventions.

We are following that practice. It is to be found in many other Acts. This clause has been amended with reference to this particular Bill, and that was done with the same object, I understand, in some other cases.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is the point of time referred to there?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The time of giving notice of application.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think parliament was sitting then, on March 25.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Yes, notice was given then.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—This company are asking no favours. The company lost their rights on December 21, 1904. They made application on November 4, 1905, and they state to parliament that anybody who has commenced to manufacture between those dates, shall continue to manufacture. We merely asked parliament to protect the company's rights after they have made it known to the country at large that they want a revival of their patents.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It strikes me that this is rather new legislation on the part of the Senate. We have not heretofore passed legislation trying to cover up a patent that has lapsed and become extinct. I think it is a wrong principle, and one which we ought not to adopt, to proceed with retroactive legislation of this nature. These people come to parliament and make application to get their patent revived, and until parliament comes to a decision, we have no right to say that notice published three, six or twelve months before, should cover any legislation that this parliament might possibly feel disposed to enact. It is certainly equivalent to saying that the notice given by those who are applying for a revival of the patent is of the same effect as the legislation of parliament, and I therefore think it would be a very unreasonable thing for us to adopt a course of that kind. They ought to know what the law is. They know that they will be protected just as soon as they get their patent. My hon. friend says that they have exposed their hand, and that they want to be protected against anybody who might take advantage of that fact and enter into the business of manufacturing this article, thus depriving the company of certain rights. We make a provision protecting any individual who has begun to manufacture, up to a certain date; but now, I ask, is any one who intends to manufacture this article for which the patent has lapsed to know whether a notice has or has not been given. They might see the notice and they might not see it. Parties might go on and expend a large amount of money, and then, forsooth, might and that the notice which had been given covered the time during which they had been engaged in this industry. I contend that it would be dealing very unfairly and unjustly with the public and we should hesitate before we proceed with this retroactive legislation.

The motion to concur in the amendments made to the Bill was agreed to.

THE RESOURCES OF THE MACKENZIE BASIN.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The notice of motion being called :

That a select committee composed of the Honourable Messrs. Talbot, Lougheed, Douglas, DeVeber, Landry, Tessier, Wilson, McMullen, Young, Ferguson, Ross (Moosejaw) and the mover, be appointed to inquire and report from time to time as to the value of that part of the Dominion lying north of the Saskatchewan watershed, east of the Rocky mountains and west of the Hudson's bay ; comprising the north parts of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and the Mackenzie territory, its extent of navigable waters, rivers, lakes and sea coast, of agricultural and pastural lands, its fisheries, forests and mines ; five to be a quorum ; the said committee to have power to appoint shorthand writers and to send for persons, papers and records.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The attention of the government has not been given to this motion. I have only seen it to-day for the first time, and I should like the hon. gentleman to let it stand until Tuesday in order that I may have an opportunity of bringing it to the attention of my colleagues.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS— I was about to ask that the motion be allowed to stand over until Tuesday, and to give notice that I wish to add a certain number of names to those mentioned in the notice.

The motion was postponed.

A VACANCY IN THE SUPREME COURT BENCH

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to inquire if the government has come to any conclusion as to the nomination of a judge ad hoc for the Supreme Court, in order that all the cases coming from the province of Quebec may be dealt on the 14th May inst ? Those cases have been twice postponed on account of the absence of the judge and because the other judge, Justice Girouard, refused to proceed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I brought this subject up before the Minister of Justice and asked him whether it would be possible to appoint a judge ad hoc. He tells me there is no provision in the constitution of the Supreme Court for the appointment of an ad hoc judge, so some other course will have to be adopted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is there any other course that could be adopted ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not at present in a position to say. In the hasty interview we had to-day he was not able to suggest any.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Perhaps the nomination of a judge might meet the situation.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (L) An Act respecting the James Bay Railway.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

VANCOUVER, WESTMINSTER AND YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Third reading Bill (41) An Act respecting the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock).

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There seems to be some misapprehension with respect to the policy of the government in reference to this work. I may say that the government have no views on the subject that they desire to impress on the House one way or another, beyond this, that it was thought to be quite important in using the Yellowhead Pass a clause should be introduced in the Bill that it would be open to any railway to have running rights over the portion through the pass approaching either from the east or from the west. It was thought at one time that the Railway Commissioners could give that power, but in the opinion of the Minister of Justice the safer way would be to introduce a clause in this Bill to that effect, and I therefore suggested to my hon. friend that we should either send it back to the committee, or if he has a clause prepared by Tuesday it can be introduced in the House, giving running powers over that portion of the line which traverses the Yellow Head Pass.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask, by way of inquiry, why with a very large ministerial representation in the House of Commons this important subject was not thought of when the Bill passed its three readings in that Chamber.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State if it is because of the narrowness of the pass that this restriction is now being required by the government? Because I have it from the highest authority in Canada, Sir Sanford Fleming, that there is room for fifteen railways in the pass, so that the government need not be alarmed about any one railway whatever occupying a position through that part of the country, that is at present undeveloped, to the disadvantage of any other railway in Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is safer, I presume, to insert a clause of that kind. We do it constantly in important railway locations.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not objecting to the insertion of the clause. I think it is very advisable that it should be done.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—To be honest, I think it went through the House of Commons without public attention being called to it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That scarcely could be the case, because the present Minister of Inland Revenue seemed to be the chief advocate of the Bill when it came before the Senate Railway Committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to call the attention of the minister to this proof of the efficiency of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I would suggest that if the Bill is to be amended it should be sent back to the committee, where we could have a full discussion. The point has been raised by the hon. senator from Beamsville (Hon. Mr. Gibson) as to the number of lines of railway that can go through that pass. Has he any information as to the number of railways that can traverse the river beds in British Columbia leading to the pass?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I will tell the hon. gentleman further than that, that the portion of the country where this line is to be built was surveyed by Sir Sandford Fleming, and for reasons, good and sufficient I daresay to the government of that day, the Yellow Head Pass was abandoned; but I am assured—and I have read the survey reports and the reports of the chief engineer many years ago, but my memory was refreshed the other day by that gentleman—as to this one fact, that a railway through the Yellow Head Pass can be built with grades no greater than are to be found between Montreal and Toronto in addition to which the width of the pass will afford accommodation for the number of railways I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The hon. gentleman's remarks are a good argument for referring the Bill back to the committee. He speaks of the opinion of the engineers; we cannot hear the engineers in this House, and if the Bill is sent back to the committee we can have the engineers there and can get all the information which the hon. gentleman says is available and which is necessary to discuss the question intelligently.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The request made by the hon. Secretary of State is rather extraordinary on account of clause 137 in the Railway Act. I think the railway commissioners have all the power necessary to deal with the question, but, if he specially wishes it, I have no objection to let the Bill stand over until Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was quite surprised to hear the observation of the hon. Secretary of State that the government have not a policy with regard to this measure, because I was present in the committee when a colleague of his took a very strong stand. I may say that during my experience in parliament I have never known a member of the government to come before a committee and express himself so strongly and emphatically as that gentleman did. I would almost go so far as to say he attempted to browbeat the committee.

Some hon. GENTLEMAN—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Well the language was very strong—extremely strong. I never knew a member of the government to come before a committee and assume so strong an attitude as the hon. gentleman did.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I rise to a point of order; hon. gentleman cannot discuss what took place in the committee. The minister is not here to defend himself.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I may not be permitted to discuss what took place in the committee. but I am free to discuss what the policy of the government is, if a member of the government, in a committee or anywhere else, took an attitude distinctly different from that taken now by the leader of the House, I do not think it should be kept secret.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—That hon. gentleman, in addressing the committee, stated he was not speaking for the government, but as a representative from British Columbia, and he closed his remarks by stating that if the government had any other policy than the one he was advocating he did not see how he could remain a member of the cabinet.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose he was speaking as a farmer ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If he made use of that observation to which the hon. member from Marquette has alluded it escaped me. In answer to a question which I put to him he said emphatically 'I am speaking with all the responsibility of a member of the government.' These were his words.

The order was discharged, and placed on the Orders of the Day for Tuesday next.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It would be well if the suggestion made by the hon. Secretary of State were put on record so that we could understand it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will ask the Department of Justice to draft a clause for the Bill giving running powers to other roads through that pass.

CANADIAN HANDICRAFTS GUILD BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. FROST moved the third reading of Bill (E) An Act to incorporate the Canadian Handicrafts Guild. He said: In moving the third reading of this Bill I desire also to couple with it a motion that the amount paid by the promotors be refunded, less the usual charge for printing. This is not a matter from which any pecuniary advantage can rise to the promotors. It is purely benevolent, and on a par with Bills relating to religious and benevolent societies regarding and which it is the custom to refund the fees less the cost of printing.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman cannot couple a motion of that kind with his motion for the third reading of the Bill. He must give notice.

The Bill was read the third time and passed.

THIRD READING.

Bill (69) An Act respecting Patents of Henry Edmunds.—(Hon. Mr. Frost.)

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in committee of the whole consideration of Bill (C) An Act to further amend the General Inspection Act.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I ask the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the Department of Agriculture has looked into this Bill and reported on it ? My hon. friend placed on the table the other day a letter from the Board of Trade of Winnipeg indicating that it was from that source this Bill had its origin. What struck me in connection with it was this, that it would appear that the committee on hay—there seems to be such a section of the Board of Trade in Winnipeg—apparently had taken the subject up and made the proposition that the Inspection Act should be amended according to the suggestion which they then made. Now it seems to me very obvious that the hay section of the Winnipeg Board of Trade would not be producers but simply dealers in hay, and it would further seem to me that the appointment of an inspector, say at Winnipeg, at the instance of those parties who handle hay, would not be in the interest of the farming community. The difficulty I see is this, that owing to the very small amount of hay shipped from distant points to Winnipeg the inspector would necessarily be there. There would be no way, except the other inspectors are appointed in western districts to have the hay inspected before its shipment. Consequently the farmer would be in the hands of the Winnipeg buyer. The inspector will be appointed at the instance of the Winnipeg Board of Trade and would make the inspection there and the shippers will have no protection, that I can see, as to receiving that disinterested inspection to which they would be entitled.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The House will understand that this measure is submitted for the express purpose of ascertaining the views of those who are more particularly conversant with it than I can pretend to be, especially hon. gentlemen like my hon. friend from Calgary. About a year ago this matter was brought to the attention of the department, and I immediately caused the gentlemen with whom probably my hon. friend is well acquainted, who are appointed by the department to inspect grain, Messrs. Horn and Castle, and who are in constant touch with the farmers throughout the district chiefly affected; I referred it in the first instance, to them to obtain their opinion, and in the next place I referred to the Department of Agriculture to know whether they deemed this would be of use in the general interest, or whether it was likely in any way to affect the farmers prejudicially in the way my hon. friend supposes. They appeared to think that it would be a matter of some moment to have an inspection and that it would not prejudicially affect the farming interest. But my intention was first of all to submit it here, and if the gentlemen who are more particularly interested in the section of the country affected have any suggestions to make, of course I should be only too happy to consider them. It will also, after passing the ordeal of this House, be referred, when it goes to the House of Commons, to the Committee on Agriculture there, which has special facilities for dealing with these questions, and I have delayed the motion on several occasions in order that we might hear from any parties in the vicinity of Winnipeg or elsewhere, if they have any objections to make. I do not understand the hon. leader of the opposition to say that he has received communications on the subject. If he has I would be very happy to hear them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—None whatever. I take no exception to the Bill. The only thing that strikes me in connection with such legislation is that it emanates from the hay section of the Board of Trade of Winnipeg. If the matter is kept entirely within the Department of Agriculture, I feel satisfied that the farming community will be protected, but it emanates from an interested source from those who buy hay in Winnipeg, and if the inspection is left to them—if that is the case it is for the Department of Agriculture to say whether it is right.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The appointments would be made by the government, but the parties would be required to pass an examination as to qualification before certain examiners who would be appointed by the board of trade.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is why I say that in all probability the appointment would be made by the hay section of the Board of Trade of Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I suppose the members from Manitoba ought to know as much about this matter possibly as the eastern members. It appears to me that the conditions laid down here for the different grades of hay certainly could not be brought into service during the coming season; and I respectfully submit that the Grain Growers Association, which is an association of farmers in the west, might be very good people to express an opinion on a Bill of this description. I think it should be left over until the fall session. The people who are putting up hay for sale should have some idea as to the conditions which are to be attached to the inspection before they put up the hay. It would not be possible to have this Bill brought into force so as to affect the hay put up this season, because I see that red top is to be kept separate, and other varieties are to be kept separate. The farmers out there cut everything and bale it as it comes, and you would have all the different kinds mixed up together. There is practically no grading; in fact until this Bill was introduced I never heard anybody asking for an inspection of hay in the west. Hay has been bought in large quantities, principally by railway contractors. The most of the hay is used around the small towns where it is put up. It is hauled in and sold by sample. The price paid is according to what the purchaser thinks it is worth. The baled hay is principally bought by contractors. In the interests of the general public I think it would be a mistake that those who are most interested should not have some opportunity of expressing themselves. No interest will suffer by allowing the Bill to stand until the fall session.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have no particular desire to press the Bill against the wishes of gentlemen on both sides of the House who represent Manitoba and the provinces included in the inspection district. My idea had been however, that the discussion taking place here and some attention having been called to the matter in the press, if there was any serious objection to it, when it went down to the other branch of parliament, it could be suspended then; but if it was found that the measure met with the general approval of all concerned, it could then go through. Still I am not disposed to press the matter, and while I have taken pains to ascertain what the views of the parties affected are, and have sent communications in two or three quarters, I have not received any answer as yet. I believe certain newspapers published in the west have been giving the matter some little publicity; and usually, as hon. gentlemen know, if there is any objection we hear of it pretty promptly, either from the papers, or through the members themselves. I did not understand my hon. friends to say that they have received any communications objecting to it in any case. If it is desired, we can move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again; and in the meantime I should be obliged if the hon. gentlemen who are interested in this matter, would bring it to the attention of their constituents who are best qualified to give an opinion upon it. At what date would my hon. friend like to resume the discussion?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I can assure my hon. friend that I quite appreciate the consideration which he has given to the matter, and the desire to have the west made familiar with the provisions of the Bill. I think there should be sufficient time given to send copies of the Bill to the west, say a couple of weeks.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I should like to hear some argument as to why an inspection of hay is wanted at all? I have lived for 27 years in the Northwest and this is the first time I ever heard of such a thing. We do not export this hay out of the country. It is all used in the country and when hay is sold it is sold by the load and by the ton; people buy it with their eyes open, and the only object I can see in this proposition is exactly what the leader of the opposition has said, that some people want to get a little hold in the city of Winnipeg to grind the farmers.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am not conversant with the particular description of hay referred to here. I have been a purchaser of hay on a considerable scale for domestic use for a number of years and have not always found it easy to obtain a good quality, and I think it is the case with a good many of us, that we would have been better off if the hay had been inspected. However, that is a matter of detail. As I said, my object is more to call attention to the Bill which has been forwarded to me, and to see that both sides are heard.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I quite agree with the idea of delaying the further discussion of this Bill, for various reasons. I have been twenty-two years in that country. On our own ranch we put up about 300 or 400 tons of hay every year, and I know something about the quality of hay. I know also a little about the history of this matter in Winnipeg. It is affecting but a few individuals, who are preparing to fill or filling large contracts in connection with railway building; and I suppose it is a matter of considerable interest to them, as they buy baled hay by the carload, and sometimes they may find it in an inferior condition, damp or otherwise, so that while it may be a matter of very considerable importance to the trade in Winnipeg, certainly it has very little to do with the west in general. Individually I have not received any letter from my constituency, and as far as I know the other representatives from the west are in the same condition, so that it would be well to delay the matter if possible. Then again I have a decided objection to the basis upon which the inspection is proposed to be made, for the reason that probably they would not find a carload of hay that could be sold under the classification here specified, red top and pea vine, and wild vetch, all dry, well cured, good colour, &c. Such a thing is not known, to me at least. We know mixtures of grasses, and pea vine and such like, but I do not believe a carload of such hay as is here described could be found in the whole western country. The whole principle upon which it is proposed to inspect would have to be very carefully gone over, and I think very materially changed. I certainly am very much in favour of the proposition to leave it over until we hear further from the west in reference to the subject.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. WOOD from the committee, reported that the committee had made some progress and asked leave to sit again.

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Consideration of the second report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I move that the report of the committee be now concurred in.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was under the impression that the consideration of the report was to be delayed until the return of the expenditures of the Senate under the head of Contingent Accounts, had been laid upon the table by the clerk. However, I do not insist upon that if the House desires to go on and consider the report without the statement in question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There will be another report coming up in a few days, when the return to which my hon. friend refers can be taken up.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That will have nothing to do with this report. It cannot be considered with this report.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not think any return made to the House can affect this report, and it is for that reason that I move that it be adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If we adopt this report, we adopt the recommendations made by the committee. However, I do not insist upon the point. I desire to make some suggestions in reference to the report of the committee, and to take some little objections to portions of it. I have a very distinct recollection of the manner in which the hon. Secretary of State used to take the members of the Contingent Accounts Committee, representing as they did at that time another political party, to task for their extravagance. Whether he has effected the same reform in this instance as in most others, by doubling the expenditure or at least adding materially to it, I do not know. In looking at the reports of expenditures attending the management of the Senate under the head of contingent expenses, now as compared with 1896, when the hon. Secretary of State used to be shocked at anything like a recommendation for an increase of salary or the appointment of an additional messenger, I observe that the difference between the expenditure to-day and that of 1896, is about $30,000. I am ready to admit that a portion of that increase can easily be accounted for. If my recollection serves me right, previous to 1896, the 'Hansard' reports had not been translated into French. That would add some $10,000 or $12,000 to the expense, and that is quite justifiable; but the remaining portion of the increase would be for other reasons. I wish to point out that if this report be adopted, and the officials referred to be retired, it leaves it open for the committee to fill their places. There is another difficulty I might point out, and I think the Secretary of State is well acquainted with the fact, that he has had in the past great difficulty in getting his colleagues to accede to the extra expenditure which has been incurred in the Senate.

Now if this report recommending the retirement of Messrs. Adamson and Lambkin be based upon a desire on the part of the Senate to reduce the expenditure, and in the interests of economy, and that fact is made plain, it would enable the Secretary of State, or his colleagues who may be on the Treasury Board, to point out that in retiring these officials with a year's salary, a saving would be effected, and he would then, I think, have no difficulty in getting it through. He may have difficulty, however, if the facts be known as he knows them, that Mr. Adamson has been literally doing nothing for a year or two, and that Mr. Lambkin has not been in the office for any considerable time during the past two or three years. He has been kept upon the pay list for, I suppose, the reason of his not being well. There is, of course, always sympathy with officials who are in that position, but that does not apply to one of the cases to which I have referred.

With regard to the appointment of Mr. Berubé as a carpenter, I notice that he is appointed temporarily, that he is not recommended to be placed on the permanent list, but there is a provision in the report that he is to receive a salary of $700 per annum. The carpenter whom we have had on the staff for a number of years, has been what might be termed, a pensioner, for the last year or two. He has scarcely done any work. Whenever any work of consequence was required to be done in the Senate the Board of Works took it in hand. We have another man on the staff by the name of Whitmore, who acts as a carpenter and messenger. If my information be correct, this man is quite capable of doing all the carpenter work necessary to be done other than alterations which are taken in charge by the Board of Works, as I have mentioned; hence there is no necessity for placing this man upon the staff of the Senate. If these new appointments are to be made, why is it that some of the senators have not the privilege of making a recommendation? Who puts these men on? We do not know; but we do know that the members representing the city of Ottawa have no little influence in the appointment of these men. Is it not a fact known to those who have paid any attention to these appointments, that whenever all the holes in the House of Commons are filled up with applicants for office, the residue is dumped upon the Senate? That may be strong language, but that is the conclusion I have come to, because I know that the members representing the city of Ottawa in the Commons have had more to do with the recommendation of parties to fill these different positions in the Senate than the senators themselves. The chairman of the committee frankly told us the other day that there was the greatest harmony prevailing in the committee in the making of these appointments. Was it not the fact that these men were put on the pay-list before the committee had ever met? If that is so, who put them on? And upon what authority? That the committee concurred in it afterwards, I am not prepared to dispute. I suggest that this report should be amended, if it is to be adopted in its present form, by adding words to this effect: 'That the committee recommend with the view of effecting economy in the expenditure of the Senate that Mr. Adamson be retired with a year's salary, and that Mr. Lambkin be retired in the same way.' I do not object to the retirement. What I would object to is that others should be appointed in their places. If the words which I have suggested are inserted—and these men are not required—we can justify the action of the Senate and in the House, and it would place the members representing the government in this House in a position to go before the treasury board and point out the reasons why this is being done. I was on the treasury board for ten or fifteen years, and when questions of this kind came up, if it could be pointed out that such action was being taken in order to effect economy, I have never known any difficulty arise in having the recommendations carried out. I should strongly recommend also that this man Berubé should not be continued as a carpenter, because I am convinced that he is not required, and it is only making an addition of $700 per annum to the expenditure for the time he is employed. We should endeavour as much as possible not to have a lot of barnacles fastened upon us particularly by those who have no right to make the recommendations. I make the suggestion to add the words which I have mentioned in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to what may occur in the future.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—In reply to the very fair criticism of the hon. gentleman from Belleville, I would state that in the case of Mr. Adamson and Mr. Lambkin I see no reason why such a clause should be added to the report, because this action is being taken as a matter of fact for the purpose of effecting economy. Mr. Caron, who is in the accountant's office, has been performing the work done by Mr. Adamson, up to a few months ago—not years, as has been suggested, by my hon. friend. Mr. Adamson has been employed for sixteen years, and would be entitled to superannuation. The committee considered it would be much more economical for the government to give him a year's salary, which he himself suggested, rather than pay him superannuation. Mr. Lambkin has been 22 years in the service, and he also is willing to take a year's salary in lieu of superannuation. It was also considered by the committee that this would be a saving. In the case of Mr. Lambkin, what has been stated by the hon. gentleman from Belleville is perfectly correct. Mr. Lambkin for the last two or three years has not been giving us much service, for the reason that he was one of the unfortunates who went to South Africa and came back an invalid, and he has been presenting doctors' certificates as to the state of his health the last three years. He now feels that the time has come when he should put in his resignation. It is not intended that there should be any person appointed in his place. As far as Mr. Bérubé the carpenter is concerned, I do not want any misunderstanding. I do not know why we should thresh these matters out here, but of course the members of this House are entitled to an explanation. Mr. Gravelle applied for superannuation last year. At that time it was decided to superannuate him, and I, as chairman of the committee, was instructed—not in the report, but verbally by the committee—to select a carpenter in his place. Applications were made and the one which commended itself to me most is that of Mr. Bérubé. He was backed up by a petition signed by senators, not of one political party only, asking that he be appointed carpenter in the place of Gravelle. I fully appreciate the fact that we have not now the same necessity for a carpenter in this building that we used to have. Our furniture and fixtures are in much better condition than formerly, and there is not the same need for repairs to broken desks, &c. Two vacancies had occurred on the messenger staff since last session, and Mr. Dallaire was taken on subject to the approval of the committee. We had to have a messenger; we could not do without one until the committee should meet. Messengers have always been taken on in the same way in the early part of the session. Bérubé was taken on in reality as a messenger, and under my instructions, because I was authorized to instruct the clerk to appoint a carpenter. That authority was given a year ago, but he was not taken on until two or three weeks ago. In writing to the clerk, authorizing him to instruct Berubé to report for work, I said that it was to be distinctly understood that it was not simply carpenter work he was to do, but messenger work, or any other kind of work required by the clerk. And he is really appointed now as a messenger, to do any work as directed by the clerk. He is taken on temporarily, and he gets, as stated in the report, salary at the rate of $700 a year—not as the hon. gentleman from Belleville states, a salary of $700 a year. Now we pay ordinary messengers $650 and $700 a year. Surely it does not hurt a man to be a mechanic and to be able to do a mechanic's work, while he is only paid at the same rate as a messenger. As regards having work done by the Public Works Department, no doubt anything of importance can be done in that way, but there are often small pieces of carpenter work to be done about the building, and it is not practicable always to have to make a requisition and then wait a week or more before getting a mechanic from the department. It always has been found in the past much more profitable and economical to have a carpenter in connection with the Senate, because there is always a certain amount of work for him to do. As regards the reference which has been made to the increase which has taken place since 1896, I happen to know some of the reasons for the increase. Hon. gentlemen will remember that $12,000 a year has been added to the expenditure in connection with the translation of 'Hansard.' The unrevised edition of 'Hansard' is published now as well, and that has to be paid for. There are more members in attendance in the Senate than formerly, and consequently the stationery bill is larger. When the hon. gentleman speaks of the expenditure of 1896, of course he does that with the object of comparing the Liberal administration with the Conservative administration, but he knows very well that the Liberals had little or no say in this chamber until about three years ago. The Liberals did not come into power in the Senate in 1896; the Conservatives controlled the expenditure until about three years ago. A good deal of the increased expenditure was incurred under the hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not think the Finance Minister of the day objected to the large expenditure for the investigation in connection with the Drummond County Railway, but surely the government should not be held responsible for that. I do not think the government had any part in bringing on the Cook investigation, which cost the Senate so large a sum. The hon. gentleman himself was largely responsible for that. We have had other extraordinary expenses since that time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Mutual Reserve was another.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—These things have grown up, and no doubt will account to a great extent for the increase. So far as the contingent accounts committee is concerned, it cannot be charged with spending more money than is necessary. I doubt, if members of the Senate were canvassed individually, if they would suggest a change in any particular. With the object of saving all we possibly can, and believing as members do that our bills for stationery are large, we appointed a sub-committee who sat to-day and will have other sittings and will report to the committee their findings and see if there is any chance of making a saving. They will also report as to the efficiency of the staff and the remuneration paid for the work done. I have no hesitation in saying that we have employees in the Senate who are not receiving sufficient remuneration for the work done. I have no hesitation in saying that we have employes in the Senate who are receiving more remuneration than their work is worth. The committee are making inquiries, and I suppose will shortly have some recommendation to make to the House. We do not wish to be extravagant, or to have people working here who are not properly paid for their services. With that object in view, we are trying to economize, and have good reasons for every dollar of expenditure that we are now making. We appointed a sub-committee to make an inquiry and we expect in a week or ten days to be able to submit a report which we hope will commend itself to the good judgment of the House.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—What is the name of the law clerk's assistant ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The assistant to the law clerk is a young lady who has been in the employ of the Senate for four or five years at $40 a month, and it is proposed to increase the pay to $45 a month. She does her work well and deserves the increase. There is no other part of the report which has been referred to that requires explanation and I hope the House will adopt it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I wish to say one word with reference to senators signing petitions for those who seek appointments or increase of salary in the Senate. It would be better in the interest of economy to leave the contingent accounts committee free to use their best judgment in dealing with such matters. It is not a proper course for any employee or applicant for employment to canvass senators for their signatures with a hope of influencing the committee against their better judgment. I have made it a rule to tell any man who asks for my signature to get out, that that is a bar, as far I am concerned, and if he requires that assistance I look upon him as one possibly who has some drawbacks that do not appear on the surface. We should have a clear cut understanding that no senator should sign a petition of the kind for any one applying for employment or for increased remuneration.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I always understood it was the unwritten law that no petition of the kind should be circulated, and I cannot recall any instance before the present session in which such a petition was presented to me for signature. A case of the kind came to my notice this session and I expressed my strong disapproval. It should be the rule that the presentation of such a petition to a senator by an employee should be almost equivalent to censuring such employee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If it has been the unwritten law in the past, let us renew for the future the unwritten law in that matter. There is another point to which I should like to direct the attention of the sub-committee, and that is the reading room. I understand a great many papers received there are practically of no interest to any one in the Senate at present, however interesting or useful they may have been in former years. It would be well if the sub-committee would take stock of the reading room and strike off some of these papers and perhaps add others—at all events see what papers should be on the list and what should be removed from it.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Another small grievance is this, that a large number of papers go direct to members; among them some of the most valuable and looked for magazines and papers. I have no objection to members of the Senate getting these, but they ought to be on file for a couple of days any way so that members could have access to them while they are still fresh. There is no doubt the list needs supervising, because there are many papers on it that are absolutely useless. Between the ones that are of no use and the better ones which are given away without any one seeing them the reading room has nothing like the merit it should have.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It may be found that if the sub-committee undertake to cut off newspapers which are supposed to be useless, they might dispense with some which are useful.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I would not suggest that. I simply suggest that they should take stock.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Some of these papers are valuable to those who come from the localities where they are published.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I am told that there are papers coming to the reading room which are never opened. There can be no question about them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That certainly should not be. Our staff is sufficiently strong to open every paper that comes and put it on file. I would not be understood as assenting at all to the idea that we have too many papers. We ought to have such a list that it would be almost possible to see in our reading room a paper published in every part of the Dominion of Canada. I have sometimes had occasion to make search for a paper belonging to a part of the country very far distant from where I reside myself but which for certain reasons I found desirable to procure, and found it difficult to get it. Of course we cannot have every paper published in Canada, but we ought to have at least one from every town in Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to this newsroom question, I quite sympathize with the hon. senator from Killarney, because I remember that when I was young and more or less enthusiastic, I thought there was a great waste of money in connection with the newsroom. But I found that a practice had prevailed almost from the beginning of taking in the Senate reading room, as they do in the House of Commons reading room, a copy of every paper published in Canada. The bill on the whole is not a very large one, and the unimportant papers generally cost only a dollar or a dollar and a half a year. I have been informed, in connection with this matter, that as a rule the newspapers taken in the House of Commons reading room are not available for permanent preservation. They are likely to be disfigured or destroyed and as a rule the files of newspapers which are to be found in the library are those which have come to the Senate. The economy would not be very large and we would probably have a large number of influential papers all through Canada condemning the Senate and asking for its abolition probably, if we were to discontinue taking these papers in our reading room. The hon. gentleman from Belleville had a notice on the paper, and I thought the discussion on the relative expenditures in 1896 and in 1904-05, would more properly come up when that motion was before the House. I do not intend to discuss it now at any length, but the hon. gentleman has referred to the matter, and it is as well to mention on two or three circumstances which, perhaps, have not occurred to him. There are more senators now than there were in 1896. That accounts for a little; but I wish to direct attention to this circumstance, that the session of 1896 lasted for three months and fifteen days while the session of 1904-5 lasted for six months and nine days—the session was nearly twice as long, and that naturally entailed a larger expenditure for stationery and a much larger expenditure for pages, sessional messengers and other officers.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Were there not two sessions in 1896?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not in 1895-96. There were two sessions in 1896, but not in the fiscal year. The session of '1896 lasted three months and fifteen or sixteen days. Hon. gentlemen will remember it could not last any longer.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is the year the hon. gentleman made his speech on the school question. It could not last any longer.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Of course, at first sight, the difference between the expenditure for 1896 and last year seems very great, but when we come to examine it more carefully it does not seem so large. I have mentioned one or two circumstances, chiefly the length of the session, which go to account for the disparity. In the session of 1904-5, we had a special committee sitting which cost something like $4,000; but for the fiscal year 1904-5, the expenditure in connection with that committee investigating the New York Mutual Reserve Insurance Company was $2,269. Then, as the hon. gentleman from Belleville stated in moving for his return, the leather trunks had to be deducted, costing something over $2,000, and there were other sundries which were not properly chargeable, items which had run over from previous sessions. I find that the net amount chargeable to the session of 1904-5 was $90,111. The net amount for the same purpose charged to 1896 was $76,153. That is a total excess of $14,000. Looking at the way in which the expenses of every householder in the country have increased, I do not think the increase in the Senate expenditure is more than might naturally be expected. The officials are paid somewhat more than they were then, and it would only be reasonable that they should be. The cost of living is very much greater than it was then, out of all proportion to the increase in the pay of those employees. I do not propose to say anything more on the general question; the details can be discussed when the motion of the hon. member from Belleville comes up, but I wish to refer to two items in the report of the committee. The hon. member from Belleville made what was apparently a very good case against the appointment of this man Berubé, to act as carpenter, as he claimed that one carpenter was quite capable of doing all the work; but when Gravelle was carpenter and was capable of doing his work, it was thought necessary to appoint Whitmore as his assistant and no question was raised then as to its being extravagant.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—That was when Gravelle had become a very old man.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Gravelle was quite able to do his work when Whitmore was appointed to assist him. There is room now for a general utility man. The report proposes to get rid of two or three officers. One result of the adoption of the report will be that we diminish our staff of permanent messengers by two. With respect to the small increase to the young lady who acts as stenographer and typewriter in the law clerk's office, I may say that the lady has been there for between four and five years. She is a most efficient servant of the Senate and has been paid in the past considerably less than we pay our pages. I do not think any hon. gentleman would object to the increase—in fact, I feel rather ashamed that we should be paying her so little.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. gentleman object to the suggestion I made that the words should be added 'with a view to effecting economy.'

