Hon. Mr. GIBSON—It could not be stale, because the hon. gentleman was so emphatic, so imbued with free trade ideas in all respects that he was the last man of the Liberal party who would ever have been expected to become such an ardent protectionist as he is now ; and he was just as well posted then as he is now. The objection my hon. friend has to this sad state of affairs is that the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern or the Grand Trunk Pacific will be hampered by another railway going through the Yellow Head Pass. He quoted an authority which the hon. gentleman in this House will dispute, whose knowledge of Canada cannot be gainsaid, a man who devoted his time and ability when he was a much younger man than he is now, to the interests of Canada. I refer to Sir Sandford Fleming. Under the Mackenzie government this very Yellow Head Pass was the pass of all others that the Mackenzie government had selected for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. For reasons best known to themselves, the government which succeeded Mackenzie changed the route entirely ; but let me assure hon. gentlemen present that the fears of my hon. friend are not well grounded, because in a personal interview which I had with Sir Sandford Fleming himself within the last few days, in the presence of another member of this House, Sir Sandford Fleming stated that there was room for fifteen railways through this Yellow Head Pass. Now surely there cannot be any danger in the direction in which my hon. friend wants to frighten the members of his House as to any obstruction. Besides if there were, hon. gentlemen are aware that the government have taken every precaution. The senator who has charge of the Bill has accepted the amendment proposed by the hon. Secretary of State, and I am bound to do so too, but I do it with the reservation that all similar railways should be treated in the same way. Now the objection is raised to this road that it is going to be built without any cost to the Dominion of Canada, wihout a subsidy. Surely this is a thing that the people of Canada cannot object to. Evidently the board of control of the city of Toronto takes a different view from my hon. friend from Wellington. They say that the man who will be kind enough to Canada to come in here and build railways without any cost to the country, instead of being condemned, should be presented with a boquet. Only the other day this very Mr. Hill whom my hon. friend from Wellington fears so much, was entertained in the city of Winnipeg, by 625 citizens. And by whom was this gentleman introduced ? By Mr. J. A. M. Aikins, the solicitor of the Canadian Pacific Railway in Winnipeg. Surely if the people in Winnipeg are in favour of this Hill scheme, it is not for the hon. member from Wellington or any other member of this Senate to object to a thing of this kind. What does Mr. Hill say ? He declares he will have his railway built from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast by the year 1907, before the Grand Trunk Pacific will be completed, and yet we are told to mark time because the Canadian Northern has not reached the Yellow Head Pass. This is not the day for Canada to mark time. I have no fault to find with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and I have nothing to say against the enterprise with which they are connected, but surely the hon. gentleman is aware, as every other hon. gentleman is, that these men have been well assisted in every part of the Dominion, they have been subsidized from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific by the provincial legislatures. We are practically told, if we take the views of the hon. gentleman from Wellington, that no man need apply in Canada for the right to build a railway for nothing, as he will not be allowed to do so. Then my hon. friend draws that doleful picture of taking the trade into the United States. I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Thursday, May 17, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND, from the Committee on Railways. Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (84) An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

He said: I move that rule 17 be suspended in so far as the same relates to this Bill. In support of this motion, I desire to say that the Bill presented by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company was elaborately discussed and altered and considered by the House of Commons committee, and likewise by the House of Commons, and it received a very close and critical examination in the Committee on Banking and Commerce in the Senate. As the Grand Trunk Pacific financial arrangements depend somewhat upon this Bill, and they are anxious to have it carried out, I trust the House will accede to my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (T) An Act to incorporate the Colonial Bank of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (U) An Act respecting the sale and marking of manufactures of gold and silver.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.).

Bill (V) An Act respecting the Northwest Commercial Travellers' Association of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Hon. Mr. GIBSON.

COMMANDER SPAIN'S CERTIFICATE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

Did Captain Spain obtain from the British Board of Trade a certificate of service as master of a foreign-going ship?

What is the date, and what is the number of such certificate?

What is the name of the chairman of the board which granted him his certificate of Canadian service?

What is the date, and what is the number of such certificate?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer given me by the department is as follows:

1. This certificate has not been applied for; this officer is entitled to it on application by section 99, chap. 60, 57-58 Vic., British Merchant Shipping Act.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Captain W. H. Smith.
4. February, 1893, No. 1443.

FRENCH TRANSLATION OF MILITIA REGULATIONS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

Whether it is the intention of the government to order the immediate publication in French in the 'Canada Gazette' of the revised rules and regulations concerning the pay and allowances to the Canadian militia, which rules and regulations have been lately published in English in the 'Canada Gazette,' on the 5th day of May last?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer sent me by the Department of Militia is, No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why not?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was not informed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The 'Canada Gazette' is printed in two languages. It is printed in French as well as in English, and I do not see why what is printed in English should not also be printed in French, especially when it relates to the Canadian militia. It is very easy to say: 'no,' but I would like to know why? That has been published as a portion of the laws of the country. When laws are passed here they are printed, and when they are published in the 'Canada Gazette' they must appear in both languages. I am asking that these rules and regulations be published in French. I suppose we shall be denied the right to have it in French. The hon. gentleman should give us the reason why.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not administer all the departments. I find my own quite large enough. I have given the answer sent by the Militia Department.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I did not ask the Department of Militia. I asked the government. My question is,—whether it is the intention of the government. The 'Canada Gazette' is under the supervision of the hon. minister, not under the supervision of the Department of Militia and Defence. Is it the Department of Militia that is going to decide what is to be published in the 'Canada Gazette'? The hon. minister cannot take that stand, and he knows it well.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. minister says that he can take no other stand. Does the hon. gentleman suppose that I am responsible for what appears in the 'Canada Gazette?' I do not read it once in six months. If any department sends down a notice with special instructions, it is the duty of the King's Printer to follow those instructions. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman. I think that the publication he suggests should have been attended to; but it is quite outside of my line to make inquiries of that kind. The Printing Bureau must, of course, follow the orders given them by the various departments in connection with the notices which are sent down. It would have been the duty of the department to send down a copy in French and English, because they do not do the translation at the Bureau. Sometimes they do it when the departments ask for it specially, but they are not equipped to do it as a general rule.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am very glad the hon. minister says that he will see about it, because these regulations are a compilation of the regulations already in existence, and which have been already translated into French, together with all the amendments which have been made. These have been added to the compilation. Under the name of 'The Kings' Regulations,' a part of it has been put into a small edition—the part relating to pay and allowances of the militia. That has just been published in the 'Canada Gazette,' and the French translation is there and it should have been printed. I hope that the hon. minister will be kind enough to see about it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me that so long as the French language is an official language, the minister charged with the particular department in question should be able to give an answer to so reasonable a request. So long as these regulations are printed in English and are to be used in the province of Quebec, the hon. member from Stadacona should have the fullest explanation why this exception should be made, particularly as he has the right under the constitution to demand that these regulations be printed in French.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I see the memo. is signed by one who is a French Canadian himself. I will make inquiry, because I take the same view as my hon. friend does. In a matter of this kind, which is a mere matter of translation, there should be no grounds for raising any question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have my doubts if the gentleman who signs that memo. is a French Canadian.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It came from Quebec with a French name at all events.

THE DEPUTY GOVERNOR.

AN EXPLANATION.

The SPEAKER—I have received the following letter from Mr. Justice Sedgewick which I deem it my duty to communicate to the House:

Ottawa, 17th May, 1906.

My dear Mr. Speaker,—I have read in the record of the proceedings in the Senate, on Monday, the 14th instant, that in connection with the discussion which there took place in relation to my attendance on Friday last, as the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General for the purpose of giving the Royal Asent to certain Bills, you are reported as stating that you had been informed that I had expressed to the Usher of the Black Rod a strong opinion that Mr. Justice Taschereau was right in his contention that he should sit in the Governor's chair. And I now desire to assure you, my dear Mr. Speaker, that I expressed no such opinion. Moreover, so far as I personally am concerned, when acting as Deputy of His Excellency for the purpose of giving the Royal Asent to Bills, I am, and always have been, quite content to follow whatever custom or usage prevails in your honourable Chamber in regard to the chair which I should occupy while performing this office.

Believe me,
My dear Mr. Speaker,
Yours faithfully,
ROBT. SEDGEWICK.

P.S.—His Excellency the Governor General has been graciously pleased to express his approval of this letter.—R.S.

Mr. Justice Sedgewick has apparently read the unrevised edition of the debates, which does not accurately report my words. The statement made to me by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, I stated to be one year old, and I took special care not to affirm that Mr. Justice Sedgewick had formally asked that His Excellency the Governor General's chair be given him.

THE VACANCY IN THE SUPREME COURT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, will the hon. minister inform the House what is the policy of the government on that question of the nomination of a new judge to fill the vacancy in the Supreme Court bench ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no policy to announce.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman tells me that I can only get an answer after the session, I may as well drop my question ; but if he is ready to give me an answer before the progrogation of parliament I should like to have it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It seems to be a source of amusement to my hon. friend to ask the question, and I would not like to interfere with his pleasure.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose it amuses the hon. gentleman also ?

THE BANQUET AT QUEBEC.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I have a communication to make on behalf of our friends in Quebec. I suppose that every member of this honourable House has received an invitation from the board of trade of the city of Quebec to attend a banquet on Saturday night to celebrate the big event of Quebec being made the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway line of Empress steamers. We in Quebec are most anxious to have as many senators present as can go, and I am requested to ask all who can positively say they will attend, to give their names to the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod before ten o'clock to-morrow in order that he may be able to wire to Quebec the number of members who will attend the banquet. I repeat in the name of our friends in Quebec that we are anxious that every member of both Houses shall attend and that we should know exactly how many to count upon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED — Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, may I suggest to the hon. leader of the House the desirability of disposing of the non-contested orders before we enter upon the first order of the day. I hesitate to ask my right hon. friend to waive his right, but as there are thirty-six orders, and as we propose adjourning to-morrow, I think we could dispose of most of the items very shortly, and I would suggest that we adopt this course on the distinct understanding that if any controversy arises on any particular order, that it shall be allowed to stand until the first order is disposed of.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—With that understanding, I am quite satisfied to proceed with the orders.

CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned Debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. David:—That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all petitions, resolutions or documents concerning the abolition or reorganization of the Senate.—(The Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As I had occasion to observe when moving the motion for adjournment, I believe that this House and the country are under a considerable obligation to my hon. friend who introduced this motion, and that for more reasons than one. There can be no doubt I think that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House are tolerably well aware that there has recently arisen a certain agitation directed against this body, and I consider, therefore, that it is highly desirable that we should take an early opportunity, while public opinion on the subject is as yet in a fluid state, and before the matter has crystallized itself in any way,—still more before it has become in any sort or shape a foot-ball of the various parties—that we should take the opportunity to put ourselves on record, and, so far as we can, to explain to the public at large the reason of our existence.

So far as I have been able to ascertain, up to the present moment, the charges against the Senate are rather of a vague character. They may be summed up in the statement that the Senate is a costly and an unnecessary body, and that the country could very well afford to dispense with it altogether. I may say that it is possible if we come to an examination of the whole system of our constitutional machinery, that whatever foundation there may be for these charges against the Senate, it might turn out that there are other portions of the constitutional machine which are perhaps quite as much in need of oiling and repairing as this venerable body. I ought, perhaps, to apologize for taking on myself to discuss at length, as I propose to do, the constitution of the Senate, inasmuch as I am among the younger members of this chamber. But hon. gentlemen, although it is true that I have been but recently appointed a senator, it is none the less true that I have had a long and pretty extensive acquaintance with the Senate. If my Irish friends will pardon the bull, I might almost say that I knew the Senate before it was born, inasmuch as I, in a subordinate capacity, did contribute, to some extent, to the creation of the present Senate. More than that, whatever may be said as to the utility of the Senate, I am prepared to testify that whether it has great power for good or not, it has, under certain conditions, a very great capacity for mischief, and as a member of two Liberal administrations who have had the opportunity of being confronted with a hostile Senate, I can say that whatever else the Senate can do, it can make itself extremely inconvenient, under certain conditions, to a Liberal government possessing the confidence of the people in the other chamber. Now, hon. gentlemen, this is, I admit, in some sort an academical discussion; it is none the less important on that account. I desire, in the first place, to make it very clear to my hon. friends on both sides that, on this occasion more particularly, in what I am about to say I speak for myself alone. I do not, in the slightest degree, desire to have it understood that I am speaking for any of my colleagues; that I am speaking in any shape or way for anybody but myself. More than that, I reserve the fullest right to change, alter, vary or modify, if occasion and sufficient cause be shown to me, the sentiments and opinions that I am about to express.

I do not think I shall materially alter them, but at the same time it is well that this discussion should be conducted in the frankest and fullest fashion, with a thorough understanding that we are mainly desirous to contribute such suggestions as occur to us as desirable for the improvement of the Senate or generally speaking, for the improvement of constitutional government in this country. Moreover, one thing is certain, whatever may be the ultimate fate of the Senate there is no great hurry about the matter. It is evident that before the constitution of this body is materially changed, many parties will have to be consulted, and it will take a considerable time to arrive at their opinions. It would be well for those who desire to proceed hastily in this matter to remember that Canada is in possession of a written constitution under the British North America Act, and whatever may be said for good or for evil as to the question of written constitutions, one thing is certain, and the experience of the United States will amply bear out what I say, that when you have a written constitution you may depend upon it that any constitutional change will take a great deal of time to accomplish. Now, it is not my intention to dwell at any length on the question whether it is or is not necessary in Canada to have a second Chamber, and for these two reasons: first of all that this is a federal compact of ours, and that there is very grave doubt indeed whether the smaller provinces would be disposed to abandon any advantages that they possess under the present constitution of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—On the other hand, there is no doubt whatever that it would be our plain duty to obtain their consent to any alteration that was made, and I, for my part, have no doubt that the imperial authorities before whom this matter must come in the last resort, would require that the consent of the various provinces should be clearly and fully certified to them before they would proceed to act. The other, and perhaps more important reason, is this: while there has always been a doubt in the minds of political thinkers as to whether one Chamber or two is the better mode of carrying on the government in a country like ours, I think of late, as, if I am not mistaken, my hon. friend intimated, the preponderance of sound opinion is settling more and more every day and more particularly in view of certain issues, certain questions that are likely to arise within the next 25 or 30 years—to the conviction that, especially under a federal constitution, it would be dangerous to trust legislation exclusively to a single Chamber. I myself believe there is a great deal to be said for that view of the case. I am of opinion that a single Chamber, under our form of representative government, more especially, is far more likely to be rushed, far more likely to pass hasty and ill-considered legislation than two Chambers would, more particularly because we are constantly confronted with the fact that now-a-days it is a very easy thing for a number of people to get together who have some particular fixed idea and to organize themselves in a fashion which will enable them to exercise an influence vastly out of proportion to their real strength over a representative body. Let us suppose, for instance, that the advocates of some particular fad or idea have succeeded in securing in 40 or 50 constituencies let us say a solid vote of 200 or 300 in each. I need not tell any man of experience in politics how little disposed hon. gentlemen in the lower Chamber would be to run the risk of losing 200 or 300 votes on almost any given question you can select, provided they were able by a little timely concession to avert the danger.

I may add—and I think those hon. gentlemen who have had seats in the lower Chamber will be disposed to endorse my remarks—that not only are these dangers considerably increased at all periods when parties are closely balanced and on the eve of a general election, but that there have been occasions, let me say it with all respect, when the vote of the House of Commons has not absolutely reflected the true sentiment of the House of Commons in just such cases as I have alluded to. For myself, I have sometimes thought that for the guidance of the Senate it would have been a very good thing if we were able to insist that in certain cases the House of Commons should vote twice, once by ballot, to give a chance of knowing what they really thought, and once openly for record for their constituents. I am afraid that there is an amount of truth in the suggestion thrown out by my hon. friend who preceded me, that such things have been known. They have been known, I am not going to say how often I have known them ; but such things have been known as the House of Commons passing a Bill in the devout and fervent hope that the Senate would kill it. Nevertheless I admit that this is but a negative value at the best. It is not unimportant. It is not by any manner of means a trifling thing to say when I say that the value of a Senate is not only in what the Senate does, but in what the Senate prevents other people from doing. There are such things as potential checks. Under certain circumstances these potential checks may come to have very great value, and there is no doubt whatever that the Senate, properly constituted, is the body to apply them. Then there is another and somewhat more delicate matter. Our Senate, as constituted, allows for the recognition in the body politic of certain classes who from various causes have not been able to obtain proper recognition on the floor of the House of Commons. In my own province of Ontario, I am bound to say that in the whole course of my long political experience I have felt it as more or less a reproach to the province and to my fellow countrymen there, that the Catholic element in Ontario never did receive full recognition or representation on the floor of the House of Commns. In Ontario to-day there are about 400,000 Roman Catholics, good subjects of His Majesty ; nevertheless, although they comprise from one-fifth to one-sixth part of the whole population, there are to-day on the floor of parliament—and they are better represented in this parliament than I have ever known them to be before to the best of my recollection—there are but seven men representing these 400,000, and two of these are gentlemen of French extraction who represent almost purely French constituencies. Now that is not quite fair. It is only too true that there are a great many constituencies in the province of Ontario as to which party managers on both sides will tell you there is no use in running Roman Catholic candidates. That is not the fault of the leaders on either side. For very good and excellent reasons, the leaders on both sides would be exceedingly glad to see an adequate representation of this important element. Let us compare the case of the province of Quebec. In Quebec they are just one-eighth Protestants to seven-eighths Catholics. These one-eighth Protestants return, I find, twelve members out of the sixty-five. In other words, in Quebec one-eighth of the population are able to return nearly one-fifth of the representation ; in Ontario from one-fifth to one-sixth return one-twelfth to one-thirteenth of the representation. Here the Senate comes in, as providing a useful method of adjusting the inequality that prevails. Every hon. gentleman knows that there is an unwritten law, respected by both sides that the Catholic party in the province of Ontario shall be adequately represented, and they are adequately represented among the twenty-four senators whom we are entitled to have on the floor of parliament. Now, as I take it, the question is a two-fold one. First of all we have to put to ourselves the question, does the Senate need to be reformed ; and if you answer that in the affirmative, then comes the question, what is the best method of doing it ?

As regards the Liberal party, I say that the Liberal party ought to have no doubt at all that the Senate requires to be reformed, and least of all should those members of the Liberal party who happened to hold office in the period from 1873 to 1878, and from 1896 down to 1901. The Liberal party have been in possession of office since confederation for fifteen years. Of those fifteen years, ten were passed with a hostile partisan majority in the Senate, and, in my judgment, although I admit that is a matter of dispute, very considerable injury to the public interest resulted therefrom. What did we find ? And I want the earnest attention, not merely of this House, but of parties outside—what did we find the situation in 1896, when we came into office with a decisive majority on the floor of the House of Commons ? Of the twenty-four representatives from Ontario in the Senate, there was one gentleman, my hon. friend beside me, to represent the Liberal party, which, during all that time, had had at least half the votes in the province of Ontario. During the same period there was but one man left in Quebec, if I remember correctly, to represent the twenty-four—one Liberal out of twenty-four in 1896. He represented the Liberal party here from the province of Quebec, and my hon. friend from Halifax will correct me if I am wrong in saying that he and he alone stood for the Liberal party in the province of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken regarding Quebec. There were others.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Who were they ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—My hon. friend beside me (Hon. Mr. Thibaudeau).

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I should be glad if my hon. friend would name anybody else.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—There were two, the Hon. Mr. Pelletier and myself.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Two out of twenty-four ; two in Quebec and one in Ontario. I accept the correction, and much good may it do, and I call the attention of the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side to this phase of the question ; there is the strongest probability, if the Liberal government is sustained at the next general election, as it is almost certain the Liberal government will be, that the position will be exactly reversed, and the Conservative party in Ontario will find themselves, perhaps, representing half the population in Ontario, with one or, it may be, two members out of the twenty-four, and the same thing will be very apt to occur in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Then a lot of them will have to die.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—We know what happened in the eighteen years during which the gentlemen on the opposite side were in power. I am applying the same rule of proportion. I do not want to get rid of my hon. friend—not a bit of it. My position is very different. My position is that it is highly desirable that both the great parties should have a fair representation on the floor of the Senate. But what I want to point out is that a thoroughly false position had arisen in 1896 as affecting the Liberal party ; that a thoroughly false position will arise in all probability in the course of half a dozen years as affecting the position of the Conservative party in turn in this Chamber. In any case this is clear, that under those conditions it is quite possible that an irresponsible body on the floor of the Senate, and it does not matter, for the purpose of my argument, whether they be Liberals or Conservative, may, for a long number of years, have power to thwart the will of the people, no matter how distinctly expressed, and also that under certain conditions such a state of things may be very hurtful to the public interest. Hon. gentlemen, that has happened. That may recur, and, in my judgment, it is not the part of statesmen ; it is not the part of prudent or rational men to allow that condition to recur if we can help it. As I have already said, I am a young senator, and the House will, perhaps, pardon me for venturing to hint at what would be, in my opinion, the sort of ideal Senate we should aim at. You may say this is a council of perfection. But, at the same time, I think it is as well for us to have an ideal to which we could direct ourselves, and aim to bring about. The Senate, as I would like to see it constituted, would be a Senate that should represent both parties fairly and in due proportion. With that point I will deal hereafter. It should also have within its ranks a large percentage of men of long experience in public affairs. It should be brought into touch with the people, and, if it could be managed, as in England and some other countries, I think it would be greatly benefited by having a substantial legal element incorporated with it, or attached to it. There are two very notable Senates which have existed at various times and in various quarters of the world, both of which have exercised enormous influence over the affairs of their respective countries—for that matter, over the affairs of the world. One of these, I need hardly say, is the Senate of old Rome, and the other the Senate of the United States of North America. Under the first, in the course of five centuries, a mere Italian municipality grew and flourished until it became the mistress of the whole known civilized world, until the Mediterranean was simply a Roman lake, and until it could almost be said that ouside of the Roman empire there was no civilization at all. That Senate, as everybody who has paid any attention to the subject knows, was composed in its best days for the most part of men of consular rank, great administrators and great generals, men who had led armies and men who had governed provinces, and it is also the case that a great number of eminent jurists adorned at one time the Roman Senate. That was one type of Senate and, for the purpose it was intended to serve, a good and useful type of Senate, too. Now, in the United States, as all gentlemen who have paid attention to their affairs know, the Senate has become an extremely powerful body. The Senate of the United States is to-day, I believe, by far the most powerful body in the United States, far more powerful than the House of Representatives, far more powerful than the President, though he is a powerful personage too, indeed I may say the United States senators are often little short of kings in their own states. That Senate, despite its immense power, has certain formidable defects on which I do not feel called upon to enlarge at the present moment, and it is not a Senate which is suitable to us. It is not a Senate which would match with our constitution, nor is there any prospect or any likelihood of such a Senate being ever introduced into this country.

Here I might pause to say that my idea of an ideal Senate is not a Senate that should thwart the will of the people, but a Senate that should be at pains to ascertain the true, calm, deliberate and reasoned judgment of the people. You cannot have two driving wheels in the machinery, but you may have with great advantage a driving wheel and a regulator therefor, and it is this last article I would aim at providing through the agency of the Senate. Here I would venture a few thoughts for consideration. First of all, the absolute fundamental necessity that if you would make the Senate what it ought to be, there should be in it a fair proportionate representation of both the great parties or of all parties, and that it should be brought, as I have said, in touch with the people. Later I shall deal with the subject more extensively. In the next place it needs to have among it a large percentage of experienced men of affairs, and notably of men of experience in public affairs in this Dominion. Thirdly, it is absolutely necessary, if the Senate is to do justice to itself or to justify its own existence, that the Senate should have certain special work assigned to it, a much larger proportion of work than at present and up to the present has ever been done. In the next place, the Senate ought to have more positive power than it at present possesses. Theoretically, I grant you, the power of this body is very great; theoretically it is a co-ordinate branch of the legislature. Theoretically we have power to refuse supplies; theoretically we have power to refuse to pass any Bills sent to us. Theoretically we can do a great many things. On the other hand our political power is decidedly too little and I propose at the proper place and time to consider how we can enlarge that considerably. Incidentally, as the question of the age limit has been brought up, I shall give my poor thoughts on that subject. First of all, I am of opinion that the age limit, if amended at all, ought to be amended at both ends. I consider thirty years too young for anybody to be placed in the red Chamber, although the constitution permits of that being done. Although I fully endorse for myself the views of my hon. friend that the rights of the existing senators must be respected now as they were respected in 1856 and though I think it would be outrageous to attempt to deprive men of the position they enjoy under a patent from the Crown, and although I would not at all attempt to interfere with the life membership of the existing members of the Senate, I think, when these gentlemen have passed away, you might very well do one of two things, either introduce an age limit, or obtain the same result by appointing men for a certain term. It ought to be a long term, how long perhaps is a difficult matter to decide. I would suggest, for consideration only, such a term as about twelve years. As to the question of appointing men of experience to the position which is a point to which I confess I attach a very considerable amount of importance, that, I think, had best be done in some such fashion as this, whether they be elected or nominated or partly elected and partly nominated. That is a detail we can discuss later. I think that at least one-third of the members of the Senate ought to be selected first of all from cabinet ministers of several years standing on either side ; next from lieutenant governors and premiers of provinces, or from judges of higher courts, or if all these sources of supply fail, you might have recourse to the members of the House of Commons of a reasonably long term of years service, twelve or fifteen years, as the case might be. Again, I suggest that they should be reinforced with a special legal element who could supply them with the expert knowledge which is almost necessary that such a body should have at hand in passing upon the various measures submitted to them. But above all things, we desire to have a Senate which will command the respect and confidence of the people. To ensure this the Senate must not be idle. The Senate should have special work to do. Now that is a knotty and complicated question. The constitution does not allow us to deal with money Bills, nor is it likely we shall ever obtain that power. The best mode is a mode which has been suggested before, and which has also occurred to me, and that is this : just as the Senate has absolute control and jurisdiction over all questions of divorce which must originate in this Chamber, so I would make it imperative, if not by law at all events by practice, and we could easily devise means of carrying this into effect—that the great bulk at any rate, if not the whole body of private legislation should be compelled to originate in the Senate. I believe it would be better done, and that the House of Commons would be glad to be relieved of a great deal of the work now thrown on them. That of itself would effectually solve the problem of providing ample employment for the gentlemen who may be now or hereafter selected to fill the Senate. As to a question which has been raised, and, as to which, perhaps, I should hardly, being myself partly responsible, say too much—of our being compelled to consider legislation too hastily, as to having a great number of Bills thrown on us at very short notice without a chance of properly and honestly deliberating upon them, I have a suggestion or two to make. I would propose an innovation or two. I am not aware that the innovation has been proposed heretofore, but I think on calm consideration not a few of the elder members at any rate will agree with me that it is an innovation which might well be considered. The Senate has ample power to reject any measure sent to it. Now, for various reasons, that is a power which is rarely exercised, and is still more likely rarely to be exercised in the case of Bills which have occupied the attention of the House of Commons for a very long time.

It has been considered and naturally and reasonably, that after the House of Commons have debated a Bill for many weeks, or perhaps many months, and sent it up to us, even at a late period of the session it would be discourteous and unreasonable for us summarily to reject it because we did not have time to consider it. Moreover, people might say to us, it is your own fault, you could have kept the Bill and considered it at your leisure. We know that practically that would hardly ever be done at the extreme end of a session and the suggestion I make is this ; I would be disposed to allow the Senate to exercise, in addition to the power of rejection which it always must have, a suspensory power—that is to say : if Bills of importance are brought to us at such a period that they cannot be fairly considered, special provision might be made under which the Senate could suspend until the next session the consideration of these Bills, with this proviso, that these Bills having once passed the House of Commons should not be returned to them, but should be taken up just as if they had again in the next session passed the House. That would enable us to exercise a considerable practical influence over legislation, and would not impose upon us the necessity of rendering useless the labours bestowed upon these measures by the Commons, which most of us would feel very loath to do. Per contra, and this is a matter which requires some care I know, if we took these powers to ourselves, I would be disposed to recommend that the House of Commons should likewise take a little additional power to itself; and that after the House of Commons, on three successive occasions, saw fit to pass any particular measure, the Senate would then and must then as a matter of course, permit that Bill to become law. In other words, I would limit the powers of the Senate to a power of suspension for a period of not exceeding two years. These suggestions I make for consideration, and for consideration only. As I have said, my view of the position of the Senate is that it is here not to thwart the will of the people, but to ascertain the will of the people. Now the House of Commons, for various reasons which I have hinted at, does not always express the will of the people, and there is another reason which has not been dwelt upon much, but it is not without importance. When the House of Commons is fresh from the people, most undoubtedly the House of Commons does represent the people. When the House of Commons has sat two, three or four years, from natural physical causes, it has ceased, to a great extent, to represent the people. In that interval a large proportion of the voters have died and a very much larger proportion of new votes have come forward and therefore there is nothing unreasonable in suggesting that a body such as the Senate would be, if constituted as I have ventured to suggest, should have the power of delaying legislation until it should be ascertained whether it really represented the deliberate will of the people of Canada.

I approach now the chiefest and hardest task, and that is the task of determining how we could bring the Senate into touch with the people of Canada; how we could best act so as to remove the partisan complexion which the Senate had, has, and will have, under the present system of nomination—how we can obtain a proper proportionate representation for each party. Now I may add that if the Senate is to have real power entrusted to it, we may depend upon this, that in some form or shape, either directly or indirectly, that power will have to be derived from the people. I myself remember perfectly well when we tried in 1856 the method of direct contact with the people on the part of the legislative council of the two Canadas. I saw that put into operation, and it did not impress me very favourably. For one thing, it brings about rather more elections than we want, and my impression is that we have too many elections as it is. But independently of that, I found, and I think those who remember the condition of affairs that time will corroborate my statement, that these elections of senators directly representing four or five constituencies together, tended to result in the creation of a mere plutocracy, by no means as likely to represent properly the popular element as some people might desire. Now, I do not think that is an imaginary danger, but, in any case, I think there is a far better way open to us in that regard; and here I will ask the indulgence of the House if I digress, although in some respects only apparently digress, from the consideration of the best way of electing the Senate, to a little consideration of the representative system under which we at present live and move. And again I say, I speak for myself alone.

I have long been convinced that our present system of representation is radically faulty, that in some important respects it is not merely vicious in theory, but vicious in practice. I want it to be distinctly and clearly understood that I am the last man to dispute the right of the majority to rule, nor do I desire in the slightest degree to dispute the right of the majority to have a majority of representatives; but I do dispute the right of the majority to arrogate to itself an unfair proportion of the representatives of the people. I will illustrate my position. Let me suppose that one side of politics controls 100,000 voters, and the other side control 90,000, and that there are 190 representatives to be elected. It is perfectly just and right, it appears to me, that 100,000 voters should return 100 representatives and that those who control 90,000 should return 90 representatives ; but it is not fair that those who control 100,000 voters, should return 150 representatives, and that those who control 90,000 should return but 40. Yet that is what I have seen ; that is what our system tends to ; that is what has occurred again and again and will occur again and again under the system under which we are at present working. I know the common argument perfectly well, that it is as fair for one side as the other, that each has its chance in turn. This is true, and it is all the worse. Each side in turn obtains more power than it ought to have ; each side is tempted to abuse it ; possibly each side does abuse it ; and I may add that this system offers, as no other system does, a steady and perpetual premium to gerrymander and corruption. I propose to make good my words. I have here an interesting statement to which I direct the especial attention of hon. gentlemen on both sides, showing the operation of a certain gerrymander which took place nearly a quarter of a century ago in the province of Ontario. In 1882 the total vote in Ontario stood as follows : Liberals, 131,618, Conservatives 132,615. The two parties were as nearly as possible absolutely and accurately balanced. The total difference between them was just one-third of one per cent. How did they come out on the floor of parliament under the operation of the remarkable Act to which I have referred ? The 131,618 Liberals returned 37 representatives ; the 132,615 Conservatives returned 55 representatives. In other words, while it required 3,556 Liberal votes to elect a representative to parliament, 2,411 Conservative votes could do the same trick.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—How is it now in Nova Scotia ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—My hon. friend from Halifax I dare say will enlighten the House on that question. In any case I do not think Nova Scotia had any gerrymander Act. For the present I am concerned with Ontario, and with Ontario alone. In 1887 there were 170,371 Liberal votes and 174,080 Conservative votes. The total difference was barely one per cent; one side having 49½ per cent of the votes and the other 50½ per cent. Under these circumstances, the Liberals had 40 representatives, and the Conservatives 52. In 1891, and I call the special attention of the House to this remarkable fact, the Liberal party polled 179,451 votes, the Conservative party polled 175,639 votes ; that is to say, the position was exactly reversed. In 1887 the Conservatives had a majority of 4,000 ; in 1891 the Liberals had a majority of 4,000. In 1887 the Conservatives, by virtue of a majority of 4,000, had 12 additional representatives on the floor of parliament ; in 1891 the Liberals with a clear majority of 4,000 had 44 representatives, as against 48 Conservatives. The nearest they could come was minus 4—a difference of 16. In 1896 there is a difficulty because, for reasons very well known to some hon. gentlemen, the Conservative party were considerably mixed up about that time. In 1896 the vote stood : 185,415 Liberals, 179,181 Conservatives; nearly 2 per cent. However, there were 48 Liberals to 44 Conservatives, but when we come to 1900, the gerrymander still remaining undisturbed, there were 193,417 Liberals to 199,138 Conservatives, and the Liberals had 37 against the Conservatives 55. Now I invite the careful and earnest attention of every man in this Chamber and elsewhere, who cares to see parliamentary government established on a firm basis, to that statement, and for two reasons : first, these figures I have given, if they are correct—and to the best of my knowledge they are perfectly correct—show conclusively two things : they show the enormous and far-reaching effects which a gerrymander Act may have, and likewise they show a more important thing, the extraordinary tenacity and the extraordinary loyalty with which the great bulk of the voters, throughout the province of Ontario at any rate, adhere to their respective parties. I desire the House to consider what that meant. Here for two and twenty years, during five general elections, the great province of Ontario, the leading province of this Dominion, was never represented honestly on the floor of parliament—not once during that whole 22 years. I will tell the House what I have seen in connection with this same gerrymander. Under pretense of adding four constituencies, I have seen 54 constituencies cut, mangled and bedevilled to produce the results which I have alluded to. Out of 35 ridings in which there was a small Conservative majority over all collectively, the representation was so proportioned that the result was 30 Conservatives to 5 Liberals. I have seen two groups of 24 constituencies each in different portions of the province of Ontario, so adjusted that although in one of them the Liberals had a majority all over the 24 of about 2,000, the result was that they got 6 representatives against 18 Conservatives; while at the other extremity, the Conservatives having a majority of precisely the same number the Liberals obtained either 4 or 5, I am not quite certain which, and the Conservatives 18 or 19. In these eight and forty ridings the vote between the two parties, had it been collected together, was almost equal. The parliamentary representation stood 10 or 11 to 36 or 37. I would guarantee, were I to take a map of Canada, and deal with that map without regard to county boundaries, I could at one and the same time produce a set of constituencies which would have a numerical population more in accord with the unit of population than we have at present, and yet I could cause 40 per cent of the electors to return 60 per cent of the representatives. As I have said, the consequences of this Act were far-reaching. For a very long time, a very long time indeed, it was absolutely impossible for us to obtain anything like a fair representation. During the interval from 1882 to 1896 there were numerous cases known to me in which, had the Liberal party possessed on the floor of parliament their fair share of the representation, the Conservative government would have been swept out of existence time and time again. Perhaps some day I may find time to write an essay on the story of the great gerrymander. If I could only persuade my hon. friend from Belleville to act as collaborator, and append a foot note or write a little tract for the use of Conservative kindergartens and Sunday schools entitled 'How we hived the Grits and what we thought about it,' we would, between us, produce an intensely interesting publication, and one which would be appreciated by every practical, political and philosophic student of history who might desire in the future to know how we managed things in the latter quarter of the nineteenth century in the good province of Canada. Allow me to say that that gerrymander, in some respects, has always commanded my profound admiration as a real work of art in its own line. I do not believe, short of an Act of parliament by which it was decreed that from that time forth three Conservative votes should ever after be equal to five Liberals, you could have done much better for that party than was done by that gerrymander. If they had only been allowed to put through the Dominion Franchise Act as it was originally introduced, that result would have been achieved by slightly modified means. If the facts which I have stated cannot be contravened, I think there is no doubt whatever as to the truth of the deduction which I draw, that our representative system offers a tremendous premium to gerrymander, recurring, mark you, every ten years.

I say that, if these facts are correct, there can be no sort of doubt that it is a very defective system in a very important point. I should be very sorry indeed to see a Liberal government have recourse to that means of keeping themselves in power, but even the Liberals are human beings. Even Liberals are frail, and I could conceive a contingency in which a hard-pressed Liberal premier with a very small majority and with very difficult questions to grapple with, might be pressed by his own followers into treating hon. gentlemen opposite to a dose of their own medicine. In so far as they are concerned, they would have very little cause to complain, whatever the public at large might have to say against such a piece of manipulation on the part of the Liberal party. I stated also that in addition to offering a premium to gerrymander, this system offers a very decided premium to corrupt practices. I repeat, that under our present system, as I have said, I believe, and I am glad to testify, that I think the great bulk of the electorate of Canada are perfectly honest and faithful to their political convictions. But, as at present administered, you have a system under which whenever the two parties are tolerably closely matched in any constituency, the practical decision of how the representation will go is largely in the hands of a floating, and very loose class lying between the two. I do not think that interferes very much with the final results of the elections as a whole, because the temptation to fight fire with fire is very great, and nine times out of ten the loose vote is divided between the two. But I do say that where one party cannot or will not resort to the same means as the other, there is very little doubt, I am sorry to say, how the election will go. That is the danger which is inherent in the present system. It has always struck me as a very curious circumstance, that when anybody proposes to remedy this defect, he is met with the cry that it is a very desirable thing no doubt, but that it is not possible to remedy it, that we have to go on as we have gone on in this same fashion, and that we cannot carry out a representative system properly on any other lines. It is a very curious fact that both in this House and in the House of Commons, for very many years, this problem of giving fair proportionate representation to both parties has been solved in the easiest way and without the slightest difficulty. Never in the forty years and more that I have sat in parliament have I known a minority in the lower House—and I presume the same condition exists here—to be denied its perfectly fair representation in all the committees struck by that House. We give them their perfect proportionate representation. If the minority have two-fifths in the House they get two-fifths in the committee. If they have a third in the House they get a third in the committee. Proportionate representation is carried out to perfection, and I have always felt, and I do not hesitate to say that the true solution for a great many of these difficulties which undoubtedly beset us, lies in applying to the electorate in one mode or the other a system analogus to that which we put in force with such success in our own Senate and our own House of Commons.

That may be done in various ways. The way I believe that would be most easily carried out, most feasible and most likely to produce good results, would be by a method of grouping constituencies on the system of one man one vote. You might group them by twos, threes, fives, or adopt a modification of these systems. This result would happen, that under no possible conditions could the minority be deprived of a reasonable proportion of representation. Sometimes they might obtain a little more than they were fairly entitled to, sometimes a little less, but in the long run the result for which I contend would be secured, and the two parties would ultimately be represented in almost exact proportion to their real strength. Now I take it that the real truth of the matter is just this: I do not mean to say that the public at large, though they do not now understand the subject, perhaps, as fully as they will ultimately come to—are in any way averse to having proportionate representation. I use the word proportionate because the common phrase of representation of minorities conveys a wholly false meaning, and an entirely false interpretation is put upon it. I do not desire to give the minority any more representation than they ought to possess, but I do desire to see that the minorities, whether Conservative or Liberal, should be represented here and elsewhere in proportion to their real, genuine strength. I am sorry to say that your average practical politican is a very difficult animal to deal with, and here again I may remark that I do not speak of Conservatives or Liberals in this respect one more than the other. As a rule, he is about the most inveterate and obstinate opponent I in my time have ever come across of any innovation or any alteration in the machinery to which he is used. It seems to be a prime article of his creed that he prefers the devil he knows to the devil he does not know, or, to put it in other language, he prefers to bear the ills he knows to thise he wots not of. There is a reasonable side to this; there is no doubt if you introduce a new and hitherto untried factor in our political life you may produce results which none of us, perhaps expect or desire; but if it be based on principles which conform with the principles of justice and fair-play, I for one, am perfectly prepared to take the risks and I advise my countrymen to do the same. I have no doubt that these worthy gentlemen to whom I have referred do thoroughly appreciate the vast importance of having a good organization, and possibly of having a good supply of campaign funds, and I do not want to be misunderstood in this matter. A good organization is a right good thing, and a great party can no more be kept together without a good organization than an army can work without a headquarters staff and, I will add, you cannot possibly put five or six hundred thousand men in battle array on either side without a considerable expenditure of money which somebody must pay. It would be mere prudery or paltroonery for me to ignore these facts. What I hope and wish is not that you should pretend to dispense—which you cannot do—with the use of money and organization, but that the money should be honestly got and honestly applied and not put to illigetimate uses. The point is not to ignore what we all know to be the fact, but to endeavour to regulate it and above all—and there is where my argument chiefly comes in—to remove as far as we can by some means or other, by grouping constituencies in the fashion I have indicated, or by what other means hon. gentlemen can suggest, to remove the temptation either to gerrymander or to use money for corrupt purposes. One thing I know, and one thing I will say to the credit of the community, and that is, that valuable as organization is, and valuable as money is to political parties there are other things and other ways of influencing which tell far more after all is said and done than either money or organization, and that if you could only contrive to appeal to the people and to thoroughly satisfy them of the integrity of your intentions, they have shown again and again they are able to sweep aside all the obstacles which may be interposed between the declaration of their will and the proper carrying of it into effect through the medium of their representatives.

Now, these are not things to be spoken lightly; they are things I would not say lightly. If I say this I say it after having had some forty-three years experience in public life, ten as a private member, fifteen as a member of the government and eighteen as one of the leaders of the opposition, and, I may add, I have this claim to speak with some special knowledge, that in my time I have put in fifteen separate elections for my own single individual share. These things have made me realize the situation. I must say that I do not believe the system has improved. I do not think the system will improve. As I have said it is radically faulty and needs to be reformed from the bottom up. I do not deny there have been certain superficial ameliorations, some of them by no means unimportant, but they do not go to the root of the matter and cannot go to the root of the matter until you provide some means, as I have said, whereby both parties shall be fairly represented on the floor of parliament and in due proportion to numbers. Now time is pressing, Canada is very fast growing into a nation. Canada will soon have to deal with a great many very complicated questions. I know that many advanced political thinkers agree substantially in the view which I have presented to you, and this brings me back to the point more particularly in hand.

I say that the reform of the Senate, properly carried out, offers a great opportunity to introduce the system of proportionate representation which, I trust and hope, if once adopted, will spread downward and upwards until it be generally introduced not merely in our Dominion parliament but in our local legislatures and generally throughout this community. I expect no miracles. I know as well as anybody that no political system that ever was devised is going to work automatically. The best code of laws that ever the ingenuity of man devised or that ever could be devised will not work unless you have capable and honest judges to administer it, nor will the best political system that ever could be invented result in bringing prosperity to a community unless there is a reasonable modicum of patriotism and intelligence among the people. But, while that is true, it is equally true that there is absolutely no limit to the harm a bad system can produce. Such a system perpetuates itself, exaggerates itself, makes good men despair of the republic and enables bad men to turn political affairs to their own profit. If you will analyse with care the vote cast at any general election you will almost always find the victors under our system have too much power, though sometimes it favours one party, sometimes another.

But I contend that the system in itself is wrong. I do not advise any very immediate change. I know well enough that in all English speaking communities you must move step by step, and one of the very best features in the British constitution, and I think, in ours which is partly derived from it, is that it is a system of gradual growth and not one of sudden, violent change. My idea is that we should begin at the election of the Senate. Later on, if things prove successful with us, we might grapple with the Commons. I feel no doubt that the principle once understood would make good way.

I know some hon. gentlemen would say that these things would produce a dead lock, and that the King's government must be carried on. I know too that this is an innovation which would involve many consequences, but I contend that, innovation or not, it is founded on principles of truth and equity, and it will commend itself to all who give it a fair consideration. I say that I believe these results will flow from it. I believe that you would have purer elections; that you would have a higher tone in parliament; that a better class of men, with no disparity to the occupants of the benches in this Chamber or elsewhere, would find entrance to parliament; that governments would be held in due check, and that the evils of the party system would be, to a great extent, done away with; and, in one word, that we would have a far fairer and a better system of representation than we could at present hope to possess. I remember when I was first entering public life that the cry which ran like a tocsin over Ontario was for representation by population, a fair and good cry and one which we ultimately carried to success; but representation in due proportion is just as good a cry and likely to bring even greater benefit to the people of Canada than representation by population is able to do. Now, for immediate purposes, I say that I do not wish or desire to disturb the existing tenure of any hon. gentleman, but we might provide for future elections just as we did in 1856.

All gentlemen who then held patents for a life tenure of the legislative councillorships retained them, but to them were added a certain number of elective councillors, elected in due rotation at intervals of two years each.

For the reasons I have given I dislike decidedly the idea of electing senators by direct election. I believe that it would be an infinitely better plan for us to adopt were we to insist or were parliament to decide that on and after a certain date all future senators, at least the great bulk of the future senators, be elected by each province, or, if you will, by groups of provinces—I mean in regard to the minor provinces and by three at a time in order that whenever an election of senators took place both parties should be represented in some proportion to their strength on the floor of parliament. Thus you would insure a fair representation of both parties. I think it would be well perhaps, inasmuch as we are likely to increase our numbers very shortly, that the number of elective senators might be reduced to forty-eight; that is to say twelve for each group. Twelve for Ontario, twelve for Quebec, twelve for the maritime provinces collectively and twelve for the Northwest provinces collectively; and to provide against deadlock, and for other reasons, I think that the government might well be given power to appoint a third additional number (which would make seventy-two in all when the present incumbents had departed) chosen from the ranks of those whom I have described as best fitted to supply such a class of senators to the Dominion. The term I suggest would be twelve years. Could this be done you would have then, when that was carried out, a Senate containing a very considerable proportion of men of long experience in public affairs; you would have a Senate assigned a definite work; you would have a Senate armed with an effective power which they could use; a Senate reinforced with due legal advisers, a Senate which would accurately represent both parties; a Senate which would derive authority from that fact. I say that such a body could do very good service to the state. We have had forty years of trial of the existing method. It seems to me that the defects of the Senate to which I am alluding are defects which no thoughtful man can ignore. Let me repeat, that it never was the intention of the founders of confederation, it never was expected or believed that such a state of things should come about as that in the province of Ontario, with one-half the population Liberal, there should be one Liberal representative found on the floor out of twenty-four, or that a little later in the same province there should be one or it may be two Conservative representatives found out of a delegation of twenty-four, when in each case the Liberal and Conservative parties were almost identically equal throughout the whole term of the Senates existed in their respective provinces. I have suggested one scheme. I invite my hon. friends to suggest another or others. We are certain to have ample time to discuss it, but there is one thing that I do believe, and that is that it will not be found possible for the existing method to continue very long, and that we will do well to set our House in order, and as fast as we possibly can. I know there is a very general disposition on the part of the general public to-day that public men are all alike and that one side is just as bad as the other and neither any better than they should be, thereby meaning that they are both a great deal worse than they ought to be. Nevertheless, I think politicians are very much what the public chose to make them, and that their shortcomings are very largely due to a bad system. But there is no doubt that to those who look behind the scenes and below the surface, there was a good deal of truth in what Prince Albert was nearly torn to pieces for saying some 50 or 60 years ago, that parliamentary government was on its trial. What Prince Albert really meant was—and it is an opinion with which a good many other thinkers agree—that party government at the time was on its trial, and was not coming out too well from the ordeal. But men are very apt to misunderstand any general dictum of that kind. We all know Dr. Johnson's famous dictum that politics was the last resort of scoundrels. He did say that, but he did not say all politicians were scoundrels and he knew better. It is true of politics as of religion, that it is one of the noblest vocations and one of the meanest trades. There is no one who deserves or ought to have more respect or esteem from their fellow countrymen than the man, on whatever side of politics he may be, who gives freely of his time and means to promote the interests of the country and of his party, if he believes his party is working for the interests of his country. And, on the other hand, I know quite well that there are few men, who, whatever their ability and talents may be, who are greater enemies of the state than the men who go into politics for what they can make out of it. I have known many on both sides, I have seen in my time a very considerable amount of business in politics and I have seen a great deal of true nobility in politics. I have seen much greed and self-seeking, and I am bound to say that I have seen a very great deal on both sides of loyalty to leaders and devotion to party and country, and I do not despair in the slightest degree because here and there there are found men who do not do honour to their party and who do not do honour to their country. I do not despair of seeing men enough of the right stamp to bring about a very much better state of affairs. I know right well that in the political field, as in every field, you will have wheat and tares growing side by side until the millenium comes. But you need not have a system specially suited to promote the growth of the tares. For the rest I appeal to my brother Liberals to consider whether the scheme which I venture to propose is or is not in accordance with the best traditions of the Liberal party. To my Conservative friends I say that the time has come when they had better cease thanking God that there is a Senate in which they had a majority often to one in their favour, and begin to consider what their position will be when there is a Senate with a majority of ten to one against them; and I say to thoughtful men of all classes that I believe a project which would bring about a system that would give fair representation, to begin with the Senate as the easiest, fair representation to both parties is a project which would work to the honour and credit of the people of Canada. I believe that here again in the course of time an opportunity has come when the people of Canada may possibly succeed in solving a problem that has presented great difficulties to thinkers in all countries. I think it can be solved, if not in this way, still in some similar way. I invite the attention of my hon. friends here and elsewhere and my friends throughout the country to the best method of solving this matter and, if it be solved, then I say that Canada once more will be able to say, as Kipling put it not very long ago:

> Once more
> I am the first in battle
> Quoth our Lady of the Snows.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speech of my hon. friend from Mille Isles, and I am happy to say that I agree with nearly every observation he made in his very interesting address. It was a very fitting introduction to a debate which should be regarded in this House as one of very great importance. I have also listened with a great deal of attention to the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce and, while I agree with some of the things he has said, and while many of the other remarks which he addressed to the House are very interesting, I cannot help making this observation: that no small part of his speech was somewhat stale and very irrelevant. My hon. friend from Mille Isles has given the Senate an opportunity to stretch forth its hand and speak for itself, and for that we all thank him. We cannot forget that this House has been accused for very long years of a great many political sins, and my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been one of its very fiercest and strongest accusers. I think it was rather ungracious in my hon. friend to interpose many irrelevant things, calculated to draw attention from the Senate's defence. He reminds me somewhat of a story I once heard of an execution in the United States. A man had been accused of a great crime and had been found guilty and condemned to die. The day of execution arrived and he was brought on the scaffold, and it was in the days when crowds gathered to witness the executions. There was a large attendance and he was allowed an opportunity before the drop fell of saying a word on his own behalf. He was a little diffident about speaking, but there happened to be a local orator on the spot who had municipal corporations on the brain and he got up and said: 'Ladies and gentlemen as our doomed fellow citizen does not avail himself of this opportunity of saying a few words to you, I will take occasion to give you my opinion on municipal corporations,' and so commenced to make a speech on the municipal corporation question.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Pretty stale.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, very stale and very irrelevant. My hon. friend, when the Senate was called upon to answer for itself, made a long address on the gerrymander Act of 1882. I rather felt a little surprise that my hon. friend had not gone a little further and that he had not spoken of the legalized robbers, robbers great and small, in connection with the trade question. I am surprised he did not go further and give us his views on commercial union in the manner he used to express these views in the nineties. After having entered upon this discussion of the Gerrymander Bill he would have just been as much in place if he had followed up and given his views on commercial union and the national policy. My hon. friend from Mille Isles has given this Senate an opportunity to defend itself against the many charges and accusations that have been made against it, and I think it behooves hon. gentlemen here to put forward the reasons which in their judgment would justify the people of the country in retaining the Senate. I am happy to say that I am in accord with my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce upon the question of the absolute necessity of an upper chamber. I think it will be found very rarely that such a position will be called in question by any reasonable thinker at the present time. My hon. friend from St. John (Senator Ellis) was understood in the press as having expressed doubts upon the necessity of retaining the Senate, during the interesting remarks which he made upon the subject in the debate on the address from the Throne at the beginning of the present session. I think he was not understood correctly. At all events I will allow him to speak for himself. The leader of the government, speaking in another place, has stated that the very general and almost unanimous opinion he thinks in the province of Ontario is in favour of the abolition of the Senate and the establishment of the system of a single branch of parliament for the government of Canada. Although I do not pretend to know the opinion of the people of Ontario very generally, I question very much whether that is the opinion of the people of that province. However, I will say that I am very sure that it is not the opinion of the people in other parts of Canada, and I will refer to the opinion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself on that subject, and I intend in the remarks that I propose to address to the House to support the views I propose to offer by authorities. I am not going to be content with giving my own opinion, but I propose to give the opinion of others who, it is admitted are entitled to a great deal of consideration.

Speaking in another place Sir Wilfrid Laurier says:

> But one consideration which, to my mind, is absolutely conclusive and paramount, is that under our system of government, a second chamber is an absolutely needed safeguard for the smaller provinces against a possible invasion of their rights by the larger provinces.

That is the opinion of the Premier of Canada. Take now the case of the other provinces and you find that in Nova Scotia they have retained the legislative council and the leader of the opposition, coming as he does, from the province of Nova Scotia, though not now representing it, speaking in the House of Commons, made this remark, that the legislative council of Nova Scotia has been for many years the more important and the better legislative body of the two bodies in the parliament of Nova Scotia. I come to the province of Quebec, and I think members representing the province of Quebec in this House are not only favourable to the retention of this Chamber, but that they are also favourable to the retention of the second chamber in the provincial affairs of the province. At all events they have retained it and there has never been an agitation, so far as I know, in the province to abolish it. In the great province of Ontario a different system was pursued at the time of confederation, and I am not here to say that any very serious disaster has occurred in Ontario in consequence of their depending upon one Chamber. In my experience, when helping to administer the affairs of the little province of Prince Edward Island we had very often to look at the statute-books of both Ontario and Quebec, and I am now speaking of the opinion of those opposed to myself in politics in Prince Edward Island as well as those associated with me, that by unanimous consent among us we found the statutes of Quebec were a better guide for us than the statute-book of Ontario. That is a good many years ago. But we found that the laws were better and more carefully enacted in Quebec than in the province of Ontario. I do not know that that is the verdict of others who had the same duties to perform that I had to perform away back before 1891, but I know that was our experience, and we attributed it to the fact that in Ontario they had not that supervision over the legislation that a second body gave, and the consequence was that the Acts were less carefully enacted than in Quebec. We find that in nearly all countries having representative institutions, second chambers are retained. That is the case in the United States. I have looked over the constitutions of all the countries of Europe and I find, with one single exception, Norway, that all the more important countries of the old world retain their second chambers. None of them are altogether elective directly by the people, perhaps with one exception. Some of them retain to some extent the elective principle. They have the nominative principle and other means of making selections, but they are all agreed, with the exception of Norway, on the principle of retaining a second chamber. That is what we gather from the experience of other countries. In nearly all the states of the American union they have second chambers, and as I have already remarked, in two of the most important provinces of Canada, Quebec and Nova Scotia, even for provincial affairs they have retained second chambers, although no person will pretend to say that second chambers are so important in the provinces as they are in a federal house. We come then to the uses of this second chamber, and why is it necessary that we should preserve it. The hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House has referred to the representation of sectional interest. Well that was what was in view to a very large extent when the constitution of our country was framed in 1867. Earl Kimberly in introducing the British North America Act to the House of Lords said that the second chamber, constituted as it was under that Bill, was the fundamental principle of the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There could have been no confederation without it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend says further there could not have been any confederation without it, and Earl Kimberly recognized that fact when he declared that it was the fundamental principle of the British North America Act. I may again quote from another remark made quite recently by the hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in which he says :

> This principle having been adopted admittedly for the protection of the smaller provinces, every one will admit at once that if we were to remove that safeguard, there would be a natural discontent in the smaller provinces, so that I contend that we cannot seriously entertain, even for a moment, the idea of ever abolishing the Senate. The arguments which we see from time to time in the press have altogether ignored that view of the constitution, which is a true one, and a paramount argument in favour of the maintenance of a second chamber

We turn to the case of the United States, and there we find that the fathers of the American union also adopted a second chamber, and also adopted the principle of the representation of the sectional interests of the country by going very much further in that direction than we did in the Dominion of Canada, in giving every state of the United Sates union the same vote in the constitution of the Senate. In the Australian provinces they have followed the same principle ; they have there given each state, large or small, six representatives ; and also in the federal union of Switzerland they have given the same representation to the large and small cantons, and in all these federal unions to which we have reference, the same principle has been recognized, of giving the small and outlying states an adequate representation in order to protect them to some extent against the large majorities which would be sure to be against them as possessed by the larger provinces in the popular House. As giving an illustration of the effective manner in which this has been used in the past, I will point to an incident that occurred in this House two years ago with regard to Prince Edward Island. A Bill had been passed in the other branch dealing with the question of communication between the island and the mainland, a Bill that had been brought before parliament by persons seeking charters for railways and also some rights in connection with communication between the island and the mainland. They were looked upon in that province as mere charter mongers that were interposing a difficulty in the way of the solution of the question of communication between the island and the mainland. When the Bill came before this House the four representatives from the island joined hands in asking this House to throw it out, and our action was effective, for having made a protest on behalf of our province we received the support of a large majority of this House, who agreed with us that we had a right to speak for the province in such a matter as that, particularly in the Senate, a body which was constituted for the purpose of protecting provincial interests. That Bill was thrown out, although it was unusual to reject a private Bill at the second reading. It is a striking illustration of the power of a province in the Senate, when its representatives act together, as they are likely to do when a question of that kind arises in which the rights of the province are seriously affected. The Senate of Canada is valuable, and valuable only on account of its legislative functions. Beyond this it may be said to have no functions at all, because in the matter of divorce the function is after all legislative. It ends in our passing a Bill and does not differ very materially, only in the matter of form, from the course pursued in regard to any other private Bill. It is only with regard to legislative functions of the Senate that we are called on to answer to the charges against us, although it is open for us to give reasons why under the Birtish constitutional system, we think this body should not be charged with any other than legislative functions. I will now turn to an opinion from Todd, in his book on parliamentary government in the colonies, in which he lays down the doctrine:

> It is only as a legislative body that the upper house in any colony can claim identity with the House of Lords. No kindred institution created by statute can be the counterpart of that august and venerable chamber, either in respect to its unique position in the English political system, or in the dignity and eminent personal qualities for which its individual members are usually conspicious. The adoption by a colonial upper chamber of the peculiar forms of parliamentary procedure which regulate the practice of the House of Lords, is indeed a suitable method of making a difference between themselves and the popular branch. But in no other way should a colonial senate or legislative council invite a comparison between themselves and the time-honoured hereditary House of Peers.

The Australian Senate is elected. The entire electorate of each province elects their quota of senators by a popular vote. How that system is going to work out in practice we cannot say, but, from our point of view, and at our distance, we would be inclined to think that it is a very clumsy method and not likely to prove satisfactory. We now come to the Canadian Senate and its point of usefulness as a legislative body, and, as I have before remarked, the functions of the Senate are only in the matter of originating and amending Bills and for that purpose I would turn to some figures that have been already presented to the House by the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles, and which I will just refer to for the purpose of showing that in the last six years we have in this House originated on an average each session 26 Bills and amended 30. It is not a very large record, but it seems to me that it is an answer to those who say, and say very unfairly, that the Senate is doing nothing; but there is more than that. In one of these Bills that we amended in 1903 we introduced 97 amendments—that is the Railway Act of that year—and over 70 of those amendments were accepted by the House of Commons. In that case we amended but one Bill, but there were over 70 amendments which the House of Commons accepted and which now form part of the law of the country. I have no hesitation in saying, having watched the progress of that Bill with great interest, that it would have been a very bad thing if it had become the law of this country without the work done on it after it left the House of Commons. I do not say that the House of Comons did not do its work on that Bill fairly well. A great deal of labour was put on it, but, after all they did, the wise and experienced men who applied themselves to it, and the time devoted to it, nevertheless it turned out that the measure required over 70 amendments after it came to this House, and those amendments were inserted in the Bill rendering its efficiency much greater than it would have been had it not been amended. The result of the work done on that Bill in this House is that very slight amendments have been found necessary to the Railway Act since then.

I will turn to another Bill which passed the House of Commons last year, came to the Senate and was sent to our Committee on Railways, and handled there and handled here also. I refer to the Ontario and Minnesota Power Bill. It contained eleven sections when it came here, and not one single section of that Bill went back to the House of Commons. We introduced amendments and made it a new Bill except the preamble, and the House of Commons accepted the Bill we sent back to them submissively and gracefully as a better one than they had sent to us. Although the number of Bills that we amended is not large, some of them were amended drastically, and the amount of labour put on them in this House and the care and attention they receive in the Senate and its committees demonstrate the usefulness of this House as a legislative body. I now come to another point which has been dealt with by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. Speaking from experience he said, as a minister, and having the misfortune of having arrayed against him in this House an adverse majority, if I heard him correctly, he was very sensible of the power of mischief which the upper House was capable of exerting when such a state of things occurred.

For the purpose of replying to my hon. friend and at the same time to remove many misunderstandings that exist in the country with regard to that subject, I shall refer very briefly to the record of this House during several periods since 1867. From 1867 to 1873 a Conservative government was in power and they had a Senate favourable to them. During that time, although there was a majority of the Government's friends in the Senate, one very important government Bill was rejected. It was a Bill introduced in 1868 for the purpose of applying the criminal laws of old Canada to the other provinces. A very strong opposition to that Bill came from Nova Scotia, and to some extent from the other provinces, and the senators notwithstanding the fact that they were politically in sympathy with the government of the day, rejected the Bill, because they thought there was not sufficient time to consider it and to compare the provisions of the criminal law of old Canada, with the criminal law still in force in the other provinces in order that justice might be done to the other provinces. That is the only instance of any important Bill being defeated between 1867 and 1873. Coming to another period between 1873 and 1878, I have a list of the government measures that were defeated during that period, and I have no hesitation in claiming that in every instance in which the Senate exercised its power to reject measures during that time, history has proved that they were right. It is all very well to make statements in the gross, but when you come down to particular and definite statements I do not think there is very much ground for argument. The first measure defeated in 1874 was a Bill to apply the election laws of Canada to my own province, Prince Edward Island. In passing that measure, the House of Commons and the government were ill-advised, because they interfered with the franchise of the province. We had an elective legislative council, and the councillors were elected by freeholders—£100 freeholders were the only persons who could vote for legislative councillors while the House of Assembly was elected by manhood suffrage, and the government of that day introduced the principle of making this freehold franchise the franchise on which members should be elected to the House of Commons from the province of Prince Edward Island. The representatives of the island in this body, irrespective of party, opposed that, and it was thrown out by the Senate, and the Senate did right. There was no second opinion in Prince Edward Island on the subject, and I had the pleasure of hearing my old friend and neighbour, Senator Haythorne, who was a Liberal senator and voted against the government Bill state that he could not come back to Prince Edward Island and look the poor men and the young men in the face and tell them that he had voted to take away their franchise.

Another Bill which the Senate rejected was the Tuckersmith Bill. It was introduced as a private Bill in the House of Commons and made a government measure in the Senate. Mr. Cameron of Huron had been elected in the general election and his seat was contested. He felt satisfied that he would be unseated and have to seek re-election. He introduced a Bill in the House of Commons to take the township of Tuckersmith, which had a large Liberal majority, from another riding and add it to his own, and thus make his election safe. The Bill was so unjustifiable that although fathered by the government of the day, the Senate threw it out. Mr. Cameron was unseated and went back to his constituents without the advantage he expected to derive from the addition of Tuckersmith to his riding, and was defeated.

We next come to the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Bill. That was a project adopted by the Mackenzie government as compensation to British Columbia for the delay that had occurred in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It was not called for by the terms of union with British Columbia, but the terms of the union required that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be built within a stated period connecting British Columbia with the eastern provinces of Canada. The government of Canada at that time showed an apathy in dealing with that question. They were understood not to be keeping faith with British Columbia. The British government was appealed to by the provincial government, and certain terms known as the Carnarvon terms, were suggested as a compromise, and a part of those Carnarvon terms was the proposition to build a railway by the Dominion on the Island of Vancouver, between Esquimalt and Nanaimo. When that measure came before the Senate it was strongly opposed and ultimately defeated by a small majority, but not on a strictly party vote. I have looked at the division and I find that the hon. senator from Richmond supported the government on that measure. However, a very small majority of the Senate threw out the Bill, and who will say to-day that it was not a good thing that the Bill was thrown out? If that Bill had passed and become law it would have delayed for many years the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, because the argument would have been used in the other provinces that British Columbia had got a fair compromise and should not press for the building of the railway. Both parties, after that, addressed themselves to the fulfilment of the terms with British Columbia, and the result was that the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, not immediately, but in due course of time, greatly to the credit and honour of Canada, and I do not think any one who will look at history carefully will fail to come to the conclusion that the senators of that day were far-seeing, because in throwing out that Bill they conferred a benefit not only on British Columbia but on the whole Dominion of Canada. There is only one other Bill of sufficient importance to be named at all, and that was the County Courts of Nova Scotia Bill. In 1876 the provincial government having arranged the jurisdiction in Nova Scotia so as to necessitate the appointment of some judges in that province, the federal government brought in a Bill for the appointment of more judges. The ground was taken that the government in power in Nova Scotia was a moribund government, was on the point of going to the people and it was doubtful whether the interests of justice in Nova Scotia called for the appointment of additional judges, and the Senate rejected the Bill in order to test that question, as to whether that was the opinion of the people of Nova Scotia. An election was held in the province and the government was sustained at all events on that point, and the legislature of Nova Scotia pressed for the appointment of judges, and the Senate next year passed the Bill. They only did what my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out was right for them to do, that was suspend the Bill. They held it over for consideration and enacted it the following year. If I have omitted any important Bill between 1873 and 1878, I am open to be reminded of it, but if these were the only important measures rejected by the Senate between 1873 and 1878 I will say this to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce that if the Senate had power to do mischief they took very great care not to exercise it during that period.

Now I come to another period, between 1878 and 1896. I do not know but that in all fairness the Senate may be exposed to more criticism during this period than in the former one, inasmuch as the government of Sir John A. Macdonald and the succeeding Conservative Premiers had a very large majority in the Senate, and the record of rejected Bills is not at all as large as probably it should have been. I may say that I believe that in those years, from 1878 to 1896, there was not as full a performance of duty on the part of the Senate as there might have been. However, there were two instances in that time of independent action on the part of members of this House. One of these was the Harvey and Salisbury Railway Bill, which was a government measure pressed upon this House by Sir John Abbott with all the ability he possessed, and that, as hon. gentlemen all know, was very considerable. My hon. friend from Richmond, although then as he still is, a strong Conservative, took the initiative in opposition to that Bill, although it was, as I have said, a government measure. I think if I have noted the record aright, my hon. friend moved the six months' hoist to that Bill, and it was rejected, not by any means on a party vote, for I notice that the member for Halifax, a very strong Liberal as he was then and is now, voted for the Bill; but nevertheless the measure was thrown out, and it embarrassed the government a good deal at that time. The Senate exercised its undoubted right on that occasion, and it is clear that the Senate was right, because no Bill has been introduced since for the purpose of building that railway. If the measure had been one which was justifiable we may be sure that in subsequent years the Senate would have been asked to deal with the measure again. They have never been asked to deal with it, although it is possible it may be covered to a partial extent, in the location of the National Transcontinental Railway through the province of New Brunswick, but it will not be completely and fully covered by that line no matter how it is located.