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, I think that was a very good suggestion.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It is proposed to insert these words in items two and three.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. The session to which the hon. member from Halifax called attention, as he very properly said, did not last longer at that time on account on the fact that the term of parliament expired. It is not my intention to go minutely into the expenditure for the reason I advanced when I rose, but the increase in the number of employees is from 53 to 65. Having heard the reasons given by the chairman of the committee for the increase in the number, we can understand how it happened. The Liberal party had been so long in opposition that they had had no opportunity of providing for their friends and, consequently, they had to add to the expenditure of the country whether it was required or not in order that some hangers on might be provided for. That is an admission from the chairman of the committee that I was very glad to hear, because it is a charge that some of us had been continually making against the party and it is seldom we have such honesty displayed in matters affecting the expenditure of the country. The total staff in 1895-6 numbered 53 and the expenditure was $65,210; in 1904-5, the number had increased to 65 and the expense to $91,780.66. Now what necessity was there for increasing the staff and the expenditure to that extent unless it was for the reason suggested by the hon. senator from Portage la Prairie? I have already pointed out that you could account for eight or ten thousand dollars of that increase for which the Senate is responsible, and not the committee, but the committee is equally responsible because it always approved of any suggestions which were made. I find also that in the matter of charwomen there is an increase from $972 to $1,227.20, and I do not know that the Senate is kept any cleaner now than it was ten years ago, and the total expenditure under the head of contingencies has swollen from $38,056 in 1895-6, to $52,630.46 in 1904-05.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Look at the number of rooms we have now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The rooms existed then as they do now. I do not desire to say anything offensive, but the sub-committee appointed to take into consideration the expenditure of the Senate will find a number of people on the staff who never do anything, and they are in the same position as the two employees to whom I called attention who are being paid for doing nothing. Another point my hon. friend did not refer to is the fact that Bérubé is to act as carpenter and messenger; that is, when he has nothing to do in one position he is to be employed in the other. What I contend is, and what I think everyone who knows anything about the Senate will admit, that a carpenter is not required at all; that Whitmore can do the work as he has done it all along since Gravelle's illness. Further, the Board of Works has taken charge of the improvements made in the Senate. If you propose to dispense with the services of the Board of Works people, then there might be some reason for this appointment. However, the Senate seems to be satisfied and, I presume, as the majority is with the hon. gentleman now we will have to accept his reasons for increasing the expenditure. I move that the following words be added to the second and third paragraph: 'with the view of effecting economy.'

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I sympathize with the remarks of the hon. member from Belleville about Bérubé, but if that man is to be retained it seems to me that a few words should be struck out from the paragraph recommending his appointment, because it implies that he is appointed to replace Gravelle and to be 'paid at the rate of salary paid his predecessor.' That implies that he is to take the place of Gravelle. It seems to me it would be an injustice to Whitmore who was appointed assistant to Gravelle. Now that Gravelle is gone, Whitmore should take his place by virtue of promotion, which is the right principle, and the one which should prevail. I would suggest that if Mr. Bérubé is to be retained that these words be struck out—leaving the question open, when it presents itself, whether Whitmore or Berubé should be the head of that service. As the chairman of the committee has told us, he has merely appointed Berubé temporarily, and really as a messenger. If we strike out these words, that would leave the whole question open for the future, for any one who may take interest in it. For instance if that sub-committee lately appointed by the Contingent Committee, is to take cognizance of this, their hands will not be tied.

Salary paid to his predecessor, namely.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—We are not interfering with Mr. Whitmore at all. We have appointed Mr. Bérubé and we have to provide for his pay.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—By leaving out these words it would read that Mr. Berubé be paid at the rate of $700 a year. The resolution as it reads now implies that Berubé is to take the place of Gravelle, the head carpenter.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The chairman of the committee will doubtless appreciate the point made by the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface. The chairman made the statement that it was not the intention to appoint Berubé as successor to Gravelle. I understand that to be the case, that he was appointed really as a messenger.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Gravelle used to do carpenter work and nothing else. As far as Bérubé is concerned, he was appointed to do any kind of work.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Therefore he would not in that sense be the successor of Gravelle. We understand his duties are defined as indicated. My hon. friend from St. Boniface, takes the exception that he should not be described as the successor of Gravelle. That impliedly places him in the same position as that occupied by Gravelle, and inferentially he would be performing the same duties of head carpenter. I think the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface is quite reasonable in his view, and the suggestion he has made will carry out the intention of the committee, namely that Berubé shall receive $700 a year.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The man he has referred to—Whitmore—is all right for the work he is doing, but I have no hesitation in saying I would not want him to be head carpenter over Berubé. Berubé is supposed to be, and is the better man of the two. Whitmore is not interfered with at all. He is a permanent employee, and the other man is only temporary.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Cape Breton)—I do not see why the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface should be accepted. This situation is this; Gravelle is sick, he is not yet superannuated. During his illness, and until he is superannuated, Mr. Berubé has been appointed to do any carpenter work that may be required. He is in the line of succession to Mr. Gravelle; therefore, I see no reason why the amendment of the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface should be accepted.

The Senate divided on the amendment which was rejected on the following division; contents 12, non-contents, 19.

The main motion to concur in the report was then agreed to.

AN EXPLANATION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the House adjourns, I wish to call attention to the summary report of our proceedings of yesterday. I was struck when one of the evening papers was put into my hands with the very large headline, 'Senator Ferguson modifies his view.' I at once went up to Mr. Soutter's room and got the report of yesterday. I am represented as having modified my view with regard to the propriety of judges sitting on commission. The summary reporter appears to have altogether misconceived my position with regard to that question. I did not modify my view at all, but I took another way of carrying it out, another way of accomplishing the same object. I read yesterday and read with approval, from the report of the remarks of the Minister of Justice in the House of Commons, wherein he entirely disapproved of judges sitting on political commission. I did not withdraw or change my position at all, with regard to the practice, but I thought a better way of carrying out my suggestion was to withdraw the pay, thus compelling the judges to do such extra-judicial work, if they were required to do it at all, without extra remuneration, which I thought would effect the object just as well as in any other way. I do not find very serious fault with the summary reporter, but the report certainly creates a wrong impression of my attitude on that question.

The Senate then adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

DUTY ON TIN PLATE.

INQUIRY.

The Order of the Day being called :

By the Honourable Mr. Macdonald, B.C.:

Will call the attention of the government to the following resolution of the Board of Trade of Victoria, British Columbia, and will ask if it is the intention of the government to place a duty on tin plate this session of parliament :

Whereas we have learned from eastern advices that the Canada Tin Plate and Sheet Stel Company, of Morrisburg, Ont., have petitioned the government for a protective duty of 33⅓ per cent on tin plate, and whereas, the granting of said petition, would, in the opinion of this board, cause considerable loss to manufacturers all over the Dominion, retard the development of certain canning industries, and cause a general advance in prices to the consumer : Be it therefore resolved that this board enters a strong and emphatic protest against any duty being placed on tin plate.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I do not know whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce has taken note of this inquiry of mine with regard to the duty on tin plate. It may be asking him to betray a state secret before the budget comes down, but if the answer can be given now, I shall be glad to have it, because some of the canners are anxious about the purchase of tin plate. It is reported that there is a duty about to be placed on tin plate of 33⅓ per cent. The boards of trade in British Columbia have taken this matter up and would like to know if there is any truth in the report.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I may say to my hon. friend that all the information on the subject in the possession of the government will be laid before the public when the budget speech is delivered.

CERTIFICATES OF COMMANDER SPAIN.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Are the certificates which Commander O. G. V. Spain holds, which were given him by the Royal Naval College of Portsmouth and Greenwich, for his knowledge, of pilotage seamanship navigation, management of torpedoes, gunnery and mathematics, certificates of competency, or are some of them certificates of service ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All certificates of competency.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was the Canadian certificate which was given to Captain Spain granted to him, in consideration of the preceding certificates, as a matter of grace, or did he obtain it after a special examination ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—After gaining the above certificates at the Royal Naval College, a commissioned naval officer is entitled by right, not only to a Canadian certificate, but also to a British board of trade certificate as master of a foreign-going ship, after passing special examination in eyesight.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In the latter case, when did this examination take place ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—February, 1893.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Who were the examiners ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Chairman of board.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was it an oral or written examination ? If a written examination, what are the questions which were put ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oral.

FRENCH VERSION OF MILITIA HANDBOOKS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

When it may be expected on behalf of the French officers of the Canadian militia that they will be put on a footing of equality with the other officers of the volunteer forces by providing them with the French version of the following works :—
Appendix to Infantry Training, 1905.
Combined Training, 1905.
Appendix to Training Manuals, 1905.
King's Regulations.
Army Act ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This question is receiving the careful consideration of the department. The department is not in a position to say when the translations will be ready for distribution.

THE ROSS RIFLE COMPANY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. How many of the Ross Rifle Company's rifles have been distributed—
(a) To the 3rd regiment of artillery.
(b) To the 6th regiment of artillery.
(c) To the 67th regiment?
2. How many to the other regiments, to which regiments, and how many to each regiment ?
3 Where are the balance of the rifles accepted by the government stored, and how many of Mark No. I, remain, and how many of Mark No. II?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT :

1. (a) 3rd Regiment, C.A., 330.
(b) 6th Regiment, C.A., 330.
(c) 67th Regiment, 268.
2. None.
3. (a) Rifle associations, 267.

VACANCY IN THE SUPREME COURT BENCH.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to know whether the government could let us know if they have arrived at any decision concerning the cases from Quebec, which are to come before the Supreme Court on the 14th inst. The lawyers who are interested want to know whether they should come to Ottawa or not because of the uncertainty as to the appointment of a second judge from the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the Minister of Justice was to see the members of the bar interested in the cases and have a consultation with them over the subject.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is he going to Quebec.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know, that is the answer he gave me. He informed me that under the constitution of the Supreme Court ad hoc judges could not be appointed, no provision having been made for doing so. He was going to see the members of the bar.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I know that there is no provision for the appointment of an ad hoc judge, but when we are here engaged in the passing of laws, and when we have the Governor General at our disposal to give assent to Bills, it would have been very easy to pass a law enabling the appointment of an ad hoc judge to be made. It would not take very long to do that, and when it is a pressing question, as in this case, I think the government should look after the interests of the public before the interests of a party, whoever he may be, even the Minister of Justice himself.

NORTH SYDNEY HARBOUR BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (74) An Act respecting the Harbour of North Sydney in Nova Scotia.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In whom is this property vested ? Is it vested in trustees ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In trustees as I understand.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As representing the Crown or the province ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We had some discussion in the House recently on the subject. It was alleged by an hon. gentleman that there had been some misuse of the funds of the pilots belonging to Sydney, and I brought in a return, which is one of the published returns. The hon. senator from Cape Breton disputes the correctness of it. I have sent his letter making a statement to the minister and specially called his attention to it with a view of having an investigation made as to whether there has been misapplication of the funds—whether any have been misappropriated.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In what way would that be applicable to the Bill now before us ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not applicable, except he says that in connection with the funds for the pilots there have been some hundreds of dollars—I do not know how much—misappropriated by some official, and that it has been covered up by a return made from Sydney. I have asked the minister to make a special inquiry into the subject.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Could my hon. friend say in whom the property is vested upon which the mortgage is to apply ? Is it vested in the Crown or in the trustees of the harbour ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it is in the Crown. They cannot mortgage except by authority. This Bill gives them authority to borrow up to $6,000. The clause reads as follows :—

2. The Harbour Commissioners of North Sydney may, from time to time, borrow upon mortgage such sums of money as are required for the purchase of real or other property, or for the improvement of the harbour of North Sydney, or for such other works as the said commissioners are authorized to undertake ; and for such purpose the said commissioners may mortgage the real property, works, tolls or revenues of the said harbour : Provided that no money shall be so borrowed without the sanction of the Governor in Council, and provided also that the total indebtedness for moneys borrowed under the provisions of this section shall not at any one time exceed the sum of six thousand dollars.

It is evidently in the commissioners that the funds are supposed to be vested.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State whether he has made particular inquiries as to the necessity for the purchase of property in addition to the land now owned by the Harbour Commissioners of North Sydney ? They acquired a piece of property and, I believe, redeemed from the ocean a piece of property some twenty years ago. I see by the return of the Harbour Commissioners that for the last two years they have collected an average of about $2,000 a year. The old mortgage must have been paid up by this time, because I see they paid $1,200 of the old mortgage last year. The old mortgage did not exceed $4,000. At the time this return was made they had on hand a large amount of money.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What return was that?

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—The return of 1905. The question is what necessity was there for buying another piece of land in addition to what they already had. Is that necessary ? Has the Department of Marine taken steps to investigate the matter and see whether the land is really necessary ? I am told that a piece of land has been bargained for, but I have no proof of it, without any report or approval from the Marine Department, of that particular piece of land, and it is expedient that the Minister should see that none of this money is paid on any mortgage until the government is assured that the security for the mortgage is necessary. I see that the report of the Harbour Commissioners represents that 1,311,456 tons of coal were shipped from the harbour of North Sydney by the Dominion Coal Company, Ltd. The Department of Marine should take steps to get the authorities of North Sydney harbour to correct misrepresentations like that. The Dominion Coal Company shipped directly from the harbour of Sydney, about six miles from the harbour of North Sydney, across the water, and it is not fair to represent that 1,311,456 tons of coal was all shipped at North Sydney. If that was done by the authorities of North Sydney harbour with a view to attracting attention and getting the government to sanction the expenditure of moneys as provided for in this Bill, it is not right. I have no objection to the Bill if the money is properly expended.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend what steps are taken by the government to ascertain the designs of the Harbour Commissioners in making this expenditure and the requirements of this loan ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is to be presumed that the local authorities are the best judges. I do not know them individually, but they are usually men connected with the trade of the port, and the fair assumption is that they are not interested in asking for anything that may not be absolutely necessary. Before the Bill goes through the last stage I will send the remarks made by the hon. member from Cape Breton to the minister and ask him to have the statement checked over, because if North Sydney is claiming shipments made at Sydney, six miles away, it is highly improper—it is a misrepresentation. Commissioners who would avail themselves of such a falsehood ought to be removed. I can scarcely believe that men interested in a port like North Sydney would include in the exports from that port the exports of another harbour. I had written the minister to make a special examination on other points.

My hon. friend some days ago brought forward a motion asking for a return of the moneys in the fund for the benefit of the retired pilots. I brought it down, and he then said he thought the return was not correct, that some of the money which the government claimed was invested, was not invested. It was only a small amount, still it was highly improper if it was an attempt to cover up any improper appropriation of moneys, and I will wait until I get the answer from the minister after he has made inquiries before proceeding further with the Bill. I will send the minister the remarks the hon. gentleman has given to this committee, which I think are quite important in connection with this Bill, before it reaches another stage, to have the minister make a full inquiry into the facts.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I asked the question because I observe the government is departing from the old established policy which has obtained for so many years, of administering harbours by what I might call ornamental commissioners. I noticed the hon. gentlemen are abandoning the Harbour Commission of Montreal, and appointing a business commission to administer the very important trade of that harbour on a business basis. I imagine the harbour of North Sydney is administered on very much the same lines that the Harbour Commission of Montreal administered that very important port. It seems to me that this system should be entirely over-hauled. It has given very great dissatisfaction generally to the shipping interests, and in all probability is very much in the same position as the Harbour Commission of Montreal, to which I have referred.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I agree with the leader of the opposition. There is this to be said about the harbour of North Sydney. It may yet become the terminus of the fast Atlantic mail steamers. I understand a contract has been made with the Allan line whereby their steamers may call at North Sydney with the approval of the government, and at the option of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the tax on the shipping at North Sydney ought to be made as little as possible. If the harbour of Montreal is to be nationalized, I claim that the harbours of Sydney and North Sydney should also be nationalized. It is not right to allow the tax on shipping coming to North Sydney or Sydney now to be increased, or misappropriated in any way. I do not say it is misappropriated, but it is wrong that the balance of the money collected at North Sydney should be put in a bank or anywhere else until that mortgage is paid, and I see by the return made last December, that there was a large amount of money on hand at that time. Instead of keeping it in bank it should have gone to pay off the mortgage. They cannot get interest on that from the bank, equal to the interest they have to pay on the mortgage.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I assume it would scarcely be warranted to appoint an official to look after it, because I see the expenditure is only $4,478.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—It must be larger than that. They have been expending money for many years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the receipts for last year. The amount involved would not jusify the appointment of an official to live there and take charge of it. There are three commissioners. I do not know how long they have been acting.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—They were appointed about six years ago.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is just one point with respect to these pilotage commissioners, which I hope the hon. Secretary of State will mention to his colleague the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that it is desirable that the government should make it the duty of some officer to inspect the books of these various boards of pilot commissioners. I have no doubt but that as to Halifax everything is as it should be; still, as a matter of business, it would be a wise precaution to have all those accounts audited every year.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

The Order of the Day being called :

Consideration of the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (B) An Act further to amend the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Bill when it went down from this House read as follows, in subsection 2 : 'The failure of a person charged, or of the wife or husband of such person, to testify, shall not be made the subject of comment by the judge, or by counsel for the prosecution in addressing the jury.' The attention of Justice Osler, having been called to the Bill he thought that clause should be given full effect and not allow comments to be made at any stage of the trial, and therefore the words 'In addressing the jury' should be omitted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why are those words put in—'Subject to the provisions of subsection 1 of this Act' ? It seems to me the object of the Act is that no comment should be made by the judge or by counsel as to the refraining of the husband or wife from giving evidence. A limitation which is very ambiguous seems to be attached to that, namely 'Subject to the provisions of subsection 1.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a mistake in that. It belongs to the next sentence, in subsection 3. Subsection 3 reads :

Subject to the provisions of subsection 1 of this Act, the wife or husband of a person charged with an offence against any of the sections of the Criminal Code, 1892, mentioned in schedule 'C' to this Act——

There are four words struck out there, and the words inserted in their place :

—shall be a competent and also a compellable witness either for the prosecution or defence.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The words 'for the' should be striken out. Either the Commons amendment is entirely wrong or the journals are incorrect, because as it reads it makes no sense.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the amendment makes good sense. You strike out 'either' and strike out 'or defence.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The amendment from the Commons struck out the words, 'for the prosecution or defence' and left the other words in.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It leaves in the word 'prosecution'—'For the prosecution, without the consent of the person charged'. The first subsection provides that every person charged, and the wife or husband, shall be a competent witness for the defence, and this provides that he or she shall be a competent witness for the prosecution, subject to the provisions of the first subsection.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Turn to page 246 and you will observe that the amendment is to leave out 'either', at the beginning of line 21. The word either is to be left out, and also the words from 'prosecution' to 'without', leaving in the words 'for the'.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not strike out the word 'prosecution'. I wish to direct the attention of the minister to another slight error in the amendment which has been sent up from the Commons. Under that amendment subsection 3 will begin as follows :

Subject to the provisions of subsection 1 of this Act.

We have not a subsection of an Act; we may have a subsection of a section. It is important because there is no subsection 1 of an Act. The first section is only the short title, and the object is to make these provisions subject to the provisions of the first subsection. We strike out section 4 of the Canada Evidence Act and substitute the whole section for it. It should read 'subject to the provisions of subsection 1.'

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A layman could scarcely understand this discussion. I hold in my hand the amendment sent down from the Commons to the Senate, and if you read it you will find the first amendment is page 1 line 16, leave out all after 'prosecution' and insert 'subject to the provisions of subsection 1 of this Act. That is the amendment which it is proposed to substitute for the words 'in addressing the jury'. Then, when you come to the second paragraph, it provides for leaving out in the 16th line the words, 'after prosecution in addressing the jury', and you add these words 'subject to the provisions of subsection 1 of this Act'. Then when you go down to the next paragraph of No. 3 it provides for leaving out 'either' in the first line. On page 1, line 21 leave out the word 'either' then on page 1 line 21 leave out from 'prosecution' to 'without', and substitute the words, 'shall be a competent and also a compellable witness'. If I remember rightly the effect of the discussion which took place in the Senate when the original Bill was passed, it was that the wife or husband should not be compellable witnesses. That was the general opinion held by senators at that time, but the Commons make the wife, or the husband as the case may be, not only a competent but also a compellable witness. As I understood the Secretary of State the manner in which he interpreted the amendments was not at all in accord with the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The error evidently is in preparing it in the House of Commons, because I presume the same person who prepared these amendments has prepared those which I have in my hand. I may say that I applied to the officer in the Department of Justice who takes charge of the criminal branch of that department, Mr. Power, a very competent official. The changes as I read them were those which he prepared; I hold his memo. in my hand and it is clearly an error in transcribing the amendments in the House of Commons. It is as I gave it to the House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I may say that I could not make head or tail of these amendments as they appear in our journals, but as explained by the hon. Secretary of State they are perfectly intelligible and will be all right except as regard the point made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. We should say subsection 1 of some particular section, and not of the Act, otherwise we shall not know where to locate it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General is without, I move that the order be discharged and that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned during pleasure.

In His Majesty's name, the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General doth assent to these Bills.

After some time the House resumed.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

COMMITTEE'S REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS moved concurrence in the first report of the joint committee of both Houses on the printing of parliament.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understand from a perusal of the report that the committee has not recommended the publication of the evidence taken upon the tariff commission. May I ask my hon. friend if that was discussed in committee ?

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—My hon. friend refers to item 40, does he—page 237, second paragraph ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I might say that the committee gave it their best consideration, and they said : 'no' to that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The reason I direct the attention of the House to the matter is this ; of course I can very well understand the desirability of keeping this report private until the government take some action upon the question of the tariff. But in the 'North American Review,' the April issue, I find an article written by one Edward Porritt, who apparently accompanied the commission and who undertakes to give the American reading public, not only the information obtained by the commission, but the intention of the government with respect to the tariff. Now it seems to me that if the government has communicated to a magazine writer on this important matter, what their intentions are respecting the revision of the tariff, it certainly would not be unreasonable——

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think I can relieve my hon. friend's mind when I say that there is not a particle of foundation for the statement.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I had a suspicion that probably those who undertook to enlighten the American public as to what the revision of the Canadian tariff would be were scarcely authorized in making the statements which they have done. But there is a semblance of authority in the statements which the writer has made in this magazine article and of truth in his assertions, inasmuch as he accompanied the commission, and it seems to me an extraordinary proceeding that the commission should permit a magazine writer for an American review to be one of its staff in obtaining this information for the public and that that writer should undertake to inform the public as to the intention of the government on this subject. My right hon. friend, will know from reading the article in question, whether the predictions of this gentleman are warranted or not. I find also in this magazine article that parliament is in fact to be eliminated from any decision that the commission arrive at and that the revision of the tariff will be confined entirely to the gentlemen constituting this commission. Mr. Porritt says :

It will be then presented to the House by Mr. Fielding and as the Liberal government has an overwhelming majority in the House the Bill will become law practically in the shape determined by Messrs. Fielding, Brodeur and Paterson.

My hon. friend seems to be eliminated from this trinity which is to decide upon what the tariff will be, and at page 571 I find the following:

Remarks like those I have quoted dropped from time to time from the commissioners at these tariff hearings make it clear that in the new tariff the British preference is to be so rearranged as to make it obviously to the advantage of two distinct sets of Canadian business and industrial interests to buy in Great Britain rather than in the United States or Germany. Importers handling manufacturing goods which are not made in Canada and which are not likely to be made there for some time to come, are to be encouraged by low duties—duties which are likely to be on a basis of a tariff for revenue only—to obtain them in Great Britain; and the Canadian manufacturers engaged in secondary industries are to be similarly encouraged to import their raw material, which is often a finished product of other manufacturers, from England or Scotland rather than, as now, from the United States.

It would seem there that the gentleman speaks with a certain amount of authority as to the reduction of the tariff. Then again he says:

Changes in the free list as well as in the dutiable schedules will be necessary to these ends, and although for a little while these changes will dislocate many Canadian industries—

I would point out to my hon. friends present that for the time being Canadian industries will be dislocated. The article proceeds:

And throw certain lines of industry out of their accustomed channels, I feel that I am hazarding very little when I predict that these changes on the free list and in the schedule will be made in the tariff of 1906.

And again this gentleman undertakes to say what the revision of the tariff will be upon these branches. He proceeds:

There will be some agreeable surprises for Great Britain, in the preferential clauses of the new tariff and consequently a new and keen interest will be awakened in Great Britain in the extended trade opportunities which are soon to be offered in Canada. These clauses may also have some surprises for American ports and American railways—surprises which will be disturbing to some of these American interests.

Again, the gentleman speaks with seeming authority when he says:

While there are to be no Dingley rates and no retaliation against the United States, and while the Canadian Manufacturers Association as a whole is to gain little by the revision, there are some aggressive American industrial interests which are likely to find themselves hurt by the new tariff.

And again he says:

Three other features of the 1905-06 tariff hearings are of much significance for Canada, and not without present interest for the United States. The protective policy of Canada is to be permanent.

I congratulate my hon. friends on the other side on the fact that we are to have a permanency of tariff, to say the least of it. The article proceeds:

The commissioners made this clear at Chatham, Ont., when a farmers' deputation recalled the Liberal pledges of a 'tariff for revenue only'—the pledges of the years when the Liberals were in opposition—and pressed for the reason why these pledges had not been implemented when the Liberals were returned to power at Ottawa in 1896.

And finally let me direct the attention of the House to an utterance by this gentleman which seems to bear a semblance of authority. He says:

In thus attacking the preference, the Canadian manufacturers, consciously or unconsciously struck heavily and disastrously at Mr Chamberlain's idea of inter-imperial trade; and no one who travelled with the commission and day after day sat out its sessions, as was my great privilege, nor any one who will undertake the tremendous task of reading through the transcript of the notes of the commission, can come to any other conclusion than that the tariff hearings have demonstrated that Mr. Chamberlain's scheme is an impossibility.

It is fortunate for the government at Ottawa that this has been demonstrated and still more fortunate for Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues that the British electorate has so overwhelmingly repudiated Mr. Chamberlain's fiscal ideas.