Now we come to the next period, within which the present government has been in power, and this I will divide into two parts, first from 1896 to 1902, during which time there was a Conservative majority in the Senate, and a Liberal administration in power supported by a large majority of the members of the House of Commons. The occurrences of this period of from 5 to 9 years ago are no doubt very fresh in the memory of hon. gentlemen in this House, and I dare say that this is the period which my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce had more particularly in view when he spoke of the mischief which the Senate is capable of doing with a majority adverse to the government controlling the upper House. Now I propose to deal with what it has done during that period, and I do not hesitate to say that I am confident of being able to satisfy most hon. gentlemen—I would even hope all hon. gentlemen in the House—that the Senate did nothing seriously wrong during that period. It would be a marvellous thing if we did nothing wrong, but I take the ground that during that period the Senate conducted itself with great moderation, and that history will determine that the action of the Senate with regard to the measures that were thrown out during this period was justifiable. Take first the Drummond County Railway Bill of 1897. Is there an hon. gentleman within the hearing of my voice who will say now that the Senate was not right in rejecting the Bill which was presented to us in 1897? Have events not proved that we were right with regard to that? It was thrown out on account of the improvidence of the financial terms made with two railway companies. As hon. gentlemen know very well that was the direction which the discussion took in this House, when that measure was before us, and the measure was rejected. It was reintroduced two years later by the government with very important modifications. So great were these modifications, these changes in the interests of the people of Canada, that an hon. gentleman in this House sitting on the other side, but whom I am sorry to see is not in his place just at this moment, in the discussion which took place on the Bill when it came before us in its amended form, made the admission that the Senate of Canada by its action in regard to the first Bill had saved no less than $400,000 to the country. I am speaking of the hon. member for Cobourg. I know that he was very much below the mark, that the amount would be nearer a million dollars than four hundred thousand, but I am taking a statement that will not be disputed as coming from the hon. gentleman from Cobourg, who we know is very careful in his remarks. Two years later, as I have said, that Bill was reintroduced with important changes and modifications, and the Senate on that occasion, although there was still a strong Conservative majority in the House, passed the Bill. Whether they did right or wrong, I am not prepared to say at this moment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They did wrong.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I know some hon. gentlemen here will say that we did wrong.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There is no doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am not going to argue that point. The point I want to make is to show the moderation which actuated the Senate. The Commons having asserted their position by making another contract, and having admitted the stand we had taken in 1897 by greatly modifying the terms of that contract when they brought in the new Bill, there was moderation enough amongst the Conservative majority of this House to vote for the second Bill and allow it to become law. Further, in 1897, when the first Bill was rejected, a crisis in this country was averted in consequence of the moderation of the Senate. There can be no doubt that the action of the House of Commons on the very night that the Senate rejected the Drummond County Railway Bill, when they brought in, about 11 or 12 o'clock, by means of a message from the Governor General, estimates containing provisions to over-ride the action of the Senate by leasing the very lines which we had refused to sanction the purchase of, was not justifiable. I shall not forget as long as I live the occurrences of the next day in the Senate, and the serious consideration which the senators gave to the issue which the government forced on them. I am bound to say that were it not for the moderation of the older men in this House, the men who had long experience in public life, among whom I may mention the late Senator Allen and my hon. friend the leader of the House at that time, the hon. member from Belleville, the hon. member for Richmond, and the hon. Mr. de Boucherville, many of the younger and more hot headed men would have provoked a crisis, by throwing out the Supply Bill. Had they done so on that occasion there is very great reason to doubt whether Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government would not there and then have come to an ignominious termination. But moderate counsels prevailed at the time, and the Drummond County Railway Bill became two years later the law of the land. Let me say before I leave that point, that a great deal of credit was due to Sir Oliver Mowat, the distinguished gentleman who led the government in this House during that trying time. If it were not that he was so conciliatory, and so reasonable, and made such acceptable promises to the House about the information that was to be given to us regarding the working of these leased lines—if it were not for that, I question very much whether, notwithstanding the moderate councils on this side of the House, the Senate would have pursued the mild course it did. It is a matter of great regret that Sir Oliver Mowat did not continue to hold his position in the House in order to carry out the promises which he made, and which he no doubt would have carried out. It is not to the credit of his colleagues that they persistently refused to this House the information which Sir Oliver Mowat solemnly promised us, when, as the result of such promise, a crisis in the affairs of the country had been averted.

It has been suggested that I should move the adjournment of the debate at this point. It is not convenient to stop at this juncture, but if it would suit the convenience of the House I am willing to do so. I move that the debate be adjourned until May 31.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (131) An Act respecting the Ottawa, Brockville and St. Lawrence Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (W) An Act respecting the Citizens' Bank of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Friday, May 18, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

PACIFIC AND ATLANTIC RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière) from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (K) An Act respecting the Pacific and Atlantic Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I move suspension of rule 71 as far as the same relates to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want to know the reason of the suspension of the rule ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The Bill passed the committee to-day, and it has to go to the Commons for consideration ; under those circumstances I should like if the House would suspend the rule so that the Bill may be read the third time to-day. It will facilitate the transaction of business and avoid any delays which might occur in consequence of our adjournment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that a Bill originating in this House ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

SOUTH AFRICAN CONTINGENTS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. Was any money as commission, rebate, bonus, compensation or otherwise paid directly or indirectly by the imperial authorities or by any officer or person acting for or on their behalf to the Militia Department of Canada, or to any officer or member thereof, or to any person acting for or on its behalf in connection with the outfitting of any Canadian troops, drafts or contingents to South Africa during the late Boer war ?
2. If so, by whom was the money paid, to whom and what was the amount ?
3. What was the service for which such amount was paid ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am informed by the Department of Militia that all expenditures out of Canadian funds on account of the South African Contingents are accounted for in the Auditor General's Reports of 1899, 1900, Q, pages 115 to 130, and 1900, 1901, Q, pages 107 to 129.

With reference to any expenditures on account of the South African Contingents not voted by the parliament of Canada, the government has no information to give.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That means the information is withheld. The government decline to give any information.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The government decline to give any information about any amounts not voted by the parliament of Canada, the imperial government are the proper parties to apply to, if my hon. friend desires information on that head.

VACANCY ON THE SUPREME COURT BENCH.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to know from the hon. Secretary of State, whether any progress has been made in the nomination of a judge of the Supreme Court ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not that I am aware of.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose we will have the information when we come back !

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot answer that.

GAME PRESERVATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (154) An Act to amend the Unorganized Territories Game Preservation Act, 1894.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill simply continues the law which was passed in 1894 for the preservation of the buffalo. The Act of 1894 prohibited the killing of them up to the 1st of January, 1900. In 1899 it was extended for two years ; in 1902 it was extended to the 1st of January, 1907. It is now proposed to extend the time for another five years.

Hon. Mr. OWENS, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS OF MONTREAL BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (124) An Act respecting the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I may state that the object of this Bill is to enable the government to replace the present board of commissioners in the harbour of Montreal by three commissioners to be appointed by the Governor in Council. Those commissioners will be paid officers and will hold office during pleasure. That is the whole purport of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Is the old board altogether dissolved ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The old board is altogether dissolved, and three gentlemen receiving salaries are appointed to look after the interest of the harbour. Of course they will be paid out of the harbour revenue.

Hon. Mr. COX, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

ERROR IN MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Senate adjourns, I wish to call the attention of the House to a little misunderstanding about the date to which the debate on the question of the Senate was adjourned. It was my intention, and I think I said the 30th ; but I was not heard distinctly, and it was put down for the 31st. That day will not be convenient for me ; and if it does not inconvenience any other hon. gentleman I wish to have it set down for the 30th, as I could not be present on the 31st.

Some hon. MEMBERS—All right.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I move that the order of yesterday be rescinded and that the debate on the question of the constitution of the Senate be continued on the 30th May.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned till Tuesday, 29th May, at eight o'clock p.m.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (Y) An Act to incorporate the Prince Albert, North Saskatchewan and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Davis.)

LEASE TO SIR CHARLES ROSS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. What is the superficial area, in feet, of the land in the city of Quebec at present occupied by Sir Charles Ross and rented by him from the federal government ?
2. What is the yearly sum paid to the government by Sir Charles Ross for the rental of this land ?
3. For how many years' rental has the contract of lease been signed ?
4. Is there in the contract of lease a clause which gives Sir Charles Ross or his heirs a prolongation of term, and for how many additional years, and at what rate ?
5. Is one of the Martello towers comprised in the land leased to Sir Charles Ross ?
6. Is there a special stipulation concerning the use, the maintenance and the repairs of this tower ?
7. Had Sir Charles Ross the right to put on top of the roof of this tower a reservoir for industrial purposes ?
8. Did the government consent to lease to Sir Charles Ross the land he now occupies, in spite of the representations of the citizens of Quebec, but with the approval of Mr. S. N. Parent, then mayor of the city ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers placed in my hands by the department are as follows :

1. 19·1 acres or 831,163 superficial feet, more or less.

2. $1 per year.

3. 99 years.

4. Yes, 99 years at same rental, renewable.

5. Yes.

6. No.

7. There was nothing in the lease to prevent his doing so.

8. There was no objection on the part of the citizens of Quebec. The application was recommended by His Worship S. N. Parent, mayor of Quebec.

It would seem from a resolution passed at a public meeting of the citizens of Quebec, duly convened in the fall of 1904, by his worship the mayor on requisition to that effect, in order to afford them an opportunity to consider an application made by Sir Charles Ross for additional land to enable him to extend the cartridge factory, that the citizens of Quebec were then strongly in favour of having the rifle factory on its present site.

The following is the resolution referred to :

Resolved, that this public meeting of the citizens of Quebec, duly convened by his worship the mayor, on requisition to that effect, in order to afford them an opportuntiy to consider the application made by Sir Charles Ross to the federal government for a part of the cove fields in addition to the tract already granted to him, desires to express its sincere gratitude to the government for what they have already so wisely and generously done to encourage an enterprise of such great present and prospective advantages to the country at large expense and to the city of Quebec in particular, and further to express the ardent hope of the overwhelming majority of the population of the latter, and especially of its working classes, that the government will do everything in their power to facilitate for the public benefit the extension of an undertaking which already furnishes employment for three hundred men at a weekly outlay of three thousand dollars for wages, and which will increase the number to one thousand, with a proportionate outlay, if the pending application of Sir Charles Ross be granted.

And furthermore we, the undersigned citizens of Quebec, desirous of promoting industrial enterprises in the city, which will give employment to labour and at the same time benefit the tradesmen and business interests of the city in general, pray the federal government to grant the promoter of the Ross Rifle Factory permission to enlarge the premises on the cove fields and thereby afford employment for at least an additional 500 men.

The petition, signed by 10,000 citizens in support of the application for additional land, was in the fall of 1904 presented to the premier.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There was no opposition ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No record of any opposition.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will remind the hon. gentleman on a future occasion of the opposition which he told us was against that building, brought up by the citizens of Quebec and which he announced himself to the House. It was contained in a petition. He said at that time it was given after the approval made by Mr. Parent.

THE GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY ARBITRATION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL inquired of the government :

Whether arbitrators were appointed under the powers vested in the government by cap. 16, 4 Edward VII., intituled : 'An Act respecting an arbitration between His Majesty and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada' ?

If so, has an arbitration been held, and a report of the result of such arbitration made, and will it, if made, be laid upon the Table of the Senate ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer to the first question is yes ; to the second, an arbitration has been held, and I beg to lay on the Table copies of the awards as rendered by the arbitrators in all except two cases in which a decision has yet to be given.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Can the hon. gentleman tell us what the two cases are ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I have not a memo of it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He will remember that when this question was before the Senate and the Bill was passed, many were anxious to know what the points of difficulty were which had arisen between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the government in reference to the bargain made between them as to the conveyance of freight from the west to the east via the Intercolonial Railway, and whether that bargain has been carried out. The hon.

gentleman will also remember that though a number of the concessions were made at the time which induced the Senate to consent to the passage of that Bill, it was pointed out that the wording of the Bill was of such a character as to lead to the difficulties which I apprehend have taken place, and the House will be somewhat interested to know what the result has been, also what the two points are to which the hon. gentleman refers, that have not yet been decided.

Hon. Mr SCOTT—I have not had an opportunity of reading the papers; in fact I only found them on my desk when I came into the House. I do not know whether reading the awards I have laid on the Table will throw some light on the subject. However I shall inquire as to those cases which stand over.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would move that as the House is rather thin we take the unopposed motions to-night, in order that they may be advanced a stage. Any motion opposed, I suggest, should be allowed to stand over until to-morrow, if that is the wish of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

VACANCY ON THE SUPREME COURT BENCH.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, will the hon. leader of the House be kind enough to let us know if the government has made a nomination of a judge to fill the vacancy in the Supreme Court?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not that I am aware of.

Mr. LANDRY—I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to this very grave fact that all the cases relating to the province of Quebec were last week once more postponed—to next week, I think. The other judge coming from the province of Quebec, Judge Girouard, refuses absolutely to sit upon any cases coming from the province of Quebec until such nomination is made; and I think the government ought not to refuse this justice to the province. To keep these cases over from session to session of the court without disposing of them is really a denial of justice, and I hope my hon. friend will be in a position to-morrow to let me know if something has been done to remedy this condition of affairs.

LA BANQUE PROVINCIALE DU CANADA BILL.

SECOND READING.

The Order of the Day being called:

Bill (49) An Act respecting La Banque Provinciale du Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, de Lanaudière.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it only fair, since we have a great many banks in this country now, that the hon. gentleman from de Lanaudière should briefly explain to the House the purport of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I understand this Bill is for the purpose of increasing the capital of the bank. It is a private Bill and when it goes before the Committee on Banking and Commerce, the promoters of the Bill will appear and make all the necessary explanations as is usual in cases of this kind. The Bill also provides for giving power to re-divide the shares and to give options on exchange of shares. This bank was formerly the Bank Jacques Cartier of Montreal. It had in the past a rather checkered career, but for the last five or six years it has been put on a very good basis; and it has been so successful that now the directors of the bank believe that with an increase of capital they could meet the growing demand for branches throughout the province of Quebec. I have no doubt that when this Bill is fully explained before the committee the committee will see fit to grant the powers asked for.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for his lucid explanation. I do not myself see anything in the Bill about any increase of capital, but I suppose there might have been something of the kind there.

COLONIAL BANK OF CANADA BILL.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved the second reading of Bill (T) An Act to incorporate the Colonial Bank of Canada. He said :

This Bill is to incorporate a bank to operate largely in the west. The rapid development of the part of Canada renders it necessary that we should have increased banking facilities. It is the usual application for an Act of incorporation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have no special objection to this particular Bill ; but it strikes me that the Senate should proceed slowly and carefully in the matter of adding to the number of banks in this country. We have a great many banks ; and, up to the present time, most of them have been successful and are quite capable of doing all the banking business which the country requires to be done. There is some danger that if we go on incorporating numerous banks each session the results which may come, after the present high tide of prosperity passes and the flood recedes a little, may not be satisfactory to the country at large. I suppose the hon. gentleman from Killarney is able to tell us if the gentlemen mentioned in the Bill as provisional directors are all men of considerable means and the sort of men who ought to be at the head of a banking institution ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If the hon. gentleman will read the names in clause four of the Bill he will find some of them at least are a guarantee of good faith on the part of the applicants. I know some of them myself to be men of standing. I agree heartily with what the hon. gentleman said, that we must have sound banking institutions, and if there is anything in our Banking Act which will permit of loose incorporation, then it would be well for the Senate to look into that and prevent it. I am advised by one of these gentlemen that the promotors have the capital ready to proceed with the establishment of the bank. Some two years ago they contemplated starting a bank with certain provisions which were in conflict with our Canada Banking Act. The gentlemen who, I understand, are behind this, are from the other side of the Atlantic, and were desirous of having a peculiar charter of their own. The Finance Department would not vary any of the conditions of the banking system of Canada. Since then these gentlemen, I am advised, have come to the conclusion that the provisions of the Banking Act of Canada are good enough for them to invest their money under. They apply for a capital of three million dollars and it is evident they are ready to put money into the institution, and under the same conditions that apply to all banks in Canada.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am glad the hon. gentleman has mentioned the fact that they are applying for a capital of three millions. That is the worst feature of the Bill. All the other banks in Canada have started usually with one million dollars, and after the rest was brought up to a reasonable amount, further extensions were asked for and granted from time to time. Under our banking system, unfortunately, the circulation of this new bank without any rest would be equal to its capital of three million dollars. The greatest care should be exercised with respect to the amount of capital that any new bank should be granted. Let them go slowly like the other banks which have built up not only a reputation but a reserve in addition to capital. It is true that we require a double liability, but it would be unfair for a bank of this kind to be allowed a capital of three million dollars with a circulation equal to its paid up capital and without any reserve whatever.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The warning given by the hon. member from Halifax might very properly apply to insurance and loan companies. Before incorporating any new companies of the kind we ought to go very carefully. We have seen what those companies are coming to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I do not think that any of our insurance companies are in jeopardy.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I largely agree with the remarks of the hon. member from Halifax with regard to the propriety of going very cautiously in the matter of granting bank charters, and I also agree with the remarks of the hon. member from Lincoln. Some steps should be taken to restrict the granting of charters. I do not ask that the line be drawn at this particular Bill. These gentlemen have as good a right to a charter as any of their predecessors, but I know that in some cases where charters have been granted the promoters have had to canvass to get men to contribute the necessary amount of capital to put the institution into operation, and in several cases they have had to come here for an extension of time to enable them to procure the necessary funds. I am very much afraid that we are laying the foundation for serious financial disasters in future years when a stringency may unfortunately strike us. Some of those weak institutions will make every effort to do large business, but the result may be that they will be caught with a lot of sail out and very serious injury to the business community may arise. I do think that the government should give their close attention to the present law with regard to the chartering of banks, and that in place of simply asking that the minimum paid up capital should be two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and the capital subscribed a million dollars, it would be well, that the paid up capital should be raised to half a million, before a charter is granted enabling a bank to go into operation. I agree entirely with the hon. gentleman from Lincoln (Hon. Mr. Gibson) when he points out the danger of granting a charter for three million dollars, thus giving the bank the opportunity of increasing its circulation when perhaps there is not sufficient funds behind it to warrant their going on and doing a large business. We should be very careful. We are all very proud of our banking institutions in Canada, and we have a right to be proud of them. They have received great credit for the way in which financial matters in this country have been conducted for many years, and we are glad to say we have had but very few failures. That is one chief reason why we should go slowly, why we should guard in the future against the establishment of weak institutions that might bring discredit upon our whole banking system, and I quite agree with the remarks which have been dropped in that direction. I would like to see the Finance Minister carefully review and recast the present Banking Act so that greater stability would be given in the establishment of new banking institutions, than there is under the existing law.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman with regard to the desirability of going slowly in the matter of chartering new banks. Very often, if not in every case, when these new banks are launched it is as a result of the efforts of some gentleman who is looking for a position as manager, and he takes the matter up and solicits support in order to get the bank started. It is undeniable that the banking institutions of the country at present are in almost all respects furnishing ample facilities for doing business. They are opening up branches to a surprising extent. Competition of the keenest kind is going on in towns and villages where it is hard to conceive that they can get sufficient business to warrant their action. There is just one respect in which there may be necessity for more banking capital, although I do not think it should come in this way; and that is with regard to the circulation. For the past two years, with the heavy crops which we have had in this country and the other products which had to be moved, it was found that many banks had reached the limit of their circulation and efforts had to be made in order to meet the increased demand. I am one of those who believe that the better way of meeting that demand would be for the existing banks to increase their capital. They are in a position to do it advantageously; they can put their new stock on the market on such terms as will give better security to the country, and, at the same time, add largely to their rest account. I think that would be a better way of getting any additional banking facilities that are needed, rather than chartering new and weak institutions which will have as the hon. gentleman from Lincoln pointed out, a right of circulation equal to their capital just as much as a bank that has a rest of two or three times as much as its capital, thus really imposing a burden upon existing banks, because they guarantee the circulation of these weak banks. Taking all these things into consideration, I think the department should be advised to look very carefully into all these new applications and prevent weak institutions from coming into existence. Whatever encouragement may be necessary—I do not say that any is necessary—should be given to the existing institutions, and I think all needs will be fully met if the established banks were to increase their capital. With that would come the increased circulation which the country needs.

The motion was agreed to.

NORTHWEST COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS' ASSOCIATION OF CANADA BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved the second reading of Bill (V) An Act respecting the Northwest Commercial Travellers' Association of Canada. He said: I am advised that the Northwest Commercial Travellers' Association is incorporated under the laws of Manitoba. They desire to extend their usefulness beyond the confines of the province, and, therefore, they are making application for a Dominion charter. There is some slight change in the management of the institution.

The motion was agreed to.

On the motion that the Bill be referred to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is one point with respect to this measure. Parliament is asked to recognize as a corporation a body which has been incorporated by the provincial legislature of Manitoba. I remember that some years ago our Committtee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours adopted the policy under which it was rendered necessary that when any provincial Act of incorporation was, so to say, made a portion of the law of the Dominion, the provincial law should be given as a schedule to the Bill which made it law. I do not see the hon. chairman of the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills in the House now, but I think that the attention of the committee should be directed to that point; and if we are going to give this company certain powers which are set forth in the Manitoba Act, that Act should appear as a schedule to this Bill, so that we may know what we are doing.

CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. David :—That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all petitions, resolutions or documents concerning the abolition or reorganization of the Senate.—Hon. Mr. Ferguson.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Would it not be well to allow the unopposed orders to go through first.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—After consulting with the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David), we have agreed, with the consent of the House, to put this motion off until Tuesday next, as I understand there are quite a number of gentlemen who wish to speak, and by postponing the debate in this way, it could then go on continuously.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Have you any arrangement ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have no arrangement except that I have spoken to the hon. gentleman from Mille Iles.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not see why the debate cannot go on now ? I think there should be no unnecessary delay.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There will be this advantage—it is understood that quite a number of hon. gentlemen wish to speak and the debate could go on continuously without being broken into. What led up to this was that the hon. gentleman from St. John (Hon. Mr. Ellis) asked me, as he was not going to be present to-day, to have the matter put off, and therefore I make the motion that the order of the day be discharged and that it be made the first order of the day for Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Two hon. gentlemen have spoken on the other side of the House and only one on this. Do you want three to go on on that side of the house ? You have no right to make an arrangement of that kind.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I made no arrangement with Mr. Ellis or with any one else as to the order of speaking. I merely said when he spoke to me, that with the consent of the House, I would have the motion adjourned until he should be present.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (Z) An Act to incorporate the Fording Valley Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

BAKER DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg) moved the third reading of Bill (R) An Act for the relief of Harriette Wesley Baker.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved in amendment :

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by adding at the end of the first section, the words : 'so far as regards the said Harriette Wesley Baker,' and by adding to the second section the following subsection :—

2. The said Francis Shaw Baker may not lawfully marry any other person during the lifetime of the said Harriette Shaw Baker.

He said : In pursuance of the notice which I gave, I propose to move this amendment to the motion just made by my hon. friend from Cobourg. It seems to me that, whatever our views may be as to the propriety of divorce in any case, it is the duty of every hon. member of this House to do what he reasonably can to discourage the violation of the marriage vow, and to discourage all conduct which leads to that violation and opens the door for divorce. I submit that in passing this Bill in the form in which it now appears, we do not do that, but, on the contrary, we rather encourage the violation of the marriage vow and offer a sort of premium to it. The amendment which I have given notice of, provides that in case a divorce is granted by parliament the guilty party shall not be at liberty to marry again : that the innocent party, the petitioner, shall be allowed to marry again, but that the guilty party shall not be allowed to marry again during the life time of the petitioner. I think on the face of it that is a reasonable propositon. Now, take the way in which the present system operates. We will say a husband violates his marriage vow. What is the penalty ? The penalty is that he is separated from the woman to whom he is married, but is at liberty to marry any other woman. In what respect is the petitioner better off than the respondent ? In no respect ; but the petitioner is really worse off. The petitioner has to take the trouble, and go to the expense, of bringing about the passing of a divorce Bill through parliament. The wife who is the innocent party has to advertise in the 'Gazette' and in the newspapers ; she has to employ counsel, and she has to pay the expense of the printing of the Bills and other papers and she has to appear before the committee. The husband, the guilty party, simply sits still and does nothing. When the Bill becomes law he is free just as his wife is free, and he is free to marry again just as she is. I contend that that is not an equitable condition of things. We can see that this really leaves it open to a man—it is better to put it in that way I think—it really leaves it open to a man to designedly commit the offence with the view of being separated from his wife. If he gets tired of her, or if he sees some other woman who pleases his fancy more, he simply violates his marriage vows and the onus is put on his wife of getting the divorce. I think the course we have followed of late years is really not in the interests of morality, nor is it consistent with our sense of justice. I may say with respect to this last point that sometimes the result under our practice has really encouraged the commission of adultery. The equity judge of Nova Scotia whose duty it is to try divorce cases, informed me some time ago that he had no doubt but that in many cases the offence was committed simply with a view to leading the other party to bring the divorce suit and free the guilty party from the bonds of marriage. Suppose we adopt the amendment which is proposed, and that this House adopts the policy of prohibiting the marriage of a guilty party, one effect of this would be to put an end, at once, or as soon as the policy of parliament became known, to what is, although not technically collusion, is practically collusion—where one party commits the offence with the view of having a divorce granted to the other party, or where a party who might possibly make a good defence refrains from doing so because he wishes to be free. If this amendment is adopted, that practice will not prevail. The new policy would offer an inducement to men and women to observe their marriage vows, and I think that is a policy which should commend itself to the members of this House. I do not propose to say anything more. I simply make this brief statement of the reasons why I think we should adopt the policy indicated by the amendment, and, perhaps, if any objection which seems a strong one is brought up, I may be allowed to say a few words in reply in support of my amendment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—For some three or four years I have considered it my duty to express my views in regard to this question of divorce as it now prevails in Canada. I remember distinctly having stated some three years ago that if divorce was to obtain any sway in this country through the authority of the Senate, the Senate should be very careful in exercising that authority ; and I held that if in married life causes were sufficient to grant a separation to either the wife or the husband, that parliament should not grant to the guilty party the right of re-marrying. That was the stand I took on the floor of this House when I came into it, and I am now proud to find an eloquent echo of the views that I held then and hold now, coming from the mouth of the hon. senator from Halifax. I hope that his colleagues in this House will endorse the stand he has taken, and will limit the evil results of divorce in the way he has proposed in this amendment. If a divorce is necessary—and I believe that no divorce is necessary—if a divorce is to be granted by this honourable House, let not the Senate of Canada give to the guilty man or the guilty woman the same rights that it affords the innocent party. I fully endorse, and the country will endorse, the attitude assumed to-day by the hon. senator from Halifax. I think he is echoing the sentiment and the best moral opinion of the country. We should not stand here to-day and be called upon to vote, whether we be Protestant or Catholic, for a separation between man and wife and give equal rights to both parties. Where both parties are guilty there should be no divorce. It was pointed out here at one of the last meetings of this honourable House that the question was not put to the husband: 'Are you equally guilty?' I forget which hon. senator brought the point up, but I think it was a necessary question to be put. The Divorce Committee did not put the question to the husband. The husband proved the wife to be guilty. That is admitted; but the committee did not put to the husband the question as to whether he was equally guilty of a similar offence. When the petitioner and respondent are both guilty, no divorce should be granted. I am in hearty sympathy with this amendment not only on account of my personal views but on account of the feeling that I have for the social welfare and morality of our community. I think that the hon. senator from Halifax should have in this matter the unanimous endorsement of the House. It is not asking too much from those of us who do not believe in divorce. It is an initial step in the right direction. I am prepared to support the hon. gentleman from Halifax in limiting the evil results that flow from divorce unfairly granted, granted I am sorry to say, on evidence that would not hang a cat in an ordinary court of justice. That I am bound to say, as a man who knows what the law of evidence is. Under the circumstances I feel it my duty to express before the House and before the country the view that parliament must respect the sanctity of the marriage tie as far as it is possible to do so.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think any hon. member of this House will agree that the Senate and parliament are not the proper tribunal for divorce proceedings. Some change ought be made, and while I fully agree with the resolution moved by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, I should like to see him go further and propose some scheme to remove divorce altogether out of parliament and out of the Senate. I was on the Divorce Committee some years ago, and I can say that many senators, myself among the number, were not qualified to dissect evidence and to take evidence in the proper way, and I have seen senators carried away by their feelings against the evidence in favour of one party or the other, so that it is very seldom that people coming before the Senate for divorce really get justice. If, therefore, the Senate would agree to refer the subject of divorce to a court of law, or some such tribunal, I think that is the only proper way. Our present system is too old-fashioned. It was the custom in England some years ago that the House of Lords should grant divorce, but it is now referred to the courts of law. Some years ago I brought in a Bill to refer divorce cases to the Exchequer Court of Canada. As hon. gentlemen know, the Catholic members of this House and parliament were strongly opposed to anything of that kind. They thought it would encourage applications for divorce, but I do not think it would. The evidence taken in the divorce courts would be properly dissected and a proper judgment would be given, and not given to this party or that party on account of individual feelings. I hope that before long some measure will be taken to lift this matter entirely out of parliament and out of the Senate and that it will be referred to the courts of the country.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I must say a few words on behalf of the abused body of men which constitute the Divorce Committee of the Senate. None of us sought the position we occupy. It is not a matter which is at all attractive for any one to be engaged in. Parties outside are very apt to think that juicy morsels of scandal come before the members of the Senate committee, and that they are rolling these morsels around under their tongue all the time, and that they are anxious to be on the committee that they will sacrifice anything to be there. I know there is not a gentleman on that committee who does not more or less view all the proceedings that are taken before us with distaste, and for the members of the committee to be attacked as we are in this House almost every time—it has got to be almost every time we present a report—is a little too much. We simply try to do our duty. We have a law which provides that the Divorce Committee shall hear divorce cases and make their reports to this House. But we have no interest in the cases that come before us. All we have to do is to hear the evidence. We are instructed by our rules to hear the evidence, determine the case and to report accordingly. We try to do that to the best of our ability. If we fail, in doing so, it is only because all human beings are liable to error and we are no more infallible than our fellows. But we have had experience on that committee. Some hon. gentlemen have been appointed to the committee recently but there are others who have been there fourteen or fifteen years. We have the opportunity of hearing the evidence given before us, and we see the way in which the witnesses who appear before us comport themselves, which is denied to the general body of senators who have not that opportunity, and, therefore, we can weigh the evidence that is given before us better than hon. gentlemen who have not heard the witnesses. But it seems to me that we are always on trial, and we are liable to attacks and I do not think this House will tolerate such a remark as has been made, that the committee have granted divorces on evidence on which a court of justice would not hang a cat. I think it is an outrage to characterize a body of men in this House, who are trying to do their duty, in such a way, and to allow such a remark to be made in this House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—We have nothing whatever to do except construe the law as it appears before us, and we do our duty in that way. I have a great deal of sympathy with the gentlemen who belong to a certain religion who are opposed to divorce. I sympathize with them in every way, where they are conscientiously opposed to it, and I am sure that if I had the same views I would probably press them, not in the same way as one hon. gentleman who has spoken here has done, but in the moderate way in which the hon. gentleman from Halifax has put forward his opinions. He is a gentleman whose views are entitled to a great deal of regard and respect in this House. He pays a great deal of attention to matters which come before us. His opinions do not always meet with the approval of the House, perhaps, but he is trying to do his duty. Now in reference to the matter in respect of which the motion has been made to-day, whether or not this committee should be entitled to debar the guilty party—that is really what it amounts to—from being married again, that matter has never been relegated to them and we have not before this had the opportunity of doing so at all. But my experience, and I think the members of the committee who have been a long time on the committee will agree with me in saying that our experience has shown that where, as often has occurred, two young people marry in early life, before their judgment has matured, and they have afterwards found they were incompatible and unable to live together and have drifted apart, one or other of the parties has committed adultery, and that party is divorced accordingly. Now it may easily happen—and I venture to say there is scarcely a gentleman in this House who cannot instance a case himself where men and women have transgressed in that way and have again married. They can cite instances where this occurred among the most respectable people of the community. Many a couple have been married and afterwards concluded they had made a mistake, but those same parties may later on meet the counterpart of what they fancy and be married again and become respectable members of the community. I can mention people occupying high positions in this country who have been divorced and remarried and raised their families and have been happy members of the community. I say, therefore, supposing that it be the woman who is divorced and who may, perhaps, in only one instance have transgressed, if she is debarred from being married again what is the result? She is thrown upon the world. She has no protector. There are natural feelings that come to everybody, yet a party so situated cannot marry again. She has no way of starting in life. Are we to perpetuate the fault that this woman has herself indulged in? We perpetuate it by keeping her in a position where she can never be an honest woman again if we agree to the proposed amendment. Whereas if we give her a start again we will have two happy parties who otherwise would be driven into a life of celibacy or a life of prostitution as the case may be. I think it would be an unfortunate thing to put this House on record to bind every case that came before us to make a rule of this sort, that the respondent in a divorce proceeding cannot marry again.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I think it is my duty as a Roman Catholic to say a few words on the subject. First let me say that the feeling I entertain for the Divorce Committee is one of the most profound respect and gratitude for doing a duty which no other committee is entrusted with, a duty which is the most arduous, difficult and painful to people's feeling which it is possible to entrust to man, and therefore I think this Senate is bound on every occasion possible to give that committee exceptional honour and to have confidence in their judgment and in their deliberations. For my part I have confidence in the committee. I come here as a Catholic opposed to divorce. What right have I to vote at all? The duty of a Roman Catholic here is to refrain from putting in his oar in this business at all. Leave it to the wicked Protestants. We should not meddle with the matter in any way. If other people chose to commit sin let them do it. We cannot restrain them.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—That is a wrong doctrine.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The hon. gentleman from Hawkesbury is in a peculiar position at this time. I do not wonder at his speaking with a great deal of feeling. Supposing the Roman Catholics—because they are the ones that are always kicking up a row about divorce—persist in their course, what will be the result? The result will be that the committee will not continue its laborious and painful duty any longer, and you will have a divorce court established, and then the Catholics will have contributed to immorality because there will be a great many more divorces granted as soon as the court is established in Ontario than at the present time. I contend as a Catholic that it is the duty of Catholics not to interfere in this matter, because it is the lesser of two evils. If they should, by their nagging at this committee, be the cause of such a change and a court is established, then the evil will be greater than it was before. I beg, as a member of this Senate, to inform that committee, as I have said inside of this House and outside of it, that they are deserving of every honour and confidence and consideration which this Senate can show them.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY. I quite agree with the last speaker. I think the Divorce Committee of this Senate deserve a great deal of credit for the pains and trouble they have taken in the various cases brought before them. The hon. gentleman from British Columbia (Hon. Mr. Macdonald) states that he is in favour of a divorce court. The province of British Columbia with a divorce court of its own from 1868 to 1902 had sixty divorces granted; Nova Scotia, with its own court, 125 cases; New Brunswick, with its own court, seventy-five cases, a total of 260, with a population of 1,000,000.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—There were only six cases in Nova Scotia last year.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—I am speaking of the period from 1868 to 1902. Ontario in that time had about eighty divorce cases granted, and Quebec about eighteen. Manitoba and the Northwest about six cases—less than a hundred—with a population of 5,000,000 granted by the courts, and here in the province of Ontario with a population of one million they have had two hundred and six cases. That speaks for itself. I do not think we want a divorce court in Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is one serious objection to this motion, and it is that it is not general in its character. If it be the opinion of the Senate that the provision or the doctrine laid down in the resolution should be adopted and carried out, then I would suggest that a Bill be introduced confirming the principle involved in this resolution, in order to prevent in future constant debates on this subject, as must necessarily follow if this motion be adopted, because the motion only applies to the particular case which is before the Senate at the present moment. The hon. gentleman intimates, in fact his resolution says, that he proposes to make a similar motion in every case that comes before the Senate. If we had a Bill affirming the principles involved in this amendment, that would put an end to such discussions in the future, and we should not have upon every occasion debates of this unsavory character. There is another objection which suggests itself to my mind—or rather it is an objection to the general terms of this motion, because it applies to every case. It provides for the prevention of the marriage tie the second time in cases where it was established before the Divorce Committee that the crime had been committed for the purpose of obtaining divorce. Even then I am not sure that I would vote for it, because in that case it would show not only immorality but it would show a depraved state of mind on the part of the person who desired to obtain the divorce. Where the crime was committed for that special purpose I would deprive the parties of the right of marrying again, but there is a great deal of force in the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Brandon. If you prevent in all cases a re-marriage you leave the parties who have been separated in a position in which probably they would continue for the remainder of their lives, in the same state of violation of the moral law. These are two points that have suggested themselves to my mind. I am fully in accord with my hon. friend from Kingston upon the question of a divorce court. I think it would be a curse to this country. We have seen results of divorce courts in the United States, where you may have a judge who has very loose ideas upon matters of this kind and if you go to Dakota or one or two of the states I could mention, the most trivial difficulties between man and wife are sufficient to secure a decree. We do not want that state of society in this country. I can readily understand the disagreeable character of the work which the Divorce Committee have to do, and under no consideration would I accept a position, speaking personally, on that committee; but, as the law stands, a committee must be appointed under the constitution and the duties must devolve upon that committee of deciding these questions.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Supposing the members all decline to act, what will happen then ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then perhaps so much the better. I am inclined to think that if I occupied a position on that committee and the remarks which have been made by certain gentlemen in this House were repeated, if they were worth paying attention to, I would throw up the sponge at once and tell him to go there himself. When hon. senators have uncomfortable and unsavory duties to perform they are entitled to every consideration. That is my idea of the matter. The hon. gentleman from Halifax introduced this motion in a manner unobjectionable to every member of the Senate, considering the strong views that he holds. I am not at all surprised that he has taken this moderate form of trying to cure what he considers to be a moral evil that exists in the country. Still if we want to put a stop to these constant discussions, and it is the opinion of the House that the views embodied in that amendment are correct, let us have a general law to put an end to it for all time to come. We have four or five cases now and there would have to be a similar motion made for each case. There are certain cases in which this crime has been committed for the purpose of obtaining a separation, and I am not so sure that I would vote for it if it were confined to such cases, but under the present circumstances I am very much inclined to the view that if this should be done it may lead to the evil which the hon. senator for Kingston has pointed out, the changing of the constitution, and placing on the statutes a law referring these things to the judges. Then if we understand human nature and look at the results which have followed that system in the neighbouring republic, I do not think the proposed change would lead to anything creditable to this country.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I have no hesitation in seconding the motion of my hon. friend from Halifax. I believe in divorce where divorce is necessary, as it is defined under the laws of Canada. There is but one cause for which divorce can be granted under our system and there is nothing so objectionable and revolting to higher manhood and womanhood than a law which would compel man or woman to live with a person guilty of adultery. I am strongly in favour of a law which will grant separation from any one guilty of that offence, but the guilty party should not be allowed to marry again. I do not take any stock in the argument advanced by the hon. senators from Belleville and Brandon. The idea that a woman, because she has been found guilty of the offence charged and refused permission to marry again, would live a life of debauchery is absurd. We have millions of women who live virtuous lives who have never married. My hon. friends assume that because a woman is denied the right of marrying she will therefore resort to a life of shame. That is a preposterous idea. I shall vote for my hon. friend's motion, because I believe that any person, man or woman, found guilty of violating the marriage vow, and divorced therefor, should not be allowed to marry again.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—As a member of the Divorce Committee I assure this House that not a member of that committee fails to discharge his duty with an honest and sincere desire to see justice and nothing but justice done in every case. We never recommend a separation unless the committee is clearly convinced by the evidence, that the crime charged has been committed. Now, with regard to the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, it might on the face of it be looked upon as a prudent thing to debar the guilty party from entering into the marriage covenant again, but when you come to consider the question you find that it is impracticable. Supposing you do adopt that as the law, you cannot prevent the divorced person from crossing the St. Lawrence river, contracting a marriage there and returning to this country. Is it the desire of the House that such a condition of things should prevail ? Suppose in this Baker case you deny the respondent the right to marry again, owing to the manner in which he has treated his wife; he can go to the United States, marry there, and return with his wife to live in Canada, and you cannot punish him for so doing. There is nothing to be gained by a law of that kind. If that were the law the committee would have to enforce it in every instance, but it would prove ineffective. The question is whether it is better when the law has been violated by either party to the marriage contract to let that person form another union as the law of the country permits, or restrict them in such a way that they will go elsewhere and get married.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Does the hon. senator state that is the law ?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—That is the law, certainly.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is not the law in our province.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—I wish to say, first of all, that although I am not in favour of divorce—indeed strongly opposed to it—I think the Divorce Committee in discharging, honestly and well, the duties imposed upon it, has placed this country under a deep debt of obligation, and has made the Senate much more important than it would be if that work were not being done by it. From time to time I receive literature in the shape of reports, and I can unreservedly bear testimony to the thoroughness and at the same time the delicacy with which the examinations are conducted. I have not heard one word against the committee's methods : on the contrary I have heard nothing but praise. But I will not advance the opinion of others : I simply state my own conviction that the work of the committee is done in an admirable manner. I was amused at the sophistry of one hon. gentleman when he seemingly thought that marriage, for a woman, and especially for a fallen woman, was a necessity to help her, with a new husband—or a second, third or fourth, perhaps, to return to the path of virtue. I cannot allow that to pass without challenge. There are virgins, thousands upon thousands of them all over the world, who remain virgins all their lives and whose hearts and morals remain pure. Remarriage is not a necessity, I think if there was a novitiate for marriage as there is in regard to the taking of religious vows, there would not be so many who would enter married life. As the French have it : 'Si le mariage avait un noviciat il n'y aurait que très peu de professes.' I am glad that this amendment has been proposed by the hon. senator from Halifax. To me it is a necessary amendment to the law. Last session we had reports containing evidence of actions the most abominable I have ever heard of. Hon. gentlemen know the cases to which I allude. I have never read anything so foul in my life. To whitewash women of that kind, and to let them go forth into the community to become the wives of honest men should be prevented. I have known young women to fall through poverty, love of dress, excitement, fear and so forth, but longed for a virtuous life, and I have known them, subsequently to have become the strongest exponents of virtue in our community. There are not many of them it is true. Because women when they fall, fall from a higher plane and fall much further than men do, and unhappily those of their sex do not readily help them to rise. Men fall more quickly; not so far, but more quickly. I would prefer to see a discretionary power left to the committee; but if that cannot be granted I would be strongly in favour of preventing an obstinately vicious woman from contracting a second marriage with an honest man and ruining his life, or an obstinately vicious man from contracting a second marriage with an honest woman and blasting her happiness.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It was not my intention to make any remarks in reference to this motion, although I may state at the outset that I disagree with it. I think it will have no beneficial effect, and perhaps it may have an injurious effect. That being the case, I do not think it is in the interests of the Senate, that they should adopt this amendment. I wish to refer to a remark made by some of the speakers in reference to the conduct of the committee. One hon. gentleman went so far as to say that we granted divorces on evidence that would not hang a cat. That gentleman may have the opportunity of weighing the evidence if he wishes to do so, because it is all published, and before the House. He will find, if he reads it, that the greatest precaution is used in that committee to see that the evidence is ample and sufficient. As far as the proposed amendment is concerned, will it prevent guilty parties from marrying again? If it did so what would be the result? As has been pointed out by the chairman of the Divorce Committee, they will live together in immorality, violating the law in the future as they did in the past; therefore, I think the amendment will not accomplish any beneficial effect. Further, if we believe, as the amendment conveys the impression, that we ought to do a certain thing, why not pass a divorce law to cover the difficulty generally? Why not introduce a Bill to prevent all who have been divorced, from remarrying? Why attach a rider to each and every divorce Bill, as much as to reflect upon the Divorce Committee in granting the petition? In Ontario we have only the divorce court held here in the Senate. In other countries they have divorce courts in which they grant not only legal separation but divorces. Go to England, or to any other enlightened country; have they arrived at the conclusion to adopt a principle such as my hon. friend from Halifax has introduced? Do they prevent divorced people from remarrying? As has been stated by the hon. gentleman from Wellington, if these parties, after having been divorced, wish to get married again, all they have to do is to cross over into the United States and go before some justice of the peace there and remarry. Can we interfere with them? I think that argument of itself is ample and sufficient to show that this amendment will not accomplish the object which is desired. Can we prevent people who violate the marriage tie, and violate the vows they have made before their Maker, can we make them pure and upright, just and honest, by any legislation of this kind? I fail to be able to apprehend any such idea, and feeling very strongly upon this matter, I say that I think the amendment is not desirable. As regards the remarks made by my hon. friend from Wolseley (Hon. Mr. Perley) that he believed so-and-so, I have just as high an appreciation, just as warm a heart, towards female society I think, as he possibly can have; but I know full well what human nature is. I have seen enough of human nature, and therefore I feel that no woman or no man who has been guilty of the crime of adultery should be deprived of the privilege of marrying again. Supposing they are debarred by law from remarrying, will it prevent them from going elsewhere and marrying again under the laws of a foreign country ? Under the circumstances I have no hesitation in vindicating the action of the Divorce Committee. I say they are conscientious, they are desirous of doing right, they are desirous of rendering no decision in favour of any party unless they have positive and sufficient evidence to sustain them. I, therefore, shall vote against the amendment.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—The matter before the House has been one of painful interest, but I trust the discussion will be productive of good. The acting chairman of the Divorce Committee has so ably vindicated the action of that committee, that I will not attempt to say anything further than to state that his views are entirely my own. I think, looking at the record of divorces in the several provinces of this Dominion, as presented by the hon. senator from Moncton, that this Dominion is to be heartily congratulated that the evil has not assumed greater dimensions within our borders. Canada will compare favourably with the records of any other country in the matter of divorce. My own opinion is, and I give it after intelligent consideration, that the Divorce Committtee of this Senate, and the method of granting divorce by legislation only, has been one cause of keeping the evil down to a minimum ; and I think that every hon. senator, upon reflection, whether he is or not opposed in principle to divorce, will come to that conclusion. It is an evil, but we have to deal with it ; and the question is how to deal with it in the best possible manner, to repress the evil. I am not at all in sympathy with the amendment proposed by the hon. senator from Halifax. I do not believe in keeping an erring one continuing a life of shame. I think that would be the effect of this amendment. I would always, on all occasions, and everywhere, say to an erring one : 'Go in peace and sin on more,' rather than condemn such unfortunates to continue in a life of shame. I was sorry that my learned and professional friend from Montreal considered the members of the Divorce Committee capable of being influenced by female charms. I claim—not for myself any more than for my colleagues upon that committee —that I believe we are actuated by the highest and most conscientious motives. So far as I, myself, am concerned, I am blind to anything but what I believe to be legal and sufficient evidence, and my finding is founded upon that. Now, it is a compliment to that committee, although it may not be so apparent, that so few of their reports have been overruled. And if any report has been concurred in by this Senate which ought not to have been concurred in, the fault is not so much with that committee, as with the Senate, because our report is only a report of the evidence and our findings upon that evidence ; but the members of that committtee are only human and they can only give the result of the best judgment with which Providence has favoured them. But this Chamber is composed of between eighty and ninety members, and they ought not to let any report be adopted which in their judgment is not a proper one. Whether the action of the House confirms or upsets the report of the committee, the House is the responsible party. Do not let us have a repetition of this discussion every time a divorce Bill comes up. We are trying to do our duty as British subjects to keep the good name and fame of this grandest tribunal in this Dominion, high in the estimation of the people of the country. It will not help us to do so if, every time a Bill comes up, these arguments are reiterated, questioning the ability and the impartiality of the Committee on Divorce.

Let us lift ourselves to higher plane, and the committee will try to do its duty, its whole duty and nothing but its duty. We all have a strong abhorence of divorce. None has a stronger abhorence of it than I have ; but highly as I regard the sacredness of the marriage tie, it seems to be necessary that for one particular offence—and I am glad it is limited to one—the fathers of confederation and the imperal parliament saw fit to place in our constitution provision for divorce. Therefore I think this country, as the hon. gentleman from Montreal (Hon. Sir William Hingston) has said, is under a great debt of gratitude to the man (Sir James Gowan) who so wisely framed the rules governing divorce, because I believe in years to come, after he has left this life, thousands of people in Ontario will rise up and call him blessed for what he has done to avert the terrible evils that would flow from the establishment of a divorce court, especially in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—Being opposed to divorce, as I am on principle, I cannot but compliment the hon. senator from Halifax for trying to diminish at least the evil of divorce, but it seems to me that the question is so important, and so many members having spoken on this question, it is only fair that further discussion of the subject should be postponed for a few days. I for one should be very glad to read in the debates the speeches which have been made here to-day, some of which I could not hear distinctly. It strikes me that no attack has been made on the Divorce Committee, and I have heard nothing which should cause any hon. senator to get excited about a supposed reflection on the honour of the committee. The question is simply whether we should vote for or against the amendment, and I therefore move the adjournment of the debate for two days so that we may have an opportunity of reading the printed report of the debate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I hope my hon. friend from Montarville will not press his motion. There are on the order paper to-day three or four third readings of Bills of this kind. These Bills have to go to the other Chamber to be dealt with there, and to undertake at this stage of the session to postpone all these measures involve a risk of the Bills not getting through.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—So much the better.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That may be the hon. gentleman's private opinion, but speaking as a member of the Senate I do not feel that way. Every one of these cases should have fair-play. I wish to say at the outset that the hon. acting chairman of the committee was altogether mistaken in supposing that the amendment which I moved implied any want of confidence in the committee, or that it was intended in any way to reflect on the committee. Not at all. I sympathize with the views expressed by the hon. senators from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Sullivan) and Rougemont (Hon. Sir William Hingston). The Committee on Divorce discharge their disagreeable duties in a way which is very satisfactory, and which entitles them to the gratitude of their fellow members. And further I wish to say that I did not speak at all from a denominational point of view. No matter what denomination I might belong to, I think my sentiments upon this amendment would have been just the same. I wish hon. gentlemen to understand that distinctly. Now the hon. gentleman, the acting chairman of the Committee on Divorce, gave really the only possible argument to be used against this amendment, and that was that you cut off from the guilty party the chance of reforming and leading a good life. I fail to see that. I agree with the hon. senator from Wolseley (Hon. Mr. Perley) that the fact of the guilty party not having a chance to marry again does not necessarily prevent the guilty party ceasing to sin. I take this view, and I think it ought to commend itself even to the hon. chairman of the committee, that prevention is better than cure. It is better to do what we can to prevent people from violating their marriage vows than to undertake to provide that after they have done so perhaps in the most flagrant way, they will be able to marry again and, possibly, as far as this world is concerned, be happier than if they had not sinned at all. The hon. senator from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen) said that this amendment even if adopted would be ineffective. I think he is mistaken in his law. If a party domiciled in Canada could not lawfully marry here, and married in the United States, the marriage would not be recognized when he came back to Canada.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Hear, hear, that is the law.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The principal objection of the hon. senator from Belleville (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) to this amendment was that we should have a general law—that parliament should pass a general law dealing with this question of the remarriage of divorced persons. I am disposed to think that would be the better plan. If divorce were not granted by Bill, that would be a perfectly correct view, but the Bill is going through, and it is like any other Bill, open to amendment, and I take it that the course which I have adopted even though my views—as they really are—were the same as those of the hon. senator from Belleville is the proper course to bring about the result which he desires ; because if this House shows by passing this amendment that the sentiment of the Senate is in favour of adopting the course which the amendment indicates, then the government would have certainly a reasonable ground for introducing a general measure on the subject. The hon. gentleman from Belleville found another difficulty in supporting the amendment in this, that it was not limited to cases where the crime was committed for the purpose of getting a divorce. That would be a very difficult thing to establish, and while there is something to be said in favour of that view, at least while those are the cases to which the rule would most strongly apply, still it would be an almost impossible thing to do. As citizens of Canada, desiring to prevent immorality, we should support this amendment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have not had the opportunity of hearing the discussion that has taken place upon my hon. friend's motion, on account of my just having come into the Chamber, and not being here yesterday I was unaware of this being on the paper; but since I came into the Chamber and hearing what has been said upon the subject—it seems to me—and I say it with all due deference—that my hon. friend does not seem to have taken into consideration the fact that he is infringing upon the constitutional privileges of the provinces as well as of the Dominion with reference to the motion which he has just proposed. At the time of confederation, as is very well known, power was delegated to the Dominion of Canada to legislate with reference to marriage and divorce. The provinces, relying upon the powers which were vested in the Dominion under the Confederation Act, would naturally suppose that those powers would remain intact in their entirety and without any interference or infringement thereupon by the federal power. Now, there is only one divorce known to English law, and that is the divorce which dissolves the marriage contract. There is no law analogous to what my hon. friend seeks to introduce, constituting a partial divorce. It would be an anomaly to say that if you dissolve the civil contract of marriage—because after all, according to the laws of Canada, marriage is but a civil contract—immediately you dissolve the marriage contract which is the only law known in England and throughout the empire, with reference to divorce, you, of course, leave both parties precisely in the position in which they were anterior to their having entered upon the marriage contract. Now this clause which is invariably inserted in divorce Bills, namely the clause to which my hon. friend has referred, and which he seeks to amend, is simply declaratory of what the law is with reference to divorce, because immediately you dissolve the marriage contract, the corollary of that is both parties are again at liberty to marry. There fore a grave constitutional question is introduced in the motion which my hon. friend has submitted to the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My hon. friend does not question the fact that this House has the right to deal with marriage and divorce to the fullest extent ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—While my hon. friend is right to a limited degree, yet, under the British North America Act, a compact was entered into between the provincial authorities of the various provinces and the federal authorities representing the Dominion. I say that any interference with the powers which were given to parliament to legislate with reference to marriage and divorce is an invasion of the rights which all parties throughout this Dominion have with reference to this particular subject. My hon. friend might as well move in this parliament to amend the British North America Act with reference to any other subject pertaining to the federal authority as this particular subject. He may say that parliament has a right to legislate upon this subject, but I would point out to him that previous to confederation there was a contract or a compact entered into between the provinces and the federal authorities, and whatever that may be, whether it may agree with the opinions which certain gentlemen entertain with reference to this subject, that contract is sacred as between the provincial and the federal authorities, and, as I have said before, without our giving any consideration to it my hon. friend, entirely apart from the invasion of the British North America Act, proposes to introduce practically into the constitution a new law with reference to divorce namely, a partial divorce. The subject is a wide one, and certainly should not be entered upon in this, I was going to say, thoughtless way, because no consideration has been given to the far-reaching consequences which may be involved in the passing of the amendment introduced by my hon. friend. I mention those considerations to show that this matter is not one which should be dealt with lightly, but is entitled to the most serious consideration not only that this Chamber may give, but that the law officers of the Crown should give it, inasmuch as it is an invasion of the rights and privileges guaranteed to the people of this Dominion under the British North America Act. There are certain provinces in the Dominion which have not the right to deal with the question of divorce. Other provinces have preserved those rights which pertained to them when they were Crown colonies, and they exercise those rights, among them exercising jurisdiction with reference to divorce. Consequently all the provinces of the Dominion are not in the same position, and I think those provinces which cannot exercise jurisdiction on this subject should watch jealously any invasion of such rights as are involved in this question. Now I am not dealing with the moral aspect of it. So far as this parliament is concerned there is a more serious question than that which my hon. friend may regard as the moral one. Under the circumstances, he having introduced this subject and caused a discussion upon it which may possibly result in consideration being given to the question which may be productive of very good effects, I would suggest to my hon. friend to withdraw his amendment and that we should not lightly enter upon so radical a change as that proposed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing this amendment were passed, what would be the position of a divorced party who is not permitted to marry, but who does marry again ? Could he be prosecuted for bigamy, or for what offence ?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The hon. senator from Halifax has intimated that he will not accede to the request of the hon. senator from Montarville. I think he should accede to it. The question is not so clear as the hon. gentleman seems to think it is. There is certainly a constitutional question raised. In so far as his amendment tends to restrict the evils of divorce, I am, to a certain extent, in sympathy with him, but other questions are involved. First of all is the constitutional question ; have we the right to pass such a resolution ? As the hon. senator from Calgary (Hon. Mr. Lougheed) has pointed out, there is a contract between the provinces and the Dominion which should be respected. Besides that, though some of us are in sympathy with the amendment to a certain extent, voting for this resolution implies that we should grant divorce to the other party. Some of us could not do that, and besides it seems to me that the amendment is not complete in itself. It does not mention who will determine who is the guilty party in the case.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The amendment mentions the names of the petitioner and the respondent. Those are the innocent and guilty parties.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—But the evidence does not say explicitly who is the guilty party. I think if the amendment of the hon. gentleman should be adopted, then it seems to me, as suggested by the hon. gentleman from Belleville, it should be in a general law or in a regulation working as a direction to the Divorce Committee ; otherwise it seems to me that the action of the Senate would not be sure. Under the circumstances, it seems to me that it would be an agreeable thing for the hon. senator from Halifax to adopt the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Montarville to let this matter stand.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I had not the advantage of being in the House when this discussion began, but I was here when my hon. friend from Halifax gave notice of his amendment last evening, and I have looked into the matter and am of the opinion that this parliament has not the power to do what my hon. friend has suggested in the manner he proposes and if we were to pass this motion we could not enforce it. The question asked by the hon. gentleman from Belleville goes right to the point. There is a law against bigamy, but it would not be bigamy if a divorced man married again, notwithstanding this prohibition. There is a natural right in every man and woman to be married, and that is confirmed in British law which applies to Canada. The canonical law may have a different application, but there are only two things to prevent people from being lawfully married. One is, that one of the parties has been married before, and the other is that the parties are within the prohibited degrees. We have dissolved the marriage between this man and woman, and we turn around and say that one of the parties may not marry again, although he is not now married. This person we are prohibiting from marrying is not shown to be within the prohibited degree with the other party. Nor yet is this person married to any other person. The person is unmarried and has a right to marry again. If we were to pass this amendment, I am strongly of the opinion that it would not be effectual, and if we did it we would have to amend the Criminal Code and constitute something else bigamy besides a man marrying again during the lifetime of the person to whom he had been previously married. I do not think it would have any effect if we did pass it, except possibly in making the offspring of such marriage illegitimate, which would be punishing innocent parties.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Being a layman and having heard the opinions of legal gentlemen who are versed in the law I feel somewhat at a loss. I do not think the hon. gentleman from Halifax had any intention to cast reflections on the work of the committee, because he knows that it does not lie in the mouth of any hon. gentleman on either side of this House to say one word reflecting on the work done by the Divorce Committee. I do not often attend it, but I do read the work they do, and they deserve from this House every assistance and every support, and while it is perhaps not possible to change the Act, as pointed out by the hon. leader of the opposition, still it seems to me there might be other questions asked the party applying for divorce. One of the prominent questions is: Have you connived at or is there any understanding between you as to any arrangement being made that this divorce should be granted—collusion? It seems to me that this further question should be put to them: Are you engaged to be married to somebody else? Perhaps it might appear a little senseless to put a question of that kind, but I venture the assertion that in nineteen cases out of twenty, other parties are providing the money with a view of the petitioner being married to somebody else, and that is the reason why we have so many divorces before us.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is a nigger on the fence.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON.—Perhaps he has not got on the fence, but he is within easy reach of it, and I honestly believe if that question were put to the petitioner, if it is within the power of the British North America Act, where there is a feeling that money is supplied to any one for the purpose of granting a divorce, we would have fewer applications. Then there is another feature. The time within which the acts were committed, and the time when the application is made are often very far apart. In many cases years elapse, and for the reason that no one has offered to assist them until then, and perhaps there has been no offer of marriage. When the time arrives, they come down here and apply for a divorce which, in my judgment, should not be granted.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Before the debate closes I have one word to say. I used an expression which was simply giving vent to my opinion of the evidence as produced in print. I do not know what influence the evidence had on the committee except through their report. But, as the hon. gentleman from Cobourg has stated, every hon. senator in this House is master of his own judgment in regard to the report of any committee, no matter how small his opinion may be, and I still hold, after the discussion, that divorces have been granted by this honourable House on evidence that would not justify the result, and we have evidence before this honourable House that would not justify us in finding anybody guilty. I hold that opinion. My expression of 'hanging a cat' may be a little strong, but still I hold to the opinion that to a man who wants to give a conscientious verdict in the matter, divorces are granted on evidence that is not sufficient. Now in regard to the constitutional question raised by the leader of the opposition, I have this to say: that there is no constitutional question in the matter, no more than there would be in a revenue question; no more than there would be in a customs question; no more than there would be in any question under the British North America Act. It is said that it is a question of pact. I do not admit that it is a pact. The provinces and the Dominion made no pact. It is a constitution and if the government have a right to change and vary the provisions which grant to the government the power of regulating inland revenue questions, and the power of regulating customs, so it has the same power regulating the other provisions of the Act, whether they fall under the marriage clause or the customs clause or any other clause. Parliament is master of this question and when the leader of the opposition points out that it would interfere with the rights of provinces with the Dominion, I ask him when the department varies regulations in regard to inland revenue or customs, does that interfere with the pact and understanding existing between the provinces and Dominion when they became one? It does not. Consequently I hold that there is no constitutional question involved in the matter, and that the proposition made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax is a safe one and one which would be upheld by the courts of this country, and one which does not need any sanction by the Criminal Code. This parliament has power to penalize persons whether under the marriage clause or customs clause or inland revenue, and, holding these views, I think there is no danger to be expected from the adoption of the motion proposed by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. Senators who ought to know much better, I was going to say the older they get the more sympathy they seem to have for people who ought not to break the marriage tie, but who do so. I hold that this honourable House will be doing its duty in limiting the evil results of divorce.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—I thought the subject before the House was the adjournment of this debate. We have been wandering away from that altogether. I will not oppose the motion for the adjournment of the debate. I would like to support the motion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, but I think in that event we would likely have a repetition of this discussion over every Bill of divorce that would come up. But if the suggestion of the hon. senator from Belleville should be adopted, that a general Bill should be introduced it would do away with a repetition of discussions of this kind. Supposing a Bill of that kind were introduced and passed, would that law not affect the whole Dominion of Canada in its general principles, and how would you apply that to a province where divorces are granted by judges of the Supreme Court? The argument that has been used here, and used repeatedly, that to submit the matter to judges would have the effect of increasing the number of divorces, does not hold true in Nova Scotia, where there have only been 68 cases of divorce in the last thirty years, which is about two and one-eighth per year. I was going to say that I do not concur in the suggestion of the hon. senator from Montreal that the question of divorce was one that did credit to the Senate. I am of a different opinion, I do not think it tends to elevate the dignity of the Senate in any shape or form that this subject should be before us at all, because this is not a proper tribunal for divorces. I do not think any member in this Chamber has stated—and I certainly would oppose such an insinuation—that the Committee on Divorce is not doing their duty in a just and unselfish manner, just as if they were trying a case of life and death. I think they are acting conscientiously and justly according to the evidence placed before them, and I would be sorry that any member of this Senate should cast any reflection on that committee who are doing their duty, I believe, as faithfully and conscientiously as it is possible for any human tribunal to perform a duty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. gentleman is misrepresenting—not misrepresenting intentionally—but I think he misunderstood the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Montreal. What he said, if I understood him correctly, was that the manner in which the Divorce Committee had conducted the business was a credit to the Senate and not that the divorce laws were a credit to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. JONES—If I understand this question aright it is asking the House to vote upon two principles which, it does not appear to me, members of this House should be asked to vote upon, with the information and knowledge that some of us have with reference to this matter. The motion implies, if it does not say so in so many words, that one of the parties referred to is to be released from the other, and so in voting for this amendment the House votes that in this case the man shall be absolutely divorced from the wife. Now that involves a difficulty in this House, because a large number of gentlemen in the House do not desire to vote that one of the parties should be released, because they have, so far as my knowledge goes, always refrained from voting when two parties should be released. It has also brought up the question as to whether it would be legal if we passed that amendment. If there is any doubt on that subject, surely the House ought not to be asked to adopt a resolution which we might afterwards find we had no power to pass and it would not be creditable to place the Senate in that position. If the motion the hon. gentleman has made was separated from the individual case and came up on its merits, it would invoke a careful consideration by which those of us who are not conversant with the law would be enlightened, and would thereby acquire definite views and would know how to vote. The hon. gentleman from Victoria has indicated that this House has absolute power beyond all question to pass this resolution, and that it would become law and we could deal with it in such way as we desired. I infer from his remarks that our power in that regard is beyond question, and goes even further than he has said. It goes so far that I do not see why he should not have the courage of his convictions and allow this House to have the pleasure and the honour of tieing together certain two people in the early part of next month, and in that way show how clearly the power rests in the House to do it. If it is as wide as he indicates, then his case which I have heard something about, ought to come to the House, and while the House is in session give us that honour of connecting the two people together, a cause in which he is so plainly interested. It does appear to me that the hon. gentleman who has introduced this motion ought to meet what I feel is the wish of a majority of this House, that this should not be pressed to a vote, but that it should come up as a general question, not on each divorce Bill, because in each case the same subject of debate will arise. If it is the desire of the House to have the law changed, surely it would be a great relief to the Senate hereafter, and would do away with all this discussion in the future, when we would deal with the cases as they come before us, leaving the common law to settle which of the two were free, or if either of the two were not free because of the granting of the divorce.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I do not intend to make another speech, but I wish to put myself right with regard to the remarks of several hon. gentlemen who have spoken, which would seem to imply that I had accused the hon. gentleman from Halifax of having made some adverse statements against the committee. I do not see how anybody could place such a construction upon any remarks I made. I did allude to some remarks made in the House, but not by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, and I said nothing but what was complimentary about the way he introduced his amendment. I would reiterate that anything he said and the way he introduced the resolution was in a moderate, temperate, and certainly in a most gentlemanly manner.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I am so strongly opposed to divorce that I am willing to support with pleasure the motion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, because I think it will operate as a check upon divorce. When it becomes known all over the country that the Senate have decided to punish the guilty party by preventing him from marrying again, it is my opinion that it would be a great check upon divorce, and that we will gain much credit by it. The hon. leader of the opposition has raised a point which, at first sight, seems to be serious ; but, though I have the greatest respect for his opinion, it seems to me it is not so serious as it looks. The British North America Act, section 91, provides that :

> It shall be lawful for the Queen by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

Subsection 26 of that section declares that marriage and divorce do not come within the jurisdiction of the provinces. Legislation on these subjects rests with the Dominion, therefore, if we had the right to grant a divorce or to refuse it, I do not see—at least at first sight—why we should not have the right to incorporate in a Bill of divorce any clause we wish to put in; and I do not see where the right of the province is invaded. The province has nothing to do with it according to the constitution, because it is a question relating to divorce; and I repeat that if we have the right to pass a Bill declaring that two parties are divorced, and if we have the right to say that they shall not be divorced, I do not see why we have not the right to grant relief as far as one of the parties only is concerned. I do not see that it would attack the constitution given to us by the imperial government. If we have the right to do the greater thing, we have the right to do the less. If a divorce should be granted to one party only, we have the right to do so, and I think it would be a good thing. As the hon. gentleman from Beamsville has said, there is always behind one of the parties in a divorce Bill another party who is furnishing the money with a view of marrying that very individual. It has been said, and it is true, that a man may commit the crime of adultery with a view to having a divorce obtained by his wife, because we do not know everything which happens in relation to these cases. But I say that we certainly have the right to deal with this question under the constitution. This court—because we are a court—has the right to deal with this question, and to grant, if not all the petition asks for, at least a part. If we have the right to grant a complete divorce we have the right to grant it with a modification—to one of the parties only.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Would we have the power to imprison either party?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I do not think that is pertinent to the point in question. I have given my opinion, but I am quite willing to correct it if occasion arises. I am willing to let the matter stand until we have the opinion of the Minister of Justice, because I consider it a most important question. There is another statement made by the hon. gentleman from Wellington and Elgin that if we were to grant a partial divorce and a man is debarred from marrying again, he could go to the United States and get married there and come back here and live with his wife, and that no one could interfere with him. I completely differ from my hon. friend. If a man is debarred from remarrying he is supposed by law to have a wife and he has no right in this country to marry any other woman. He would be guilty of bigamy.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Under what law, the federal or the local?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The federal law. He may be prosecuted for bigamy.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—On what grounds? Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him a question? He has stated that a man in such a case could be sued for bigamy. For the violation of what law?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The law of this country.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—No, he has not married again in this country.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—It would make no difference at all.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If he has married again in the United States, could you prosecute him in Canada for the violation of a law of the United States?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—He may do what he likes as long as he lives in the United States, but if he comes back from the United States—comes to live in Ottawa, as was suggested—I say he cannot do that. A man has no right to have two wives living, which would be the case under such circumstances, because if we pass a Divorce Bill in favour of the wife declaring that he has no right to remarry, if he goes to the United States and comes back here with another wife whom he marries in that country, he will have two wives living. It will be against the law of this country, and he would be liable to be sued for bigamy. I have given my opinion candidly, but as I have said, I am willing to let the matter stand until we obtain the opinion of the Department of Justice on both questions. If we are called upon o vote now upon this resolution, I am satisfied we have the right to pass it, and I am willing to support it.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—I will not detain the House; I am not going to speak upon the question itself, but merely wish to explain my own vote. I am largely in sympathy with the amendment. I have often expressed myself along its lines, but at the same time I am not prepared to vote for it, for the reason that I think every case should be judged upon its own merits, or rather upon the evidence submitted. At all events the committee might have the power of bringing in a recommendation, either for or against. Then, again, what has decided me against voting in support of it is the point raised by the hon. gentleman from Calgary. He is a constitutional lawyer, and he says we have not the power to do it. Another constitutional lawyer says we have. I should be glad if the hon. gentleman from Halifax would take the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Calgary, and not press his amendment to a vote, otherwise I shall have to vote against it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I have not given sufficient attention to the question to enable me to give a vote intelligently if the motion is pressed. I think that the hon. member from Halifax is to be congratulated for having raised the question. It is a very important one, but I incline to the opinion that it should be dealt with more fully than it would be by this motion. I think that the criminal law would have to be amended. I have no doubt in my mind that this parliament has absolutely the power to pass the motion as it appears on the order paper, and that no constitutional question is involved in it. The question which is involved is rather the logical question: a marriage contract having been entered into between two parties, is it logical to dissolve that contract merely as regards one party only, and what would be the consequences? Take A and B, who are married, and the marriage is dissolved only quo ad B, B getting the right to marry again, while A cannot marry. Suppose A and B choose to marry again. As far as B is concerned he could do so, whether it be with the same person as previously or not. As regards A, would A have the right to marry again?

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman will look at my amendment he will see that it reads, 'marry any other woman.'

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I am not speaking of the Vaughan case in particular. I have no doubt but that the question which I have suggested is a possible one as to whether in such a case the wife should marry her former husband again, whether it would not be an act of bigamy. Any way it strikes me that if the question is to be dealt with, it is necessary that it should be dealt with by way of an amendment to the Criminal Code also. Now we have always known the English people as being a very practical people, and as far as I am personally informed I think we cannot find in the English books that any divorce has ever been granted only partially; and I take it to be—though I have not examined the question sufficiently to enable me to express a decided opinion on the matter—I take it to be because it would lead to very serious inconvenience and because it would be illogical to dissolve the marriage as regards one party only. As far as the merits of the question are concerned, I agree entirely with the hon. gentleman from Montmagny. I think if it was practical, that it would have a tendency to decrease the number of divorces, and I would be in favour of it in that respect; but, as presently informed, I would not be prepared to vote on the motion which has been made by the hon. member for Halifax.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS—I have had a great deal to do in the way of marrying people during the course of my life, but only since coming to the Senate have I had anything to do with dissolving the marriage contract. I feel very deeply on this question, and I am sorry to say that I cannot see my way fully to support this amendment. An amendment of this kind is far-reaching in its influence and would disturb the people of this Dominion to a very great extent. I see difficulties in regard to its relationship to the constitution, and I have still further difficulties about it in another aspect which, perhaps we are not called upon to consider, namely, the religious aspect, and because it affects the different social institutions of the Dominion. It would lead to endless discussion, and it is hard to say what the result would be.

Further, it seems to me it would mix up affairs decidedly, not only religiously merely, but to my mind, legally. I am not a lawyer, but I do feel that this amendment, if it were carried, would affect the relationships of the two parties concerned in relation to property, and in their relationship to the children that might be the fruit of the union which could be partially broken. I cannot in my own mind define the precise position of the one individual if you grant a partial divorce. It would be an anomaly in the Dominion of Canada. My own view is that it would be wiser for the hon. gentleman to withdraw this amendment. If it is to be the means of lessening the number of petitions for divorce, I am sure I would be only too glad to support it, but I do not think that the importance of the question, and the far-reaching influence of this amendment, call for a more dignified way and a fuller way of dealing with the case. It is precipitate, to begin with. The public has no notice of it. The House has only a day or two notice of it, and certainly a question of such grave importance ought to be brought fully before the people and fully before this House so that we might be able to discuss it intelligently and concientiously. I would rather see the matter brought up apart altogether from any particular case, brought up in the way of a Bill of this House and receiving in due time the full concurrence of both Houses. Then we might expect some good to come out of it. I do feel that if this amendment is adopted by the Senate, this House, which is supposed to be a check upon hasty legislation, could be charged with being hasty in this particular instance, hence I regret to say that I cannot support the amendment as it now stands, and further, I would like to have it entirely separated from any individual case and dealt with as a principle.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order. This amendment is unconstitutional. It creates in the different provinces impediments to marriage, unknown up to to-day.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—According to the canon law ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—According to the civil law. It is dealing with a question which the province alone has a right to deal with. The Dominion parliament has nothing to do with the matter of impediments to marriage. It is a local question altogether. If we look at our provincial courts—take the province of Quebec for instance—we find this. Clause 125 of the Civil Code says :

> In the collateral line, marriage is prohibited between brother and sister, legitimate or natural, and between those connected in the same degree by alliance, whether they be legitimate or natural ; but it is permitted between a man and his deceased wife's sister.

Clause 126 provides that marriage is also prohibited between uncle and niece, aunt and nephew. Clause 127 is as follows :—

> The other impediments recognized according to the different religious persuasions, as resulting from relationship or affinity or from other causes, remain subject to the rules hitherto followed in the different churches and religious communities.

Clause 118 says that a second marriage cannot be contracted before the dissolution of the first. From all these articles it will be seen that in the province, legislation regarding impediments to marriage is local legislation. This amendment is bringing forward a new status, a new impediment. If a woman is divorced from her husband, she cannot marry again because this amendment sets forth that she cannot marry during the lifetime of her former husband. Why ? Because she has been found guilty here before the Committee on Divorce. A report is made by the committee and the fact that she has been found guilty in this court of the Dominion is constituted an impediment against her future marriage. Her husband may marry but she would not be able to do so. I say that this is creating new impediments, and that we have no right in the federal parliament to create impediments to marriage. That is reserved to the local legislature, which is the guardian of our civil rights.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I think the question is on my motion to adjourn the debate.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It seems to me the point of order is badly taken for two reasons ; first because there is no impediment. The impediment would be because of the marriage which would not be dissolved by the act as to the two but only as to one, and, therefore, as regards the one whose marriage would not be dissolved, that person would be prevented from marrying again, so there is no impediment. But even if there was a second impediment, from the fact that the British North American Act has vested the question of marriage and divorce in this parliament, this parliament is entitled to deal with it most fully as for instance when it deals with insolvency. Civil rights have been left to the provincial legislatures, but the courts and the Privy Council have held, nevertheless, that parliament is supreme in dealing with the question of insolvency, and in dealing with civil rights, because it is accessory to the power which is vested in the federal parliament, so that for these two reasons I shall support this amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I propose, if the House does not object, to recognize the fact that this amendment is lost on a division.

Hon. Mr. De BOUCHERVILLE—No, I object.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then I am prepared to withdraw the motion, with the consent of the House.

Hon. Mr De BOUCHERVILLE—I object.

The Senate divided on the motion to adjourn the debate, which was rejected: contents 10, non-contents 28.

The SPEAKER—The question is on the amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Lost on a division.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No.

The SPEAKER—The amendment is lost on a division.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not think the Speaker should declare it lost on a division. I was quite willing that the motion should be dropped.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Speaker has decided.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—My point of order should be decided first.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the point of order is well taken. In addition to the reasons given by the hon. senator from DeSalaberry, the hon. gentleman must remember that this is not a question of order, that it is a question of amending the British North America Act. That is not a question of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not a question about any section dealing with the Senate, and hon. members must bear in mind that only a few years ago the Dominion parliament passed an Act allowing marriage with a deceased wife's sister, showing that this parliament has a right to deal exclusively with the question of marriage and divorce.

The SPEAKER—I would ask the hon. gentleman not to insist on this point of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I want the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER—I do not think this is a question for the Chair to decide but rather for parliament. The amendment is lost on a division.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed on a division.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (O) An Act for the relief of William Napoleon Vaughan.—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

Bill (P) An Act for the relief of Charles William Holmes.—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

Bill (Q) An Act for the relief of Minnie Florence Irvine.—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (14) An Act to amend the Weights and Measures Act. He said: I presume it will be more convenient to discuss the details of this Bill in Committee of the Whole. The object of it is to fix a standard for each can in which milk is usually sold. It has been considerably amended from the introduction in the House of Commons and is now a good deal longer than when introduced.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

FRUIT MARKS ACT, 1901.—AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (101) An Act to amend the Fruit Marks Act, 1901.

He said: This is not a long Bill. It is the result of the judgment given by the Fruit Growers' Association, who met here some three or four weeks ago, changing the marks on packages that are chiefly for export. As the law stands to-day the opportunity for fraud and deception is very great. X means the low grade, XX mean the higher grade, and XXX is the highest grade. It is an easy matter for any one to put on an extra X and deceive people when the original packer had no thought of doing so. This places the highest grade of fruit, 'Fancy.' Then No. 1, 2 and 3. Otherwise it is very much on the line of the law as it stands. We can consider the details at a later stage.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am sorry my hon. friend is proceeding with the second reading of the Bill. It is an important Bill, and I think there should be some opportunity of discussing it. Possibly that may be done in committtee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We can discuss it in committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

LEWIS ENFRANCHISEMENT BILL.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The Order of Day being called,

Committee of the Whole House on (Bill 85) An Act for the enfranchisement of Jamieson Webster Lewis, an Indian of the Moravian Band of the Thames, in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I object to that; this is a private Bill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT— It arises from an error in the Department of the Interior some time ago. Some of the papers were not properly considered, and it was afterwards thought that as the individual was in no way responsible that he ought to be enfranchised; as the fault was in the department, the department should take it up and that is the reason it is a public Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think it is a very poor reason. Suppose a man has a patent in Ottawa and he does not comply with provisions of the Act, his patent expires. He comes in with a private Bill to have his rights restored, though he obtained the patent under the general law. This Indian should have his rights by the general law, but fails to get what the law affords him. Let him come in with a private Bill. Bourinot says:

Private Bills are distinguished from public Bills in that they relate to the affairs of private individuals or of corporate bodies and not to matters of public policy or to the community in general.

This Bill only applies to that single individual.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If the hon. gentleman will allow me to say, the Bill provides for the enfranchisement of this Indian. In 1899 he applied to be enfranchised and to acquire any rights he had to the moneys he was entitled to out of the band, and by some mistake he was not properly enfranchised at that time. This Act provides that he shall be enfranchised, and shall receive the amount he is entitled to, and shall also receive the amount of land, which, under the Indian Act, he is entitled to receive under the patent. The Bill is in the name of the Hon. Mr. Young now. It was really introduced in the House of Commons by the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver.) I do not think there can be any question as to the Indian, he had no right to apply as an Indian, because he is a ward of the government, but the government has provided to give him his franchise. The Bill could not be introduced by the Indian himself or be applied for by the Indian himself. It is applied for by the government.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—All the reasons given by the hon. gentleman prove that it is a private Bill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It is not a private Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Every Bill for a particular interest or the benefit of any person or persons is treated in parliament as a private Bill. Is it for a public or private interest?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Public interest. It is a Bill introduced by the government to enfranchise this Indian.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The fact that the minister introduced it does not make it a public Bill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman knows that the Indian himself could not apply for the Bill; he is a ward of the government until the Bill is passed. When it is passed it makes him an enfranchised Indian. My learned friend will agree that it would not be possible for him to make application on behalf of himself to be enfranchised.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me all this trouble might have been avoided if the government had introduced the Bill and made it a government Bill instead of a private Bill. The Indians are enfranchised under the Dominion Act, and the Dominion Act was introduced by the government and there are certain provisions in that Act which enable him to become what we call a free citizen, takes him out of the catagory of a ward of the government. That was a public Bill when it was introduced. The blunder has been made in this case in the attempt to enfranchise this Indian. Is he applying?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No, it is the Minister of the Interior.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then that makes it still stronger. The Department of the Interior is applying to parliament to rectify an error which the department made, in order that this man can be properly enfranchised. I can only repeat what I have already said, that it ought to have been introduced by the Minister of the Interior and made a government Bill, but whether that has been done or not it seems to me that under the circumstances, and the law under which Indians are enfranchised, it becomes a public Bill and not a private Bill, more particularly as it emanates from the Department of the Interior.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend from Portage la Prairie will see that 'prima facie' the Indian is not a ward of the government, but a ward of the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I said the Bill was introduced by the Minister of the Interior. And I do not know how my name and that of the Hon. Senator Young became attached to it. The Bill sets forth the reasons for its introduction, I have looked over the Bill, and I have no hesitation in making the motion. It is a public Bill in every sense of the word. This Bill provides for enfranchising this Indian and giving him title to the land he has occupied for the last four or five years.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am clearly of opinion that this is a private Bill. A citizen has a grievance, and he applies to parliament to have it removed. That is the difference between a private and a government Bill. The fault may have been with himself or may have been with somebody else. The fact is that he has a grievance and seeks to have it removed. I think if the department is in error they should send the fee to the Senate and have it put through as a private Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no other way of accomplishing it now. They got into a tangle; it passed the other House as a government Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Indian himself is not applying, so the position taken by my hon. friend to my left is not tenable. The Bill is introduced to rectify an error, and it comes from the Department of the Interior, and the Secretary of State says that it ought to have been introduced by himself or his colleague.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the title does not justify the Bill. The title states that it is for the relief of that particular gentleman.

The SPEAKER—Does the hon. gentleman insist on his motion?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Well, as long as the government admits they got into a tangle it is all right.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved that the Order of the Day be discharged and that it be placed on the Order of the Day for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Thursday, May 31, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

GRAND RIVER AND WESTERN POWER COMPANY BILL.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I move for leave to introduce Bill (AA) An Act to incorporate the Grand River and Western Power Company.

The Bill was read a first time.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I move that the Bill be referred to the Standing Orders Committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—If my recollecton serves me right a petition has been presented for this Bill. It is a Bill originating in the Senate, and a petition has been presented which, I understand, has not yet been passed upon by the Committee on Standing Orders. Therefore, this Bill does not go to the Standing Orders Committee in the same way that a Bill originating in the House of Commons would. It must rest upon a petition, and as the petition has not been passed upon yet, if the hon. gentleman will defer the second reading of his Bill until, say the 6th of June, possibly by that time the Committee on Standing Orders may recommend the suspension of the rules in reference to that petition. My recollection is that in considering the petition we found it was woefully short in regard to notice, and, therefore, it was not recommended to the House.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I move that the second reading of this Bill be set down for the 5th of June next.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (BB) An Act for the relief of Asenath Ramsay.—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

Bill (CC) An Act to incorporate the General Accident Insurance Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

THE EXPEDITION TO HUDSON BAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to :

Call attention to the expedition and voyage of the ship 'Arctic,' commanded by Captain Bernier, to Hudson bay and the northern sea last year, and inquire of the government what the result of the expedition is; has any good been accomplished ?

Is Captain Bernier, officers and crew, still in the service, and pay of the Dominion ?

Is it the intention of the government to outfit, and send the same ship in command of the same captain on a voyage of discovery within the Arctic circle towards the north pole, at any future time ?

He said : In calling the attention of the House to the voyage of the 'Arctic' last year I do not intend to go into the question of economy or extravagance ; first, because I do not know whetner there was extravagance or economy, and, in the second place, I am aware from action taken in the House of Commons that the Premier has very properly moved for a committee to inquire into this whole matter. Of course I have my own opinions. I hope Captain Bernier had a good time with the old port wine, the cognac, and other good things. I am asking this question simply for information. I hope the trip resulted in some good, though the expense is no doubt great. With regard to future expeditions, I do hope the government will not undertake any. I would leave the north pole where it is ; it will not benefit or hurt any one and there are other nations with ships and experience who can search for it if they feel disposed to do so. Many attempts have been made by various nations, all of which have failed, and there is no necessity for Canada now to step in and at great expense try to make this discovery where others have failed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The object has not been to discover the north pole ; it has been practically to assert possession of territory that seems to have been in the past nobody's land, but which properly belongs to Canada. Hon. gentlemen are aware that United States whalers frequent Hudson Bay and Strait and the land along there, and in the years past have paid no duty. They trade with the natives, and it was very important that we should assert our sovereignty. In regard to the first question, what the result of the expedition is; has any good been accomplished ? I am informed that the result of the expedition marks a further advance in enforcing Canadian jurisdiction over our northern waters and territories, particularly with regard to the customs, game and fisheries and the acquisition of valuable information respecting the navigation of Hudson strait and bay as a commercial route, and the location of harbours suitable for shipping.

In reply to the next question: Is Captain Bernier, officers and crew still in the service and pay of the Dominion? The reply is: Captain Bernier, second officer, purser, second engineer and one sailor remained on board to look after ship; remainder of crew paid off.

As to the next question: Is it the intention of the government to outfit and send the same ship in command of the same captain on a voyage of discovery within the Arctic circle towards the north pole at any future time? I am informed that it is the intention of the government to send the 'Arctic' to Hudson strait and bay and northward thereof to establish British authority and collect customs dues in these northern waters. The 'Arctic' will be under the command of Captain Bernier and the vessel will leave about the middle of June.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman how the jurisdiction of Canada is maintained in those distant regions? I suppose the flag is hoisted and it is left there. There is no jurisdiction exercised?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Other than compelling the whalers to pay customs duty.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—When they are caught there.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. They frequent those waters and apparently take possession of land at various points and it is necessary for us to assert our sovereignty in various ways and show them that we claim control and that they must account to us.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How many mounted police are in that territory?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think there are any on the northeast coast. There are on the northern and northwest coast, at the mouth of the MacKenzie river, but I do not think there are any in the direction of Hudson bay and strait.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I thought a number of police accompanied Captain Bernier under Colonel Moodie?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I may not have correct information. I do not know whether they remained there or not. I was under the impression that they simply visited the locality, but I am informed by my hon. friend on the left (Hon. Mr. Power), who seems to be conversant with the subject, that some of them remained there.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was the whole expedition of last year under the command of Colonel Moodie, or was it under Captain Bernier?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Captain Bernier only commanded the ship.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He was only the sailing master?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And the command of the expedition was under whom?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Colonel Moodie.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Was not Colonel Moodie appointed governor of that territory? I understand so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Possibly; I have no information on the subject.

EXPRESS FREIGHT ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. Has the government a contract with an express company for the carriage by the company on the Intercolonial Railway of goods and effects intrusted to it for that purpose ? And what is that company ?
2. Does the government know that such company refuses to make this carriage along the line of the Intercolonial ?
3. Can the government, by its contract, force the company to serve the public, and does it intend to avail itself of its right ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The replies to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows :

1. The government has an agreement with the Canadian Express Company giving that company the right to carry goods and effects on the Intercolonial Railway on regular passenger express trains to a limited extent. The government also has a similar arrangement with the Dominion Express Company between St. John and Halifax.

2. No.

3. The government cannot under the agreements force the companies to exercise their rights, but the government reserves to itself the right to grant like privileges to any other express company. The companies in exercising their rights, however, must serve the public in accordance with the terms of the agreements.

THE ICE BREAKER 'MONTCALM'.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Has the ship 'Montcalm' ever had on board, at any time after its arrival or at the time of its arrival in Canadian waters, spare copper bolts intended to screw the blades of the propeller to the shaft, and thus to replace, in case of need, bolts which might be broken in the work of the vessel amongst the ice ?

Were there such spare bolts to the approximate value of $500, according to the bills furnished to the government ?

Was the vessel stopped in the spring of 1905 during several weeks on purpose to repair its propeller, the blades of which came off or threatened to come off from the shaft ?

Is it a fact that the removal of the said copper bolts was then ascertained, and that an inquiry was begun to find out the facts as to such removal ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The following reply has been furnished by the department :

1. She had spare brass bolts on board on her arrival from the old country to make fast blades to the boss of her propellers, if necessary.

2. No such account has been received by the department.

3. Yes ; owing to very heavy ice work all the blades themselves of her propellers were broken and new ones had to be made.

As regards the last question I have not an answer for it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think I can account for the government not giving an answer to that question. My notice of motion was published yesterday in French and English but in the English translation of the original copy this portion of the question was omitted. I called the attention of the clerk to the omission and it was corrected in to-day's issue. I suppose that is why the government overlooked this point. I will let that part stand.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I only saw it to-day, I will have an inquiry made about it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

FISHERY WARDEN AT LOBSTER COVE, QUE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. Is there in the service of the government as fishery guardian, or under any other title, but belonging to the Department of Fisheries, a man by the name of Jean Legouvé, and another by the name of John La Couvey ?

2. Do they belong to Lobster Cove, in the county of Gaspé ?

3. What are the respective situations which they fill, and how much has the government paid each of them annually for the past seven years ?

4. How much, on their part, has each of them annually remitted to the government, for the past seven years, on account of collections of licenses to fish, granted by the Marine Department ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers are :

1. John LeCouvey or Legouvey (one and the same man), is a fishery warden at Lobster Cove, Gaspé county.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Fishery Warden John LeCouvey (or Legouvey) is paid a salary of $150 per annum.

His disbursements for the past seven years were :

1899-1900	68 50
1900-1901	84 00
1901-1902	68 95
1902-1903	91 25
1903-1904	83 81
1904-1905	84 41

4. Received from John LeCouvey (or Legouvey) on account of fishery licenses :

1899	$ 27 43
1900	82 20
1901	52 20
1902	60 00
1903	41 20
1904	58 80
1905	102 00

SPECIAL FISHERY GUARDIAN AT MECCATINA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. Is there in the service of the government and belonging to the Department of Fisheries a man by the name of Samuel Gaumond of Meccatina ?

2. What situation does he occupy ? What salary does he get ? What amount has he remitted to the government each year, for the last seven years, on account of collection of moneys due for fishery permits or for other objects ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers given to me are :

1. No. On March 19, 1906, the department was informed of his death.

2. Samuel Gaumond was a special fishery guardian at Big Meccatina Island, for which service he was paid $40 per annum. Being a special guardian, he remitted no money to the department, collections on account of fishery licenses having been made by Commander Wakeham, the fishery officer in charge of the gulf division.

COST OF RIFLES AND BAYONETS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

How much did the following rifles cost in their time, and how much do they cost to-day :

Snider, Enfield, Martini-Henry, Lee-Metford and Lee-Enfield, without the bayonet ?

How much for the bayonet, or for the sword-bayonet, of each of these different patterns of rifles ?

Has the government made arrangements for the bayonet or sword-bayonet of the Ross rifle ?

What are these arrangements ?

How much will the bayonet and the sword-bayonet cost with or without the scabbard ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—In reply to the hon. gentleman I may say that there are no data in the Department of Militia and Defence showing either how much the Snider, Enfield or Martini-Henry rifles cost in their time or what they cost to-day.

When the manufacture of the Lee-Metford and Lee-Enfield rifles in the Royal Small Arms factory was commenced on a large scale in 1888-9 the cost was $25.96 each for that year's output of 35,633 rifles. This cost did not include rent of land for factories, sites, interest on capital or other trade charges and risks not incurred in government manufacture.

In 1890-1 the cost of 100,000 B.L. ·303-inch magazine rifles, Lee-Metford pattern, Mark 1, purchased by the War Office from the trade was $26.52\frac{1}{2}$ each.

The last Lee-Enfield rifles bought by the department from the War Office cost approximately $24 each laid down here free of duty. The British Small Arms factory cost did not include rent of land, interest on capital or other trade charges and risks not incurred in government manufacture. In a report presented to his minister in December last the secretary of the Defence Department of Australia states that that department pays £5 9s. 3d. ($26.58\frac{1}{2}$) each for these rifles.

2. The cost of the bayonet or sword-bayonet for the Snider, Enfield or Martini-Henry rifle in their time is not known in the department. Sword-bayonets, pattern 1887, manufactured in the War Department Small Arms factories in 1888-9 for Lee-Metford rifles cost $3.08 each, not including rent of land, interest on capital or other trade charges and risks not incurred in government manufacture.

During the years 1888-9 and 1889-90 the War Department ordered a first supply of 325,000 sword-bayonets for Lee-Metford rifles from the trade at a cost of slightly over $3.16 each; these figures do not include the cost of the scabbards. The present cost of sword-bayonets is not known.

3. No.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. Answered by No. 3.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before proceeding with the first order of the day, I might say that there are fifteen or sixteen second readings which I think it would be well to take up first. If there is any objection they need not be proceeded with, such of them as are of a controversial nature.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I would like to comply with the hon. Secretary of State's desire, but really I see so many amendments to this first Bill on the order paper that I am afraid that there would be nothing left of the Bill except its title. I gave way yesterday and an adjournment has now taken place three different times. I made a motion yesterday on the distinct understanding that the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway Bill was to be made the first order of the day to-day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is only the non-contentious items that I proposed to go on with; it would not take five minutes.

VACANCY ON THE SUPREME COURT BENCH.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before proceeding with the Orders of the Day, can the hon. Secretary of State say if there is any truth in the rumour that the Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick is going to be made a judge of the Supreme Court in the place of the Hon. Mr. Taschereau, who has resigned, and that the cases of the province of Quebec can then be proceeded with ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not a prophet, and I really cannot say. The hon. gentleman seems to know more about it than I do.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suppose then we may take it that the items appearing in the press are not correct; that the appointment is to be made to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman can put the same faith in the press report that I do. It is a matter of opinion with all of us.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suggest to the hon. Secretary of State that he should make inquiry so that when the hon. member from Stadacona inquires to-morrow, a satisfactory answer may be given.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is many a slip between the cup and the lip. It would not be proper to make any announcement until the appointment is an actual fact.

VANCOUVER, WESTMINSTER AND YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The second Order of the Day being called :

Third reading Bill (X) An Act for the relief of Eileen Mary Mackintosh.—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I submit, hon. gentlemen, that I have been fair in my requests, and have twice consented to postponement of the debate on the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway Company Bill. I think probably it would be unlucky to ask for a third adjournment of the same debate. I occupied the time of the House for a few minutes just before six o'clock on the 16th May, speaking in reply to the hon. gentleman from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen). I had not time then to finish the few words I had to say with reference to this Bill. Many things have taken place since then, and I have had the opportunity to look over the hon. gentleman's speech made on the 6th instant. I see that he was painting a very doleful picture about this railway——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is not on the second Order of the Day. It is the second order which has been called.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I did not give way as regards the first order.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If there is any opposition, my suggestion will have to be dropped. It would not have taken five minutes to run through the second readings.

The first Order of the Day was then called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for third reading (Bill 41) An Act respecting the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway Company ; and the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Landry thereto :—That this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by striking out therefrom paragraph (a) of clause 1.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Now that the coast is clear, and I have the permission of the House I wish to say a few words with regard to the motion which is before the House in regard to the amendment proposed by the hon. Secretary of State, and several other amendments proposed by other members of this House. I simply wish to say that when the House adjourned on the 16th of May, the hon. gentleman from Wellington was calling the attention of the House to a very doleful picture of this railway being extended to the boundary line in British Columbia for fear the trade of Canada would be taken into the United States. Well, if this were the first railway that was built to the boundary line or into the United States, perhaps we might have some reason for fearing such an undertaking at this, but my hon. friend is very well aware that every frontier city of any importance in this country has railway communication with the United States, communication which is instrumental to a great extent in increasing the trade of Canada. The Grand Trunk Railway runs via Rouse's Point to New York and runs from Montreal through to the port of Portland, Maine. Then we have several railways crossing the frontier at Fort Erie to Buffalo by the international bridge, and at Suspension bridge by the Cantilever bridge, with the Michigan Central, then New York Central and Canadian Pacific Railway, the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo, as well as the steamers used by the Grand Trunk Railway and its associated lines. Then at the west end of Lake Erie we have a line of steamers carrying the trade of all the railways which extend to the frontier across to the United States. At Port Huron we have the same conditions, and in addition a tunnel built for the purpose of accommodating the trade between the two countries. I would point out to my hon. friend from Wellington that it takes two to make a bargain, and that we are benefited to as great an extent by getting trade from the United States as we are by carrying trade from Canada into the United States. Every railway in Canada has connections with the United States. The Grand Trunk Railway for instance has the Chicago and Grand Trunk line which carries an enormous amount of trade from the city of Chicago to the city of Montreal. We have the same facilities by the Canadian Pacific Railway to Minneapolis and by the McKenzie and Mann route to Duluth. So the hon. gentleman's fear is only a bogy so far as any real argument is concerned.

The hon. gentleman does not want the people of British Columbia to have a railway at all. One member proposes one amendment, a second proposes another and a third another, and as if that were not enough the hon. member from Wellington proposes by his notice of motion that no branch lines of this road shall be built until such time as two hundred miles of the main line is completed and in operation. Let me direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the conditions at Mount Forest where he lives. He was instrumental in getting a railway there and afterwards in getting another. He has no objection to the people of Mount Forest having ingress and egress by two different routes, but he is very much opposed to the people of British Columbia having a railway through the section referred to in the Bill. I am not so much afraid of paternal legislation as my hon. friend seems to be. The railway companies are large and strong enough to take care of themselves. My idea is that no opposition should be given to any enterprise that is for the benefit of Canada. Every railway company that comes to parliament asking for a charter and showing that their intentions are honest is proposing something in the interests of the Canadian people. They may spend any amount of money in the country in the construction of railways and every mile of their track remains in the country. It cannot be removed. Here it remains, adding to the wealth of Canada for all time to come. My hon. friend is very much concerned because he said you would require that this road should be carried on and used by other railways for three or four hundred miles, and he likewise drew your attention to what would happen if a breakdown should occur on this railway that is used by other lines. I would remind him that no railway manager can give the assurance to his board that accidents will not occur. They have happened in the past and will happen in the future, even with the greatest care that railway companies can exercise to prevent them. I am astonished at my hon. friend drawing this terrible picture, because he and I, when we went up to Toronto the other night together, were detained for two hours by a breakdown, with the result that my hon. friend lost his connection and had to remain all day in Toronto chewing his finger. Many railways are obliged to use the lines of other companies. Every individual railway that runs into New York or Chicago and other large centres of population is obliged by the very nature of things to use the track and rails of other companies. But this is not a parallel case at all, because in the early part of this discussion I tried to point out that there was no need for conditions of this kind being imposed upon this company, that they would be obliged to haul the cars of other railways over their track for three or four hundred miles, as the hon. gentleman from Wellington wanted to point out; for I can assure him on the best authority in Canada, the authority of the engineer who made the survey, Sir Sandford Fleming, that there is room for fifteen railways in this particular pass, so that we need not be concerned about running rights at all. But even if his contention were correct, the government of this country has the power to compel any railway to give running rights to another if it is absolutely necessary. It happens that they are not obliged to do so in this case, but if they were the railway company which first constructs a line through this pass will incur all the expense of pioneering and other railways that follow will profit by the industry, the pluck, the energy and the ability of the first railway builders to the extent of saving five to ten thousand dollars per mile in the construction of their line. Now, if that is so, why should this House hold up a Bill that has passed the House of Commons, and why should member after member rise to move amendments calculated to destroy the usefulness of a railway for which no public assistance is asked? Even if they did ask for aid, surely they are not the first railway company that has asked and received bonuses and subsidies and subventions at the hands of this government and of all preceding governments in Canada, and surely if they are willing to build this line without a subsidy we cannot look upon it as a crime. We should rather encourage a railway company of this kind. But above and beyond all that, what have the people of British Columbia to say with regard to those who are opposing this railway? Why should the people in the east, who have no direct interest in the progress and development of British Columbia, object to this railway being built by a company that is willing to construct it without aid from the government? My hon. friend is willing that they should build to the Yukon. Well, I do not know that any railway company that ever came before parliament for a charter to build a railway east and west has been told that they could only build north and south. My hon. friend is afraid that our wheat will find its way down to Minneapolis instead of to Victoria and Vancouver. Well, I think the people of British Columbia are just as energetic and able to take care of the milling interest of our great Northwest and to grind the wheat and send flour to Japan where it is valuable and where tea is cheap. But, says my hon. friend, the millers of Minneapolis will destroy the value of our Canadian flour by mixing it up with an inferior grade of wheat grown in the United States, send it to England, and offer it upon the British market as being made from Canadian wheat, thus destroying the trade of Canada by exporting an inferior class of flour. Well, as the Quaker says, cheat me once, your fault; cheat me twice, my fault; and I venture to say that the people engaged in that line of business in the old land are just as keen and clever and capable of judging of the quality of the goods delivered to them as any member of this House is. My hon. friend objects to us having anything to do with the people of the south of us through British Columbia. Surely he has forgotten that we deal with the people of the United States by every one of our great railways. The Canadian Pacific Railway has the Soo line, and the Grand Trunk Railway the Chicago and Grand Trunk, and the Canadian Northern their United States connections, while the Père Marquette runs in and out of Canada, bringing the products of the west to our ports and taking the products of Canada back to the west. That is the true policy for us to adopt. The amendment that is proposed by the hon. Secretary of State is not a government measure.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That part of it is.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I understood the hon. gentleman to say it was simply his own proposition.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I said nothing of the kind. I said as far as the Bill itself was concerned the government left it an open question, but they insisted that the pass or the approaches to it being narrow, whatever the conditions may be on the pass itself, they would only consent to the Bill going through if that amendment carries.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—It is very strange that this should only be discovered after the Bill has passed through the House of Commons—strange that the members of the lower House with the Minister of Railways and the minister representing British Columbia and other members of the government sitting in the committee, should allow it to pass through all its stages and be so negligent of their duties as to overlook such an important a provision as this. Every railway should be subject to the same regulations, and I am astonished at the hon. Secretary of State proposing to add this codicil to the Bill, because I understood, and everybody else understood, that under the terms of the Railway Act they had this power.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Minister of Justice gave it as his opinion that the law did not provide for it, and it is deliberately put in for the purpose of protecting the other roads in the approaches.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Chapter 58, section 137 of the Railway Act of 1903, is as follows :—

The company may for the purpose of obtaining a right of way over or through lands owned or occupied by any other railway company, and for obtaining the use of the tracks, stations or station grounds of another railway company or for the purpose of constructing and operating its railway, take possession of, use, or occupy any lands belonging to any other railway company, and use and enjoy such right of way, tracks, stations or station grounds, subject always to the approval of the board first obtained, and to any order or direction which the board may make in regard to the exercise, enjoyment or restriction of such powers or privileges.

2. Such approval may be given upon application and notice, and after hearing the board may make such order, give such directions and impose such conditions or duties upon either party, as to which may appear just or desirable having due regard for the public and all proper interests, and in case the parties fail to agree as to compensation to be paid in respect of the powers and privileges so granted.

Nothing can be wider than that. Our own government railway, I would remind the hon. Secretary of State, the Drummond County Railway that we have heard so much about, has the privilege of using the Grand Trunk Railway tracks from Rosalie Junction into the city of Montreal over the Victoria bridge, into the Grand Trunk Railway yards, with all its sidings, stations, elevators, buildings and everything else by mutual terms of agreement.

For years the Canada Atlantic ran from Coteau Junction into Montreal; hourly every day of the year trains of all descriptions ran between Montreal and Coteau Junction. There was no difficulty there, and there would be no difficulty in this pass ; but I would not think so much of the restriction that the hon. Secretary of State offers if some other members of this House were not so illiberal. My hon. friend from Wellington does not want to give this company any privileges until they have built two hundred miles of their main line. My hon. friend from Prince Albert wants to strike out subsections (c) and (b) so that they could build the road to the mouth of the Yellow Head Pass and there stop. Stop for whom ? Stop for McKenzie & Mann, the men who have been so praised by the hon. member for Wellington. I give them credit for their industry regarding railway building; but these men have become so powerful that they have turned their attention to buying out governments ; these very men hypothecated some of the bonds of the railways they are connected with for the purpose of turning the present government out of power. I would like my hon. friends of the Senate to get a committee to investigate this matter. It is public notoriety. Certain gentlemen said that Cox would not wait; but I will say that Andrew would not work. He balked, and the job fell through; and yet these men come here and ask this House to delay the building of a railway that is for the benefit of Canada so that they may have their way and that the progress of Canada shall stand until they are ready to build their own railway through the Yellow Head Pass. That is the condition of things. It is plain English, but it is the truth, and every hon. gentleman in the House knows it. I say that the interests of Canada to-day are too great —this country cannot stand waiting for McKenzie & Mann or for any other railway company. British Columbia is too large ; its interests have as much right to be respected in this House as those of any other province in the Dominion. I know nothing about Mr. Hill or his associates, directly or indirectly. I never saw the man but once in my life. I care not whether he is before or behind this railway company. I stand here to-day, not for Mr. Hill but for the Dominion of Canada. My hon. friend from Wellington advocates a policy of Canada for Canadians. I say, yes, Canada for the Canadians, but not for some of the Canadians. If McKenzie & Mann are not ready to build their road through the Yellow Head Pass, or the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway I care not ; why should these people who are ready, who are willing, who are able to build through the pass and provide the people of British Columbia with a railway to increase the value of their mines, to carry their products to the sea and distribute those products over every part of the Dominion of Canada—why should they be held back ? It ill becomes the members of this House to stand up and object, and thereby hinder the progress of Canada. It is now beyond the reach of any one company, or of all the railway companies to stop the progress of this Dominion of ours. This Bill should be considered on its merits, not at the beck and call of any rival railway company. I say that Canada demands and requires this railway. If any province of the Dominion is in need of railways more than another that province is British Columbia. I therefore trust that when the time comes for this Bill to receive its third reading that the good sense of this House will prevail, that the interests of Canada alone will be considered, that private enterprises will be laid aside for the benefit of Canada. If that is taken into consideration by this House I have no fear but that the Bill which has passed in its present form through the House of Commons, will receive the same fair treatment in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am sure I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman who has just sat down for the reference which he has made to me and to other gentlemen on this side of the House. It appears to me that any hon. gentlemen in this House has a perfect right to take whatever action he chooses on any proposition coming before the House, and has a perfect right to use his best judgment and to use his influence in the interests of the country as he understands them, without being lectured by the hon. gentleman. I do not object to the hon. gentleman taking the ground he has taken. He thinks he is acting in the best interests of the country ; perhaps he is, according to his light, which may not be very extensive. However, other hon. gentlemen have a perfect right to use their judgment and to take whatever action they see fit in the interests of the country as it appears to them. Now, the hon gentleman has treated us to quite a long speech this afternoon, and quite a long speech the other afternoon, with reference to this question. He has tried to leave the impression on the House that certain hon. gentlemen in this House are trying to obstruct legislation coming before the Senate ; that we are trying to prevent the people of British Columbia from getting railways. As far as I am concerned, I have not the slightest intention of trying to deprive the people of British Columbia, in whom my hon. friend takes such interest, from getting railways. But this is a large proposition. This is too large a proposition for the province of British Columbia alone. Here is a proposition which, as I understand it, is being introduced in the interests of one of the largest railway corporation in the United States for the purpose of building a railway through the fertile portion of the great Northwest, through what is known as the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. If it was merely confined to the province of British Columbia, I do not suppose that I or any other member of the House who take different views from my hon. friend would have anything to say ; but we have certain parties coming before the House with a proposition to build, as they claim, a railway through to the city of Edmonton in the province of Alberta. My hon. friend did not take the House into his confidence. He did not tell the House that these gentlemen were not confining the scope of their operations to the province of British Columbia but that they are leaving British Columbia and coming into the city of Edmonton in the province of Alberta. Why not ? Why did not my hon. friend say so ?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The Bill speaks for itself. Every hon. gentlemen knows the scope of the Bill, where the proposed line begins and where it ends. I objected to the lopping off of the different branches. I am quite well aware that the proposed line runs to Edmonton.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The hon. gentleman spoke of the benefits which would accrue to the Canadian people from the introduction of this system. He said also that the opposition to this Bill in this House was created by McKenzie and Mann. He went on further to talk about some bonds that McKenzie and Mann had negotiated to turn the government out. As far as I am concerned, this is not a political question at all and I am not discussing it as such. I will simply say that I have just as good reason to claim that my hon. friend is advocating this proposition in the interests of Mr. Hill as my hon. friend has to say that I am here advocating the interests of McKenzie and Mann.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Pardon me, I never said anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The hon. gentleman sought to leave that impression on the House.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—If the hon. gentleman insinuates that I am acting on behalf of Mr. Hill I give it a flat denial. I never mentioned the hon. gentleman's name except with regard to the two sections he wishes to amend.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not know what impression the hon. gentleman gave to the House, but the impression I had was that he tried to lead the House to believe that anybody opposing this Bill was doing so in the interest of McKenzie and Mann. That is what the hon. gentleman said and there is no use in dodging about the bush. I have as much right to say that the hon. gentleman and the others who have spoken on that side of the House are supporting the measure on behalf of Jim Hill as they have to claim that I am supporting the interests of McKenzie & Mann. It is as broad as it is long. This measure is one which requires a good deal of consideration. The transportation problem in this country is the greatest problem before the people. If we do not deal with it and lay the foundation of that transportation system properly at the present time, it is impossible to say where we are going to land in future. It is nothing but right and proper that any important measure of this kind coming before this House should be discussed in all its different phases. If there was neglect on the part of the House of Commons, it shows that the House of Commons was weak in that respect. My hon. friend not satisfied with scoring myself and some other members of the Senate saw fit to score the members of the government in the other House because they let the proposition go through without an amendment being moved. If the Bill went through the other House without amendment, and the government sees fit to amend it when it comes before the Senate, I do not see why they should not do so. But I simply wish to discuss the measure from my own standpoint. I do not think anybody in this House or in the other House will say that I have ever supported railway monoply in this country. I was one of the first in the other House who stood up and fought for free trade in railways in the Dominion, and I am prepared to do it now. If the government were to see fit—as I think they should—to give us absolute free trade in railways, to introduce a measure allowing any company coming into the country to build a railway by simply filing their plans as is done on the other side of the line, I would be only too happy to support a proposition of that kind. But our railway system is altogether different. Promoters have to go before a committee of the House to get power to build a certain railway in a certain place. If you once grant that charter, then they claim they have certain vested rights. My hon. friend says no, but I differ from him. I have sat in this House, or rather in the House of Commons, longer than he has. When these people come back with their charter and ask to have it renewed, they will tell you that they have certain vested interests and they generally get what they ask for. If any other corporation comes in and asks to have a charter over the same ground, the charter-holders will appear before the committee and say, we have a charter over that ground and we don't want you to interfere with our rights. If the government were to give absolute freedom it would be all right, but when you are not giving absolute freedom, when you are granting charters to build railways in certain portions of this country and thereby creating vested interests, I say we ought to consider very carefully what we are doing in granting these charters. Some of the gentlemen who are advocating this proposition say that Mr. Hill is at the back of it. Other hon. gentlemen say that he is not. I was going to suggest, seeing that Mr. Hill is going to be here in two or three days, it might be a good thing to send the Bill back to the Railway Committee so that Mr. Hill could appear before the committee and give us his views on transportation in this country before we do anything. I think that would be a very good suggestion.

We would then know whether he was behind this Bill, and find out what he proposes to do if he is granted the charters he is asking for at the present time. Some of the parties connected with the Bill say he is behind it, and some say he is not. If he is not, then I claim it is not a proper thing to do to allow private parties to preempt all the available approaches to the Yellow Head Pass—parties who do not construct railways themselves, and who we do not suppose will construct a railway there if a charter is given them. If it is proven that it is not Jim Hill who is behind the road, I think we ought to be very careful in granting any charter at all. Now my hon. friend commented a moment ago on the notice of motion that I gave. I may have drawn it up in a hurry, and there may have been something wrong with it, but it was not my intention to stop Mr. Hill from building a railway from the main line to Edmonton at the present time, although I have an objection to Mr. Hill being allowed—if it is Mr. Hill—to hold all the passes that we have in the province of British Columbia that are available for building railways. I have a map here which shows Mr. Hill's system in British Columbia. Here we have what is known as the Victoria, Vancouver and Esquimalt, the charter for which was granted to Hill last year. The solicitors of that railway, before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, agreed that if they got that charter they would build the line in eighteen months. The eighteen months are pretty well gone by, but still I understand from my hon. friend from Wellington that only seventeen miles of that railway has, up to the present time, been constructed. Several hundreds of miles are to be constructed yet. In place of fulfilling the promises made to the committee we find the gentlemen coming here are saying that they are acting for Mr. Hill, and they want some more. In the map that I have here the main line granted last year is shown in blue. The light red line shows the line which is working to the United States boundary. Hon. gentlemen who wish to consult the map can do so for themselves. Surely it would not be too much for us to ask that these two branches should be struck out and that Mr. Hill be given the right to build from the main line one road through to Edmonton, so that the other available passes may be left open for some other railway company who may want to go in there later. This is the proposition I am advocating. That is what I would like to see if my amendment goes through at the present time. With reference to these railway propositions it appears to me that we should make haste slowly. Two or three years ago we granted a charter to the Grand Trunk Pacific to build a transcontinental line running from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic. A great many of us, myself included, were in favour at that time of allowing the Grand Trunk Pacific to make their terminus at Portland, Maine, because we thought that they would be able to handle the grain crop of that western country cheaper than if they were compelled to build to some Canadian port. We were in favour of free trade, but the accumulated wisdom of the government and of the people of the country came to the conclusion that it was not in the interests of the people of Canada generally that we should allow the Grand Trunk Pacific to build to Portland, but that we should have a transcontinental line built through the whole of Canada from one end of it to the other. The Dominion government is now engaged in building a railway from Moncton through the northern country, which is going to cost the people of Canada over $100,000,000, and they are guaranteeing the bonds on the prairie section to a large amount. Now what are we doing that for? Is it not for the purpose of keeping Canadian trade in Canadian channels. That was my idea when it was done.

If any person at that time had risen in the House of Commons, or in the Railway Committee of the House of Commons, or in the Railway Committee of the Senate, and proposed that the Grand Trunk Pacific be allowed to build a line from Manitoba into Minneapolis, or to build a line from Manitoba into Duluth, there would have been a cry from one end of the country to the other; because, they would have said, you were diverting trade across into United States channels. My hon. friend read a list of railroads crossing the boundary in different parts of this country and coming into our territory. We are all very well aware that these roads were built into this country. They were built into this country at the time that the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill went through the House. The same argument he used was put forward on that occasion, but the people of this country did not see it in the same light as he views it at the present time. If Mr. Hill were building his roads in from the boundary line directly north, cutting across the transcontinental line, whereby a lot of trade would flow into our railways, there would be no objection. But he does not propose to do that, I understand. He is going to Edmonton, and then he has a line running into Brandon, in Manitoba. All he wants is to fill in the loop between the city of Edmonton and Brandon, and then he has something in the shape of a C, by which he can gather all the trade and take it to the other side of the line. It is evident Mr. Hill has not the same great desire to forward the interests of the country that my hon. friend thinks he has, because it is only a few days since, in the city of Winnipeg, that Mr. Hill rose and told the people there that the Hudson bay scheme—which 99 per cent of the people in the west believe is a practical proposition, and are strongly in favour of—was not a feasible one, that we would not get any railroad built, or, if we did get one built there, that it would be practically useless, that we could not get our products out that way, but would have to take them out by the Gulf of Mexico, on United States soil. If that is not interfering with what we consider the fixed policy of this country, after having granted this charter, I am greatly mistaken. I understood that road was built to carry the trade from the Atlantic to the Pacific through Canadian ports, and it appears to me that if everything is allowed to be taken in the other direction, that the portion of the road between here and the sea-board is going to be useless as a through route. It may open up the country and act as a colonization road. There may good land there. There may be minerals and there may be timber. But as far as the wheat proposition is concerned—and we understood the road was built to carry the produce of the west to the sea-board—it appears to me it will not get the traffic it should get if you allow this other proposition to go through at the present time. I think we should have an understanding on this point before this Bill is allowed to pass, because it is the thin edge of the wedge if it is Mr. Hill's scheme. If it is not his scheme, I do not think the charter should be granted at all. As I said before, I do not think there is any such great hurry about the Bill going through. If the Bill were referred back to the committee we could hear what Mr. Hill proposes to do in the way of constructing roads in this country, and that would be beneficial to us in considering the question. Mr. Hill has slated the Hudson bay route and says it is not a practical route, but I venture to say that Mr. Hill is not a prophet, and I do not know that he is the son of a prophet. He has prophesied before. It is not more than four years ago that Mr. Hill was travelling all through Minnesota and Dakota and telling the farmers there not to move into this country at all; that it was not a practical proposition; that they could not grow wheat except in a certain limited area. It is not long ago since he tried to prevent us getting immigration into this country, and he said the country was practically no good. He finds out now that he was not a prophet at that time, that he made a mistake, and that the country was not what he represented it to be to friends on the other side of the line. An hon. gentleman says he is a false prophet, and I think he is. Hon. gentlemen will find when the Hudson bay route is established, as it will be in the near future, that he is again a false prophet, and that the great bulk of the products of the Northwest, if not the whole of them, will go that way. We hope to see them go that way through our own country. But if Mr. Hill would complete his lines north and south, cutting across our Transcontinental line, they might bring in trade from the east and the United States, which would go out to the west over our roads, and to the Hudson bay. But that would not bring the fish to Mr. Hill's net. He does not want to build anything to aid Canadian industries. He wants to come in and build lines that will divert our products over his own lines. That is as it appeals to us. I think we should be very careful in granting to Mr. Hill the right to tie up all the approaches through British Columbia to the Yellow Head Pass. There are three of them, as I understand, and I would be in favour of giving him one and one only. I think that is enough for him at the present time. That is the reason I gave notice of the resolution standing in my name. If it appeals to my hon. friend who has left his seat as being different, that is a mistake. I do not intend to stop Mr. Hill going to Edmonton. If he comes to parliament for a charter to connect his line with the line to Edmonton, I may have something to say later on. As there are several more resolutions to be disposed of with reference to this Bill, I will not take up further time at present, but may have something to say on those resolutions when they are under discussion. I want it understood that I am in favour of American lines running north and south to the Hudson Bay, but not east and west to American cities.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I have listened with some amusement to what my hon. friend from Prince Albert has said with reference to this Bill. He produced before the House a map, and was starting to talk about the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern Railway. He seems rather mixed up between the two charters. He seems to think the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern and the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon charters are the same. He says there are only seventeen miles of railway built on the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern. If he will turn to the Railway Blue-book, which has just been issued dated June 30, 1905, he will seee that the company have built the line from Laurier to Grand Forks a distance of 14 miles; from Grand Forks Junction to Danville, 2·10 miles; then Grand Forks to Granby Smelter, 4·75 miles; Copper Junction to Phœnix, B.C., 24·62 miles, making a total of 45 miles.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That was up to the end of last year.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—This is the report of June 30, 1905. That would be the condition of the railway two years ago, and that portion is running at the present time. But that refers to the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern. It does not refer to the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway, which is the subject of the Bill we are discussing at the present time. I want to point out a few matters in connection with this motion. This amendment has been moved in reference to clause (a) in the Bill, and there is an objection to this railway being allowed to go down to the boundary line. Well, it is a very common thing in railway charters to allow roads to be built down to the boundary line, and I do not see anything to fear in that matter. This railway is going to be built, and it is going to open up a very important part of British Columbia. There is no reason to suppose that the mineral wealth of British Columbia, the country through which this road runs, is any less important than it is in the country to the south, and we know from our experience there that in order to develop the mining interests of the country it is necessary to have all the railway facilities that we can get, and that we require to be able to carry the ore from the mine to the smelter. It so happens that most of the smelters in British Columbia are situated near or along the southern boundary of the province, and, in the first instance at any rate, before we get the mines in the northern part of the province fully developed we shall want to carry that ore from the northern part of the province down to the smelters near the boundary and in the Kootenay country, and, therefore, this particular branch of this line that is being objected to at the present time is an important one for the development of British Columbia itself. With regard to the main objection, as to this railway being allowed to go through to the Yellow Head Pass, I should like to point out that at the present time there are three or four charters having running rights through the Yellow Head Pass, and, from all reports, that pass is a wide pass through which not one but several railways can be built. At the present time the Canadian Central Railway Company have a charter giving them rights to run through the Yellow Head Pass. That charter has some years yet to run. The Edmonton, Yukon and Pacific Railway Company have a right to run through that pass. The Grand Trunk Pacific have a right to run through that pass, and the Trans-Canada Railway Company has the same right, and then there are other local railways in British Columbia that have a right to run up to the pass and make connection with a railway coming through the pass. Now, as a matter of fact, any engineer or surveyor who has been through that part of the country will tell you that the most difficult part of the pass is not in the pass itself but on the western side, and if there was any objection to the railways having the right to run up through that part of the country, the objection should have been taken not only to this Bill but to several Bills that have been put through the House this session. They have a privilege of running up to the Yellow Head Pass and if there is anything in this contention that we are obstructing these passes and preventing other railways from building, then objection should have been taken to these other charters that have been granted. So far as the question of corralling the passes in British Columbia is concerned, there is not the least intention on the part of the promoters of this railway to stand in the way of any other company that wants to build in that country. They have asked the privilege to build these different branch lines, because they want to get out the products of the country and develop British Columbia as far as possible, and in order to do that they have run branches from their main line on account of the geographical features of British Columbia ; so that although it may appear on looking at a map that this company is trying to corral these passes, as a matter of fact they have no intention of doing anything of the kind and simply ask the privilege of building a line along these routes which are the most feasible routes through the country, and with this clause that has been proposed by the hon. Secreary of State put into their charter I think that every other company building lines in British Columbia is thoroughly protected and will find that they will have no difficulty in pushing their lines through as they want to.

My hon. friend from Prince Albert has taken exception to the fact that it is possible that Mr. Hill may at some time make use of this railway. I do not think that Mr. Hill wants the railway or that it works in with his plans, but assuming that he does want the railway, I do not see any objection to letting him use it if he wants to. There has been a great deal of talk about the possibility of diverting trade from this country into the United States. Personally I am not at all afraid of anything of the kind. What we want in Canada is all the railway accommodation we can get. The farmers and the people generally will be benefited by competition in sending their grain out of the country to the markets of the world. Supposing this railway is built, the grain from Edmonton and that section of the country will be carried to Vancouver and shipped on vessels there. I do not think the grain carried by this road will ever pass Vancouver, because there is plenty of room for building wharfs and deep water for ships in the harbour of Vancouver, and it is only natural that any company carrying grain from Alberta and Saskatchewan to Vancouver would place it in vessels when it reaches the seaboard. Therefore, I do not think there is the slightest danger of that grain being carried down to the United States. The danger to my mind is in connection with the lines it is said Mr. Hill proposes to build from the boundary line in the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan to the northern parts of these provinces. I am given to understand that one of those lines is being built by Mr. Hill under a charter known as the Brandon and Saskatchewan Railway. On looking up the history of that company I find the charter was obtained in 1903. When that charter was before the House there was a considerable amount of opposition to it, and my hon. friend from Prince Albert, who at that time was in the House, evidently had this matter in hand, and had considerable trouble in getting a charter through, but I do not remember that there was any opposition on the ground that this charter might be sold to Mr. Hill. He fought very hard for the charter and succeeded in getting it through, although the hon. gentlemen who were opposing it at the time considered that a clause should be enacted to prevent the promoters of the Bill selling the charter until after the railway had been constructed and put in operation. That amendment was voted down, and the charter went through in the ordinary form. I do not see that my hon. friend ever made any objection to that charter being turned over to Mr. Hill, yet he opposes a Bill which is in the interest of the province of British Columbia because there is a possibility of its being turned over to Mr. Hill. I do not think that is showing consistency. My hon. friend has asked for information about the history of the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern charter. Possibly I can enlighten him on the subject. It was obtained originally as a provincial charter from the legislature of British Columbia, and later on was brought to this parliament because the then promoters of the Bill considered it would be to their advantage to have a Dominion charter. They got that Dominion charter and then set to work to get subsidies. They got subsidies from the provincial government. I do not think they succeeded in getting a subsidy from the Dominion government, although they tried very hard. After holding this charter for some time they sold to McKenzie & Mann. At that time they had the provincial subsidy, but later on came a change in the government of British Columbia and the provincial subsidy was cancelled. Then McKenzie & Mann sold the charter to Mr. Hill. It was not the people of British Columbia who sold it or asked Mr. Hill to come into the country. It was McKenzie & Mann who proposed that he should come into the country and now we are told that we should not grant any charter for this road for fear it should get into the hands of Mr. Hill. The people of British Columbia are entitled to have railways built to open up their country, and I do not think that this Bill should be opposed on the grounds stated here. The charter is in the interests of the country and I am not afraid of our trade being carried out of Canada by this railway if the charter is granted.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman from Wellington and the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert have based their arguments on entirely false foundations. They have no proof that Mr. Hill has anything to do with this line; his name does not appear in any way in connection with it. Where Mr. Hill's name does appear, we do not conceal it. He is now building lines in British Columbia from Rossland down to the coast and we are very glad that he is doing so. Nobody else would build them, and if he had not come to build them that country would not be open as it is to-day. Those two hon. gentlemen have not the least foundation for their arguments. They are illusory; they have raised up a goblin; they have a nightmare over it, and there is nothing to sustain their arguments. I knew nothing about this project until it came before the Railway Committee, but after seeing it I approved of it as being a useful project to open up a part of British Columbia yet undeveloped. Hon. gentlemen do not know that in going to the Yukon the line will pass through four gold districts, Omineca, Cassiar, Atlin and the Yukon, and besides will open up territory rich in timber and other resources. The hon. member from Prince Albert opposed the railway going through Edmonton. He should be proud of its going there. If that country is worth anything, every railway should be glad to go there. Five charters have been before parliament this session for lines all heading to the Yellow Head Pass. Instead of hon. gentlemen objecting, they should approve of these enterprises.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—How much of these roads will be built?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I cannot tell; I am not a prophet. At all events this road is intended to open up a part of British Columbia that is at present inaccessible. It is intended to carry into the Northwest products that they very much require, timber, fish, fruit and products of that kind, and to carry the products of the Northwest down to the sea-ports of British Columbia. If they can carry wheat, cattle and products of that kind at all, the traffic will go to British Columbia ports. I do not know Mr. Hendrie personally, but he has telegraphed me twice to say that the road is entirely financed by people in British Columbia and England, and that the intention is to bring trade to the ports of British Columbia and not to divert it out of the country. If hereafter Mr. Hill should have an interest in this road I am not to be responsible. I believe Mr. Hendrie to be a creditable man and I give his statements for what they are worth. It is too late in the day to confine ourselves to the narrow gauge line advocated by the hon. senator from Wellington. The country must progress and there is no use trying to draw a distinction between the east and the west. We must open up every part of the country. Winnipeg is the commercial centre of the great Northwest where nearly all the commerce of that vast region centres. What did these people do when Mr. Hill visited them recently? They received him with open arms. They were glad to see him go up into their country and develop trade, and so would any other part of the country be equally pleased to get such railway development. The House will not at this stage of the progress of the Dominion stultify itself. We would not have the progress we enjoy to-day over the whole of Canada were it not for the west. We would not have on the ocean to-day the beautiful ships we possess were it not for the Northwest, and would not have the Northwest at all were it not for British Columbia. If a compact had not been made to construct a railway across the continent, we would not have that province to-day. We want to be on equal terms with the rest of the country. The people of British Columbia are to-day paying three times per capita the taxation paid by any other part of Canada. Ontario and Quebec together pay about $9 per head; British Columbia about $20 per head. The Dominion government have got already from the railway belt we gave towards the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway $1,250,000. These are facts from the official returns. The hon. senator from Beamsville (Hon. Mr. Gibson) has told us of the number of lines crossing the boundary in the east. A few miles east of where this road is to cross, the Canadian Pacific Railway crosses into the United States and no one is hurt by it. Already the British Columbia government has built a bridge across the Fraser river to give the railways of that part of the country access to Seattle and other towns on the United States coast. If those towns were not there that bridge would be useless. This road will probably take power to build to the boundary line and will likely connect with Seattle. I ask the House, in the interests of progress, and in the interests of British Columbia, not to oppose this measure which is intended to open up an inaccessible part of the country, but to pass the Bill without amendment.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Last year when the Bill came before the Senate I took a certain line in opposing the granting of the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern charter. I gave my reason for the position I took then, and I have seen no reason since why I should change the opinion I then formed. My hon. friend from British Columbia says that my hon. friends from Beamsville and Alberta are all wrong in their premises. If I am to be guided by facts I would not consider that the views he has expressed conveyed a sound idea of what the trade of this country requires. We were told by the hon. senator from Beamsville that there are roads running from Chicago through Canada, and that those roads carry our traffic and develop our country, but there is a wide difference between these roads and the line we are now asked to sanction. No doubt the people of British Columbia desire to have a railroad built. Every municipality would like to have money spent within its borders, and if it be true, as the hon. member from Alberta said, that Mr. Hill does not consider the Hudson bay route feasible, what does that mean? The great question to come before us in the near future is the question of transportation, and any policy we adopt now which may interfere with the future development of the country and lessen the transportation of traffic through Canada will be injurious to the country as a whole. If Mr. Hill is not interested in this project, who is? Why is the charter being applied for unless it be for the purpose of heading off other roads projected to this locality? If the Hudson bay route be not feasible it means that Mr. Hill can divert the traffic of the Northwest into the United States and prevent the development of our waterways and in other ways will have the effect of injuring us very materially. We want the Georgian bay canal. We know that water communication is the cheapest method of transportation, and if we prevent the development of our water routes we are doing an injury to the Dominion. Are we to consider that British Columbia must have another railway for its mere convenience? I hope we have a higher aim than that, and that we look upon Canada in a broader light. I would call upon my hon. friends from the maritime provinces and Quebec to consider this matter. What is the object of this road? Why are the promoters making this desperate effort to obtain a charter? If they get the charter, and it be anything like the hon. member from Prince Albert says it will, they will divert the trade of the Northwest to the United States, divert it from the maritime provinces, notwithstanding the large amount of money we are spending to establish that trade. If the people of British Columbia are suffering to-day for want of transportation facilities, existing railway companies will build lines for their accommodation. Does any one suppose they would fail to do so if they thought those lines would be profitable? It may be that it is in the interest of Mr. Hill by means of this road to divert the trade of Canada to the United States. If that be so, the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway, or the McKenzie and Mann line should be allowed to open up that country. They would not divert the traffic from their own main lines, and if they see there is any money to be made in building the road they may be depended upon to construct it without delay. We are told that the freight rates are too high. Will Mr. Hill diminish the rates ? No ; there will be no competition in rates. Mr. Hill will collect all the freight he can and take it over to his lines in the United States and ship it through United States ports. Looking at it from a national point of view, I cannot on this occasion, any more than on the former occasion, support this charter. My hon. friend said that this was not a government measure. What did the leader of the House say to-day? Does he represent the government here or does he not? He told us that it was a government measure, and that if this amendment be not made the government will be obliged to oppose the Bill in the interest of the Dominion. Therefore no one can question that it is the government policy for the protection of the public interest. Is not the amendment proposed by the leader of the House a danger signal ? Has he not given us to understand that our interests will be endangered if the Bill goes through without his amendment? Are we here to defeat the wishes of those who have the interests of the country at heart as much as any of us? I shall, therefore, vote in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. Secretary of State.

Hon. Mr. FROST—It was not my intention to make any remarks on this question but the remarks to which we have just listened induces me to say a few words as a representative of the province of Ontario. I am sure the remarks of my hon. friend from St. Thomas (Hon. Mr. Wilson) do not represent the feelings and intentions of the people of Ontario. They are in favour of railroads, and if this wonderful Mr. Hill is behind this project—which does not seem apparent on the face of it—if we have any one who is willing to expend fifty to a hundred million dollars in this country to open it up as we want to see it opened up, then I say let him come in and build railroads wherever he likes. I have very great sympathy for the people of British Columbia. No province in this Dominion has more wealth in its natural resources waiting for development than the pacific province. How is it to-day that our revenue is increasing by leaps and bounds ? Every newspaper comments on the wonderful progress that is being made to-day throughout the older parts of the Dominion, and what is causing it ? Is it not the development of the western territories ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Did Jim Hill develop our western territories ?

Hon. Mr. FROST—What is the matter with Jim Hill anyway ? If Jim Hill wants to come into British Columbia, where we have mines, fisheries, timber, and the most unexampled wealth on the North American continent, which even the railroads that are being constructed there to-day would not be able to develop in a hundred years, is it not desirable that we should have another line when men are willing to spend their own money to build it ? They are not asking any subsidy from this country; they are merely asking permission to build.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The promoter of the Bill says that Jim Hill has nothing to do with it.

Hon. Mr. FROST—All the better reason why we should support this Bill. If our people are prepared to build this line without any aid from the government, why not allow then to do it ? So far as we know, Vancouver is to be the terminus of the road. Is there not a line from the United States running into Vancouver ? Is there not a line running from the United States at Pembina to Winnipeg ? Have we not in the province of Ontario a score of lines running from the United States into this country, conferring wonderful benefits on our people ? Have not all those lines been helping us ? Just as much traffic comes into the country as goes out of it. There is not one of them that has not conferred as much benefit on our people as on the people of the United States. We want those lines, and, therefore, I sympathize with our people in British Columbia, and when I see every representative from that province, in both Houses, supporting this Bill, I say we should give it our support. Not very long ago, when I was a member of the other House, the question of imposing a head tax on Chinese entering the country came up in the House of Commons, I voted for that measure because the people of British Columbia said, 'We must have it.' The government said we will accept the will of the people of British Columbia on that question, and we all accepted the measure as we should do now in this instance. Let us not put a brake on the prosperity of the country. If we are collecting a revenue of seventy-five or eighty million dollars to-day in consequence of the wonderful advance that is being made during the past few years in Canada, how much more will our revenue increase in the near future when this railroad is constructed, whether by Mr. Hill or anyone else ? This country has benefitted greatly by the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the lines constructed within the last ten years. How much greater will be the expansion of the trade of the country when the Grand Trunk Pacific is built and this additional line is constructed ? Does not every business man in Canada want the lines that can be built; and so long as men are willing to build them without asking for a subsidy or bonus, would it not be unwise to prevent the opening up of our country by new railroads lest some portion of our traffic may be diverted to the United States ? Why the railroads up there to-day are taxed to their utmost to supply cars and to render an adequate service in that section of the Dominion. It is straining the resources of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Only lately they have had to issue bonds to enlarge their plant and equipment for the purpose of meeting the growing needs of the west. Let us have faith in our country. Let us believe that Canada is going ahead, and that we are building up on the northern half of this continent a great nation, an empire, and that the time is coming when every road that can possibly be built by the capitalists of Canada, the United States and England will not be more than sufficient to meet the needs of this country.

Hon. Mr. ROY—I do not propose to speak on this amendment, but before proceeding farther I ask permission to correct a statement made by the hon. senator from St. Thomas with regard to my hon. friend form Prince Albert. He referred to that gentleman three times, I believe, as 'My hon. friend from Alberta.' My hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Davis) is from Saskatchewan. I would not like the people of Canada to believe that the people of Alberta, or those representing them do not want this railway constructed.