Now the reason I direct attention to this fact is that in the report which my hon. friend has moved the adoption of, the committee in its wisdom has considered it advisable not to have the evidence taken by the commission printed. I am not now passing a criticism on the judgment of the committee, because I can very well appreciate the magnitude of the task of printing such a voluminous report; but if this article be true, if this Mr. Porritt had access to this information which we are precluded apparently, from possessing, it is a question for the consideration of parliament? Whether parliament, itself should not be placed in as good a position as this Mr. Porritt who, apparently, accompanied the commission and was hand in glove with the three commissioners and who undertakes to reflect to the United States reading public the opinions which they hold as to what the revision of the Canadian tariff will be. I direct the attention of the House to this fact, because I scarcely give credence to the inference to be drawn from this article, that this Mr. Edward Porritt has been made the depository of what should be regarded as a state secret, what the revision of the tariff will be, and I desire further to point out the undesirability of a commission like the tariff commission having on its staff a gentleman taking the liberty of expressing publicly his views which at this stage are inimical to Canadian interests.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have great pleasure in relieving the hon. gentleman's mind. So far as I know—and I ought to know, having been a member of the commission, although I was unable to attend many of its meetings—the gentleman to whom he alludes is in no sense, shape or way, a member of the tariff commission staff. He may have attended, as a dozen or score of other newspaper reporters did, the meetings of the commission.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Did the other newspaper reporters travel with the commission? He says he travelled with the commission.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They did, but they travelled at their own expense. They certainly were not on the staff of the commission, as far as I am advised. As regards the article—which I have not seen—any inferences that may have been drawn by that gentleman or any others are wholly unauthorized, drawn by themselves, evolved out of their own inner consciousness, and I shall be extremely surprised, knowing my friends on the commission, if anything was said by them to this person in the slightest degree authorizing him to make any such statements as he has made. The commissioners understood one thing at any rate, how to keep their own counsel. They listened to all the evidence submitted to them, but they were very cautious indeed, whenever I was in attendance, about giving any light as to what conclusions they had come to, and I can assure my hon. friends that neither Mr. Porritt nor any other man outside of the commission I believe—of course outside some members of council with whom we are entitled to confer—has the slightest or smallest ground for making any assertion, good, bad or indifferent, as to what conclusions the commission have arrived at.

The motion was agreed to.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS OF MONTREAL BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (124) An Act respecting the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal. He said: This proposes to supersede the present commission by three officers who will be appointed by the government and who will be paid officials. We will discuss the matter, I suppose more conveniently, when we get into Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

DELAY IN PRINTING DIVORCE EVIDENCE.

The Orders of the Day being called:

Consideration of the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce to whom was referred the petition of Charles William Holmes, together with the evidence.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

Consideration of the ninth report of the Standing Committe on Divorce to whom was referred the petition of Minnie Florence Irvine, together with the evidence.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no desire to be censorious, but I would point out to the hon. Secretary of State that there has been most unreasonable delay in the printing of this evidence. Both reports were brought down by the committee on May 2, and, with the reports, the evidence in duplicate was brought down and one copy sent to the Printing Bureau—at least I assume it was sent when typewritten, and we are now on the 11th May without the printed report. That is a most unreasonable time to occupy in the printing of them. I direct my hon. friend's attention to it in the hope that he may make some inquiry as to the cause of the delay.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Printing Bureau has no soul, and it has to take all the blame for any omission to print. I shall be very glad to give my hon. friend an explanation.

The orders were allowed to stand until Tuesday next.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (J) An Act respecting the St. Mary's River Bridge Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (K) An Act respecting the Pacific and Atlantic Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (96) An Act respecting the Mexican Consolidated Electric Company, Limited, and to change its name to 'Mexico Tramways Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (95) An Act respecting the Mexican Light and Power Company, Limited.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (94) An Act respecting the Rio de Janeiro Tramway, Light and Power Company, Limited.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (107) An Act respecting the Erie Ontario Power Company.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (L) An Act respecting the James Bay Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

VANCOUVER, WESTMINSTER AND YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When Bill (41) An Act respecting the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway Company, was up yesterday, I stated that the government proposed that there should be an amendment to it. I had the amendment, I thought, on my table, but have mislaid it for the moment. I presume the House will have no objection to its going in to be printed. It reads in this way, that any railway company desiring to pass through the Yellow Head Pass should have the right of way over this road, and, if the parties cannot agree, then it shall be on such terms and conditions as the Railway Commission may decide on. I presume the House will have no objection to my handing it in so that it may be printed, for Tuesday next.

SUSPENSION OF RULES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—With leave of the House, I desire to move that the rules be suspended with reference to Senate Bills J, K and L, as to posting, so that they may go before the Railway Committee at its next meeting. These are three railway Bills.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—Bill (L) is not printed yet.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

A POINT OF ORDER.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Before the Orders of the Day are called as there is not likely to be much business before the House this evening, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to what I consider was an irregularity in the proceedings of the House on Friday last in connection with the giving of the Royal Assent to certain Bills by the Deputy Governor—an irregularity which, I am happy, however, to say is not of such a serious character as to affect the validity of these Bills. The irregularity I allude to refers to the position occupied by Mr. Justice Sedgewick on the vice-regal throne in this House in giving the Royal Assent to Bills on last Friday. It is an irregularity and an informality which I think should not have occurred, after the discussion that has already taken place on the subject, and which I trust will not again occur in the future, after the light that this discussion will throw on it.

This matter, the House is aware, was once before under the notice of the Senate and it received some notoriety in the public press. I expressed then my opinion upon it, but I did not think it necessary to trouble the House on that occasion with any citation of the authorities on which I based my remarks. I shall do so now, and I shall leave it to the House afterwards to say whether or not the position I have taken upon this question, is or is not the correct one.

In the first place, however, I think I may complain that sufficient deference is not paid to both Houses of parliament in the time of notice of so important a function as the giving of the Royal Assent to the laws of the land. I think there is no reason why on ordinary occasions such as the present, twenty-four hours' notice should not be given to both Houses of parliament. The notice read to this House on last Friday from the Governor General's office is to the following effect :—

Office of the Governor General's Secretary,
Ottawa, May 10, 1906.

Sir,—I have the honour, by command of His Excellency the Governor General, to inform you that the Honourable Mr. Justice Sedgewick, acting in his capacity as deputy of the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber on Friday the 11th instant at 5 o'clock p.m., for the purpose of assenting in His Majesty's name to such Bills as have passed the Senate and House of Commons during the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
C. J. JONES,
For the Governor General's Secretary.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate.

Now, I want to say here, that in referring to the gentleman who was the Deputy Governor he is styled the Honourable Mr. Justice Sedgewick. This I contend is a misdescription. There is no warant or authority at the present day in Canada for giving the prefix honourable to any man as a right or consequence of his being a judge. There are several judges on the bench who are privy councillors and who have of right the title of honourable on that account, but I repeat there is no warrant or authority for the application of the title of honourable to any judge other than these, even the highest in the Dominion.

It is quite true before confederation a number of titles were enjoyed by right or courtesy by high office holders in the old provinces. But all these privileges in that respect were swept away at confederation, when a new order of things was inaugurated, and a new departure taken, in this as well as other respects.

In the year 1868, the year after the union of the provinces was consummated, the questions of rank or precedence, as well as the question of titles, were duly considered by the imperial authorities, as these subjects were matters connected with the royal prerogative and were decided according to the pleasure of the sovereign, of course, upon ministerial advice. In that year two despatches were sent to the Governor General of Canada by the Duke of Buckingham, then Colonial Secretary, conveying the pleasure of the Crown as the source or fountain of honour as to questions of precedence or titles in the new Dominion of Canada. These despatches, with the amendments, which have subsequently been made to both are now the only authority and guide on all questions of precedence or titles in this country. We have no other; everything before that was wiped out. A new order of things arose, and it had to be provided for as I have stated. In that table of titles with its amendments no title is given to any judge as such—whether through design or inadvertence, it is unnecesary for me to say. I have always thought, however, that it was an omission which should not have occurred, and that provision should have been made in the table of titles for giving the prefix of honourable to the judges of all the superior courts of record in the Dominion.

On several occasions I have brought the subject before several Ministers of Justice, and they have all agreed with me that the omission whether intentional or otherwise should be rectified, but none of them have so far taken practical steps to bring the subject under the notice of the imperial authorities. I think they have failed in their duty in this regard, but while the table of titles remains as it is, the title of honourable cannot properly be given to these high judicial functionaries, and the mistake of employing it should not be committed in a formal document coming from the Governor General's office to Parliament as in the case in the letter I have just quoted.

With regard to the main point I wish to bring before the Senate that is, the position or seat which a Deputy Governor should occupy when he comes upon the floor of this House as the representative of the Governor General to give the Royal Assent to Bills. It appears to me the Deputy Governor on such occasions occupies an analogous position to that occupied by the lords commissioners under the Great Seal authorized by the King to discharge the same duties in the House of Lords. He occupies, I say, a similar position, and he discharges a similar duty. The lords commissioners appointed to give the Royal Assent to Bills in the imperial parliament are generally the Lord Chancellor and two or three other high dignitaries of the House of Lords. The Lord Chancellor is always one of them. They perform in England the same functions which the Deputy Governor is expected and intended to perform here, but we have no provision in our rules for the way in which the latter shall discharge his duties, or the seat or position he shall occupy in doing so, but we have a rule, rule 124 of this House, which reads as follows:

> In all unprovided cases the rules, usages, and forms of proceedings of the House of Lords are to be followed.

Now, I am going to show what the usages and proceedings in the House of Lords on such occasions are, and of course such usage must decide the question as to the formalities which should prevail in this House. I shall read from the 10th edition of May, at page 483, which says :

> The form in which the Royal Assent is signified by commission is as follows : Three or more of the Lords Commissioners seated on a form between the Throne and the woolsack in the House of Lords demand the usher of the black rod to signify to the Commons that their attendance is desired in the House of Peers to hear the commission read, upon which the Commons with the Speaker immediately come to the bar.

The woolsack in the House of Lords is situated with regard to the throne pretty much as is the clerk's table in this House, and the Lord Chancellor when presiding over the proceedings of the House occupies that seat. There is no obstruction between the woolsack and the throne, but when commissioners are appointed to assent to Bills a temporary form or seat is erected in front of the throne a short distance from the woolsack, and these high dignitaries occupy that form while giving the royal assent to Bills. They do not of course, occupy any seat upon the throne.

When I was Speaker, I had my attention directed to this matter, and I saw clearly that a practice had crept in that was irregular ; that is the practice of allowing the deputy governor to take the seat of the Governor General, on the throne. I satisfied myself that this practice was not justified by the rule of the House; that it was a violation, in fact of the rules of the House, under the authorities I have just now quoted, and looking for a practical and satisfactory way to meet the emergency I came to the conclusion that the Speaker's chair directly in front of the throne occupying pretty much the same position as the form on which the Lords Commissioners sit in the House of Lords, would be a compromise that the deputy governor would gladly accept. Having come to that conclusion, I supmitted my decision to Sir Alexander Campbell, then leader of the Senate, who was, as we all know, a very high authority upon parliamentary questions, and he completely approved of it. Chief Justice Ritchie was then at the head of the Supreme Court of this country, and he generally came down to give the royal assent to Bills, and discharge the other functions of a deputy governor. He was, I need not tell honourable gentlemen, an ornament to the bench ; one of the greatest judges we have had on the Supreme Court bench since its creation, and he was also a man of strong common sense. He practically coincided with the decision arrived at by the leader of the House, and myself as Speaker on this subject. He came here and took the Speaker's chair and discharged his duties as deputy governor and never made any objection or fuss about it, and we never heard a word of complaint from him. While I was Speaker, I did not therefore permit the deputy governor to occupy a seat on the throne, and I did not permit the Speaker's chair to be removed.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—That is right.

Hon. Mr. MILLER.—I thought it was the most suitable place the deputy governor could occupy, and one of which he could not complain, because the deputy governor has no official rank in the table of precedence. His only rank has been his judicial rank which was that generally of the chief justice, and the official rank of the chief justice of this country is below that of the Speaker of this House. The Speaker of this House takes precedence over every judge or chief judge of this Dominion. The head of this House is the head of the high court of parliament, which is above all other courts, and that is the reason why his official rank is fixed by the table of precedence above that of the chief justice of Canada.

I considered and now consider, it would not be inconsistent with the dignity of any chief justice while giving assent to Bills or acting otherwise as deputy governor, to act as Chief Justice Ritchie always did. Having shown the Senate what the practice of the House of Lords is, and having also shown that under rule 124 of this House of the Standing Orders of the Senate, we are obliged to conform to that practice where the case is unprovided for by our own rules, I must repeat that it is a breach of the rules of this House, to allow the deputy governor to occupy the throne while discharging any official duty.

There is one way in which, if it is desired —I have no strong opinion on the matter— that the deputy governor should occupy the throne when he comes here to give assent to Bills, if it is a wish of the Governor General, because it is a matter involving more the royal prerogative than the privileges of either branch of Parliament. There is one way, I say, in which the difficulty can be overcome. I have no doubt if His Excellency expressed his desire that his deputy should on all occasions occupy a seat upon the throne, which, however, I do not consider very probable, this House would change the rules to meet His Excellency's wishes, but until the rules are changed I do not think a similar infraction should be permitted such as that which took place on Friday last. Having said this much, without desiring to say anything which may be considered unpleasant to any one connected with the regulation of the business of this House, I hope the Leader of the House and the Speaker of the House, if they agree with the views I have placed before it, and are not prepared to differ from or to have the rules altered, should see that no irregularity or informality such as occurred on Friday last will again be permitted to take place in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the various ceremonies incidental to the functions under our constitution I think we should invest the executive official with all the pomp and ceremony that can possibly belong to the office. My hon. friend commenced his observations by referring to the misappropriation of the word 'honourable' as applied to judges of our Superior Court. I beg to differ from my hon. friend in that respect. For over sixty or seventy years—my memory goes back sixty years—the judges of the Superior Court, at all events in Ontario, have always been designated 'honourable' and I have never heard the appellation challenged. They have been in the presence of royalty, and royalty has not taken exception to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Does not the hon. gentleman think that every right, usage or courtesy of that kind was wiped out by the new order of things? At any rate no such right, usage or courtesy existing before confederation could apply to new appointments after confederation. I think any such right or usage was wiped out by the publication of the new order of things.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not. I think our own history is worth something, and unless it was wiped out, as my hon. friend puts it, I see no reason why we should have changed it. We did not change it at the time, and certainly when the Duke of Buckingham's instructions were received in Canada there was a good deal of—I will not say opposition to them, but hesitation about adopting them in the form in which they were first sent out, and, if my memory serves me, Sir John Macdonald called attention to some changes which had necessarily to be made, because the views in England and ours in this democratic country do not harmonize on those subjects. I should be sorry to see the term 'honourable' withdrawn from our judges. It adds very much to the status of the office, and it is our duty to preserve in the opinion of the people all the essentials that command respect and lead to regard for the high position which judges occupy. No man is worthy of being on the higher bench who is not entitled to the word 'honourable' and I should be sorry to see it withdrawn. Coming to the other point, I was not aware that Justice Sedgewick took his seat on the Throne, and I do not know how he happened to do so; but he is a man of good sense and I am sure if he had had the Speaker's chair he would not have taken the Throne. I take very little stock in the whole subject. My memory is that when Justice Taschereau on one occasion was called upon to perform a similar duty he insisted on occupying the Throne, and that he would not attend unless he did occupy the Throne. I presume arrangements had been made to get the Bills assented to, and the public were more interested in having the Bills sanctioned on that particular day than in challenging the judge's view, and so he was allowed to have his way. Now it is a compliment to His Excellency for the Deputy Governor to attend; he is not paid for it, and I thought Justice Sedgewick showed good taste in coming in the garb he did. I have seen judges come here in the ordinary frock coat, not dressed in any ceremonial style, to give assent to the Bills. Justice Sedgewick came here as a gentleman of the old time, with frills on his breast and on his wrists, with knee breeches and stockings—I thought he was paying a high compliment to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is one reason why I think it is unfair not to give us due notice of the coming of the Deputy Governor. We are here in our working clothes, and when he comes in the gorgeous attire he wore on Friday last it is only right that we should put on some of our good clothes to meet him But how can we do so without notice that he is coming? It is taking an unfair advantage.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not agree with my hon. friend. I see that Mr. Hardie and all the representatives of the labour element in England the other day attended in the House of Commons, even in the presence of royalty, with their caps and breeches just as they dress when they go to look after a contract, and they declined to conform to the fashion of the hour. It is as I said, a compliment for the judge to come here. On a former occasion I think he had to adjourn the Supreme Court because there would not have been a quorum if he left the bench, and if this question arose in the way my hon. friend puts it, I doubt whether you would get a judge to act as deputy here if his right to occupy the Throne as representative of the Governor General is challenged. I fancy the judge would have some respect for himself and would say: 'If I, as Deputy to the Governor General, am not to occupy the Throne, I decline to go.' It is a compliment on the part of the judge to come. Now as to the question of notice: my memory in the past has been that we never had a full day's notice. When an accumulation of Bills had arisen, there was always somebody who wanted a Bill, it may be a measure of public policy or a private Bill that had to be assented to, and the announcement was made on the very morning of the day the Bills were assented to. Up to three o'clock Justice Sedgewick did not know he was to be called here. I do not know how he managed to get home, in the short interval he had, and dress as he appeared here, but really that is the fact. Justice Sedgewick was only advised in the afternoon of the day he came here.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That was not his fault. It was the fault of the government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think it was the government's fault. However, the government's shoulders are broad. You can say what you like against them and it does not hurt them at all. Such remarks are only entertaining to the House. His Excellency thought he would like Justice Sedgewick to attend, and he communicated with me through one of his officials in the morning. It was then suggested that Justice Sedgewick would be available if he were written to in time, and he was written to about two o'clock in the afternoon of the same day. I know he had not been made aware of it, up to one o'clock, and the usual practice was adopted of His Excellency, through one of his officials, sending notice to the two Speakers. I am quite sure that Justice Sedgewick is too much of a man, has too much respect for his own position, to challenge the right to take either the Throne or the chair.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No one is attacking Justice Sedgewick.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—On one occasion some observations were made on this subject about Justice Taschereau, and he declined to take the chair. There was a very awkward contretemps in consequence of that. His Excellency had to attend the following day as the result of it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Without in any way dissenting from the constitutional practice laid down by the hon. gentleman from Richmond, and which is possibly warranted by the best authorities we have upon the subject, I may say, in justice to Mr. Justice Sedgewick, that since May 16, of last year, when the then Chief Justice in his capacity as Deputy Governor General attended in this Chamber to give assent to Bills, a new practice has grown up to which Mr. Justice Sedgewick, I venture to say, was bound to conform. The Deputy Governor on the occasion of last week had no other alternative than to take the Throne, his honour the Speaker having removed his chair from the dais to the floor of the Senate. I therefore think, in justice to the Deputy Governor, that this Chamber should be made aware of that fact so that it could not be thought for one moment that he was assuming a position which otherwise he might not be warranted in taking. I remember that on May 16 last year the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court in coming here to assent to Bills, according to the debate which then took place, apparently took the position that unless the Speaker's chair was removed to the floor of the House he would refuse to come into the Chamber to assent to Bills. My hon friend from Richmond, on May 17, 1905, directed the attention of the Senate to what he then contended was the unwarrantable position taken by the then Deputy Governor General. Since that time my memory recalls the fact that on two occasions his honour the Speaker did remove his chair from the dais to the floor of the House and, consequently, the Deputy Governor had no other alternative than to occupy the Throne. Consequently I think we are warranted in saying that Mr. Justice Sedgewick must be acquitted from the charge of presuming to occupy the Throne as such. It was the only chair which he could have occupied, and under the circumstances I suppose he had to use it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—He will not do it again I suppose ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Since the hon. senator from Richmond has directed the attention of the Chamber to the etiquette which should prevail on such occasions, I have no doubt, the Deputy Governor who may come here in future to assent to Bills will conform to that rigid practice and etiquette which has not only been enlarged on to-night, but on previous occasions, and I fancy any future Deputy Governor will scarcely care to take the risk of running the gauntlet of the censure and criticism which have found expression with reference to seating himself on the Throne.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The point is this, that while the dignitaries in England who give the Royal Assent to Bills are appointed pro tem or ad hoc, our Deputy Governor here performs as it were an official function. He is gazetted as Deputy to the Governor, and, as such, he participates to a certain extent in the privileges of royalty, and, therefore, the position of the dignitaries in England who assent to Bills is not exactly identical with the position of the chief justice here who assents to our Bills, after having been gazetted officially as Deputy of the Governor General. In such capacity I would submit that he has a right to occupy the seat of the high functionary he comes here to represent officially.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman from Richmond has stated that we had no rules bearing on this question of the place where the Deputy Governor must sit, and he cited what purported to be a rule of the House of Lords. I have just read 'May', and I beg to differ, with all due deference, from the hon. gentleman as to there being a rule in the House of Lords. There is merely a statement as to the form of procedure in the assenting to Bills, which I take not to be a rule of the House of Lords, but to be a statement as to what does take place when Bills are assented to. As to the facts connected with the ceremony of assenting to the Bills on last Friday, I may state that Mr. Justice Sedgewick, representing His Excellency the Governor General, before entering this Chamber last session expressed his opinion to the gentleman Usher of the Black Rod that Mr. Justice Taschereau was right in his contention that he should sit in the Governor's chair. This statement having been communicated to me, I complied with the implied wish it seemed to convey, and had my chair removed. I may add that, in my opinion neither the Deputy Governor nor His Excellency the Governor General, come to the Senate to assent to Bills, but convoke parliament into the Senate Chamber, and I will agree with the hon. gentleman from Richmond that it is a matter between His Excellency the Governor General and his deputy as to what seat they should respectively occupy when calling together both branches of parliament in this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think that not only the rules of the House of Lords should be taken into consideration in this House, but also the usages of that body. Our rules require that in unprovided cases the rules, forms of proceedings and usages of the House of Lords shall govern. If the hon. Speaker did not find in 'May' any rule, he found what the usage is, and regarding the question from that point of view I think the contention of my hon. friend from Richmond is the right one. I do not know whether the contention of my hon. friend from Acadia (Hon. Mr. Poirier) is right. He says that the Deputy Governor has been gazetted. I never heard that the nomination of Mr. Justice Sedgewick as Deputy Governor had been gazetted.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It was gazetted in the 'Gazette' of Saturday.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He acted as Deputy Governor on Friday. The hon. Secretary of State might be in a better position than any one else to tell us what the facts are as to this point. The deputy governor came here last year and he was not gazetted at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Sometimes a special 'Gazette' issues on the occasion. I really do not know whether one was issued on that occasion or not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How could we be expected to know, if the hon. Secretary of State does not know?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think it is a matter of very much consequence.

VACANCY ON THE SUPREME COURT BENCH.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the hon. Secretary of State if any decision has been come to with regard to the nomination of a judge of the Supreme Court to deal with the cases from the province of Quebec?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have heard nothing. The Minister of Justice is fully apprised of all the hon. gentleman has said on the subject. It rests with him entirely.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. minister told us on Friday last that the Minister of Justice was to have an interview with the members of the Quebec bar.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—So I understood.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Did that interview take place?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I really do not know. I do not know what occurred.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the government should know one thing—that the cases from the province of Quebec were set down for May 14—that is to-day, for hearing. Twice already these cases have been postponed to suit the convenience of the government, and I think the public interest requires that the government should take a stand on this question and do justice to the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick informed me that he was to see the leading members of the bar who were interested in these cases and discuss the matter with them. I did not hear the result of it.

COST OF INSPECTION OF INSURANCE COMPANIES.

DELAYED RETURN.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask what progress is being made with reference to a return which I asked for on May 8 last, as to the cost of inspection of insurance companies, &c. ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I would ask the hon. gentleman to drop me a note so that I may inquire about it. I do not keep track of these returns.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend should have some systematic way of directing the attention of the different departments to the returns which are asked for.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The orders for returns go first to the Secretary of State office. Immediately after, without the delay of one day, they go to the particular department interested; and then from time to time an officer of the Secretary of State office is instructed, where any delay arises, to call attention to the matter. That is done periodically ; we have no way of doing any more than that. They are all entered in a book, and where it is evident that delay is taking place the official is instructed to communicate with the department in question and ask how soon the return may be expected. If the hon. gentleman will drop me a note, I shall be able to give instructions to call for an explanation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The return which I have asked for relates to a matter of great public interest, and it seems to me that the public should be placed in possession of the information while the insurance commission is sitting. My hon. friend, no doubt, has had his attention directed to the position taken by the Superintendent of Life Insurance as well as the different members of his staff who have been examined before the Insurance Commission, that the staff was inadequate to a proper inspection, and a proper audit of the books of the different companies, and so on. Now, under the Insurance Act, provision is there made for a contribution by the companies to the maintenance of the inspection staff; and it would seem to me to be very inconsistent or very contradictory to say that the staff is inadequate, by reason of the government not being in a position to employ a sufficient number of clerks to make a proper inspection, inasmuch as the maintenance of the staff is practically supported by the insurance companies. Hence it seems to me that, while the commission is sitting, it would be of public interest and would contribute to a proper ventilation of the subject that this information should be forthcoming at once.

THE LEPROSY BILL.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Order of the Day being called :

Committee of the Whole House on (Bill 115) an Act respecting Leprosy.—Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon Mr. SCOTT moved that the House do now go into Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I notice that there are two sets of questions on the order paper, one by the hon. member from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Sullivan), and the other by the hon. member from Alexandria (Hon. Mr. McMillan), in reference to this Bill, and I think it would be well that these questions should be answered.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If any hon. gentleman desires information I shall be glad to give it to him. I have the answers to these questions already provided, and they may be asked when we are in committee.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—It is a matter of astonishment to me that a Bill of so much consequence should be treated with so much indifference by the Senate and by the House of Commons also. I venture to say that not in the history of this country has a Bill been brought forward which upsets to such an extent the Habeas Corpus Act, one which is so contrary to humanity and so arbitrary and despotic in its provisions. It is, in my opinion, entirely uncalled for in this regard. Why such Draconian rules and regulations as are promulgated under this Act should be permitted, I am at a loss to understand. Since the Bill has been brought to this House I have to thank the hon. Secretary of State for allowing it to be postponed, for a few days. That delay has only served to confirm me in my opinion of the very unnecessary enactments which are laid down in this Bill. As it pertains particularly to matters in which the medical profession are interested, I think one more effort ought to be made, and I would desire that all the physicians who have a seat in the Senate should meet and give joint expression to their view, because this Bill is very loosely constructed. Therefore, if the hon. Secretary of State would allow the matter to stand until say Wednesday next, it would be of great benefit and would facilitate matters very much.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am always glad to meet any reasonable request made by my hon. friend. All I can say is that after the Bill has gone through committee, up to the last clause of it, we can afterwards go back into committee at any future day, say a week or ten days hence, and the whole subject can be gone into again ; but for the present I think we should try to make some progress. Possibly after the discussion which will arise on the various clauses, he will withdraw the charge which he has made that the Bill is in violation of the Habeas Corpus Act and interferes with the liberty of the subject. I do not agree with him on this point. As regards leprosy, the medical men of Canada have had little or no experience. Their knowledge on the subject is derived purely from the books they have read, because, happily, the disease itself has not existed in Canada to any appreciable extent. We have had one institution here, the number confined in which has been as a rule not exceeding fifteen. The management of that institution is regarded by those experts who have given attention to this subject as being conducted on the best lines. In the state of Louisiana they were establishing a lazaretto recently. Attention was called to the subject in the state legislature, and it was asked how that lazaretto ranked as compared with other lazarettos throughout the world. The answer given by those who had charge of that institution was that it was practically in advance of all the other lazarettos of the world. Attention was then called to a lazaretto existing in Canada; but the authorities in Louisiana stated that they did not profess to bring their institution up to the standard of the one in New Brunswick, because the latter was far in advance of any other institution of its kind in the world.

That was a very strong compliment coming from the United States. The reports from time to time show that several have been cured there, and it is the only lazaretto in the world where cures have been effected. As a rule no attempt has been made to cure them in any lazaretto. The object of this Bill is, as my hon. friends will see when I explain it, of the highest importance. At present there is no authority whatever for carrying on the lazaretto at Tracadie. It was taken over by the federal government at the time of confederation, but no legislation was adopted vesting the control and direction of it in the government or parliament of Canada. The expense has been paid from year to year regularly, and the administration has been under the control of the Department of Agriculture, but there has been no authority whatever for carrying it out. Now, this Bill proposes to vest in the Minister of Agriculture the jurisdiction over that lazaretto and also authority to construct another lazaretto. At the present time there are, I believe, six or seven unfortunate lepers confined on an island known as Darcy island on the Pacific coast of British Columbia. The management there is of the most primitive kind. The unfortunate creatures are sent to the island. No attempt is made to improve or benefit them. No one is allowed to go near them, nor are they allowed to leave the island, which is, of course, very proper. But no attempt at care or management exists. If a man is supposed to be afflicted with the disease he is simply shipped off there and no communication is had with him.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They nurse each other as long as they can.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—How many are there ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I do not know. There is no doctor and no nurse.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I won't classify the treatment, because my language might perhaps be too strong, but it is for the purpose of improving and ameliorating the condition of these unfortunate people that this Bill is introduced. If the lazaretto is established and its management is up to the level of the one at Tracadie, then I think parliament is to be congratulated upon having performed a most benevolent act by this legislation. The Bill does not permit any one to be sent to a lazaretto unless the disease has really developed, and then, if the unfortunate subject has a home where he can be isolated, it is in the power of the minister to say that he may be left in his own home. So that hon. gentlemen will see that it is not carried out on the extreme principle that a lazaretto is a place where unfortunate men, when they are once pronounced lepers, are sent to and no attempt is made to relieve them.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I think the whole proceedings are irregular. How can any person take advantage of these answers if we have not an opportunity to ask the questions?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will answer them in committee.

The SPEAKER—Does the hon. gentleman object to the motion?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I certainly think the course adopted is not regular. I have put a notice on the order paper and I wanted an answer. I put it down for Wednesday with the expectation that this Bill would not come up until I would get an answer to those questions. Is the Secretary of State willing to give an answer to those questions at present? They may answer the purpose, but I am very doubtful.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall answer my hon. friend's questions now. The first question is:

How many lazarettos are established in Canada at present?' The answer is, one under the Dominion government. There is no legislative authority for it. The management of that institution was taken over soon after confederation, and since that date up to the present time there has been no legislation about it. The second question is: 'Where are they situated?' The answer is, 'at Tracadie, New Brunswick, the only one.'