Hon. Mr. DeVEBER—I did not propose speaking on this amendment, but I am forced so to do. The hon. member for Prince Albert has been alluded to frequently in the debate as the member from Alberta. He is from Saskatchewan, I am from Alberta. Not only from the province of Alberta but the constituency of Alberta, and I should be sorry to have any of my people imagine that I held the views of the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan on this question.

Coming as I do from the west, having absorbed western ideas and being fairly conversant with western requirements, I hope I may be pardoned if I take up a few moments of your time. The transportation problem, as the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan has observed, is the problem of the west, and on its proper solution depends altogether the prosperity of the west, and on the prosperity of the west depends the prosperity of the whole Dominion.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Not by a jugful.

Hon. Mr. DeVEBER—A good deal of so-called patriotism has been introduced into the argument before the House this afternoon. When I make the statement that no corporation or government ever conceived the idea of building a railway purely out of patriotism ; when I state that no company or corporation ever constructed a railway purely out of philanthrophy ; when I state that no corporation or company ever operated a railway solely and exclusively in the interests and for the convenience of their patrons, I think I am making a statement that no member of this House will have the temerity to endeavour to controvert. Railways are conceived and constructed and operated for one purpose only, and that purpose is the declaring of dividends. I am not against railways at all. I am very much in favour of them, but railways may be an unmixed blessing, but they may be at times nothing but an unnecessary evil. Every railway will give good accommodation and will give fair rates if compelled to do so, and to my mind nothing will compel them so to do but competition.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DeVEBER—And therefore we in the west look upon it in this way ; give us competition wherever it comes from, let it come from north, south, east or west, Canadian Pacific Railway, Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Railway, or even from friend Jim Hill ; but let it come, and the more competition we have in the west the better for us. Hon. gentlemen who have not visited the west have a very small idea of the extent of that country. I am looking at the question in a very small way when I say that the wheat belt extends for 400 miles in width of territory, more or less. We have one line there, and one partly built ; the Canadian Northern, and one which is to be built, the Grand Trunk Pacific—three lines in a belt of territory 400 miles in width. What would the people of Ontario say if they had only three lines in 400 miles ? Would they be satisfied ? Can you blame us for wanting competition ? We have wandered afield in our argument this afternoon. We are simply discussing at the present time an amendment which strikes out subclause (a) of clause 1, which subclause reads as follows :—

(a) From a point on the main line between Anderson lake and Green lake, running along or near Lilloet lake, Lilloet river and Harrison lake, and thence southeasterly to a point on the international boundary line.

As I understand it, the only thing that is to be feared, if this subclause is adopted, is competition. Was there any cry or any fear of roads running into United States territory taking anything away when the railways were being built from New Brunswick, from Quebec and from Ontario into the United States ? Take the whole of the international line from the Bay of Fundy to the Pacific ocean, there are numerous lines running into the United States. Are they draining this country, or are they benefiting us ? I think hon. gentlemen will all agree that they are benefiting us. Why not allow us to have all the roads we want ? I call attention to the fact that in the original charter of the Canadian Pacific Railway there was a clause which prohibited any railway coming into Manitoba from the south. That raised such a storm in the west that the government had to buy that right, if I remember correctly, and had to pay some fifteen million dollars to get rid of that clause. The town I live in had to have a railway built from Medicine Hat to Lethbridge to take our coal out. The road there was narrow gauge, and it gave us no competition. But when this clause was expunged by the government, our roads were made broad gauge, and that gave us competition. The Great Northern, owned by Jim Hill, did not lower the rates at all, but they said, 'We will give you better service.' Prior to the advent of the road into Lethbridge, when we bought our goods in Montreal and Toronto, we had to wait three or four months for their arrival. Immediately on the advent of the roads from the south one of our merchants bought two car loads of goods in Montreal and ordered them to be routed by the Great Northern. We had every Canadian Pacific Railway freight official, from Mr. Peters down, inside of two days, wanting to know what the Canadian Pacific Railway had ever done that we should get a car load of goods by the Great Northern. They were simply told that whichever road gave the best service would be patronized. The consequence is that to-day we get our freight in Lethbridge in as many weeks as we formerly got it in months. And the cities between Lethbridge and Winnipeg, which are yet without competition, have to wait two or three months to get their goods. When the other clause comes up for consideration, it may be necessary to direct a few more observations to the question, but at the present time I think I can only say that I have no wish whatsoever to see blank charters issued by any government in Canada. If it were possible, I would like to see railway routes thrown open to competition, and if fifty companies applied for a charter over a certain piece of country, that every one of them would be given a charter, and the company who got in there first could build a road first.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Coming from the west, as I do, and having had something to do with the railroad building in the west for some years, and as a representative of the west, I feel called upon to make a few remarks on this occasion. We have a Bill before us to-day, introduced by a member of the House, promoted by Mr. Hendrie, who is I understand, one of the wealthiest men on the coast, a man capable of financing a good portion of the road himself, a large lumberman and mill-owner and the Bill is being opposed, and opposed very vigorously, by some gentlemen whose interests I am not informed of. Mr. Hill's name has been connected with this charter. As I understand, Mr. Hill has nothing whatever to do with this charter. It appears to me that if it is supposed that any one is back of a charter that charter is opposed. I believe we have had charters passed in this House as important as this is. I believe we have had Bills asked for by incorporators who have had as much chance of building a road as half a dozen niggers. I suppose this Bill would go through if it were supposed the people asking for a charter would not be able to build the road. So far as railway charters are concerned, I think that any person who wishes to build a railway, and has the money to invest and is able to file a plan, should be given the power to build that road. I think it is one of the great mistakes in our legislation that we have people coming here and lobbying for the purpose of getting charters on the pretense of building up the country. I believe we should have a general Act to do away with the applying to parliament for power to build railways. I think companies ought to be permitted, if they are able to comply with the Act, and when they have filed a plan, they should be permitted to go on with the railway. It is amusing to hear the remarks of some hon. gentlemen to-day, and particularly the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert. That hon. gentleman has promoted Bills in this House, and in the House of Commons, for enterprises that are owned and controlled by James Hill, and which he is building into Manitoba and notably into Brandon. I understand another road promoted by the hon. gentleman, which I believe Mr. Hill now controls or is about to control, is being built into Medicine Hat, by which he expects to reach Edmonton. That gentleman opposes this Bill to-day, after being an advocate of charters within the last twelve months that Hill now controls. It is rather surprising. Hon. gentlemen ought to have some consistency about them on these matters. Now if Hill is to be connected with this scheme, I would remind the House that he was in Winnipeg a few weeks ago, and he was tendered a great reception there. As far as Mr. Hill is concerned, my opinion is—and I do not think I can be successfully contradicted—that he is the greatest railway magnate in America. He has built more miles of railway, as an individual, than any other man in America. I feel proud of the fact that he was born and raised, as I was, in the county of Wellington, that he is a native of Guelph where my hon. friend from Wellington comes from. Several gentlemen around me say : 'me too,' they all want to be connected with Mr. Hill and I think it a credit to be connected with him. He has done more to open up and develop the Northwest—I am not speaking now of the Canadian Northwest but of the American Northwest—than any other man in the United States. He is now reaching over into Manitoba and the Northwest Territories and the people there are welcoming his coming in to develop that country. He has inaugurated a new system in regard to Canadian railways, building without asking for bonuses. That certainly is a new policy in Canada, and the Canadian people do not seem to understand it yet. If Mr. Hill is at the back of Mr. Hendrie who is applying for this charter, I think he ought to get the powers he is asking for because he will build the road. Hill is in Vancouver now over the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern, the charter granted here a year ago. I understand that road is pretty well on towards completion, and the people of Vancouver want that road, the people of British Columbia want that road. It is true that a portion of the line diverges to the south and crosses the international boundary line, but it gets into Vancouver, and the people of British Columbia were practically unanimous in supporting the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern Bill. If Hill be at the back of this application—and the hon. gentleman for Prince Albert has used his name in that connection—I would support it all the more strongly than if it were Mr. Hendrie alone or some charter monger applying for a paper charter, because I expect if Hill is behind it he will surely build the road. If this charter were for a road that had for its object diverting Canadian trade to the United States, some objection might be urged against it; but there is no evidence of that before the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask the hon. gentleman is he informed that Hill has running powers over that road?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—What road?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—This road.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It is not built.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—A portion of it is built.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Seventeen miles.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We were told just now forty-four miles. On the seventeen miles, is there any right of way given to Hill?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not know—I do not care.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is not well informed.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman is not as well informed as I am; the seventeen miles that I spoke of, the road I referred to and the road the member from Prince Albert referred to was the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern, an entirely different charter. I am informed that some three thousand men are working to-day on the construction of the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern. They expect to reach Vancouver in the very near future. So far as this charter is concerned, which we are now discussing, the terminus of the line is Vancouver. There is no question about that at all. It runs northerly and easterly to Edmonton, that is the part which is opposed. The hon. gentleman objects also to the branch running to the international boundary. As far as that is concerned, Hill has an entry into Vancouver at present, and the branch cannot make the situation any worse. Why should any person suggest that if the road is built, trade is going to be diverted to the United States? The trade will be diverted to Vancouver. I believe that we will have in the west a sea-port from which the products of the prairies of the west will be shipped to China and Japan, just as we have at Fort William steamers carrying wheat from the eastern prairies to England through the province of Ontario. As far as I am personally concerned, I believe that the principal portion of the export of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories will be to the United States. I believe the United States will be the best market for our wheat products inside of fifteen years. If any person were to suggest that we should cut off the connections already existing between Canada and the United States it would be treated as simply absurd. No person advocates that in eastern Canada. He would be laughed at. You have connections all through Ontario and in Manitoba and the Northwest Territories. Jim Hill is going in there now on a charter procured by the member from Prince Albert, who opposes this Bill to-day. You must have that trade and the return trade. It is not all going one way. It was argued in connection with this very Bill that Hill would carry the wheat of Alberta to the Minneapolis mills. It is simply absurd to say that he would carry it through the Yellow Head pass down to Vancouver and back east to Minneapolis. Was there any objection made to the Canadian Pacific Railway building from Lethbridge to Minneapolis and Duluth and the Soo, a line running directly to the United States? I never heard of any objections to that line. The people of the Northwest and Manitoba supported it and we have these connections to-day. The hon. gentleman remembers, no doubt, that only a few years since rebellion was talked of in Manitoba because we could not get railways to the United States. The hon. gentleman is the supporter of a government which a few years ago granted $15,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific for doing away with the monopoly clause, section 15 of the Canadian Pacific Railway contract, to allow us to get connections which we asked with the United States. The parliament of Canada were seized with the importance of allowing the people of the west to have an outlet for their products. If Mr. Hill is to be discussed in this matter, I want to mention some of his ideas. In delivering an address in Winnipeg a few days ago he made use of certain remarks which I do not think the people of eastern Canada should object to—and if the member for Elgin will take note of what Mr. Hill said I think he would support Hill's charter in the west. Mr. Hill talked of building from the Crow's Nest pass to Winnipeg another transcontinental line. As far as Winnipeg is concerned he states that he does not see any necessity for building east of that point. He considers that the Canada Northern, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific are sufficient to take care of the traffic east of Winnipeg and he is satisfied to make connections there, giving these railways the freight to carry to Fort William, and he advocates the Georgian bay canal.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Do you believe that —that he will build to Winnipeg ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—He made that statement. As I stated before, Mr. Hill has done more to develop the west than any one man in the west. I believe him when he says he is in favour of the Georgian bay canal, for the reason that he would benefit by that connection, thus having water communication from Fort William east to the Atlantic seaboard. The people of Winnipeg, irrespective of party, the business men of Winnipeg, turned out en masse to do him honour. Seven hundred members of the board of trade sat down to a magnificent banquet in his honour, believing he was right. We have the city of Toronto represented by the board of trade—and I want to say I regret that any member of the Senate should practically ask for a lobby in this Senate on this or any other Bill. We saw by the press reports that the hon. member for Wellington sent a communication to the board of trade of Toronto asking them to come here and lobby against this Bill, because that is what it meant. There was no other means of doing anything against the Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The statement is not true. I did not ask them to come here and lobby against the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—He asked them to protest and oppose and denounce the Bill. What other means had they of doing so ? They could not at that time go before the House or any committee of the House, and the only thing they could do would be to lobby. They turned down the proposition, and they said since Mr. Hill had offered to build railways without asking for bonuses he ought to get bouquets rather than be turned down, and the letter of the member for Wellington was laid on the table, or put in the waste basket, I do not know which.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that the board of trade, or the board of control ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The board of control I think it was. Probably the hon. member for Wellington will correct me if I am wrong.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—It does not matter.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It does not matter ; that is right. Fault was found because Mr. Hill, while in Winnipeg, made some remarks about the Hudson bay road. The member for Prince Albert was very wroth that Mr. Hill should express an opinion on the Hudson bay road. He expressed an opinion because a deputation from Dauphin, a town in the northwestern portion of Manitoba, waited on him, asking him to give them one of his branch lines from Portage la Prairie to Dauphin, and holding out as an inducement that it was on the short line to Hudson bay. I may say there were deputations there, not only from Dauphin, but from Deloraine, Brandon, Portage la Prairie, Gladstone, Minnedosa—practically every important point in the province of Manitoba, asking Mr. Hill to give them connections with his line. That is the way the people of the west feel towards Hill. When the Dauphin deputation suggested that it would be on the line to Hudson bay, Mr. Hill remarked he didn't want to build to Hudson bay. The suggestion was made that if he did not build to there Mackenzie & Mann would. He said, Mackenzie & Mann may if they like. They apparently build wherever they can get sufficient bonus. That was Mr. Hill's idea of the Hudson Bay route. He is leaving it to other people, but as far as he is concerned —my hon. friend may doubt his sincerity— he advocates for an eastern connection the Georgian Bay canal. The people of British Columbia, as has been stated before, have unanimously asked for this legislation. I venture to say hardly any Bill has come before parliament which had the unanimous support of the representatives of the province, both in the upper and lower Houses, as this Bill has here to-day. The people of Alberta are interested in this charter also. Changes have taken place in our great Northwest in the last few years. Ten years ago if any person had suggested that they would be growing two million bushels of wheat in southern Alberta in 1906, people would have said he was crazy. It was thought to be fit only for grazing, and the land was rented to ranchers for two cents an acre a year. But a change has come about. People have demonstrated that they can grow wheat there, and last year there were over two million bushels of first-class wheat grown in southern Alberta. That wheat has got to find a market. Is it going to be freighted through to Fort William and the eastern provinces ? I think not. A market is being opened up in China and Japan for our flour, and I am satisfied that that wheat will find its way west and by the shortest route. We know to-day that mills are being erected at Calgary and Vancouver for the purpose of manufacturing that wheat into flour, and that flour will find its way to China and Japan. Flour is being carried to the far east to-day from the Lake of the Woods Mills ; large orders are being shipped. Why not take the wheat grown a thousand miles west of Winnipeg to the coast and ship it across the Pacific ? How is it to get to the coast. Some people may say by the Canadian Pacific Railway by the Kicking Horse Pass. It may, but the Kicking Horse Pass has very heavy grades, and I venture to say that the wheat will go by the Yellow Head Pass. Edmonton is two hundred miles north of Calgary, and it is eight hundred feet lower. It is down grade all the way from the international boundary to Edmonton. Some people think it is up grade, but really it is down, and that wheat will travel by the down grade and through the Yellow Head Pass where there are easy grades. It will be taken through by the Canadian Pacific Railway, because I think they will build a road, or by the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern or by this line for which a charter is asked to-day, I believe the wheat will go that way and be manufactured in Vancouver and the products will be shipped on to China and Japan. Why should any person in this House oppose a Bill to build a railway to open up and develop that western country ? It seems to me like turning the clock backwards. The time has gone by when we talked about the provinces controlling the charters of railways in Canada. That is 'Little Canada' to my mind. The country is too big now to discuss transportation matters in that way. There are hundreds of thousands of people rushing into that country. Do you want to stifle their energies by refusing them facilities for transportation ? If you do, adopt the motion of my hon. friend. We found this Bill opposed at every stage. Other charters have gone through this session, and there are other charters before parliament now, to which there is no objection at all, promoted by the very gentlemen who are opposing this Bill. Why ? They are afraid this charter will be gone on with. My hon. friend from Kamloops (Hon. Mr. Bostock), very properly, is willing to accept the amendment suggested by the hon. Secretary of State. Neither he nor any other member of this House, I venture to say, wishes to monopolize any pass through the Rocky mountains. I believe we ought to have a provision in the general Railway Act providing that the passes may be used by all roads that wish to build. I am informed that the Yellow Head pass, I heard Sir Sandford Fleming say so, has room to build ten or fifteen roads through it. There may be some points where it is a little narrow, but the provision suggested by the Secretary of State will safeguard that. In the other House an amendment was suggested to the general Railway Act which will give effect to what I have outlined here and protect all railways desirous of building through the passes, particularly through British Columbia. We only know of the Pine River pass, the Yellow Head, the Kicking Horse and Crow's Nest passes. There cannot be a railway built in British Columbia except it is built through a pass. That being the case, I say the member who introduced this Bill is wise in accepting that suggestion and with that amendment included it ought to be the duty of every member of the Senate to support the Bill. There is no just reason for doing otherwise, except the fear that it may interfere with other interests in the carrying trade. I do not wish to occupy any further time. As far as I am personally concerned, I am strongly in favour of this road. I believe it will assist in developing the Northwest, not only British Columbia, but also the prairie lands in the west, by opening up a market for their products, and it will benefit the eastern country also, because my hon. friend who sits behind me and who is largely interested in manufacturing agricultural implements, knows whereof he speaks. Every settler you get in the Northwest assists in providing a market for the manufactures of the east.

You must have communication between the east and west, and if Mr. Hill, or any one else, will come in and build railways, especially if they will do so without bonuses, we ought to welcome them. We ought to say, as the Board of Control of Toronto has done, 'Give bouquets to Mr. Hill,' and as the city of Winnipeg has said, 'Give bouquets to Mr. Hill,' and as deputations from all parts of Manitoba have said, 'Give bouquets to Mr. Hill.' They all want competition in railways. I hope the Senate will be true to itself and true to the country, and not attempt to throttle any enterprise whose purpose is to open up and develop our country.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—When the House rose for recess I had been calling attention to the fact of the connections that we had in Manitoba and the Northwest and also in British Columbia with United States railways. I want to call particular attention to this fact, that when this Bill was before the House of Commons, before the people who are responsible to the electors for their seats in the House, it passed that Chamber unanimously. Not a dissenting voice was raised either in the House or the Railway Committee, notwithstanding all the opposing interests that are now here and lobbying in the Senate in opposition to this Bill. Knowing that the legislation was so popular in British Columbia and also that the Hill connections were so popular in Manitoba and the Northwest Territories no attempt was made to interfere with the Bill, not even to amend it along the lines suggested by the hon. Secretary of State, I suppose because they had passed Bills of a similar character without any conditions attached to them such as the one suggested by the hon. Secretary of State and which I think is a very wise provision. No doubt the lower House believed that the general Railway Act protected the passes against monopoly and that the railway commissioners had power to give running rights over a road where it was difficult to build two lines. I have no hesitation in saying that if the hon. senator from Prince Albert (Hon. Mr. Davis) were to attempt to carry an election on the views he has expressed here to-day he would not get 25 per cent of the electors to send him to parliament, because in the last election the people were entirely in the direction of favouring free trade in railways and railways without bonuses. Apparently the hon. gentleman has seen fit to change his views——

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—This is only a railway charter. Charters are not railways, and there is no guarantee that this road will be built without bonuses.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I venture to say that the hon. gentleman would not rise in his place to oppose this Bill to-day if he was not satisfied that the people back of this road are prepared to build it. A year ago a Bill was introduced in this House, and a charter was granted, which the hon. gentleman had a good deal to say about. Inside of two weeks after it was assented to, it was sold to Jim Hill, and Jim Hill is building from the boundary to Brandon on that line. What has occurred to change the hon. gentleman's views ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I want the hon gentleman to understand that I was in favour of Jim Hill building as many roads as he liked from the boundary.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Does the hon. gentleman suggest that he is prepared to support railways to be built north and south and not east and west.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Yes, to Hudson Bay.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Then I venture to say there is not a man in this House representing eastern Canada who will support that proposition, because the complaint is that if this charter is granted the trade will be diverted to the south. They want the trade of the country retained in Canada but the hon. gentleman wants to divert it to the United States.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to correct him? I pointed out that this was a line, one end starting at Seattle and the other end going into Minneapolis. My idea was that the road should be run north and south, and part of the traffic from the north and south lines would be diverted to the main lines east and west.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—My hon. friend's logic is very poor. Last year he was supporting charters for roads crossing the Canadian Pacific Railway and running through into the United States.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The road I supported ran toward Hudson bay.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman is stuck on Hudson bay. We are discussing routes which are more practicable than the Hudson bay route just now. I have no hesitation in saying that the reason why the Bill was not opposed in the committee was that it was popular legislation and the gentlemen who had to depend on the votes of the electors for their seats in parliament would not dare oppose it. The hon. gentleman should not be solicitous for the other corporations in looking after their interests so strongly, because it is only two or three years since the Canadian Northern, a road which had a charter for years through the Yellow Head pass, became actively interested. We are not afraid of Jim Hill's opposition to the south. Mackenzie & Mann disposed of the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern charter, and to whom? To the Canadian Pacific Railway? A Canadian company? No, but to Jim Hill, the very man who is building this road and the very man the hon. gentleman is afraid of permitting to build a road to the Yellow Head pass.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Allow me to state that I was prepared to support the proposition to allow Jim Hill to build a road through that pass, but not through all the passes approaching it, but simply through the Yellow Head pass to British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—A suggestion was made by the Secretary of State and a Bill was introduced into the committee by the Minister of Railways to protect those passes. If the hon. gentleman is satisfied with that, then why should he not withdraw his opposition and support the Bill? The hon. gentleman is steering north by south in his arguments. He wants railways north and south, and not east and west. Is he afraid they are going to take wheat from Edmonton to Vancouver and then back to Minneapolis? Surely the hon. gentleman does not contend that for one moment?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—No, but that they will build a branch from Brandon to Minneapolis.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The last road the hon. gentleman was interested in was running from Medicine Hat, and Jim Hill won't get down to Brandon or Portage la Prairie, but will go south from Medicine Hat. I desire to say in conclusion that I do hope the government will see fit in the near future to introduce legislation that will empower any person who wishes to open up and develop our country by expending money in the construction of railways to do so simply by filing plans and proceeding with the work, the Railway Commission having control of rates, &c., and promoters will not then have to come to us for charters. Several charters are being applied for this year. We have a charter for a road from Vancouver to Hudson bay. I wonder if the hon. gentleman will support that? Another charter through the Yellow Head pass which is held up. The suggestion of the hon. Secretary of State to preserve these passes should be acted upon, because, as I said in opening my remarks, I believe it is a proper provision to place in the Bill, for I do not believe that any railway can be built in British Columbia without running through the passes, and those passes should be preserved. I do think that, after the Bill has passed the House of Commons as it has with no opposition there, and with no opposition in the Railway Committee, this Senate will stultify itself by interfering with legislation passed so unanimously by the popular chamber.

Hon. Mr. JAFFRAY—Hon. gentlemen, I do not know that a member so new to this House should have anything to say in a matter of so much importance as this, but although new to the House I am not new to this question. I had to discuss a question of the very same nature in British Columbia, and in the Victoria legislature I had to meet there the very same argument that we have heard to-day as against this railway, and when it is remembered how unanimous the British Columbians are, in face of this, if there were no other, it is one reason why we should not have any hesitation in deciding what our course should be in reference to this Bill. There is no province in this Dominion that is so rich in undeveloped resources and that has so much need to have every encouragement possible given to it, whether in the country or out of it, to develop the railway facilities in it. The mountains, the difficulties and troubles that there are in railway development ought of itself to be sufficient reason for us giving it every consideration. The arguments in favour of it have been so ably put forward and been so convincing that it is not necessary for me to say much about it. I have only to say that either party or any party that opposes the development of British Columbia will not have the support of British Columbia. That province will not tolerate interference with the development of their country, especially in railway facilities, and I hope that this Senate will never interfere in that respect. I would much rather see the construction of railways that are going to connect our country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but in order to find business for those railways, in order to develop that country, we must allow the railway routes that are natural to it to be developed also, and it will be a selfish, narrow, indefensible policy if we attempt to repress British Columbia in any matter of this kind. I am certain we will only regret it and that it will not be for the benefit of Canada as a whole.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—Before this debate closes I would like to make a few observations upon the amendment now under consideration. I do so with a good deal of diffidence, and with some personal anxiety in this matter, because the vote which I may cast will be, perhaps, not in accordance with the views of some of my warmest friends in this House. In fact I cannot say warmest, for all are my friends, I believe. I feel a good deal of diffidence also in speaking on this question, seeing that this Bill has passed the ordeal of the committee of another branch of this parliament, and has come up to this House in its present shape. The first thought in my mind is, how the Bill ever got here in its present shape. I want to emphasize that. I understood that this country had entered upon something like a national policy in the matter of transportation; that we had committed ourselves to the expenditure of an enormous amount of money to build a national transcontinental railway. If that be so, then I think that this amendment strikes at what I believe to be a clear, distinct, deliberate and express violation of that policy. And I rise more to call the attention of the Senate to what is implied in subclause 'A,' which it is proposed by this amendment to eliminate from the Bill. I do not need any argument to convince me that perhaps this branch would be some benefit—immediate benefit at any rate—to the people of British Columbia; but as I see my duty, I am not here to have my political vision bounded by provincial lines. If I have any right to be here, and any fitness to be here, I ought to be able to take, not only a provincial, but at the same time a Dominion view of every question that comes before this House. My friends of British Columbia must not charge me with want of being friendly to that province. So long ago as 1874, when many of my political friends thought it was a pretty wild scheme—I do not give myself credit for any particular prescience—but it did so happen, and I am now glad it did, that I never was opposed to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway and never voted against it. I did think, considering the comparative poverty of our country at that time, that perhaps we were paying a good deal for the support of that railway. Subsequent events have established the fact that it was a very wise expenditure, and if Canada to-day occupies a position which makes it the pride of the British empire and the envy of other countries, that credit is largely due to the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada and the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The Conservative party.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I happen to be fortunate in this regard. I have not the honour of any intimate acquaintance with any of the authorities of either road, and no man has asked me how I intend to vote on this question. I have told no man how I intend to vote upon it, but I do intend to vote upon it, and to take the consequences of that vote. In another place, only a few days ago, I had occasion to remark that I feared to oppose any application for a railway charter for fear I would be responsible for preventing two blades of grass growing where only one had grown before, and on that line I have stood on all occasions, and, according to my light, have tried to support every application for a charter that I honestly thought had for its object the development of the trade and the growth of Canada, and that I would as persistently on all occasions oppose any application for a charter that had for its express object the diversion of our trade into an alien country. I repeat that now. I want to say further, that British Columbia must not complain that they are not friends who vote for this amendment, and they must not say that the people of the east are on that account unfriendly to British Columbia. The people of the east took their full share of the expenditure and the sacrifice this country made in encouraging and supporting the establishment of the first transcontinental line. In 1871, the late Prime Minister, Sir John Macdonald, entered into a bargain with British Columbia, when that province had only about 8,000 inhabitants, to build that railway in order that they might become one of the members of the federal family of provinces and enjoy all the advantages that that implied; and ever since that the east, the centre and every part of the Dominion has borne its fair share of that expenditure, so that Canada has shown its sympathy and regard for British Columbia; and on any other question than railways to divert our trade, British Columbia will find me, so far as my humble support is concerned, standing up for their rights and battling for them shoulder to shoulder. But I cannot do it on this question, unless I am told by the government that the policy I am speaking of now, and that I think has been wisely inaugurated, has been thrown to the winds, and that the great concern is to dump our trade over the border and let it be carried to the ends of the earth through alien channels. I am not in favour of that, and this line, if it means anything, means that. Of course, hon. gentlemen from British Columbia know more about it than I do; I am only speaking from a national standpoint; but I say, from a national standpoint, it would be a very great mistake to allow that line to be built, and I say further that so far as I can prevent it, that line never will be built. I do not believe it is in the best interest of Canada that it should be built. Some of my friends speak a great deal of Mr. Hill's coming into Canada. I am not acquainted with that gentleman, so that I am not able to speak of him familiarly as 'Jim Hill,' so he will pardon me if I speak of him as Mr. Hill. I have nothing against Mr. Hill. He is a Canadian; I am glad of that. He is a very shrewd man, and has railroading down fine, and he knows what he is doing when he is coming into Canada just at the present time. The time was when we would have welcomed Mr. Hill with open arms, but he reminds me of Americanus, who could discover America with the greatest of ease after Christopher Columbus, after eighteen years, had found the way. Mr. Hill comes in now, when the harvest is ripe and abundant, at the eleventh hour, but he does not say, 'I will take your trade through Canadian channels.' He says, 'I will scoop it down to the south.' I do not want to say anything unkind, or that would in any way disparage Mr. Hill's great ability as a railroad man, but I can understand that a man who has nearly all his interests in an alien country and in other roads, that his first object will be to feed those roads. I do not blame him, but I do not want him to feed them with Canadian trade which he will do if he takes it through alien channels. I want that thought impressed on every one who listens to my voice.

I would not be so vain, so presumptuous, as to suppose that I could influence a single vote in this chamber. I do not pretend to be right, but I do pretend—and a man always can be that—to be upright, and that is the position in which I think I stand today. Mr. Hill advised his fellow countrymen—it is not denied—against coming into Canada ; and I account for his coming into Canada himself at the present time because the reports from the people who emigrated from the United States and settled in our west were so encouraging and so flattering and so enticing that he could not resist the temptation to come in and share our prosperity ; but he does not come here as a patriot or philanthropist. He comes here to make money. He wants that branch line in order that he can have an outlet from Canada to his Great Northern road and divert to his own lines that trade which rightfully belongs to the railways of Canada. I am asked some times, would it not make a difference with your vote if he comes and offers to build a railway for nothing ? As I view it, I say no. If he built a dozen railways in British Columbia and the Northwest for nothing, if he diverts the trade that should come to our own ports, to an alien country, I say no. I am prepared to concede that the people of British Columbia feel very sensitive on this question, and do not like to hear a word said against it. Some of them perhaps have suffered from a want of railway competition suffered sorely, in the past. It is not my fault if that has been the case ; but if that has been the case in the past I believe Canada itself, without any alien help, is doing its level best, and doing it grandly, to meet all the requirements of every province, British Columbia included. Now, hon. gentlemen, you recollect, some of you, in your classical reading, that the Grecians and the Trojans were once at war. The Grecians could not get within the walls of Troy, and the idea occurred to them to construct a wooden horse, and get someone to persuade the Trojans that the mammoth wooden horse was filled with rich presents for them. The foolish Trojans wanting to get the presents, admitted the horse within the walls of Troy, and when it got within a spear went into the side of the horse and out rushed armed men, and Troy fell. I do not know that Mr. Hill's road will be a wooden horse, but I strongly suspect it will; at any rate I will use the exhortation that was used on that occasion which was 'Trust not the wooden horse, whatever it is, Trojans. I fear the Greeks, though bringing presents.' So Mr. Hill need not be surprised if I fear all his good promises and presents. I would respectfully decline them and say: 'We will not let your wooden horse within our walls.'

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him what is the difference between a hobby horse and a wooden horse ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—There is a difference, though that hon. gentlemen may not be able to see it. I am not here as an advocate of the Grand Trunk Railway Company ; but I must dwell a minute on that company. I have been told that as a matter of bookkeeping that railway is in debt to Canada in the sum of $15,000,000 and about an equal sum in interest, aggregating about $30,000,000. I have said to my political friends and opponents, the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada does not owe Canada one dollar. Where they have had one dollar from us we have had directly and indirectly benefits from that railway of ten times, twenty times, the amount. There is a disposition in the country, I have found it for the last thirty or forty years in my legal practice, to raise a hue and cry against a railway on every possible occasion. The greatest Godsend this country ever had are the two great trunk lines we have now, and I do not propose by my vote to let them be disturbed. With the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian Northern and the National Transcontinental Railway we shall be able to cope with even the wonderful developments of our western country. Now, what I have said, I have said in all kindness, with every good wish for the greatest possible prosperity and happiness of the people of British Columbia It is not because I love British Columbia less, but because I love this Dominion more, that I shall give the vote I intend to give to-night. The hon. gentleman from Beamsville for whom I have, as he knows, the most profound respect, because he is a great Canadian citizen, and a successful man and whatever he says is worthy of consideration—I do not know whether he meant it or not, but he said, as I understood from my seat in the House, that those who opposed this Bill are opposed to any railway at all in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He was not in earnest.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I will not allow anybody to say that with impunity. I purpose to-day to vote for this amendment. When we come to other parts of the Bill we will consider them, but one at a time. According to my view this branch leading to an alien country is utterly obnoxious. We have been thrown by a neighbouring, not always a friendly, people back upon ourselves. According to my view, and I have studied the affairs of Canada pretty closely, that is the best blessing in disguise this country has ever had, that we should be thrown upon our own resources; but do not let us give them away. Let us cling to them. I need not remind hon. gentlemen of the importance of this question. You all know as well as I do, and a great deal better, some of you, that by a series of diplomatic disasters we have irreparably lost some of the fairest portions of this Canada of ours to the people to the south of us. I do not propose, so long as I live and can raise my voice against it, to let the United States get one pound of our freight that we can send by Canadian lines, and I do not propose they shall ever—and I hope Great Britain will stand by us in this—get another inch of our territory, not even a little island out in the Pacific. I sometimes get provoked with myself and with my fellow-countrymen to think that we are not on all occasions and at all times, as are our neighbours to the south, alive to our own interests. I desire to live side by side with them amicably, as a loyal Canadian under the British flag, but I desire Canada to respect herself more and more and to live up to that standard. I heard my hon. friend speak about giving free trade in railways and letting every man have a charter who would file plans. That may be good statesmanship. I do not believe in that policy. I do not believe in encouraging business enterpises to commit suicide. I think the government of Canada and the people of Canada can settle these matters for themselves, and that we have abundant roads constructed and now under construction to serve this whole Dominion. Let us rise to the occasion and decline Mr. Hill's offer with thanks, fearing all the time that it is the wooden horse seeking entrance within the walls of Troy. Toronto, I thought, lost its head the other day. They treated my hon. friend's business letter to the people of Toronto very lightly. I know Toronto is a very wise, as well as a very good city, but I think sometimes of the Bigelow papers:

"John P
Says they didn't know everything down in Judee."

I think they don't know everything down in Toronto. The people of Winnipeg, to the number of 600—brave 600—went into raptures the other day when Mr. Hill thundered to the right of them, thundered to the left of them and thundered in front of them, and they were prepared to shower him with bouquets. That may be all right, but I am not prepared to fall down and worship Mr. Hill. Someone suggested, I do not know who, that this matter should be postponed, and that the Bill should go once more before the Railway Committee and be reconsidered. If Mr. Hill should come there I would treat him as a gentleman, with all possible courtesy, as it would be my duty to do, but I think that that committee and this Chamber are competent to deal with the question without his help. Mr. Hill may employ himself in a more profitable way. So far as I am concerned, my mind is made up, and it is made up whether he or some other man or company is at the bottom of this application for a charter, that they shall not tap our trade and send it into a foreign country.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I suppose my hon. friend has heard of the dog in the manger; that dog thought he was perfectly right. He could not eat the hay himself—

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—But we are eating it ourselves and we don't want anybody else's dog to come and share it. I am not asked to advocate their cause. I am not advocating their cause, but I say something is due to the men who have borne the heat and burden of the day and have invested their all, invested their millions and I should be sorry to hear they had not, where they ventured all to have fairly won, and I do not propose by my vote to take that away from them. I never could understand—it is owing to my stupidity, I suppose—why the men who only came in at the eleventh hour should get as much as the man who bore the heat and burden of the day. These railways that we have and are in projection have borne the heat and burden of the day and have given us a country unsurpassed on the face of the globe, and I ask my British Columbian friends if you should leave this life with a little less money in your pocket, a little less for your relatives to squabble about and divide amongst lawyers; better you should say:

No foot of land do I possess,
No cottage in the wilderness,
A poor way-faring man am I

That is the man I like, and that is the man the country likes, and those are the men who make the country great. I hope I have not offended any man. Although I am from Ontario I will not vote for anything that concerns Ontario unless I think it is in the best interests of the Dominion. It is as much my duty to see that Prince Edward Island out there in the ocean, the youngest of the federal family, receives just as much justice as I would if I lived in the far east, and if I do not do my duty in that respect I have no right to be here. But I want to say to my friends in British Coumbia, Alberta, Saskachewan and Manitoba and my own province, that no province so long as it is a member of this federal compact can have its own way at all times. We have each to give up something that we think dear to us for the general good, and it is only by acting in that spirit that we can make the people on this northern continent glorious, happy and free. We have a grand country. Some one has said that our country is a glorious land:

Our country, 'tis a glorious land,
With broad arms stretched from shore to shore,
The proud Pacific chafes her strand,
She hears the dark Atlantic roar.

I have always hated the word annexation, political annexation, and I have very little faith, no faith at all, in commercial annexation. I believe in Canada being what Providence evidently intended it to be, the great highway of nations, and that over Canada shall be transported to the Orient and to the Occident the trade of the northern part of this continent. I call upon you all to rise above your provincial feeling, and when a question of this kind comes before us let us deal with it from a national standpoint and give such a vote on the question that your children and their children will be able to point with pride in coming years to the vote you gave on this important question.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I propose to vote for the amendment moved by the hon. member from Stadacona, the first amendment, and under the circumstances it may be desirable that I should make some little preliminary explanation. I may say that I do not sympathize with the hon. gentleman from Cobourg. This House from the beginning has been supposed to represent in a special manner the interests of the several provinces. That was the theory upon which the Senate was constructed—one of its great offices was to represent the sentiment of the various provinces. Now, we know that all the members from British Columbia in this House are in favour of this measure, and we happen to know, although we are not supposed to know anything about it, that all the representatives from British Columbia in the popular branch are also in favour of it. Under the circumstances, I think that hon. gentlemen here should require very strong assurances that the measure is highly objectionable in itself before undertaking to vote against it in the face of the unanimous expression of sentiment on the part of the province of British Columbia. The hon. gentleman from Cobourg has taken his stand on the Dominion view. Well, if the hon. gentleman had shown how the Dominion at large was to be seriously injured by the passing of the Bill which is now before the House, I should be quite prepared to support him, but the hon. gentleman has not done that. He has told us the old story of the wooden horse at Troy. We have had several of those wooden horses in eastern Canada. The Canadian Pacific Railway has a branch running down through the state of Maine, and the main line of the Grand Trunk Railway runs to Portland in the state of Maine, The hon. gentleman from Beamsville (Hon. Mr. Gibson) this afternoon enumerated a number of those roads which run from this country into the United States. I do not think that even the hon. gentleman from Cobourg would be willing to part with one of those wooden horses. He would not be satisfied to cut off one of the roads now leading from his province into the United Sates; and I do not see why he should wish to cut off the people of a distant province from the same sort of connection which his own province enjoys. I have heard more than one hon. gentleman, in discussing this question, speak as though the railway companies had certain mortgages on this country. They talk about interfering with the rights of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia, or some other company in the Northwest Territories. I was under the impression that the country was not for the railways, but that the railways were for the country. This country did not pay substantially one hundred million dollars to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the purposes of the company. They gave that assistance for the purposes of the Dominion, and the opening up and benefiting of our country, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on the whole have done the work very well. Whereas, twenty-five years ago we thought that we were paying, perhaps, rather dearly for the connection, history now shows that the expenditure was justifiable. My view is that the railways are intended for the benefit of the country in which they are built. When railways are built into our western country they promote settlement, and the settlement of the country increases the general business, not only of the region where the railway is and the region that is settled up, but the whole country east and west, and north and south. Then supposing that there should be as there actually is all through eastern Canada, ample means of access to the country south of us, that would not hinder our manufacturers from supplying the needs of the western country, because the Canadian tariff leaves the Canadian manufacturer an advantage which quite counterbalances the excess in the freight charges; and when we have a gentleman like the hon. senator from Smith's Falls (Hon. Mr. Frost), one who is connected with one of the largest manufacturing concerns in the country, advocating a scheme of this sort, it is pretty clear that he does not think that the manufacturing interests of the east are to be injured by railway building in the west, no matter under whose auspices the railway is built. I hope that I am able to look at the matter somewhat from the same point of view as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat; I hope I am able to look at this question from the point of view of a Canadian. It seems to me that the welfare of the whole country is involved, and must proceed together with the prosperity of all its parts. If east and centre and west are all prosperous, then the whole country is prosperous. Even though the farmer of Alberta is not obliged to ship his grain to England through Montreal, still, if he finds a good market for his grain, and gets a good price for it, he is prosperous, and the farmer of Alberta has just as good a right to be prosperous as the merchant or manufacturer of Montreal. Everyone knows that a little while ago when there was only one railway through that western country, the price which the farmer got for his wheat was comparatively small. It was not a paying price, because it cost him too much to get his wheat to market, to enable him to raise wheat at a profit. The more competition there is in the carrying trade, the more cheaply he can get his wheat to a market, the more his wheat is worth in the field, and my view is this, that if this company build a road from Vancouver to the Yellow Head Pass and get to Edmonton, their getting there will necessarily tend to lower the freight and increase the price of wheat to the farmer. That seems to me to be a reasonable proposition. I do not see how it is going to hurt the people in the east; because the farmer at Edmonton, or that neighborhood, cannot to-day send his wheat to England and sell it at much of a profit. The future market of the Albertan wheat fields will be found in Japan and other countries across the Pacific. The people of Japan are already beginning to consume flour, and Japan and China will afford an almost illimitable market for the flour made from the grain of Alberta and that region, and if the building of this railway tends, as it must tend, to reduce the rates of freight to the Pacific ocean, and necessarily therefore to the Orient, it is going to be a great blessing to the people of Alberta. Looking at the distance which separates, say Quebec from the Pacific coast, looking at the vast extent of territory that intervenes and the mountain ranges and all that, it seems to me that you cannot compel the business of British Columbia, the bulk, at any rate, of the freight, to come down to Montreal and Quebec, and the best way is to give them easy access to the best markets they can reach. The hon. gentleman said something about our grain going to the United States. Well, hon. gentlemen, if our grain goes to the United States we will not give it away to them. If our grain goes to the United States they will pay us for it, and unless the United States gives us a price for the grain which pays our farmers better than the price paid in England it will not go to the United States, but will continue to go to England, and if our farmers are getting better prices south of the line than they get in England I do not see any reason why we should undertake to hinder them from getting the better price. Having said this, I wish now briefly to state why I propose to vote for the first amendmenl moved by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona. That amendment proposes to strike out the paragraph in the first clause of the Bill which reads as follows:

(a) From a point on the main line between Anderson lake and Green lake, running along or near Lilloet lake, Lilloet river and Harrison lake, and thence southeasterly to a point on the international boundary line, at or near the town of Huntington, in the province of British Columbia.

I have no objection to having that clause stricken out, and I did not gather from the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Kamloops, who represents the feelings of the people of British Columbia, that he had any very strong objection to that paragraph being stricken out either. The reason why I think that under the circumstances one would be justified in voting for striking out that clause is this: You strike out that branch, and all the other lines that are proposed in this Bill having their terminus in the port of Vancouver. The branch which runs through the Yellow Head pass goes down to Vancouver. The main line terminates at Vancouver. The whole system ends at Vancouver, but this particular branch. The elimination which is aimed at by this amendment leaves the main line, not a very great distance to the northward of Vancouver, northward and somewhat east, and runs down directly to the United States boundary. Now you cannot say it is absolutely necessary for that part of the country that there should be a road built there, because the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern runs east and west through that same region, and I have this feeling about it, because I understand what the feeling in in the east, in my own province, is about similar questions; there is just this danger that, if the railway company is allowed to build this branch, the traffic coming down through the Yellow Head pass and from the northern portions of British Columbia, the grain of the prairies and the minerals and lumber of British Columbia, instead of going to Vancouver to be manufactured there or shipped, may be deflected and run down into United States territory, to be there manufactured and shipped at Seattle. I do not feel very strongly on this point, because it is to a certain extent a departure from the free trade principle; still I do not see that it is going to hurt the whole scheme very seriously; and if, after the business has become fixed and settled in Vancouver, the people of British Columbia still desire that this branch should be built and they come two or three years hence and ask to have this branch built, I for one should probably be prepared to support its construction, but as I feel at present I think on the whole it would be wiser that that branch should not be built just now.

The question being put on the amendment, the amendment was declared lost on a division.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that the Bill be not now read a third time, but that the following be added as subsection (e) of section 1:—

2. The company shall grant running powers to any railway company applying therefor over the branch lines above described in subsections (b) and (d) through the Yellow Head Pass, and also over the approaches thereto on terms to be agreed upon or to be settled, in case of difference, by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The form in which the amendment is put seems to me to reject the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that the Bill as amended be now read the third time.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I move that the Bill be amended so as to provide that none of the branch lines therein provided for shall be located or the construction thereof commenced until at least two hundred miles of the main line is completed and in operation. I desire to embrace this opportunity to offer a few remarks in reply to some of the speeches that have been delivered upon this question.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That will be out of order. The hon. gentleman can speak to the amendment only.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I have a right to speak to the whole Bill. Some remarks have been made with regard to connections that we have with the United States by eastern lines. That has been commented upon as a reason why we should pass the Bill that is now before the House. I desire to offer a few remarks in reply to the references to these different lines. In the first place it is well known that the line running to Portland and Boston was constructed for the purpose of giving Canada a convenient outlet for our commerce before we had the Intercolonial Railway. It was known that Canada required an outlet and we had to have it. It was constructed in the interest of the carrying trade of this country in getting us to the Atlantic coast. Then my esteemed hon. friend from Lincoln has referred to the principal lines that have been built, running from Ontario to the United States. At the time the most of the lines were constructed, as I pointed out before, we had trade relations of a very desirable character with the United States. We had free trade in natural products. We had that from 1854 to 1866. Now, we know that most of these lines were constructed during that time. For instance, take the Great Western Railway, it was constructed as the middle link between New York and Chicago, and it did form for a very long time that connection between the New York Central and the Michigan Central. In that vast trade that was carried on from New York and Chicago, the Great Western developed that trade and was constructed for that purpose largely. It is also well known to the hon. gentlemen in this House, that we in Ontario have been depending upon the United States side entirely for coal. It became absolutely necessary that we should have connection with the United States, in order to get that commodity. Unfortunately in the case of Central Canada, particularly in Ontario, we have no coal. We are thankful to say that we have an abundant supply of coal both east and west but in the central portion we have none, while in the United States out of 45 States, in 22 they have an abundant supply of coal. We are forced by present conditions to send there for our coal supply and, in order to get that it became necessary to construct these roads. There is not a road that has been constructed out of Ontario doing United States trade that has not been operated in the interests of coal supply in Ontario, unless one road, which I think runs from Belleville back to the mines, and was operated for a great many years in freighting the minerals of that section in a raw state down to Lake Ontario, whence they were taken across to the other side. I think that road was built for that purpose. That is the only road that I know of that was not built in Ontario practically for the purpose of bringing in a supply of coal. We had to have a coal supply. So far as these roads are concerned, they have unquestionably rendered a very desirable service to the province of Ontario. We have had them and we have to have them and will have continuously to use these roads for that purpose. Now, it has been said also that there is room through the Yellow Head pass for some fifteen different lines. There may be. We hope there is. All that we say with regard to the Bill before the House is that we should respect our lines, that have been constructed in British Columbia and are now building additional branches; that we should respect the efforts put forth by Mackenzie & Mann in order to get into that province, and also the Grand Trunk Pacific. Let them have first chance. What I claim by my amendments is that we should not give the promoters of this Bill now before the House, the opportunity of going on the ground, locating lines, partly constructing them, taking up the district and in that way interfering with, and very seriously crippling the future of lines that are now under way. I pointed out on a previous occasion that in doing this we were unquestionably crippling the Mackenzie & Mann road. They will have to go to the European market to borrow money to enable them to carry out that scheme, and in laying that scheme before the money lenders of England they have to acknowledge the fact that a Bill has been passed in this House giving powers to another company to locate a line over the very section that this road purposes traversing in order to get to Vancouver. They will have to travel side by side with that line for some three or four hundred miles, and in doing that they will have the competition of that line for all time to contend with. I should like to know if men that are possessed of means will view with a hopeful look the future of a line that is to be opposed by a line of this kind ? They will see at once that competition in freight and traffic is likely to come up, and is going to very seriously cripple the earning powers of that line, and I question very much if it will not seriously interfere with the company financing their scheme. The statement has been made that the railway companies have been influencing members of this House to take the stand that they have with regard to this Bill. All that I can say is that I have not been interviewed directly nor indirectly, nor yet have I been written to or requested in any shape, form or way to take the stand that I have with regard to this question. I have never held even a conversation with any railway man on the question as to the attitude I purposed taking upon the Bill—not one. The stand I have taken is simply and solely from an honest patriotic view, I hold with regard to this question. I listened to all the remarks made by the hon. gentlemen. I did not point ridicule or pass any discourteous remarks. I endeavour always to cultivate a respectful demeanour towards members of this House. Sometimes, perhaps, I err. I concede to every man the right to his own opinion on this, as on any other, question and I only ask, on the other hand, the right to my opinion, and I am sure we can agree to discuss great and important problems of this kind without getting into each others' wool personally, or getting on any bad terms, or saying or doing anything that will be considered or might be looked upon as discourteous, one to the other. I do not desire to do that, and I hope nobody else does. Now, it is said that the question is one that is of sole interest to British Columbia. I do not look upon it in that light. I think that this entire confederacy is composed of nine members, and they are like the members of a partnership. What are they ? We are a confederacy linked together for the specific purpose of working out the future destiny of this united Dominion.

The east has an interest in the welfare of the west, and the west should have an interest in the welfare of the east. What did we construct the Canadian Pacific Railway for ? What were the inducements that we held out in justification for the expenditure of that road ? It was to provide interprovincial communication and to encourage interprovincial trade. It has come up to expectation of the people of the country admirably, I must say. Now I know that there has been a disposition to find fault with the rates charged on freight by the Canadian Pacific Railway. I at one time thought myself that there was a good deal in the charges made, when I had a seat in the other House, with a regard to excessive freights. I took the opportunity myself of going over the rates charged by the United States transcontinental lines, and I compared the rates of no less than four of them with those of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I am here to testify on my word of honour that the rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway compared favourably with every single one of those transcontinental lines. I made that investigation without any suggestion on the part of any one else, and I made it with the hope that I might be able to show that the Canadian Pacific Railway was excessive in its rates. I was not able to show it; the rate charged in Canada compared favourably with the rates of transcontinental lines on the other side. Now with regard to the record of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we have a right to be proud, I admit, of that line. It has done a great deal for Canada. So has the Grand Trunk Railway, and we earnestly hope that the Grand Trunk Pacific will have a record equally creditable with that of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

There is not to-day a line in the United States southwest of the Missouri river with the exception, I think, of one, which has not, since the date of construction, been in the hands of a receiver; every one of them has gone through liquidation to a certain extent, but our transcontinental line, the Canadian Pacific Railway, has never had any experience of that kind. It has met its obligations honourably and honestly, and I am willing to do anything in my power to defend it with regard to the territory through which it runs, and to defend the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific also. I want to see the interprovincial trade that should flow from the east to the west and from the west to the east increased so that we may become one united whole; and I maintain that even if a little sacrifice is necessary to be made on the part of the western provinces in the interests of the whole, until such time as our lines are completed, it is their duty to make it. What have we done in the east? We have poured out money like water in the development of the west, nobody can deny that. We have done everything for its development that could be done. We built the Canadian Pacific Railway; we have fed the Indians at a cost of a million a year; we have supported a mounted police at a cost of a million a year. We have built public buildings, we have gone into improvements wherever they were necessary. We have spent no less than $365,000 in public improvements in Regina alone. What did we do all this for? For the purpose of opening up that country and of reaping the advantages to the east that would come from the development of that western country.

Having done all this, having given to the west the best of our sons and daughters, contributed to its settlement and development, all we ask in return is, not that they should be enslaved or deprived of any rights as British subjects, but simply that they should give to the east the preference of their trade, and before the avenues are established for the carrying of that trade, let us not open up other avenues that would take it away. What would you think of a man who had constructed a canal for the purpose of irrigating a district of country who, after its construction would grant another party the right to tap it at the fountain head and carry away a considerable portion of the water to another place? You would think he was very foolish, I would think so too. That is the very thing I want to avoid in the railway development of the west. Let us say to Mr. Hill, or whoever is at the back of this thing, go on and show your bona fides by first constructing a large percentage of your line. Build two hundred miles of your road and put it in operation, and then, if there is still an opening for branch roads, or if you want the privilege of going in other directions, come to parliament and we will consider the question. I should like to know from the promoter of this Bill if any financial scheme has matured whereby a mile of this road will be built this year? I venture to predict that there will not be one mile of it constructed this year. Then why not wait until parliament meets again? Why ask us by this Bill to tie up all those passes and give them over to this particular company, I care not whether it is Jim Hill's or whose it is? I have nothing to say against Mr. Hill. He was born in the county in which I live; he is a great railway man and a great financier, but the greater he is in that respect the more dangerous he becomes. He has the Great Northern Railway running very close to the southern boundary of Canada, and his object is to drain away what he can of the trade of Canada and further build up the earning capacities of his own line. I quite agree with the remarks which have been made that the export of the produce of the Northwest may largely go out to the Orient. I hope that trade will largely increase. If it does, I want to see Canadian ships carry it from our own ports. Will it be the object of Mr. Hill, supposing he gets his railroad to Edmonton, to do his shipping at Vancouver? I say it will not? Why? Because his line of boats will run from Everitt, a point he will establish as one of the terminals of his line on the Pacific, or else Seattle. Do you think that after he builds his railroad that he will leave off the freight which will accumulate along the line, at Vancouver, and allow the Canadian Pacific Railway boats or some other boats to carry it to the Orient? We know that Mr. Hill is not such a fool. If he secures a large volume of trade he will take it to his own side of the line, and ship it by his own boats. People say it makes little difference who builds the railroads as long as the country gets the advantage.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—My hon. friend says hear, hear. We know that sixty-five or seventy per cent of the earnings of every railroad goes to pay the operating expenses of that line. Suppose Mr. Hill does construct this line, it will be operated by men largely from the other side.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Why?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I am informed that they come now even to Vancouver, bringing their dinner cans with them, and seventy per cent of the earnings of that road will go to the pockets of men who live on the other side of the line. Is that as good for us as if we had a line of our own ?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that all the men who will be required for this Transcontinental Railway, several hundred miles in length will be supplied from the United States side, and that the men will go back and forward with their dinner cans?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—We have only to judge from the past. It is a fact that four fifths of the men that are employed on that short line come from the United States. We know also that the contractors and men working on that line belonged to the United States, drew United States money and spent it on the United States side. I say we want the money spent in Canada. We want those men to come over and bring their families and live here. If they do that, our population will been increased, our consumers will be increased, and the country will be built up. I contend, even from that standpoint, it is better for us that Canadians should build and operate the road than that it should be constructed and controlled by people from the other side. My hon. friend said something about my communication with the board of trade, Toronto. I never sent a letter to the board of trade. At the request of a man in Toronto to whom I spoke in getting on the train at Toronto, I sent a copy of the Bill to the mayor of Toronto with the 'Hansard' that contained the debate on its introduction. Now, my hon. friend says that my letter was referred to the board of control. Yes, it was. My hon. friend says that the board of control proposed to put a bouquet on Mr. Hill. The board of control did nothing of the kind—never said such a word. The paper that proposed that, I think, was the 'Globe,' and we know that the 'Globe' has very strong free trade tendencies. I do not find fault with them for that. They believe the more trade we have with the United States the better. I got a letter from the mayor of the city of Toronto in which he complimented me in the view I took, and I have the letter here. That is all there is to be said with regard to the board of control. My hon. friend has also said that the House of Commons having passed this Bill unanimously, and the members from British Columbia favouring it, we should accept it. If this Chamber is to accept all the Bills that are passed by the House of Commons, and that owing to the fact of any province being united upon a measure, that this House is not to take any action, that we should hesitate before we attempt to interfere with any of those Bills, we had better resign our positions. We are not going to be of any use to the people of this country if that view is taken. We have a perfect right, and that is what we are here for, to criticise every Bill that is sent to us, and if we have any amendments to offer to that Bill it is our duty to propose them. My hon. friend from Toronto said that there was no province richer in natural resources than British Columbia. I believe that, and I believe that Jim Hill is of the same opinion. He is a wise man in his own way, and he wants to get connection, no doubt, with that country, and I do not blame him ? From his own standpoint, perhaps he is right. I believe that out of the Rocky Mountains of British Columbia will come in the future a very large percentage of the wealth of this Dominion. From the United States section of those mountains is taken over sixty million dollars a year in silver and gold. I believe that our section of it is just as rich, and once it becomes properly developed, as I believe will soon happen, I have not the slightest doubt we will have out of British Columbia as large an amount as is taken out on the United States side, and Mr. Hill, unquestionably sees that there will be a very large amount of business done there and no doubt he wants his road to tap that distance and have all the advantages and earnings that will result from its construction, and will bring to his smelters, perhaps, on the United States side a very large percentage of the mineral that will be taken out of that district. We know that prior to the construction of the smelter at Traill all the ore from the Rossland district was taken across to the United States and smelted there.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Did the hon. gentleman ever hear there was one at Nelson and one at Pilot bay?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Before they were erected, the ore was taken to the United States. It will not be admitted after it is smelted, because then it is subject to a duty. It must be taken across in the rough or not at all. We have to consider whether it is our duty to treat our neighbours largely on the lines they have treated us. On every single occasion that Canada has had anything to do with the United States, as pointed out by my hon. friend from Cobourg, we have been euchered out of what was looked upon as our rights. Take the treaty of 1871, which contained the provision that we should have the right to use the canal which runs from Whitehall to Albany, and also from Buffalo to Albany. It was understood that in exchange for the use of our canals we should have the use of that canal on the same terms as their own citizens. What was the result? They admitted that we could send boats down there, but they said 'you can't send in any load. You may send in the boats and bring them back empty if you like, but you can't take in any freight.' That was their interpretation of the provisions of the treaty; consequently we never got any advantage from it. Then take the treatment that we received from the Americans at the time of our Northwest rebellion. These arguments I present to show that we should act independently for ourselves. When our troops started to quell the Northwest rebellion they went up to the Sault, and they were not allowed to pass through the American canal. Our boat had to go back unload on the Canadian side, have all the stuff transported up to a point where the steamer could get it and reload it. The boat was then allowed to go through empty, and after she had passed through she had to load up again upon the other side and proceed on her way. That was the treatment meted out to us on that occasion and treatment on that line has been meted out to us from time to time ever since. We do not owe the other side anything. We should endeavour to hold our trade ourselves. I know that British Columbia, apparently, is indifferent with regard to this question of holding the trade of the Dominion for ourselves. They may be as patriotic as we are; I am not going to say that they are not, but it does look, from their anxiety to make southern connection, as if their patriotism is in their pocket. They want, in the first place, to make American connections, get all they can in that way and whatever our own lines are able after that to take from British Columbia and bring east they may do so, but, in the meantime, they are not concerned as to whether it is going to interfere with the trade of the east or not. In our own interest we should endeavour to hold together and act as partners in common, and endeavour to be true to each other. What would you think in the case of a company consisting of nine partners if one partner commenced dribbling away the interests of the firm and throwing trade in a direction that would tend to cripple and interfere with the business of which he is a partner. You would say he was not true in his partnership. Now, we are all partners as provinces, and we should unitedly put forth our efforts to keep up our interprovincial trade. We have been going to very considerable expense in developing the ports of Montreal and Quebec, and I am glad to notice that the Canadian Pacific Railway are starting the new line of steamers from those ports, which will, no doubt, tend to develop and increase the trade coming from the Northwest. We hope it may continue to pour in there. Somebody has talked about the construction of the Georgian bay canal. I should be glad to see that built, and I have not a doubt if the volume of wheat produced in the Northwest continues to grow as it has for the last ten years, the Georgian bay canal may become an absolute necessity and will have to be constructed by this country. If so, it is going to largely increase the trade of Montreal and Quebec. We want to see our own cities built up and to hold the trade of the west for our own towns and bring it through the avenues we have prepared for the purpose of carrying it. I do not wish to detain the House further. I have expressed these views, not because I have been prompted or asked by any person to do so, but I have expressed them honestly because I entertain them. I am quite willing to grant to every other member of this House the right to differ from me on this question. I am simply expressing the views I hold myself, and I earnestly hope that Canada may not experience in years to come the fulfillment of my predictions. I hope I may be wrong. I hope the country will hold its trade, but I am very much afraid that years after this then we will begin to experience that we in our simplicity were far wrong and that it was a mistake on the part of the country to consent to this measure.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Before the amendment is put I should like to say a few words with regard to it. Before doing so I wish to answer some criticisms which have been made of my remarks this afternoon. Some of my hon. friends from Alberta seemed to think that I had spoken against railway competition. I assure them they are entirely wrong and if they will take the trouble to-morrow of reading what I said they will find they were wrong. I am not in favour of choking off railway competition, because I have always been in favour of it, and I might say that I favoured railway competition in the western country eight or ten years before these hon. gentlemen had a seat in this House. No one can accuse me of ever being friendly to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or any other corporation not doing justice to the people of Canada. But there is a great difference between the granting of charters and the building of railways. We know as a matter of fact that charters are very often asked for, not for the purpose of building a railway at all, but for the purpose of preventing a railway from being built. I took that ground in the past and I take it still, that the more charters you grant the less prospect you have of getting railways. We are told that the west has made a great deal of progress lately. That is true. Some gentlemen who were eulogizing Mr. Hill seemed to think that he had something to do with that progress, and they took occasion to speak in not very complimentary terms of the existing railways we have in the west at the present time, more particularly those of the firm of Mackenzie and Mann. Now I want to say as an old settler in the west, there is no company deserves more at the hands of the Canadian people to-day than this same firm, Mackenzie & Mann. In the dark days of the Northwest Territories, when it was very hard to get any one to put a dollar into railway construction, Mackenzie & Mann stayed with the proposition that they had entered into. I believe they hypothecated everything they had in the world to stay with it. They showed they had faith in the Northwest when Mr. Hill had not, and they have succeeded. They have done a wonderful lot of work in the last two or three years in that country, opening up the great Saskatchewan valley and filling it with people. I do not think any one claimed that it was Mr. Hill that filled the North Saskatchewan Valley with the people who are there to-day developing that country and producing wealth which will eventually run into the coffers of the manufacturers of the east. Mr. Hill had nothing to do with that. The hon. gentleman from Yale, (Mr. Bostock) has told us that it is not Mr. Hill who is interested. Then I submit if Mr. Hill is not wanting to build this transcontinental line that that hon. gentlemen spoke of this afternoon, it is all the more reason why we should not allow these applicants to blanket the whole of British Columbia because that will have a tendency to prevent Mackenzie & Mann or any other Canadian company from going through to the Pacific coast. It will prevent them from floating their bonds in the money markets of the world. What was the object of Mr. Hill's making the statement which he did about the Hudson Bay road? He knew perfectly well that Mackenzie & Mann had undertaken that enterprise just the same as they had undertaken in the dark days of the Northwest Territories to build the existing line. These men have absolute faith in this Hudson Bay road. Do you think that statement made by Mr. Hill, the most emminent railway man on this continent, will assist them in financing when they go to England to look for money? His words will have a great deal of weight with monied men, and if Mr. Hill condemns the scheme it will be hard for Mackenzie & Mann or any other Canadian company to find money to build the road. The same thing applies to the charters that these gentlemen are asking for in British Columbia. If you allow all these rights they are asking to be tied up, when Mackenzie & Mann or any other Canadian company try to finance their projects they will be met with that difficulty. They will be told that the country will perhaps support one company but not two. While the financiers might be willing to advance money to build one road, might see a return for money put in that way, they would not see their way to advancing money where there are two or three railways to be constructed to that part of the country. Therefore I say that the granting of this proposition at the present time will have a tendency to stop Mackenzie & Mann from financing their proposition to build through to the Pacific coast. We are told, here you have a railway without money and without price. What guarantee have we that we are going to get a railway built without money and without price? Some hon. gentleman has said that Mr. Hill has made that statement. The promoter of the Bill said Hill is not behind it. No doubt the gentlemen in British Columbia that are behind it will be just as anxious to get a subsidy as Mackenzie & Mann or any one else. As a matter of fact it has been acknowledged this afternoon that they had already applied for a subsidy for this other charter that now belongs to Hill, the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern. Mr. Hill, if he owns the road now, perhaps will not apply for it. If he does not own the charter now asked for, what guarantee is there that the promoters will not be down here to get a subsidy towards building the road? I submit that as the Canadian roads have shown a great deal of energy in developing the Northwest Territories and have taken the risk in the years when the country was in its experimental stage by putting their money into the building of railways, if there is any advantage to be given any railway at all, it ought to be given to the Canadian roads, not to cut off competition, because as I said before if we can get railways coming in from the south, I would be in favour of all the railways we could get from the south. If we have the three transcontinental lines we have now in view—we have the Canadian Pacific Railway—we have practically the Canadian Northern, and in the very near future we will have the Grand Trunk running through that country east and west, dividing it up—if these other roads could be brought in crossing from the United States boundary towards Hudson bay, we hope in the near future when the Hudson bay route is open—because we have absolute faith in the west in that Hudson bay road—we hope that not only will a great part of our own trade be carried by that road but we hope to get a lot of United States trade as well, going towards the Hudson bay. Any trade that would come from the United States across our country in that way, a portion of it must eventually find its way over our own transcontinental lines.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—How do you expect to get that unless you go to the boundary line?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am not opposing going to the boundary line. I am opposing this other proposition. If Hill were to come here to-morrow and propose to build a transcontinental railway on Canada soil right through from the Pacific Coast to the Atlantic Coast, I would hold up both hands to vote for it, but he is not doing it. He is side tracking the City of Vancouver, putting it on a branch. He practically puts his main line into Seattle. That is what it means, nothing else, and after he gets that you are allowing him to go through to Edmonton. What then? He has already a line running from the boundary line to Brandon, and he will find means to get another railway from Brandon to Edmonton; then he will have a railway with one end of it at Minneapolis to take the trade out to the Gulf of Mexico, and the other end at Seattle, coming in like a hoop and gathering up everything in the Canadian west and pulling it out across the line. There is a great deal of difference in that, from roads run north and south.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Wont you get anything in? You said a moment ago you were not opposed to lines coming in from the boundary and now you are speaking against that argument?

Hon Mr. DAVIS—No, what I say is that if roads come in from the south they will be pushed to the Hudson bay.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am not speaking of the Hudson bay.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—But I am speaking of the Hudson bay. It is a portion of the transportation problem, and we have a right to speak of it in this connection. These lines coming across the boundary line running towards Hudson bay would bring trade from our country to the Hudson bay, where as if you allow this other road to be built, starting in Seattle in the United States and ending in Minneapolis in the United States it will mean scouping everything out of the country and taking it across there. I simply say that I think my proposition is a better one. Speaking in the interests of the part of the country I live in, the Canadian Northern has opened up that part of the country and developed it, and we are in hopes that we are going to have a transcontinental line. We are in hopes now that that transcontinental line is not only going to run down to the older provinces and the coast in the near future, but that we are going to have a branch of the Hudson bay, and that all the trade from the east, from Japan and the east, will come through there, and down through our provinces, and to Hudson bay and I would rather see it, and I think every Canadian would rather see that, than to have it go to Minneapolis. If we are right to-day we were wrong two or three years ago. There are a number of gentlemen advocating this proposition who supported the Grand Trunk Pacific proposition to keep Canadian trade in Canadian channels a few years ago. If they were right then they are wrong to-day, and if they are right to-day they were wrong then. The Grand Trunk Pacific wanted to make the terminals in Portland, and that was opposed by these same gentlemen on the ground that we wanted a national railway policy and a national transcontinental line, which was adopted. You could not allow them to go to Portland. We must take that wheat and carry it right to a Canadian port on the Atlantic ocean. That was the cry. I want to say to our friends in the maritime provinces that they have an immense amount of water-power in Nova Scotia. I understand that there are great water-powers in the province of Quebec. If wheat that is growing in the west now and will be grown in that country in the future —I expect in the near future we will be growing nearly a billion bushels of wheat, because we are getting the population there —if that wheat was brought down and milled in Quebec where you have cheap power, or in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, and carried down to a Canadian port and shipped in Canada bottoms, would it not be better than to allow it to be carried to Minneapolis over United States roads and shipped in United States bottoms to the markets of the world? Are we going to build up our own country or the United States? The United States have not done much in the past to assist us and they may not treat us any better in the future. Mr. Hill is not a philanthropist and he is coming here after his own benefit, not for ours He has built forty-one or forty-two miles in British Columbia; he has a charter for some hundred miles of main line in British Columbia, which has not been built, and he is asking now for a charter for hundreds of miles more. This is not all for the benefit of the people of this country. It is for the benefit of Hill and for the benefit of his system in the United States. Every mile he builds on this side is going to assist his United States lines.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The hon. gentleman should stick to one thing or the other. First he said that Mr. Hill was not at the back of the company. Now he says he is at the back of the company.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am replying to my hon. friends across the floor, who says Hill is behind it.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The hon. gentleman is sailing east by west.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am speaking to the motion moved by the hon. gentleman from Wellington. If Mr. Hill is behind this charter, I think it would be as well to allow him to build the road for which he already has a charter before we grant another, and then we will ascertain whether it is Mr.

Hill or not because when he builds the main line he will want the rest of the line, and if he does that perhaps parliament will see its way clear to give it to him. When that time arrives, our Canadian road would be on their feet. Messrs. McKenzie and Mann will be able to finance their scheme, and the Grand Trunk Pacific will get to the coast, but if you allow a blanket charter to be passed, you are going to jeopardize the other undertaking and prevent them getting money to build that road. The Grand Trunk Pacific is going to build through there and they will be wanting branches through that entry too. I am glad to be able to agree with the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie that it would be a good thing if we could have a system in this country under which a capitalist could build railways where he pleased, but we have not got it. When you grant charters you create vested rights, and when the people come back for an extension, you will give it. The charter allows two years to begin work and five years to complete it. All they have to do is to spend 10 per cent in organization, and they can have the time extended for five years. I do not think it is the interest of the country to tie up all these routes leading up the Yellow Head Pass for the next five years. If the House is prepared to give Mr. Bostock's friends a charter into Edmonton, it is only a fair proposition to give them one charter, give them one line, and leave the other free for a Canadian road, but do not allow them to tie up the whole thing.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Pass is free to all lines, according to the amendment just now passed.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My hon. friend knows a lot about railroads if he thinks that proposition will meet the case. As far as the Yellow Head Pass is concerned, it may be all right to have running powers for a distance; but running powers would not do any good to a railroad to run four or five hundred miles. They could not have any local traffic. They would have to run right through and they would be hampered by the parties who had the ownership of the road. I do not think it is proper to tie up all those Passes even with that clause which has been moved here, giving all roads running powers. I think it would be much better to give them one road and let the other be free, and let the Canadian roads have a preference in building through into that country. I do hope the House will take that into consideration. I must say that I am in favour of the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Wellington. If my hon. friends on the other side of the House are right in the supposition that Mr. Hill is at the back of the road, it is no injury to Mr. Hill if you accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Wellington, because Mr. Hill has promised to build the whole thing in eighteen months.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Which road?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The main line he speaks about?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I was informed in the House of Commons by a gentleman who was there that the solicitor made a promise to have it put through in eighteen months.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Which Bill?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—That has nothing to do with this line.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—That is the charter that Mackenzie and Mann sold to Mr. Hill.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—They sold a small charter in British Columbia to Hill, but it was not a transcontinental line at all.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Was it not a crime to sell that?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—No it is not a crime to sell any Canadian road on any terms.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Was that not charter-mongering?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I don't know.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—My hon. friend knows more about it than I do.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—No, I do not. I do not know any more about charter-mongering than my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I can tell my hon. friend that I never had anything to do with one in my life.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am informed that my hon. friend supported that proposition last year.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Not for the purpose of the charter being sold in that way. I never thought these people would go into the charter-selling business at all.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—But this proposition which passed the House last year had nothing to do with the charter-mongering. It was a charter granted to build the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern Railway, and I take it that is their main line before they ask for anything else.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman is confounding the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern with the Bill before this House. They are different propositions, and have no connection with each other—they are one hundred miles apart.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I want to tell my hon. friend there is every connection. If he will look at that map he will see the connection.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Who made the map ?

Hon. M. DAVIS—It does not matter who made it. It is absolutely correct. This line taps the main line of the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern in three different places.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—The only possible place for the railway to tap the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern is down where it crosses that line of railway near the boundary.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The hon. member from Victoria says that they are one hundred miles apart.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have a map showing where the main line of the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern Railway taps it. Does this blue line here not belong to Mr. Hill ?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—No, that is a different road.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am told this blue line on the map goes under a different name.

Hrn. Mr. GIBSON—Who made the blue line ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It makes no difference who made it. I got it made by parties who know about it. That is the main line of Hill's road in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I suggest that if any information is to be attached to the reference to the blue line on the map, the hon. gentleman should state where it starts, and where it runs to so that it will be intelligible in the reporter's notes.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—There is no question that the last section of the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern Railroad was intended to be backed up by Jim. Hill, and was part of his line running for a distance through British Columbia, running about forty miles across the boundary line into the United States and returning again to British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—That is not this charter at all.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I opposed it, and got abused for it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It does not make any difference about the name. This is the main line charter which was granted to gentlemen in British Columbia representing Mr. Hill, and it is therefore Mr. Hill's main line. It taps this country at three places, and one is enough. The hon. gentleman from Wellington claims that they should build two hundred miles of this road before they are permitted to construct branches. That is perfectly right. If they intend to build this road at all, what objection could they have to that amendment? If they are merely holding these charters for the purpose of preventing other people from building roads, we know what they are at. There can be no objection in accepting the amendment if they intend honestly to build the road, and if they do not intend to build it, I claim they should not be allowed to prevent railway competition. The promoter says Mr. Hill has nothing to do with any attempt to cover up the whole province of British Columbia. I do not want any false impression about my views on this subject. I do not want to stop railway competition. I want to see as many roads built as we can get, if it is done in the proper way. I want railways from the United States running north and south extended to Hudson bay, so that they will bring traffic through our country, but I am not in favour of covering the whole country with road charters so as to enable the people who hold them to prevent others floating bonds and getting money to build railways. That is exactly what is intended, just as Mr. Hill's scheme was to stop Mackenzie & Mann and others, and prevent them getting money to build to Hudson bay. It meant nothing else.

The House divided on the amendment, which was rejected on the folowing vote :

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I notice the hon. member from Alexandria did not vote.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I am paired with the hon. gentleman from Perth. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote for the amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by striking out therefrom paragraph (d) of clause 1.

The amendment was declared lost on a division.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (CC), An Act to incorporate the Chartered Bank of London and Canada.—Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

THIRD READING.

Bill (X), An Act for the Relief of Eileen Mary Mackintosh.—Hon. Mr. Perley.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 155) An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892. He said: As the law stands at present, a judge of the Supreme Court or County Court can appoint a commissioner to take evidence out side of Canada in all indictable cases. This Bill proposes to extend it to cases that are not indictable.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 70) An Act respecting the British Canadian Loan and Investment Company, Limited.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto).

HURON AND ERIE LOAN AND SAVINGS COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH moved the second reading of Bill (No 21) An Act respecting the Huron and Erie Loan and Savings Company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman inform the Senate what the purpose of this Bill is?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It is for the amalgamation of two loan companies in London. The matter was thoroughly considered in the committee of the House of Commons and the Bill passed without amendment.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

NIAGARA, QUEENSTON AND ST. CATHERINES RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 25) An Act respecting the Niagara, Queenston and St. Catherines Railway Company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Explain.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—This Bill was up here some time ago and there was some opposition from the city of Toronto on account of some power line, but the opposition was subsequently withdrawn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (35) an Act to incorporate the Western Trust Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (54) an Act to incorporate the Pacific Marine Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (65) an Act respecting the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

Bill (72) an Act to incorporate the Quebec, Montreal and Southern Railway Company. —(Hon. Mr. David.)

Bill (103) an Act respecting the Quebec and Lake Huron Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Choquette.)

Bill (132) an Act respecting the Ontario Northern and Timagami Railway Company. —(Hon. Mr. McHugh.)

Bill (141) an Act respecting the Quebec, Saguenay and Gulf of St. Lawrence Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Tessier.)

Bill (112) an Act respecting the Huron and Ontario Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Frost.)

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (156) 'an Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.' He said: The object of this Bill is to define what a final judgment is. Under the Exchequer Court Act a party who is dissatisfied with the judgment may appeal. The Department of Justice thought there was a better definition of the words 'final judgment' than the one given in the Act. This Bill reads:

A judgment shall be considered final for the purposes of this section——

That is for the purpose of an appeal——

—if it determines the rights of the parties.

The motion was agreed to.

The Bill was read the second time.

CANADIAN HANDICRAFTS GUILD BILL, COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved concurrence in the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill (E) an Act to incorporate the Canadian Handicrafts Guild. He said: These are amendments made by the House of Commons to a Bill which was introduced in this House, and most of the amendments are of a very trifling character. The first amendment is to strike out the name of the Hon. Justice Baby, who was one of the proposed directors, inasmuch as that hon. gentleman died since the Bill was introduced. Then the description 'Miss,' and the description 'Mrs.' are used in several places in connection with the names of several ladies, and these descriptions are striken out.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Did they get married since the Bill was introduced?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, that is not the reason. The substantial amendment is in the third clause. The third clause reads:

3. The Guild shall have power, for the objects aforesaid:

(a) To buy and sell goods, wares and merchandise, and do engage in all kinds of commercial transactions incidental and necessary thereto, subject to the provisions of section 14 of this Act.

(b) To take, hold, possess and acquire by purchase, exchange, donation, devise, bequest, endowment or otherwise, all such moveable or immoveable property as may be required to the use of the Guild or for the purpose of procuring revenue, and the same to sell, mortgage, pledge, hypothecate or alienate in any manner whatever;

(c) To borrow money;

(d) To exhibit goods wherever desirable, to hold exhibitions and to open depots, stores and shops;

(e) To appoint agents and instructors and to open schools and classes anywhere, for instruction in and concerning the objects aforesaid.

The amendment reads:

Page 2, line 27.—After 'immovable property' insert 'not exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars annual value.'

I move that this amendment be concurred in.

This motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In clause 10 there are some other amendments striking out the words 'Mrs. and Miss', and there is another amendment in clause 14. The clause read in the original Bill as follows:

14. The members of the Guild shall not make any personal profit out of its affairs; provided that the general committee may allow fair compensation and reimbursement for any time actually occupied or lost by any member in connection with the affairs of the Guild, or for any sums and expenses expended on behalf of the Guild.

The amendment is to strike out the words 'any time actually occupied or lost by any member in connection with the affairs of the guild or for any sums and expenses expended on behalf of the guild', and inserting 'for any sums expended and expenses incurred.' They are not allowed to charge for time lost. I move concurrence in that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMIESON WEBSTER LEWIS ENFRANCHISEMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Pursuant to the Order of the Day, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (85) An Act for the enfranchisement of Jamieson Webster Lewis, an Indian of the Moravian Band of the Thames, in the province of Ontario.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This unfortunate Indian has been kept out of his rights for a number of years. Under the law when an Indian desires to be enfranchised it has to go before the band. That was all complied with. The whole difficulty consists in some irregularity in the affidavit.

Hon. Mr. FORGET, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment; and it was then read the third time.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (133) An Act respecting the Niagara St. Catharines and Toronto Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto).

Bill (160) An Act respecting Queen's College of Kingston.—(Hon. Mr. Sullivan).

Bill (60) An Act to incorporate the Interocean Fire Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (42) An Act to incorporate the Buffalo, Niagara and Toronto Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson).

Bill (DD) An Act for the relief of Jane Frances Fields.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg).

Bill (EE) An Act for the relief of Frederick William Wight.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg.)

Bill (FF) An Act for the relief of James Allen.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg).

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—With the leave of the House I move that rule 13 be suspended, and that when the Senate adjourns on Friday it stand adjourned until Tuesday evening following at eight o'clock.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I object to that. If the hon. gentleman will make it three o'clock I shall not object.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I have no objection to that, but there are a number of gentlemen——

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is just it; there are always a number of gentlemen who want something.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am willing to substitute three o'clock for eight o'clock.

The motion as amended, was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned until to-morrow at 3 p.m.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Friday, June 1, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

CHANGES IN THE CABINET.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to direct the attention of the hon. Secretary of State to a paragraph published yesterday in the 'Free Press.' It reads as follows:

MR. FITZPATRICK TO TAKE SEAT AS THE CHIEF JUSTICE.

It is currently reported that Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick will appear at Monday's meeting of the Supreme Court, as Sir Elzear Taschereau's successor in the chief justiceship. The Quebec list of appeals, including several that stood over from last term, come up for hearing on that day. It is accepted as practically certain that Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux will be promoted from the Solicitor Generalship to the office of Postmaster General, and that Hon. Mr. Aylesworth will thereupon become Minister of Justice.

As this has been published in the government organ in this city, and as it is repeated in the issue of the government organ in Montreal, 'Le Canada,' which we received to-day, I would like to know from the hon. gentleman if there is any truth in these reports; if the nomination is contemplated or if it has been made, and how has it leaked out so that the papers of the country have received that information prior to its being laid before parliament? We are entitled I think to have the news first.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No appointment whatever has been made; no recommendation, even, has been made. The hon. gentleman knows full well that the papers in this country are generally a month or two ahead of the government, and of public opinion. They sometimes shape it—sometimes they are right and sometimes they are wrong.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Then we cannot rely on what that newspaper says ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Give the weight to it that you would give to any other newspaper report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I thought, as it was the organ of the government, its announcements would have some weight !

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The government has not given out the announcement.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will the hon. Secretary of State inform the House if there is any truth in another rumour, that is now becoming widespread, to the effect that seventeen members of the Liberal party in the House of Commons or in this Senate have combined to prevent the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux from being appointed as Postmaster General in the cabinet?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not even heard the report. It is entirely new to me.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that he might give the answer which was given by the late Sir John Macdonald when he was interrogated on a similar point. He said he could not tell, because he had not seen the newspapers that morning. I would further suggest to the hon. Secretary of State, could he not inquire of the Minister of Justice when he proposes to appoint himself to the position on the Supreme Court bench. He would, no doubt, get a civil answer which would enable him to relieve the anxiety of the hon. gentleman from Stadacona.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Perhaps the answer would not be more reliable than what the newspapers say.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (L) An Act respecting the James Bay Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (86) An Act respecting the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railroad and Steamboat Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (39) An Act respecting the Canada Atlantic Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (37) An Act respecting the Montreal Park and Island Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Béique.)

Bill (98) An Act respecting the Central Ontario Railway.—(Hon. Mr. Coffey.)

Bill (126) An Act respecting the Thorold and Lake Erie Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (79) An Act respecting certain patents of Chester Burnell Duryea.—(Hon. Mr. Power.)

CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION TO SAN FRANCISCO SUFFERERS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hon. gentlemen are aware that the Deputy Governor is to come down at four o'clock, to give his assent to some twenty-five or thirty Bills. It will be in the remembrance of the Senate that the House of Commons approved of the government making a contribution of $100,000 to the San Francisco sufferers. The Bill has not yet been passed, but the Finance Minister suggested that the Bill had better be put through now, and receive the Royal assent. It may, therefore, not come to the Senate for twenty minutes yet. It is now being considered in the House of Commons. I would therefore ask the Senate to adjourn during pleasure, to meet shortly before four o'clock to consider the Bill donating one hundred thousand dollars to San Francisco sufferers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has the Bill been sent up to this House ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is only being considered in the House of Commons just now. I move that the House adjourn during pleasure to meet at a quarter to four.

The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned during pleasure.

SUPPLY BILL NO. 2.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (178) An Act for granting to His Majesty a certain sum of money for the public service for the financial year ending 30th June, 1906.

The Bill was read a first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the suspension of the 17th and 41st rules so far as the same relate to this Bill.

He said: This Bill is a grant of $100,000 towards the relief of the distress, caused by the recent earthquake and fire in San Francisco.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read at the table.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend what correspondence took place between our government and the government of the United States with reference to the application of this fund? I did understand that our aid had been refused by the government of the United States. Do I understand that that refusal has been withdrawn?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Promptly after the fire, as hon. gentlemen will recollect, when it was decided to make this offer, and public opinion in Canada seemed to be universally in favour of it, communication was opened with Washington. Cotemperaneously with that, President Roosvelt made the announcement that the government of the United States did not propose to accept any outside assistance. It was rather a rebuff, because we had corresponded with Washington and proposed that they should make distribution, assuming that it would go in with the money that had already been voted by congress. They voted a large sum of money and we supposed the better way to distribute it would be through the same channel the United States themselves were distributing money. However, when the president made this announcement, it of course, stopped any further negotiations. Soon afterwards it became evident that public opinion in the United States did not sustain the course that the president had taken, and, as hon. gentlemen will recollect, he rather withdrew from it and intimated that while they would not be made the channel for the distribution of foreign aid, still the government would not interpose any objection to their communicating direct with the distribution committee in San Francisco. Our government rather hesitated as to what course should be adopted, and since that time correspondence has been going on between His Excellency the Governor General and the British embassy at Washington, and the conclusion, I think, at present, although it is not final, is that perhaps the better way would be to send it to the British minister at Washington and allow him to exercise his discretion as to whether it should be distributed by the municipal authorities at San Francisco or given to the head of the Red Cross Society, which seems to be a body that is distributing outside moneys to a very considerable extent. No doubt through either channel it would reach the people who need it most, and I think it is most unfortunate that it was not sent sooner than we are sending it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do I understand that the government is relying absolutely on the British embassy at Washington to make the necessary application?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is not final. It seemed to be the opinion His Excellency entertained in corresponding with the British embassy, but it is not absolutely certain. I presume the government will decide to-morrow whether the funds will be entrusted to the British embassy at Washington or go direct to the Red Cross Society.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN. Why should it not be sent to the mayor of the city of San Francisco?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The mayor was spoken of, but there were reasons given against the suggestion which I need not discuss.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read at length at the table.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I desire to say a word on this matter. At the time it was first proposed to contribute one hundred thousand dollars towards relieving the people of San Francisco, the United States press of that time was keen in their appreciation of the kindly feeling that was exhibited by Canada and the prompt and liberal way in which they had offered assistance. I was glad to notice that, and although the money was not immediately sent forward it was not Canada's fault; it was the fault of the president of the United States in declining as he did, officially, to accept any outside aid, virtually discouraging any outside assistance. I am in full accord with the course which the government has taken. The money is to be sent to the British ambassador in Washington, and will, no doubt, be distributed by him in the best way and through the best avenues towards the relief of these people who need it. I am glad that the government moved promptly in the matter. It shows the sympathy of Canada towards those people who have suffered so seriously, and if they have not reaped the benefit of that sympathy before now, that responsibility rest with their own president and not with us.

The motion was agreed to.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

The House adjourned during pleasure.

After some time the House resumed.

BILLS ASSENTED TO.

The Hon. Justice Sedgewick, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, being seated on the Throne.

The Hon. the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House :

To these Bills the Royal Assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the following words :—

In His Majesty's name, His Honour the Deputy Governor doth assent to these bills.

Then the Hon. the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, as follows :

May it please Your Honour :

The Commons of Canada have voted the Supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the Public Service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour a bill intituled :—

An Act for granting to His Majesty a certain sum of money for the public service of the financial year ending June 30, 1906, to which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

Then after the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery had read the Title of the Bill,

The Clerk of the Senate, by His Honour's command, did thereupon say :—

In His Majesty's name His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General

thanks His Loyal Subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this bill.

The Deputy Governor was pleased to retire, and

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at three o'clock p.m.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Tuesday, June 5, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG presented the 19th report of the Committee on Standing Orders and moved that the report be now adopted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would not perhaps object to concurrence in the report, but I think it is a little premature to ask that it be adopted the same day it is presented. It should be allowed to stand over until to-morrow, so that we may take cognizance of the facts it states. I see there are a few suspensions of the rules asked for, and though I would not feel inclined to object to the report, still as a matter of prudence I think it should stand over. It would not cause much delay if it were adopted to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—There is a great deal of force in what the hon. gentleman has stated, and I fancy that the only reason for pressing this report now is that some of the Bills may be on the Orders of the Day for second reading to-day. I have no objection at all to the report standing over. The delay in bringing in the legislation was caused by a difference of opinion between the parties and certain municipalities, which, we were informed, was not adjusted until very recently. The adjustment has taken place and the committee were advised that there were no longer any objections on the part of municipalities, and, on the strength of that, they proceeded with the legislation. The petition which is referred to, and in respect of which the suspension of the rule requiring full notice is asked for, is a matter in which differences have arisen recently in which the applicants are asking for further legislation. Having applied for legislation in British Columbia they found it necessary to extend their railway into the province of Alberta, thereby compelling them to come to this House. The Bill originates in the Senate, and, therefore, certain time must elapse before it will pass its final stages in the House of Commons, and the promoters, some of whom were present, were anxious the legislation should be proceeded with at as early a date as possible on that account. They have given three notices in the papers and undertook before the committee to continue the notices until the end. I am speaking of weekly notices, but apart from giving the weekly notices, some of the papers, through misunderstanding or otherwise, are publishing the notices daily and the public are receiving considerable notice of this proposed legislation. Although the rules of the House do not require daily notice, they recognize the bi-weekly notice. I merely mentioned that this daily notice has had the consideration of the committtee. The other petition, the third one, is a petition asking for the incorporation of an insurance company, notice of which is required only in the 'Official Gazette'. They have published four notices, and there is one more to appear. The notice will appear in due time, we are assured by those who are interested in the Bill. Those are the three petitions which I referred to asking for the suspension of the rule.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Does the report only apply to three petitions ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Speaking from memory, yes. There is another report which is not yet prepared, but which I will take up with the consent of the House before the House rises. That refers to the extension of time for presenting Bills to the Senate and for the receiving of the reports on private Bills from the select committees. The time for presenting Bills to the Senate expired to-day, and we have recommended an extension of time in each case for the consideration of the House, and if it is desired to have that report stand over we can discuss that question when the report is presented. I am sorry that it is not yet prepared, and that I cannot present it now.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If my hon. friend will delay that second report until to-morrow I will waive any objection.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The third one ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, the one that asks for an extension of time in a general way.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think my hon. friend had better delay the whole of the reports until to-morrow, especially as he has already indicated that there is one which is of a controversial nature. If it has been sufficiently important to create a controversy between the municipalities affected and the promoters—although that has been adjusted—it is an indication that it is of such a nature as to warrant this House investigating the matter before passing upon it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—My hon. friend will bear in mind that while we are only dealing with the petition, and it will be some time, owing to our procedure, before the Bill reaches the committtee, they will deal with the merits of the case, and the objections of the municipalities, if there are any. It appeared to the committee that very full notice was given to the municipalities, and there appeared to be no objections, so far as we know, to the present Bill, which has been modified to a great extent from the one which was introduced last year, speaking from memory. When the Bill comes before us, of course, I understand it will be very proper to give it long and careful consideration, and it must be made quite clear that the objections of the municipalities are withdrawn.

LIFE INSURANCE COMMISSION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid on the table of the Senate a statement showing :

1. The names of the commissioners composing the Royal Commission on Life Insurance.
2. Per diem allowance paid to each commissioner.
3. The names of the counsel and assistants employed by the government.
4. The retaining fee and the per diem allowance paid, or to be paid, to each.
5. The name of the secretary of the commission, and the amount paid, or to be paid to him.
6. The names of the actuaries, accountants, clerks and stenographers employed, and the amount paid per diem or otherwise to each of them.
7. The date of the first meeting of the commissioners.
8. The number of life companies investigated.
9. The number of life companies and friendly societies in Canada.

The motion was agreed to.

FRENCH EDITION OF THE MILITIA REGULATIONS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Has there been commenced, in the Department of Militia, or elsewhere, the translation of the rules and regulations concerning the pay and the supplementary pay, of which the English text was published in the 'Canada Gazette' of the 5th May last, and does the government intend to order that the publication in French of these rules and regulations shall take place in good time, so that the militia of the province of Quebec may have the benefit of it at the next camps ?

Will the syllabus of the daily routine which the troops in camp are to follow be likewise translated for the use of the militia of the province of Quebec ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I find the answer sent to me just now by the Department of Militia is as follows :

1. No. See reply to inquiry on May 17, 'Senate Debates,' page 503.

2. It is not considered necessary to publish the syllabus referred to in French.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think I should enter my protest against that decision of the militia authorities of Canada. It is not their opinion that I asked for in my question. What I want to know is what the government intends to do. It is a matter of policy. By the King's regulations every regulation passed by the Militia Council and approved by the Governor in Council, before becoming law, must be published in the 'Canada Gazette.' Such a publication is required by law. It becomes necessary for the purpose of incorporating those regulations into the law and making them obligatory. I claim that they cannot become law without being published in the 'Canada Gazette.' You have, by the British North America Act, an obligation to publish those regulations in French as well as in English. I say that the answer given by the militia authorities of the Department of Militia is directly contrary to the constitution and to the law of the land. We have a law regarding the publication of orders in council in our statutes, obliging them to be published in the statute books and I claim that a similar obligation exists to publish them in French. I think, therefore, that the reply of the Militia Council is simply impudent in view of the rights we possess. We ask no favour; we claim a right, and I would remind my hon. friend that so long as those regulations are not printed in French, as they ought to be, they form no part of our militia law and the government will have no excuse if they are not obeyed. When that question came up the other day, the reply to which reference has been made just now, was given, and as to-day, I was told that the translation would not be done.

I immediately wrote to the honourable the Premier a letter in which I stated all the points regarding that translation and pointed out the legal obligations to have it done. He replied that he would lay the matter before the Department of Militia, because the hon. Secretary of State, whose answer I also gave to the Premier, had said that the translation was not to be attributed to the government, but to be attributed to the Department of Militia, that such rules and regulations should go before the King's Printer already translated, as the Printing Bureau had no facilities for making any translation of the kind. I will bring the matter up once more, and I will go further and say that if it is not settled as it ought to be settled, according to law, I will bring to the attention of our province and of the whole of Canada the way in which we are treated now contrary to the constitution and to the laws of this country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall be very glad to bring the observations made by the hon. gentleman to the notice of the government as soon as they are printed.

THE ROSS RIFLE FACTORY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House :

1. A copy of the petitions signed by the citizens of Quebec protesting against the choice of the place where Sir Charles Ross has built his rifle factory.

2. A copy of the petitions sent by certain persons asking the government to increase the land placed at the disposition of Sir Charles Ross.

3. A copy of the plan of the land leased by the government to Sir Charles Ross for the purpose of his rifle factory.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the address going forward.

The motion was agreed to.

PAYMENTS TO ROSS RIFLE COMPANY OR TO SIR CHARLES ROSS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

On what dates was there paid to the Ross Rifle Company, or to Sir Charles Ross himself, the $80,764.89, which were given to him as advances upon the cost of rifles which, on the 1st of May last, were not yet accepted by the government, and of which allowance mention is made in the answer given to this House on the 9th of May last ?

If this amount has been given in several payments, what is the amount of each payment ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The first payment was made on the 27th February, 1906, $31,016.53. The next payment was made on April 27, amounting to $49,748.36, making a total of $80,764.89.

COST OF INSPECTION GAUGES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. To whom was paid the sum of $26,237.63, mentioned in the answer given on the 24th April last by the hon. Secretary of State, when he fixed at this amount the cost of two sets of inspection gauges ?

2. In virtue of what clause of the contract entered into between the government and Sir Charles Ross, did the former pay this sum ?

3. And if nothing in the contract imposed upon the government the obligation to make such payment, under what authority was such payment made ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers handed to me by the department are :

1. To Ross Rifle Company.

2. The gauges were not included in the contract for rifles.

3. The Ross Rifle Company's offer of 14th April, 1903, to make and supply necessary gauges was accepted by the department on 29th May following.

COST OF THE ROSS RIFLE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. Have the modifications brought about in the Ross rifle increased the price of that arm, and does a rifle of mark No. II. cost dearer than a rifle of mark No. I. ?

2. If there is a difference, what is it ?

3. How much has been paid, respectively, for the rifles mark No. I. and mark II.—(a) Up to the 1st of January, 1906 ? (b) from the 1st of January, 1906, to the 1st of May, 1906 ? (c) from the 1st of May to the 1st of June, 1906 ?

Hon Mr. SCOTT—

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. (a) For Mark I. rifles: $12,500 by the Marine Department, $25,000 by the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Department, $200,000 by the Militia Department; for Mark II. rifles, $446,052.51 advanced by Militia Department.

(b) For Mark I. rifles, $6,250 paid ; for Mark II. rifles, $18,750 paid and $80,764.89 advanced by the Militia Department and $300 paid by Justice Department for Mark II. rifles.

(c) For Mark II. rifles $12,500 has been paid by the Militia Department.

HIGHER COMMANDS IN MILITIA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Is it the intention of the government to put upon an equal footing officers commanding the higher commands of eastern Ontario, western Ontario, Quebec, the maritime provinces and the western provinces, when the latter provinces shall have been constituted a higher command ?

And in order to arrive at that result, is it intended to confer upon all holders of these titles the same rank in the militia, that of brigadier general, for example, which one of them already holds, namely, the officer commanding one of the higher commands in Ontario ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not the present intention of the government to put upon an equal footing, as regards rank in the militia, officers commanding the higher commands.

FRENCH REPRESENTATIVE IN THE SENATE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Does the government know that under the three administrations which preceded its own, the French element in the country was represented in the Senate by a member of the executive ?

Does the government intend to give the Senate, in the near future, a French minister ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The government is aware of the fact as stated. I may add that the government is not able to foreshadow what changes may be made in the future in the nationality of ministers having seats in the Senate. The French element can, however, always confidently rely on being properly represented in either the Senate or House of Commons.

WAGES OF OFFICERS ON GOVERNMENT VESSELS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. How many officers and petty officers upon the government vessels receive the full amount of their wages for the twelve months of the year ?

2. How many receive the full amount of their wages only for a part of the year, with half wages for the rest of the year ?

3. Which are the vessels whose officers fall within this last category ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Marine and Fisheries Department furnish the following answer :

1. One hundred and nine.

2. Sixteen.

3. 'Osprey,' 'Vigilant,' 'Curlew,' 'Constance,' 'Shamrock,' 'Scout,' 'Petrel.'

The Department of Agriculture has furnished the following answers :

1. William Head, British Columbia : 1 captain, 1 engineer, 1 fireman, 1 deckhand.

Halifax, Nova Scotia : 1 captain, 1 mate, 1 engineer, 1 deckhand and assistant engineer.

2 and 3. The general crew of the two steamers (the government boat 'Challenger,' and the rented boat 'Contest') at Grosse Isle does not come under the category of question 2. It is composed as follows :

1 captain, 1 1st mate, 1 2nd mate, 4 seamen, 1 cabin steward, paid for 7½ months ; 1 chief engineer ; 2 engineers, and 5 stokers, paid for 8 months.

These men are not paid at all in winter as a crew, but the chief engineer acts as winter guardian of the 'Challenger' on the Lévis.

ST. JOSEPH DE LEVIS RIFLE RANGE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr LANDRY inquired :

1. Has anybody asked, and when, since the beginning of last autumn, for the repairs of the targets at the St. Joseph de Lévis rifle range ?

2. Who made such request ?

3. Has such requests been acceded to, and when were the targets repaired ?

4. If such has not been the case, why has such demand been refused or the granting thereof retarded ?

5. Is it known that the want of targets at Lévis makes it impossible for the members of the District of Quebec Rifle Association, for want of practice, to take part in the meeting of the Dominion Rifle Asociation ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers are to :

1. Yes, in December, 1905.

2. Range caretaker.

3. Yes.

4. Requisition was received from Quebec at end of December, 1905. It had to be dealt with in connection with all other rifle ranges, and a general distribution according to probable requirements was made between March and May, 1906 ; the consignment to Quebec going forward about the middle of May, ultimo.

5. No.

CABINET CHANGES.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the Orders of the Day are called, may I ask my hon. friend, the leader of the government, if he has any announcements to make with reference to the recent cabinet changes ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, according to usage, I have pleasure in informing the House that the Minister of Justice has accepted a seat on the Supreme Court bench, as Chief Justice of Canada. His position as Minister of Justice has been filled by the transfer of Mr. Aylesworth, who was Postmaster General. The Postmaster Generalship thus vacated, has been filled by the gentleman who recently occupied the position of Solicitor General.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I feel satisfied that my hon. friend from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) will now have his anxiety relieved as to the Quebec list, and I have no doubt that the Supreme Court will now proceed with that list with due diligence. I hesitate to hark back to the principles which the present government—or at least the leaders of the Liberal party—advocated so strongly when in opposition as to the giving of appointments to members of parliament, and, more particularly, to those holding cabinet portfolios; but one cannot refrain from taking note of the violence which my honourable friends to the right of the Speaker have done as to this particular plank in their platform. One cannot fail to recall the fact that the late Postmaster General, who was, I think, the first exponent of that principle, honoured it in the breach by accepting the chief justiceship of the Exchequer Division of the High Court of Justice of Ontario, while occupying a cabinet portfolio and holding the vacant office in abeyance for many months. Now we find the late Minister of Justice, with that rare modesty which characterizes hon. gentlemen who hold cabinet positions in the present government, having forced upon him the highest judicial position in the gift of the Crown in Canada. However, one cannot take any exception to the appointment which has been made. I think I am safe in saying that public opinion will warrant the conclusion that the appointment is a good one. I certainly am unaware of any professional gentleman in Canada that would be more acceptable to the legal profession than the hon. gentleman who has been appointed to the position of Chief Justice of Canada. And I fancy there will be no question about his bringing very eminent qualities to bear in the discharge of the high duties of that position.

I also might say that it will be a very great relief to my hon. friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) that the gentleman who has represented for so long a time the opposing forces to my hon. friend in the Quebec district has been removed from the field of contest to the very peaceful seclusion of the Chief Justiceship of the Supreme Court. The consideration of the government in removing Mr. Parent, who was the head of the opposing forces in the same district, to the chairmanship of the Transcontinental Railway Commission, and also the late Minister of Justice to the position of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, will now, I presume, leave my hon. friend from Grandville in full possession of the field, which I fancy will be very satisfactory to himself and to that particular section of the Liberal party which he represents. My hon. friend, however, did not give us very much satisfaction as to the filling of the portfolio of Solicitor General. If one is to judge from the various reports in the press and elsewhere, there are many eminent political patriots who are willing to sacrifice their talents on that particular altar, and the government is to be congratulated that there are so many aspirants who, I presume, are fitted to occupy that position. In the various press reports which I have seen on the subject, it would seem probable that the appointment would go to some representative of the eastern provinces. It, therefore, might not be unfitting for me to point out just at this time that while the other provinces of the Dominion are fairly well represented in the cabinet, there are two western provinces, two of the most important provinces in Canada, perhaps not in population, but in their possibilities, unrepresented in the cabinet of the Dominion, and while the press of the country very freely mentions the names of eastern aspirants to the position of Solicitor General, I would point out to my hon. friend that this would be an excellent opportunity to give Manitoba or possibly Saskatchewan representation in that particular office. While it is not a cabinet position, yet it seems to me it would be a very proper recognition of the importance of those provinces in their contribution to the prosperity of the Dominion. I have no doubt that my hon. friend at an early date may be able to inform us of the appointment being filled, and it certainly would be gratifying to gentlemen coming from the west to find that consideration has been given to the representations I have made, namely, that it should be filled by a professional man from Manitoba or Saskatchewan.

THE STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE.

NINETEENTH AND TWENTIETH REPORTS.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills, presented their 20th report and moved its adoption. He said: The suspension of rule 50 that is asked for is on account of the non-production of a map before the committee. Your committee felt that they could safely recommend to the House a suspension of the rule in that respect, as the location of the work is in the French river country away north, and we recommend that the rule, so far as the presenting of a map is concerned, be suspended.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In a case like that it would be the duty of a member in charge of the Bill to see that a supplementary map is furnished for the committee when the Bill comes up before the committee.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—They will have a map for the Railway Committee, but they could not find one for our committee, I understand.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills, presented their nineteenth report. He said: The report asks for an extension of time for presenting of private Bills to the House and also an extension of time for reports from any committee on private Bills. If it is the desire of the House that the report should stand until to-morrow, I have no objection. I simply mention the fact that the time for presenting the reports on private Bills expires to-day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Although the time expires to-day, the fact that another report is brought in asking for an extension of time should be considered as action taken in due time. The adoption of the report is only delayed at the request of members of this House.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG moved that the report be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

FORDING VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. WATSON introduced Bill (GG) An Act to incorporate the Fording Valley Railway Company.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I beg to move the suspension of rules 17 and 60, in so far as the same relate to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is that one of the Bills referred to in one of the reports brought in to-day?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (111) An Act respecting the Lake of the Woods Milling Company, Limited, and the Keewatin Flour Mills Company, Limited.—(Hon Mr. Young.)

Bill (20) An Act to incorporate the Canadian Bible Society Auxiliary to the British and Foreign Bible Society.—(Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.)

Bill (M) An Act respecting the Monarch Bank of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (T) An Act to incorporate the Colonial Bank of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (127) An Act respecting the Farmers' Bank of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Coffey.)

Bill (W) An Act respecting the Citizens' Bank of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

ALBERTA RAILWAY AND IRRIGATION COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (100) An Act respecting the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like the hon. gentleman to tell us what this means—the combination of railway and irrigation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Some representations have been made by the people living in the locality of the railway, and I have arranged with my hon. friend from Lethbridge, who is more especially interested than any one else, that the Bill should be sent to the Railway Committee, where those representations will be heard.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (Y) An Act to incorporate the Prince Albert and North Saskatchewan and Hudson's Bay Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Davis.)

Bill (AA) An Act for the relief of Asenath Ramsay.—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

Bill (BB) An Act to incorporate the General Accident Insurance Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Poirier.)

Bill (133) An Act respecting the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

QUEEN'S COLLEGE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN moved the second reading of Bill (160) An Act respecting Queen's College at Kingston. He said: This Bill is for the purpose of increasing the number of trustees of Queen's University from 32 to 37. The object of putting on the additional five trustees is to give the students of that university representation on the management board. Nothing could be more just than such a measure. The students and friends are those who support this university, and one of the largest buildings, called Grant Hall, is a contribution of the students alone, so that the Bill is one which we must all approve of.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. David: That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all petitions, resolutions or documents concerning the abolition or reorganization of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON said: When this debate was adjourned about two weeks ago I was engaged in a brief examination of the record of the Senate during the different periods since confederation with the object of meeting a statement made by my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the Senate had possessed since confederation some very great power of mischief in some of these periods and had exercised it. I divided these periods in this way, from 1867 to 1873, from 1873 to 1878, from 1878 to 1896, from 1896 to 1902, and from 1902 to the present time. I had reached the period from 1896 to 1902, but before finishing it I want to say one word with regard to an omission which I made in reference to the period between 1878 and 1896. I mentioned one important measure that the Senate had rejected during that period. A measure of very great importance, which I failed to enumerate, and which I wish to mention now, was the Bankruptcy Act of 1894. As hon. gentlemen will remember, the Bankruptcy Act of 1894 was introduced by the hon. member from Belleville, who was then Minister of Trade and Commerce, and it was sent to a special committee of this House. I was a member of that commitee, and I know that a great deal of time was devoted to it before the second reading. When it came up for the second reading, it was found that a strong opposition had arisen in the House largely among the supporters of the government, and the late Senator McCallum lead these forces and moved the six months' hoist against the Bill. So strong did that opposition prove that the government were forced to withdraw the Bill without allowing a division to be taken. That was in the period between 1878 and 1896. In dealing with the period 1896-1902, there were several measures defeated in the Senate. I have dealt with the Drummond County Railway Bill, and was on the point of saying when the debate adjourned a few words with respect to the Teslin Lake Railway Bill. That measure was introduced in the House of Commons and was carried there by a party majority, but was thrown out in this House by a very large majority, including at least one Liberal senator. I have no hesitation in saying at this moment that I do not think there will be found in Canada any reasonable man who will condemn the action of the Senate on that measure. Public opinion has long since been settled that that measure was one which well deserved the defeat which it received in this House, and the fact that the government has never attempted to revive it from that time forward shows that they acquiesced in what was the general verdict of the country.

I think there was only one measure of importance during the existence of this Senate sent to us by the House of Commons that was defeated twice. I refer to the Redistribution Bill of 1899, which was defeated in 1899, and was again sent to this House in 1900 and was again defeated. I know there was pretty strong feeling with regard to these measures at that time, but I feel as the years go by, if that point has not already been reached, the point will be reached in the minds of everybody I think in this country, that the defeat of that measure was in the interests of Canada. I think that the Senate of Canada in defeating that Bill in 1899 and again in 1900 rendered a very valuable service to the people of Canada, and I feel that it will be a long time before any government will attempt to disturb the representation of the people in parliament during the ten years intervening between our decennial census, and that in future, having a precedent set by the action of this Senate in 1899 and 1900, no government will be found to deal with the representation of the people in the House of Commons except at the time and in the manner prescribed by the British North America Act. There was just another Bill, in addition to those mentioned, which was rejected in one year but re-enacted the next year, and that referred to the provincial courts in the province of Quebec. The Senate, in the year 1900, dealt with this measure just as the Senate in 1877, dealt with the provincial courts of Nova Scotia. The Bill was held over, and next year, when the province sustained the action of the government, and the government re-introduced the measure, it was passed in this House and there was no friction about it. We now come to the last period, from 1902 to 1906, and so far we have not a record of any difference whatever arising. Every government measure that has been sent to this House from the House of Commons has been accepted and passed. Up to this time, there has been very slight indication of independence among the supporters of the government in this House with regard to government measures. Of course you will tell me that this is only five years, but many of us think that there were instances in that period in which the supporters of the government might have found occasion to have asserted their independence.

The general course of business in this House warrants the statement that British parliamentary institutions have been carried out in Canada during that period in a very harmonious and successful manner. There have been no crises, no Supply Bill has been defeated, and, as I have said before, no Bill of any kind has been defeated a second time by the Senate excepting the Redistribution Bill. These facts go to show that British parliamentary institutions have been carried out with a great deal of success, and in a very harmonious manner in Canada. Indeed, if there is any fault at all to be found with the record of the Senate in all the different periods I have referred to, it is that the Senate has been too acquiescent. I have no hesitation, in looking back over the events which occurred between 1878 and 1896—although I was in the Senate a part of that time myself—in saying that the Senate would have done itself justice if more criticism and independence had been evinced during that time. The same observations may be made with regard to the period now passing, in which there has been very little assertion of independence on the part of government supporters in this House. I think the verdict of history will be that the Senate has been on the whole rather too acquiescent in assenting to measures passed by the House of Commons, and I would utter a warning to hon. gentlemen sitting opposite me and to hon. gentlemen around me as well, and that is this: during the long period that the Conservative party were in power the Liberal press and Liberal public men stirred up a very strong feeling of opposition to the Senate, mainly on account of its acquiescence in the measures of the government of the day and of its very strong party complexion. So strongly were these arguments used, that I think I am safe in saying that a very large majority of the Liberal party were almost educated up to the point of voting for the abolition of the Senate altogether, and it would be unreasonable to assume that the lesson which was then inculcated so strenuously and I believe so effectively by the Liberal leaders and the Liberal press has been altogether unlearned. I would remind hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House that human nature is much the same among Conservatives as among Liberals, and that when this Senate comes to be almost altogether Liberal, which it will surely be as the years go by if the administration is unchanged, you will likely find the Conservative press attacking the Senate and the Conservative leaders joining in that denunciation, and that there will be a considerable element of the Conservative party trained to become opponents of the very existence of the Senate. Taking the strong feeling created by the Liberals while they were in opposition, much of which must still remain, and the hostility which will certainly be engendered in the Conservative ranks if the Senate becomes too acquiescent and onesided, it will be found, I fear, that the Senate may lose the confidence of the people of Canada, and I wish to utter this warning. My hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, pointed out, and I think very properly, that patents from the Crown should be respected and when making any change in the constitution of the Senate respect must be had for the life tenure so created. I agree with the principle, but we must not lay that flattering unction too strongly to our souls and conclude that we may do just as we like and party men may follow their bent to the very fullest extent with impunity. There may be so strong a feeling created in the country that even patents from the Crown will have to go, and popular feeling may rise to such a height that it will demand to be heard. It is the old story of the barren fig tree. It is possible that the policy of the Senate might become so strongly opposed to the popular will that all barriers would be swept away. The true way for the Senate to protect itself is to assert its usefulness on all occasions and show a considerable spirit of independence with regard to the measures that may come before it.

Comparisons which, to my mind, are very unfair, are often made between the Senate and the House of Commons. Because the House of Commons attracts the public eye, and the eye of the press to such a large extent as compared with this honourable House, the people are inclined to believe that the Senate is not fairly and faithfully fulfilling its functions. There are many reasons why the House of Commons should loom larger in the public eye than the Senate does. The House of Commons has the control of supply. We know that that is a very important matter in the estimation of a very large proportion of the people, and the control of supply by the House of Commons must always give that body an importance in the estimation of the people and of the press that the upper House, which does not have any practical control of supply, cannot posess. This is a wise limitation, a constitutional limitation. It is perfectly right, and the people ought to recognize it. There is another point even more important. Under our British constitutional system, you cannot have two Houses to which a government must be responsible. That would be nonsense. If the government of the day were required to possess the confidence of two Houses of parliament, a conflict might be precipitated at any time, because you might have two Houses of different political complexions. It is to the more popular branch of parliament that the cabinet must be responsible; and the very fact that this House cannot make or unmake an administration is calculated to place it in a lower position in the eyes of the people than if it was essential under our constitution that the government must possess the confidence of this Chamber. Then there is another circumstance which makes the debates of this House less attractive and less noticeable than the debates of the Commons. We are not obliged to talk for the benefit of the electors. I think that is a great advantage. It makes our deliberations more reasonable, and enables them generally to take a higher tone. It is to the advantage of this House that we have not to talk to the electors. The Commons, having the constituencies in their eye all the time, are obliged to talk to them, and that talk finds its way into the press and gives the House of Commons greater importance in the public eye than it would otherwise possess. Some of the gentlemen in the House of Commons seem to be very fond of speaking sneeringly of the Senate because we have short sittings, because we have somewhat long adjournements, and because we do not make quite as much noise as the House of Commons does. I would remind these gentlemen, and would do so without any idea of being disrespectful, of the famous simile of Edmund Burke—that though half a dozen grasshoppers under a fern may render the earth vocal by their importunate clink while a herd of cattle resting under the British oak chew their cuds and are silent, you must not conclude that the grasshoppers are the only occupants of the field—and I would just add another word. We know the power of the press, and are cautious about saying anything that would offend the press. We know its influence, and we also know that we have in Canada a very able and industrious press; but I would make this observation, that the press does not evince as much diligence with regard to following the work of this Senate as it might, I think, very properly do. If the press as a rule—there are exceptions, of course—were to folow the work of this Senate with a little more diligence, they would find that it is generally very well done indeed. With regard to the comparatively short sittings, and the less protracted debates which take place in this House, I would remind hon. gentlemen that in the Australian Senate provision is made for only three sittings in each week. The House of Lords in England sits less frequently than the House of Commons, and the debates of the House of Lords, as hon. gentlemen know, who have studied the English parliamentary Hansard, are generally very short and very uninteresting compared with the debates of the House of Commons. It is also true, though to a very much less extent, that the debates of the Senate of the United States are not by any means as animated or as protracted as are those of the House of Representatives, although the former are better conducted, and are of a higher tone and are generally regarded as better discussions of the public questions arising in that country than those which take place in the latter.

But unfair as the comparisons are, made between this House and the House of Commons of Canada, there are still more unfair comparisons made with reference to the Senate of the United States. In comparing the Senate of the United States with the Senate of Canada, you have very important considerations to keep in view. In the first place the Senate of the United States has powers with reference to supply that we have not. It has the same right to initiate supply that the House of Representatives has. The only difference is, it cannot originate a public burden or tax, but it can vote supply equally with the House of Representatives, and that, as I have said, in the previous comparison with the House of Commons of Canada, is one reason why the Senate of the United States is regarded as an influential body. But in another respect, and it is still more important, the Senate of the United States has a veto on all appointments made by the executive. Indeed we know that that has been pushed so far that the executive in making appointments of importance is forced to consult the senate almost in every case in advance. The senate has obtained power with reference to appointments in the United States that, I am sure, the House and the country will agree with me, it is not desirable the Senate of Canada should possess. You can easily understand that, in the United States, the senate having this power with regard to patronage, which is not in the House of Representatives, becomes greater in the eyes of office seekers, and they and their friends form no small part of the population. The Senate acquires an influence and importance in the United States on account of their control of patronage which a house like the Senate of Canada, which is purely legislative, cannot obtain. I contend that that is a proper restriction and that on no account whatever should we wish that the Senate of Canada should have any power with regard to patronage.

There is another function of the Senate of the United States which gives that body a great deal of importance, and that is its control of the foreign relations of the country. We have not up to the present time, and possibly may never have, certainly not for a long time to come, foreign relations of any consequence to deal with, and a comparison cannot be very well instituted between our Upper Houses on that account; but it is undeniable that the Senate of the United States commands a great deal of influence in the United States, nay, in the eyes of the world, on account of its power with regard to the making of treaties with foreign countries, and I have no hesitation in saying that that very power has proved all through the history of the United States to be one of the main causes why American diplomacy has not stood as high as it should stand, or as the diplomacy of other nations stands. It is a fact that the government of the day is weak in the matter of making treaties, because the Senate with closed doors may undo the work of the head of the nation, and that has made American diplomacy something that is not so highly respected as it ought to be in the eyes of the world. On all these accounts, the Senate of the United States is looked upon as a very important body, but it is not desirable that our Senate should be given the power that the United States Senate has, either in the matter of supply, or patronage, or, if we had treaties to make, in the matter of treaties. The British system is that the treaties shall be made by the government of the day having the confidence of parliament, and they carry the treaties through parliament on the strength of their influence with parliament. It is cabinet responsibility which is unknown in the system of the United States, and that is one of the reasons why the United States Senate looms so high as it does on account of the power which it has in all these matters. I may add, that all these powers are incompatible with British institutions. Writers in the press and others who have been criticizing the Senate on the ground that it is not so active as the Senate of the United States, lose sight of the fact that the Senate of the republic is active in directions which we could not in accordance with British institutions allow an upper chamber to be active.

Comparisons are often made with regard to the personnel of the Senate of the United States and that of other countries. The Senate of the United States is some times held up as being a body of extraordinary character, and there can be no doubt that in many respects it consists of able men, and that in the past the ablest men in the United States have held seats in the Senate, and I have no doubt that that is so to some extent at the present time. But there is a great deal of glamour about it. My hon. friend, the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce coupled the Senate of the United States with the Senate of ancient Rome. Now, that is something that vainglorious Americans are very apt to do. They quote the famous remarks of the ambassadors of King Pyrrhus when they called the Roman Senate an assembly of kings, and they are proud of pointing their European friends to their Senate as an assembly of kings. I can give you very good authority for saying that the Senate of the United States is entitled to no such rank. I have a work in my hand entitled 'Bryce on the American Commonwealth,' and I will read an extract or two from his estimate of the Senate of the United States. I may add, as hon. gentlemen who are acquainted with this book know, that it is one of the ablest and best contributions that has ever been made to the discussion of the American constitution. He says :

> Whether the senators of to-day are inferior in ability and integrity to those of fifty, thirty, twenty years ago, is not easy to determine. But it must be admitted, however, regretfully, that they are less independent, less respected by the people, less influential with the people, than were their predecessors ; and their wealth which has made them fear the reproach of wanting popular sympathies, may count for something in this decline.

He further says :

It is a company of shrewd and vigorous men who have fought their way to the front by the ordinary methods of American politics, and on many of whom the battle has left its stains. There are abundant opportunities for intrigue in the Senate, because its most important business is done in the secrecy of committee rooms or of executive session ; and many senators are intriguers. There are opportunities for misusing senatorial powers. Scandals have sometimes arisen from the practice of employing as counsel before the Supreme Court senators whose influence has contributed to the appointment or confirmation of the judges.

I think we know a little about this same trouble in Canada. We need not throw stones at our neighbours in regard to what Mr. Bryce points out in the United States, and if in Canada counsel appears before judges in whose appointment they have a hand; it is a scandal here as well as in the United States. He further says :

There are opportunities for corruption and blackmailing, of which unscrupulous men are well known to take advantage.

There are other observations that are much more complimentary in Mr. Bryce's book. He admits the ability of the Senate in the past, and to some extent its ability in the present, but he has no hesitation in determining that it is not for its work in regard to treaty making or foreign relations; it is not in regard to its executive work, or in the forming or looking after estimates ; it is not even in its protecton of the sectional interests of the different states, but it is in its legislative work that the Senate of the United States has done the country real and substantial benefit. In all other respects its influence has, in his opinion, been rather more detrimental than otherwise. So that the idea of a Canadian Senate as constituted here meets with the approval of so eminent a writer as Mr. Bryce. It is the current comment in the United States that the Senate is composed of two classes of men; one class are senators because they are rich and the other class are rich because they are senators. It is not very complimentary to the Senate of the United States. Sometimes we hear some such remarks made of the Senate of Canada, but there are many of another class in this Senate who are neither rich for the one or the other of these reasons, or are not rich at all, but it is unfortunately the case, with very rare exceptions, that only rich men are able to procure seats in the United States Senate, be their qualifications what they may. That is an unfortunate circumstance and must tend to lower the Senate of that country in the eyes of right thinking men. With regard to this Chamber I will take the liberty, if hon. gentlemen will be patient with me, of placing before the House two estimates, made at different times by two very eminent gentlemen, as to the character of this Senate. The first that I will read is a comment made in 1886 in this House by Sir Oliver Mowat when he entered this House in that year. He said:

I rejoice to have in mind the materials of of which this House is composed. When I consider what the materials we have here are, how this House is composed, some very promising thoughts come into my mind. A large number of the members of this House, even before they came here have had a very important training in matters of government and legislation, and all of them have had an important training in the affairs of the world generally, whether they have in matters of government and legislation or not ; all of you were men of mark ; all of you had influence in your respective localities, and many of you beyond your localities ; and you were all men of activity and energy and force of character ; you were all able to work your way up to the places which you hold now in the government of the country. And all classes are represented here ; all nationalities, all the leading Christian denominations, and all occupations are represented here. I have spoken of the training which a large number of you had, even before coming here, and you have had more training since in matters of government and legislation. You have several ex-judges here, and we all know the value that is placed upon the assistance of judges in the legislation of a country. You have three, perhaps you have more than three, who have been lieutenant governors of provinces, the highest gift, I suppose, which is in the hands of the Dominion government. Then you have at least one hon. gentleman who has been Premier of Canada and has all the experience and all the ability implied in one who reaches that high position. You have several ex-premiers of provinces here. You have other men who, though they had not reached the position of Dominion Premier, have been ministers of the Crown for the Dominion. You have ministers here who were ministers in provincial affairs, and probably every one here has given much attention to political subjects and is familiar with them —subjects of government and legislation.

This was the very high compliment that this House received from the lips of Sir Oliver Mowat when he rose for the first time to address the Senate in 1896. Ten years have passed, and the personnel of the Senate has been largely changed. Another very eminent gentlemen speaking in another place recently, has placed on record his testimony with regard to this House. I am now reading from remarks made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He said :

I hold that if the Senate has not given all the satisfaction we might have expected from it, it is not because the Senate has done anything wrong ; on the contrary, I believe the Canadian Senate has done very well and that we might well be proud of it. If any criticism is given it is not for what they have done, they have done some things which I am far from approving, but on the whole they have done very well; that criticism has come because it seems that the Senate does not come up to the high expectation of what was thought would be the outcome of the constitution at the time of confederation.

I quote these two gentlemen, Sir Oliver Mowat and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, because they are two leading men in one of our political parties that has been somewhat severe, at all events very free, in its criticism of the Senate. I quote these two opinions and place them on record as having special value coming from these two gentlemen.

Before I leave that point I wish to utter another word of warning to hon. gentlemen in this House, and that is as to the duty that we owe to this House and the country to uphold its dignity. Incidents have occured within the last two or three years that to the minds of many of the older senators are not at all consonant with the dignity of this House. It is noticeable that innovations have been introduced that would not have been permitted by the fathers of the Senate. I remember, when I came to the Senate in 1894 and had the task assigned me of moving the address in answer to the speech from the Throne, a gentleman whom many members in this House knew and esteemed for his dignity and ability—I speak of the late Senator Dickey—very kindly put his seat at my disposal. I was occupying a back seat, and he gave me his in order that the House might hear me to better advantage. He warned me 'You must not expect any sympathy in this House ; as a rule we do not applaud. The House should partake of a judicial character, and such a thing as applause is not permitted in the Senate.' I remember remarking that it would be very cold, and he said 'If you allow applause, the next thing you would have to admit is hisses and groans. The only way to maintain our dignity is to listen respectfully to anything of value a man may have to put before the House but not to applaud, nor to manifest disapproval, unless a speaker is violating the rules of the House.' For many years I never heard applause, but that decorum has passed away. We find of late a tendency to introduce the practices of the House of Commons in that and other respects. I want to utter these words of warning, and I think we would act wisely if we fell back on the practice of the fathers of the Senate and discourage any manifestations of applause or disapproval.

The real defect of this honourable House lies in the difficulty that all the appointments come from the government of the day. That would not work any practical difficulty if administrations were changed frequently as they were before confederation, or as they often have been in the provinces; but the habit of long administrations seems to be settled in Canada, at least it has been during the last 28 years, and the difficulty arises that the power of appointment vested in the government of the day when exercised by one government for a long period of time, will pack the Senate down to the door with the supporters of one political party. It is impossible that the Senate can have the confidence of the people to the extent it otherwise would have while that condition obtains. The Senate ought to be replenished regularly from time to time from the ranks of both political parties, and other, blood not party blood, might with advantage be introduced also. But the Senate cannot hold the confidence of the people unless it is filled from time to time regularly by men holding different political opinions, because when it becomes absolutely one-sided it will lose even the respect of the party to which it is allied, and it is natural that the other party would become disgusted and would lose all hope or faith in the Senate. Before leaving that point I shall deal with a subject introduced by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He pointed out a very desirable way of filling vacancies in the Senate, and he instanced a class of men who should be appointed, such men as cabinet ministers, retired judges, and lieutenant governors. He mentioned these three as classes from which men could be drawn to fill vacancies in the Senate to the great advantage of the country on account of their standing and ability. I agree with my hon. friend that that would be a very desirable class to draw from. In the past a few such men have been drawn to the Senate and it would be very satisfactory if some arrangements could be made, and I think it would be possible, under the proposal which I shall make before taking my seat—that such a thing might be done. But there is nothing to prevent my right hon. friend carrying out at least some of his good intentions even now. I do not think there is anything in the way, and I would instance one gentleman who, I think, should long since have been called to the Senate owing to the circumstances under which he retired in 1896, and who meets the description of my right hon. friend, not only in one particular, but in every particular. I refer to the hon. Mr. Angers, who retired from the Senate in 1896 to engage in an electoral contest. We remember the action of the Governor General, who declined, at the time, to permit Sir Charles Tupper to re-nominate Mr. Angers and another gentleman. The reason was one which had to be admitted to be strong. The Conservatives were already very strong in the Senate, the new government would require to be represented in the Senate by men in sympathy with them, and the objection was advanced that although Mr. Angers had a reasonable claim to be returned to the Senate on account of his eminent public services and standing in the province of Quebec and the whole of Canada, yet it was inconvenient and undesirable at that time that any of the vacancies in the Senate should be filled by gentlemen in opposition to the incoming administration, seeing that the Liberal party was so weak in the Senate. That was a reasonable answer and everybody had to be content with it ; but all these circumstances have long since passed away, and my right hon. friend and the leader of the House have a strong support here and one seat would not be essential to them. I would point out that Mr. Angers, who was not only a cabinet minister in Canada, but also a lieutenant governor and a retired judge as well, has eminent claims to be appointed to the Senate, and my hon. friend should gird himself to try and do something in the line he has indicated before any change is made in the constitution of the Senate, if any is coming. I hope my hon. friend will not continue in the position of a sign post, pointing a road which he has never travelled.

There are just two suggestions that appear to my mind to be necessary for the improvement or reform of the Senate. One of them is a better apportionment of the work between the two Houses, and the other is a theme which has been discussed at great length and seems to be the favourite theme of my right hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that is, proportionate representation in this Chamber of the two great political parties of the country. These two propositions constitute, in my mind, a complete scheme of Senate reform. My right hon. friend suggested that in order to provide a better apportionment of work between the two Houses, all or nearly all private Bills should originate here. That might be all right, but from the experience I have had here it would make no appreciable difference as to the work of this House. I am stating now what is a matter of public knowledge, that all private Bills receive just as careful, and as lengthened consideration in the Senate committees and in this House as they would receive if they all came to us in the first instance. It is possible that if they were threshed out here in the first place, the effect would be to lessen the work of the House of Commons, but I am not inclined to think that it would do so to any great extent. A better apportionment of the work of the two Houses could be obtained in another way, far more effectual than in initiating all private Bills here, and that is by giving the Senate better representation in the cabinet. I am not at all finding fault with the gentlemen who represent the cabinet in this House in point of ability, standing, and character, and all that goes to constitute public men. I think if I had the choice as to whom the cabinet would send here I would not make a choice as against these two hon. gentlemen ; but what I mean is that the departments which are represented here, some of them at least should be departments that had important functions calling for legislation. If some of the more important departments were represented here, that is departments that carry with them of necessity legislation from year to year and that have transactions which would call for very close and earnest criticism on the part of parliament, I submit that this House would be supplied with a great deal of work that it does not get at the present time. Not only in regard to the measures which it would be necessary for the ministers in charge of the departments to submit to the House, but in the opportunities it would give this House, nay more, the duty it would impose on the members of the Senate to criticise these departments, we would have a good deal of important work placed on our shoulders. Let me illustrate this: Some years ago, feeling that we ought to take up some work that would otherwise be done in the House of Commons, I undertook to investigate, by many inquiries which I placed on the order paper, the Department of Railways. It led to my ultimately making a motion on the subject in which I criticised the Department of Railways very fully in this House in consequence of the information I had received from these returns. I was met by the hon. gentleman who led the government in the Senate, the late Mr. Mills, with this view: It is hardly fair to the Minister of Railways that his department should be assailed in the Senate; it would be far preferable if my hon. friend (speaking of myself) would get some one in the House of Commons to bring up these matters there, where Mr. Blair is present and can defend himself. I was actually accused of cowardice because I brought these matters up in the absence of the minister. I do not agree with that view; the government is a unit, and the members of the government here should be prepared to defend their colleagues. The deputy minister could come here to assist them. The documents would be at their disposal, and I do not think the answer was a fair one. Nevertheless it was sufficient to place me at a disadvantage when I undertook to criticise the department in this House, and I apprehend it would apply to other directions in which we might take up work which we could otherwise properly do.

Although this House is precluded by precedent from forming a committee to handle the public accounts as a whole, we could appoint committees to investigate certain departments. The only thing that prevents it being done in this House is that the minister whose department calls for explanation and criticism is very seldom in this House, and consequently the examination would not be as fair and above board as it would be if the minister were here to meet those who criticise or attack him. From my experience in the Senate, which now goes over a dozen years, I have no hesitation in saying that this House furnishes an excellent sphere for the activity of an industrious man. I see around me many in this House who are industrious and give a great deal of attention to public business. They do not get much credit for it in the press. The press does not know of the persistent, steady, work that is being done, because it does not give rise to explosions on the floor of this House such as occur in the House of Commons, but the Senate furnishes an excellent sphere for the activity of industrious men. I say this too, hon. gentlemen, that if we want to keep our hold on the people of this country we must be industrious. We must not come here and sit waiting for adjournments or something like that and merely drawing our indemnity. We must remember this, we are going to be judged in the future more severely, and properly so, than in the past. The increase of the indemnity is making this House cost the country more than it did, and the people will expect the Senate as well as the House of Commons to give some fair return for what it is costing the people of Canada. On this account, and on other accounts, I would enjoin hon. gentlemen to devote themselves to their work. I do not accuse them of neglecting it, but we could all do more and fulfil our functions in such a way as to win the respect of the country and we could command fair and reasonable attention from the press. Notwithstanding many of the good and sound views enunciated by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, there is one other view of his with which I cannot agree, and that is on the question of a limited tenure as against life tenure, at present in operation in this House. With regard to that, allow me to read the words of Hon. George Brown in the Confederation Debates, and I entirely subscribe to the opinions therein expressed. He says:

> I thought it would be well to provide for a more frequent change in the composition of the upper House, and lessen the danger of the Chamber being largely composed of gentlemen whose advanced years might forbid the punctual and vigorous discharge of their public duties. Still the objection made to this was very strong. It was said: Suppose you appoint them for nine years, what will be the effect? For the last three or four years of their term they would be anticipating its expiry, and anxiously looking to the administration of the day for reappointment; and the consequence would be that a third of the members would be under the influence of the executive.

I would go a little further and say that as they received their appointments from the executive, they would at the outset be animated by a feeling of gratitude to the government that appointed them, and, as the Hon. George Brown very properly put it, they would be looking towards the end of the term to the party that would have the power of reappointment. The objection that men grow old and that you have to take the closing years of a man's life as well as his more vigorous time, and that men are less valuable towards the close of life, has no doubt force. I do not want to have myself classed among the old men yet, and, therefore, I am speaking for others when I say that it is in the older men of this Senate that its great strength lies, and although they may not take so much part in debates, yet wisdom and moderation grow with years. I referred, when addressing the House two weeks ago, to what might have been a crisis in the affairs of the House with regard to the Drummond County Railway Bill had it not been for the influence of the older men. I have not observed any serious disadvantage arising to the country from the fact that we have in our ranks a few men that have become so far advanced in years that they are not able to take that vigorous part in the proceedings of this House that they did when they were younger men. We have had them when they were comparatively young and when some of them were inexperienced. We have had them in the fulness of their powers, and they have rendered the best service they could, and we have had them in their declining years, with the moderation and mellowness which come with advanced life, and I for one would be sorry for any change by which we would lose them before the end of their careers. I think it is an advantage rather than otherwise, and that no harm to the public interest has ever arisen in that respect.