'How many persons are in each'? The answer is 'fifteen.'

'What number of patients have been discharged as cured, or discharged by a certificate of the medical superintendent or officer in charge as safe to be at large since the government of Canada has assumed control of these institutions'? The answer is 'five.'

'Is leprosy more prevalent in Canada now than heretofore, and if so, in what province or provinces?' The answer is: 'Little change, but tending towards decrease.'

The next question is, 'Does Canadian experience, where the disease was properly diagnosed, warrant the assumption that leprosy is curable, or can, under treatment in a lazaretto, be sufficiently overcome to warrant the discharge of the patient'? The answer is: 'In four of five cases mentioned, such cessation or cure took place spontaneously or followed treatment, as to warrant the dicharge of the patient.' I presume that is the only lazaretto in the world where it can be said that the condition of the patient has improved. Where such unfortunates have gone into a lazaretto it has been to die, some in two or three years, but all to die there.

In regard to the question put by the hon. gentleman from Kingston, what is the race and nationality of the lepers at present confined in the leper asylums of Canada? The answer is: French Canadians ten; English two; Icelanders three: total fifteen. The second question: How many of the present inmates have been admitted there voluntarily, and how many were compelled to do so by the authorities? The answer is: All voluntarily. All those that are now in Tracadie are there voluntarily.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—This lazaretto was established in New Brunswick before confederation, was it not?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHEVILLE—Was there not a law passed in the province of New Brunswick?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There may have been in New Brunswick, but not by the parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—If there was a law enacted in New Brunswick, I think we will find that by the terms of the British North America Act, such law would continue in force, and it would be interesting to learn what laws on this subject were passed in those days. My hon. friend from Alexandria wanted to know if there was any law. There was one in New Brunswick, and I should like to know if we can get that law ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will look it up before the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I would like to ask the hon. leader of the House, if it is not a fact that there is a lazaretto off the coast of British Columbia ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, on an island, where there are six or seven patients confined.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The hon. gentleman has not answered question 5.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It does not exist except in the two provinces. The answer given was that there was little change, but tending towards decrease. The lepers in British Columbia on this island of Darcy are, I believe, either Japanese or Chinese. They are not Canadian.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—All Chinese.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—And in New Brunswick ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Ten French Canadians and two Englishmen and three Icelanders.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State if he has positive authority for stating that there were five cures at the lazaretto in Tracadie ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—During what period ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have here the statement of the authorities in charge in various years.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—It is contrary to all medical statistics.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The memo I have was prepared by the Department of Agriculture, Dr. Montizambert being at the head of that particular branch ? He is the gentleman responsible for the statement.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I am afraid he is a little astray. We have been taught by the medical authorities that leprosy is incurable. I have in my hand a reference handbook of the medical society, by Albert Bucke, M.D., who says :

> Of all the diseases mentioned syphilis is most likely to be mistaken for leprosy. In leprous districts cases of syphilis are frequently treated as lepers. In the Tracadie lazaretto there was one undoubted case of syphilis.

I am inclined to think the cases reported as having been cured have not been leprosy at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps not.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Here is where the whole trouble comes in : it is the getting of medical men who are experts on leprosy, to send people to the lazaretto. Clause 5 of the Bill reads :

> The minister may cause any person as to whom it is suspected that he is afflicted with leprosy to be examined by a medical officer or officers to be designated by him, and upon a report of such medical officer or officers that there is reason to believe that such person is afflicted with leprosy he may authorize the admission of such person into a lazaretto, and in case of such person refusing to become an inmate of such lazaretto may cause proceedings to be taken for his apprehension and confinement therein as hereinafter provided.

Now, it is a very serious thing when this disease is so very much like syphillis, and so much like lupus, another disease of the same family. If an individual shows symptoms of syphillis, which may be mistaken for leprosy, he is taken into lazaretto, and our doctors are not very well versed in leprosy ; none of them are experts. I think the community should be protected. It is a terrible thing for a man who is not afflicted with leprosy to be taken to the lazaretto and confined there. I think we should be very careful in enacting such legislation as this. Another authority on this question is Dr. W. Tebb, who has had a very large experience on this matter ; and he writes as follows :—

> The health authorities in Hawaii, as well as the most experienced medical residents elsewhere, consider leprosy as practically incurable, though they acknowledge that life may be prolonged by good food, pure water, healthy habitations and other favourable sanitary conditions. On one occasion, referring to the reports of certain medical practitioners as to their alleged and officially reported cures, I was told by one of the responsible officials that the cures were mythical, the particular cases cited having since exhibited further development of the disease.

It is alleged that the external manifestations of leprosy, like those of some other maladies, disappear for a time, either with or without treatment, and cures are noised abroad; but the disease invariably reappears, and shows itself when least expected.

So you can put down leprosy as an incurable disease, and I doubt very much about these alleged cures at Tracadie.

The SPEAKER—In answer to a question put to the hon. Secretary of State it was said that eight or ten of those people at Tracadie were French Canadians. I am assured by medical authorities in the province of Quebec that there has never been a case of leprosy in the province of Quebec, and that the disease at Tracadie originated from people who had travelled in India. I do not know the history of the disease at Tracadie but can vouch for the fact that not a single case of leprosy has been found in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is the usual thing, the lower provinces will not get fair play here. His honour the Speaker objects to having a French Acadian described as a French Canadian. Even though those French inmates of the Tracadie lazaretto may not have been born in the province of Quebec—they may not have that good fortune—still they are French Canadians all the same, and the hon. Secretary of State was perfectly correct when he so described them.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—The general impression is that leprosy is incurable, and if there are some cases in the lazaretto in New Brunswick that have been cured, it shows that these French Canadians, or Acadians either have not had the same disease that is known under that name, or they have some peculiar virtue which enables them to be cured when others are incurable.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—If we trace the origin of leprosy we shall have to go beyond either French Canadian or French Acadian.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—We will have to go to the valley of the Nile.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—At Tracadie it is traceable to Norwegian sailors who, it appears, landed at Caraquet and left the disease behind them. It matters very little whether they are French Canadians or French Acadians or English Canadians, they have this dreadful disease and are there confined for life. It is a sad but inevitable condition. What I object to is that any person may be cast into that lazaretto under suspicion of being afflicted with leprosy. Hon. gentlemen, just look at this Bill. If such a Bill had been framed and passed under any of the ancient kings for example, or even under the Czar of Russia it would have been deemed a horrible case of autocracy. You give the Minister of Agriculture, or certain officials under him, power to take hold of any one of us if we have a pimple on our face or anything which may be suspected as a symptom of leprosy, and to cast us into the lazaretto. We are retrograding. This resembles the letters of cachet by which, under the French monarch, any one suspected of being anti-royalist or not being in accord with the powers that be, could be thrown into the Bastille there to remain until he was taken out, and that very often at the will of people that simply took advantage of these lettres de cachet to injure persons against whom they had some grudge, women having, through nefarious influence, power to have innocent persons thrown into the dungeon. This Bill is equivalent, to a great extent to the letters of cachet, against which, as you know, the people of France rebelled, and on account of which the great French Revolution was brought about. I would very much desire to see the wording of clause 5 changed, especially that part which gives an official of the government power to apprehend any suspected person and send him to the lazaretto. The official, unless he has made a special study of leprosy, would be no more a judge of it than myself, and there should be an appeal to some medical authority on leprosy, before any one should be subjected to such treatment. I protest against clause 5 as it appears in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—With regard to the spread of leprosy I have here a map showing the portions of the world in which it prevails, and I find that it is prevalent in cold as well as in warm climates, but is more generally prevalent on the sea coast and on islands. In India disease is more prevalent than in any other part of the world. It is useless to discuss the manner in which the disease originated at Tracadie, and I can find no reference in any of the works I have read on the subject to Norwegians having brought it to New Brunswick. The first time lepers were placed on Sheldrac Island was in 1844. It has not spread beyond that, there is no necessity for adopting such a very stringent measure. The disease is diminishing and none of those who are in attendance upon the lepers have taken it. With reference to the necessity of locking up every leper, I have here in the report of a commission appointed to investigate leprosy, the opinion of one of the most eminent surgeons in England on the subject. According to the statements of these men who were conversant with it in India, and whose accounts of it are published in this report, the disease is not of such a contagious nature as is generally supposed. The authority to which I have referred says :—

A certain number of lepers arrive every year in England from abroad. They usually remain in England and are allowed to mix freely with their friends. Children are permitted to go to schools, married couples continue cohabitation, inmates of hospitals and workhouses are, unless especially loathsome, placed in the general wards ; in brief, not a single precaution against contagion is ever taken, and yet the disease never spreads. Precisely the same statements are true of French practice. It is believed that there are sixty lepers in Paris at the present time, and I am told that two leading Paris surgeons have each a leper employed as a household servant. Yet the disease never spreads in Paris any more than in London.

2. A certain number of English persons of various ages going to reside in leprosy districts become the subjects of the disease. It scarcely ever happens in such cases that there has been any known exposure to risk of contagion. Almost invariably such sufferers will say that they have never seen a leper.

I do not object to the establishment of a lazaretto, and I think it ought to be established as soon as possible, and furnished with everything that can possibly conduce to the comfort or mitigate the sufferings of those persons. I notice that the debate on the subject in the House of Commons was replete with inaccuracy and that the disease is not so extremely contagious as it was there represented to be. The bacillus of leprosy was discovered by a Norwegian in 1889. There has been a great deal of leprosy on the coast of Norway. This has been attributed to the excessive use of fish; but the amount of disease there has been diminished in twenty or thirty years more than one-half, and the general tendency is towards a diminution of the evil. There are different degrees of contagion in different diseases. Small-pox is the most contagious, but there is a wide difference between small-pox contagion and leprosy. The authorities all agree that leprosy cannot be contracted except by inoculation.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Does the hon. gentleman consider leprosy more contagious than pneumonia ?

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—No, I do not. Leprosy has a long stage of incubation. Some diseases take only a few hours, some take days, some weeks ; but leprosy takes years. Like hydrophobia it sometimes takes two or three years from the time of the admission of the virus into the system until the manifestation of the disease. It is the same with leprosy. It is only infectious in an acute case. There is not so much suffering accompanying it on account of the loss of feeling, which is generated by its attacking the nerves. I object to the Bill because there is no necessity to give any official power to go into a man's house and search for a supposed leper. There is no necessity to take the man away from his family when he cannot possibly be a source of menace or danger to any body. If one were to judge from the statements made in the House of Commons when the subject was being debated there, leprosy is so highly contagious that it is only necessary to look at a man afflicted with the disease and one will contract it. I have studied up the matter in the last three or four days, and would reply to the hon. Secretary of State when he says that the doctors cannot be expected to know much about the disease since they seldom or never have any occasion to see a leper, that the spectator often sees more of the game than the player, and so a man may get a more thorough knowledge of the subject by study than he would even if he had seen or treated a few cases. However, the authorities I have looked up on the subject all go to show that the disease is not extremely contagious. I go strongly for the lazaretto, but I draw the line at giving any one power such as is conferred by this 5th clause. The doctor who takes charge of this lazaretto should be one who has studied the disease and has passed an examination on it as specialist. No ordinary man without special knowledge of the subject should be put in there. These are the reasons why I thought the objectionable portions of this Bill should be eliminated. They are contrary to humanity and entirely unnecessary, but I approve of the Bill with these objectionable features eliminated.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The better way would be to follow the usual course in dealing with a Bill in committee, and not anticipate any clause until we come to it.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—There are some points with reference to this question which we should speak about now, before dealing with any particular clause. I want to read from the same authority I cited before, to endorse what the hon. senator from Kingston has said.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What is the date of it?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Quite a late work, 1893. He says :

> Whilst the opinion of medical authorities and experts varies considerably on the subject of the contagiousness of leprosy, the preponderance of authority is in favour of the theory that it is not contagious in the ordinary sense of the term, but is communicable by means of a cut, sore, or abraded surface ; and this view is confirmed by my own personal investigations.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I gather from the remarks made by the medical gentlemen in this House that there really is not any necessity for passing a Bill of this kind. The hon. gentleman from Kingston informed the committee that leprosy died out when it was not in the climate to which it properly belonged, and apparently our own experience in Canada goes to show that he is right, for I understand that the disease, instead of increasing at Tracadie, is diminishing ; and I submit that if the views of the hon. gentlemen who are also members of the medical profession are correct, the better way would be simply not to pass the first clause of the Bill, as it would appear that we do not require any machinery to stamp out a disease which is dying out of itself.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think this discussion is very important, because the Bill involves an interference with the liberty of the subject, and the question which has been raised is as to whether there is any necessity for a law of this kind. That is a very important point, and we should, I think, consider that point as the first thing. So far as the remarks which were made by the hon. gentleman from Acadia are concerned, I think he has lost sight of clause 8 of the Bill which provides that all the minister can do is to appoint a medical man to examine the patient to see whether there is any serious suspicion of his being afflicted with the malady. If the person so examined refuses to be committed, he is brought before a judge and investigation is made before the judge. It is then open to the person to adduce whatever evidence he may desire for the purpose of showing that there is no occasion for his being confined. It, therefore, seems to me that the Bill is in the right direction, if the malady is such as is claimed—that is to say contagious and very dangerously so.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—We contend that it is not.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—There is another point to which I call the attention of the House. It has been stated that there was an institution in New Brunswick, at the time of confederation, where patients of this class have been secluded. There must have been legislation by the province of New Brunswick on the subject, and it seems to me we should, before considering this Bill, ascertain what the effect of that legislation is, because it is in force in virtue of the Confederation Act and it will have to be repealed if this Bill is to come into force. I think it would be very important that we should have this legislation before us, and I therefore invite the hon. Secretary of State, if he does not see too much objection to such a course, to defer consideration of the Bill in committee for a short time.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I agree with the suggestion of my hon. friend that the consideration of this Bill should be postponed for a little time. I know that legislation has been enacted by the province of New Brunswick concerning this question, but I am not prepared to say what the effect of it is. I think, therefore, that it would be proper that the consideration of this Bill should be postponed until we are cognizant of the rules and regulations which obtain in New Brunswick so that we may make our legislation here accord with that of the province if necessary—at all events until we gather as much information as possible on the subject, because, after all, this Bill is one which deals with the liberty of the citizen. I perfectly agree that society has a right to be protected against the spread of the awful disease known as leprosy; but on the other hand I desire to insist, as far as I can, that the individual liberty of the citizen should not be rashly interfered with. It is possible that under this Bill a man who is not actually a leper might be thrown into a lazaretto, with the consequences which we can all appreciate. If a man is improperly confined in a place of that kind, it is a worse mistake than if a man were to be improperly confined in jail for some offence of which he is guiltless. Referring to what the hon. gentlemen from Kingston has said, about leprosy not being infectious, I have been told of instances where children born of a father and mother who were both lepers, have grown to manhood and attained old age without any indication of leprosy on their person. These instances go to confirm what both of our hon. colleagues of the medical profession have here asserted. In view of these considerations I would suggest that the leader of the government should allow this Bill to stand for a few days until some further consideration can be given to the matter.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—The hon. senator from Halifax has misunderstood us on this side of the House. We do not pretend to say that leprosy is not infectious at all times. We say that leprosy is not infectious in its first stages, perhaps for years, and that a leper will not infect another individual until such time as abrasions and ulcerations appear on his body, and then if they touch the body of any individual where there is an abrasion, that other individual will contract the disease. But that is not likely to happen for many years, and the disease in its first stages is so much like syphilis and lupus that the very best medical men are liable to make mistakes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is a difference between infectious and contagious diseases.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Certainly there is. It is infectious and endemic. It does not spread over the whole country as smallpox or typhus fever would do, but confines itself to certain small sections of the country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It appears to me that there is no point about which any difference of opinion arises until we reach clause 4. I think we might pass the clauses up to that point, and when we reach it some hon. gentleman might move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again; but we ought to do something because we cannot very well report progress if we have not done anything. Surely there is no objection to the first clause of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Not the slightest.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Let the clauses be passed then, and let us not leap before we come to the stile.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I should like to see that clause amended to this effect, that the Governor in Council may appoint a medical superintendent who is a thoroughly educated expert in leprosy. I should like these latter words included.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Where are we going to get such a man in Canada?

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—One who is duly qualified by experience.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You cannot get such a man in this country, where there is no leprosy.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I think otherwise there will be some danger that people who are not affected with the disease may be confined in the lazaretto.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think there is a good deal of misunderstanding on this question. I wish to read what an authority in the United States says about the lazaretto at Tracadie, the only one we have in Canada. The medical man at the head of that institution has certainly had more experience than any other man in Canada, probably more than any other man on this continent. He surely is the best judge as to whether or not any man whom it is proposed to confine in the lazaretto is really a leper. I think hon. gentlemen are inclined to urge objections to this Bill which have no real foundation. To show the reputation which that institution possesses in New Brunswick I wish to read a part of a report.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—From what is the hon. gentleman reading ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—From the official Report of the Minister of Agriculture, 1904.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Is this the Canadian Minister of Agriculture ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is the Minister of Agriculture of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is he speaking as a doctor or as a farmer ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Speaking of the lazaretto at Tracadie, the Report of the Minister of Agriculture quotes an extract from a report of the lazaretto in Louisiana, in which they admit that the institution in New Brunswick is superior to any other known. I may say that we have never heard any complaints against that institution. It is not administered under the laws of New Brunswick, but is administered by the health bureau of the Department of Agriculture and has been so administered from 1867 downward—38 years—during which time I am not aware that any fault has been found with it, and, therefore, it is not open to the criticisms to which my hon. friends have given expression. I stated in the introduction of this measure that the best medical opinion was that in the earlier stages the disease was not contagious. In 1878 and 1888 the College of Physicians and Surgeons in London, when asked by the government of Great Britain to say whether the disease was contagious, reported that it was not. In 1898, which is the latest report I have been able to find, the British government again submitted the question to the Royal College of Physicians. I shall read a letter written from Downing Street on the question :

Downing Street.
25th October, 1898.

Sir,—

With reference to your letter of the 16th August, 1887, communicating to this department the opinion of the Royal College of Physicians on the subject of leprosy, I am directed by Mr. Secretary Chamberlain to request you to be good enough to move the college to consider and report whether in view of the report of the conference on leprosy held at Berlin in October last, they have found reason materially to change their previously expressed opinions, or to modify the advice which they have given the Secretary of State, either as regards the question of segregating lepers, or on any other point which is of practical importance in the regulation of the disease in colonies where leprosy is endemic.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
C. P. LUCAS.

The Registrar to the Royal College of Physicians.

The members of the committee were :—
Sir Dyce Duckworth, M.D.,
Dr. Robert Liveing,
Dr. Payne,
Dr. Heron,
Dr. Hebb,
Dr. John Anderson.

Their report was as follows :—

Your committee beg leave to report as follows:—

That the communicability of leprosy by direct or indirect means from lepers to the healthy must now be accepted as an established fact, the evidence in support of this belief being conclusive, and there is no evidence of the disease arising or spreading in any other way.

Your committee are therefore of opinion that the conclusions stated in a resolution unanimously adopted by the International Conference on Leprosy held at Berlin in October, 1897, and set forth at page 194 of the official report of the conference, ought to be accepted in their entirety and acted upon where leprosy is endemic, or occurs under the conditions indicated in the first paragraph of the resolution.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That does not settle the question at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That may be the hon. gentleman's opinion. The point raised was, is leprosy contagious. They report that it is contagious.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not see that.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—It is, in a minor degree. That cannot be denied for a moment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will repeat what I have read :

That the communicability of leprosy by direct or indirect means from lepers to the healthy must now be accepted as an established fact, the evidence in support of this belief being conclusive, and there is no evidence of the disease arising or spreading in any other way.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is the second clause of the Bill agreed to ?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I do not see what injury it would do to the Bill to have the words which I have suggested inserted after the words 'medical superintendent.'—'A duly qualified expert in leprosy.' It might happen that some person would report that a man in British Columbia, for instance, is affected with leprosy. Word is sent to the Minister of Agriculture and he orders some local doctor, who is no expert at all, to make an examination, and perhaps an innocent man who is utterly devoid of the disease might be shut up in the lazaretto, in which he will become infected.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Surely the hon. gentleman must give the government credit for common sense. They have had a good man at Tracadie all along, because, by common consent, that seems to be ahead of any other lazaretto in the world, and the only place where they have ever been known to have effected a cure. That is the most conclusive evidence that the government feels its responsibility in this matter.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I must say that it is the very fact that they have reported cures at Tracadie which excites our suspicion. I am satisfied that no case of a true cure of leprosy has ever been reported. I spent seven years amongst the native states of India. Under Hindoo laws they compel these people to live apart from the moment that the skin loses its colour, and its sensation. From that moment, those who are affected must be separated from their families, and grouped together as a distinct community. The very fact that this statement has been made in reference to our lazaretto is the reason why we feel anxious about the authority to be given to the superintendent, and the authority to be given to the minister. I am thoroughly in favour of this Bill, and very much interested in it. I may say that some few years ago, upon my report to the government, an individual was sent to this institution in Tracadie. I had an Icelandic woman under my charge for two years, and when the disease declared itself, I reported to the government and she was removed to Tracadie, where she died. There is a vast difference between the leprosy of the Baltic coast or Norway, such leprosy as is found among people engaged in fishing, who live upon tainted fish and the refuse and offal from fish. They in due time acquire a taint in the blood that produces what I stated the other day to be 'button' leprosy.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Is it elephantiasis?

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—No, it is an entirely different thing from Asiatic leprosy; but I am satisfied that it needs just as much care, and in no case would I accept any superintendent's statement that a person can reach that condition in which he may be safely set at liberty. I know of cases in India where an individual might have fairly good health perhaps for 17 years after he is known to be a leper, and I have used a vegetable oil in this country which has the power of retarding the progress of the disease, keeping it back for many years. I have also used the same in connection with cases of syphilis with very great effect. So that the reason I ask for delaying the progress of this Bill is just because it seems to me that we ought to be very careful about the powers that we give to the superintendent, and also the powers given to the minister in connection with this matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The conditions in Canada would be very different from the conditions in India. In the first place the climate and the mode of life and the treatment would be absolutely different. I presume in India the disease is regarded as hopeless. The superintendent, Dr. Montizambert, who is recognized as a very high authority, sends me an extract from the report of Dr. Smith, who has been in charge. It is as follows:—

> One patient, a man of forty, is so apparently cured of all symptoms of the disease that I felt justified at my last inspection of the lazaretto in approving of his going home, on the condition of his reporting himself from time to time for examination by the physician of the institution. He has been in the lazaretto for five years.
>
> Previous to his being thus released, all the ulcerations on his body and limbs had completely healed and repeated microscopic examinations of the mucus from his mouth, throat and nostrils, had for some time failed to reveal the presence of the leprosy bacillus.

Whether this apparent cure will prove permanent or not the future, of course, alone can show. With regard to this question of cures it is well known that spontaneous cures do take place sometimes in leprosy, or rather spontaneous cessations of the disease. Thus, in the history of the lazaretto, Dr. Smith reports the following cases :—

M. Judith Beniot entered in 1879, discharged in 1889. Augustin Losier, entered in 1879, discharged in 1885. Louis Manzerell entered in 1882, discharged in 1890. Maurice Benoir, the man spoken of in my last report, entered in 1878, discharged in 1889.

So that the disease is probably not the same as what is known as leprosy in India, probably not the same as in China or Japan.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—It is the same disease. It comes from China. We have lazarettos in India and under the best medical care ; and the experience there is that there is no cure. It sometimes will cease so that there may be tolerably good health enjoyed, but it is still in the system and it will appear again. There are cases where it skips one generation and appears in the second. It is still in the blood ; and we certainly ought to be exceedingly careful about doing anything that would permit the officials to discharge these individuals and allow them to live with their families.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—If we are on clause 2, we must bear in mind that the Governor in Council of necessity must be the judge of the qualification of the man appointed, otherwise it would be open to have his qualification brought in question by anybody, and therefore it might go to the root of the efficient working of the Bill. If the suggestion which has been made of having a qualified medical superintendent was adopted, then we would have to go further and say 'of which the Governor in Council shall be the only judge.' It will be the duty of the Governor in Council to appoint a qualified person ; and the Governor in Council will be responsible to parliament in the discharge of that duty ; therefore it seems to me that this is sufficient and should be accepted.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I think for the safety of the Bill and for the safety of the people of the Dominion of Canada, that these words should be inserted. If the Senate is not willing to do it, the responsibility is off our shoulders. I move that after the words 'medical superintendent' we add the words 'Duly qualified expert in leprosy' ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

The amendment was lost on a division.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think it is time to object to that clause. If there is a law in force now we should know what it is. The hon. gentleman from DeSalaberry objected to the passing of the Bill before we were acquainted with the laws of New Brunswick on that subject.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have already explained that the administration of this lazaretto has been under the government of Canada and not under the law of New Brunswick in any sense. It has been under the direction of the Minister of Agriculture for the last thirty years.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is there really a law ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Well, it has not been observed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If there is a law, it may be observed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. The government of Canada took over the lazaretto and have administered it as best they could.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—They had certain laws which had either to be followed or be repealed. This law has not been repealed that I know of.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We will look up that law. But this lazaretto has been administered by the department.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It may have been administered under the department for the last ten or twenty or thirty or forty years, but it may be so administered without authority of law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was superseded by the Dominion government, if there was a law.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Can an hon. minister supersede the law?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I stated before, that the persons confined there were purely voluntary patients. They go in there to better their condition. Their friends think it better for them and for their families. Great care is taken. The kindest nurses have been engaged—nuns. It is only in view of its success that one would feel that it would be undesirable to make any change in the administration of the lazaretto.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Stadacona is remarkable for propounding conundrums which it is sometimes difficult to answer. This clause has not any of the effects it is supposed to have. It says simply that this lazaretto shall be subject to the control of the Minister of Agriculture. It must be under some minister, and we simply say that it shall continue to be under the minister who has had charge of it for 30 years.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER, from thh committee, reported that they had made some progress with the Bill and asked leave to sit again on Wednesday next.

VACANCY ON THE SUPREME COURT BENCH.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the House adjourns, I wish to ask the hon. Secretary of State if there is any truth in the rumour that Sir Henri Joly, the ex-Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia, has been named to the Supreme Court Bench?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not heard anything about it.

The Senate adjourned till 3 p.m. tomorrow.

PURCHASE OF CANADIAN EASTERN IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL, K.C.M.G., inquired of the government:

1st. The amount paid for the railway known as the Canada Eastern in New Brunswick, and the name of the person or persons to whom the purchase money was paid.

2nd. The amount of money expended on said railway since its purchase by the government to the 1st of April, 1906, on buildings, repairs, grading, culverts, bridges, ties, rails and all other expenditures incurred in the improvement of said railway.

3rd. The total amount earned and received from the passengers, and for freights, separately to the 1st of April, 1906.

4th. The total expenditure for operating said road, as a branch of the Intercolonial, from the date of purchase to the 1st of April, 1906.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The department have informed me that the information asked for in this notice is rather diffuse and that it could be brought down better if a return was moved for. I have given them notice to prepare it so that no time will be lost.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the hon. minister will accept this inquiry as a motion for a return. With that understanding I will make the motion now.

The motion was agreed to.

FRENCH TRANSLATION OF MILITARY INSTRUCTIONS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

Can the military authorities order the translation into French of the programmes of instruction as published in English on the 7th of April last in the Militia Orders under the number 81, and the distribution thereof to all officers commanding units in the regiments of the province of Qubebec ?

Can the government give the assurance that such translation and such distribution will take place as soon as possible, before the holding of the next camps for training ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has not been customary to publish the camp regulations, or such programmes as are referred to above, in the French language, as it has not been considered necessary in the public interest. Inquiry is being made, and if it should be found to be desirable, the syllabus for the ensuing training will be published in the French language.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think that the answer given by the hon. minister is merely a defiance of public opinion in the province of Quebec. We make this request, not as a favour, but we ask it as a right. If we desired to go further we would ask that all the militia orders should be printed in French. We are not asking that; we are only asking that the syllabus for the next camp, where most of the French regiments will be ordered for drill, shall be printed in French and we are denied that right, according to this answer of the department. I think that is not a fair answer, and the French population of the province of Quebec are not being fairly treated. I claim this as a right, and I do not think the government will take upon themselves to refuse that for the province of Quebec. It is merely four or five pages altogether, published under order number 81 in the militia orders. It is giving all the routine of the camp, a distribution not only to the officers but to the men; so that they may know all the routine business of the camp. I think that the government should treat our population fairly and permit them to be on the same footing as the other regiments in this Dominion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall be glad to call the attention of the minister to my hon. friend's remarks. I will obtain a copy of the statement which he has just made and forward it to the department.

RESOURCES OF THE MACKENZIE BASIN AND NORTHWEST.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved :

That a select committee composed of the Honourable Messrs. Talbot, Lougheed, Douglas, DeVeber, Landry, Tessier, Wilson, McMullen, Young, Ferguson, Ross (Moosejaw), McGregor, Power, Robertson, Watson, Bernier, Kirchhoffer, Ellis, Thompson, Perley, Riley, Bostock and the mover, be appointed to inquire and report from time to time as to the value of that part of the Dominion lying north of the Saskatchewan watershed, east of the Rocky Mountains and west of the Hudson's bay; comprising the north parts of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and the Mackenzie territory, its extent of navigable waters, rivers, lakes and sea coast, of agricultural and pastural lands, its fisheries, forests and mines; five to be a quorum; the said committee to have power to appoint shorthand writers and to send for persons, papers and records.

He said: The reason I have moved for this committee is the fact that we have that large territory lying north of the Saskatchewan river which extends down to the old district of Athabasca and through the Mackenzie river territory. Very little is known of this vast district by the people of this country or the world at large. We have devoted all our time and attention to the settlement of our agricultural lands, and we have, I must say, been very successful in that respect; but we have not devoted the same interest and attention to the development of the mineral resources of that western country. It is true that in 1888 the Honourable Sir H. John Schultz, moved for the appointment of a committee of this House to inquire into the extent and resources of the great Mackenzie river basin. That committee went into the matter extensively, and a large amount of information was collected which has been of great value to the people of this country. Before becoming a member of this House I took great pleasure in reading that report, and although a resident of that country for 27 years I derived from it a great deal of valuable information which I could not have otherwise obtained. The people of the Northwest know from reports of traders, trappers and others who have travelled in that northern country that it contains vast mineral wealth, and I am certain if steps were taken to find out just what we have in that part of the Northwest an inducement would be offered to people in the older countries to come here and invest their capital. There are many capitalists looking for investments. If they knew that capital could be profitably invested there would be no difficulty in getting money to develop those natural resources. I have myself seen splendid samples of hard white mica, a foot square, brought in by an Indian from the north country, and he said there was any amount of it there. I have seen samples of coal, copper and other minerals from the Mackenzie and Peace rivers, but we have no reliable information about that country. It has never been thoroughly explored, and the government should do something to ascertain its resources. Some years ago, I understand, the Ontario government sent exploring parties to find out what they had in the northwestern part of the province of Ontario. The reports of those parties can be found in the library. If to-day the mineral resources of the northern part of Ontario are being developed it is mainly due to the explorations made by those parties sent out by the government.

Another reason why I think we ought to appoint this committee is the fact that two years ago—I think it is about two years ago—the Department of the Interior saw fit to send Professor Macoun out into the Peace river district, and the northern part of Alberta. Mr. Macoun is a young man; he went into that country and stayed there two and a half months. In two and a half months he explored a territory which is larger than practically the whole of the arable portion of the province of Ontario. He rode around on a pony—there is no other way of getting through that district unless it be riding on a pony or in a cart, because there are no railways. He got off his pony and examined the soil with a jack knife and came home with a report condemning the whole northern part of the country. That is very serious matter. His report is still uncontradicted as far as I know. The minister in charge of the Interior Department at that time was going to take the matter up and send another party out to make a more thorough investigation, giving the party any amount of time to go over the territory and make a proper report; but that has not been done. Mr. Macoun, as I have said, is a young man, and he drew very large conclusions from small premises. He could not have seen much of the country, and I think he went a little out of his way to condemn the whole of the district. Now, from the knowledge I have, having talked over the subject with gentlemen who have been all through the country, one of whom is Bishop Pascal, the Roman Catholic bishop in my town, who passed the greater part of his life in that territory, I have come to the conclusion that we have a magnificent country there, equal to anything in Alberta, perhaps better, and equal to anything in Saskatchewan; and I think it is the duty of the government to investigate and to obtain accurate detailed reports for the information of the public. I was travelling recently in the United States and not three weeks ago I was talking to a gentleman from New York about the Peace river country, its resources and the amount of fine arable land which it possesses. He told me he had read this report of Macoun's. He said that is an official sent out by your own government; surely you have confidence in your own officials. 'As far as I know,' he said 'that report has never been contradicted.' From reading the report he had come to the conclusion that the Peace river country was not very much good. Another reason why we should have a committee to inquire into the present condition and resources of that country is that great changes have taken place in the eighteen years that have elapsed since the committee of Sir John Schultz sat. At that time the Mackenzie basin was an unknown wilderness, inhabited only by trappers and the Hudson Bay officials. During that eighteen years there has been quite an influx of immigration into that country, and, at the present time, around Vermilion and Lesser Slave lakes the settlers and traders have grist mills and roller mills, and they are growing wheat and one hundred and one other things that were unknown in that country at the time the Schultz committee were carrying on their investigation. Another thing is, that while some people might have thought that country very little good on account of the climate eighteen years ago, they may have changed their minds to-day. A great many people not only outside of the Dominion, but people within the Dominion thought eighteen years ago that northern or what is now known as New Ontario was very little good. Our own people were afraid eighteen years ago to invest their money in Manitoba.

Agriculture there had not passed the experimental stage; and as for Saskatchewan and Alberta no one would invest his money there at that time. To-day everything is changed. From my own knowledge of the country—I have lived there for 27 years—there has been a great change not only in the way of development and settlement, but a change in the climate. The winters to-day in the Northwest are not the same severe winters that we had there seven years ago. The winters to-day are as mild or milder than in any other part of the Dominion. Twenty-seven years ago the winter set in early in November and we had continual cold weather for two, three and four months, with the thermometer going down to fifty below zero. Of late years the thermometer may go down to fifty below a couple times during the winter, but it would be about daylight in the morning, and it is right up again to zero before twelve o'clock. We now have thaws in the winter, something that was almost unknown 27 years ago—regular thaws, so that the climate has changed, and while gentlemen may have conscientiously made pessimistic reports on that country 27 years ago, I fancy the same gentlemen to-day, after the experience which they have had since, would report very differently. There would be a great difference in the evidence they would give now as compared with what they did before. Take the northern part of Saskatchewan. I suppose we have from the line of the North Saskatchewan river, for a hundred miles north of Prince Albert a good agricultural country. After that it is practically an unknown land. No person knows much about it except from the stories we hear from the trappers, traders, &c. For five hundred miles extending inland from the North Saskatchewan river there is a lot of good agricultural land. For a couple of hundred miles there is any amount of timber. I think something should be done to find out exactly what we have in that line. The timber in this country is very valuable on account of the vast amount of territory we have in the western provinces in which there is no timber. The timber in the other provinces of the east is about used up. I suppose there is a large supply yet on the new line through the northern parts of Ontario and Quebec, but taken altogether the timber supply in the Dominion to-day is very limited compared with the increasing demands of the population that we expect to inhabit the great western plains in the next twenty-five years. We have to ascertain what there is in the way of timber in that northern country, and protect what we have there. Settlers are going into the country and we must remember that when people get away into an unorganized district they become more careless about fires than if they were living in the older settled provinces.

And it does not take long to clean off a nice strip of forest. I remember travelling through a heavy piece of forest in Saskatchewan about twenty-four years ago. To-day if any person travels over that same tract of country he will find it is all under cultivation. He will find farm houses, roads, bridges, schools and everything else to be found in a prosperous farming community. About twenty years ago there was a large fire which cleared off the timber and scrub. It is a good thing to have the land under cultivation, but we have still an enormous quantity of land in its primitive condition and very little timber. The timber should be protected, but I do not think we can adopt a system of protection until we know what we have got to protect. Another question of importance is the fisheries in the northern parts of Saskatchewan and Alberta. We have Great Bear lake, Great Slave lake and Lake Athabasca all teeming with fish. North of the city of Prince Albert, twenty-five or thirty miles, we have lakes all teeming with fish. Some of these lakes have not been explored and we do not know exactly the varieties of fish they contain. These fisheries are going to be a great source of wealth when the country comes to be opened up, and I think the time has arrived when we should make some effort to ascertain the extent of our resources in this new country. If we had a committee they could get from the officers of the Interior Department, the Geological Survey staff, explorers and others valuable information on which to base a report at the end of the session, asking the government to appoint a couple of parties to make a thorough exploration of that northern country. Appoint a man at the head of that department, whose report would be reliable and when he appended his signature to his report everybody would have confidence in it. I think it would be a step in the right direction. This is a very important matter, at least as far as Peace River country is concerned, considering the report that Mr. Macoun made with reference to that country. I think that something should be done to counteract the wrong impression created by his report. I was present at the committee when he made that report. I was there several days and took part in the discussion, and also took some part in cross-examining him upon it, and this gentleman, as I said before, went a long distance out of his way. He went so far, when he could not conjure up anything else, and some person in the committee asked him if the country was subject to hail, as to acknowledge that although he had not seen any hail himself, he had made up his mind that the country was subject to hail from the fact that he saw spots on the fallen timber. I have been a good while in that country, and although I do not claim to have the same amount of scientific knowledge that that gentleman possesses, as I have never given it that much study, still I could tell him what made the spots on the fallen timber. I am sure it was not hail, because I never heard that the Peace River country was subject to hail storms. Still it has gone out to the world that the Peace River country is not only subject to drought and frost but to hail and everything else. I am sure it would be very easy for a committee such as I am asking for to obtain evidence from gentlemen at present occupied in farming, ranching, lumbering and fishing in that country to establish the fact that there is not a better agricultural country in the Dominion to-day than the Peace River valley. It is equal in extent, or larger than the whole arable portion of Ontario. If it costs something to establish that fact and counteract the evil and the injury done by Mr. Macoun's report, the money will be well spent.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I fully appreciate the importance of giving the widest possible publicity to the vast resources of the Northwest Territories. We have on several occasions had similar committees formed in this chamber, and very valuable evidence has been secured and circulated from time to time. The first committee was in 1870, when it was moved by Mr. McCully, seconded by Mr. Botsford :

That a committee be appointed on the subject of Rupert's Land, Red river, and Northwest Territories, with a view of collecting information respecting its general capabilities, and means of access thereto, with power to send for persons and papers.

Then again, in 1886, Mr. Schultz moved the appointment of a committee for a similar purpose. After being discussed in the House by a number of gentlemen, it was decided that it was too late a period of the session to commence so important an investigation as, necessarily, the inquiry would have to be somewhat exhaustive, wholly apart from the cost attending it, and so it was deferred that session. However, in the following session, 1887, the hon. Mr. Schultz brought the subject again to the notice of the Senate and moved this resolution:

The Honourable Mr. Schultz moved, seconded by the Honourable Mr. Girard, that a select committee composed of the Honourable Messieurs Allan, Almon, Bolduc, Botsford, Carvell, Chaffers, Ferrier, Girard, Howlan, Kaulbach, Leonard, McCallum, McClelan, McInnes (British Columbia), McDonald (British Columbia), McPherson (Sir David Lewis), Mernier, Millar, Ogilvie, Pelletier, Reesor, Robitaille, Sanford, Sénécal, Sutherland, Thibaudeau, Turner, and the mover, be appointed a committee for the purpose of collecting information regarding the existing natural food products of the Northwest Territories and the best means of conserving and increasing them, and that the said committee have leave to send for persons, papers and records.

That committee sat for a month, and was attended with very considerable expense, but the result of the investigation was very satisfactory. The report occupied about 170 pages. It will be found in the Journals of the Senate for 1887. I do not know that you could read a more beautiful description of the Northwest and its resources, and particularly that section of the country north of the Saskatchewan than you will find in parts of this report. I will just read portions of it in order that the House may understand the scope of the committee. I shall take one paragraph.

Your committee cannot conclude their report without expressing to your hon. House their sense of the great value of these Northwest Territories to the Dominion of Canada, and from the evidence taken, which incidentally extends beyond the scope of your instructions, they are forced to the conclusion that nowhere has nature showered blessings with a more bountiful hand than in the Canadian Northwest. About 600,000 square miles of arable and pastoral land seem prepared by the hand of God for the homes of civilized men. No rock or stump prevents the immediate cultivation of the soil, while beneath the surface are vast stores of fuel from former forests, side by side with the extensive deposits of iron ore. A region, which, situated as it is on the highest table land of this continent, enjoys equality of mean temperature, freedom from many forms of epidemic and malarial diseases, and immunity from the cyclones which have become from their frequency the terror of the inhabitants of less elevated regions south of our border ; navigable rivers traverse its length, and a great and growing system of railways carries its produce to the shores of the Atlantic and Pacific. It is a land of interest and profit to the tourists, the angler, and the hunter. Great waterways drain it to the Pacific, to the Atlantic, to Hudson's bay and the Arctic sea ; in its bosom is found coal, gold, silver, iron, copper, salt, sulphur, petroleum and asphaltum, and most of the granites, marbles, clays, lime and sand-stones which are of constructive use, while on and near its surface amber and some of the precious stones have been found. The well-known climatic law 'that the nearer we approach the limit of possible cultivation of all cereal plants the greater will be the yield and the finer the quality,' also ordains that the frost of winter, accompanied, as it is, by an absence of moisture and by light snowfall, shall make it pleasant and healthful for man, while aiding him in his work by its deep penetration, pulverizing the soil as it thaws, and giving gradually back to the upper crust the imprisoned moisture.

It is worth while calling attention to the names of some of the witnesses, who were leading men at that time in the Northwest. They are:

The inquiry was a very exhaustive one, and the report might be republished with very great advantage at this time. I do not think that Mr. Macoun's report was taken as a correct statement of the condition of things in that country. I think it was not generally credited. It came rather as a shock to public opinion. It was different from the roseate reports we had had in former years, and my own impression is that it was very generally discredited. I doubt very much whether it did the harm that my hon. friend ascribes to it. I have no desire to oppose the motion, if the opinion of the House is that at this period of the session it would be of value that we should have another committee. Of course the cost would be considerable, because gentlemen would have to be brought from remote distances, and it would take time. I would advise my hon. friend to postpone this motion until the beginning of next session. There will probably be very little for this House to do at the beginning of next session as the tariff question will be before the other Chamber, and, therefore, it might be quite appropriate that an inquiry of this kind should be held here then. I therefore advise my hon. friend to postpone the committee, and I would suggest also that when a committee is named it can take up the report of the Schultz Committee which may probably aid them in coming to a conclusion as to the best witnesses to call before them. It may not be necessary to call so large a number of gentlemen as appeared as witnesses on the former inquiry, which, as I said, extended over a considerable period. In 1886 it was thought that it was too late in the session; it happened to be about this time in 1886 that the motion was made, about the 6th or 8th May. The opinion of the Senate at that time was that it was undesirable at so late a period of the session to pursue the matter, and the motion was postponed until the next session. For these reasons, I think, it is undesirable at this period of the present session to undertake so important an inquiry. It is proposed now to have an adjournment for ten days, and after that, I think, the House will be pretty well occupied with the legislation coming up from the other Chamber. For these reasons I would suggest that my hon. friend, having made his statement, should give this report made in 1887 the fullest consideration, and direct his inquiry to points that are not covered directly by it.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Does the hon. minister recollect how much the investigation of Dr. Schultz's committee cost?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not recollect. It cost a great deal, because travelling at that time was more expensive than it is to-day. I do not suppose the cost would be as large now as it was then, for the reason that now we have railway facilities coming and going, and the time occupied would be considerably less than it required in that year; but it would cost a considerable penny. I may add also that a good deal of the information that would be required is to be found in the reports of the Minister of the Interior. Since that time annual reports have been published of the condition of the various sections of the country, more particularly the Peace river. That has received a great deal of attention, and from other sources, the Geological reports and so on, a great deal of information can be obtained that would be of value in the inquiry.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I desire to add my tribute to the remarks of the hon. Secretary of State in a complimentary way with reference to the investigation that was made in 1887 under the direction of the late Senator Schultz. I have had occasion frequently since I have been in this parliament to consult that document, and I was amazed when I first made the acquaintance of it to find what a vast amount of information was there collected at that time and how thorough the investigation was, and the amount of labour the committee went through in collecting that information. I never knew the chairman of the committee personally, but he must have been a man of great industry and ability. I do think also, with my hon. friend who moved this motion, that the time has come when we should push our investigation still further. The difficulties, as my hon. friend the Secretary of State has pointed out, of travelling and getting witnesses from that country in earlier years were almost insuperable. To-day they are largely removed and the difficulty and expense will not be anything like as great as they were then. I am one of those who felt a strong regret that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway did not pursue that course, north of Lake Winnipeg, as Sir Sandford Fleming recommended, entering the Peace river district in that way. Of course there were strong influences of every character to locate the line via Winnipeg, but Winnipeg could have been connected by a branch, and ultimately that city would have been as well off, because by a branch running north it would have been a comparatively easy matter to reach Hudson Bay, which would have been of great value to Winnipeg. My opinion was that if the railway pursued that northerly course it would have opened a route from Quebec to the Peace River Pass through the northern belt for exploration, and that many minerals and other riches would have been discovered, and we would have added greatly to the depth of our Dominion if we had pursued that course. However, that was not done, but in view of the rich mineral discoveries in the Yukon and in Cobalt, minerals which we believe exist in other places that are already more or less explored, we should look forward to the time when we may not only press the investigation into the Saskatchewan district, but prepare for opening it in some way by railways. My hon. friend deserves credit for bringing this matter before the House. It is a duty this House should enter upon, and I am glad that my hon. friend has taken the initiative to bring a matter of such great importance as this before the attention of the country. I think we should embrace that opportunity and proceed with the investigation, but in the conversations which I have had with my hon. friend on the subject, I said to him, as the hon. Secretary of State has now said to the House, that I thought we were too far advanced in this session to enter on that work. The witnesses would have to be brought from very long distances. A great deal of preliminary work would have to be done by the chairman or some one else before any witnesses could appear at all and before the committee could take evidence. A reference to the report of the Schultz Committee will show that a vast amount of preliminary work was done by Senator Schultz and others before the committee commenced to hear evidence at all. If this is going to be a valuable inquiry, the same thing will have to be done now, and I warn my hon. friend that he has entered upon a task which will involve a great deal of work if it is done properly, and it is not worth doing at all if it is not done rightly. I do not think the cost ought to stand in the way. It would be a mere bagatelle compared to the importance of that northern country and I warmly support the suggestion that we should have the investigation. I agree, however, with the hon. Secretary of State that the better way would be for my hon. friend, with such assistance as he can procure, to lay out his plans and prepare for the work, and move for his committee at the beginning of the next session of parliament.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (deLanaudière)—If I understood the hon. gentleman from Marshfield aright he said that the Grand Trunk Pacific should pass north of Lake Winnipeg and from there enter the Peace River district.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That was Sir Sandford Fleming's plan.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is the Trans-Canadian Railway route

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Or the Grand Trunk Pacific, which? If it is meant for the Grand Trunk Pacific, I would remind my hon. friend that there is a very great distance, some 1,100 miles between Lake Winnipeg and the Peace River district. Would it not be the intention with such a location that the railway should pass through the city of Edmonton? I understood my hon. friend to say that the location of the Grand Trunk Pacific should have been north of Lake Winnipeg and from there that it should enter the Peace River district.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, in a north-westerly direction.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—If my hon. friend would examine the map again he would find that coming eastward from the north of Lake Winnipeg towards Quebec, the line would have to go through a very poor country indeed. There is very little arable land coming from Lake Winnipeg eastward; he would also see that if he tried to make a straight line starting from Quebec as he said and going towards Edmonton, as he admits this line should have gone, he would see that Winnipeg is very nearly on a straight line between those two points. A straight line would pass perhaps about the middle of Lake Winnipeg. The construction of a branch from north of Lake Winnipeg down to Winnipeg, on either side of that lake, would be very difficult and very unproductive, and a very crooked line at best. I think the location was a wise one in going through Winnipeg, and in going from Winnipeg almost due east as far as Lake Seul, bending a little bit to the south passing north of Lake Nipigon and north of Lake Abitibi, and going to the sources of the St. Maurice river. I may say that is exactly the line that has been adopted and I am glad to have this opportunity to say also, that it is the very line that I described three years ago in this House, and I then marked that location in red ink on a map. That map is now hung up in room 17 of this Senate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Where is that room?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Room number 17 in the Senate Chambers, and that same map and that same location are there to-day, and you will find the location with very little change, and you will see also that Quebec, Winnipeg and Edmonton are almost on a straight line. From Winnipeg eastward the line is about a straight line, as it is also westward from Winnipeg to Edmonton, inclining a little to the south of the direct line passing through settled territory as far as Portage la Prairie, then through to Touchwood hills, then straight through to Edmonton. I think that was the proper location; I do not believe that the location north of Lake Winnipeg would have been as good, because on both sides of the lake—and especially on the eastern side, as I have said, it is a very poor country indeed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to offer a word of explanation. I was not saying whether it was a better route or not. That is not what I was discussing. I was pointing out to the House that it was Sir Sandford Fleming's plan—and I had strong hopes at the time that it would have been adopted—to keep that northerly route, north of Lake Winnipeg and going in the direction of the Peace River Pass. I was pointing out what Sir Sandford Fleming's scheme was; I only brought it in incidentally, and said that if it had been carried out that country would have been opened up—and that I hope before very long some plan will be set on foot to open up that district by a railway.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Sir Sandford Fleming's report was south of Lake Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Yes, crossing the Red river at Selkirk, and the Narrows of Lake Manitoba, and from that point practically following the route of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I think the hon. gentleman from Belleville will agree to that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman pits his word against mine, but I will undertake before the House adjourns to put evidence before him that Sir Sandford Fleming recommended a line north of Lake Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Never.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think we should go and examine the map in room 17.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie knows very well that Selkirk is north of Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—South of Lake Winnipeg—north of the city of Winnipeg. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield says that Sir Sandford Fleming recommended a route north of Lake Winnipeg ; I say it was south of Lake Winnipeg.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am inclined to think the hon. gentleman from Marshfield is correct. My hon. friend seems to have misunderstood the argument of the senator from Marshfield; he did not refer at all to the route east of Winnipeg or east of Lake Manitoba. What I understood him to call attention to was the necessity for opening up that northern portion of the arable part of the Northwest Territories, and that would have been done had the Grand Trunk Pacific line run north of Lake Winnipeg westward to Prince Albert, and north of the Saskatchewan until it reached Edmonton. That was the route that was contemplated when the scheme was first devised in reference to the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific. My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie knows very well that the road north of Winnipeg and north of Lake Manitoba and north to a certain extent—though it might have to cross it in certain places—of the North Saskatchewan river up to Edmonton, runs through an arable section of country fit for grazing, for settlement and for cultivation of all that you produce south of Lake Manitoba. That is the route that I think ought to have been taken. That would have been a much shorter route to the Peace river district than the road now being built through the middle of Manitoba verging towards the section of country which the hon. gentleman referred to as being desirous of having opened up for settlement. The present route of the Grand Trunk Pacific never could have been contemplated when the scheme was first devised. It runs from Winnipeg westward through the best settled portions of Manitoba and in fact of Saskatchewan, until it reaches Alberta where the country is not so well settled. I know the tendency of settlement is in the direction which I have indicated, and had the road been built on that route there might have been some excuse for the enormous expenditure to which this country is being committed in order to open up that part of the country. By the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme, after you leave Winnipeg, no portion of the country is being developed. They are running almost parallel with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in some places alongside the Canadian Northern. I am speaking from personal knowledge of that section. I drove from Edmonton down to Prince Albert, and I formed a very high opinion of the country and its fitness for settlement. There is room there for hundreds of thousands of people; and I only regret, that since we have to bear the expenditure in connection with the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific it has not been located further north, in order to open up and develop a portion of the country which will not be benefited by the route which has been taken. That is the argument which I advanced when the scheme was before the Senate, and I repeat that I think my hon. friend misunderstood the argument of the senator from Marshfield. He did not say, as I understood, that the construction of the road north of the North Saskatchewan river was intended to reach, or that he advocated that route as going through the Peace river country. You would have had to go vastly north of the Yellow Head pass. The supposition was that the Yellow Head Pass would have been selected or a pass still further to the north, which is represented to be a very easy pass through which to build a road. I am only expressing the opinion which I expressed at the time the scheme was before the Senate. I am still strongly of the conviction that the location of the Grand Trunk Pacific through Manitoba and the portions of the Northwest through which it is going, is not the route that should have been adopted, nor is it the route to which we should have given such immense aid and support, because it will not accomplish the object which I believe the government had originally in view in aiding the construction of that road. I give no opinion upon the country running eastward from Lake Winnipeg. From my quite limited knowledge of that section of the country I have come to the conclusion, as my hon. friend has, that through that portion of the route the country is not particularly adapted for settlement; but there is no telling what may develop when the country has been opened up for settlement. We have been staggered and astonished at what is being done by the construction of the road from North Bay into the Cobalt district; and it is to be hoped that similar benefits may result from the large expenditure which is to be made in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific. However that is in the future. I am not a prophet in this respect, but from the experience we have had so far there is every reason to hope that something of the same kind would follow the opening up of the northern lands, making Canada richer and more popular than it is at present.

I have a very strong conviction that the Grand Trunk Pacific line through Manitoba westward to Edmonton, is being constructed through a section which, I repeat, is tolerably well supplied with railway facilities. What I should like to have seen and what I am satisfied the country in the future will be desirous of seeing, is that that portion of the country lying immediately to the south of the North Saskatchewan river supplied with railway facilities, which will enable immigrants to settle in that region as well as in other parts. Any one who has read the reports of Sir Sandford Fleming and others on that section of the country, must have observed that it was that portion of the Northwest which was originally supposed to be the wheat growing area—what is known as the fertile belt. We have all a distinct recollection when the southern portion of the Northwest Territories west of Manitoba was looked upon as a desert. In fact if you read the reports of the early explorers of that country, or Sir George Simpson's route from Montreal to the Pacific, you will find that southern portion to which I have referred designated as a desert.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Not Manitoba.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, not Manitoba. I have driven from Deloraine along the southern border of Manitoba to the Rocky Mountains, and I am safe in saying that there is not fifty miles in that whole stretch of the southern portion of the new provinces that is not fit for cultivation or for grazing. Having been over it personally, I speak with some authority, and it was a source of the greatest gratification to me to learn from personal experience something of the value of that portion of our country. I need not say that in some seasons there are droughts, which might interfere with the cultivation of grain, but I may mention one little incident which will show that it is not by any means a dry desert. Our wagon broke down and we thought we would have to walk five or six miles in order to water our horses, but we had not gone twenty-five yards before we found a depression containing plenty of water. I give that as an illustration of the character of that country and as a reply to those who say that it is unfit for cultivation. We have not yet discovered half its value, nor have we learned yet of the resources in water and fuel to be found in that section of the country that was at one time thought to be valueless. To return to the subject, however, I am sorry that the Grand Trunk Pacific has gone by the route selected. I would have preferred to see it built further north.

Hon. Mr. ROY—In supporting the resolution of my hon. friend from Prince Albert, I wish to give one reason why I approve of it. The hon. Secretary of State said that Mr. Macoun's report was not taken seriously. If the hon. gentleman had been in the west during the last general election he would have found that the Conservative party credited that report, and that the press made quite a point of it; and that very bad feelings were created in the west. The people of that country do not like to see anybody, especially an official of the government, discrediting our country, and that is why very likely my hon. friend from Prince Albert has brought up this resolution to-day for the appointment of a committee to ascertain the facts about that territory. I am sure that when the facts are known it will be found that Mr. Macoun's report was not altogether exact. That is why I am so strongly in favour of the resolution of my hon. friend from Prince Albert.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I am sure most of us who live in the older portions of Canada have been deeply interested in the remarks to which we have listened from the mover of the resolution, the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. member from Belleville. The subject of the resolution is undoubtedly a very important one. The report quoted from by the hon. Secretary of State referred rather to the more southern portion of Rupert's Land, than to the section intended to be covered by the investigation now sought. It took us a great many years to impress upon the people of the old world, even of England, the value and enormous resources of our western country. It was only after many years of exploration and publication of reports that we succeeded in opening the eyes of the civilized world to the fact that we possess a territory which will eventually support many millions of people. If we have other territory north of that which is capable of cultivation, such as the Peace river district of which I have heard a great deal—and I regret very much that I have never had the pleasure of visiting that section of our Dominion—if we have there a territory susceptible of being cultivated and producing fairly good crops of the kind for which it is best adapted, it is well that that information should be carefully, thoroughly and reliably compiled, so that immigrants might know it. I have no doubt it will be found to possess vast mineral resources, equal to those discovered in North Ontario. I have no doubt it is rich also in timber, fish, and other natural resources. However, I agree with what the hon. Secretary of State has said that it is now too late in the session to take up this important question. Parliament may prorogue in five or six weeks, or perhaps sooner, and if so there will not be time enough to make a successful investigation this session. However, the discussion which has taken place to-night and the information furnished and the reference to the report of 1887 will justify us in taking prompt action at the next meeting of parliament, and appointing a committee to investigate the resources of our northern territories and collecting information of a reliable character to be distributed throughout the civilized world. It is desirable in view of the enormous influx of population that the world should know that we possess other lands capable of being cultivated besides those already known; that we have unoccupied fields almost without limit, and that we are prepared to comfortably settle all the surplus population that may come to us for many years in the future. We certainly must have a vast area, because it must be remembered that Canada possesses 40 acres out of every hundred of the entire empire. We possess an extensive and valuable territory, and we have only touched the crust of it. It is well that we should go on, and gain a knowledge of what is yet to be opened up in order that it may be made known to the world that we have homes to offer for all who come.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If the House will allow me we will have this matter between my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie settled. I have before me the Senate debates of 1903, and if my hon. friend will turn to page 1500 he will find these words quoted by myself on that occasion—a very long quotation from Sir Sandford Fleming—which my hon. friend will see entirely sustains what I said about a route for the Grand Trunk Pacific north of Lake Winnipeg. He says:

> The rich prairies of the Dominion are in the heart of the continent. They may be said to be bounded on the east by Lake Winnipeg. The illimitable grain region of central Canada practically extends from that lake to the foothills of the Rocky Mountains, and from the international boundary away north to an undefined line of 400 miles or more distant. It embraces the greater part of the four provinces of Manitoba, Assiniboia, Saskatchewan and Alberta, to which may be added the western portion of Athabasca. This immense territory, now being rapidly occupied by settlers, is so situated that it can be reached from the east by two possible routes. One passes to the south of Lake Winnipeg, the other to the north. These may be regarded as the only two avenues open to Canadian railway service between the great west and the Atlantic seaboard. If we look forward but a few years, we must see that both routes are of great, perhaps equal importance, and that there are two gateways through which the products of the prairies must pass on their way to the east.