My hon. friend made another suggestion on this same subject with which I would not agree, regarding an age limit for entrance. He did not say how much higher he would put it, but simply that he would raise it. Although I am fond of having the old men here, I believe so strongly in long tenure of office that I would like to see the members coming into this House much younger than they usually do. If they did they would be better public men when they grew old, because they would acquire experience here at a time of life when men are more ready to learn. No harm has arisen from having the age of 30 years fixed as it is at present. Over three hundred summonses have been made to the Senate since 1867, including the first batch of men selected, and only fifteen have been under forty. I am not sure, but I think there was only one man, the hon. member for Richmond, who reached this House under thirty-five years of age.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—There have been several.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There are not many. I think I am safe in saying that. I am sure no harm has arisen. If any fault is to be found at all it is that members are called to the Senate too late in life. I think it would be better in the public interests if they were called at an earlier age. I would almost go so far as to suggest that a limit be fixed at the other end, that some restriction should be placed upon allowing men to be appointed at a very advanced age, say sixty years. Still we have instances of men coming into this House late in life who proved themselves valuable members. They had acquired experience elsewhere; but in cases where there has not been previous experience, I think members should not be called to this House at a very advanced stage of life. I was pleased to find that my right hon. friend, like the Prime Minister in speaking elsewhere, is not favourable to electing members by the direct vote of the people; and I agree with him in that respect. I think we have too many elections, and that an elective House, although in some respects it might be preferable, would carry with it great disadvantages. We had a little experience in Prince Edward Island of an elective Upper House chosen on a franchise of freeholders instead of manhood suffrage as in the case of the Lower House; but the council coming thus directly from the people claimed an equal voice with the assembly and there was continual clashing and difficulty. They claimed, although not successfully, that the government of the day must possess the confidence of the council as well as the confidence of the Lower House. It led to constant difficulty over supply, and I am therefore, quite strongly of the opinion that we should not have a Senate elected by direct election. In this respect I would mention—though it is scarcely necessary, for I am sure that hon. gentlemen are conversant with the fact, that both the Hon. George Brown and Sir John Macdonald, at the time of confederation, agreed ultimately on the nominative principle in preference to direct election. Mr. Brown was, of the two, the stronger opponent of the elective principle, but Sir John Macdonald agreed with him that that principle as applied to the legislative council of the old province of Canada, had not been entirely satisfactory.

I think, if I understood my hon. friend aright, that he would have the choice of two-thirds of the senators made by the provincial legislatures. I would not agree to that, I think the choice would not be well made if it were made by the provincial legislatures. It would introduce, as it has done in the United States—intrigue and possibly corruption in the provincial legislature. That principle has worked badly in the United States, and there are other reasons which I will urge as I proceed. Perhaps the strongest of these is that it would not lead to proportionate representation, which my hon. friend seemed to have so much at heart. Proportionate representation between the two political parties. Take Nova Scotia for example. At the last election the Conservatives of that province polled 45 per cent of the popular vote without having one single seat in the House of Commons, and they have only two seats in the provincial legislature out of a House of 38. I think that is the number; if I am wrong my hon. friend from Halifax will correct me. That is one-nineteenth only. If the provincial legislature of Nova Scotia within the last four years—and I might go very much further back—had had the choice of senators, the Conservative party would be simply obliterated in this House as they are in the House of Commons. I point to the case of Quebec, which offers almost as strong an illustration. In Quebec the Conservative vote is 44 per cent of the whole, yet I think there is only half a dozen Conservatives out of 78 in the legislature at Quebec. If the legislature at Quebec were to make the choice of senators, the 114,000 Conservative voters in the province would not be able to secure any voice in this Senate, no matter what might be the complexion of the federal government, that is as regards the two-thirds to be chosen in this way. I have a table in my hand prepared by Mr. Hamilton, the Ottawa correspondent of the Toronto 'News'—who has written some very clever articles on the question of Senate reform, although I do not agree with them throughout—letters which are very able and which contained some very valuable suggestions. He has compiled a table showing what, on a nine years term, would have been the complexion of this Senate every three years since confederation, with the nominations made by the provinces. In 1867 they would start with 36 Liberals to 36 Conservatives. Then the progression would be as follows:

In	1870	there would be	45	Cons.,	29 Libs.
In	1873	there would be	46	Cons.,	31 Libs.
In	1876	there would be	48	Cons.,	29 Libs.
In	1879	there would be	35	Cons.,	42 Libs.
In	1882	there would be	40	Cons.,	38 Libs.
In	1885	there would be	38	Cons.,	42 Libs.
In	1888	there would be	31	Cons.,	49 Libs.
In	1891	there would be	16	Cons.,	64 Libs.
In	1894	there would be	14	Cons.,	66 Libs.
In	1897	there would be	13	Cons.,	68 Libs.
In	1900	there would be	11	Cons.,	70 Libs.
In	1903	there would be	5	Cons.,	76 Libs.

That would be the working out of the principle of a nine-year tenure, the members going out in rotation every three years, with the strength of the parties in the provincial legislatures as they have stood since confederation. That would be the result in 1903, and that is where the calculation ends. It is not mine. It is made, as I said, by Mr. Hamilton. No doubt it is accurate and in 1903 under that system there would be five Conservatives in this House and seventy-six Liberals. I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that this nine year tenure and choice from the provincial legislatures would not have worked very well in the past, and there is very strong reason for believing that it would not be found to work very well in the years that are to come. There is another objection to having the senators chosen by the provincial legislatures and it is this: That they would be very much inclined to chose men of provincial calibre; in fact, they would be almost invariably inclined to choose men from amongst themselves. It would be a contest amongst themselves and the result would be that the representation in this Chamber would not be composed of men of as large a calibre and experience as it has been under the nominative system. Now, I come to deal with the plan propounded by my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have read his speech many times, and I think I grasp it fairly well. It is that the House should be ultimately reduced to 72 members in place of 87; that the different sections should be represented by 12 for each section: Maritime provinces 12; Quebec, 12; Ontario, 12; and the west, 12; and that the 24 other men should be selected by nomination, as heretofore, by the Federal government, having regard to sectional representation. That is what I understand to be my hon. friend's plan, 24 to be nominated by the Crown and 48 to be selected by the provincial legislatures either on the system of cumulative voting or one man one vote, in order to bring about a proportionate representation of the two political parties, but which, as I have pointed out, would only be porportionate to the strength of the parties in the legislatures and which might not bear any proportion to the strength of the parties as shown by the electorate at the preceding general election. He would also have a twelve year tenure. My hon. friend indicated that the change would not be expected to come into effect very soon. It was an important change, and, under British practice, we must expect that any change of this kind would have to be thoroughly considered and time would be taken for its consideration. Although my hon. friend did not fix any time for such a change it would be reasonable to assume that it would not take effect until the close of this parliament. I notice that the right hon. gentleman who leads the government in the Commons has outlined a plan somewhat similar to that of my hon. friend, and I notice also that the Finance Minister in the Budget speech has given an assurance that this plank in the Liberal platform with regard to Senate reform was to be acted on at no distant date. Therefore, I conclude we are going to have legislation on the subject. and whatever the change may be, it will not come into effect until the close of the present parliament. I was greatly interested when I heard my hon. friend denounce what he called the gerrymander of Ontario in 1882. I admit that the hon. gentleman almost excited sympathy in my breast as he described the deplorable consequences that resulted to the Liberal party from the very unfair distribution which he said was made in 1882, but in passing let me remind my hon. friend that the evidence which he submitted did not prove that the unequal representation of the Conservatives and the Liberals at that time from Ontario was the result of any gerrymander whatever. My hon. friend said there was a gerrymander, and he claimed that the Liberals were able to return fewer men in proportion to their strength to the House of Commons after that distribution, or gerrymander as he called it, took place than the Conservatives were, and he claimed that that proved a gerrymander. It proved nothing of the kind, because under the present state of things in Nova Scotia, the Liberals have eighteen members for 56,000 votes and the 46,000 Conservatives have no representation at all. Yet my hon. friend told us there was no gerrymander in Nova Scotia. Therefore, if the little disturbances or inequalities which have been found to exist in Ontario after the redistribution of 1882 was the result of the gerrymander, then there must have been some gerrymander in Nova Scotia. But there was none. The Liberal victory in Nova Scotia arose from other causes and other circumstances entirely different from any distribution of the seats, and I have little doubt, notwithstanding the way my hon. friend dealt with the subject, that the same thing might have occurred in Ontario in 1882 had there been no redistribution at that time. But I desire to say that I fear my hon. friend did not give this subject that close examination that he is generally credited with giving to public questions before he makes his utterances with regard to them. Owing to his detestation of a gerrymander I cannot believe my hon. friend would have proposed this scheme to the House or country if he understood it, because I have no hesitation in saying that his scheme would work out the most perfect gerrymander that was ever inaugurated in any country. Now let me submit two or three reasons, and later on I am going to submit actuarial calculations on this subject, which cannot be very far wrong. The present Liberal majority in this House is 21; we cannot be absolutely sure of every man, but generally it is recognized that there are 33 Conservatives and 50 Liberals, with four seats unfilled, which are pretty sure to fall into the hands of the Liberals. The average age of the Conservative group in this House is nine years and a half greater than the average age of the Liberal group. The Conservative group in this House has no chance of being replenished from year to year by the good offices of their friends in the government until the next election, when we firmly believe there will be a change, but in the meantime there is no prospect whatever of the Conservative group being increased in number in that way and being nine and a half years older per man than the Liberal group there will within that period be a larger proportion of deaths amongst them. That is certain tables used by experienced actuaries settle that fact beyond any doubt or peradventure. Three years hence, or at the beginning of 1909, in the natural working out of mortality results, the Liberal majority will be 35. Hon. gentlemen will say these are only guesses. These are only calculations. Let me show something which will go to prove how certain these things are. The Montreal 'Herald' six years ago dealt with the Senate as it then stood on actuarial lines. No doubt the 'Herald' had the service of an actuary and a competent man. He had the names of all the senators at that time. Their ages are placed before their names in a list which I have before me, and there were 53 Conservative senators and 28 Liberals, and this actuary worked the matter out for the Montreal 'Herald' and came to the conclusion that at the end of five years 17·56 Conservative senators would die, and that corresponding new appointments added to the 28 Liberals in the House would give the Liberals a large majority in the Senate. Five years and eight months have elapsed and nineteen Conservative senators have died—two more than was stated, but the eight months additional time explains that. In the case of an individual we know that these tables are of no value, but when you take men in groups in sufficient numbers and apply the experience tables of Great Britain and the United States, you can come to a result with almost absolute certainty, and this calculation is proved to be absolutely right. I have some calculations made by a competent actuary, and this is the result: That at the end of this term of parliament, taking into consideration the age of the Conservative group now as compared with the Liberal group, the Liberal majority will then be 35. Then there would come a period of four years under the hon. gentleman's scheme in which there would be no filling of vacancies at all. The House had to be reduced from 87 to 72, and that would be no doubt effected, as I think my hon. friend indicated, by the non-filling of vacancies. It would take about four years more before the deaths in the House would bring the Senate down to 72 member. At the end of the year 1913 by the non-filling of vacancies the House would drop down to 72 and you would have nineteen Conservatives and fifty-three Liberals in a House of seventy-two. Then the new plan outlined by my hon. friend would come into effect. One-third of the seats would be filled as vacancies occur by the government in power at Ottawa, and it is needless to say they would be filled by the party in power with their own friends. As vacancies would occur in the other two-thirds they would be filled from the provinces, and, for the purpose of this calculation, we assume that one-half of these seats would go to each party. Assuming the Conservative party came into power, as it is almost certain that it will at the next election—my hon. friend from Toronto laughs very heartily, but it is nothing to the laugh he set up in this House when I told him in 1903 that the Ross government was going to fall and that the handwriting was then on the wall. However, we are not discussing that now. Assuming that the Conservative party were to come into power at the end of this parliament and were to contiue in power until 1921, the Conservatives would have 29 members in the Senate and the Liberals 43, and at twenty years from this date, or in 1926, the parties would become about equal in the Senate, assuming the Conservative party to be in power all the time and having the filling of the nominative vacancies. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce laughs very heartily. I have no doubt if he had considered this matter before he launched his plan he would not have made the suggestion. The plan proposed by my hon. friend would work out one of the worst gerrymanders that was ever heard of. The actuary to whom I refer, who knows my hon. friend very well, said to me: 'I think it is due to Sir Richard that you should say that he hadn't the slightest idea that his plan would work out in the way it does.'

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Or that the hon. gentleman or his actuary had the slightest knowledge of what they were talking about.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend thinks he can afford to be very supercilious. I would not say that he can afford to be, but he tries to be, and when he tells me in a petulant manner that I do not know what I am talking about he only shows every hon. gentleman in this House that he is 'touched on the raw,' and that he feels the effect of what I am saying and the criticism I am offering. My statement will go to the country and it will be criticised and tested by others as well as by the hon. gentleman himself. The following is the table in detail as worked out by the actuarial expert :

Conservatives in power.			Liberals in power.
—	Con.	Lib.	—	Con.	Lib.
1909	26	61	1909	26	61
1910	24	58	1910	24	58
1911	22	56	1911	22	56
1912	20	54	1912	20	54
1913	19	53	1913	19	53
1914	20	52	1914	18	54
1915	21	51	1915	17	55
1916	22	50	1916	17	55
1917	23	49	1917	16	56
1918	24	48	1918	16	56
1919	26	46	1919	15	57
1920	27	45	1920	15	57
1921	29	43	1921	15	57

I may not be altogether clear as to what the hon. gentleman really proposed to do. I admit that he was not very clear. I thought my hon. friend was purposely obsecure in order that he might escape criticism if he found that he had taken a very untenable position. I notice he was not as plain as I would like him to be, but I think I have outlined his proposition as it is understood by the press. I followed the different newspapers of Canada and they have interpreted his proposition just as I have interpreted it, and if the calculations that I have submitted to the House are wrong—and they are not mine, they are actuarial calculations submitted and worked out with the greatest care—if the calculations are wrong, it will be easily to show it.

In concluding I will submit a counter proposition to that submitted by my hon. friend, and in doing so I speak for myself only. I am entirely in accord with his principle of proportionate representation of the two political parties in this House and I should hope that all hon. gentlemen and everybody in this counry will agree with that as being a good and sound proposition. The aim should be to ascertain the best way to bring it about. I would say that no change at all would be necessary if the Premier would be strong enough to do what is right between the two political parties in the matter of appointments. I have no stone to throw at Sir Wilfrid Laurier in that respect, because he has been preceded by very strong and able men and not one of them was strong enough to make non-political appointments. Therefore, we have no right to be unfairly critical with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, because he has done no worse than other premiers have done, with a slight exception in the case of Sir John Macdonald. If the premier were strong enough to make nominations to the Senate, independent of party lines, there would be no need for a change, but our experience with public men since confederation and with the good men we have had too, shows that we have not been able to work it out on that principle, and, therefore, it seems to me there will have to be something done to strengthen the Premier for the time being and to provide that the two political parties will have a fair representation in this House.

Last year we introduced an innovation in our constitution, one which is a very important precedent. We recognized the leader of the opposition for the time being as a factor in our constitution. I propose that we should follow the British system of constitution making, by precedent and just go one step further and recognize the leader of the opposition with regard to the nominations for the Senate. My suggestion is that an arrangement should be made between the two political parties. My hon. friend pointed out very fairly that in a matter of choosing committees in this House and in the other House, and in all legislatures, there is no difficulty whatever in securing proportionate representation of the members of the two parties on all the committees. That no majority ever attempts to be so unfair as to prevent such representation being then made. There is no law on the subject. The majority having a giant's strength could use it like a giant if they chose, but as a matter of practice no majority ever attempts to do anything of that kind and the minority is allowed a fair choice in the selection of committees. I say give the leader of the opposition a similar choice in regard to the selection of senators. Something would have to be done to secure equality at the start. I hold that the ideal state of things in this Chamber would be that the two parties were almost equal. So that it would become a question of argument and merit on every single measure which would come before the House. It would not be at all certain, when a measure was introduced, whether the government of the day would be strong enough to carry it or not. That would be an ideal state of things, if we could bring about almost an equality between the two parties. There would be a slight inequality, because the party in power must have a majority of the votes or they would not be in a majority in the Commons. They would, therefore, be able to control a majority in this House, but the majority would never be large. In all the electoral contests in this country it is noticeable how very little difference there is in the voting strength of the respective political parties in the aggregate. This would prevent the possibility of anything happening like what I have mentioned in the case of Nova Scotia, where 45 per cent of the people voted Conservative without returning a single member to the House of Commons. We would be enabled to make an equal and fair start, and then let the nominations come from the leader of the opposition and the premier according to the voting strength of the two parties. I think this change could be brought about without an amendment of the British North America Act. Joint resolutions of the Houses might be passed in regard to it which would strengthen the hands of the Premier. The Premier would recommend all the appointments, but he would receive a fair proportion of the nominations from the leader of the opposition. Patents would still be issued from the Crown, and we would still retain the nominative principle and life tenure of office, the change being in simply recognizing the leader of the opposition so far that the Premier would accept from him a certain number of names, proportionate to the voting strength of his party, I think the change could be brought about without any amendment to the British North America Act. Hon. gentlemen may say it is an innovation, but the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he believed in innovations, and I believe in them also. What we did last year with regard to voting a salary to the leader of the opposition was undoubtedly an innovation, but although there was some criticism in the first instance, I am satisfied that people generally are now convinced that what was done last year was a good thing; and having recognized the leader of the opposition in that way it is a simple matter to go a step further and recognize him in relation to nominations to the Senate in the manner which I have suggested.

If it were decided that an amendment to the British North America Act should be obtained in order to bring about this change, I would make two variations in my plan. One is that we should reduce the number of senators to the number named by the Minister of Trade and Commerce—72. That would be very much preferable in my humble opinion, but that could not be done of course without amending the British North America Act. I should also be inclined, if we were going to the British parliament for power to make any changes, to favour giving the universities some voice in the selection of a limited number of representatives. These could be elected by the universities under some such plan as prevails in Great Britain in connection with the election of university representatives for the House of Commons, or we might take some other way of doing it. A suggestion might be sent in to the Premier of the day upon which a patent could be issued from the Crown, and in that way we would have a House composed of two parties of almost equal strength, with the balance of power held by an independent and enlightened constituency, the universities of Canada.

In drawing these remarks to a close, I desire to submit that this would be constitution making on the true British principle, not by revolution, not by statute, but we would be carrying out in action Tennyson's ideal nation where > Freedom broadens slowly down,

> From precedent to precedent.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (117) An Act to incorporate the Erie, London and Tilsonburg Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Wednesday, June 6, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

QUEBEC, MONTREAL AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière), from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (72) An Act to incorporate the Quebec, Montreal and Southern Railway Company, with an amendment. He said : The amendment made by the committee to this Bill is simply increasing the bonding power of the company. I move that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DAVID moved that the Bill be read the third time.

The motion was agreed to, Bill was read a third time and passed under a suspension of the rules.

VANCOUVER, FRASER VALLEY AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière) from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours reported Bill (87) An Act to incorporate the Vancouver, Fraser Valley and Southern Railway Company, with two amendments. He said : The first amendment consists in striking out the words 'Subsection 3 of'. That was done for the purpose of removing any doubt as to whether only subsection 3 of clause 195 of the Railway Act should apply, or the whole provision of the Railway Act. The next amendment is the insertion of clause 13 of the said Bill which is done for the purpose of putting this Bill under the provisions of any local Act passed by the legislature of British Columbia concerning electric powers and so forth.

Hon. Mr. DAVID moved that the amendments be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ICE BREAKER 'MONTCALM'.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

Is it a fact that the removal of the copper bolts intended to screw the blades of the propeller to the shaft of the ship 'Montcalm' was ascertained in the spring of 1905, and that an inquiry was begun to find out the facts as to such removal?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no answer. At the department they do not seem to understand what the hon. gentlemen desires. They think they have already given full information.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They could not have given an answer to this particular question, because it had been left out of the original series of questions. It was included in the French copy but by mistake this question was omitted in the translation. It was then agreed, as I understood, that it would be left on the order paper so that we might get an answer later on. If the department is unable to give an answer that settles the matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have asked several times about it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose they are under the impression that the previous answer was all that was necessary. We might give them another chance perhaps.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

VICTORIA, VANCOUVER AND EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a return of all papers, letters and documents relating in any way to an application made to the Dominion government for a subsidy by the promoters of the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern Railway Company.

He said: In connection with this matter I want it to be distinctly understood that I am not approaching this question in any spirit of hostility. I have no objection at all to the promoters of that railway getting a subsidy, not in the least; but the statement has been generally made in this House of late, and not only here but in the newspapers throughout the country, that the time has come when all railway subsidies should be done away with, and that no further subsidies should be granted to any railway corporation to build more railways in this country. From our standpoint, in the Northwest at least, that is a very dangerous doctrine. It is very easy for Mr. Hill or Mr. Hill's friends to go through this country like a cyclone stirring up public feeling by telling the people that it is time to do away with the granting of railway subsidies. As a matter of fact we must have railway development in the west. If Mr. Hill or any one else is prepared to build the railways and build them at once, and give the people railway communication, I would be only too happy to see them built without any government assistance whatever. I think that would be proper and right. But if any person or persons stir up public opinion to such an extent that it will influence the legislatures of the provinces in the west and the government at Ottawa to stop the granting of railway subsidies at the present time, it may have a very serious effect on the development of our country. There are certain portions of the Northwest, and more particularly of the country where I reside, where it would be impossible for Mr. Hill, or any one else to build railways because there are no connections.

I do not suppose that Mr. Hill even could get in there for several years yet. A piece of road 90 miles in length will have to be built at once. It is a connection of the Canadian Northern, between Prince Albert and Battleford. There are thousands of people living along that hundred miles; the country is thickly settled. It might be argued that if the country is thickly settled and capable of supporting a railway it should be built without any assistance. Whether that is right or not, the fact remains, that the people there want railway communication, and, if we cannot get it in any other way, it is the duty of the government here or of the government of Saskatchewan to assist that railway. I notice in a speech made by Mr. Hill, the president of the Great Northern Railway, as reported in the 'Free Press', this statement occurs:—

The Northwest is no longer dependent on its mother. Let it help itself now; don't spoon feed it.

Well, from my standpoint, I don't think the Northwest has been very much spoon fed. I have lived there for the past 27 years, and I fail to see where any spoon feeding comes in, as far as railway building is concerned. It is a well known fact that a great deal of money has been spent in the construction of the Intercolonial Railway. That money is outstanding yet, and the interest on it has to be paid; and I fancy hon. gentlemen will agree with me that the people of the Northwest and Manitoba will have to pay their share of that interest, and they will also have to pay a share of the principal, when it comes to be paid. There is hardly a railway that has been built in eastern Canada or in any part of the Dominion which has not been subsidized in some way by money that is still outstanding, and the people of the west will be called upon to pay their share both of principal and interest; and as time goes on and the country develops and a larger proportion of the population of this country is found in these new provinces, as will be the case in the near future, we will have to pay the greater part of the interest and also the greater part of the principal.

Now, when it comes to this spoon-fed country we hear about, the western country, what do we find? How much money has been given towards subsidizing railways in Saskatchewan, Manitoba or Alberta? The government were very free with the lands. It makes no difference whether the lands belong to the people up there or the people down here, the fact remains that no money was given, no interest or principal has to be paid, so that, as a matter of fact, we in the west will have to pay the money granted down here and the interest upon it, while there will be nothing at all to pay for in the west, and still we are told by gentlemen who know very little about it that we are spoon fed. As far as granting subsidies is concerned, I should be very glad to see the day when we can do away with railway subsidies; but while the country is developing, we cannot afford to put a brake on the wheel. You cannot get people to settle in a country without railway communication, and if the government cannot get railways built without assisting them, it is the duty, not only of this government, but of the provincial government as well, to aid in having them built. It is not absolutely necessary to give money towards the building of railways. Everybody understands that the day of giving cash subsidies has passed, but we can guarantee bonds in some cases. If we have confidence in our country; if we are going to spend large sums of money to bring people in and establish them on our lands, we must have confidence in the country being able to support them; and if it is able to support them, it is able to support the railways, and there is no risk in the government guaranteeing the bonds of those railways. What is the effect of guaranteeing bonds? When a railway corporation gets the government of a country, or even of a province, to guarantee bonds, they can be sold in the markets of the world about at par. Money can be had at a low rate of interest, and the roads can be built much cheaper, and the fixed charges will be less than if the bonds are not guaranteed. Therefore, they can or should carry the products of the farms at less rates, and nobody would be hurt. That is why I am moving for a return of these papers. As I said before, I am not doing it in any hostile spirit. If the people who are going to build those roads in British Columbia are getting a subsidy to build them, I do not object; but the fact remains that an agitation has been raised in the country to do away with subsidies, an agitation which might have the affect of shutting off all railway construction for the next five or six years, because all will agree that no matter how desirous Mr. Hill may be to construct railways, it would be impossible for him to furnish all the railway facilities that may be required in the west during the next five or six years, and if our local railway companies will not build without government assistance, they must get it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the address going. I am not aware that there are any papers or letters. If there are any, they will be brought down.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—While the matter is before the House, I wish to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to an article appearing in yesterday's 'Citizen' and it is along the lines of discussion that has arisen over this matter—whether railways can be built in the northwest without aid. This article refers to the action of the Senate, and it reads as follows :—

A prominent westerner interviewed on the subject of Mr. J. J. Hill's railway schemes, speaking to the 'Citizen,' said :

The action of the Senate in deciding to give Mr. J. J. Hill a free hand in the Canadian west, is hailed with satisfaction by most people in Manitoba. We are all land poor, staggering under liabilities incurred for town lots or farming land, and, therefore, in a mood to welcome any scheme that promises to keep up boom values a while longer.

I wish to say—and I think I speak for every member coming from the Northwest who has any knowledge of that country—that there is no foundation whatever for a statement of that kind. I do not think any gentleman coming from the west, having any knowledge of conditions in the west, will say that the Northwest was ever on a sounder footing than it is to-day. I do not think there is any boom in values of town lots or farm lots. Everything sold is full value for the money paid, and I wish to give this statement, published in the 'Citizen,' the most absolute contradiction, and so far as the statements just made by the hon. gentleman with regard to bonusing railways is concerned, I have every confidence in the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan that they are probably the best judges as to whether they will guarantee railway bonds or not, without any direction from Ottawa. So far as aid to railways is concerned, we must remember that the country is growing, and what I have said about the Northwest is one of the evidences of its growth that I want to remind this House of. Thirty years ago the Canadian Pacific Railway received large aid from the government—more than it cost to build the road. A few years later the Canadian Northern started to build roads in that country, and they received almost sufficient aid to build their road by way of guarantees and bonuses. Later on, two or three years ago, the Grand Trunk Pacific agreed to construct a transcontinental line for smaller aid, practically a guarantee for a portion of the cost of the work, and now, as the country is progressing, the credit of the country is becoming better, simply because the people are furnishing freight for the railways. Having reached that point, Mr. Hill suggests they should stand on their own resources and build other railways without bonuses. It was stated by Mr. Hill when here a few days ago that all the transcontinental railways on the American continent, except his own, have been in the hands of the receiver. He builds his roads for actual cost, pays dividends to the people who furnish the money, and he is able to build his roads without aid, and keep them out of the hands of the receiver and out of the law courts.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—No bonds to be considered.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I hope the northwest portion of Canada—the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan—will have their railways built without incurring even a contingent liability on themselves. We have in the province of Manitoba incurred very large contingent liabilities, I believe too large, for the purpose of building railways. We thought some years ago the time had gone by for giving guarantees and aids to railways in that country. However, the representatives in that province have seen fit to encumber the province with very large liabilities for railways. I hope the new provinces in the west, on account of the large population coming in, on account of the fertility of the soil, as demonstrated by the large crops grown in the last few years, will permit men who wish to build railways to build them as a business enterprise. I believe the time has gone by when we will have to give aids for the purpose of constructing roads in our territory. I am simply expressing my own view, and I would not have risen except to call attention to the statement of some 'prominent westerner,' which I have read to the House. I venture to say no prominent westerner would subscribe to the statement that appears in this article, a two column article, of course denouncing Jim Hill. I am not aware that the Senate decided in passing Bill 41 the other day to give Jim Hill a free hand in building railways in our Canadian Northwest. From all that I have learned up to the present moment, Mr. Hill has no interest in the Bill whatever. So far as the information asked for in regard to getting bonuses on the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern, a matter that apparently is annoying some people in this House, I do not know whether he ever asked for bonuses or not. The Secretary of State stated that the return would be brought down, but, as I have said before, I want to give the most positive contradiction—and I believe it will be backed by every member from the Northwest who knows whereof he speaks—to statements in this article, and to say to the public that it is entirely unfounded.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—So much attention has lately been paid to the assertion made by Mr. Hill that the present prosperity in the Northwest will warrant the construction of railways without any bonus or aid being given, that one cannot refrain from expressing their regret, in view of the fact that the imprimature of the government seems to be indirectly, if not directly, placed upon Mr. Hill's present schemes, that the government did not discover Mr. Hill within the last two or three years. I took occasion, upon the introduction of the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill, to point out to the government that in entering into a contract with that company without submitting to the railway builders of the world, and particularly of this continent, the fact that another transcontinental road was desirable across Canada, and the government would give reasonable aid, it was an extraordinary course for the government to take, to enter absolutely into a contract with any company without intimating to capitalists that here was an opportunity to enter upon railway construction of the elaborate kind then in contemplation. I also pointed out, at the time the Canadian Pacific Railway scheme was inaugurated, that the government of Sir John Macdonald advertised to the entire world the fact that they were prepared to accept propositions and tenders for the building of a transcontinental road. Now, I venture to say that had the government pursued that course with reference to the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific road, Mr. Hill would have been only too glad, in view of the attitude which he has taken very recently, to have entered upon that immense undertaking and to have saved Canada the enormous expenditure upon which we have entered of at least $150,000,000. It is, therefore, the more surprising to find supporters of the government advertising to the world at large that the time has now arrived (when the ink is scarcely dry upon the contract which the government have entered into) when no further bonus or public aid must be given to the construction of western railways. It seems to me that it places the government in a very peculiar position, and warrants the comment being made that they recklessly entered upon the contract which they closed a couple of years ago.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman, before he resumes his seat, whether there is any proposition of building east of Winnipeg under such terms ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would say in answer to my hon. friend's question, that the proposition of Mr. Hill would certainly have dispensed with this government guaranteeing 75 per cent of the cost from Winnipeg westward to the coast, and, so far as the other sections of the road are concerned, I would point out to my hon. friend that the Grand Trunk people themselves strongly disapprove of constructing the road east of North Bay, and proposed originally to the government that they should simply construct the road from North Bay westward.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I desire to say a word in reply to the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie. I do not know that it is necessary ; but I intend to do it. I think he informed the House that the legislatures of Alberta and Saskatchewan were quite competent to decide as to what they should do without advice from Ottawa, and in the next breath he started to give them advice and hoped that they would not give assistance to anybody.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I said I hoped they would be able to get all the railways required to be constructed, without guarantee or cash bonuses.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—That is advice. Then he rather insinuated that some person had a grievance against Mr. Hill. I want to distinctly state with reference to this question, that I do not care whether Mr. Hill has a charter to build all over the west or not. That is not the issue. I say that Mr. Hill, even as he is prepared to build railways, could not build all the railways we will want in the next four or five years in the west, and, therefore, some other persons will have to build roads. That is a point I wish to make. I want to give as an instance of the construction of the Canadian Northern through from Winnipeg to Edmonton. It is a well known fact that where the Canadian Northern were asking for a guaranteeing of their bonds to build that road, the Canadian Pacific Railway people came forward and said : 'Why should you guarantee the bonds of the Canadian Northern Railway, when we are asking no subsidy for the road we are going to build ?' Our answer to that was 'When do you propose to build that road' ? If the government had not guaranteed the bonds of that road at the time they did, the country would have been still a wilderness. Have we lost anything by guaranteeing the bonds on that road ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I did not find fault with guaranteeing the bonds on that road.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The hon. gentleman was objecting to guaranteeing the bonds in any way if I understood him. I say the people of Canada have not lost anything by guaranteeing the bonds of that road. That road is now open to Edmonton, and the country which was a wilderness before, is now thickly settled, and the railway is more than paying its fixed charges and the running expenses as well, and the people of Canada will never be called upon to pay a dollar of interest on that road. The country was quickly settled and there is general prosperity up there. If we had waited for the Canadian Pacific Railway to come along and build it because they simply made the statement that they would build it without assistance, the gophers would be hopping over that country yet. The same argument applies to Mr. Hill's proposition. He tells us in broad terms that he is prepared to build railways without subsidies. I hope he will, but there are portions of that country which require to be opened up at once and if the people cannot get them opened without assistance, they should be helped by a guarantee of bonds. I am not attempting to dictate a policy ; I am merely giving my opinion.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—My hon. friend, so far as the Northern Railway is concerned, and with regard to Mr. Hill or anybody else, sets his face against voting any money to aid a railway enterprise ; but he makes an exception in the case of Mackenzie and Mann.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I beg my hon. friend's pardon ; I said that if a subsidy was necessary to build the road, they might get it.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I understood perfectly what the hon. gentleman said ; that he was not in favour of granting Mr. Hill or anybody behind that road, any aid from the government of the Dominion or of any of the provinces, except in so far as it affected some branch of the Northern Railway to be built——

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have already denied the statement the hon. gentleman is making. I do not object to Mr. Hill or anybody else getting a subsidy.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—My hon. friend should possess his soul in patience. I am only repeating to the House as faithfully as I can the argument he was making ; that he is asking for information from the government whether Mr. Hill or anybody else is behind a certain railway, and he has a notice of motion before the House, which we are discussing, with regard to giving grants to railways, and he wants to know from the government whether application has been made on behalf of this railway ? He says that this thing should be stopped, with the exception of some 90 miles that he mentioned particularly, which could not be built unless Mackenzie and Mann or the Canadian Northern Railway received assistance. It would appear to me as though the hon. gentleman was more concerned about Mackenzie and Mann's interest than the finances of the country.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not think the hon. gentleman should make any insinuations of the kind.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—That is what is disturbing the spirit of my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The hon. gentleman——

Some hon. GENTLEMAN—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I do not mind the hon. gentleman's chatter ; it does not affect me at all. My hon. friend is very much concerned that some help might be given to some other road and thus interfere with the object he has in view of helping his friends in the west. That has been the argument he has made in every speech he has offered to the House, that his whole and sole concern is about the interest of Mann and Mackenzie. Now surely there are other railways in this Dominion which require assistance as well as the railways of Mann and Mackenzie ; surely there are other roads that require consideration at the hands of the Dominion parliament ; and I for one should be very loath to dictate to the government what they should do. It is certainly a matter of government policy, one which does not come within the purview of this House, whether the government grant subsidies to any particular railway or not. It is for the government to bring down any such measure, and we can only discuss it when it comes down. If I was as solicitous for my friends as my hon. friend appears to be, I should ask the Prime Minister, who alone is responsible, or I would have a chat with my hon. friend the Secretary of State or the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this House, and see what their views were with regard to it, instead of announcing to the House a bald policy that no aid should be given to any railway except the Canadian Northern. That has been the purpose of the whole of the hon. gentleman's discussion ; that is the purport of his notice of motion, and that has been the object of my hon. friend for the last two or three years in this House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If my hon. friend from Prince Albert really wants to get information as to the ultimate cost to the people of the country for the construction of this road for which we granted a charter the other day, I think he had better take up the contract we made with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and he will be able, with the aid of some calculations which were made two or three years ago in this House as well as in the House of Commons, to arrive at something like a proper estimate of what the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway is to cost the people of Canada before it is finished. If my hon. friend wanted to get a correct forecast of the cost, I believe that would be the better way, because, from the extreme anxiety which the hon. gentleman from St. Catharines (Hon. Mr. Gibson) shows about this matter, and other things of which I have been a close observer, I have a strong conviction that this charter is being pushed through parliament for the purpose of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and that it is the intention of that corporation to proceed by this route through the mountains to Vancouver instead of by the Pine River or Peace River Pass to Fort Simpson. I have looked over the contract, and I find that it will fit admirably into this state of things. If the Grand Trunk Pacific get a charter to build through the Yellow Head Pass a line terminating at Vancouver, they will be fulfilling the terms of the contract to the letter, with just this difference, that the cost to the people of Canada will be increased to the extent of between twenty-five and thirty millions of dollars. If the northern pass is selected, the mountain section of the Grand Trunk Pacific will be 480 miles in length, but it will be about 800 miles if the Grand Trunk Pacific is built through the Yellow Head Pass and terminates at Vancouver. I am comparing the mountain section of the road as proposed for this railway from Vancouver towards Edmonton, and the mountain section of the Grand Trunk Pacific if the northern pass were taken. From what I have been able to observe in this House I have very little doubt in my mind—I may be wrong—that a very clever game is being played on parliament. I do not know how far the government are a party to it ; but I remember that when the Grand Trunk Pacific contract came to this House—after the last Bill of two years ago, the final contract which we made with this company—came to this House after it had received all its readings and the complete assent of the House of Commons, that my hon. friend, the Secretary of State rose in this House and told us that the mountain section would be 766 miles in length, whereas in all the previous discussions, and in the previous information placed before both Houses of parliament the length of the mountain section was described as being only 480 miles. Between the time the Bill was read a third time in the House of Commons and the time it received its second reading in the Senate of Canada, two years ago, the mountain section expanded from 480 miles to 766 miles, or 286 miles. We never got an explanation of that.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—It was a growing time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It seems to have been a growing time indeed, but the only explanation I can get of it, and it fits admirably with the part which the hon. member for St. Catharines is playing——

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I hope my hon. friend will bear in mind that I am not from St. Catharines.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think any very great harm has occurred to the country or to the dignity of the House if I made that statement. The hon. gentleman is not from St. Catharines, but from Beamsville. He has, all the same, shown an extraordinary zeal and anxiety in regard to this Bill. I generally observe the hon. gentleman's efforts very closely, and the conclusion I draw from that observation is although he attributes such an anxiety to the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert in the interests of Mann and Mackenzie—and I do not think that would be very culpable—they are large railway builders in this country, they have a charter to go through the Yellow Head Pass and his friends are naturally anxious that their interests should not be jeopardized. I have observed all Mr. Hill's utterances and have not found any statement of his which would give the slightest hint that he is in any way connected with the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway scheme. He has not said a single word about it. He has spoken recently of all his railway enterprises in Canada as being about 1,300 miles in length. This railway would be 1,300 miles in itself. There is no indication that Mr. Hill has ever said he had any connection with it. He may be allowing his name to be used for some purpose. It may be that he has some understanding with the Grand Trunk Pacific. At all events I place my views on record, and time will show who is right. When full developments come, hon. gentlemen will compare them with what I have said, and I think it will be found that this charter has been pushed through parliament for the purpose of furnishing the route which the Grand Trunk Pacific intend to build on after they leave Edmonton.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I can hardly understand how my hon. friend can accuse me of any partiality, after the remarks I made the other night in support of this Bill. I said that I cared for neither the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Pacific Railway, nor for Mann and Mackenzie; that Canada was too big to wait for anybody. My hon. friend knows surely that the Grand Trunk Pacific have still the right to go through the Yellow Head Pass; that Mann and Mackenzie have the same right; and I pointed out in my own humble way that there was room for 15 railways through that pass, and that the gradients on the route were as good as could be found between Toronto and Montreal. I advocated nothing on behalf of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I am independent of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and of the Canadian Northern. I am in favour of every railway being built that is for the benefit of Canada.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The position my hon. friend occupies in advocating this railway is that he is furnishing a charter for the Grand Trunk Pacfic, and if the Grand Trunk Pacific should build through the Yellow Head Pass to Vancouver all the subventions that this parliament has voted to them will attach to this very road.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—How do you know?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—May I ask my hon. friend which road he is referring to? The road referred to by the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, in his motion, is the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern. It does not go through the Yellow Head Pass at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What is not the same railway?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern does not go near the Yellow Head Pass.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was under the impression that this is the road.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am very glad that I have had this opportunity of putting my explanation on record. It will remain there notwithstanding I was not speaking of the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway Bill. I am making this statement—I wish to repeat what I have said, not a word is supposed to drop because I had not the same charter in mind—that with regard to that particular charter I have a strong conviction that the Grand Trunk Pacific intend to utilize that charter, and that when they do so all the subventions and guarantees we have given them under that will apply to that route, and it will cost the people of Canada twenty to thirty millions more than if the other pass was used.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Seeing the hon. gentleman was only 160 miles away from the road we were discussing, I should like to ask him this question: How I should be assisting the Grand Trunk Railway in this Bill when they have a charter already, granted two years ago, to take them through the Yellow Head Pass?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Have they a charter ending at Vancouver?

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—No; that does not bear on the question at all.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a point of order.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—They have a right to go through the Yellow Head Pass.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman has no right to remain standing when a point of order is raised. I think we are proceeding in a very irregular way. There is a motion before the House, on which every member has a right to speak, but to speak once only.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What difference does it make to the country whether the road goes to Vancouver or to Port Simpson? Port Simpson is two days nearer China and Japan than Vancouver is, but it will make no difference to the country, so far as I can see, whether the terminus is at Vancouver or at Port Simpson.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The difference is that under the contract made with the Grand Trunk Pacific we are bound as to cost only by the length of the railway. Our guarantee will be 75 per cent of the entire cost of the railway for the mountain section, and if the mountain section is extended from 480 to 800 miles, the difference to the country will be the increased subvention attached to the 320 odd miles.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Hon. gentlemen, I wish to make——

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The hon. gentleman has made a persoal attack on me, and I have a right to reply.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Chair, chair.

The SPEAKER—I understand the hon. gentleman has replied.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I want to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER—I understand the hon. gentleman has replied to the speech made by the hon. gentleman from Lincoln.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I want to make a personal explanation. I have been misrepresented and attacked by an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, and I want to set this question at rest once and forever. An hon. gentleman has made the statement that I am more interested in the affairs of Mackenzie and Mann than in the affairs of this country. I want to state here and now that I have no interest, direct or indirect, in the affairs of Mackenzie and Mann, that I am not a director and not a stock-holder, and have never had a contract with, or had anything directly or indirectly from Mackenzie and Mann or any other corporation in this country, and I hope the hon. gentleman can say as much.

The motion was agreed to.

THE GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY AND INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY ARBITRATION.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid upon the table of the Senate, a return showing the names of the persons appointed arbitrators under authority vested in the government by chapter 16, 4 Edward VII., intituled 'An Act respecting an arbitration between His Majesty and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada,' and the amount paid to each arbitrator, or to be paid, either as salary or per diem allowance, and to any other person employed by the said arbitrators, and the total sum paid to said arbitrators and other officials to the first of June, 1906, and the proportion of such expense paid or to be paid by the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

He said: When I made the motion asking for a return showing the cases upon which an arbitration was to be held, I was under the impression that some of the difficulties which had arisen, arose out of the terms of the contract entered into between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the government of Canada in reference to the Drummond County Railway and its connections. I find in looking over the return laid before the Senate that some of them were of a very minor character, and it occurred to me that it would be well that the country should know what it costs to determine the rights of either one of those companies, to pay small Bills such as were submitted to the arbitrators for their decision. I find that most of the cases referred to the arbitrators involved amounts ranging from eleven dollars to a few thousand dollars, and that an elaborate report has been made by the three arbitrators for each of these cases. It is true the names of the arbitrators are given in the reports which were laid upon the table, but I thought it better that the whole of the information should be contained in the report for which I am moving. I shall give a short synopsis of what was done by these three gentlemen, and then I will read one of the reports, in order that the House may see the trouble and expense involved in making the investigation. One of these cases is the Grand Trunk Railway Company s claim of $89.11 as reimbursement of moneys for the carrying of certain hay from Montreal to St. John, N.B. The finding of the arbitrators was that the government had to pay the sum. Next His Majesty claimed certain rights as to terminals at the Bonaventure station which the Grand Trunk Railway Company refused. The finding was that His Majesty was entitled to have and maintain a separate passenger ticket office and put up a sign—the sign I suppose was that this was the Intercolonial Railway ? However the report does not say what the sign was. The claim of the government to display advertisements of the Intercolonial Railway route at the said Bonaventure station was not allowed. The claim for additional accommodation, while the present conditions continued to exist, was not allowed. That, I suppose, implies that when the room at Bonaventure station is increased, they may be able to concede to the government the rights they claim in reference to further accommodation. At present we must infer from the report that the accommodation given to the Intercolonial Railway is limited to such an extent that the business of the railway cannot well be carried on. The third case is a claim by the Grand Trunk Railway for the reimbursement of $11 paid for sheep killed by the Intercolonial Railway. The finding was that the Grand Trunk Railway was not entitled to be reimbursed the $11. Why, is not set forth. The fourth case, the Grand Trunk Railway claimed from His Majesty $200 paid to one Paris for damages done goods and chattels by the Intercolonial Railway engines. The finding of the arbitrators was that the said claim had been extinguished by prescription and, therefore, should not be reimbursed. I dare say that may be the law, but it seems an extraordinary position for a government to take against a claim, if the claim were a legitimate one. However, that was left to the arbitrators. The fifth case was a claim of the Grand Trunk Railway Company for a refund of $604.40 and interest at 5 per cent, paid on account of injury to one Bourdon, due to a collision on the Intercoolnial Railway. The finding was that the government must refund the amount with interest. The sixth case was a demand made by the government for an amount overpaid to the Grand Trunk Railway Company for cartage. This was a claim of $4,237.45. It was ordered that it be refunded. The seventh case is a disagreement between the two companies, arising out of a collision, in which property was destroyed and two lives were lost. The Grand Trunk Railway Company was to pay the Intercolonial Railway $944.45 to cover damages to rolling stock, &c., and interest at 5 per cent, and the Intercolonial Railway was to pay to the Grand Trunk Railway $8,534 and costs incurred by the Grand Trunk Railway Company in respect to the death of two men killed in the same collision, and damages, interest, &c., to the Grand Trunk Railway on account of the said collision. The eighth was a case of the government claiming from the Grand Trunk Railway Company $1,068.39, less salvage, for damage to goods placed upon the Grand Trunk Railway pontoon on a wharf, the property of the company. The finding was that the Grand Trunk Railway Company was to pay the $1,068.39, on the ground that the Grand Trunk Railway Company did not keep the wharf or pontoon in proper repair. These are the important cases which were referred to the arbitrators, and no less than eight separate and distinct reports were made, covering some four or five pages each. I will read one in order that the country may see what the arbitrators consider necessary in making their report, after investigating these cases, and we will ascertain, when the return is brought down, what has been the cost of making these investigations into claims, only one of which is of any consequence whatever. That one was for an overpayment of $4,237.45 for cartage. It would suggest itself to any business man that that was a question which might well have been decided by the Minister of Justice and the Railway Department, without going to all the expense necessary to bring these arbitrators together and summon witnesses to make the investigation. These arbitrators live in New Brunswick and different parts of the country. This is one of the outlets by which large amounts of Intercolonial Railway money find their way and contribute to a very great extent to the enormous deficits in the working of that railway. Here is one report:

Whereas by an agreement bearing the date the first day of February.

Claim of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada in re sheep killed near St. Hyacinthe.

To all to whom these presents may come.

Greeting,—Whereas by an agreement bearing date the first day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, made between the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, of the first part, and Her late Majesty Queen Victoria, represented therein by the honourable the Minister of Railways and Canals of Canada, of the second part, the Grand Trunk Railway Company leased and demised to Her Majesty for a certain term in the said agreement expressed an undivided one-half share or leasehold interest in a portion of the company's railway and property, and granted to Her Majesty the privilege of running engines, vehicles, rolling stock and trains of the Intercolonial Railway over the same and certain other portions of the company's railway, and other rights and privileges, upon certain terms and conditions in the said agreement expressed.

And whereas by an Act of the parliament of Canada passed in the sixty-second and sixty-third years of the reign of Her late Majesty Queen Victoria, chaptered five, it was declared that the said agreement, excepting the fortieth clause thereof, had been and was valid and binding in all respects, subject to certain qualifications and conditions and to the happening of certain events.

And whereas all things happened and were done necessary to make the said agreement valid and binding in the matters and respects hereinafter mentioned and referred to.

And whereas it was provided in and by the said agreement that should any difficulty arise between Her Majesty and the company under any clause of said agreement, or respecting the carrying out of the same according to its true intent and meaning, such differences should from time to time, as the same might arise, be referred to the award and determination of three arbitrators, one of whom should be nominated by the Minister of Railways and Canals of Canada, one by the said company, and the third by the two so nominated.

And whereas differences arose between Her late Majesty and the said company, and between His present Majesty and the said company, under the different clauses of the said agreement and respecting the carrying out of the same according to its true intent and meaning.

And whereas we, the undersigned, were duly appointed as arbitrators to determine all such differences between Her late Majesty or His present Majesty and the said company under the said agreement.

And whereas we did take upon ourselves the burden of the said reference.

And whereas, among other differences under said agreement referred to us, the said arbitrators, and brought before us the said parties for award, was one wherein it was alleged and claimed by and on behalf of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada that the said company was entitled to be reimbursed and paid by His Majesty the sum of eleven dollars ($11), being the amount alleged to have been paid by the said company to the owner of certain sheep killed through being struck by one of His Majesty's trains on a part of the railway forming the subject of the said demise, on the twenty-second day of May, A.D. 1902.

And whereas after we had so taken upon ourselves the burden of the said reference, and after the said claim had been made before us on behalf of the said company, by an Act of the parliament of Canada passed in the fourth and fifth years of His Majesty's reign, chaptered fifteen, it was enacted that the said arbitrators should not be limited to making one award under the said agreement, but that the said arbitrators, or a majority of them, might, from time to time, make such number of awards as to them the said arbitrators should seem best, and that, in any such award, the said arbitrators might embody their decision, or that of a majority of them, upon any one or more of the disputes or claims referred to them or forming subjects of the said reference.

Now know ye that we, the said arbitrators, having heard the evidence offered by the parties, as well as the arguments of counsel upon the said claim hereinbefore particularly set out, and having taken the same into consideration, and having done all other matters and things necessary to enable us to make a valid award concerning the premises, hereby make and publish our award, in triplicate, as follows:

We find that the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada is not entitled to be reimbursed or paid by His Majesty the said sum of eleven dollars ($11), or any part thereof, and we do hereby award and direct accordingly.

In witness whereof we have unto set our hands at the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec, this third day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and six.

A. C. KILLAM,
C. P. DAVIDSON,
GEORGE F. SHEPLEY.

Thomas P. Owens,
Clerk of the arbitration.

When we were discussing in this House the question of appointing additional judges, it was stated as a fact, on the authority of the late Attorney General of Quebec, Mr. Casgrain, that they had but one case in the district of Gaspé during the year, and that the judge, whose duty it was to live within the district, kept his residence in the city of Quebec and rather than go to the trouble and expense of a trip to Gaspé to adjudicate upon the case that was entered in the court, he put his hand in his pocket and paid the sum himself. It seems to me that the government, although the award was in their favour, would have made a great deal of money to this country if they had saved themselves the trouble of that arbitration and paid the $11. I dare say there was a principle involved, and that the government did not feel bound to pay it; but to the layman's mind—perhaps my lawyer friends will take a different view of it—it seems to me all these cases might have been embodied in one report instead of giving eight separate reports. The hon. Secretary of State, when he laid this return upon the table, made the statement that there were two other cases yet undecided; whether they involved large amounts, larger than the $11 or the one of $4,000 neither the House nor the country knows. But I presume we should get the reports in a very short time. I repeat that I have brought this matter under the notice of the Senate in order to show the expenses which are incurred in adjudicating upon the matters of such an insignificant character, that might have been settled without all this trouble and expense. Ordinary business men would have settled these matters at a cost of a very few dollars compared with the sum which, I have no doubt, the country will have to pay. I make my motion and I hope my hon. friend will bring down the statement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the address going. If the case my hon. friend has been at such pains to bring before the House had stood alone, I fancy his criticisms would have been well founded, but it appears it was only one of eight cases, some of them claims of a considerable amount, one in which two lives were lost, and another involving the principle of what would be done at the station in Montreal. I know nothing whatever of the facts except what has been given to the House by the hon. gentleman. I will be glad to forward a copy of his speech to the Minister of Railways for his information. I am quite sure that if there had been only $11 at stake, there would not have been any arbitration at all, but there happened to be other claims made pro and con, and some of them I fancy of some importance—that is, involving a principle. No doubt, I say, if the case had stood upon the individual $11 claim, it would not have been gone into. I presume also that there is a printed form following out the law as defined in the statute, on the principle that all questions in dispute between the two companies were to be settled in a particular way. There is a regular form for it, and the time may not have occupied five minutes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Would not the Court of Exchequor have been the proper tribunal to refer such matters to?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is evidently following out a prescribed arrangement made under the Act under which the Intercolonial Railway obtained running powers over certain portions of the Grand Trunk Railway. It could not be anticipated at the time what controversies might arise, and so provision was made in a statute that when they did arise they should be referred to a board of arbitrators, and this is the result of it. No doubt some of the matters have been insignificant and ought to have been arranged without recourse to arbitration.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—From the remarks of the hon. gentleman the House might be led to believe that these were the findings of one court. True the reports bear the same date, but there is no evidence that the cases were all decided at one sitting of the arbitrators.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. David: That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all petitions, resolutions or documents concerning the abolition or reorganization of the Senate.—Hon. Mr. Legris.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I understand some hon. gentlemen are prepared to speak this afternoon on this matter, and I would suggest that when the debate on this question is adjourned again, that it should go to the foot of the order paper. We will be here until the middle of July or 1st of August and there will be time enough next session, before any change in our constitution can go into effect, this order ought not to stand on the paper blocking the whole business of parliament.

Hon Mr. LOUGHEED—I dissent to the statement that we will be here until August 1.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In resuming an adjournment debate, it is only fair it should go to the foot of the orders after the second or third adjournment. It should not be allowed to block everything.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me we should call it six o'clock when it is six, and finish our business in the evening. I suggest that, so that we can dispose of the business on the paper.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me that we should continue this debate until it is concluded, and then proceed with the other business of the House. I see no necessity for delays which are taking place.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Some other business may have to go down to the House of Commons. It is a pity to block the business. There have been disputed orders on the paper for a fortnight or three weeks.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But the hon. gentleman must know that none of the ordinary Bills are of as much importance as the reforming of the Senate, and the sooner that is attended to the better.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS—In rising to offer a few remarks upon this important subject, that has been so ably introduced before this House by my hon. friend from Montreal, the hon. member for Mille--Isles, and subsequently discussed by other members, it is not my intention to enter into any extended discussion, for many reasons. I consider that it is not necessary on my part, the discussion having been pursued, I may say, in an exhaustive manner, by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, followed by the hon. gentleman from Queen's (Hon. Mr. Ferguson), Prince Edward Island, and I consider also that many members of this House, I may say every one of the members, could discharge such a duty better than I can, principally on account of my lack of knowledge of the English language. However, I should like to state here, that during the many years I attended parliament as a member of the House of Commons, and many times during elections and on other occasions, I expressed my views, I may say my doubts with regard to the utility of our Senate. I thought that this honourable body perhaps was not indespensable to secure good government and good legislation under which to manage the affairs of this country. I thought also that the whole responsibility should rest, as it practically does, with the members of the House of Commons, elected by the people.

My opinion was also that the Senate is costing a large amount of money, constituting a burden upon the shoulders of the taxpayers of which they should be relieved. I must say at this point that though I have had in the past some hesitation in recognizing the utility of this honourable House, I never had the slightest doubt with regard to the qualifications and the honour of its members. I know that every one of my colleagues, whether older or younger than myself, is well chosen from among the most prominent men in the agricultural, industrial, commercial and professional classes of the community—men of considerable experience, great ability and high standing. Now, I must say that whatever my opinion in the past might have been, I realize today that we must maintain a Senate for many reasons. First of all, it is the result of a federal compact, which we have no right to change without the full assent not only of the majority, but of all the interested parties. Perhaps the next strongest reason is the example given us by almost all civilized countries in the world. Wherever representative institutions prevails they retain a Senate. I know also that many politicians and other persons think that the Senate is a safeguard to protect the smaller provinces and the rights of the minorities, and, generally, to act as a check on all hasty legislation. Furthermore, there is a feeling existing in the country which is desirous of copying as closely as possible the British parliament, where the House of Lords is practically their Senate. We all know also that the government, or the party in power, desire to maintain a Senate for many political reasons, and other strong influences are ready to intervene in favour of its maintenance. Now, there is a feeling existing in this country in relation to the Senate, and to understand it we have to look at the most prominent men whom Canada has had since the days of the founding of confederation up to the present time. Every one of them who has spoken on the subject has committed himself in favour of a Senate. A few weeks ago the question was raised in the House of Commons and many able speeches were delivered on that occasion. I read them over carefully, and I found that no one advocated the abolition of the Senate. The Prime Minister himself emphatically declared for its maintenance and no voice dissented. I have to bow before the combined testimony of so many persons and to give up my personal opinion, somewhat adverse in past years, and to realize to-day that it cannot now be a question of the abolition of the Senate. After all, the only reason advanced against this branch of parliament is the amount of money it costs to the country . That evil cannot be denied, but however great it may be it is only one among the many costly branches of the government machinery which cannot be overthrown or avolded. Now remains the question of its reform. During the last ten years there has been much discussion of this question. I admit it is always very easy to criticise, but it is a very different thing to point out a way and suggest a proper remedy for the evil. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce recently presented to the Senate a very elaborate scheme of his own, the fundamental basis of which was an election of some sort. The main object of the hon. minister, if I understand him right, is to secure representation for the minorities in this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS—I think that is most desirable, and it is also in the highest interest of the country as well as of this House ; at the same time I also think that the people of this country have as many elections to take care of as they can well manage. I agree that the minorities should be represented in this House and, above all, the opposition must be strengthened. Let us hope that the state of things existing in 1896, when the Liberal party came into power being hopelessly in the minority in this Chamber, will never occur in Canada again. That alone, to my mind, is the reason why the Senate has been criticised and somewhat discredited in public opinion. We all know that for many years after the return of the Liberal party to power, the Senate, many of whose members were well known opponents of the Liberal party, was constantly regarded as a menace to the Liberal government and an enemy of the large majority of the newly elected members.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—No.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS—That is the hon. gentleman's opinion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY— And I share it.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS—I am not surprised; I know both these hon. gentlemen. The reason of this is that all the senators, with a few exceptions, belonged to the same party. Under such circumstances, knowing the party feeling in our Canadian politics, we should not be surprised if some criticism has been heard from time to time, mostly from the Liberal party against this honourable House. I dare say that a few years hence, if we are not fortunate enough to find out and apply a remedy, the same state of things will occur again, only the conditions will be reversed. The criticism and the opposition to the maintenance of this House will come from the Conservative party. We have been invited by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce to carefully study this question and state our views. In compliance with that request, and feeling it to be my duty, I venture to suggest one way by which I think the object in view can be attained with the least innovation possible and in a workable shape. Let us pass a law, or amend the law now existing, relating to the appointment of new senators and let say two out of five be appointed in the same manner as in the past by the government, but on the recommendation of the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons with two or three of his lieutenants. The leader of the opposition in the House of Commons is the official and active leader of the opposition in the country, and most interested in having the opposition in this House represented by the best men he can possibly secure within the ranks of his friends. Let us give him a means by which his party in this House will be made strong enough to properly discuss and criticise measures, as well in this Chamber as in the other House, and to speak in the name of the minorities in this country, if we can do so, I say the Senate will be far more favourably appreciated.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke the other day of fixing an age limit and a tenure of office. Other gentlemen have expressed the same opinion in other places. Surely there are objections to the system of life tenure, but, as demonstrated by the hon. gentleman from Queen's, the other system will be met with objections to my mind more formidable than the objections to the present system. We have in this Senate five or six hon. gentlemen over 80 years of age. I think every one of them is qualified to fill the position as well to-day as he was twenty years ago, with considerably more experience to his credit. Of those venerable representatives are we not to be proud? With the venerable leader of this House on the one side and the ex-leader of the opposition on the other side, have we not reason to be proud? Surely both these statesmen would grace any Senate in the world. Consequently they are a living proof of my contention, and I can say that the fixing of an age limit, if applied, would surely be deterimental to this House and cannot be pursued without great objection and perhaps more formidable objection than those urged against the Senate to-day. After all, if we can devise a means by which both parties in this House will be represented and sustained in a fair and workable manner, the best result will be obtained, and if we can obtain that result without inflicting more elections upon the people the better, and whereas nothing is perfect in this world, I feel that my suggestion, as well as the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, will be found to be a good one, and if put in practice will result in making the Senate stronger and stronger, and at the same time will contribute to keep this House in the high esteem which it deserves in the minds of the Canadian people.

Hon. Mr. FROST—I desire to say a few words on this question, and I do not think that much time need be occupied with it. It is purely an academic question. The motive for this discussion is to bring out suggestions as to what can best contribute to the making of the Senate perhaps more popular in the country, more important as a part of our legislative machinery, and also to enable it better to perform the functions which it was originally intended to perform by the fathers of confederation.

We have heard various views enunciated here as to the manner in which these various ideas could be worked out. To me it is somewhat doubtful. I have been for many years—and I am proud to say it—a strong supporter of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have believed in him as a statesman, as a man of political sagacity and wisdom. He has given utterances to certain views as to what would, in his opinion, bring the Senate more in unison with the people of Canada. I am not prepared to say at the present moment that he is not right; it has been a proud privilege for me to follow him. But, as I said in the beginning, this is an academic discussion. This is a discussion that has no bearing on the policy of the government, for the right hon. gentleman stated in the beginning of his remarks that he was to be considered as speaking for himself alone and not for the government, and he invited every member of this House, as far as it was possible, to give utterance to his views as an individual, independent altogether of the government. Reflections have been cast upon the Senate; insinuations have been made as to its usefuless and its value to the Dominion. As all the previous speakers have said—as the last speaker has repeated, it must be understood that the Senate was really the result of a compact by which the smaller provinces were to be protected. If we look back to anti-confederation days, when political excitement and prejudices ran very high, and remember the condition of things in the legislative assembly when the same number of members came from Ontario and from the province of Quebec, and when we remember the urgency that some Ontario members placed upon the necessity for a larger representation from their province and the opposition which the province of Quebec gave to that proposition; when we remember how race and religion entered into the discussions; when we remember the deadlocks that occurred in those days; when we remember that it was almost impossible to carry on a government, and when the proposition of confederation was first brought up and discussed by the statesmen of that day, and when after various conferences in Quebec and in Halifax and in Charlottetown and finally in London, the terms of confederation were outlined, and when an Act or the schedule upon which the Act of the British parliament was founded, came before that House, it was considered to be a way out of the deadlock, out of the difficulty, out of the trouble. One of the most important stipulations of that Act was that the province of Lower Canada should have equal representation in the Senate with the province of Ontario. If they were providing for unequal representation in the lower House there was to be equal representation in the upper House, and if that compact—and as my hon. friend has just stated, it was a compact—if that compact had been opposed, or if it had not been carried out, I do not believe personally we would have had any confederation. There would not have been a Dominion of Canada as we have it to-day; there would not have been any Intercolonial Railway, there would not have been any Canadian Pacific Railway; there would not have been any Northwest; there would not have been the great country that we now have and of which we are justly proud. Now, any violation of that compact on the part of this House or any representation made to the imperial parliament on the part of this country, to in any way derogate from the privileges which the provinces enjoy through the mode of constituting of this House, would be a violation of that compact, and it would not be tolerated by the imperial parliament either in the lower House or in the House of Lords. Taking that view, I do not see how we can abolish the Senate or on what ground we can, with any degree of expectancy on our part, go to the British parliament and say that we want the mode of appointing or selecting our senators changed. What would be the effect of a change from the mode of appointing senators by the government to the method of election by the people? We have had the American Senate quoted here, and I am free to say that I hope it will never come about that senators will be elected either sectionally or throughout the country as a whole. In the United States we know that they had one assembly for the first five or six years of their history, during the time of the revolution. Immediately after the revolution their leading statesmen met together and decided then upon a Senate. What was to be the main function of the United States Senate as it was then proposed? I quote from some of the speeches of the statesmen of that day. I will give you a short extract from the speech made in New York at the time by a celebrated statesman of that day, Mr. Alexander Hamilton. He said:

> First United States Senate was constituted to conciliate the spirit of independence in the several states by giving each, however small, equal representation with every other however large, in one branch of the national government; second, to create a council qualified by its moderate size and the experience of its members to advise and check the President in the exercise of his powers of appointing to office and concluding treaties; third, to restrain the impetuosity and fickleness of the popular chamber and so guard against the effects of gusts of passion or sudden changes of opinion in the people; fourth, to provide a body of men whose greater experience, longer terms of membership and comparative independence of popular election would make them an element of stability in the government of the nation, enabling it to maintain its character in the eyes of foreign states, and to preserve a continuity of policy at home and abroad; fifth, to establish a court proper for a trial of impeachments, a remedy deemed necessary to prevent abuses of power by the elective.

Now it may surprise some here, who have not read the history of these times—as I presume probably all have—that the Senate of the United States sat with closed doors for five sessions. After that sittings were held with open doors, but you will observe from these statements of the Hon. Alexander Hamilton that the Senate had no power given them to initiate money Bills. That power was at the time, vested in the lower House, and since the United States Senate has been initiating money Bills they have simply usurped a power which never was intended they should have by the framers of the United States constitution. Now what would be the effect here supposing a certain proportion or all the senators of Canada were elected? It would not be very long before we would be initiating money Bills. We would demand that privilege. We would be the representatives of the people just as much as the members in the House of Commons and, practically with the same right to share in the distribution of patronage, and the disbursement of the revenue. I mean to say that from the disbursements of the revenue they would claim the right to share in the distribution of patronage, and the result of that would be a frequency of deadlocks between this House and the Lower House.

Looking back over the debates which took place at confederation, I most confess to a great admiration for the statesmen of that day. They were foreseeing. They had studied the constitution of the United States then. They had studied the constitution of the Senate of Rome. They had studied the constitution of various Senates throughout the world, including the House of Lords, and there is no parallel between the House of Lords or the United States Senate practically, and the senators of the Dominion of Canada. The Senate of the Dominion of Canada was created here and adapted to the requirements and to the needs of this country as they found it at that time, and now, after very nearly 40 years experience, I do not know that any one can say that it has worked unfavourably, either in the making of the laws or in any way derogatory to the interests of the people. Whom have we here in the Senate? It is sometimes said that we are a privileged class. It is quite true that our debates here are not reported by the press, and for a very good and sufficient reason. We do not have the debating to do that is done in the House of Commons. We do not set ourselves up in opposition, or we do not put ourselves into competition as it were with the House of Commons, because we know that there they initiate all the money Bills, and, consequently, the debating between the parties, to a very large extent, must proceed in that House. Notwithstanding the fact that the Liberal party has a large majority here, yet we do not see any very great amount of party feeling. And who have we here representing the country? Notwithstanding the fact that we have not in this chamber the debatable subjects that are so interesting in the Lower House, we represent the country as a body as a legislative part of the machinery of the country equally as well as the House of Commons. My hon. friend this afternoon stated very correctly that we have representatives here of every class. We have representatives of the farming, commercial, the legal, the capitalistic, and labour interests. We have stout defenders of labour in this House, and we sometimes hear from the House of Commons—we heard one member of the House of Commons not long ago, casting a certain amount of aspersion upon the capitalists of this House. We want all these classes represented in the Senate. We need the capitalist just as much as we want the farmer. We want his advice and we want his counsel, but we cannot expect any man who is at the head of a great railway property, who is at the head of a great banking institution, or who is at the head of a great insurance company, who has a dozen irons in the fire in all parts of the country, men who have stimulated the growth of Canada through their enterprise, and given employment to thousands and thousands of men,—we cannot expect these representatives to be always in their seats in this Chamber. But they are here a great deal of the time, and a great deal oftener than one would expect them to be here—not as often as those of us who have smaller enterprises, and who can come here and remain here, knowing our small business will still go ahead. How much better off would we be if we had a professor from the university as an appointment to this House, supposing we had a university represented? Have we not universities represented here? Have we not now a dozen professors of universities who are just as much in touch with their Alma Mater as they ever were, and just as much defenders of their Alma Mater as they ever were? I say these gentlemen who represent universities and hold university diplomas are just as much if not more capable for the work than professors out of universities, who have no knowledge whatever of the practical work of legislating. The men who are reported here are generally men who are familiar with legislation to a very large degree. Therefore, I do not see that we can gain any great advantage in appointing from these separate classes, simply for the reason that the Senate of Canada is not the House of Lords. The House of Lords is comprised of 600 members. They are of the nobility—all one class. The old Senate of Rome was first constituted by the King appointing 100 members out of their patrician families, and the number was afterwards increased to 200. These men were simply one class. Under the republic it was changed to a certain extent, and some other classes came in, but, when it got back under the rule of emperors again the Senate was again recruited from the patrician class, simply because they just allowed the emperors to make the laws, and the Senate of that day became practically useless, practically representatives without any votes as it were, only to confirm or record the degrees of the emperor; but in this Senate we have no class of that kind. I think the governments in this country, the preceding Conservative government and the present Liberal government, have made appointments that will commend themselves to all classes of the community. Referring again to the United States Senate, what has been the effect of the election of the senators through their local legislatures? The effect has practically been this; that the U. S. Senate is constituted of men who have been practically above and apart from the people, through the great corporations and trusts of that country that they have been continually promoting. While they are able men, they have been to a very large extent politicians. Could such a thing as occurred in the Senate of the United States occur in the Senate of Canada? For seventeen years they have burked a Bill called the Pure Foods Bill. For seventeen years that Bill has been passed every year in the House of Congress, and when it reaches the Senate it is burked, and why? Because the committees of the Senate all sit in secret. Not like the Railway or other Committees here, except the Divorce Committee, where everybody is permitted to attend. Every committee of the United States Senate sits by itself, and, practically, in secret. No outsider ever goes there, and the result is that by collusion between different members, Bills are burked and cut off. What has been the result of burking the Pure Foods Bill for seventeen years? We see it reported in all our papers. Look at the condition of the packing houses in Chicago? Look at the poison that the people of the United States and the people of Canada have been taking into their systems, because there is no government inspection whatever at these packing houses. Three years ago we passed a Railway Bill in this Chamber, and we did it in one session. We inaugurated a system of railway supervision and regulation of rates, and we put that into force, and it is working splendidly at the present time. It was only during the past session of the Senate of the United States, although their Interstate Commerce Committee Bill was passed many years ago, that they have been able to incorporate a clause in that measure giving power to the commission to regulate the rates on freight. What we have put through our House of Commons and Senate in one session without opposition, without any collusion, without any one being barnacled, but for the general good of the whole community, they have tried years and years in the United States with their elective Senate to carry out, and have only succeeded recently in doing.