Then turning to page 13 he further discusses the same point. He says:

> There is one point which appears to a large extent to have escaped the attention of parliament. If we look forward a few years we may anticipate great changes. The inhabitants of the great prairie region will not remain centred in Manitoba. While we are aware that the fertility of the country around Winnipeg, the Red river valley, cannot be surpassed, we must at the same time recognize that the area of the fertile plains of the whole province of Manitoba is only about one-eighth of the vast fertile region of the Northwest. If we add to Manitoba, Assiniboia and every acre directly west of Assiniboia to the Rocky Mountains, we have but the southern and much the smaller half of the prairie and the habitable region. This southern half is already fairly served by railways. It has the Canadian Pacific throughout its whole length. It has the Canadian Northern from Lake Superior. It has the Northern Pacific from the United States, and many branches for these lines. It is not the southern half, so much as the northern and by far the larger and generally more cultivable half of the prairie region, which is in need of new railways. The southern half has the advantage of three great lines to collect and transport its products to market. Should not the people of the northern and more improtant half of the fertile plains be provided with one trunk line direct to the seaboard, instead of being obliged to use the longer route by way of Winnipeg?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—In what year did Sir Sandford Fleming make that report?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Oct. 5th, 1903, and it was before every hon. gentleman in this House when we were discussing the question in 1903. Sir Sandford Fleming's proposition was that the better way to carry that railway was north of Lake Winnipeg, and thence westward to the Peace river or some other northern pass.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I have been interested in Manitoba some 30 years, and I know the route laid out by Sir Sandford Fleming. It was by way of Selkirk, crossing Lake Manitoba at the narrows and proceeding west by Battleford and Edmonton, to the Yellow Head pass. That was the route laid out and recommended by Sir Sandford Fleming for the government railway and approved by the Liberal party. With reference to the Grand Trunk Pacific route at the present time, for the first hundred miles west of Portage la Prairie, the route lies in close proximity to the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern. After that it is practically a colonization road through to the Pacific. It passes about midway between the Canadian Pacific Railway and Canadian Northern to Battleford and Edmonton. One of the most important questions to be considered in the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific was the question of grades, and a route has been secured with grades of five-tenths of one per cent going west and four-tenths of one per cent coming east. Those who had been concerned in the construction of the older road through that country said such grades could not be secured, but as a matter of fact the Grand Trunk Pacific has secured such grades as far west as Edmonton. The Canadian Pacific Railway was built with good judgment through the country at the time it was constructed. At that time the success of the enterprise was somewhat problematical. It was not known that you could grow wheat in Manitoba or the Northwest Territories, but the richness of that country having been established, the Grand Trunk Pacific Company are endeavoring to secure the best possible grades. There is no doubt about the character of the country referred to by the hon. senator from Belleville as lying south of the Canadian Pacific Railway. At one time it was considered a desert, fit for nothing but grazing, but it has been demonstrated that it is capable of producing wheat of the very finest quality, 40 or 50 bushels to the acre. The early settlers of Saskatchewan and Alberta had no idea what that country would produce, but time and experience have demonstrated its capabilities. I have no hesitation in saying that at no time did Sir Sandford Fleming or the people of Canada consider seriously the construction of a road north of Lake Winnipeg, because while we say our country is good we have to admit that some portions of it are bad, and I do not think that any person in Manitoba or the Northwest Territories to-day believes that a railroad could be built through northern Manitoba or Keewatin Territory north of Lake Winnipeg with any idea of settlement, because that is not a country which any person claims is a wheat growing country or a country attractive to settlers. The result is that Sir Sanford Fleming recommended the crossing of the Red River at Selkirk, and proceeding in a northwest direction, crossing Lake Manitoba at the narrows. The Grand Trunk Pacific Company have diverged from that location so far as crossing the narrows of Lake Manitoba, but they have located a line by the route I have described, all the way to Edmonton, and further on. They have not decided what pass they will adopt through the Rocky Mountains. They are making surveys and no one can tell whether the Pine, the Peace, the Yellow Head, or some other pass will be adopted. No fault is found with the route selected through Manitoba, Alberta or Saskatchewan by the people of those provinces. I do not know why this question should come up on this particular motion, but it has come up, and I have seen fit to give my views upon it. With regard to the appointment of a committee to make a report on the resources of that country described in the motion, I have no doubt that valuable information can be secured, but I doubt if, at this stage of the session, it would be possible to get people here who are in a position to give us the information desired. The hon. gentleman from Prince Albert ought to be complimented on his zeal in wishing to collect information about the northern country in which he is so deeply interested, but unless we are to sit here all summer it would be impossible to get information concerning that vast region which would be of benefit to the people of Canada. Consequently I must agree with the leader of the House who suggests that this matter might be taken up early next session and a valuable report placed before the country.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—I scarcely feel able to agree with the last speaker from the west, and I am surprised at the stand he has taken on this matter. I am one of those Canadians who like to see every part of this country developed if not simultaneously at least as fast as possible, and I do not believe in putting off till to-morrow what should be done to-day, no matter what anybody thinks about it. My hon. friend from Prince Albert has asked this honourable House to accord him a select committee to examine into certain things which are of interest to his part of the country and, therefore, to my part of the country. As I go to Quebec on Saturday night to tell the people of Quebec, I wish them all God speed in developing their port, so do I wish my hon. friend from Alberta God speed in developing that part of the country, and I think there should be no hesitation in this House, or in any branch of parliament, to investigate the conditions which are necessary to develop the prosperity and progress of this Dominion. The hon. gentleman is simply asking for a select committee to investigate into these conditions, and I am prepared to stand by him. I was very sorry to hear the hon. gentleman from Manitoba state that he could afford to wait. This country cannot afford to wait. Whether this session lasts one month two months or three months longer, the hon. senator from Alberta is entitled to have his committee in order to get information that will be of advantage to this country. It is not proper for any hon. senator from the east or the west to say that the session is too far advanced, that it is too late to do the work. It is never too late. For that reason I am prepared to stand by the motion of the hon. senator from Alberta in asking for the committee.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Just a few words on this subject. I think we ought to be practical before we are sentimental in a matter of this kind. I take it that a report like that of the Schultz Committee is not for the people of Canada, but for people outside of Canada, in England and in Europe.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Who are they ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The people of the world outside of Canada, because you want to get those men into this country to invest their money and occupy our lands. I do not suppose there are five men in England who have seen that report or who know anything from that report about the great Northwest country. The proper thing to do is to disseminate those reports, send them broadcast over Europe, where they can be seen. What is the use of them here? They are perfectly useless. If the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert to-morrow had his report, it would be just pigeonholed and who would see it ? No one. We know a great deal about the Northwest country now, and there are millions of acres ready for people to occupy. The best report we could send to Europe is the products of our country, our wheat and our cattle, our cheese and our butter. These are what will open the eyes of Europe, and not the reports. The people would then see a practical illustration before them of what the country can produce, and what is bringing the people to this country to-day are those products of the soil, not any report that my hon. friend will bring in. I am not opposing that inquiry being made, but I know that the people of this country now have all the information of unsettled lands that will be open for settlement for years and years. The House, I think, is entirely out of order in discussing railway routes, on this motion, but we will forget all that. We have been out of order all session, members speaking a dozen times, which is against the proper conduct of business, and if every one is to speak a dozen times where will the House be ? I hope members will see that that order is kept in the House and not speak as frequently as they do.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am sure my hon. friend from Prince Albert, who moved this resolution, will feel highly gratified at the very wide range this discussion has taken, all the way from the important visit which my hon. friend from Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran) proposes to pay to the port of Quebec next Saturday, up to the discussion of the Sandford Fleming route shortly after confederation, and the subsequent location of the present route of the Canadian National Trans-Atlantic Railway, better known as the Grand Trunk Pacific. Now, if, in the preliminary stages of the discussion of a resolution of this nature, such wide territory can be so readily traversed as has been done to-night, I am very apprehensive as to what the scope of this investigation will be if entered upon during the present session. I must confess to a little impatience towards getting to my home at mid-summer at least, but if we start a very enterprising gentleman like my hon. friend from Prince Albert upon an investigation of this kind, almost at the approach of the dog days, I feel satisfied that this session will merge itself into the proposed November session, and I should be very sorry that it should have a result of that character. I was very much pleased at the way my hon. friend presented his resolution to the House, and equally gratified at the probable results that his proposed investigation will have. Those of us who come from the west cannot fail to be deeply interested in any investigation which may take place as to the resources of the magnificent heritage which belongs to all of us, but which we are more closely in contact with, than those who come from the eastern provinces. But I was somewhat disappointed that my hon. friend did not enter more largely, or in more detail, into the scope of the examination which he proposed to make. As my hon. friend is the mover of this resolution, I apprehend that the scope of examination will largely be determined by him, and it certainly would have been gratifying to the House if that scope had been outlined in greater detail so that we might be able to more intelligently discuss the desirability of entering upon it during the present session. One thing is certain, and that is to have an adequate examination into the resources of the country will involve considerable expenditure. That, of course, should be an insignificant matter in comparison with the very important results which are to be derived from the examination, but I have my eye upon the leader of the government at the present moment and I did rather infer from what he said, that such an appropriation would not be forthcoming at the present session were we to enter upon it. I therefore hope that the suggestion will be accepted by my hon. friend from Prince Albert that this investigation should not be entered upon during the present session, but that an outline should be determined upon by himself as to the scope which it would take, and that we should enter with energy and enthusiasm upon the investigation next session. I think the suggestion made by the hon. leader of the government in the House is a desirable one and it certainly should be adopted by the mover of the resolution.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—As the seconder of the motion of my hon. friend from Prince Albert I have a very few words to say, but if there ever was a reason why a committee should be appointed, it is shown by the wide range and various foreign subjects that have been taken into consideration by the speakers on this occasion. I, of course, sympathize very strongly with my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. I hope he may not be delayed here all summer. I hope he may have an opportunity of visiting those green fields of the Northwest, and if our committee had the opportunity of holding a session perhaps they would be enabled to give him some satisfaction and information in reference to those lands, but I may say to my hon. friend who moved this resolution that he is in a serious dilemma. The hon. leader of the House is opposed to his resolution being adopted, and the hon. leader of the opposition endorses the view expressed by the hon. leader of the government; he therefore must exercise patience, forebearance and hope. Perhaps at the coming session it will be hope deferred, poor satisfaction to him, but yet we may claim to have a hope that this committee will be granted to us. Now is there any necessity for this committee? Is there any necessity for the House to know where the Grand Trunk Pacific road is going to run? The discussion to-night has been entirely whether it was right and proper—the ex-leader of the opposition sounded that note—whether it was right and proper to know where the transcontinental road should run. If we had all the information we desire—if we had an opportunity of examining witnesses and had this committee appointed early so that the information could be handed down, the ex-leader of the opposition would not be in the difficult position of not knowing what the motive or the object of this inquiry is and what is the nature of the country through which the railway is to be constructed. We all fully concur that it is very important that we should know full well what our inheritance in the Northwest is. We all feel grateful that we have such a territory. We know that other committees have been appointed and investigations held, and perhaps had it not been for the committee appointed in another House we would not have known that we have New Ontario, which is developing a source of much wealth to the province. Therefore, I may say to the leader of the House that if he would only feel satisfied to remain here a little longer we would do our utmost to expedite the work of this committee, and get it through as rapidly as possible. I may say again that I fear the chances of realizing the object of the resolution which my hon. friend moved so ably are very poor. We require that information. Every member of this House must admit that that information would be of great utility. I therefore am in favour of the committee being appointed—we need not occupy a very long time—and get all information we can, and at another session of parliament, with the promise of the leader of the House, with the hopes that he has created in reference to this matter, we may resume with renewed energy and obtain all the information possible in reference to this territory. I therefore would feel grateful if the House will grant us our committee.

Hon. Mr. KERR, (Cobourg)—As an enthusiastic supporter of the motion now before the House, I desire to offer a few observations. It occurred to me while the hon. gentleman was giving us so full and interesting an account of that western territory that the motion was not premature, but rather fifty or one hundred years late in coming. According to my view that country of which he speaks has been kept hermetically sealed from the people of Canada for the last hundred years, and I think the fullness of time has now come when we should know where it is and what it is. I am greatly pleased that the information given by the hon. gentleman who has made this motion corroborates to the fullest extent the information which I received not more than six months ago from an intelligent gentleman, one who knows whereof he spoke. His statement to me was that the Peace River country will some day—and he thinks the sooner the better—become a grand revelation to the people of Canada. He says the quantity and quality of the arable land in that country will be a surprise to the people of Canada when the facts are made known. He also spoke of the grain that could be raised there, saying that as good wheat could be raised, nay, has already been raised, in the Peace river country as in any other part of the Dominion. The information I have corroborates to the full what the hon. gentleman has said of the waters in that region of the Dominion, teeming with valuable fish, and he spoke particularly and enthusiastically about the wealth of the fisheries in the Hudson bay. He says neither the people of Canada nor those of the United States have any idea of the value of the fish with which the waters of the Hudson bay are stocked; and this man knew all about it. I may say that he was a superintending engineer engaged in the construction of the American Soo canal, he had also to do with the originating and success of the elevated railways in New York. Although a native of the United States, he has spent most of his life in and about Canada; and his statements so filled my imagination with the greatness and grandeur of our Peace river country, that I was delighted when I saw this motion on the paper. My informant said that if that territory was south of the international boundary it would be developed in a very short time, and all would be known about it. He said: 'You Canadians are too slow in your movements.' I believe that. But perhaps there is a wise Providence in it. Perhaps Providence has kept that part of the Dominion sealed for some wise purpose and now when immigration is setting in from the old world, especially from Great Britain and Ireland, and from parts of the United States, it is now the fulness of time when that country is to be settled. Let us get this information, and let us get it as speedily as possible. I never hear the word 'delay' used without becoming impatient, someone has said, and I think there is a great truth in the adage that art is long, but time is fleeting. The report which was quoted from by the Secretary of State is a very valuable one, but it would have been much more valuable if the information furnished there had been spread broadcast over Great Britain and the continent of Europe, and if there is another inquiry such as this motion contemplates, I hope the information elicited will not be locked up in the Parliamentary Library; I hope the people of the United States and Great Britain will be deluged with it. The trouble with Canada is that we do not advertise ourselves. People do not know half enough about this country, but the signs of the times seem to indicate that they soon will know more about it; and this report will help to bring about that consummation. I know it will cost something, but the expense should not cause us to hesitate one moment. It is a mere bagatelle compared with the great value it will be to this Dominion and to the human race to know that they can find homes in that western world, hitherto supposed to be inhospitable, where they can work out their social regeneration as they could never do in any of the older parts of the globe. Let us have this committee; it may not be convenient to have it this session. I do not understand that my hon. friend who made the motion is anxious to have it this session; but I see from the remarks of the hon. Secretary of State that he is rather inclined to encourage the idea of postponing it until next session. Let us have this committee and after we have got the information let us make the best possible use of it, and send it broadcast all over the world, not 'burying it in a napkin' as was the case with that other report. I had forgotten about that report, although, I do recollect that the committee sat; but I think a great deal more use could have been made of its contents. If I had a dozen votes I would give them all for this motion, and let the world know that the half about this great Dominion of Canada, and especially about that great western section has not yet been known, but let it be known soon.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am sure that I am pleased at the wide scope which this discussion has taken in connection with the resolution. I am also pleased with the support which the resolution has received from the House. I am sorry that the leader of the House has seen fit to ask to have the committee delayed for another year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It will only be for six months—the House meets in November.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Because like my hon. friend who spoke last I am not in favour of delay. However, as my hon. friend the leader of opposition, seems to have joined with the leader of the House in this request, I am placed in a very peculiar position. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition appears to be anxious to get home to the green fields and running brooks; but I want to tell him that his friends in the other House are apparently not as anxious to get home as he is, and we have to stay here until such time as these gentlemen see fit to let us go home. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition says that I did not explain the scope of this committee. If he will read the resolution I think he will be able to come to a conclusion as to what I am asking for. However, this is a very large territory something of 1,000 miles. by 600 or 700 miles deep, perhaps 1,000 miles deep; and the resolution extends farther than that, because we run down to the shore of Hudson bay and the Arctic ocean. We want to investigate the extent of sea coast we have, and the mileage of navigable streams in that country. We want to find out the acerage of arable land fit for growing wheat, and the amount of land fit for raising hay and for the raising of cattle, and also the extent of and quality of minerals contained in that great area. We want also to find out the amount of timber we have in that country, and we want to find out the wealth which the people of Canada have in the fisheries, not only throughout the inland waters of Northern Saskatchewan and Alberta, but also in the Hudson bay. Now my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, is aware of the fact that an agitation is going on all through that western country for the construction of the Hudson Bay road, so that we may have the products of the southern portion of that country, the wheat and the cattle and so on which we produce, sent by the shortest route to the markets of the world. I think my hon. friend will agree with me that if we had investigated the resources of that northern country, through which a portion of this Hudson Bay road is going to run, it would be much easier for us to have the road financed. We hear of parties coming here and asking for subsidies for railways. Now that this country has been opened up and developed to a certain extent, other gentlemen are saying that they will build railways without subsidies. Perhaps if this investigation had been completed, if we could show the vast resources of iron, copper, gold, petroleum, &c., which exist on both sides of the proposed Hudson bay road, it would be very easy for any railway corporation to finance a scheme of that kind. Therefore, I say that it would be a good thing for us to investigate this region as quickly as possible. I am very much pleased that my hon. friend the ex-leader of the opposition has to a certain extent approved of this proposition. He has perhaps a greater knowledge of that western country than a great many others who are sitting in this House. While he was Prime Minister he paid us a visit, and travelled by wagon throughout the whole country from the foot of the Rocky Mountains to Manitoba. He made it his business to become acquainted with the country, and he knows whereof he speaks; and that is the reason I suppose, why he approves of this proposition. I want to say to my hon. friend the leader of the House that if he will turn to the report of the Schultz committee of 1888 he will find that a series of questions were prepared by the committee and sent out to parties all over the country. These parties sent their answers in and it did not necessitate the expense of bringing witnesses to be examined before the committee. I think that if we were to appoint the committee this year, and get it thoroughly organized and prepare a list of questions such as we have in this book which I hold in my hand, and send them out to people in all parts of the northern country, people from whom we want information, there would be ample time between now and next November, when this House is to meet again, as the leader of the House has just told us, to obtain a great deal of this information, without it costing the people of this country one cent. We may be here until the middle of July. It is true that we are going to have an adjournment in a few days, but I hope we will be back again to our labours in the course of ten or twelve days. If we could have this committee appointed, get it organized, and in shape to allow it to go to work and prepare a list of questions, that would not necessitate any expense, or at least very little. If the questions were sent out now, then next autumn, when the House meets, the answers would be here and we could proceed with the investigation. I find on going over the report of the Schultz committee, of 1887-8, that the list of questions which was sent out was very full. It says here:

> Your committee determined at the outset that the best means of systematically collecting information upon the subject of their investigation would be to frame a list of questions indicating the nature of the inquiries to be made by the committee. This was accordingly done, and copies of this list, which is hereto appended, were sent to such senators, members of parliament, clergymen, government officials, officers of the Hudson's Bay Company, leading business men and others, as from residence, travel in or other acquaintance with the Northwest would be the best qualified to furnish information. In each case a written reply was requested to the question or those of them with the subjects of which the recipient might be most familiar. In this manner much very valuable information was collected. The reply was received up to the date of this report are appended hereto, and doubtless a number of them will yet be forthcoming.

In the back of the report a number of these replies are to be found. The questions sent out are arranged in such a way that the committee practically got all the information that was necessary without having the witnesses here in person. For instance, they were asked what area of agricultural land fit for the growing of wheat was to be found in the locality in which the person lived. They were asked the area of land which was fit for the raising of cattle, or for the production of the wild hay which we have in the west, the amount of timber, the minerals if any, and the extent of the fisheries. All these questions were asked, and, when the answers were gone over, a great deal of reliable information was obtained. Hon. gentlemen in the House have complained that they never saw this report, and hardly knew that it was in existence. I suppose hon. gentlemen coming into the House since 1888 have not had the same opportunity because I read it at the time. I remember quite well at the time that committee sat, three or four leading citizens of my town were asked to come down here and give information. Mr. McKay, mentioned by the leader of the House, was one of them, and there were some other gentlemen who were well qualified to give information with reference to the country, Hudson Bay officers who had lived in the country all their lives. Men who had travelled from one end of it to the other, who had been living there, and had raised vegetables in their gardens and were thus able to give valuable information. We got that information at the time, and I expect we will get more valuable information at the present time. We know what happened in the Yukon. When the Yukon was first opened up every one thought that nothing could be grown there. People told me that if you were to scrape the moss off the ground three inches in depth you would find nothing but ice and frozen ground. To-day they are raising vegetables—I have seen them at exhibitions,—and they are raising grain as well. That is what settlement and investigation will do, and I think if we are to fully inquire into the resources of that northern country, there is wealth enough in the northern portion of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta and Mackenzie district, to pay off the national debt of the country ten times over. If that is the case, it is nothing but right that we should establish the fact and let the investing public all over the world know what we have. If the House grants the committee, I should not propose to have the report pigeon-holed. I would not for one moment entertain any proposition of that kind. Such a report would be the very best immigration literature you could have. Is there anything better in the world to send out to immigration officers than a report which goes to show that we have any amount of mineral wealth, petroleum, gold mines, silver, copper—all the different things that I know we have in that northern country—vast forests and rich fisheries. That would make the very best immigration literature we could have, and it would be easy to send it out through the Immigration Department. If the committee found, after gathering all the information possible, that they had not sufficient details as far as the mineral wealth of the country was concerned, that they had not been able through the Geological Survey and from the testimony of the officers of the department who have visited that part of the country, and of prospectors and others, to obtain the information they require, then I would suggest that the committee in their report should ask the government to send out competent men to ascertain exactly what we have—something in the same way as the government of Ontario did some years ago ; and then we would be able to place that report, signed by men whose names would be taken as reliable—in the hands of capitalists all over the world. I think we would find then that there would be no trouble in developing the mineral wealth of this country. We have it there, all we need is the capital to develop it. That country will shortly be opened up by railways. We have projected lines all over the country. We have the charters for the roads, we have not the roads yet, but we expect to have them soon. It would be easier to build the roads if the people holding the charters were in a position to show those who have money to invest that the building of the railway would be a profitable proposition, and that the interest on the bonds would be paid and that the road would pay from the start. I am sorry that the leader of the House has seen fit to ask me to have this matter stand over until next session. I would ask him to reconsider the proposition which I have made with reference to getting the committee organized. We need not incur any expense. If the committee were organized and we were to send out questions such as were sent out at the time of the Schultz Committee, I am sure we would get a lot of work done in that way and it would cut down the expense a good deal in the way of bringing witnesses before the committee at the present time. I should like to hear what the leader of the House has to say. If he insists of course, I must bow to his decision.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The most valuable testimony which was given before the Schultz Committee was viva voce. Gentlemen were summoned here and gave evidence under examination by members of the committee. I can see no advantage whatever in forming the committee now. It would necessarily involve some expense and there is no appropriation for it. There are no contingencies of the Senate to which it could be charged, and the supplementary estimates both for the current year and for the coming year have been brought down. I do not think my colleagues would approve of any proposition that another estimate should be presented to the House of Commons for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the investigation. I should therefore prefer that my hon. friend would drop the matter for the present, and I should be glad to favour it at the coming session. The House will meet in November, probably in the early part of the month, and, therefore, it is only six months away.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If that committee is named in November next the same difficulty will arise about the appropriation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the estimate is not brought down now, when will the money be provided ? There will be none.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—That is one of the difficulties I fancy. I am glad that the leader of the House has seen fit to look favourably upon this proposition and say he will support it at the coming session. The people of the western country feel that this is a very important matter, not only from the standpoint of having an investigation into the mineral wealth of the district, but also to counteract the influence of the Macoun report on the Peace River. I withdraw the motion.

THE STRIKE AT SYDNEY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. Whether the Sydney 17th field battery and its officers have been paid for their services in preserving order during 'the strike' at the steel works in 1905 at Sydney ?
2. To whom was the money paid, who disbursed it ?
3. Was any amount of it retained pending any difficulties ?
4. Have those difficulties been settled, and in what way ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—

1. Yes.

2. $865.29 was paid to Major W. Crowe, and $58.80 was paid to Surgeon-Major T. P. O'Neill.

3 and 4. No, not so far as known in the Department of Militia and Defence.

VACANCY ON THE SUPREME COURT BENCH.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the hon. leader of the House if he has any information concerning the cases from the province of Quebec coming up in the Supreme Court. If any arrangements have been made.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not that I have heard.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Nothing has been done ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not unless the Minister of Justice has made an arrangement.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The Minister of Justice is not ready yet.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He has not advised me at all events.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understood the hon. Secretary of State to inform the House the other night that he would make inquiry as to whether there were any cases that required the immediate attention of the court, and if it were necessary to have an extra judge from the province of Quebec. So far as the hon. member from Stadacona is concerned, I think he is very cruel to torment the hon. Secretary of State as he is doing. He should know at least, if rumour be correct, that the government are saving the plum until after the prorogation of parliament in order that they may not be obliged to appoint another Minister of Justice. It is important that the present Minister of Justice should remain in the House of Commons until the end of the session, and I would suggest to my hon. friend not continue inflicting cruelty on the Secretary of State by asking him questions to which the hon. gentleman must know he cannot get a reply.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONSIDERED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Consideration of the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (B) An Act further to amend the Canada Evidence Act, 1903.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When this Bill came up the other day from the House of Commons, hon. gentlemen found some difficulty in applying the supposed changes that were endorsed on the original blue print, with the Bill as it existed before it went down to the Commons. I explained then that an error had been committed in the law clerk's office of the House of Commons, because the endorsations did not give the conclusions reached by the House of Commons, and therefore it was thought better to postpone the Bill, and I requested Mr. Power of the Department of Justice to see the law clerk and have the Bill properly prepared to come before the Senate. That has now been done. The first change in the Bill made by the House of Commons is in subsection 2 of section 4. As it read when it left here, it provided that 'the failure of a person charged, or of the wife or husband, or such person to testify, shall not be made the subject of comment by the judge or by counsel for the prosecution in addressing the jury.' The attention of Justice Osler was called to this paragraph, and he remarked, very properly, that not alone when addressing the jury should counsel abstain entirely from making any comment on the fact of the person not testifying, but all through the conduct of the case the counsel should be silent on that subject, and therefore wrote the words 'in addressing the jury' are struck out. I move the adoption of the amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We will have to take some course in order to correct our minutes. The amendments now proposed by the hon. Secretary of State are not the amendments which are reported as made by the House of Commons to the Senate, nor are they as they appear upon our minutes. The amendments made in the Bill introduced in this House in reference to evidence, as amended by the House of Commons, read as follows:

Page 1, line 16.—Leave out all after 'prosecution' and insert 'subject to the provisions of subsection 1 of this Act.'

Page 1, line 20.—Leave out from 'Act' to 'witness' and insert 'shall be a competent and also a compellable.'

Now, the amendment moved by my hon. friend is to strike out simply the words 'in addressing the jury.' The next amendment which he proposes is not at all in accord with the Bill as amended by the House of Commons. The third paragraph as amended by the Commons reads as follows:

'The wife or husband of the person charged with an offence against any section of the Criminal Code of 1892, mentioned in schedule 'C' of this Act shall be a competent witness and also a compellable witness.' The word 'either' is struck out, and the words 'defence and,' are struck out. Now the proposition is, without any further reference from the House of Commons to the Senate, to amend in the manner proposed by the hon. gentleman. The amendments may have the same effect, but they are not the amendments contained in the message from the House of Commons. If we adopt them, on what principle do we adopt them? We have a Bill passed by this House and sent to the House of Commons, amended there, and returned to us for acceptance or rejection of the amendments. instead of accepting or rejecting the amendments, the hon. Secretary of State asks us to amend the Bill in another direction altogether. It seems to me that the reference should be withdrawn by the House of Commons and a new reference sent to the Senate, or in order to keep our record right we should reject the amendments made by the House of Commons and amend the Bill in the direction desired. There is another blunder here that we are asked to amend. It says 'subject to the provisions of said subsection of this Act.' Now, I am informed that was not the intention. The intention was to use the words 'section of this Act'; that is what it is desired to amend and not the Act itself. It refers exclusively to the section, and the law clerk of the House of Commons informs me that the word 'Act' should be struck out and the word 'section' inserted therein. What right has the law clerk, or any clerk, to change the wording of an Act, in any particular, as it comes from the Commons? It is a material change to strike out the word 'Act' and substitute the word 'section' therefor. It cannot be considered a clerical error. Either the Commons did not know what they were doing, when they inserted the word "Act' instead of 'section,' or they intended it to apply to the whole Act, and not to the section. It is clear enough to my mind, if the suggestion made by the hon. Secretary of State is to be carried out, that he must adopt some plan by which the records can be placed right; otherwise we shall have upon the records amendments made to a Bill diametrically opposed to the amendments made by the Commons with which we are asked to concur.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am sorry I did not make myself understood. I tried the experiment the other day and failed then also. What I said was that the endorsation on the Bill was not the result of the decision of the House of Commons; that it was a blunder of the law clerk after the Bill had left the Commons chamber in preparing the endorsement for the Senate, and I called the attention of the Senate to it. However, it was very difficult then to understand. I said I would have that rectified, and so I instructed Mr. Power, who is familiar with the Bill and he probably had drawn it in the first instance, to see the law clerk and point out his mistake. He did not endorse what the House of Commons decided. I gave to the Senate at that time, as I give now, the conclusion the House of Commons reached, and Mr. Power, at my suggestion, took the Bill back to the law clerk and made him correct it to agree with the decision of the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There has been no message from the Commons nor anything to indicate that that was the case. How are you going to get rid of the records of the House?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The records of the House of Commons are correct.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But our own records?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We can change that in conformity with the correct statement. This is not the endorsement that came up the other day. Mr. Power went to the law clerk and showed him where the mistake was. The law clerk is ill, and the gentleman acting is not as familiar with the mode in which those endorsements are made, and he muddled it. The endorsement, as I have read it, is correct. He put in the wrong numbers of the lines. It was carelessly corrected.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is perfectly obvious there is no question about that, but it does not come to us in a regular way. We received a message and that message has been entered upon the journals of our House, and now we are receiving what every hon. gentleman sees are the correct amendments, but they are coming to us irregularly. How are we going to have the message and the journals corrected? We will perpetuate an error there which is very serious.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Could we not, by general consent, strike out the whole of the motion which appears on the minutes of the former sitting?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The message must be corrected.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been corrected.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But it does not come to us from the Chair?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, because it did not come to us from the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We cannot receive a message from an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The House directed their messenger to send the message to us as it is now before us. He made a mistake and didn't send it up that way. The practical way to correct it was not to reopen the matter in the House. It was correct on their records and proceedings. The only way was to call the attention of the clerk who made the blunder and ask him to make the endorsation conform to the conclusion of the House. He did so, and we have it now in the proper form. Surely it is a matter of common sense to enter on our records the correct amendments. They were obviously incorrect before. Then also the lines were not properly quoted in two instances; '20' appeared for '21' and '19' for '20.'

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think we had a case last year analogous to this, and our clerk was directed to confer with the clerk of the Commons and correct the message. I think we should do that now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I thought the proper way was to call the attention of the clerk to it as I have done, and have it amended. There was no reason to call the attention of the House of Commons to it. It was simply to carry out the will of the House of Commons that we had to adopt the plan I suggested, which was the only way to do it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The whole proceeding is irregular and it is very questionable whether it is the fault of the law clerk. If the hon. gentleman had looked at the Bill as it came amended from the committee and seen where the mark was put for the amendments to be made, he would not be so ready to condemn the clerks. If there was any one to blame for placing the amendments in the wrong place it was the clerk of the House of Commons rather than the law clerk. I have examined the Bill, and I know that taking it in my own hands as that clerk did I would put it in just where it is marked in the original Bill as it came to us. Now, apart from that, there is a serious change made in the amendment which the hon. Secretary of State asks us to acquiesce in. In the first place the argument when the Bill was before the Senate was that the wife and the husband should not be made compellable witnesses for the prosecution. Why should the wife or husband of a prisoner be made a compellable witness for the prosecution and not for the defence ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to ask why the wife should be a competent or compellable witness for the defence as well as the prosecution?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Subsection four provides that the wife or husband shall be a competent witness for the defence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But the amendment in the third section makes such person a compellable witness.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The clause provides that, subject to the provision in the former section, the wife or husband shall be a competent or compellable witness.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The House of Commons has disposed of this matter and we want to carry out the will of that House ; the former record on our minutes is not the will of the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing we pass it as it is amended, then we will have both messages on our votes and proceedings, and if they are referred to hereafter what will be our position?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me the only authoritative reference is the Bill which comes from the House of Commons, and I understand that is correct?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The endorsement has nothing to do with the Bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But our proceedings will be corrected when they are put in permanent form?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes we can authorize the clerk to enter the correct minutes.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—As soon as the Bill is passed, the difficulty will be avoided by the Secretary of State moving that the minutes be corrected.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Directly contrary to the message of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. KERR—The message was wrong.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Should the amendments not be read twice before we concur in them?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You have not the amendments ; all that you have is what appears in the journal.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then I move the adoption of the first amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think that is not the proper way. Rule 23 of the Commons provides that the amendments made by the Senate to the Bills originating in the Commons shall be placed on the Orders of the Day next after the Bill is reported to the committee. Bourinot says :

> The practice in both Houses with respect to the amendments is the same. When the amendments are of an unimportant character, or there is no objection to their passage, they are generally read twice and agreed to forthwith.

But we must have the reading the same as a Bill is read. Bourinot proceeds :

But if they are important their consideration is deferred until a future day.

That is the rule. We have something of the kind in our own rules. Rule 72 reads as follows :

When any private Bill is returned from the House of Commons with amendments the same not being merely verbal or unimportant, such amendments are, previous to their second reading, referred to a committee of the whole or to a standing committee.

This is as regards a public Bill. It is not referred to a standing committee or a committee of the whole but they must be read twice.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is the second time it has been before the Senate and I explained it on the former occasion as fully as I possibly could, but I quite appreciate hon. gentlemen who took part in the discussion not understanding it, because our own minutes were misleading. Our own minutes were printed from the message received from the clerk of the House of Commons ; then when his attention was called to it, it was taken back to him and he corrected it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was corrected in one place and not in the other.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not corrected in our minutes ? If we pass the Bill now as corrected, then I should move that the entries made on that particular day in our own minutes shall be corrected by the clerk inserting the actual amendments as made by the House of Commons.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then the words in line nineteen 'May be called as a,' are struck out and the words 'Shall be a competent and also compellable witness for the prosecution without consent of the person so charged' are added. The word 'either' is struck out. I move that this amendment be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I contend that an amendment brought from the House of Commons to this House should be read twice at the table. The clerk has not given the first or second reading of the amendments.

The SPEAKER—I think the hon. gentleman is too late in raising the point. The amendments were concurred in. There is one reason why we should have proceeded differently to-day : these amendments were set down by resolutions of this House for the consideration of this House ; so that it is by the decision of the House that we have proceeded in another form.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—All right I just call attention to it.

The SPEAKER—I noticed that we had departed in the first place from what has been a rule of the Commons that has been followed here.

The motion was adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to enter my protest ; we have not adopted the amendments that were sent in the message from the Commons, but we have adopted other amendments which have been substituted by the hon. Secretary of State, as he says, at the instance of the Clerk in the Commons.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I decline to accept that charge. I have not substituted anything. I am taking the amendments as proposed by the House of Commons, and those are what we ought to take.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They are not the amendments contained in the message which came from the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The message was wrong.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That may be.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—How else would it be corrected ? You could not bring it up in the House of Commons because they would say we had passed it in such a form. There was no other way of doing it except this. I move that an entry be made on our minutes calling attention to the error at page 247, and that the amendment we have just passed be substituted for the amendments therein contained.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (P) An Act for the relief of Charles William Holmes.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

Bill (Q) An Act for the relief of Minnie Florence Irvine.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

Bill (R) An Act for the relief of Harriett Wesley Baker.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg.)

JAMIESON WEBSTER LEWIS ENFRANCHISEMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—in the absence of Mr. Young, moved the second reading of Bill (85) An Act for the enfranchisement of Jamieson Webster Lewis, an Indian of the Moravian Band of the Thames, in the province of Ontario.

He said: this is really a government measure; it has been introduced by Mr. Oliver in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understand that this Bill is to give an Indian his civil rights, not political rights.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Owing to an omission by the Indian agent, the application could not be made under the Indian Act, and, therefore, it is necessary to have special legislation. In 1899 this Indian made application to be enfranchised, but on account of some irregularity in connection with the application at that time, he was not enfranchised. He has now made application, and the Minister of the Interior has introduced this Bill for the purpose of enabling him to hold property.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I do not know whether that explanation is quite sufficient. This Bill interferes with the Ontario Franchise Act and with the rules upon which we hold our elections.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The Indian Act provides that an Indian can be enfranchised and qualified to hold property in his own right if the wishes to withdraw from the reserve. This Indian applied in 1899, but there was something irregular about the application at that time, and this Bill is introduced to allow the Indian to hold property the same as a white man. He is withdrawing from the band and from the treaty. He is not enfranchised to be an elector, but in order to enable him to hold property the same as a white man.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—An enfranchised Indian has the right to vote. If he has the right to hold property in his own right, he has the right to come to the poll and vote. In enfranchising this indian you are nullifying the Act of the province of Ontario controlling the franchise. You are assuming the control of the voting powers of these indians.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It is true that a man who holds property is entitled to vote, at the same time this Bill does not provide for that at all. It simply provides that this Indian shall have the right to hold property in his own name.

Hon Mr. LOUGHEED—The Indian Act promits him to obtain these rights, but owing to an omission, he cannot avail himself of the provisions of that Act.

The motion was agreed to.

UNORGANIZED TERRITORIES GAME PRESERVATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (154) An Act to amend the unorganized Territories Game Preservation Act, 1894.

He said: In the year 1894 an Act was passed, making it unlawful to kill buffalo for a period up till 1900. In 1899 that period was extended for two years longer. In 1902 it was extended up to the 1st January, 1907. This Bill professes to extend it to 1912, to prevent the killing of buffalo till that time. There are very few of them left I believe.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow afternoon at three o'clock.

SCHOMBERG AND AURORA RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière), from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (102) An Act respecting the Schomberg and Aurora Railway Company with one amendment. He said: The amendment consists in adding subsection (c) to clause 2, and it reads as follows:—

A branch or extension of this railway from a point at or near Bond lake along the shores of Cook's bay and Lake Simcoe to Fig Bay Point and to Barrie and to Sutton.

This amendment was accepted by the promoters of the Bill and would have been incorporated in the Bill in the other House but by some mistake it was omitted. It was unanimously adopted in the Railway Committee this morning. I move concurrence in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to .

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (S) An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, as respects lotteries.—(Hon. Mr. Ellis.)

TIME LIMIT FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

REPORT OF STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Standing Orders, presented the 14th report of the committee, recommending that the time for presenting private Bills be extended to the 5th day of June next, and also that the time limit for receiving reports from any standing or select committee on private Bills be extended to Tuesday, the 19th day of the same month, and moved that the report be now concurred in.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the report is adopted. I wish to call the attention of the House to this practice which has obtained during the past year or two of adopting a report from a committee the same day it is brought in. No one knows what it contains, and I think it should be printed in the Minutes so that every member may see what it contains. Then afterwards we would have opportunity, to adopt it, or to bring in any amendment which might be desired. As it is now, we cannot. I would ask that the consideration of the report be postponed.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The time for presenting private Bills to the Senate expires to-day, and it was thought wise, on behalf of the Standing Orders Committee, to recommend that the time for the presentation of private Bills be extended to the 5th of June and that the time for presenting the reports from Standing and Select Committees, be correspondingly extended. That is the whole extent of the report. It is a matter of routine and one which, of course, is in the judgment of the House to be rejected or not; but inasmuch as the time expires to-day I thought I would ask the leniency of the House to consider the report at once. It only contains this provision.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—With the explanation given by my hon. friend I have no objection to the report being concurred in to-day. I put it in a general way that when reports come from a committee they should be laid on the Table and printed, so that we may have ample time to see what they contain before being asked to pronounce on their merits.

The motion was agreed to.

IRREGULAR PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills presented the sixteenth report recommending the suspension of the 49th rule in so far as it relates to the petitions of the Northwest Commercial Travellers Association, the Colonial Bank of Canada, and the General Accident Insurance Company. He said: In the case of the Northwest Commercial Travellers Association, it was purely a petition relating to the domestic affairs of an association incorporated under the laws of Manitoba. The association desire to extend their operations over the whole Dominion. They were short in time of notice very little, and as they have undertaken with the committee to continue the notice until the necessary time is completed, and from the nature of the application, your committee decided to recommend the suspension of the rule. In the case of the petition of the Colonial Bank of Canada the application was late because of circumstances which have arisen very recently, making it advisable for them to seek this legislation, and inasmuch as it is one of those applications in which the public will be carefully protected by the Banking and Commerce Committee, we felt that it was in the public interest to recommend a suspension of the rule. The same thing applies to the General Accident Insurance Company. Another reason applies to these three cases which is this: these three Bills originate in the Senate and will therefore have to go the full course through both Houses yet, and your committee felt, under the circumstances, that they were justified in recommending leniency.

NORTH SYDNEY HARBOUR COMMISSION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.), moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of the North Sydney Harbour Commissioners Report for the calendar years 1897, 1899 and 1901, showing collections and disbursements of the said harbour commissioners during those years. Also correspondence, if any, respecting purchase of land for harbour commissioners' purposes, with plans of the said land and harbour.

He said : In view of the third reading of the Bill, giving power to the North Sydney Board of Harbour Commissioners, for the 5th of June next, and in view of the fact that the hon. Secretary of State was kind enough to tell us the other day that he would place the few remarks I made on that occasion before the Minister of Marine so that he might consider what should be done on the third reading of the Bill, I wish to supplement the few remarks I made then with some additional remarks today. In 1879 the Harbour Commissioners of North Sydney were incorporated, and they acted as such for 17 years until they were dismissed, about the beginning of the year 1897. During their term of office they made returns regularly as required by the Act incorporating them, every year during that time. The Act incorporating them required them to make returns to the Department of Marine on the 31st of December of every year, or as soon afterwards as possible. The old commissioners, before going out of office, made a return on December 31, 1896, which I find in the blue-book for the year 1897. They collected that year harbour dues amounting to $2,510.41. A report that is attached to the return, made by the late Henry F. Perley, dated December 31, 1895, shows what works had been done to that harbour, and that the extension of the work to deep water was about completed and would not require any further extension. At that time there was very little debt on the harbour commission of North Sydney. By the Act of 1882, amending the Act of 1879, they obtained power to borrow four thousand dollars, and in 1896, when they went out of office, they had reduced the amount of four thousand dollars to six hundred dollars. Before they went out of office on December 31, 1896, they paid off the mortgage, with the exception of six hundred dollars. The next report made by their successors is dated 1898, for the calender year 1897. It was made on January 12, which was prompt enough, according to law. Their report reads as follows :—

The harbour commissioners beg to submit herewith a report of the shipping entering the harbour during the year ending December 31, 1897. The present commissioners are responsible for the figures relating to the last month only.

That is all that they say, that they are only responsible for the last month of the year 1897. What became of the return for the other eleven months ? The old board evidently made no return as they were dismissed from office. They handed over their accounts and books to the new board when they went out and they left a balance to the credit of the Harbour Commissioners of $143.05. What has become of the collections for the eleven months of the year 1897 ? There is no return, and there is no accounting for the expenditure, and all the commissioners say is that they are only responsible for the one month of the year 1897. Even this month's receipts are not accounted for. Why ? It will be seen from that whether the commissioners have been performing their duty according to law. In the succeeding years we find the following state of things. They did not account for the collections of 1897, not a dollar, although it is presumed that they collected on the average every year about $2,800, and there was a balance of $143.05 on hand at the time the old commissioners went out of office. In 1898 there was a balance on hand of $413.20 according to the return. The returns also show that the new commissioners collected $2,762.44, leaving a balance on hand of $1,682.69 on December 31st of that year.

In 1899 they made no return at all, as far as I can ascertain. I inquired in the distribution office of the House of Commons, and also at the Department of Marine and Fisheries, as well as the parliamentary library, but was unable to find any trace of a return for those years. The return may have been made and the department may have neglected to print it. If so, the return is in manuscript and the Department of Marine will have no difficulty in furnishing a copy of it to this House. In 1900 there was a return made showing the collections to have been $2,932.07, leaving a balance on hand on December 31st of $2,680. There is no return for 1901. No account is given of the collections of that year, assumed to be a similar amount. The return for 1902, although required to be made in January of the following year, was not made until the following June. What can be the reason of that? It looks to me very suspicious that the return for the year should not have been made until five months after the proper time. According to that return there was then a balance in hand of $1,282. The collections amounted to $2,744.89. For 1903 the return was dated June 1st, 1904, five months after it should have been made, the balance on hand was $1,197.87; the collections amounted to $3,153.51. Why is it the department do not hold these harbour commissioners to making the return promptly on the 1st of January? By neglecting to do it for five months that left them time enough to expend the money or to manipulate things to suit themselves. For 1904 the return was made more promptly. It was dated February 16, 1905. The balance on hand was $1,565.80. There were dues collected $2,912.72.

Now, during all these years, no reference, whatever, in any of the reports, has been made to the mortgage on that property, and I assume that nothing was paid. Again I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that that money must have remained in the hands of the commissioners at least five or six months, because no expenditures are accounted for, speaking generally, sooner than June and July, and extending until the months of October and November. That money, therefore, in hand at the end of each year, must have remained in the hands of the commissioners for an average of at least six months in each year without producing any interest. That is a state of affairs, I think, the government should have corrected. As I said the other day, the returns that they have made show that they are taking credit to the harbour of North Sydney for all the coal shipped by the Dominion Coal Company from the Whitney pier section of Sydney harbour, also for the importations of the Dominion Coal Company of iron ore which the company bring from Waubana, Newfoundland, not a pound of which is landed at North Sydney. What motive can the commissioners have for misrepresenting the trade of the port in that manner? Now they ask parliament for authority to borrow six thousand dollars. I ask what is this six thousand dollars for? They now have authority to borrow four thousand dollars. Do they propose by this Bill to ask authority to borrow six thousand dollars more?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, the Bill is specific. That is the total amount.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—The Bill does not provide for repealing the Act of 1882, which gives them authority to borrow four thousand dollars, and until that Act of 1882 is repealed, I think it is very likely they have the power to borrow four thousand dollars under it and six thousand dollars under the legislation which they are now asking for. What is this money required for? Have they made representations to the government that more land is necessary to be acquired in connection with the works of the harbour of North Sydney? Have they estimated the value of that land? I consider that the commissioners of North Sydney harbour should not have the power to buy any more land without an investigation by an officer from the Public Works Department, and that that land should be valued by a man who is not interested in selling or in buying, or in lending money on such a property, or any harbour commissioner who may have been formerly interested in one side of the deal. It behooves the Marine Department to see that nothing improper is done in this respect. We have examples of great corporations manipulating statistics and money matters. There is the York County Loan Company, and wrongs are being exposed with regard to the management of the great insurance companies of the country. The little harbour board of North Sydney are capable perhaps of manipulating matters just as skilfully as these other corporations I have mentioned. North Sydney harbour is one of the most important harbours in the Dominion, and I look forward to the time when we may have the fast line of steamers making that harbour their terminus. The experiment which was made last year, I think, fully proves the feasibility of North Sydney becoming the terminus of the fast Atlantic service. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce stated last year in this House that mails from Sydney could be carried to Montreal well within twenty-four hours. If we only take the difference in time between going by rail from Sydney and the time which any of the fastest steamers would take to go from Sydney to Montreal, it is evident that there must be a considerable saving by rail from that port. In Sydney, last summer, during the visit of His Excellency the Governor General, I heard him say in reply to an address, that he hoped to see the mails from Europe delivered before long in the city of Ottawa at least forty hours sooner than they are now received at the capital through a foreign country.

I believe North Sydney harbour should be patronized and taken under the protection of the Dominion government as well as the harbour of the port of Montreal or of the port of Quebec. I observe that the Minister of Marine the other day introduced a resolution in the House of Commons giving power to the government to lend $150,000 to the people of Quebec for the improvement of their harbour, and it would be better I think for the Dominion government to lend five, six or ten thousand dollars to the Harbour Commissioners of North Sydney, for works required in that harbour rather than give borrowing power to the Harbour Commissioners of that port. In that case it will give the control to the Dominion government in that harbour, and their money would be perfectly safe and the commissioners of that harbour, perhaps to a large extent irresponsible men, would be relieved from any responsibility in that regard. The government would then be in a position always to see that they got their rights, and that the money was properly expended on that harbour. I move this resolution in order that the Minister of Marine may ascertain whether what I say ought to have any weight with him. If the hon. Secretary of State will permit me, I should like to include in that motion the report of the commissioners for 1905.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certainly, no objection.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—There is a further point to which I wish to call the attention of the government. I find that for the first year under the present commissioners, 1898, the salaries amounted to $1,250. In 1900 the salaries amounted to $1,373 ; in 1902, $1,475 ; in 1903, $2,032 ; in 1904, $2,020. Now, when I say salaries, I mean the harbour master, I mean the chairman of the board, the salary of the board and $50 rent for an office. I put the $50 in with the salaries, because I think the secretary of the harbour commissioners, in consideration of the salary, must furnish his own office. I submit $2,020 salary is too much out of a total average collection of about $2,800. At this rate of salary increase the whole revenue will soon be insufficient to pay salaries, and they even may have to take their salaries out of the money that they propose to borrow on the mortgage. For the three years not accounted for the average collections, according to the reports I have, is about $2,800. The three years for which there is no return, at the same average, would be three times $2,800 or over $8,400 not accounted for by any return to the Marine Department. It is very important that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should deal promptly with these men who have neglected to perform their duties under the statute.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the motion going. I shall be glad to forward my hon. friend's observations to the minister, though I question very much the wisdom of the department in appointing an official to oversee a department of that kind where the receipts are only $2,800, or averaging a little over $2,000 and the salaries amounting to $2,000. It would involve the expenditure of another $2,000, to come out of the treasury of Canada. In appointing local commissioners, the presumption was that they were men interested in the development of the place, and naturally, honest men. My hon. friend's criticisms would indicate that there might be some doubt about that. They at all events are the supreme judges of everything. I find that the statute authorizing the appointment of harbour commissioners was passed in 1882. They were appointed for North Sydney, and the Act provides that they may sue and be sued, have a common seal, hold lands, &c. Apparently they have a discretionary power. It is quite true they cannot make any purchase of land without the approval of the Governor in Council, but at the same time, their powers under the statute are very wide, and it would be asking too much of the government to appoint a special officer to visit the port at considerable expense.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Section 4 of the Act is repealed by this Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That section gives power to borrow on mortagage or other security such sums of money as shall not exceed $4,000. It appears that the amendment is for the purpose of changing that to $6,000. The two amounts would not be cumulative in any sense. The harbour is improving from what my hon. friend has stated and no doubt the larger amount is necessary. However, I will get further information from the department. The third reading is put off for some time and we will get the information in good time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have not before me the Act constituting the Harbour Commissioners for North Sydney, but if I understood my hon. friend aright this harbour board has made no report whatever to the government for the last five or six years. I presume that the Act calls for an annual report. It seems very remarkable that this board of harbour commissioners should fail to send in a report, and equally remarkable that the department should overlook it from year to year. There is no guarantee whatever that the moneys collected have been faithfully disbursed. If I understood my hon. friend aright there have been several years during which the reports of the Department of Marine and Fisheries show that no returns whatever have been made to the government by this board. If that be so, I fail to see that we have any guarantee whatever that it has been carrying on its operations in accordance with the Act.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVID moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all petitions, resolutions or documents concerning the abolition or the reorganization of the Senate.

In view of the opinions which have been expressed outside and inside of parliament in connection with the maintenance of the Senate, I have thought it proper to give hon. members of this House occasion to discuss a question which is of great importance to them and to the country. I think it is dangerous to let certain accusations and denunciations remain unanswered, and that the hon. members of this House especially should not allow certain opinions to be spread to the detriment of their own position and influence. In order to give a practical opinion on this question it is proper to go back to the origin of the Senate. There is no doubt the Senate was considered by the founders of the confederation as essential to the good working of the constitution and to the interests of the country. Mr. Clements in his work upon the British North America Act makes a summary of the reasons which were alleged at the time to justify the establishment of the Senate. I shall read only a small part of what he says:

By the fathers of our confederation, the Senate of Canada was announced as answering both purposes; as affording a check on hasty or ill-digested legislation, and also as protecting local interests and the autonomy of the provinces. The attainment of the former purpose was supposed to be made secure by the mode of appointment, the life tenure of the senators being held out as a guarantee for independence in the exercise of their legislative duties; while the equal representation, in the Senate, of each of the distinctly differentiated portions of the Dominion would make that body the guardian of 'provincial rights,' or at least, of local, as distinct from general, interests.

There is no doubt that the establishment of the Senate was accepted as one of the conditions of the federal pact, and that in several of the provinces the confederation would not have been accepted as it has been if the Senate had not been constituted and organized as it was. In several provinces, especially the province of Quebec, there was a good deal of reluctance to accept the application to the House of Commons of the system of representation by population, but they were satisfied to a certain extent because they were told that the Senate, where the different provinces would be equally represented, would furnish a safeguard for the provincial interests and provincial autonomy, and I think the summary which I have just read establishes that fact. Sir John A. Macdonald, in his celebrated speech on the British North America Act, takes the same position. He says:

In order to protect local interests and to prevent sectional jealousies it was found requisite that the three great divisions into which the British North America Act is separated should be represented in the upper House on the principal of equality. There are three great sections, having different interests, in this proposed confederation. We have western Canada, an agricultural country far away from the sea, and having the largest population who have agricultural interests principally to guard. We have Lower Canada with other and separate interests, and especially with institutions and laws which she jealously guards against absorption by any larger, more numerous or stronger power. And we have the maritime provinces, having also different sectional interests of their own; having, from their position, classes and interests which we do not know in western Canada. Accordingly in the upper House—the controlling and regulating, but not the initiating branch (for we know that here, as in England, to the lower House will practically belong the initiation of matters of great public interest) in the House which has the sober second thought in legislation—it is provided that each of those great sections shall be represented equally by twenty-four members.

The provision that each of the great sections shall appoint twenty-four members and no more, will prevent the upper House from being swamped from time to time by the ministry of the day, for the purpose of carrying out their own schemes or pleasing their partisans. The fact of the government being prevented from exceeding a limited number will preserve the independence of the upper House and make it, in reality, a separate and distinct chamber, having a legitimate and controlling interest in the legislation of the country.

There is this additional advantage to be expected from the limitation.

To the upper House is to be confined the protection of sectional interests; therefore, it is that the three great divisions are there equally represented for the purpose of defending such interests against the combination of majorities in the assembly. It will, therefore, become the interest of each section to be represented by its very best men, and the members of the administration who belong to each section will see that such men are chosen, in case of a vacancy in their section. For the same reason, each state of the American union sends its two best men to represent its interests in the Senate.

I do not think it is necessary to quote any more from the speeches made at the time by the fathers of confederation, because there is a fact which cannot and will not be denied here, more than elsewhere, that the establishment of the Canadian Senate was considered a condition, and one of the essential conditions, of the Federal Act of 1867.

All the arguments which could be advanced to justify the establishment of an upper chamber were introduced in favour of the establishment of the Senate. It was said, as I have read from this book of Mr. Clements, that the Senate was necessary to check, revise and amend hasty legislation; that the Senate would be less subject to popular passion and to the influence of temporary excitement. The fact is that the usefulness of high chambers is based upon the same principle as the establishment of courts of revision or of appeal. Why do courts of appeal or revision exist in all the civilized countries of the world? Because it has been established, and because it is recognized, that judges, like other men, are liable to error, and that great injustice will be done if their judgments could not be amended, reformed or reversed. The House of Lords in England, and the Canadian Senate perform the same duties. They sit in appeal on the judgment of the House of Commons, and I think their usefulness has been many, many times recognized by all. There has been a great deal of criticism of the House of Lords in England and there are some people who have tried to denounce the House of Lords as useless, as others have done with reference to the Senate of Canada; but who are the Englishmen who would vote for the abolition of the House of Lords? There will never be a majority of Englishmen who will vote for the abolition of the House of Lords, because they appreciate its usefulness; they know that it is one of the principal parts of that admirable machinery which is called the English constitution. They know that the House of Lords has brought a great deal of honour to England, and has furnished illustrations for the people of England. They like to recall the names of the great statesmen who have distinguished themselves in the House of Lords, and to recall also the important questions which have been discussed there. The Canadian Senate is as necessary in Canada as the House of Lords is in England, as the Senate is in the United States, as all the upper houses or the legislative councils, whether called legislative council or senate, in all the British empire. Go anywhere in the world and you will see that in all the colonies of the British empire there is an upper house, a legislative council. I do not think it necessary to remind this honourable House of every important act which the Senate has done, but nobody will deny that it has accomplished the object which the makers of confederation had in view when they established it, and speaking especially of what I have seen since I became a member of this House, I may say that it has done nobly, especially in the matter of provincial rights. However, I shall leave that part of the subject to the hon. gentleman from DeSalaberry, if he will undertake it, because he has studied that question. If the high chambers in all the countries of the world have been so useful in the past, I have no hesitation in saying that they are now, and will in the future be much more necessary in view especially of the great movement which is going on in the world towards extreme democracy. Because the struggle now is no more between tyranny and democracy. Democracy has triumphed, has conquered, and everywhere its flag waves over the civilized world. The struggle is between modern democracy and extreme democracy; in other words between democracy and radical socialism, between labour and capital, between the millionaire, the trust and the working classes. The struggle will be the most terrible one the world has ever seen, but the ascendency of the labouring classes is apparent—it is increasing all the time; slowly and gradually the labouring classes are rising up and before long they will domineer over the whole world. Personally I would not be afraid of their ascendency if I were assured that they would be controlled by the best elements of the labouring classes. I have always tried to be a friend of the working man. I have always thought he was entitled to the sympathy, to the generosity and to the charity and protection of the government and legislators. I gave evidence of my sympathy for the working man when I was a member of the local House in Quebec, and when I had Bills passed to improve their condition. I think the governments and legislatures should direct all their efforts to make the labouring classes love their country, and I think that the best means of making them love their country is to make them happy, to listen to their demands and to their revendications as long as they are not unjust to other classes.