They have now, I believe, carried, and only upon the very strongest urgency of the president of the United States, that Act and given the Inter-state Commerce Commission power to regulate freight rates. Now these are what constitute reasons why we should not depart from the good, safe and sound principle of nominating members to this House so long as the government, in doing so, maintain the parity of the different classes of the people. These are reasons why we should not go over to a system which we know has not worked well, so far as the United States Senate is concerned, and that is the only Senate we can compare this House with. We can not compare this Chamber with the House of Lords. The House of Lords is a hereditary body. It makes no difference whether out of its 600 members 550 are Liberals or Conservatives; every man who is a nobleman has a seat in that House. Then we are told that there are too many senators in this House. In the United States Senate there are 90 members, but there are 600 in the House of Lords in England. The Senate of France has 300 members; the Senate of Italy has 400 members, and the senates of various other countries I could mention, have anywhere from 100 up to 400 and 500 members. So that, taking it all in all, the size of our Senate and any additional cost its numbers entail upon the country is hardly worth while discussing. Because taking the size of our country, its length and breadth, 85 Senators are after all a very moderate number, and I do not think there can be much exception taken to the number in this House. I do not know that I have any suggestion in particular to offer. So far as the Senate itself is concerned, it seems to me that we are about as well constituted as it is possible to make an upper House. As my hon. friend has said, everything human is defective. The Senate, of course, is a human institution and has its defects and always will have them. If our newspapers could get away from a certain flippancy which they indulge in about the Senate, perhaps the public would esteem this House a good deal more than they do. I do not believe that the people themselves realize the value of the Senate to the country. If they could know the work that is done here, the painstaking revision the Bills receive when they come to us from the lower House, I think they would regard the Senate in a far different light from what they do.

We sometimes feel that perhaps we do not have quite all the work we would like to do. We do all the work there is to be done and we cannot be blamed if we would take a couple of weeks for an adjournment now and then while waiting for work to come up to us from the Lower House. We allow the House of Commons two, three, or even four months to debate a single measure. The Franchise Bill that came here so late three years ago was discussed in the House of Commons for over a month, and when the Autonomy Bills were up last year we know the discussion that took place on them. I for one am not averse to these discussions. I believe that liberty is dependent upon a free and untrammelled discussion in the House of Commons. We sometimes feel that the speeches there are occasionally prosy, too long, and not to the point; but we could be in a great deal worse position.

In the United States there is not one man in 100,000 who ever reads the speeches delivered by the members of their congress. The newspapers there do not report them; they are simply printed in the Congressional Record and very often speeches are put in that record without having been delivered at all. The people in that country do not know anything about the workings of their Senate. The members of Congress and Senate know that, and, consequently, they are not amenable to public opinion. The proceedings of Congress are not followed closely there except when some great fraud is exposed such as the meat packing frauds that we hear of to-day and such as we heard of during the Spanish war. What was the report that was made by General Miles at that time? That four thousand soldiers had died from eating embalmed beef prepared in Chicago, put up without any supervision or inspection, indeed without any law to prevent fraud. We have nothing of that kind in Canada. That is one point where our system of responsible government shows its superiority. Our government, which is responsible to the people, must exercise, through the Department of Inland Revenue, care to prevent such dishonesty in all parts of the country. But in the United States, at times of special excitement, they find that the government have not been paying very much attention to what is going on. The average American knows nothing about his congress. There is scarcely a man or woman in Canada who is not reading the speeches delivered in the House of Commons and the people would read the speeches of the Senate if they were published by the press. They all understand what is going on in parliament. The House of Commons is just as sensitive to public opinion in Canada as it is possible for a legislature to be, because they know that the people are intelligent, and that everything is being done to keep affairs in a good condition. Looking at all these things I am led to believe that there is not very much prospect of improving the constitution of the Senate. There is one drawback, I admit. The one drawback in the Senate is that when a government is very long in power it places its own friends in these seats until, perhaps, the representation of the opposite party almost vanishes. That was so under the late government, and it may be so under the present government, but I am bound to say, as I did at the beginning of these remarks, that there was not so much partisanship after all as is reported. There never was a money Bill thrown out. Some Bills have been burked and vetoed, and, probably, it will happen again but every Senator in this House knows that he has been placed to a large extent above the partisanship that prevails in the other House. He knows he is in a position to rise above party, and it would be paying a very poor compliment to our Senators were we to charge them with the extreme partisanship that is to be found, perhaps, in the House of Commons. We are to a large extent above and beyond its influence, and we can afford to discuss all measures which come before us upon their merits. We need not be amenable altogether to the government or party, except as our own best judgment and wisdom guide us, and I think, as a general rule, the senators come to that conclusion. Looking around upon these benches, I realize that we have men here, as my hon. friend said a few minutes ago, who would grace any Senate in the world. We have scores of men here who are thoroughly competent; men of experience; men of political wisdom and sagacity, thoroughly familiar with all the cross and counter currents that are passing to and fro throughout the country, and men who know how to detect wrong. When it cannot be done in the House of Commons it is done here, and it is usually very well done. We know that the House of Commons, as a rule accepts every amendment made to their measures by this House. I would say, that we need not expect any great degree of success in going to the imperial parliament to obtain an amendment to the British North America Act in the way of changing either the mode of selecting the members of this House or in any other particular that might perhaps be suggested. To my way of thinking, the Senate is at present about as well constituted as it could be. The very first question which they would ask us in England would be this: Canada was comprised of a lot of disunited provinces when you came here in 1866. Where are you today under the present constitution of the House of Commons and the Senate? We would naturally tell them we had prospered beyond anything we could ever have expected. There has been no check to the prosperity of this country and the way it is growing at present is beyond anything we could have expected. They would say to us: All that has happened under the constitution that we gave you in 1866, and under such circumstances as these, the House of Lords would certainly ask what changes we required and why we were asking for them. If we were to reply that we would like to have our Senators elected, they would say: 'Look at the United States. You don't want to have anything like that surely? You are under a responsible, monarchial system of government, you are carrying on a democracy under a system of responsible government, which we believe insures life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness to a far better and higher degree than anything under a republican form of government could do, and we think, therefore, you ought to be contented as you are.' For my part I contend that we must be contented. If there is a little disparity in representation between the parties occasionally, the people will set that right in due time. In the meantime the majority will necessarily have to endeavour to rise above partisanship and deal with the masures which come before this House on their merits and so decide.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. FROST—When the House rose for recess I was endeavouring to show that it was better for us to stand by the ills that we have rather than fly to those we know not of. There is only one remark that I desire to make before I resume my seat. Ten minutes before six o'clock I could have made the point and been through with my speech. I was endeavouring to show that the Senate was the keystone of the arch of confederation. It was by the mutual concessions of all the fathers of confederation that it was finally brought about, and to-day we see the effect of the splendid work which these men did. There has never been any quarrel between the Senate and the House of Commons; there has never been a word that I know of between the two Houses; we have always worked together in harmony, good feeling and goodwill, no matter whether the majority in the Senate corresponded with the minority in the House of Commons or vise versa. But there is one point which in my closing remarks I desire most especially to call attention to. The confederation certainly solidified the power of British connection upon the North American continent, because if we remember the condition of affairs in 1866, our provinces were at swords points with one another. The reciprocity treaty had been abrogated by the American government, and hostile tariffs were being built up against us, so much so that some of our leading men felt perhaps that there might be a possibility at least of some of the provinces entering the United States union. There was then an indifference on the part of British statesmen, and there was more than one statesman at that period who openly stated that they did not care whether Canada left Great Britain or not. This is a matter of history, a matter that is of record. Now what was the result of confederation? I think it is proper while discussing this question that we should give the province of Quebec that justice which belonged to her in bringing about the confederation of these great provinces on the northern half of this continent. It was through mutual concession. It was through the giving in in regard to the representation that was to be in the new parliament that we really concluded the scheme of confederation. Had it not been so, it is very difficult to state at this moment what the condition of these disunited provinces would have been. I hardly think any one to-day could possibly make any definite statement as to what this country would have been. However, the dangers that threatened were happily averted, and it is now our proud privilege, after forty years of confederation, to see our country solidly united upon the platform of British connection and a corresponding pride in that connection also, in the motherland. The fathers of confederation, nearly all of of them, have passed away and gone to their reward. One or two are still left, but it would be casting a reproach, I say, on them if we, as a Senate, should begin any agitation whatever looking to the unsettling of an institution for which all have worked so well and which has so vitally contributed to the unity and material prosperity of our whole Dominion.

It is true that the Senate has no jurisdiction over money Bills, and it is a wise provision, I believe. One House is enough to originate money Bills. If we had the privilege of originating them in this House, with all the additional prestige it would give us in the country, there is no doubt we would have conflict between the two Houses which, happily, has not occurred during all these 40 years. Then again, were the senators to be elected by the legislatures, a claim would be set up by this House very soon for the disbursement of the moneys, and that would lead to a claim for the distribution of patronage. We do not want to get ourselves into the position of senators in the United States. We know that there are good and true men in the United States Senate, but there are others there who are the servants of gigantic monopolies and trusts which have been inimical to the welfare of the people of that great country, and they have used their power as against the people and against what they were elected for by the states, to a very large extent in the interest of these corporations and in the interest of themselves. The corporations always re-elect these men. The names of many members now in the United States Senate will occur to hon. gentleman, men who have been re-elected time after time by the railway companies and by the gigantic trusts that are to be found throughout the United States. Some objection is made to life appointments. I do not think that it has proved to be a very bad system after all. What is there very bad about it? The life members have done their duty in the Senate faithfully, some of them for 40 years. At times, in the past and at the present moment, there is and has been a disparity between the parties, but that is inevitable. We must look for that and trust that it will be remedied in the future ; but there is this to be said, that where men are appointed for life they ought to be, and I think they generally prove themselves to be in this Senate, on both sides of politics, above mere party lines which exist in the House of Commons and the parties throughout the country. I believe the Senate has risen to a very great extent above partyism. In the four years that I have occupied a seat in this House I have seen very little evidence of partyism either in the committees, or in the Senate itself. Consequently I do not know that that argument can be set set up as a very serious objection to the appointment of senators for life. The government that appoints these senators has the confidence of the people. The senators are practically elected by the people, for the government always have the confidence of the majority of the country ; otherwise they would not have the power to appoint senators and, while the government is in power, the men that it appoints are practically speaking the choice of the people, and would be elected by the people, perhaps, under any circumstances—either these men or men of the same political stripe.

There would be nothing to gain as far as I can see by changing the mode of appointment, while the present system gives a permanency and solidity to the Senate and enables it to rise above party strife and party tactics. In all these years no appointment, as far as I know, has been successfully attacked. There may have been appointments that offended some individuals, but the principle, and even the appointees themselves have not at any time been very successfully attacked since confederation. We have had one continuous line of patriotic men, men of ability and integrity. There is not to-day in this Senate, a single member, and I believe I know them all—who is under the control of any railway, trust, corporation or any other such institution ; and that being the case, I do not think the outside public or any interest in the country could successfully attack the principle of appointing members of this House or attack the individual senators themselves. Therefore, it would not perhaps be to the advantage of the country that we should change the mode of appointment. I am not going to speak on the question of the age limit of senators. We have all heard with a great deal of pleasure, and I think we can all endorse, the sentiments of speakers who have already referred to some of our aged senators. We know very well that some of the most able and distinguished men in Canada to-day are well up in years, and, nevertheless, are quite competent to fulfil the functions and duties pertaining to their office. Because one, two or three senators might be, through infirmity, unable to respond as promptly to the work of this House as younger men, it would be doing an injustice to ourselves, it would be suicidal to-day that because of that we should change the whole mode of appointment. I am very glad to know that no memorials or petitions of any kind have ever come before the government looking toward the abolition of this Chamber. In the first place, it would be a violation of the compact entered into at confederation. In the second place it would deprive the smaller provinces of that protection which they have a right to expect from this Chamber in all matters where their rights, privileges or liberties are in any wise jeopardized. We are here amid all the contentions and strife of parties, and the clashings which take place in the labour, business and commercial world, to stoutly oppose any interference with the rights and privileges of any class, creed, people or province; and I believe that in case anything should be done to menace these rights in any way, the people of Canada would soon discover how effectually the Senate could act. We could not then, as I have already stated, apply to the imperial parliament, because we could not ask with any show of reason, for an amendment to the British North America Act in the face of the prosperity which this country now enjoys. Let us therefore as a Senate, representing the people—we are not representing any aristocratic class, but we hope that we are representing the whole people—show that we are desirous of doing justice to all classes. Let us do our work, as far as in us lies, above party feelings and party contention, and do it in a way that will meet with the approbation of the public; and I for one have no fear that, when all the facts are known in regard to what the Senate has done in the past, and what it is doing to-day for the country, the people will take a pride in the Senate and learn to look upon it as an important factor in the safety and steadiness of legislation and as being one of the bulwarks of the constitution; and that this House stands for the maintenance of our connection with the motherland and its institutions, of which we, in common with all the people of Canada to-day, are so proud.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not intend to trouble the Senate with a very long speech on the motion of the hon. senator from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. David), although I fully admit the importance of the subject and the opportuneness of this discussion, because I consider it reasonably certain from some remarks lately made by ministers of the Crown in another place in reference to this body that we are on the eve of far-reaching constitutional changes in this branch of parliament, and also because I think some such changes are imperatively demanded, in the interest of good government, and in order to bring this House more into touch with public opinion in this country than it is at the present time, or indeed has been at any time in the past during its existence. The subject is one to which every member of this House must have given some thought, and on which he must have formed some conclusions, and I consider there should be a full and frank interchange of opinion among us on a topic that cannot be otherwise than very interesting to all of us.

I had not the good fortune to hear the opening address of the hon. mover of the resolution, but I read it of course and found it was thoughtful and eloquent as his utterances always are in this House. I did, however, have the benefit, and perhaps I ought to add the pleasure, but I cannot say pleasure unalloyed, of listening to the interesting speech of the right hon. minister who followed him. Although much of the hon. minister's address was rather vague and visionary and aimed at unattainable ideals, yet these flights of imagination could not be displeasing to any one. As an oratorical effort the hon. gentleman's speech was equal to his reputation, but as a practical attempt at the solution of grave constitutional difficulties it was not satisfactory—in fact, it was rather disappointing. He called attention to all sorts of theoretical defects in our governmental system, but did not offer a clear-cut, tangible remedy for any one of them. Perhaps this reticence was largely due to the ministerial responsibility under which he spoke, and which he took pains to disclaim at the outset of his speech. It is on this account all the more to be regretted that the hon. gentleman was so outspoken in other respects, that he thought it necessary to drag into this debate some irritating subjects of party politics, which did not help his main object in any way, for we were all prepared to listen with deference to the opinions of a public man of his ability and experience on any serious political problem such as that under consideration, when not marred, as his remarks certainly were, by injudicious party acerbities. My hon. friend from Queen's (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) has given all the answer that some of the hon. minister's criticisms seemed to him to require, and I venture to predict that the rejoinder will be complete when my hon. friend from Belleville (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) gets the floor in this debate.

For my own part, I desire only to say, that the members of the Liberal-Conservative party in this Chamber can look back with pride to the moderation, justice and patriotism that invariably animated their conduct, whether in power or opposition, in the discharge of their duties in this House, and I am going to waste no time to-day in adducing proofs in support of this assertion, for the facts are on record—they are matters of history, and speak for themselves.

But, although agreeing with all that has been said by the hon. member for Queen's in defence of the Senate under Conservative rule, and even of the general magnanimity of the Conservative party, and its freedom from factiousness in its days of ascendency in this House, I am nevertheless far more in accord, but by no means completely so, with the right. hon. minister in respect to what ought to be the basic principles in the formation of this Chamber, than I am with my hon. friend. The hon. senator from Queen's has gone to much trouble to furnish us with actuarial calculations in support of his views, for which he deserves our thanks, although I have not implicit faith in the absolute correctness of any actuarial figures on the subject to which he has applied them. As his contentions, however, have relation more to the question of adequate party representation in this Chamber, I will postpone my references to that subject until further on in my remarks; but I wish to say at once that many of my hon. friend's actuarial calculations seemed to me very fallacious and very misleading.

In suggesting any constitutional changes in relation to this Senate, the first question we have to ask ourselves is, how far are we at liberty to alter or amend the British North America Act, 1867, in regard to this Chamber, as a fundamental provision or compromise of the union compact embodied in that Act? Most of us are old enough to remember, and the right hon. minister certainly is among the number, for he briefly referred to the subject the other day—the fierce war that raged at the time of confederation between Upper and Lower Canada on the question of representation by population, or as it was then called 'Rep. by Pop.'—with the racial and religious antipathies of both sides well in the fray. Lower Canada would never have consented to enter the union with the concession of representation by population to Upper Canada, unless it had secured a countervailing representation in the Senate much out of proportion to its population. Neither would the smaller maritime provinces, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, for many reasons, too numerous to mention, ever have agreed to be swamped in the popular branch by the larger provinces in any scheme of union, but for the safeguards to their special interest secured in the form of larger representation in this body than they were entitled to by population. The Senate, therefore, as at present constituted, was a fundamental compromise of the contract of federation. As I said the other day, there would have been no confederation without it. It was the only possible solution of the troubles of Upper and Lower Canada in those days. Some unthinking people either do not seem to know, or if they know, do not always seem to remember, that to abolish this Senate, without filling its place in some other way, would be morally to dissolve the compact of union—with all the inevitable consequences of political dissolution—a result, I am sure, no one now desires to see effected.

While, however, we cannot in justice to the old provinces, abolish this Senate, without providing an equivalent substitute for it— as such a step, I repeat, would be nothing less than revolutionary—I do not deny that this parliament, with the consent of all the old provinces that were parties to the original contract, and with the sanction of the imperial parliament, may, so long as we have due regard to the fundamental compromises of the Union Act, amend or alter the constitution of this Senate, if deemed desirable to do so.

As, therefore, our federal scheme of government and the bi-cameral compact under which it exists, in my opinion, render a second Chamber absolutely indispensable in the governmental system of Canada, it may be unnecessary to ask, is the existence of a second Chamber justified on its intrinsic merits as an entity in the body politic ? But if such an inquiry is made, we can do nothing better or safer than to refer to the example of the most enlightened nations of the world, whether monarchical or republican, and we will find, first, our nearest neighbour, the greatest republic the world has ever seen, certainly one of the most advanced in political science, and one of the most democratic, as well as Great Britain, truly called the mother of parliaments, France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Switzerland—all answer in the affirmative. Even Russia, just emerging from semi-civilization, if not actual serfdom, recognizes the necessity of a second chamber, at the very threshold of her political freedom and higher national life. I would say to the right hon. minister in allusion to his learned disquisition on the subject, that the contract of union contained in the British North America Act in regard to this Chamber, is a simple contract, and we do not require great political thinkers or learned casuists to enlighten us upon it.

But it is said the province of Ontario, the premier province of the Dominion, as it likes to be called and deserves to be called, wants to abolish this Senate—wants to break faith with Quebec and the maritime provinces on a fundamental compromise of the compact of union—wants a single chamber for the whole Dominion ; in other words wants to set up its own opinion against that of all the civilized nations of the world on a great constitutional question. I do not believe it. I do not believe it is true, that the intelligent judgment of Ontario wants to do anything so unjust and dishonourable; but if such is the case the premier province should be warned in time of the possible and even probable consequences. Such a step on the part of Ontario would endanger the whole fabric of confederation.

The pertinent inquiry we now have to meet—the practical question for parliament at the present time is, has experience shown, that the Senate of this Dominion, as at present constituted, has proved a failure ; and is a change required in the method of its construction ? I think we are at liberty to go that far afield. While I contend that this Chamber in the early days of confederation was a decided success, and served admirably the purposes of its creation, I have no hesitation in admitting, that for many years—even many years before the change of government in 1896, I had come to the conclusion, that the nominative principle, as now applicable to this House, was a failure, and that some change was absolutely necessary to bring this body not merely theoretically as, for instance, through election by the provincial legislatures, into touch with public opinion, but to make it either wholly or in a very large proportion of its members, directly responsible to the electorate.

I am not going to trouble the House in an academical discussion like the present with the reasons that have led me to this conclusion, but if I were dealing practically with the subject as a question of legislation, I think, with my long experience in this Chamber, I could easily give reasons for my opinion, which might not be unworthy of the attention of this House. I think, however, it will be time enough to do this when we have some practical measure of legislation before us. But I may go so far on the present occasion as to express my conviction, that the weakness of this Senate in public estimation is due chiefly to the nominative principle in its construction—its non-representative character and want of popular sympathy—its immunity from direct responsibility to the people, in a word, that we are an irresponsible body, and do not speak or act with authority from the people. It cannot be truthfully denied that the average estimate of the ability and intelligence of this Senate has always been as high as that of any other legislative body in the Dominion, and its earnest desire to do its whole duty to the country has ever been unquestionable, in the mind of every fair and truthful critic; yet it has always been subject to bitter partizan hostility.

I was surprised at the speeches of my two hon. friends, who spoke to-day, and who are prominent members of the Liberal party, in which this Senate was lauded as the very perfection of political institutions, when I recollected that before the Liberal party came into power this Chamber was denounced everywhere by that party on political platforms and in parliament, as worse than useless; as an excrescence on the body politic; as an unjustifiable expense, which the country should not be compelled to endure. Nearly every public man in the Liberal ranks, of any standing, declared himself against the Senate as at present constituted; and the press, from the leading organ of the party in Toronto down to the humblest village sheet, never had a good word to say for this House. All were unanimous in condemning this Chamber as useless and unnecessary, as not worth its cost, and as an institution that would certainly be abolished or amended, as soon as the Liberal party obtained power.

But more than all this the great Liberal party of Canada in 1893 held a convention at which it framed its policy for the ensuing general election. One of the leading planks in that platform was the abolition or amendment of the Senate. It is true there has been no attempt to amend or abolish it since the advent to power of the present government, but we lately had an intimation from the hon. Minister of Finance, in the other House, that this duty would be shortly undertaken. I say, therefore, that so far as the government supporters in this House are concerned, it should be unnecessary, even if I felt disposed to do so, to adduce reasons to show that some amendment of the constitution is desirable in regard to this body. My hon. friend from Smith's Falls (Hon. Mr. Frost), who last addressed the Senate with so much force and clearness, and who came into this House through the dignified way of a transfer from the Commons, was unmeasured in his laudation of this Chamber. I would like to ask my hon. friend, if when he was seeking a seat in the House of Commons, he had indulged in such an eulogy of the Senate as he did to-day, would it have improved his chances of election to that House, or would it not rather have effectually destroyed them?

Before going further, I wish to say a few words in reference to the House of Commons, as it is impossible to avoid some modest criticism of that House, when considering Senate reform. I agree with all that has been said in regard to the inadequacy and injustice of the existing system of representation in the House of Commons to which particular reference has been made—its injustice to minorities. But I go further—I do not think the elective franchises of the various provinces are now what they ought to be under representation by population. Manhood suffrage for the House of Commons is the legitimate corollary—the logical sequence of representation by population. It is true, the Franchise Acts of all the old provinces, while complicated, troublesome and expensive, yet come very near to universal suffrage, but with many unjust omissions and defects. I think that the popular branch of parliament in Canada, under a bi-cameral system, should be elected by manhood suffrage, pure and simple—of course, British citizenship by birth or naturalization being an indispensable qualification—and with limitations only with respect to residence, crime and pauperism.

With a House of Commons elected on such a basis, I think two-thirds of the Senate should be directly chosen by the people at the polls, on a moderate but substantial property qualification, consisting of real or personal estate, or both combined; the other third to be appointed by the government. The right hon. minister told us he was oppposed to the election of senators directly by the people, but with consistent vagueness, he did not tell us in what other way he would have them elected or selected, and I therefore suppose he meant by the provincial legislatures, to which I have strong objections. In any case, I would have no fancy qualifications, or class preferences, which might suit very well in old countries on the other side of the Atlantic, but are altogether out of place in the democratic atmosphere of this continent. I would let ex-governors, ex-cabinet ministers, ex-judges, and university professors take their chances like other candidates, either with the electors or the government of the day, and let the latter bear the responsibility of their selection or appointment. The right hon. gentleman would evidently like to get an aristocratic Senate of some kind, showing that he has not completely got rid of his old Tory ideals, notwithstanding his long association with the Liberal party.

If I understood the right hon. minister correctly, the chief objection to the direct application of the elective principle to the Senate is that we already have too many elections in Canada. Here I differ from him entirely. Whatever may be its defects, and it is an old adage that nothing human is perfect, the elective system is the best for the self-government of a free people that earthly wisdom or ingenuity has yet discovered or devised, and we have not yet arrived at that stage when we can truly say we have too much of it in Canada. But an elected Senate or a partially elected Senate should not put us to any serious trouble or expense in the way of elections. An elective or partially elective Senate need only require a general election every eight or ten years—I would say every eight years —according to the term of office fixed by law. All vacancies in the elected body for an unexpired term, in consequence of death or resignation, might be filled by the local legislatures, and thus avoid the necessity for a revision of the voters' list, excepting at the end of every senatorial term, only once in every eight or ten years. In all cases senators should be eligible for re-election or reappointment, with only the restrictions in respect to qualification or disqualification now imposed by law, that is by the British North America Act, 1867.

I agree with the right hon. minister that this Senate is now too large and might safely be reduced in number, but not to one-half its present strength as he suggests. I believe there is as much danger to the public weal in making a second chamber too small as there is inconvenience in making it too large, and the inconvenience to be avoided in too large a Senate is less to be feared than the danger involved in one too small. I consider the Senate of the United States is too small a body—and we have proof of it every day—for a nation that now exceeds 80,000,000 and will shortly exceed 100,000,000 of people, and the great powers invested in that body are not fairly balanced or distributed.

In forming a reconstructed Senate for Canada I would give Ontario 15 members, Quebec 15 members, the Atlantic provinces 15 members, and 15 members to the Northwest and British Columbia, which would be 60 in all. But as we must expect a great expansion of population in the Northwest, I think provision should be made in the amended constitution for giving the Northwest a further increase from time to time, with the understanding that the Senate should not exceed 75 members. Such a Senate as I have sketched would be a body more representative of the people than this House at the present time, and should be satisfactory to all classes, as it would be on all occasions, both in calm and stress, in thorough touch with public opinion.

As to the question of age qualification for election or appointment to the Senate, I would leave the law as it is at present. A man who is not fit for the office of senator at thirty years of age is not likely to be ever fit for the position. The younger Pitt, long the idol of his country, much before he arrived at the age of thirty was Prime Minister of England, in one of the stormiest periods of English history, and I certainly would not exclude any Canadian at thirty from the Senate of Canada on account of his youth.

I am also opposed to any old age limit that could be applied to members of this Chamber. It might work beneficially in rare cases, but I am satisfied the cases would be very rare and exceptional indeed —not enough to justify any inflexible rule on the subject. What are the facts in relation to this point in the Senate to-day? We have one nonagenarian and several octogenarians now members of this House, and who will say that most of them are not among the brightest minds among us—only over-ripe in knowledge and experience? Lord Lyndhurst, when much beyond eighty years of age, made one of the most brilliant speeches of his great career, in defence of the rights and privileges of the House of Lords, in connection with 'The Paper Duties Bill'—a speech which, whether right or wrong in theory, is an epoch-mark in the annals of that illustrious legislative body, and it also marked a new fiscal departure in the House of Commons. The late Senator Wark, with judgment unimpaired, attended his last session in this House, after he had passed the century mark. The electorate on the one hand, and the government on the other, might be trusted generally to keep senile imbecility out of this Chamber—although either may occasionally make a mistake in this respect.

It has always been a great cause of complaint among members of the Senate that enough legislation is not introduced here to give employment to senators, especially in the early days of the session, and by thus relieving the pressure on the House of Commons, shorten the period of our stay in Ottawa. It has been contended, that all private legislation, and many of the government measures, might just as well be introduced in this House. In the early days of confederation, I took an active part in an agitation in that direction, but with the best intentions on the part of the Liberal-Conservative leaders in the Senate, the movement had little success. As nearly all the ministers, and sometimes every one of them with portfolios, were in the House of Commons, each and all of them preferred to introduce the Bills of the various departments in the Chamber to which they belonged, and could not be persuaded to do otherwise. Then as to private Bills, originating among the people, the latter were more in communication with their representatives in the popular branch than with the life-appointed members of the Senate, and naturally placed their private legislation in their hands. But if two-thirds of the members of the Senate were sent to this House by the electorate, this state of things would be completely changed. The relations between the electors and the elected senators, would become more intimate and practical, and as a consequence much private legislation would be entrusted to the elected members of this House. Then a few necessary alterations in the rules of both Houses, might accomplish all that would be necessary to attain the end desired. The outlook at any rate would be much more hopeful than it is at present; but I do not think it would be wise to seek, in any other form or direction, larger powers of legislation than we now possess, and if we did, the strong probability is the effort would prove futile. The careful revision of legislation,—and the consequent check on all bad or hasty legislation, must always be the chief duty of this Senate, and for these purposes alone, it will always be worth infinitely more than it costs.

I now desire to say something about the important questions of party representation and probable deadlocks between the two Houses, to which my hon. friend from Queen's devoted much of his elaborate argument yesterday. In regard to the first of these questions, that is, party representation, I consider that the nominative system has been and always will be an utter failure, and with reference to the latter, namely, deadlocks, there is no provision at all in our constitutional Act. I cannot understand, how my hon. friend does not see, that any scheme whatever, based, in whole or in part, on the election of Senators, either by the local legislatures, or directly by the people, must not inevitably give fairer party representation than the present system of governmental appointment. I think the proposition is self evident, and I am surprised to hear it disputed. With a good majority now, the present government will have a much larger majority in this House three years hence. Then suppose that the Liberal party is successful at the polls at the next general election, what will be the result in this Chamber? The government will have a majority in this House of over fifty or sixty before the end of their fourth term? The Conservative party will be practically annihilated before the end of another term, and it would require at least twenty-five years of power to regain a majority in this body under the present system. It would not take half that time to acquire ascendency, either under the scheme of the hon. minister or my own, if the party in the minority in this House had public opinion outside in its favour, and if it had not, what harm would it do to let it stay in the minority in this Chamber? And I cannot see any attempt at gerrymander in the scheme of the right hon. minister, but to my mind it is much more rational than are the Utopian propositions of my hon. friend. Then as to the suggestion of allowing the leader of the opposition to have a share in senatorial appointments in proportion to the strength of his party in the House of Commons which is a thoroughly Utopian idea, for which I think my hon. friend from Queen's would be almost entitled to a patent——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, in proportion to the strength in the country.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—How are you to ascertain the strength in the country?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—By the electoral vote.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That would be in the House of Commons, would it not?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—How are you to know what the strength of the country would be except by the result of the elections to the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The difference my hon. friend will see; in Nova Scotia there were 46,000 Conservative votes and there was not a man elected.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I see what the hon. gentleman means. He means as shown on the electoral list in a general election contest?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I say it is equally unreasonable and Utopian. Why not go further and make the leader of the opposition —now that we have given him a minister's salary—a member of the cabinet to advise on senatorial appointments, if not, on all state affairs? Then Canada would present to the world the model of a Utopia—the like of which never entered into even the loftiest dreams of Sir Thomas More.

But a majority in both Houses is not an absolute necessity in carrying on the affairs of government. Majorities in second chambers all over the world generally respect the trend of public opinion as expressed by the popular branch. No Liberal government in England ever has a majority in the House of Lords, and no Liberal premier, no matter how large his majority in the House of Commons, expects a party majority in the Upper House. But this does not render government impossible in England, although it may be inconvenient and annoying occasionally.

If an Upper Chamber, such as the Senate of Canada, showed undue factiousness, is there no way of overcoming the difficulty then presented? I think there is, and that we have it clearly defined in the constitution of the Australian Commonwealth, namely, a joint vote of the two Houses, after a dissolution of the Lower Chamber, if the government thought proper to enforce such a test. This provision of the Australian law might easily be included, in our amended Constitutional Act. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, if I am not mistaken, is on record as favouring this alternative, as a solution of the deadlock contingency.

These are some of my views on this important subject, expressed as concisely as in my power, and without any attempt at elaboration, and also without any reference to many important details, which will require the most careful consideration. I freely express them, because as I have already said I believe every member of this House, who has given any thought to the subject should afford the Senate the benefit of his conclusions, as in the multitude of the counsellors there is wisdom as well as safety.

It has been said there is no need of haste in effecting any change, and it is no doubt always better in important matters to proceed with caution and deliberation, but for my own part I consider the subject one of urgency, because the sooner it is attempted, the fewer difficulties will be encountered, and all the more easily our task accomplished. I hope therefore, that the government will next session grapple with this grave question, and settle it in a manner that will elicit the approval and gratitude, not of one party alone, but of the whole people of Canada, as well as all others, who desire the stability and success of free and efficient political institutions, under a constitutional monarchy, on this continent.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow, to be the last Order of the Day.

Senate then adjourned until to-morrow afternoon at three o'clock.

ALBERTA RAILWAY AND IRRIGATION COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière), from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (100) An Act respecting the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company without amendment, and moved that the Bill be read a third time to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. De VEBER—I move that the Bill be not read the third time to-morrow, but that it be referred back to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours for further consideration. I may state that a great many letters have been received from boards of trade in the part of the country from which I come and in which this railway is situated against the granting of an extension of time. I am not prepared to-day to state whether the extension should be given to the company or not. I wish to ascertain before it shall pass out of the committee, that the company are entitled to the extension, and I had an understanding—at least I considered I had an understanding—with the hon. gentleman who had charge of the Bill that it should not go through the committee until the solicitor of the company, Mr. Barwick, of Toronto, appears before the committee and gives reasons why the extension should be granted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Although the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert pointed out to the committee this morning that there were objections, the committee recommended that the prayer of the petition be granted. However, I am quite willing that the Bill should go back to the committee so that my hon. friend may have an opportunity there of making any representation he wishes. There is no objection to that whatever. I do not wish it to be understood, however, that it was reported from the committee through any breach of understanding with my hon. friend. It was understood that Mr. Barwick, who appears for the promoters of the Bill, would be here when it came before the committee. He did not appear, but the committee did not seem to desire any one to make representations as to the merits of the Bill, and consequently it went through. However, I am quite satisfied that it should go back to the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

FORDING VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière), from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (GG) An Act to incorporate the Fording Valley Railway Company, with amendments. He said: The principal amendment to this Bill is that the Board of Railway Commissioners are to be given in future, if necessary, further power in order to give running rights to other companies through parts of the country where the configuration is such that it would be very expensive or almost impossible to build a railway otherwise than by using the right of way of some existing line. With the leave of the House I move that these amendments be taken into consideration now, because this is a Bill originating in the Senate and it will have to go to the House of Commons. According to information received yesterday and to-day, it would appear that the session of parliament will be brought to a close in the near future. I, therefore, ask that the amendments be taken into consideration to-day.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—As I understand, it is not in order to proceed to consider amendments to a Bill which has just been reported. There are a half dozen other Bills in the same position. Why should this one be singled out specially?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I explained just now that this is the only one of these Bills originating in the Senate, and that it will have to go to the House of Commons, and I said that as there is a strong probability of the session drawing to a close shortly, it would be advisable to have this Bill sent to the House of Commons early next week.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I don't think that is a very good excuse. There must be something else.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It appears that the amendments to this Bill are considerable in their extent.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—No, no.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I heard the amendments read. I certainly am grateful to my hon. friend for saying 'no, no,' but I suppose I am able to grasp the effect of the amendments since I have just heard them read. I think the amendments are of considerable importance, and if the Bill is dealt with in its ordinary course it will be ready in ample time to go to the House of Commons for consideration. I understand perfectly well what the amendments are and the effects which will be produced. Let this Bill take its normal course. Let it be considered to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I may state that no objections were raised to the Bill in the committee this morning. The principal amendment is the clause reported from the subcommittee which is to be inserted in all these Bills. The only other amendment was one giving power to connect with another railway. There was no objection to the Bill in the committee, and for the reasons stated by the chairman I don't think any person should object——

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I object, and I would tell the hon. gentleman that this Bill was not even on the order paper this a.m. for consideration in the committee.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—That was an error on the part of some clerk. The hon. gentleman knows that the Bill should have been on the order paper. The rules were suspended three days ago in order that it might be placed on the order paper for consideration this a.m. If the hon. gentleman does not know that, he ought to know it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I object in any case.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ICE BREAKER 'MONTCALM.'

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Is it a fact that the removal of the copper bolts intended to screw the blades of the propeller to the shaft of the ship 'Montcalm' was ascertained in the spring of 1905, and that an inquiry was begun to find out the facts as to such removal ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was reported by the chief engineer of the ship to Mr. Gregory, the agent of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, in Quebec, that some bolts were stolen. The agent immediately started an inquiry and a detective was engaged to find out their whereabouts, but the inquiry is kept quiet at the detective's special request, no report having yet been made.

THE MILITARY COUNCIL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

I. What is the number of persons belonging to the various staffs of the military members of the Military Council of Canada, that is to say, to the staff of :

1. The chief of the general staff ;
2. The adjutant general ;
3. The quartermaster general ;
4. The master general of the ordnance.

II. How many Canadians of French origin are amongst this number ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers sent me are as follows :—

I. (1) Branch of the chief of the general staff : officers, 7. Subordinate staff, w.o. and n.c.os., 2.

(2) Branch of the adjutant-general : officers, 4 ; also one temporarily employed at headquarters, and 1 specially employed at Quebec. Subordinate staff, w.o. and n.c.os., 5.

(3) Branch of the quartermaster-general : officers, 3 ; and one officer temporarily. Subordinate staff, attached, warrant officers and n.c. officers, 3.

(4) Branch of the master-general of the ordnance : officers, 5 ; and 4 officers temporarily attached. Subordinate staff, w.o. and n.c.os., 2.

Total number of officers : 18 ; and 7 specially employed at the present time.

II. Of the above numbers, 2 officers and 1 n.c.o. are Canadians of French origin, all in the branch of the adjutant-general.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. What are the names of the present members of the Military Council of Canada, and what position does each of them occupy in the organization of that council ?
2. What position in the militia does each of the members of the said council occupy ?

3. What salary does each of the present members of the Military Council draw for the position which he occupies in the militia, and how much more does he receive as a member of the said council ?

4. What additional amounts has each of the said members received for travelling expenses, office expenses, rental, or for any other allowance or indemnity whatsoever, from the first of May, 1905, to the first of May, 1906 ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The replies sent me are :

1 and 2. Vice-president and civil member, Colonel L. F. Pinault, C.M.G., Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence. 1st military member, Major-General Percy Lake, C.B., C.M.G., p.s.c. Eng., chief of the general staff. 2nd military member, Colonel B. H. Vidal, adjutant-general. 3rd military member, Colonel D. A. Macdonald, I.S.O., quartermaster-general. 4th military member, Colonel W. H. Cotton, master-general of the ordnance. Finance member, Mr. J. W. Borden, accountant and paymaster-general.

3. Civil member paid $4,000 per annum as deputy minister ; 1st military member $6,000 as chief of the general staff ; 2nd military member $4,000 as adjutant-general; 3rd military member $4,000 as quartermaster-general ; 4th military member $4,000 as master-general of the ordnance ; finance member $2,800 as accountant and paymaster-general.

4. Travelling expenses : Deputy minister, $35.66 ; chief of the general staff, $239.70 ; adjutant-general, $140 ; quartermaster-general, $60 ; master-general of the ordnance, $161.64 ; accountant and paymaster-general, $90.

No other allowance or indemnity whatsoever, have been paid.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In No. 3, is there an amount given for the salary paid as member of the council ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I think not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Well, there is one.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know, I have not got it here.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the answer is not complete.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is probably covered by the last paragraph I have read.

THE NEW POSTMASTER GENERAL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Is it the Honourable Mr. Lemieux, member for Gaspé in the House of Commons or the Honourable Mr. Lemieux, member for Nicolet in the House of Commons, who has just been appointed Postmaster General ?

If it is the member for Gaspé who is the fortunate office-holder, in what position does the member for Nicolet then find himself ?

If, on the contrary, it is the member for Nicolet who has been appointed minister, what has the member for Gaspé to do with His Majesty's mails ?

Or does the government consider that the Honourable Mr. Lemieux enjoys a double nature, a maritime nature which he gets from his electors in Gaspé, and a terrestial nature which his electors in Nicolet have communicated to him ?

And, in this case of sea and earth, will the honourable minister receive a double salary ?

Is there any law whatsoever which allows an ordinary man to double himself thus, and to occupy for more than half of the length of a parliament two seats in the House of Commons simultaneously ?

Is there not, quite to the contrary, a law which forbids such an anomaly ?

Is it the intention of the government to cause the law to be observed, and to demand of him who now forms part of the cabinet, the Postmaster General, that he shall at last choose which of the two seats he wishes to keep ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It may amuse the hon. gentleman, but I think it scarcely comports with the dignity of the Senate that questions of this kind should be put on the order paper. Mr. Lemieux was elected for two constituencies in the last general election. In one of those a protest was entered, and, under the law, he had no power to choose between the two seats while the case was before the courts. I do not know when the case was decided ; at all events until it had been decided he was not in a position to make an election. It is a matter which rests entirely with the House of Commons when Mr. Lemieux shall make his election. Whether he has done so or not I am not informed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. minister does not know if that contestation has been settled ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know anything about it, except by common report.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think it was arranged in the month of January or February.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He conformed to the law, whatever it may be.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand the hon. Secretary of State to say that the provisions of the law are such, that if a member be elected for two constituencies he cannot relinquish either of them until the contestation as to the legality of the election is settled ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the law. He cannot elect until the courts have decided. A protest was entered against him. He might possibly have been disqualified, and could not sit at all, and, therefore, he could not make the selection until the case was decided.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I certainly do not think there is in the law any provision of that kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I will give the hon. gentleman a precedent of a member of his own cabinet who did the same thing. Sir Hector Langevin was elected for Three Rivers in 1891, and he was elected for the county of Richelieu and he sat for both counties until 1892.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I can give another, in the case of Sir John Macdonald who was elected for Lennox and Carleton at the same time and had to wait until we unseated him in Lennox before he elected to represent Carleton.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But after the contestation is over?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—There is no limit of time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a matter for the House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am under the impression that it is open to him to resign for the constituency which is not contested.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I scarcely have any doubt of it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Why should he not?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Because it is not the law.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend is not a lawyer, and, further, is not often very accurate either.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—He cannot ignore the law.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman is correct, he could keep these two seats until the day of judgment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the hon. gentleman from Stadacona need be troubled about that. There are numbers of vigilant members of the opposition in the House of Commons who will see that no abuse of the kind takes place.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—As the House of Commons wants to reform us we might try our hand at reforming them.

THE MILITARY STAFF OF HIS EXCELLENCY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

I. In the military family of His Excellency the Governor General, what is the number of persons employed—
1. As military secretary ;
2. As aides de camp ;
3. As honorary aides de camp ?

II. Out of this number how many persons belong—
1. To the province of Ontario ;
2. To the province of Quebec ;
3. To the maritime provinces ;
4. To the western provinces ?

III. How many persons of French origin does the province of Quebec count among the number of persons which it furnishes, according to the above figurès, to the military family of His Excellency ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the hon. gentleman might have put that question in a little more courteous form. I may say to him the military secretary of the Governor General is always an officer of the imperial service, brought out with him.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not deny that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—His aides he selects himself. I could not tell you who his aides are. I have no information on the matter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is not justified in making the remarks——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman makes the position I occupy very uncomfortable day after day. Every day he fires a number of questions at me, and if I were obliged to furnish answers to all of them

I would have nothing to do but go to the departments and ask them to answer Mr. Landry's inquiries. The hon. gentleman, to say the least of it, is extremely unreasonable. I am told that the publication of our proceedngs is delayed because he chooses to put everything in print and it has to be sent upstairs to be translated before going to the printer, with the result that minutes get to the Bureau too late to be printed in the morning, so it is difficult to get information promptly for the hon. gentleman. He gives notice of his questions one day and expects to be answered the next day. He might show some degree of courtesy.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. gentleman might show some degree of truthfulness in his remarks.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When the hon. gentleman says I make a motion the day after I give notice of that motion, he says a thing which the minutes of proceedings will not sustain.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All his notices are marked Thursday the 7th.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—To-day is the 7th. But the notices were given, some of them last week, not one of them was given yesterday among those that are to come up to-day.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I wish to raise a point of order; is there anything before the Chair? The question has been put and answered.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman is mistaken——

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The hon. gentleman has no right to address the House until the point of order is decided.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I have a right to debate the point of order. The hon. gentleman's point is not well taken, because on a question of this kind if he will consult Bourinot he will see that we have always the right to speak to a point of order. An hon. gentleman can rise to make a personal explanation in a case such as this, where I am accused by the hon. Secretary of State of putting a question on the order paper and demanding an answer within twenty-four hours. I have a right to say that it is not twenty-four hours notice. I always give him forty-eight hours, and if he is not ready then, I am always willing to wait; and I do not see that the hon. gentleman has any right to say that I lack courtesy in the matter. Because he says so I am not obliged to accept the statement and I will not accept it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think my hon. friend from Stadacona is deserving of great credit for his industry in putting these questions. That is what we are here for, and gentlemen who do not do this work have no right to stigmatize an industrious man. The questions put by my hon. friend are uniformly proper ones. Of course he must not be unreasonable with the hon. Secretary of State in the matter of getting replies as promptly as he might desire them. He must allow a reasonable time, and I think he is willing to do so; but I do not think that an hon. gentleman who is performing such valuable work in investigating matters connected with the welfare of the country should be censured and condemned in the House for doing meritorious work.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I think the hon. gentleman who has risen to a point of order should explain what he means. What is the point of order?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I merely said it was scarcely courteous to use the Governor General's name in the manner it is employed in this question. In both Houses of parliament, as a rule, the name of the Governor General is held with some degree of respect and it is rather discourteous to talk about the Governor General's family. The aide de camp is not a member of the viceregal family; he is a member of the staff. The militia secretary is not a member of that family.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It says 'military family.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—These officers do not belong to the Governor General's family any more than my deputy or the staff of my department are members of my family, and I do not think it is in good taste to use the expression. It is too flippant.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I gave notice of my motion in French. I do not know how it sounds in English, I did not translate it; but we say in French: 'la maison militaire,' the military household. It was not I who made the translation. The original question was couched in proper language.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I accept the hon, gentleman's explanation. I will have the information for him to-morrow.

The SPEAKER—I see that the notice of motion is correctly worded in French. The translation can be changed.

LIEGE EXHIBITION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

Why, at the time of the Universal Exhibition at Liège, did the government appoint the Honourable Mr. Turgeon, of Quebec, honorary commissioner for Canada?

What were the functions of this gentleman, and what instructions did he receive?

At whose request and upon whose recommendation was Mr. Adélard Turgeon appointed commissioner for Canada?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The only accredited appointees from Canada at the Universal Exhibition at Liège were those of the Dominion government. The Hon. Mr. Turgeon wished to visit the exhibition in the interest of the province of Quebec, and, as it was considered advisable that he should have an official standing there, he was appointed an honorary commissioner for Canada. His functions were not defined and he received only general instructions to act as a representative of the Dominion. Mr. Turgeon was appointed upon the recommendation of the Minister of Agriculture, acting upon the representations of parties in whom he had confidence.

INSPECTION OF PACKING HOUSES IN CANADA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER rose to call the attention of the government to the following despatch, published in the Ottawa 'Free Press' of the 6th June last:

Winnipeg, Manitoba, June 6.—The pork and beef packing business of J. C. Griffin & Company, one of the foremost industries of the west, has been absorbed by a big American corporation. The name of the new stockholders are not announced.

And to inquire whether it is the intention of the government to provide for a thorough inspection of meat packers' houses?

He said: The community has been shocked by the disclosures which have recently been made in the United States with regard to packing houses. There may be some exaggeration in those disclosures, but it is hard not to believe there is some truth in them, especially when we notice that the president has thought it his duty to send a message to Congress about this condition of things. In that message he refers to a report made by inspectors appointed by himself and says.

The conditions shown by even this short inspection to exist in the Chicago stock-yards are revolting. It is imperatively necessary in the interest of health and decency that they should be radically changed.

And again:

The report shows that the stock yards and packing houses are not kept even reasonably clean, and that the method of handling and preparing food products is uncleanly and dangerous to health.

The president urges amendments to the existing laws and a most rigid inspection:

'I urge,' he says, 'the immediate enactment into law of provisions which will enable the Department of Agriculture adequately to inspect the meat and meat food products entering into interstate commerce and to supervise the methods of preparing the same, and to prescribe the sanitary conditions under which the work shall be performed.'

(Sgd.) THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

If we are to believe the report submitted to the president, no one will say that his action was premature. Here are some extracts from the report:

In one well-known establishment we came upon fresh meat being shovelled into barrels, and a regular portion being added of stale scraps that had lain on a dirty floor in the corner of the room for several days.

In another establishment, equally well known, a long table was noticed covered with several hundred pounds of cooked scraps of beef and other meats. Some of these meat scraps were dry, leathery and unfit to be eaten, and in the heap were found pieces of pigskin and even some bits of rope strands and other rubbish. Inquiry evoked the frank admission from the man in charge that this was to be ground up and used in making 'potted ham.'

The lack of consideration for the health and comfort of the labourers in the Chicago stock-yards seem to be a direct consequence of the system of administration that prevails. Physicians state that tuberculosis is disproportionately prevalent in the stock-yards, and the victims of this disease expectorate on the spongy wooden floors of the dark work rooms, from which falling scraps of meat are later shovelled up to be converted into food products. Even the ordinary decencies of life are completely ignored.

The mayor of Chicago has also put himself on record in this matter, and he is reported as favourable to the city owning a slaughtering plant where the packers would be compelled to kill their cattle and prepare the meat for sale to the public under strict municipal supervision. The above disclosures are creating alarm almost all over the world. No wonder that they do, for every one knows how large is the number of consumers of that kind of food. It finds its way into thousands of households, into the shanties, under the tents of the sportsmen and amongst the army. It is a necessity for the immigrants who in numbers of circumstances are left without any thing else to fare upon. It would be idle to pretend that we do not require a rigid inspection of the same industries in this country. When the disclosures about insurance companies took place in the United States it was said that in Canada nothing similar existed. Since that time, however, the government has started an investigation, and by the time that investigation is concluded it will surely be found that even in our land there is unfortunately much improvement to be made in the control of the insurance business. Now, here is an opportunity for our packing houses to get a good and extended foothold in the meat markets of the world. England is reported as having cancelled its orders for meat in the United States. Yet England must import meat foods. Why should not Canada try to secure for its products that immense market? It would be a means of developing to a much larger extent within our borders than it exists now a very remunerative industry, and thereby favouring the agricultural resources of our country and the tillers of the soil.

In providing for a strict inspection, Canada would only follow its own course. We have already provided for the inspection of many other kinds of food—for the inspection of grain and fruits. We have now before us a measure for the inspection of hay. In other countries the inspection is carried out in a manner which we could wisely follow. A report published in the press shows that:

> In the chief cities of Europe, the slaughter houses are public institutions, conducted without the slightest regard to profit, but solely with a view to protecting the public health. The United States consul general at Paris in his report on 'What Paris eats,' shows what care is exercised at the French capital. The public markets are under strict municipal control—no animal or part thereof being exposed for sale unless the killing was done at the public abattoirs. Eighty per cent of the food consumed in Paris passes through the 'Halles' or public market. The other twenty per cent consists of fruit, breadstuffs, coffee and vegetables. The most rigid official inspection is encountered at every turn.
> There is a sanatorium at the abattoir in which animals that are under suspicion are held until they are examined. Dealers who are admitted to the use of the slaughter houses are charged a small fee; and they have to submit to the strictest regulations, which include a scientific inspection of all animals.
> In Germany there is a system similar in character with a most carefuly organized service, and the thoroughness of the inspection and absolute cleanliness is a matter of general comment by all who have visited the places.
> In Great Britain, it need hardly be said, the public health is a first consideration, as the Chicago packers will now learn to their cost. All over the British Isles, the municipalization of the slaughtering business is taking place. An English writer dealing witih the experiments of foreign countries to which we have referred above, says: 'There is unanimous testimony from these and other countries, and from towns in the United Kingdom where public slaughter houses have been established, showing that one result of the abattoir system has been an improvement of the public health and a diminution of nuisance. It is declared that the sale of diseased meat is practically impossible under this system.'

That the inspection as carried out at present in Canada is not satisfactory, one has good reason to believe when he refers to interviews which are to be found in the public print. Here are some extracts of an interview with Dr. McCarrey, food inspector of the city of Montreal, as published in the 'Star':

> Dr. McCarrey, chief food inspector of the city, revealed to-day an astonishing state of affairs in regard to the poor inspection of packing houses in the city.
> It was stated by this official that packing houses, to all intents and purposes were practically not inspected at all.
> Do the inspectors watch the canning and packing and take steps to see that meats, &c., are put up in a way that are cleanly and in conformity with the laws of health?
> I am afraid they have little or no time to go into this phase of the question.
> Is all the meat bought by packing houses inspected before it reaches their premises?
> It is not. We inspect the meat that is bought by such places at the abattoirs; but often meat is sent to such places from country districts; in this case we have to do the best we can and try and locate such animals.
> Do any of the inspectors see that meats, fruits and similar food is not coloured with matter that is dangerous to health?
> This branch of the work is not looked after, the cause is the insufficiency of the staff.

The Mayor's attitude.

Mayor Ekers stated to-day that it was certain the city had not sufficient inspectors. He would do all he could to see that this branch of the civic service was improved.

Now here is the statement attributed by the Montreal 'Star' to Dr. Dagenais, chairman of the Health Committee in the Montreal council :

There must be a better meat inspection at the two large slaughter houses in the city. It was the contention of Alderman Dagenais that the city had not nearly enough of inspectors. There was only one inspector at the big eastern abattoir and he had to watch the killing of all the animals. The truth was that no one man could possibly attend the killing of so many animals and do the work in a satisfactory manner. Could any one say that a hog or a sheep not fit for human food was not now and then killed and put on the market. It was to be feared that this might happen on account of the one inspector having so much to look after.

Alderman Dagenais made the remark that as for private abattoirs and packing they were given little or no inspection. All the inspection amounted to was a visit once a week from inspectors. The truth was that in some of the large packing houses there should be an inspector in attendance all the time. If this were done it would be possible to see no food was packed which might be unfit to be eaten. He was glad to say that no complaints had been made against the packing houses in Montreal, and he did not believe that the packing done in Montreal packing houses was on lines now being exposed in Chicago ; at the same time it would be well for the public as well as for the packing houses if they had resident inspectors.

I am glad to say that in so far as Winnipeg is concerned, the honour and integrity of the gentlemen who are at the head of the packing business is a guarantee to the public that they produce an article which is not liable to the same suspicions attaching to the similar article in Chicago. But just the same I would be inclined to think, as Dr. Dagenais does, that 'it would be well for the public as well as for packing houses, if they had resident inspectors.'

Moreover, here is a despatch which, if true, must lead the Canadians to serious thinking :

Winnipeg, Manitoba, June 6.—The pork and beef packing business of J. C. Griffin & Company, one of the foremost industries of the west, has been absorbed by a big American corporation. The names of the new stockholders are not announced.

And in the 'News' of yesterday :

Chicago packers may establish a plant in Alberta.

Will not this absorption of our Canadian industry by American dealers have the effect of gradually introducing in our country the methods disclosed on the other side of the line ? Surely this conclusion would not be without some plausibility.

In connection with this transaction, the following despatch, from Toronto, indicates that some one does not favour inspection :

Toronto, June 6.—Should the canned products of Canadian packing establishments be subject to government inspection ? is the question that has suggested itself since the accounts of the frauds that some United States firms have perpetrated have been made public.

'I do not see what use any inspector would be to us,' said one of the best known men in the business here. 'If the government think it necessary and are willing to pay a man, we have no objection. But if we have to pay him by fees or otherwise, I would decidedly object.'

The representative of another large Toronto firm held a similar view.

'It would be of absolutely no advantage to us to have such inspection,' said he. 'Our grades are all labelled with our own name, and there is no greater stimulus for the use of the best material than the desire to build up our reputation and trade.'

Both gentlemen declared emphatically that the stories about diseased hogs and other conditions mentioned in the United States papers do not apply here at all.

The cattle are inspected before being killed, and the hogs are inspected in the market, while the packers are not allowed to use veal under a certain weight.

There are no federal regulations for the inspection of packing houses.

I do not think that the public would favour the opinion of these latter gentlemen. Very important questions are involved in this matter. We may have an idea of the vast importance of these questions by the following cable despatch to the 'Star' from London :

London, June 6.—The opinion is general in trade circles here that the packing house scandals have killed the tinned provisions trade, not only of the United States, but of Canada, Australia and Argentina. Retailers say it is difficult to sell three for every dozen formerly sold. They say householders refuse to make any distinction between Canadian and American, and they bar all tinned stuffs. It is felt that Canada has an opportunity to push her non-canned meat trade if she could devise some convincing method of government inspection here and in Canada. Canada last year supplied only three and a half millions out of total imports of thirty-five millions sterling, the United States supplying fourteen millions.

I will not dwell any longer upon this matter, except to say that we should take this opportunity of securing this trade for our own country. The farming community, our commerce, our industry, the whole country would be benefited by the action of the government, were they to provide for satisfactory inspection. Public health also requires such action. But these results cannot be obtained unless public confidence in our own goods is restored. And I fully concur in the suggestions of the Montreal 'Star' as contained in the following extracts. The 'Star' suggests that we should at first seek to take out of the hands of the Americans their own market, and affirms :

> This can only be accomplished by relieving the public mind, so far as the Canadian products are concerned, of its natural revulsion of feeling against all sorts of canned meats. The people must be convinced that the Canadian goods are clean and sanitary ; and they can only be persuaded of this by a thorough inspection and a detailed and independent report.

I now ask whether it is the intention of the government to provide for a thorough inspection of meat packers' houses ? And if I were permitted to give my inquiry a somewhat more extensive purport, I would ask also whether the government is contemplating some action with the view of prohibiting the importation from the United States of the goods put on the market by the meat trust ?

As I have already stated, England has cancelled its orders for such meat. Should we not go a little further and prohibit entirely this importation ? In any case this is a question which is worth the attention of the government.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—There is no doubt whatever that the disclosures which have recently been made as regards the manner and method in which the trade of packing meat has been conducted in the United States have been of a character to astonish and almost appal the whole civilized world. The attention of the government has been directed to the points mentioned by the hon. gentleman, and they will be prepared, I think, at a fitting time to deal with the question; but it is not altogether free from difficulty. To a very considerable extent it is rather a question of enforcing existing legislation than it is of adding new clauses to the statute-book. I am rather inclined to believe that there is power both in the municipalities and in the provision made by the local legislatures for purposes of health and sanitation, not to speak of such as may be vested in the federal government itself, to deal to a very great extent with all the worst class of abuses. But I am perfectly in accord with the hon. gentleman in thinking that there is a very considerable opportunity opened to the people of Canada and other British colonies, in view of these recent disclosures, to greatly extend their trade in canned meat products, and I for one will be disposed to advocate in the interest of trade and commerce—the department I more particularly represent—any measure which will tend to completely prevent the possibility of any such atrocious misconduct being perpetrated by Canadian packers or in Canadian manufacturies, as I fear have, beyond all doubt, occurred in the case of Chicago. Of course, hon. gentlemen will not expect under these circumstances that the government will say more than that they will consider the matter at the very earliest opportunity.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have any communications been received from the imperial government with reference to Canada supplying the British army with canned beef?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—They have not come before us officially. As yet we have seen nothing except the paragraphs my hon. friend has referred to relating to the probability that the imperial authorities will refuse to accept any canned goods coming from the United States and would endeavour as far as possible to supply the needs of the army from colonial sources. I may remark to my hon. friend that I doubt whether it would be possible for Canada to meet more than to a very partial extent the requirements of the British army, whatever Australia might be able to do. Our total exportation of canned goods amounted to $3,500,000 in the last year—and that is but a very small fraction of the amount of that class of article which is consumed in England or even by the imperial authorities alone. But there can be no sort of doubt that a matter of this kind, affecting so vitally as it does the health of consumers, affords, as I have said, large possibilities for the extension of trade, if we can succeed in convincing foreign customers that our system effectually prevents the possibility of any such practices prevailing in Canadian packing houses as are alleged to have prevailed in Chicago. There can be no doubt that the question is one of first rate importance and deserves the consideration of the government.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Will the hon. gentleman be prepared to recommend that the importation of United States beef be stopped ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—That is a question which will be for the consideration of the government. I am not in a position to answer the hon. gentleman at present.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It should be prevented in view of the condition of things disclosed in Chicago.

A CORRECTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I wish to call the attention of the House to a matter of some interest. When the hon. senator from Richmond addressed the House last evening on the question of the Senate, he made a somewhat strong statement, with regard to actuarial calculations which I had submitted on the previous day. Towards the close of his remarks he returned to the subject and made another statement which I was perfectly satisfied had amply contradicted the statement made by him in the earlier part of his speech. I was a little surprised when I saw the unrevised edition of the 'Debates' this morning and found that the later statement did not fully appear. I know that my hon. friend has not interfered with it, but I have had the advantage of consulting the notes of the reporter and find my recollection verified by these notes. The first statement of the hon. gentleman was :

> But I wish to say at once that many of my hon. friend's actuarial calculations seem to me very fallacious and even absurd.

As I said, I was quite content to allow my hon. friend's ipse dixit to go against my statements and the statements of the expert I had consulted, as the statement further on in the hon. gentleman's speech entirely supported our view ; but I found that was not fully reported.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Have I not a right to make a change if I think proper ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, but if my hon. friend had made an important statement which supported my figures and subsequently changed it, I would have a right to call attention to the change having been made ; but in this instance the change came in another way. The words that appear later on are :

> With a good majority now, the present government will have a much larger majority in this House three years hence. Then suppose that the Liberal party is successful at the polls at the next general election, what will be the result in this Chamber ? The government will have a majority in this House of over fifty or sixty before the end of their fourth term.

The subsequent words which fail to appear are these :

> It is evident from the common sense view of results that that must be the effect.

That would be in 1913. I turn to the actuarial calculations which I submitted to the House on Tuesday, and it will be found that the Liberal majority in 1913 was estimated at 49 out of a house of 87. Then I find that by this statement which the hon. gentleman makes, that at the end of the fourth term the Laurier government, if they are sustained at the next general election, will have a majority of 50 or 60. Suppose we assume that they will have at that time a majority of 49, which is more moderate than my hon. friend put it, that will be 68 Liberals and 19 Conservatives at the end of the fourth term. I turn to my expert's table, and find that at 1913 the number of Conservative senators in the House then will be 19, so my hon. friend's later statement entirely corroborated the statement of the expert referring in both cases to a date seven years in advance of the present time, and having been found right, in the middle of a term of 14 years, it is fair to assume that these expert calculations will be right according to 'common sense' as well as actuarial calculations, to the end of the term. Therefore my hon. friend's imputation of fallacy and absurdity against the expert's table is absolutely contradicted from his own lips.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I fully expected when the hon. gentleman from Marshfield rose that he was going to make some remarks in addition to those that fell from the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg regarding the exceedingly important question of the impurity of the United States meat as reported on by the committee, and the desirability of Canada stirring herself under present conditions to secure an important and large exportation of canned meats. I listened with much pleasure to the words that dropped from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. I earnestly hope that the government will take very active steps to encourage in every way we possibly can the exportations of those meats and picking up the trade that our neighbours are evidently bound to lose by the report that has gone abroad.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I rise to a point of order. What is the hon. gentleman discussing.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Discussing the question raised by the hon. senator from Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—That is closed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend will give the hon. gentleman an opportunity he may come around to the actuarial tables in the course of the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce make a reply to the hon. senator from St. Boniface and I thought the subject was still under discussion.

AN IRREGULARITY IN PROCEDURE.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Before the orders of the day are called I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that I have a grievance. On the 30th May I had a Bill standing in my name called Bill (Y) An Act to incorporate the Prince Albert and North Saskatchewan and Hudson's Bay Railway Company. My hon. friend who sits beside me offered to move the second reading of the Bill, but was not allowed to move it on the ground that it was claimed the Bill was not printed. I find on Tuesday last that same Bill got its second reading and should have gone to the Railway Committee. The following day, that is yesterday, Bill (GG) appeared on the order paper here. It was not even printed, according to the 'Minutes of Proceedings.' Much to my surprise I found that my Bill was not on the order paper of the Railway Committee, while this other Bill was, and was railroaded on the order paper and railroaded through the committee. I objected to the amendments to that Bill being concurred in to-day, and I understand that the Speaker has ruled that the amendments should be concurred in. I took exception to that, and, I think, under the rules of parliament, the report should not have been concurred in to-day, and I ask the Speaker's ruling on it. I think my Bill should have been on the order paper this morning at least.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I would like to make an observation as to the manner in which the hon. gentleman has made his statement. It is very objectionable to say that a Bill is railroaded through the committee, because it conveys an imputation for which there is no ground at all. The committee has been sitting two hours and a half each day and has given full consideration to every Bill that came before us.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Will the hon. gentleman say that a Bill which was not printed yesterday and was not on the order paper of the committee to-day, and yet was run through, was not railroaded through?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If the hon. gentleman will remain in his seat in the House and be informed as to the legislation which passes the House he will not make such rash statements. The Bill standing in my name was moved in my absence by my hon friend from Killarney (Mr. Young) and an explanation was given. The Bill, printed in both languages, was produced before it was given its second reading. If the hon. gentleman had consulted the 'Debates' he would have found that such is the case. The Bill came regularly before the committee to-day and was explained in the committee. It was on the orders of the day as furnished by the law clerk, who was clerk of the Railway Committee, and on the Orders of the Day furnished the chairman of the committee. That Bill was entered there regularly. The first time I was aware that a mistake had been made in the printing of the Orders of the Day was when I was told of it by the law clerk: That Bill should have been on the Orders of the Day and it was regularly before the committee,

The explanation was made in the committee and no objection was taken and the Bill was regularly reported. As far as this session is concerned, no member can fairly say that any Bill has passed the Railway Committee without free and full consideration. I am satisfied that in no session that I have attended here has the Railway Committee given more attention to Bills presented to it than it has this session, and that remark applies particularly to the Bills which were considered to-day. As the hon. senator from St. John has stated, therefore it is wrong to say that Bills are railroaded through committee. If the hon. gentleman has fault to find with the officers of the House for not putting Bills that he has charge of on the orders of the day, he can do so, but why the hon. gentleman should make such vague and reckless charges against the Railway Committee is hard for me to understand.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—There are many things it is hard for the hon. gentleman to understand. I complain that the Bill in which I was interested and which stood in my name, and which passed through this House on Tuesday, was not placed on the order paper to go to the committee this morning, while a Bill in which another gentleman was interested was taken up the next day, considered, referred to the committee, and reported and put through the House to-day against my protest.