And I must tell you hon. gentlemen, that you will see me always inclined, more perhaps than many of you,—to listen to their demands, and vote for all the measures which will have the effect of improving their condition. I think that the man who toils and suffers, who works night and day to earn enough to support his family, while he sees hundreds of people who do not know what to do with their money, cannot be an ardent patriot. The time is coming, I think, when the demands and the revendications of the labouring classes may be exaggerated. The working men, like other men, are inclined to abuse their power, and they are liable to be carried away, to be led astray, by demagogues and agitators, who try to win their confidence for the furtherence of their own interests, and the time may come when it will be necessary to oppose the demands of the working classes, not only in the interest of society, but in the interests of the best classes among themselves, in the interests of the good honest people, who form so large a part of the labouring classes. When that time comes, where will governments, and legislatures find the protection which society will require? They will find it in the upper houses—in the House of Lords in England and in the Senate in this country. I have no doubt that the upper houses, with the magistracy, will be before long the great bulwarks of society. Resolutions have been passed in certain parts of the country denouncing this Senate as the enemy of the working classes. These resolutions are unfair and unjust. The Senate is not the enemy of the working classes. Why should it be? The Senate is not composed of princes, or aristocrats, or millionaires—there may be some of the latter, but very few. The Senate is composed of the sons of the people, the sons of farmers, of merchants, of working men even, who will always be happy to listen to the just demands of the popular classes and to do what they can to improve their condition. No, the Senate is not the enemy of the good, honest, respectable working men, and they have no reason to be afraid of the Senate. But I admit that the agitators and the demagogues have reason to be afraid to a certain extent of the Senate. They have reason to believe that the Senate will protect the working men against them, against their ambitions, against the means which they will take to deceive the working people. I am not surprised that these demagogues are afraid of the Senate ; but what surprises me—what I cannot so well understand—is that the politicans, the statesmen, the legislators, help these agitators to spread the notion that the Senate is useless and should be abolished. I am surprised that they are trying to destroy the only power which will be able to protect them in the future ; and if the higher chambers were abolished in the different countries in the world and in Canada, I think they would be the first to regret the step, and would try, perhaps vainly, to re-establish them. Without being a prophet, or the son of a prophet, I may say, without fear of being contradicted, for the reasons which I have just given, that the time will come when the houses of representatives will be more or less at the mercy of these agitators —more or less I say—and the fact is that I cannot refrain from reminding hon. members of this House who have spoken lately of the Senate of what has taken place in the past. They were very happy under certain circumstances to shelter themselves behind the Senate in circumstances where they feared to come into conflict with the wishes of their electors. In many instances they were saved by the Senate ; but there are some who do not seem to recognize that. There are certain Bills for which they have voted and will vote—perhaps this will be the case even more in the future than in the past—because they will hope that the Senate may reject these measures. But naturally distinction must be made between those who want to abolish the Senate, and those who only want to improve it. That is another question. Before coming to that point, I want to say a word as to the complaints which are made against the Senate. What are the complaints against the Senate ? It is sometimes amusing to hear these accusations. It is said in certain quarters that the members of the Senate are idle, that they have almost nothing to do, and that the House of Commons could do without them. Well, I admit that if we are to judge of the efficiency of the House by the number and length of the speeches, by the size of the 'Hansard,' adopting that as a standard, I admit that the Senate occupies an inferior position to that of the Commons. But there are many people who think that talking is not the best test and criterion of efficiency, and they even go so far as to say that less talking would be more useful and less expensive. There are some even, uncharitable people, who say that if the 'Hansard' were abolished, the sessions would be shorter by at least half, and the expense would be three-fourths less. They draw the conclusion that a good deal of talking is done for the sake of popularity. I do not know if it is true. It may be so ; if it is true it is strongly in support of my argument that it is expedient to have a house more independent, less subject to popular influence, and less liable to be influenced by the fear of the demagogue and the voter.

If the members of the Senate were instructed by the constitution to revise the speeches made by the members of the House of Commons, I admit that they would have more work, very much more work than they have to do to-day ; but under the constitution the members of the Senate have not that duty to perform. Their duty is to revise, not speeches, but legislation. And, in doing that work of revision, the Senate is doing its duty and doing it in very reasonable time. There are some who have expressed the opinion that perhaps it would be better to have only one House, that one chamber would do the work as well and that it would cost much less. If we compare the cost of legislation in the two Houses, then I would be of opinion that if we are to choose between the two we might choose the Senate, because it would cost much less and the work would be done in much shorter time. There are some who have said that the Senate is the cemetery of the House of Commons. I do not think that those who have said it are serious. If it were, there would not be so many seeking admission to the cemetery. I find that those who speak that way are among the first to try to seek for appointments to the cemetery, and I am willing to consent to their admission on one condition. In all cemeteries in the province of Quebec, there is a special place reserved for children who have died without being baptised and for people who are not christians. If these people, to whom I have referred, are to be admitted to the Senate, I move that such a place be reserved in the Senate for them. About the work done by the Senate, I have here a statement which was prepared by the clerk of this House. It is as follows:—

Bills Initiated in the Senate.

In 1900	25
" 1901	20
" 1902	27
" 1903	26

Well that is fine progress, and should it continue, and I do not see why it would not continue, nobody will have a right to say that the Senate does not work. There are many ways by which this progress can be proved. Questions have been discussed in the Senate which have not been discussed elsewhere. The number of Bills initiated in the Senate can be increased. That can be done in different ways, and even by virtue of a rule which could be adopted by parliament by which a distribution of the Bills could be made either by the Minister of Justice or by the Governor in Council or by a special committee composed of members of both Houses, and then I think nobody could complain.

I wish to say a word on certain suggestions which have been made as to the reforming of the Senate. Some are interesting and some are queer. It has been said that senators over 80 years of age should be excluded. That means that after a long and sometime a glorious life of labour and of service to the country, and while yet full of vigour, intelligence and experience, a man having attained the age of 80 years will be obliged to withdraw from the House which he has, perhaps, sometimes made illustrious by his intelligence, experience and ability, and give place perhaps to an inferior man. It is possible that in the House of Commons experience has shown that men over eighty years are useless, but, in the Senate, all experience is to the contrary, and since I have been a member of this Chamber, if that rule had been in force and all members of this House over 80 years old had been obliged to retire, the country would have been deprived of some of the best, ablest, most intelligent and active men. This is not a reform, it is a bad suggestion. If they need that reform in the House of Commons, let them apply it there. I do not say that they do not require such legislation, but here in the Senate we want to keep those old men of whom we are proud, and if they have more like them in the House of Commons, let them be sent here and we will receive them with pleasure No doubt in the military service, in some countries, men are obliged to retire at a certain age, but the military service, as we know, requires certain physical qualifications which we do not always find in old men. But to govern the country and make laws, wisdom, age and experience have always been appreciated by all nations of the world. I have no hesitation in saying that the best and greatest statesmen in the world have been old men, and even now, if you inquire, you will find amongst the various nations that the best statesmen are old men. I may be asked by people outside: 'Well, what do you propose yourself?' I admit it is easier to criticize a plan than propose a better one, but if we consider what is done in other countries, if we see how they have met similar difficulties, I think we may arrive at something which will be acceptable. In all countries of the world, and in the British Empire, and in all its colonies there are upper chambers. They do not always bear the same name, but whether they are called legislative council, Senate, or House of Lords, they exist everywhere, though they are not constituted the same way. In certain cases the senators are appointed by the Crown, and sometimes a proportion of them are elected. In certain colonies of the empire that condition prevails. There are some colonies, however, where a certain number of senators or legislative councillors are appointed by the Crown, and others elected by electoral colleges or by the people. What is the best system? That depends on the circumstances, on the social, political and moral conditions of the country. There are certain countries where one system would be best, and other countries where another system would be preferable. In Canada what is the best system which should be adopted? I think we should combine the best elements of those different systems which exist elsewhere. The best system would be that which combines efficiency and permanency and gives representation to the best elements of the population.

If we were at the origin of confederation it would be much easier to put into practice any system, but now we have acquired vested rights and we can not dispose of the hon. senators who have their position here without their consent. But I think that it will be perhaps very practicable and acceptable, if a modification is to be made, to have one-third of the senators appointed by the government, one-third by the provincial government and one-third by the universities, and other public bodies. Such a system would give the government the protection which it requires. They would be protected by having the appointment of one-third, and I am convinced that the provincial government would consent to send their best men to protect their interests, and I think that the choice which would be made by the universities and public bodies would introduce into the Senate one of the finest and most useful elements. This is in accord with the opinion expressed by Bourinot in his book on the federal government of Canada.

Is it necessary to amend the constitution to establish such a system? I do not think it is necessary. I think it can be done by a simple rule, which would be adopted by both Houses and approved by the government, and that under that rule the government should try to put into execution such a programme if they thought it was a good one. Naturally, if that were done in virtue of a rule the names could only be suggested by these public bodies. There are many other matters in connection with it, with respect to which I do not pretend to be able to say exactly what should be done. There are many ways of considering that question, and there are many systems which may be proposed, but it does not matter what system may be adopted provided its affect will be to preserve the Senate, to make it stronger if necessary, if possible to make it more capable of accomplishing the object which the fathers of confederation had in view when they established it. There are people who may say that the members of the Senate are very much interested personally in expressing their opinions, and that they desire to preach in favour of the maintenance of the Senate. Well, if I were to be excluded from the Senate to-morrow, or if I were to die to-morrow, I would say to my countrymen and to my friends, and to those who may have confidence in my word, 'For God sake preserve the Senate! keep the Senate, because before long it will be the safeguard of our most sacred interests. Preserve the Senate, improve it if you like, but keep it in order that it may fulfil its mission of peace, order, harmony and justice.'

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am sure that we are all of us, and I think the country too, indebted to my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat for bringing this very important subject under the attention of the Senate at the present moment. It is one on which I know that a very considerable number of hon. gentlemen are desirous of expressing their view, and I think there is very great reason why they should take the earliest opportunity for doing so. However, on the present occasion, as I am afraid I will have to inflict my own views at some considerable length on the Senate, and as I know that there is a great deal of business on the paper which had better be disposed of, I shall, with the consent of my colleagues, move that this debate be adjourned and be made the first order of the day for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

CANADIAN HANDICRAFTS GUILD BILL

FEE REFUNDED.

Hon. Mr. FROST moved :

That the fee of two hundred dollars, paid the clerk of the Senate in connection with (Bill E) An Act to incorporate the Canadian Handicrafts Guild, be refunded, less the cost for printing and translation.

He said : Perhaps hon. gentlemen would desire to know why this refund is asked for. I may say that there is no pecuniary benefit whatever to any of the parties in this guild and the Bill comes within the class of cases where a refund is proper.

The motion was agreed to.

VACANCY ON THE SUPREME COURT BENCH.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to ask the hon. leader of the government in this House if any decision has been arrived at in the matter of the appointment to the Supreme Court?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have just the same answer to give my hon. friend as I gave him before. The matter rests with the Minister of Justice. I have mentioned to him the views the hon. gentleman expressed to me, and that is all I can do about it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could we know if anything has been done?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Nothing that I am aware of.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Has any decision been arrived at respecting the cases in the Province of Quebec, because we were informed the other day by the hon. gentleman that the Minister of Justice intended to meet the principal lawyers in the cases that were before the court and to come to an arrangement with them ? Has that been done?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not say he had come to an arrangement. I said the Minister of Justice was to have a conference with the members of the Bar for the province of Quebec. Whether he had that conference or not I am not prepared to say.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Do the government expect to have any judge appointed very soon?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot tell the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could the hon. Minister of Justice tell us that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You can put the question to him in the other chamber.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Well, I am going to take that means to find out. I think if the hon. Secretary of State would be kind enough he could tell us.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I could not. I have been very frank with the hon. gentleman. I do not know why he should be so persistent. I do not think it is quite courteous. I have told him over and over again that it rests with the Minister of Justice. I asked him if it would not be possible to appoint an ad hoc judge, and he said 'No,' and he said he would have a conference with the members of the bar, that is all I know about it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The appointment of a chief justice of any court does not rest strictly with any member of the cabinet. Surely the hon. gentleman could say whether the government is prepared to make the appointment now or not. It is not a question at all as to what the Minister of Justice may say, other than any member of the cabinet—as an individual. It does not rest with him. If the government is not prepared to make the appointment, there would be no possible difficulty in the hon. Secretary of State making that announcement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite aware that the appointment of chief justices rest with the government, and the government are not in a position to make the appointment at present.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I cannot see what advantage is to arise from a consultation with the members of the bar of Quebec. They have no power in the matter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to impress upon the Minister of Justice, or on the Prime Minister, the necessity of giving the information. I shall call upon him again to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I might suggest to my hon. friend the leader of the government that in view of the answer which he has given with reference to the Minister of Justice not having taken any action, that his name having been so closely associated with the probable appointment to the office, his diffidence may possibly stand in the way of his personally interviewing the profession in Quebec.

STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the Standing Orders Committee, presented the 13th report of the committee and moved its adoption.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think we have the same objection to that as to the previous report. Where is the hurry ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Perhaps hon. gentlemen will permit me to say that as regards the petitions contained in this report, the rules of the House have all been complied with. The report was not ready at the time I presented the others, and therefore it was delayed until the present moment, but I am pleased to say that in the case of all the petitions referred to, the rules of the House have been complied with.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—My hon. friend does not answer my objection at all. Where is the hurry ? Let the report be printed in the usual way in our minutes so that we may take it up to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—There may be no hurry unless there are Bills on the order paper depending for their advance upon the acceptance of this report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no notice of a meeting issued yet, and I do not see any hurry.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—So far as this report is concerned there is, as a matter of fact, a difference of opinion in the House as to whether or not concurrence is necessary. The authorities suggest that it may be the better course to have all reports concurred in, but in the past the committee on Standing Orders, when presenting a report in which there is no recommendation for the suspension of any rule, have not always moved concurrence in that report, but it has been allowed to lie on the table and taken as a matter of course. I have always felt, however, that it was not a uniform practice and that every report of every committee should be submitted to the judgment of the House. I have therefore always moved concurrence in the report.

This of course is purely a formal motion, if we look at the practice here in the past. Inasmuch as all the rules and requirements of the Senate have been complied with in connection with the petitions mentioned in the report, I would therefore ask my hon. friend to allow it to be passed on to-day so that any Bills coming up may be dealt with.

VANCOUVER, WESTMINSTER AND YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved the third reading of Bill (41) An Act respecting the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway Company.

He said : Since this Bill was before the House there has apparently arisen a considerable amount of opposition to its obtaining a third reading. I desire to assure the House that there is no wish on the part of the promoters of this Bill to corral the passes through British Columbia. It is true that the lines asked for here go through two different passes, but that is not with the least intention of monopolizing the passes. It was only put in because the promoters of the Bill wanted to develop that part of British Columbia and they could not succeed in getting to the part of the country which they wanted to develop without having these branches which they now ask for. On account of the impression which has apparently got about, I thought it well to make this statement, although I consider that the matter of the control of these passes is entirely in the hands of the Railway Act as it at present stands. I see no objection to accepting the resolution which stands in the name of the hon. Secretary of State, and which he, I understand, proposes to move as an amendment to the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This Bill (41) intituled an Act respecting the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway Company, has been passed by the Railway Committee, but the motion was carried upon a division. A motion was made in the committee to strike out subsection 'A' of clause 1. That subclause recites that the company may lay out, construct and operate branch lines of railway from its main line as follows :

(a) from a point on the main line between Anderson Lake and Green Lake, running along or near Lilloet Lake, Lilloet River and Harrison Lake, and thence south-easterly to a point on the international boundary line, at or near the town of Huntington, in the province of British Columbia.

This branch, which we are told has a length of about 115 miles, is really a drain, the purport of which is to take out of Vancouver all the commerce and all the products of the industries which may be in existence in that city, over to the south of the boundary line. It runs direct from Vancouver south to the boundary line, and there enters the United States. We were astonished in the Committee on Railways to hear a member of the government declaring——

Hon. Mr. POWER—Surely the hon. gentleman, who is so well up in the rules of the House, is not going to state to this House the details of what took place in the committee ? I raise that question of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We were astonished to see in the public press a statement made by one of the ministers of the Crown to the affect that the government had no objection to a policy of diverting our Canadian trade to the United States. If the papers published a statement which was correct, that was the view propounded by a minister of the Crown. I heard also one of the ministers here declaring that he would make known the policy of the government by an amendment that would be offered. We have notice of that amendment to-day on the order paper, but that does not settle the question. That branch line, in my humble opinion, completely diverts our Canadian trade and carries all the raw material they may get in Edmonton or other places along another branch to Vancouver and there diverts it to the United States where it will be manufactured to our disadvantage. Under the circumstances, it is our duty to oppose the Bill, and I therefore move in amendment that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by striking out therefrom paragraph (a) of clause 1.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I took the opportunity when this question was before the committee to address the committee at considerable length upon the policy of adopting legislation of this kind from a Dominion standpoint. With regard to the amendment now before the House it virtually refuses this company a right to construct a branch before constructing their main line. What is the position of the company to-day ? They got a charter in 1901 empowering them to build some 700 or 800 miles of road. What have they done in that time ? We are told that they have built 17 miles, some say only 13 miles. admitting that they have constructed 17 miles, what are they asking? They do not seek an extension for another five years, but they ask that they may be allowed to cover British Columbia and parts of the new provinces with a charter that will virtually take up the passes and control the territory through which neither of the two Canadian roads now being constructed to the Pacific coast have yet located their lines. Suppose we grant them this power to go through the Yellow Head Pass, that would mean the construction of 400 or 500 miles of road. We know that the Canadian Northern is approaching that pass as fast as possible. We do not know where the Grand Trunk Pacific is going. It may possibly want to use that pass also. My hon. friend in charge of this Bill says there are any number of passes in British Columbia. There may be, but Sir Sanford Fleming, one of the ablest engineers in the country, has declared that the Yellow Head Pass is one of the most favourable through the Rocky Mountains. If we pass this Bill in its present shape we are giving to the Victoria, Vancouver and Yukon Railway Company virtually control of that district, in face of the fact that two of our own lines, Canadian institutions largely aided by Canada, extended and encouraged for the purpose of building up trade between the east and west, and permission to build through that pass first and do as they please. Had they constructed one hundred and fifty or two hundred miles of their main line, and made desirable progress within the five years they have held their charter, and shown sincerity and anxiety to accomplish what they had undertaken and then asked for an extension of time, I could understand that they would have some claim upon parliament, but they have built only 17 miles in five years. If they had said they had been unable to finance the undertaking, which is an extensive one, and are therefore unable to carry out this extensive undertaking and appealed for one more chance, I am sure this parliament would have regarded their request for another extension of five years as reasonable.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—They asked for an extension of time last year and got it. They are now asking power to build branches.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—That makes it worse. Last year when they applied for an extension of time and got it they had constructed only 13 miles. Now, after building four miles more, they ask for additional privileges. They have not completed their main line, and yet they ask that they shall have this territory alloted to them with the right to build their lines and control the district ahead of our own lines. I may look upon it from an extreme point of view, but I must confess that it is giving privileges to a foreign country and at the same time shutting out our own people. Are there to be two roads from Edmonton to Vancouver? I do not think British Columbia or the Dominion is prepared to subsidize two roads. These people are applying for a subsidy now with all the force and assistance that can be given them by the united efforts of British Columbia people who are anxious evidently to get this road, and the probabilities are that the government will feel that they are obliged to consider this road entitled to a subsidy. I have it on good authority that they have made an application to the government of British Columbia to get a land grant in aid of the construction of their line. Is British Columbia going to make a land grant towards the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific to run side by side with this line? If it runs from Edmonton through the Yellow Head pass to Vancouver, that is what we may expect. The Canadian Northern track will run for three or four hundred miles side by side by this road or between the two. We are chartering this company to give them the first chance, giving them power to control that section for five years. We are saying to them virtually : Negotiate with British Columbia and get all the land grant you can; negotiate with the Dominion government and get all from them you can,' and while we are doing that we are shutting out the lines that we should encourage first. Before we grant them the right to build those branches let them exercise the powers they now possess. Let them construct their main line, and after doing that, let the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern proceed with their lines, and whoever comes first to the government with evidence of their intention and ability to construct a road through that section, then give that road the charter and assistance for all they require. But why should we by this legislation shut up the territory to this company which has built only 17 miles of road, and say to them that they shall have the first chance? There is another point to which I wish to draw attention and that is with regard to the running powers. I count very little upon the question of running powers of one road with another.

I do not believe it is possible for two roads to come together and equally enjoy the same privileges over the same line. I know that in some cases it has been tried. For instance, the Canadian Pacific Railway shares equal running powers with the Grand Trunk from Toronto to Hamilton, a short line some 38 miles. If you have a line of three or four hundred miles and provide that two roads shall have equal rights to operate over that road, I contend that it is an impossibility to do it so that neither one nor the other will suffer. They will sustain loss. Supposing an accident happens upon that road and there is a freight train knocked off the track ; it belongs to one company and it may be hours before it is removed. Another train load of stuff perhaps coming forward for shipment has just time to make the port, but they have to stand there for twenty-four hours perhaps until the track is cleared to permit them to proceed. Who is to pay the damages ? How are they going to settle disputes of this kind ? I do not see very well how they can do it. It has not been done satisfactorily anywhere so far as I know. I do not know of any line on the continent of America that is successfully operated in that way. It may be possible. They may be able to do it, but I do not know of any case where it has been done. Consequently the insertion of the clause suggested by the hon. Secretary of State is, in my opinion, very little use. The great point that we should hold is this; Let the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway Company, if you will, build a main line. They have powers to do that, and they had a renewal of their charter last year. They have had charge of this project for five or six years, and they have done little or nothing. Let them build their main line, and do not tie up the balance of the territory there to them, by granting them rights to build branches all over that country prior to, and in the face of the advances, made by our own lines. I think it is nothing short of national suicide to do that. The people of British Columbia are no doubt anxious to get extended railway accommodation. We cannot blame them very much. They are right, I dare say, in their own interests to think it would be an advantage to them. It may be—I can see it in the future—that if that road is built it will carry to the United States side of the boundary line, and to the United States main line of the Hill system, every pound of freight they can secure, and will do everything it can in the interests of the United States line. Now it is said, what difference does it make to Canadians if this road is built and it carries wheat from Edmonton, even supposing they do carry it to the United States side, if the farmers are paid more for it than they can obtain on the Canadian side? That looks well at first, but what is the fact to-day? Canada, I contend, controls the best wheat that is grown on the face of the earth. Manitoba No. 1 hard is the best wheat produced on this continent, and I question if there is any thing to beat it in any part of the world.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The United States millers get that wheat and they mix it with the inferior wheat of Dakota and other states, and they produce an article of flour that they export to the Orient and place it there in competition with Canadian flour. It is also placed on the market of India and China and other countries as the product of Manitoba No. 1, hard. The result is that it will not give the satisfaction that flour milled entirely from Manitoba hard will give. Manitoba and those places grinding flour on the north side of the line, will, no doubt, put in their best wheat, and no doubt they will produce an article that in point of quality is better than the United States flour, and why? Possibly, to begin with, the Canadian farmer may get a few cents better from his United States customer, but after a while when the consumers begin to realize that U. S. flour is not up to the standard that was represented, the price of our wheat will fall. The result is that our millers will not get any higher price than they would have got, perhaps not as much, as they would if they had kept the trade to themselves. Now, our great object should be to see the erection of mills in Vancouver and at the terminus of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the terminus of the Canadian Northern. We should like to see our wheat ground in our own country and exported to the countries of the east through our own shipping, through our own ports, as Canadian products in place of going to the United States ports and being exported as United States products, ground in United States mills, employing United States labour and United States freight. We know what our neighbours are. They are a very decent lot, take them individually; but collectively they are the most selfish nation on the face of the earth. They have proved themselves to be that, and I would venture to say that if you would reverse the condition of things that exists now, and place the American in the position in which we are, and you went to Washington and you asked them to grant us in their territory what we are asked to grant to a United States project, I venture to predict the Washington people would reject the proposition, simply because it would not contribute to the development and trade of the United States, and when it would not do that, they would not give you the privilege you would ask for. This whole question deserves careful consideration. I must confess that I should have been glad if the government had announced a policy upon it. My own opinion is that they ought to have a fixed policy. The future development of this Dominion is virtually in their hands. The government can make it or they can, to a large extent, ruin it, and I think they should have a fixed policy on the question. It appears that they have stated that they are willing to leave matters to the Senate and to the people who are interested, and that then they will guard the public interest in the manner suggested by the Secretary of State. I do not think that protection is sufficient. I speak as a Canadian—I believe in the principle of Canada for the Canadians right up to the hilt. I do not want to deprive any man of a fair chance in life or of the results of his efforts, but I do wish to keep for Canadians and those who take upon themselves Canadian citizenship, the inheritance which we have now, and I do not want to see other countries come in and take it away from us. I admit that we must have customers. We cannot consume all the wheat and flour we produce, but I want to see that when it goes out of our country, it goes out as a Canadian product, from Canadian ports, in Canadian bottoms, and is sold in the country where it is exported to as a Canadian product. I think we should carry out that principle as far as we can possibly do. Why are we building the Grand Trunk Pacific ? Why are we encouraging the Canadian Northern ? Why have we built the Canadian Pacific Railway ? I admit that if there is one institution in Canada to-day which is a credit to Canada it is the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is a well managed line, and wherever its name is known it is a credit to this country. Now, we ought to uphold and encourage these roads and retain for them the advantages which they have a right to expect, and which they will enjoy if we do not incorporate these foreign competing companies. I think it is right we should do everything in our power in the interest of our own lines first. If our British Columbia people are very anxious about this railway, let them complete the line according to the charter which has already been granted. If they do that, and build a road to the Yukon, which we would not object to, then let them come here and we will be prepared to grant them a charter for the building of these branches. We can well remember that on a certain occasion a charter was proposed for the construction of a road to the Yukon. It was passed through the House of Commons, but did not get through this House, and I think that the reason why those who opposed it here did oppose it was that it was an American institution, and that we should control that country ourselves in the matter of the construction of railways. Whether it was wisdom or not, it certainly had a good deal of loyalty about it as a policy. Therefore, before we go on and grant this company all these advantages that they ask for we should hesitate and seriously consider the whole question, and if after due and careful consideration we come to the conclusion that it is in the best interest of Canada that we should tie up all this district under charter to the Hill system—because that is what it is, neither more nor less—if we think that is the best thing to do, then let us grant charters for these branches ; but when we do so we virtually say to the Canadian Northern, 'You need not apply to parliament either for bonus or assistance or charter. You proposed to build to Vancouver, but the territory is already covered by the Hill system.' Now I say, let us cut out these branch clauses ; let the company go on and show their good faith by completing their main line, or the half of it and then we will be in a position to deal with them about these branches. But with a paltry construction of seventeen miles, in a territory which will require at least eight hundred miles of road, and in view of the fact that the company have held that charter for so many years, I think they ought not to come now to parliament and expect to have this Bill passed. What do you think would be our reply to the Canadian Northern—and I am not advocating their cause any more than that of any other road—were they to apply to parliament under similar circumstances ? The Canadian Northern deserve credit for the progress they have made. They have unquestionably made good progress. There are no two men in Canada who have shown greater enterprise and who deserve better at the hands of Canada than Messrs. MacKenzie & Mann ? What do we say when we grant the charter for these branches ? Suppose the Canadian Northern applies for a charter for the construction of a line to Vancouver and the coast, they lay out their line, and, as I said a moment ago, it must be alongside the Hill line for three or four hundred miles. When they go to the markets of England for the purpose of finding money—that is where all promoters go with schemes of that kind—capitalists who have money to invest will unquestionably ask all kinds of questions with regard to the territory they are passing through, as to whether there is keen competition, and what the conditions are. When they are told that the Hill system will practically duplicate the proposed railway for four hundred miles that will settle the question for intending investors. It is the very last thing that investors in railway debentures want—a close side by side competition. It augurs very badly for earning a revenue ; it is a very bad condition to contend with, and the result will be that MacKenzie & Mann will have that difficulty to face the very moment that this charter is granted. These people will become known as the chartered owners of such a line, and when that becomes public MacKenzie & Mann will have to meet that condition of things and show how they are going to get over the difficulty. Another thing is that there is no section of this Dominion which is more desirable for railway construction than the portion through the Rocky Mountains in British Columbia. If you take the trade and the railway traffic over the American section of the Rocky Mountains, you will find that it has contributed more to swell the earnings of every road which passes through them than any other business they have save one, and that is the coal business. I believe that the Rocky Mountain section in Canada will be just as productive in valuable minerals when it comes to be developed. In the United States they take out over $60,000,000 a year in silver and gold alone out of their section of the Rocky Mountains. When we arrive at a development of that kind, see what a position it is going to place the Hill lines in ? They will naturally want to carry away our ore, build smelters on the American side, and have the ore smelted there instead of on the Canadian side. We would like to see it smelted in Canada, the gold and silver refined in Canada, and coined in the building which we are putting up in Ottawa for that purpose, instead of letting it go over to the American side to be refined and coined there. What is the use of building a mint if we are going to allow all the money of our country to be carried away to a foreign country for the purpose of being smelted and coined ? I hope that the Senate will take a reasonable, careful, and prudent view of this whole question, and that they will say to the Hill people : Gentlemen, we propose to deal with you fairly, but we are not going to allow you to blanket that whole country with branches for your line until you build your main line first. Go on and build that, show your sincerity, your honesty and when you do that come back to us. In the meantime the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern will strike the foot of the Rocky Mountains and come to us and apply for privileges to get through there and we will then be in a position to deal with all the competing lines on equitable terms. I would object even to closing up this whole section of territory for the Grand Trunk Pacific by giving them an absolute monopoly of any particular pass. Let the railways that have charters go on and build their main lines as far as they can without asking charters for branches, and when they have done that they can come to us and we will consider their claims and deal with them on their merits.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has not contented himself with trying to enlighten the members of this House, but he has also undertaken the task of enlightening the people of the city of Toronto through its board of trade. This item appears in the Toronto 'Globe' of May 11th :

When Senator McMullen's letter on the advent of Jim. Hill's railway into British Columbia, Manitoba and other western provinces was read, Controller Jones thought that instead of condemning Mr. Hill's scheme, as Senator McMullen suggested, they should present the railway magnate with boquets as the only man who had ever offered to build railways in the Dominion without a bonus. The Senator's letter was simply laid on the table.

I think it is an insult to this body to have any hon. gentleman taking outside advice from the board of control of the city of Toronto or the board of trade of any city when a matter of this kind is up for discussion. It is simply inviting increased lobbying in the Senate and the House of Commons. I am not going to take the trouble to follow the hon. gentleman in his meanderings about his loyalty to Canada and about the good results that have flowed from the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen to a few speeches which the hon. gentleman made some years ago with regard to the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The hon. gentleman should consider that stale by this time surely.