Hon. Mr. WATSON. What I say is, that Bill (GG) was regularly dealt with. Why the hon. gentleman should pick out that Bill which stands in my name to say that it was railroaded through the House I cannot understand.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This conversation may be very interesting to the hon. gentlemen who are particularly concerned, but there is really nothing before the House and there is important business to be dealt with, and I do not think our time should be taken up with these altercations.

The SPEAKER—The complaint of the hon. gentleman refers more to what took place in committee. It cannot be remedied by the House. He also objects to the report being concurred in this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Yes.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman's objection is too late. He should have objected when the motion was made. No objection was made and the report was concurred in.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The objection was made by the hon. gentleman, who claimed that the report should not be concurred in, that it required a day's notice before concurrence could take place. I in my place, raised the same objection. I thought I spoke loud enough to make myself understood, that we objected to concurrence in the amendment when the report was before the House. To my surprise, and I will say to the surprise of the House, the motion notwithstanding the strong objection that was raised, was declared carried. What my hon. friend objects to is that the Speaker allowed the amendments to be concurred in after he had raised his objection. As to the other point, I suppose that that Bill not being printed was one reason why it ought not to have been read the second time yesterday and referred to the Railway Committee.

The rules, unless suspended, implicitly exact that every Bill shall be printed in the votes and proceedings of the House. That Bill was not so printed, and, therefore, it had not right to go to the House. If it did go, when it came back here, and we raised objections to the report being received to-day, why was it not held over until another day ?

The SPEAKER—Objection was taken by the two hon. gentlemen to the report being discussed and adopted at that meeting, but, was taken as against the right of the hon. gentleman who made the motion to do so to-day ; as there was no point of order the motion was carried, and the point the hon. gentleman raises now is too late.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I understood that when hon. gentlemen rise to a point of order and object in accordance with the rules of the Senate, the Speaker's duty is to see that the motion is not put, but that the rules are complied with. On this occasion that certainly was not the case. We raised an objection. The Speaker must have heard the objection, yet, notwithstanding that objection, he put the motion and declared it carried. I expected that the Speaker would not put the motion, because he knew perfectly well that it had not the unanimous concurrence of the Senate. I therefore thought we had just cause of complaint.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman complained that the time of notice was too short, and asked if it would not be apropos that the motion should be held over, but, when the motion was put, no point of order was taken ; and I may add that I have some doubts as to whether any point of order could properly be raised, although I would not like to pass judgment upon that question. My present impression is that it is a matter for the House to decide.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It was not necessary to put the motion, under the circumstance.

The SPEAKER—There is nothing presently before the Chair.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (HH) An Act respecting the Manitoba, Keewatin Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

MILITIA REGULATIONS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State if the militia regulations published in the 'Canada Gazette' on the 5th of May last have been laid before both Houses of parliament or before this House. The Militia Act, chap. 23, Edward VII., sections 126, 127 and 128, provide as follows :—

> The Governor in Council may make regulations for carrying this Act into effect for the organization, discipline, efficiency and good government generally of the militia and for anything required to be done in connection with the military defence of Canada.
> Such regulations shall be published in the 'Canada Gazette,' and, upon being so published, they shall have the same force in law as if they formed part of this Act.

The publications of these regulations in the 'Canada Gazette' is therefore obligatory in order that they may become law. The Act further provides :

> The regulations shall be laid before both Houses of parliament within ten days after the publication thereof in the 'Canada Gazette' if parliament is then sitting, and if parliament is not sitting then within ten days after the next meeting thereof.

Parliament is sitting now; these regulations were published in the 'Canada Gazette' on the 5th of May last; the ten days would have expired on the 15th ult., and I ask the hon. gentleman if he has produced before this House of parliament—it may have escaped my attention—a copy of these regulations?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have certainly not been laid on the table by me. I am not sufficiently familiar with the militia law, not being myself a military man. I rather belong to the peace party, and therefore I have not perhaps taken the interest I should have done—certainly not the interest which my hon. friend takes—in all military matters. I intended to-day to call the attention of the Minister of Militia to the subject-matter which the hon. gentleman referred to a few days ago, namely, the importance and propriety of printing these regulations in French. Sir Frederick Borden has been out of town for some days, however, and I have had no opportunity of bringing the matter before him, but I shall do so at the earliest opportunity. I presume the hon. gentleman is right in his contention that the regulations to which he refers—I am not familiar with them, and I do not know to what they refer, but from a cursory glance at them I thought they had reference to the pay of the force.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Pay and allowances.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are then such regulations as the statute contemplated should be laid on the table. I will draw the attention of the Department of Militia to the subject at once and see that the papers are laid on the table.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will take the same occasion to ask the hon. gentleman, in the interest of our French militiamen, if the syllabus of what is done in camp every day, the daily exercises prescribed by the syllabus, could be printed in French as soon as possible for the use of French militiamen in the province of Quebec. I think these men are serving the country as well as any other citizens could, and they should be put on a fair and equal footing with militiamen in the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As soon as the Minister of Militia returns I will bring the subject before him and give him my opinion that they should be printed in French.

HENRY LUTHER HOUK PATENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg) moved the third reading, Bill 51, an Act respecting a patent of Henry Luther Houk. He said : In moving the third reading of this Bill it would be proper for me to state that when the Bill was reported to the House by the proper committee, it was understood that certain information would be forthcoming as to the object of the patent, before the House should be called upon to allow the third reading. The patent covers a new and useful improvement in vehicle tires, and tires under the said patent have been manufactured and sold in Canada ever since the date of the patent, July 21, 1899. It was a patent granted for eighteen years; the fees were paid for six years and the holder of the patent understood that his agent had, before the six years expired, paid the necessary fees and renewed the patent for the remainder of the term, to wit, twelve years. As soon as he discovered that that was not the case, within a month from the time the six years expired he tendered the proper fees, but the proper officer did not feel that he was at liberty under the Act to accept payment for the renewal, and hence the owner is driven to come to this parliament under our law to ask for a renewal. I understand that some hon. gentlemen wish to avail themselves of the opportunity which will now be given them, to offer some observation on the general principle involved. I do not understand that they refer so much to this Bill in particular, but rather to the general principle of the inexpediency of renewing patents or of renewing them in the manner which has hitherto been pursued. The officer of the department in charge of these matters appeared before the committee and said that so far as the department was concerned there was no objection to this Bill. I would, therefore, move that this Bill be now read a third time.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before my hon. friend sits down, will he inform the House as to what particular article this patent has to do with ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The Bill, unfortunately, does not contain, as I think it should, information as to the nature and object of the patent. It is one, as I mentioned a few moments ago, for a new and useful improvement in rubber tires, and tires under the said patent have been manufactured and sold in Canada ever since the date of the patent.

Hon. Mr. JONES—Before this motion passes, I wish to take the opportunity of making one or two observations with reference to the renewal of patents, not especially with reference to this Bill. I do not know anything about this particular patent except what the Bill indicates. The hon. mover has advised the House that it is a patent relating to rubber vehicle tires. The principal objection which I have towards this particular renewal and to all renewals, practically, that have come before the House since I have been a member of it—and the number year by year is increasing, doubtless naturally so—is first with reference to the last clause in the Bill for the protection of the public. That is after all possibly the most important part for the consideration of this House. I think the latter clause in this Bill is the same as the last clause in all the renewals of this nature which have been granted for some time, at least last year and this year. In this case the words ' Or licensees ' are put in, because in this particular instance I believe the owner of the patent has licensed some persons in Canada to manufacture under his patent, and the mover of the motion has indicated that it is because of their carelessness or oversight that this Bill comes before the House. I shall read the clause in this Bill :

> Any person other than licensees, who has within the period between the 31st day of July, 1905, and the passing of this Act commenced to manufacture, use and sell in Canada the inventions covered by the said patent may continue to manufacture, use and sell the said inventions in as full and ample a manner as if this Act had not been passed.

The object of the clause of course is to protect the interests of those who, after the patent lapsed, undertook to manufacture. Now, if I read this aright it necessitates that any such person or persons must have begun to manufacture, must have used, and must have sold the said article or articles in order to give them the right to continue. The wording of that clause to my mind is not clear and definite, and goes much further than the House intends to go in establishing or in reserving to such persons the rights that they would have, which it is the intention of this Act to give to them. If I read the clause correctly, it does necessitate the manufacturer not only manufacturing the article but using it himself and selling it, in order to continue to him the right to manufacture. It might be, and it is in certain cases impracticable if not impossible, that the manufacturer should make for his own use as well as make and sell the article. He ought not to be asked to do so; he is not asked to do so in the original patent.

If I read the patent Act and the patents themselves aright, if he manufactures the article so that it is available for any other persons in Canada who desire to purchase it, he has fulfilled the intention of the law. This amendment, therefore, worded as it is at present, goes materially further than the original patent does. I contend further that this House ought not to reinstate patents unless it is in possession of the fullest possible information indicating that it is, under all the circumstances, desirable and necessary, fair and reasonable, to the patentee or the owner of the patent—that it should be of the very strongest nature. The object of a patent is self-evident; it affords an incentive to inventive genius; and if inventors devote time and thought—in important patents a great deal of time and thought is frequently expended, and a good deal of money is often spent—a certain period of time should be conserved to them for the manufacture and sale or use of the article so that they may be reimbursed. It is not in the interests of the country that patents should be tied up for speculative purposes. It is not in the interests of the country that large sums of money should accrue to people who purchase patents for little or nothing and thus possibly prevent competition in the manufacture and sale of the article. In this, as in most of the cases that come before the House, the patentee is not the applicant for the renewal. This renewal is asked for by Henry Luther Houk; doubtless the patent had been sold and transferred to him. There is no objection to that. A Mr. Swinford, of Akron, Ohio, is the patentee, but the patent has passed out of his hands. In this particular case the mover of the resolution has pointed out that his article has been manufactured in Canada under license; but in a number of the patents which have been renewed by this House, so far as the House is aware, the patent law has not been complied with, and, so far as this House knows, possibly the person applying for a renewal of the patent may have purchased that right from the patentee after it had lapsed and have gotten it for a song, or he may have acquired the right shortly before the time lapsed, acquired it very cheaply, because the article was not apparently being called for to any considerable extent, not being looked upon as a public necessity, and no one was willing to accept a license and begin to manufacture. In such a case, I think the House should give careful consideration to the inadvisability of tying up a patent for another twelve years, as is generally the case. As every hon. gentleman knows, the patents now cover a period of 18 years. Previous to the last two or three years the period was 15 years, and that was divided into three terms of 5 years each. The first payment made would secure to the patentee the right for 5 years. In taking out patents, persons frequently take advantage of the fact that they need only pay for one-third of the whole period, because a patent when first taken out is generally to a large extent an unknown quantity, and there is considerable doubt as to how far it may be of value. The difference between taking out the patent in the first place for the full period of eighteen years, and taking it out, or paying the fees, for six years only, is about $50. In Canada under the present law, the fees may be paid for six, twelve or eighteen years as desired. Nearly every application for renewal which comes before the House is in relation to a patent that has been taken out and the fees paid for the shorter term only, the parties interested desiring to wait and see whether the invention will prove to be sufficiently useful and in public demand to make it desirable to continue its protection. There is a further provision in the Patent Act that in the case of a foreigner taking out a patent in Canada, he shall within two years from the date of the patent, commence the manufacture of the article in the Dominion, so that if he has tied up a new and useful invention by his patent he must, within a reasonable time, make provision to supply the article to the people of Canada if they desire to purchase it. The rules of the department permit the officer in charge of the Patent Office, under representations made by the patentee, showing that it would be reasonable and fair to do so, to make some extension of that term of two years, probably to three years. I do not know of any cases in which they have gone to four years, but I know in a number of cases the Patent Office has extended the time for one year, making a total of three years within which the patentee from a foreign country has to begin to make, or have made for him, the article so that it may be sold in the country. It is well known among manufacturers and others that this is in a large number of cases arranged by the patentee having some one in the country manufacture a sufficient number of the articles to preserve his rights under the patent. It may only be necessary to make one, two or three of the articles—simply enough to enable him to prove that they are being manufactured in Canada, and that will preserve his rights under the patent until a larger demand grows up. As regards this question of manufacture, the law in Canada differs from the law of the United States, and differs also from the laws of some of the other countries where patents are granted; and it may be a question for consideration whether that is desirable or not. No doubt when the patent law was brought into force in Canada it was felt, as I think it would be now, if that were under consideration and had to be decided by this House, that we could not necessarily be guided by a principle laid down by the nation to the south of us or by any other nation. Great Britain, for instance, does not require that the patentee shall manufacture in that country the article within a given period; but here we lie beside a great country where, if my recollection is correct, the number of patents issued is, as compared with Canada, as fifty to one; and many of the patents that are taken out on the other side are also taken out here, because it costs but little money to do so. Fifty to seventy-five dollars would be the extreme sum required. Doubtless the view taken by the government in passing the law was that, situated as we are, it would be in the interests of Canada that such provision should be made. Personally, I think it is an excellent and wise provision. Now, so far as I have learned or have observed, the members of this House do not know, when they renew a patent, whether the law in respect to manufacture within the prescribed period has been complied with. In this particular case—and I repeat that I am not discussing this particular case, but am simply taking the present opportunity of referring to the general principle involved—the mover of the resolution has been advised that there are licensees in Canada who are actually manufacturing; but this is an exceptional case. In no other case where renewals of patents have been asked for, when I have been present, have I heard a definite statement that there was actually an arrangement under which the article was being manufactured in Canada and sold in Canada. Now if the law has not been complied with in this matter of manufacture, and this House passes an Act reinstating the patent, it does not do injury to the public nor to the patentee, and no difficulties would arise other than would have arisen had the patentee taken out his patent for the full period in the first instance. It simply puts the patentee or the owner of the patent in the exact position he would have occupied if his patent had not been allowed to lapse. But I submit that it is not desirable for this House to reinstate a patent unless they know that the law in that respect has been complied with, because if it happens to relate to a desirable invention—some article which a Canadian company or individual in Canada might desire to manufacture, that company or individual is put to the expense of establishing the fact that the article had not been made in Canada as required by the law, and very considerable expense in the way of law costs may arise in that way which ought not to have arisen in the case of a renewal by this House. This House ought to have the most definite, positive information before granting the renewal, that all these conditions have been complied with, and that the owner of the patent, or the patentee himself is clearly and absolutely entitled, for the reasons given to the House, to a renewal of the patent.

Therefore I believe, in regard to the information that comes before the committee who have these matters under consideration, the information that is furnished to the House should be much more full and complete so that every member of this House may feel he is not doing an injustice to the people of Canada, and that he is doing justice to the foreigner who asked for the renewal and only justice to him, and that the best interests of Canada are conserved if we, by legislation, hand back to him what, from carelessness or otherwise, he may have allowed to lapse, which may or not have been his own fault. Generally speaking, I believe it is the fault of the individual; possibly at times something has arisen within the period after the patent has lapsed, and before it comes to this House, that indicates what they had not previously known in connection with the patent, that it is likely for some reason to be valuable. If that were the case, this House should not pass the Act under any circumstances whatever. It is only when the patentee has clearly been doing what he felt was his full duty under the patent that he should get the extension from the House himself. As to the latter clauses particularly, I would ask the House to give to the suggestion which I have made with reference to what is necessary to protect the public, their most careful consideration. The legal members of the House will understand better than I do whether my interpretation is correct or not. I know my interpretation is correct to this extent, that where the public and the patentee differ in their views with reference to the reading of that clause, it would end in litigation that is expensive and unfair to both the patentee and the public, and it is extremely important that we should in every way guard their interest. Further, take this patent as an illustration. It expired in July of last year—ten months ago. Any manufacturing company in Canada, who may have desired to manufacture this particular article, who sent to the patent office and inquired from the patent office if that patent had expired, would get an official letter from the patent office stating that it had expired. In the natural course of events, any individual or company, who desired to manufacture the article, would, upon that information, undertake to get ready to do so, and they might spend $5,000, $10,000 or $50,000 in preparations for manufacture without any expectation or knowledge that the parliament of Canada would be asked to reinstate the patent a year later; and so while we are legislating back to this man the rights that he originally had, some one in Canada may have gone to very considerable expense to get ready to manufacture the article; they might really have large sums of money tied up in the plant when they find, probably by accident, or notification from the patentee, that his patent has been restored, and dated back to the date at which it lapsed, and is as fully in force now as if it had never lapsed at all, and without their knowledge. I think that under those conditions the protection that is offered by this clause is not sufficient. Even if they have not actually established a business and manufactured, they should certainly be reimbursed for any expense they have gone to in getting ready to manufacture if the patent is to be reinstated, and if they are to be prevented from proceeding. The patent office itself takes no responsibility with reference to these matters. The mover of this particular Bill advises that the deputy minister of the department was before the committee but the deputy takes no responsibility. The deputy did not tell the committee, I am positively certain, that it would be proper and right to reinstate this patent. All the deputy tells them is that the office has no responsibility of any kind whatever. We are here to do certain things in certain ways and we are acting under our rules. We do not know what has happened in the interim. We have no knowledge of it. We have no right to ask the patentee or owner of the patent for information of that kind, and we could not have asked it. Such a thing is never done in the patent office. I have had a good deal to do with the patent office, have had hundreds and hundreds of patents myself, and my experience indicates that the officials are entirely and always without information, outside of matters coming directly within the interests of their department. So the House is dependent upon the knowledge that the person who asks the information can furnish to the House. It is necessary of course, that certain notice be given of a Bill of this nature. If I am correct, it is five insertions in the 'Canada Gazette,' five weeks. In my opinion that provision does not necessarily protect the public in a matter of this kind. There are a very large number of manufacturers who do not take the 'Canada Gazette,' and do not examine it weekly, and possibly there ought to be some further publication than that for the protection of the public when this extraordinary legislation is asked for. Now that might be done by at least one of the principal newspapers in our province, or by some other plan that would reach the manufacturers and builders of the various articles that are patented in Canada. That notice ought to indicate what this Bill does not indicate, what most of the Bills do not indicate. This notice would not indicate necessarily even to the manufacturer, if shown to him, that it affected any part of his business or the articles he was manufacturing, because they may give the number of the patent, but do not give any details. This Bill does not, you must go to the patent office, or the record, to find out what kind of article this really covers, and so the notice in that regard should be such as would enable the businessman and the purchasing public to understand whether they were purchasing or using or selling an article which they had a right to sell or dispose of or not. I apologize to the House for occupying so much time on this matter, but it is a far more important subject probably than many others that will appeal to members of the House who are not in close touch with the many difficulties that arise in connection with patents in Canada. There are now probably 65,000 or 70,000 patents taken out in Canada. Many of these have lapsed. Probably not more than one in a hundred is of any considerable value, but any one who undertakes to follow them through and see whether they are alive or have been allowed to lapse, would have a good deal to do, and it is not asking too much of any gentleman or any company who want us to legislate them back into possession of something that is now the property of the public of Canada, and which they ask to take away from the public, and give to the individual, that the fullest possible information should be given to the House before we adopt such legislation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think the hon. gentleman from Toronto has any reason to apologize to the House for the speech he has made. It has been the practice of the House not to look into Bills to revise patents. These Bills come before us and are read the first time as a matter of course, are read a second time as a matter of course, and are then referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills. Whether they are very carefully considered there or not I do not know, but I presume that they are, and I have no doubt that if the hon. gentleman had been here at the time and had been aware of the fact that this Bill was before that committee and he had gone before the committee, every weight would have been given to his views. His suggestions deserve a great deal of weight, but I think the hon. gentleman somewhat misapprehends the position. I have looked at some of the Bills which we have passed, and I find that this particular Bill (No. 51) of this session, is not nearly as objectionable in its language as some of those measures which we have passed.

It seems to me that the interests of the public are amply protected under this Bill. It appears that the patent lapsed on the 31st of July last, and the second clause of this Bill provides:

> Any person, other than licensees, who has, within the period between the thirty-first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and five, and the passing of this Act, commenced to manufacture, use and sell in Canada the inventions covered by the said patent may continue to manufacture, use and sell the said inventions in as full and ample a manner as if this Act had not been passed.

That I think is full protection to any one who has begun to manufacture. Where the expression is first used the wording might be modified so as to read 'manufacture, use, or sale,' but I do not think in the interpretation of the Act the courts would hold that there was really any difference between 'and' and 'or' so that, from the 31st July last, when this patent lapsed up to the time when this Bill is assented to by His Excellency; any person who has manufactured or used or sold the article can continue to do so. I do not think there is anything unreasonable in that proposition. The interests of outsiders are amply provided for. With respect to what took place, and as to where the blame lies, as a rule, for these patents being allowed to lapse, I venture to say in the hearing of hon. gentlemen who are members of the committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, that in a good many cases the fault is not with the patentee himself, but with his solicitor, who is employed to see that the patent does not lapse, and who overlooks it. In a great many cases that is the fact, and it would be hard on a man who has made an important invention, and who has manufactured it himself, that his rights should be cut off in that way through the oversight of a professional man. We passed a Bill here the other day that contained a provision which I thought objectionable, and I was under the impression when the hon. gentleman referred to it that a similar provision would be found in this Bill. The provision in the other Bill was :

> Any person who had commenced to manufacture, use and sell, at any time between the date when the patent lapsed, and the date when the first notice was given in the 'Gazette' of the intention to apply for this Act, &c.

I felt that that was exceedingly unfair, and I thought when the hon. gentleman proposed to call attention to this Bill, that the language was the same.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What Bill was that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it was No. 45.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The puffed rice Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The clause says :

> Any person other than the licensee, who has within the period between the 31st December, 1904, when the patent lapsed, &c.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We amended that clause.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, and fixed the date when the notice was first given in the 'Gazette', which I think was exceedingly improper. I do not mean to reflect on the action of the House, but I think it was not a proper thing to do. The speech of the hon. gentleman will have the effect of making the House and the members of the committee more watchful in future in dealing with Bills of this character ; and I think he has placed the Senate under an obligation.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—As a member of that committee I wish to state that every possible care was taken, and the idea was that every Bill having reference to a patent having elapsed, and restoring rights to the party, had a provision in it to guard any one who had from the time of the lapsing of the patent until the application for a renewal was advertised, or until it was passed in the House, manufactured or sold the article in question. That was the idea that prevailed in the committee at that time. and every Bill which passed the committee, when I was present, had such a provision in it.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—In the absence of the chairman of the Private Bills Committee, perhaps I might be permitted to say a word or two in reference to these matters, which are not easy matters to deal with and which cannot very well be dealt with as a class and which we ought to deal with as they come before us in every case. Being exceptional cases they should be dealt with in an exceptional way, if they are entertained at all. At the risk of being somewhat troublesome and repeating to some extent what has been said by the hon. gentleman who brought the matter before the Senate, I would venture to remind the House that under our patent law a person who is the inventor, or his assignee, may obtain a patent which protects him in the use of the invention, on certain conditions, for a fixed period of time, namely eighteen years. One of the conditions is that he must satisfy the department that the article has not been in use or manufactured in the country, and one of the conditions of every patent is that it is not a public property in any way, so that it has to be, in fact, a novelty, a new invention, and it must be a new invention which has not hitherto been manufactured or used in the country. That being so, on payment of a certain fee, and on satisfying the department as to its being the invention of the applicant and as to its being a novelty, and as to the bona fides of the transaction, the inventor receives a patent covering eighteen years. The law requires that he need not pay the whole fee down which is necessary to cover the eighteen years, but he may make the payments by instalments, payable every six years. He receives a patent, which remains valid for six years, and on payment of a fee, but without further application and further particulars. it is renewed for another period of six years, and at the end of twelve years and a third payment it is renewed for a further period of six years, making the term eighteen years. In the case we are dealing with, the patent was issued in 1899, and, therefore, was in force until 1905. When the six years covered by the first payment transpired, it became necessary in order to continue the patent that he should pay the additional fee for the next six or twelve years as he might do if he desired. Prior to that time, under the general law, his patent would cease and be void unless he had complied with the conditions as to manufacturing. So that we have a case where the time had expired within which the fee should be paid, in which he had complied with the law by manufacturing an article which he had obtained his patent for eighteen years, subject to the payment of a few dollars to the department at the expiration of the year 1905. By some slip—I can't say what it was in this case, or on whom the responsibility rested —that fee was not paid when it should have been, and when the payment was subsequently offered, the department could not receive the fee.

Now there is no pretense that up to that time there was any reason whatever why this patent should not be renewed. The patentee had complied with the law as to the manufacturing, and with the conditions in every respect, and all that was necessary, in order to give him protection for the next twelve years was to pay the fee. This application was made and notice given in conformity with the rules of the House. Whether those rules are sufficient or not is for the House to say. Reasons may be suggested why rules in patent cases, should be amended so as to provide for more ample notice; that is for the Senate to say. Dealing with the matter, notice was given, proofs were received, the petition was received establishing the facts that were necessary, and that petition came before the House. A Bill was received, and the principle of the Bill was adopted in the House of Commons months ago I may say. The matter went before the committee of the House of Commons in due course and was investigated, and the Bill was adopted, in this case without change, and sent over to the Senate. The preliminaries were all investigated, the Bill was received and read the first and second time and referred to the committee and stood before the committee for some time. There was ample time for any one interested in what is covered by this patent to have intervened and shown either that he had acquired a right, or that it was not reasonable that he should be precluded from acquiring a right, so there was no person who was interested in this manufacture who had not ample time, because of the notice that was given prior to the Bill being introduced in the House of Commons and dealt with by the committee in the House there. On its coming before the committee here, the committee declined to deal with this case without having the deputy of the department before them, and the deputy of the department appeared before the committee and stated that, so far as was known in the department, there was no reason why this Bill should not pass if parliament saw fit, in its wisdom, to extend or revive patents at all. In other words, if there was any case in which it was fit to be done, this was such a case so far as the department could in any way know. The hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Jones) pointed out, with reference to patents, that inquiries are made from time to time to know if they are still in force and for how long, and would be advised by the department of the expiration of a patent, at a certain day, and people might engage in the manufacture of the patent article. Let us consider for a moment if a person did that and engaged in the manufacture. He would be a person so in touch with the Patent Law and with the patent business that he would know that if the patent had been in force for any length of time the article must have been manufactured in the country, and he would know therefore that when he got the advice that the patent had expired, he was getting the benefit of a patent, which ought to have been in force for eighteen years, and which had expired simply through a slip, nonpayment of a small sum of money. There may be cases of that kind where the patent may have been working hardship to people in this country, and it might be desirable to get rid of the patent. That does not appear to be the case in this instance. It was open to any person to have made that representation before the committee. That might have involved a further inquiry in the matter, but there being nothing of the kind, the committee dealt with the matter after due notice, and this House having assumed the principle that Houk is entitled to an extension of his patent, unless, on inquiry, there is some reason to prevent him getting it, the committee have only to ascertain if any person should be protected in connection with the revival of the patent. There being no evidence of the kind, the protection is given by the committee in general terms. They say that any person who has commenced the manufacture and sale, any person who has acquired a vested right, so to speak, shall be protected. Every one is entitled to anything he has done and to any rights acquired by him from the time the patent lapsed until it goes into force again. I venture to submit that the committee have acted in accordance with the practice of the House in this case, and with due regard to the protection of acquired rights, as provided by the rules of the House in the way of notice, and, so far as they could that every interest should appear before them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Have all the conditions of the Patent Act been complied with, except the failure to pay the fee?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—We were advised by the deputy minister that the patent was in force, and would have continued in force but for the non-payment of the fee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That does not answer my question.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—We did not make an investigation of the factory at which Houk is manufacturing this article. We did not make inquiry as to the number of persons he is employing or the prices he is charging, but we did inquire of the department, whether they were satisfied that the conditions had been complied with.

Hon. Mr. JONES—Does the hon. gentleman say that the chief of the patent department advised him that the conditions were fulfilled, or only that the patent was in force?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—What I said was this. The deputy showed that the patentee had complied with those conditions. That was before the department and the department, with that information before them, advised us that, so far as they knew, there was no reason why this extension should not be granted if it is granted in any case. I do not say there was any inquiry, or that inquiry should be made in such cases, but I do say it has been the practice, and that no effort has been made by any one to provide for any more notice being given. Under these circumstances, it appears to me, that if any person had been making inquiry with a view to manufacturing this article, he would have been on the lookout to ascertain what was about to take place, and if there had been any person engaged in the manufacture you may depend upon it, during all the delay since notice was given last November or December down to the present time, we would have heard some suggestion that there was certain inquiry, and there having been none the committee reported the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There seems to be a misapprehension in the minds of some hon. gentlemen who have listened to the explanation. Are we to understand that the Bill simply continues the patent as if the payment had been duly made, and does not validate anything other than the non-payment of the fee.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It is in a form that has always been adopted here.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understand it is so.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The first clause provides:

1. Notwithstanding anything in the Patent Act, or in the letters patent mentioned in the preamble, the commissioner of patents may receive from Henry Luther Houk an application for a certificate of payment and the usual fee upon the said patent for the remainder of the term of eighteen years from the date thereof, and may grant and issue to the said Henry Luther Houk a certificate of payment as provided by the Patent Act and an extension of the duration of the said patent to the full term of eighteen years in as full and ample a manner as if application therefor had been duly made within six years from the date of the said patent.

And then they put the qualification in the next clause:

2. Any person, other than licensees, who has, within the period between the thirty-first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and five, and the passing of this Act, commenced to manufacture, use and sell in Canada the inventions covered by the said patent may continue to manufacture, use and sell the said inventions in as full and ample a manner as if this Act had not been passed.

Every person's right is protected, so, under the circumstances, if this Bill cannot get the sanction of the Senate, there is no case which has come before parliament during the time I have been here that would be likely to meet approval. I have not stated, and I do not want to be understood as stating, that I am at all in favour of the idea of protecting patents for any longer time than the patentee chooses to protect himself, but once the principle is invaded it is a very difficult thing for a member of the committee to say that A's patent is to be revived, and B's is not, when they are all on the same footing. In this class of cases at all events, where the default is not in manufacture or importation or other violation of the conditions which would void a patent, but where it is a mere omission of the payment of a fee which may have been caused by miscarriage in the mail or through the illness of the agent, or his absence from his business, or various other circumstances, there is nothing to justify parliament in saying that a proper case has not been made out. I am not saying what that case should be. Acting on precedents which have occurred before this case, it comes under them. It is for parliament to lay down the principle as to whether they are going to grant any of these extensions at all. Parliament should take up and deal with the question and determine some principle by which no special cases would be recognized.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Personally I am very much pleased that the hon. senator from Toronto (Mr. Jones) has brought this question before the Senate in such a plain and distinct manner. I took objection to the amendment which the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Kerr) suggested to a Bill of a somewhat similar character, in which that patentee was protected against the commencement of the manufacture of the article from the date of notice of application for a renewal of the charter. I supposed when the hon. gentleman commenced speaking, that this Bill contained the same provision. I find, however, on reading it, that it does not. Still that does not meet the objections that I think were so forceably advanced by the hon. senator opposite (Hon. Mr. Jones). The question put by myself and renewed by the leader of the opposition, as to whether all the conditions of the Patent Act had been complied with other than the payment of the fee, has not been answered. The only reply is that an officer of the department had appeared before the committee and stated that so far as the department knew, the conditions of the Patent Act had been complied with other than the payment of fees. That is not a satisfactory answer. How could the department know whether the conditions of the patent had been complied with other than the payment of the fee unless they had made special inquiry throughout the whole Dominion to ascertain whether any one had commenced the manufcature of the article after the lapse of time, within which he should have paid the money ? There is no evidence before the Senate to establish that fact, and, to my mind, that is an important fact which ought to be established before any patent is renewed. No doubt if the patent is of any value, manufacturers might be keeping a keen and close watch upon the patentee to ascertain whether the provisions of the Patent Act had been complied with, and the moment it was found they had not been complied with, they would take advantage of that fact and begin to invest money for the purpose of manufacturing the article. In such cases, men who had invested their money to prepare to manufacture this article should be protected.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—My hon. friend misunderstood me. What I wanted to say was that a petition was before the committee establishing the fact that there had been manufacturing under the patent and that petition was verified. There was a declaration establishing the truth of that petition before the committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Certified by whom ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The statement of the petitioner is that the article has been manufactured and sold in Canada ever since the date of the said patent, and all demands for the said vehicle tires have been and still are filled. That is verified by the affidavit of Houk. in which he solomnly declares that the allegations contained in the petition are true. I was misunderstood by the hon. gentleman when he said we had no evidence. We did have this evidence and that evidence was also before the department.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That strongly supports the argument made by the hon. member for Toronto (Hon. Mr. Jones) when he introduced the subject that these facts should be recited in the report or in the Bill when it comes before the House in order that every member may understand and vote intelligently on the subject. I know there is not one-half as much interest in the way of investigation taken in the renewal of patents at the present time as there was fifteen or twenty years ago when I was on the Private Bills Committee in the House of Commons. The Bill before us does not even mention the article that is patented, and, consequently if the notice given in the newspapers and in the 'Gazette' were of the same character as the preamble of this Bill, a manufacturer might have been manufacturing the article for months and years and never know what was meant by the notice. It simply refers to the number of the patent, without any reference whatever to the character of the article covered by the patent. Many patents have been renewed over and over again. Bills of this charactr are introduced every session. We have had nearly a dozen of them this year, and the most objectionable amendment was made in one instance. I hope that in future, in any application of this kind, the facts will be set forth in the preamble of the Bill and also what has really been done, in order that we may be able to vote upon the question intelligently. I do not know if my hon. friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Jones) intended to move an amendment to this Bill or to allow it to pass as it is. I frankly admit it is not as objectionable as the Bill to which I have referred, and for the objectionable character of which my hon. friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr) is responsible.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman either made the amendment or defended it with the earnestness which he always displays when he advocates any measure. I am glad this discussion has taken place, and I hope that in future the House will be given sufficient information when these questions come before us to enable us to cast our votes intelligently.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a third time and passed.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (AA) An Act for the relief of Asenath Ramsay.—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

Bill (136) An Act respecting a patent of the Cyclone Woven Wire Fence Company, Limited.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (25) An Act respecting the Niagara, Queenston and St. Catharines Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (65) An Act respecting the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.—(Hon. (Mr. Forget.)

Bill (103) An Act respecting the Quebec and Lake Huron Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Béique.)

Bill (141) An Act respecting the Saguenay and Gulf of St. Lawrence Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Tessier.)

Bill (151) An Act respecting the Ottawa, Brockville and St. Lawrence Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (125) An Act respecting the Algoma Central Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Friday, June 8, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

RULES OF THE SENATE.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER gave notice that he would move :

That the new Rules and Orders of the Senate, contained in the Report of the Committee of the Whole as adopted on the second day of May last, and set forth in the volume recently distributed to Senators entitled : 'Standing Rules and Orders of the Senate of Canada, adopted during the Session of 1906,' be made Standing Orders of the Senate, the Senators in attendance on the Session being summoned to consider the same under Rule 16.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not wish to interfere with the notice of motion given by the hon. gentleman, but would ask if the French translation of these rules already made could be distributed, that is, the translation having the same form and the same numbers as will appear in the English edition. We have not received the French translation yet; if it is ready for Wednesday next it will be all right.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They have not been printed in book form yet, but I understand they are translated.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They are translated, but I would like to have them distributed, because I would have a few suggestions to make as regards the French edition so as to render it more clear before being finally adopted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I hope that by Wednesday it will be ready.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved :

That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 12th instant, at three o'clock in the afternoon, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the resolution adopted by the Senate on the 11th May last.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I do not rise to oppose the motion, but wish to call the attention of the House to the long order paper which is now before us and our utter inability to finish it to-day in consequence of the amount of matter which had to go over from last week until Tuesday. I am perfectly willing to meet the views of hon. gentlemen who desire to go home, but it is rather hard on those of us who cannot go home, who have to travel 1,200 miles to reach our domiciles, and back again, to ask for an adjournment under the conditions which exist at this moment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman cannot go home, I will invite him to come to my home, and he will be back in Ottawa in time.

The motion was agreed to.

CHIEF JUSTICESHIP OF QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Has the position of assistant chief justice at Quebec been offered to the Honourable François Langelier ?

Has he accepted or refused the position so offered ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. Francois Langelier has been offered the position of chief justice of Quebec, not assistant, but as chief justice of Quebec, with a residence at Quebec. Mr. Justice Tait has been appointed chief justice of Montreal with a residence at Montreal

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a new departure.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The orders in council read that Mr. Justice Langelier is to be appointed chief justice of the court at Quebec, with a residence at Quebec, and Chief Justice Tait is appointed chief justice at Montreal, residence at Montreal.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Who is really the chief justice? Are there two chief justices now?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume, as far as the seniority goes, it rests with the one who is the longer on the bench.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to call the attention of the Secretary of State and the hon. gentleman from Stadacona to the fact that in answering these questions which are somewhat important in their character, the hon. gentleman is addressing the House in such a tone as just to reach the hon. gentleman from Stadacona. Now, the other members of the Senate are just as anxious to know what the answers are as the hon. gentleman from Stadacona.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I took an extract from the order in council which reads as follows :

Hon. F. Langelier a justice of the Supreme Court of the province of Quebec be appointed chief justice of the said court in the room of Chief Justice Routhier resigning to perform the duties of chief justice in the district of Quebec, and that his residence be at the city of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That gives two chief justices.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Who is in charge of the higher command?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume it will go by seniority. Justice Tait has been a long time on the bench.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is there a provision in the statutes permitting two chief justices?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot answer that myself, because I have not looked it up, but I am informed that the appointments follow the statute.

CHIEF JUSTICESHIP OF QUEBEC.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House a copy of the correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister of Canada, or any other member or ex-member of the present cabinet, and the Honourable Mr. Justice A. R. Routhier, ex-Chief justice of the Superior Court of Quebec, and the Honourable Mr. Justice François Langelier, on the subject of the appointment of the successor of the Honourable Mr. Justice Routhier as chief justice of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I brought up that question at council to-day, and was informed generally by the minister that there was no correspondence.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no correspondence ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No correspondence.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the orders of the day are called, I desire to refer to the discussion which took place yesterday in reference to a member of the House of Commons holding two seats. I am not bringing it up for the purpose of worrying the hon. Secretary of State, but there seems to be some doubt as to whether the contested election of Mr. Lemieux, the present Postmaster General, has been decided. There seems to have been a want of knowledge on the part of the government on this point. I frankly confess that, with some other friends on this side of the House, I was under the impression that there was no law preventing a member who had been elected for two seats from resigning one of them, even though the other had been contested. I am not yet aware whether there is any law on the statute-book upon that point, but I find on reference to 'May' that the principle is laid down very clearly that in such cases the member who has been elected for two constituencies cannot resign either of them until the contest is decided. At page 614 of the 10th edition of May, I find the following :

When a petition has been presented against his return for one place only, he cannot elect to serve for either. He cannot abandon another, and thus render void an election which may turn out to have been good in favour of some other candidate ; neither can he abandon the other seat, because if it should be proved that he is only entitled to sit for one, he has no election to make, and cannot give up a seat without having incurred some legal disqualification, such as the acceptance of office, or bankruptcy.

I have read that because I had been under a misapprehension myself. Now as to the other point, I find that the hon. senator from Stadacona was quite correct. The Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons for 1905, page 853, contains the following :

In re the election of a member for the House of Commons of Canada for the electoral district of Nicolet, held on the 27th October and the 3rd November last, 1904, being respectively the days of nomination and of votation.

Omer Camirand, jeweller, of the town of Nicolet, petitioner, vs.

The Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, advocate, of the city and district of Montreal, solicitor general, in the Government of Canada, respondent.

To the Hon. R. F. Sutherland,
Speaker of the House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Sir,—The undersigned, the Hon. Napoleon Charbonneau, and Hon. Richard Stanislas Cooke, judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, have the honour to transmit to you a copy of the judgment by them rendered in this matter, at Three Rivers, on the 24th June, 1905, dismissing the election petition of the said Omer Camirand, and declaring the said respondent, Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, duly elected a member of the House of Commons of Canada, for the electoral district of Nicolet.

The undersigned have no notes of the evidence to transmit to you, inasmuch as no evidence whatever was adduced before them in support of the said petition.

The undersigned further report that in the said petition it was alleged that corrupt practices had been resorted to during the election to which the said petition relates, but that it has not been proved that corrupt practices were committed by any of the candidates at the said election or with their knowledge and consent, nor by any other person; that they have no reason to suspect that the inquiry into the conduct of the said election had been rendered incomplete by the act of any of the parties to the said election, and that they do not consider it advisable that further inquiry should be made to ascertain whether corrupt practices extensively prevailed thereat.

Three Rivers, this 3rd day of July, 1905.

NAP. CHARBONNEAU, J.S.C.
R. S. COOKE, J.S.C.

It is clear that the hon. senator from Stadacona was quite within his right as regards the question which he put, and to which the hon. Secretary of State objected. Not only was he within his right, but as a matter of policy he was quite correct in asking for which constituency the Hon. Mr. Lemieux, who was lately sworn in as Postmaster General, had elected to sit. Though we may be senators, it does not follow that gentlemen interested in the elections either in the maritime provinces or in the province of Quebec take less interest in the matter than if they were not members of this House, and under the circumstances the petition against Mr. Lemieux having been dismissed nearly twelve months ago, is it not time that some member of the government should be able to tell the country which seat Mr. Lemieux has elected to sit for; or is the policy which was carried out by the Ross government in the province of Ontario to be re-enacted in the case of the province of Quebec. We all know that a constituency in the province of Ontario was kept vacant for political purposes for some eighteen months. Mr. Lemieux has held these two seats for nearly twelve months; how much longer is one of them to be kept vacant, either for the convenience of the government or to better prepare the electorate for an election in the interests of the government? It is well that the country should know and I do not think that, though we are senators, we are any the less entitled to receive the information asked for by the hon. gentleman from Stadacona.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I made no statement as to the time. I did not really know when the contest had been settled in Nicolet. I had never heard when the matter was decided. Of course it is a matter the House of Commons can deal with at any time they choose to do so.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (DD) An Act for the relief of Jane Frances Fields.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg.)

Bill (FF) An Act for the relief of Frederick William Wight.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg.)

Bill (EE) An Act for the relief of James Allen.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Cobourg.)

HAMILTON, WATERLOO AND GUELPH RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved the third reading of Bill (No. 104) An Act to incorporate the Hamilton, Waterloo and Guelph Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask the hon. gentleman to be kind enough to postpone the third reading of this Bill until Tuesday next. We want to know whether it is really a provincial or a federal Bill. The postponement will not delay the Bill very much.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—That phase of the question was fully discussed at the Railway Committee. We do not deny that it is entirely within the province of Ontario, but there are certain conditions connected with the project that absolutely necessitate the company coming here to get a charter. For instance they have to cross the canal, and Canadian Pacific Railway and Grand Trunk Railway and through the city of Hamilton. The result is, in order to get the necessary powers to enable them to carry out the undertaking, it is absolutely necessary that they should come under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Railway Act. That is why they are here. Of course if my hon. friend insists on having it left over until Tuesday I must consent.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I ask it as a favour.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Then I consent.

The order of the day was discharged and the third reading of the Bill was fixed for Tuesday next.

FORDING VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved the third reading of Bill (GG) an Act to incorporate the Fording Valley Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I gave notice yesterday of an amendment to this Bill. I desire that it be distinctly understood that I do not want to obstruct any legislation coming before this House. I should also like it to be understood that McKenzie & Mann are not interested in this Bill, because I find the solicitor for McKenzie & Mann, Mr. Smith, is in charge of this Bill, and I cannot be charged with opposing it in the interest of Mackenzie and Mann. I took exception yesterday to this Bill being, as I said at the time, railroaded through the Senate. Some hon. gentleman on the other side took exception to that term. Well, it is a matter of words. I think this Bill has been railroaded through, not only by the Senate but the committee, and when I give the history of the Bill, the hon. gentleman will agree with me that that is the fact. I do not think it is right or proper to suspend rules of this House on every occasion to allow private legislation to go through. I have not been accustomed to such practice in the other House, and have never seen it done anywhere else to the extent it is done here. I want to give the history of this Bill. The petition for it was presented May 18th, and rules 17 and 60 were suspended in order to allow the petition to be presented. The report of the Standing Orders Committee was read on June 5, I have the report here.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We will take the hon. gentleman's statement as correct.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The Standing Orders Committee reported on June 5 that the notice was short; that the time for notice had not expired as provided by the rules of the House, but they recommended that rule 49 be suspended. I want to say in connection with that, that the rule was not suspended. As I understand it, before a rule of this House can be suspended some member must move its suspension, and in this case when the chairman of the Committee on Standing Orders made his report, which report recommended that, as the time was short, this rule be suspended, I find that it was not suspended. I cannot discover any motion in the minutes of the House to that effect. However, it was suspended without a motion being made—rather it was not suspended and it has gone through without the rule being suspended. I find on June 6, the order paper showed the Bill was not printed, and on that day, rule 60 was suspended in connection with this Bill. I understand that while our order paper shows that the Bill was not printed, still some hon. member, or the hon. gentleman who had charge of the Bill, stated that it was printed. I am not in a position to contradict that, because I do not know anything about it. But, as far as we were concerned, we were dealing with matters which appeared on the order paper, and it appeared from the order paper that it was not printed. If it was printed I was not aware of it. I find again, on June 17, that the Bill was sent to the Railway Committee, and I found in the Railway Committee it was not advertised as being a Bill that was to be before that committee. I think this is rather an important and serious matter. We know as a matter of fact that in the case of legislation which goes through the Railway Committee there are parties who wish to support it, and also parties who desire to oppose it. Notices are sent to the people through the country in order that they may oppose the passage of legislation in this House if they so desire. Gentlemen come here the day the committee meets, or the evening previous, and they obtain a copy of the order paper. They find that the Bill in which they are interested is not on the orders, and they say 'There is nothing there which interests us particularly and we will go home,' and they send their solicitors home. What is their surprise when they learn next day that, although the Bill did not appear on the order paper, it had been railroaded through the committee and no opportunity had been given to them to object. I say that that is a serious objection to this mode of legislating. The same day that the Bill went through the Railway Committee it was reported to this House. That was on June 7, and amendments were made to the Bill. These amendments dealt with the principle of the Bill and were very important. The clerk of the House, who has a very good voice I am bound to say, rises from his seat and rattles off the amendments in such a quick manner that I venture to say not one-half of the members of this House can understand what he is reading. Would it not be right and just that these amendments should be laid on the Table for one day at least, in order that hon. members of this Chamber, would be able to see them and to inform themselves of the legislation that was being passed through the House. If every member of the House was a member of the Railway Committee, there might be some justification; but I suppose more than half the members of this House are not members of the Railway Committee, and I should think these hon. gentlemen would want to know what is going through the House. I submit they did not have a proper opportunity to consider and digest those amendments when the measure was rushed through as it was yesterday. Therefore I contend that this Bill should not have gone through. I wish to say again that this Bill was reported on June 7, and the amendments were read. Another hon. gentleman protested as well as I did against this Bill going through in the way in which it had been amended in committee. However the Bill was passed. I do not know whether I am right or wrong in reference to it. I am not as well versed in the procedure of this House as some hon. members are, but I think we should be allowed time to consider amendments. In connection with this Bill I have looked up the petition and the notices, and I find that the notices were short in every case. The notice was given in the 'Canada Gazette,' and in British Columbia, and also in Alberta, but the time was not up. When the chairman of the Standing Orders Committee made his report he did his duty, because he reported to the House that the time was short but asked in his report that a certain rule be suspended, which, as I pointed out, was not suspended. I desire to state to the House that the time of those notices would not expire until the 16th day of June. If hon. gentlemen will tell me that this is not railroading legislation through this Chamber I should like to know it, when we find the Bill, the notice of which does not expire until June 16, becoming law on June 7, 10 days before the time which is allowed by the House for the notice to run, I claim that is railroading legislation through the House. I have no wish to obstruct the Bill, but I wish to point out that I do not think it is right and proper for us to suspend the rules in this manner, to permit legislation to go through with a rush. I think we should have these measures properly advertised, and let them stand on the order paper, and take their turn, in the same way as the measure which stands in my name must take its course. It is a Senate measure, and is in the same position as this Bill. I have to take my chances whether the other House will sit long enough to put it through. I find also, in looking over the petition that it does not cover clause 9 of this Bill. That is a matter that is open to debate. I have an idea, however, when a railroad company comes to this House and asks for power to operate telephone and telegraph lines, that that should be asked for in the petition and mentioned in the notices. I find that they do not ask for this privilege either in the notices or the petition.

The petition reads as follows:—

The petition of the undersigned James Q. Pike, W. Herbert Evans, and Andrew Laidlaw, all of the city of Montreal, and William Johnston, of the city of Ottawa, humbly sheweth:

That your petitioners are desirous of obtaining an Act of the Parliament of Canada incorporating your petitioners and others under the name of the Fording Valley Railway Company, with power to lay out, construct and operate a line of railway from a point north of Fording river, thence northeasterly to the Fording river valley, thence following Fording river to the north of Henrietta creek, thence northeasterly along Henrietta creek to the Alberta boundary, thence northeasterly in the province of Alberta to a point at or near Okotoks; also branch lines up Gracel Ewin, Smith Lewis and Henrietta creeks, all in the province of British Columbia, with power to enter into agreements with or amalgamate with other railway companies, and with such other powers as are generally given to railway companies.

Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray that your honourable House may be pleased to pass an Act for the purposes mentioned.

Clause 9 in the Bill reads as follows:

9. The company may construct and operate telegraph and telephone lines along and upon its railway and branches, and establish offices for and undertake the transmission of messages for the public and collect tolls therefor.

I submit that if this company wanted the power to run a telephone business in British Columbia and Alberta they should have given the public notice of that fact in their petition and in the notice published in the papers. They are asking to collect tolls. It is not for the purpose of their business. They may claim that they have the right to do this without notice being given to the public. I submit this is not for the purpose of their business, because the sending of despatches along the line of railway is very different from establishing a telephone line for the purpose of collecting tolls from the public. I claim that should be in the notices as well as in the petition. Probably some hon. gentleman will be able to throw more light on that point than I can. I want to see this Bill go through, and I have simply drawn attention to the fact that it has proceeded a little too quickly, when we consider that the ink was hardly dry on the Bill before it became law as far as the Senate was concerned. I do not think the members of the House had an opportunity to consider the amendments, unless they obtained them in some other than the regular way before the Bill was put through. I do not wish to press this motion. I merely brought it up for the purpose of putting my views before the House. I think the Bill went through too quickly. The least we could have done was to leave it over until such time as the proper notice was given, that is to the 16th inst., before giving the Bill its third reading in this House.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman has reflected somewhat on the Committee on Standing Orders, and I wish to make an explanation. He complains not only on account of the action of the Standing Orders Committee, but on account of the action of the House itself. The Bill is travelling too fast to suit him—in fact, travelling faster than one he has charge of, and no doubt that is grating to any hon. gentleman when he finds his Bill cannot go as fast as the other fellow's. The petition in this case appeared before the Standing Orders Committee, short as to time of notice. Three out of five notices had been given. To-day I fancy four out of the five notices have been given, because, as my hon. friend states, the notices will be completed on the 16th June. The committee found there were reasons for the late application and found also that three notices had been given. They also found that before the Bill would get through the Senate the notices would be complete, because the Bill originates in the Senate. The committee found that it would be in the interest of legislation, and nobody would suffer, if they recommended the suspension of the rule. The report was presented accordingly and passed unanimously by the committee. There were other petitions as well as this in the same position and they were all treated in exactly the same way. No special case was made of this. The report was read in the House, explanations were asked for by hon. gentlemen, and there was some discussion. Then I moved the adoption of the report, and the motion was carried unanimously. My hon. friend says there should be a special motion made with reference to this—that in each particular case the rule should be suspended in so far as it relates to any petition; that is, that each petition should be dealt with separately afterwards by a separate motion.

I am not going to argue that point because that may be good practice, and in some places it is done in that way. For some years the reports of the Standing Orders Committee were never adopted directly by the House; they were, as I understand, presented and laid on the Table. Since I have been chairman I have always moved concurrence in the report, so that the House, by their concurrence, would sanction the action of the committee. If any hon. gentleman wished them to demur to the report, the door was wide open for them to do so. There has been no railroading in regard to this Bill. The hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill moved the suspension of rule 60, which relieves the Bill from being posted up six days in the corridor, and, as a consequence, the Bill appeared before the Railway Committee in a shorter time than it would have appeared had rule 60 not been suspended. The clerk at the Table, by an inadvertence, put down the words 'fifty-two' instead of 'sixty,' but—and the Speaker will bear me out in this—common sense would show that rule 52 has no application to the situation at that stage of the Bill. That was remedied and corrected at the Table, therefore the Bill appeared before the Railway Committee very properly, because a suspension of the rule had taken place. My hon. friend did not move the suspension of rule 60 in regard to his Bill, and, as a consequence, he got behind on account of the necessity for having the Bill posted up for six days, which may mean in some cases eight or nine days, because the committee may not meet just at the end of the six days. I am sure no one in this House has any desire to delay the legislation in which the hon. gentleman from Alberta is interested, nor any other legislation. Had he been alive to the situation and made the same motion which my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie made with reference to the Fording Valley River Railway Company's Bill, I am very sure that the House would have given him the same consideration. He did not ask for that consideration and, therefore, he cannot charge this House with any unfairness when he himself did not take the opportunity when it was open to him to move the suspension of the rule, and to ask the indulgence of the House upon that point.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I think, as chairman of the Railway Committee, I should take exception to the words used by the hon. gentleman from Alberta, in saying that legislation has been 'railroaded' through the committee. I do not remember being present at any meeting of the Railway Committee where Bills were more seriously and quietly considered, and better attention was paid to legislation, than at the last meeting of the committee, the one to which he specially referred. Why this was not on the order paper has been explained fully by the hon, gentleman from Killarney (Hon. Mr. Young). Through some inadvertence on the part of some of the officials of this House the number 52 was substituted for 60 in the motion for the suspension of the rules which was made by the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie, and consequently those who have charge of the work of preparing the order paper, seeing that rule 52 could not have any bearing on this subject at all, not being the proper rule, very naturally thought this Bill would not come up before the committee, until the motion was amended by inserting the number 60. At that time the order paper had been printed. I do not believe that this Bill should suffer in any way through a slip or a mistake made by some of the officials of this House. The Bill was brought up a couple of times during the sitting of the committee, so that every member was well aware that it would be brought before the House and dealt with. It was even suggested by the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie that this Bill should be taken before the other Bills but the hon. gentleman from Missisquoi (Hon. Mr. Baker) objected, saying that we would go through the order paper, and, if necessary, would sit after one o'clock in order to deal with this Bill. We went through the whole of the order paper, deliberately and quietly, giving full attention to every Bill, amending a great number of the Bills and when we came to this particular Bill, which is supposed to have been railroaded through, it was fully considered, and even amended. I think all the members of the committee should take exception to the use of such an expression as that used by the hon. gentleman. I do not think it is creditable to any committee of this House to say that we railroad legislation through. We have plenty of time to do our work, and we do it well. Every member of this House should resent the statement which has been made. As chairman of the committee I feel it very much. It is absolutely wrong to use such an expression in this House. It is suggested to me that it is a western term; I am glad it is not an eastern term, and it should not be employed on the floor of the House. Not only was this particular Bill carefully considered but two important amendments were inserted. They were carefully drawn up in writing by the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie and inserted in the Bill by the law clerk. I supervised the work myself.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him the question: Does he consider it right that the public should not get notice that a Bill is to come before the committee? When the order paper is printed that is the only notice that is given to the public. Not a man in this country who wants to oppose a Bill has any other means of knowing whether it is coming up before the committee, and if he does not get notice in that way he will not be in a position to oppose the Bill. The expression I used is a western expression, and I think it applies. That Bill had no right to come before the committee on a day when the public had no notice of the fact that it was coming up.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I understand that the order paper is only for the convenience of the members of the committee. I do not understand that it is circulated amongst the public at all. I am quite willing to stand corrected if I am wrong. I understand that the order papers are for the use and convenience of members of the committee, so that we may know in what rotation the Bills will come up, and, I say once more, that I think the Railway Committee in regard to that Bill have done their duty as they have done in regard to all Bills coming before them, and it is very wrong to cast such an aspersion on the work of the committee.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It appears to me that there is just cause of complaint as to the manner in which this Bill has been treated from its inception. I am not adverse to the construction of this road; I am not here to oppose in any way the construction of the road, and it is not my intention, in taking exception to the manner in which it has been proceeded with up to the present time, to do so for the purpose of obstructing. But what I complain of is that a reasonable and fair chance was not given to parties affected by the measure to oppose the Bill, if they felt disposed to do so. We found that the notices will not expire before the 16th of this month. The people living in that locality may feel disposed, with reason, to object to this Bill and thinking that it will not pass for a certain time may have postponed coming to Ottawa to take action. That being so, is it not a good reason why the Bill should not be hurried through until everybody interested in it is given a fair opportunity to present his views before the committee? We are told that the suspension of the rule has been recommended by the chairman of the Standing Orders Committee. The rules of parliament provide that any suspension of a rule ought to be made a special motion. It is all very well for the chairman to suggest that the rules be suspended, but that is not enough. Furthermore, if objection is raised against concurrence in the report of the committee without due notice, that objection should be entertained. My hon. friend from Prince Albert did object to concurrence in the amendment, and asked that the report be laid over for another day to give members an opportunity to examine the amendment. That was his just right, but it was refused him, and he has just cause of complaint. Was it an unreasonable thing that the Bill should be laid over for one day at least, as other Bills were? We find in the minutes that six or seven reports from the Railway Committee were allowed to stand until to-day. Why should this Bill be given a preference over all the other Bills? It is said that if this Bill is delayed the House of Commons may suddenly get through with their work, with the result that this Bill is likely to be slaughtered. Is that a justification of the violation of the rules of parliament?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Will the hon. gentleman tell us where the rules are violated?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—They are not allowed to have their proper legitimate force, and that is a violation. The rules provide that the amendments should stand over until the day following the presentation of the report.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Will the hon. gentleman read the rule?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I will see what a better authority than myself has to say on this matter. Bourinot, at page 555, says:

Many motions for concurrence in reports of select committees are brought up without notice and allowed to pass by unanimous consent.

Was this consent yesterday unanimous? I think the Speaker will bear me out in saying that objection was made.

In all cases objection may be taken, and it is the regular course to give notice.

Did my hon. friend give notice of this? No. The chairman of the committee merely recommends that such a thing should take place.

It is consequently always done when there is objection taken by one or more members opposed to the report. A debate is likely to arise on the matter, the report of the Committee on Private Bills is not concurred in.

Is this authority good or not good? If it be good authority, the amendments should not have been concurred in yesterday.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I am reading from 'Bourinot's Parliamentary Proceedings,' page 555. It is pretty good authority, almost as good as some members of this House. It ought to be satisfactory to my hon. friend. I will send him over the book if he wishes.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I am not questioning the hon. gentleman's honesty at all. He said he was going to read a rule to show that the hon. member from Prince Albert was wrong yesterday. I asked him to read that rule. He had the Rules in his hand but dropped it and took up Bourinot instead.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I am reading the best authority on procedure in committees of this House. Has any reason been given why this Bill should be hurried through parliament? My hon. friend the chairman of the Railway Committee presented a number of reports yesterday, all of which stand over until to-day, but Bill (GG), forsooth, had to be concurred in yesterday. In all fairness, all these Bills should be treated in the same manner. Then as to whether the hon. member from Prince Albert had the right to refer this Bill back to the Railway Committee for consideration, I find that rule 48 provides :

A report from a committee may be referred back to them for reconsideration, or with instructions to reconsider, or amend, or strike out clauses, or add new ones. A Bill reported from a committee may also be referred back in the same way.

Even amendments may be sent back, and all that my hon. friend asks is that that should be done. He is desirous not to do anything to delay the Bill if there be just ground to fear that delay may ultimately defeat it. But if the Bill should be defeated, on the promoters must rest the responsibility. I say that the motion moved by my hon. friend is a just and proper one, and that the rules of parliament in this case have been violated. I am not going to oppose the Bill, but I hope that in future every Bill will receive fair consideration at the hands of committees as well as in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There may seem to be an opinion that the rules of this House will permit of reckless legislation, but we should not forget the fact that we have rules perfectly safeguarding every stage of any legislation which may be submitted to the House, and while I do not express approval of the very hasty way in which the Bill in question was put through its various stages, yet it must be said that every hon. gentleman in this House is quite as great a sinner as his neighbour with reference to this particular Bill. My hon. friends could at the earlier stages of this Bill have protected themselves from any alleged railroading of a Bill through the Chamber by refusing to assent to the suspension of the rules. There is no good reason why hon. gentlemen in this House, if they have any objection to suspending the rules for the purpose of expediting or accelerating the passage of a Bill, should hesitate to object. Of course that involves hon. gentlemen being diligent with reference to every step taken in the passage of legislation. It is very desirable and very commendable that every hon. member should be diligent with reference to the transaction of public business, and I know of no better way of exhibiting that particular virtue than by keeping a very close track of every stage of a Bill. The discussion which has taken place to-day will not be prejudicial to the interest of future legislation, but, certainly, no reflection should be cast upon either the rules of the House or the members of the House because in this particular case the House apparently unanimously agreed to suspend the rules, and this could have easily been averted had any hon. gentlemen refused to consent to the suspension of the rules.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I want to say, hon. gentlemen——

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Have I not the right to make a motion ?

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman has exhausted his rights.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have only spoken once on my notice of motion, and I think I have a right to speak in closing the debate.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman has not moved anything.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have the right to move the adjourment of the House.

The SPEAKER—It is too late.

The Bill was read the third time.

The SPEAKER—This Bill has been read the third time and is now ready to pass.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I want to say in reply to the chairman of the Railway Committee that I did not want to cast any reflection on the members of that committee. It is not very likely that I would, because I am a member of that committee myself, and I am speaking on the Bill at the present time. This argument applies to this measure. I was going to say that the term 'railroading' appears to be too strong for some of my hon. friends and I will withdraw it. I desire to say that at every stage of this Bill the rules of the House have been suspended. If hon. gentlemen will follow the matter, they will see that this statement is quite correct, that from the day the petition was presented, and the day it went to the Standing Orders Committtee, the time that it went into the committtee and came back to this House, and even to-day, the rules have been suspended right along, and now I am accused of saying that the Bill has been rushed. I am simply drawing the attention of the House to these facts, and I do not wish to say anything that would be offensive to anybody. I am simply stating that this Bill has been put through a little too quickly, casting no reflections on any one. The hon. chairman of the Standing Orders Committee intimated that if I had been as sharp as some hon. members I would have got my Bill through this House by this time. I may say that I am protesting against a violation of the rules of the House, and I do not intend to ask any suspensions of the rules in order to put any legislation through this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I said the door was open to him as well as to any hon. member to ask the indulgence of the House as far as his Bill was concerned, and that he has neglected to do so.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (117) An Act to incorporate the Erie, London and Tillsonburg Railway Company. —(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (139) An Act respecting the Northern Commercial Telegraph Company.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

EXTRAJUDICIAL EMPLOYMENT OF JUDGES' BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called :

Second reading (Bill I) An Act repecting the Extrajudicial Employment of Judges.—(Hon. Mr. Ferguson.)

Hon. Mr. DAVIS.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I move that this order of the day be discharged and that it be placed on the orders for Tuesday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would like to ask the hon. Secretary of State whether any steps have been taken in the direction of passing a Bill in the lower House affecting the extrajudicial employment of judges? I understood some time ago that one of the reasons why this Bill was delayed by the hon. member from Marshfield was that it was understood that the Minister of Justice at that time was about introducing a Bill in the same direction. Whether it went as far as this Bill or not I do not know, but can either of the members of the government in this House inform us whether a Bill of that kind has been introduced, and if not whether it is the intention to introduce it ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think a Bill has been introduced. I have not seen it on the notice paper of the House of Commons. I doubt whether one would be introduced at this period of the session.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I may explain that no Bill covering these points has been introduced in the House of Commons, but as I explained on the first reading of the Bill, the late Minister of Justice expressed himself quite strongly in favour of the principle of this Bill in discussing a motion by the hon. gentleman from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) with regard to the judges in other respects.

The motion was agreed to.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (14) An Act to amend the Weights and Measures Act,

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I ask my right hon. friend what, generally, has led to this amendment of the Act? Possibly there are facts which may be interesting to the House.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The Bill is slightly analogous to a celebrated Bill which my hon. friend, doubtless, has heard of, which was introduced at the last session of the Irish parliament, by which it was proposed to enact that a quart bottle in future should hold a quart. The object of the Bill is to define the capacity of cans used for selling milk. It has been alleged—and the matter was pretty fully investigated before the Committee on Agriculture in the other House—that the farmers in various portions of the country, more particularly in the neighbourhood of Toronto, were being compelled practically to sell eight and one-half or nine gallons of milk for eight; that by some process the Irish rule was reversed—by some process best known to the dealers in milk, the can in which the milk was sold had grown gradually larger, so that from being intended to hold eight gallons, it had gradually grown to nine, while the farmer continued to get paid for eight gallons only. That appears to have been proved to the satisfaction of the Agriculture Committee; at any rate the desire is to have a standard. The standard can is to be eight gallons, the half standard will be four, and a quarter can will be two gallons. That, in brief, is the whole object of the Bill. I do not think it can do any particular harm, and I trust the farmers will in future get full pay for the milk they deliver, and I trust the milk they deliver will continue to be of good, sufficient and satisfactory quality.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment, and it was then read a third time.

SPAIN DIVORCE BILL.

REPORT FROM COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

The order of the day being called:

Consideration of the fifteenth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce, to whom was referred the petition of Osprey G. Valentine Spain, together with the evidence.—(Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer.)

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—In moving the adoption of this report I would point out that this is a case—one that very seldom occurs at our Divorce Committee—in which one member of the committee did not concur in the report altogether. One of our members objected as follows:

I concur in the foregoing report, but only in so far as it is founded upon the existence of collusion between the parties. Had not the agreement evidenced by Exhibit No. 2 been established, I would have considered the proof sufficient to warrant the granting of the prayer of the petition.

JAMES McMULLEN.

From this the House will infer that the rest of the committee were agreed that there was not sufficient evidence of adultery to warrant granting the prayer of the petitioner. There is recited, in addition, in this case an agreement which the committee held to be a collusive agreement between the parties to this divorce by which the respondent had made a confession of adultery to a party who was employed as an agent by the petitioner. This confession was obtained under certain conditions whereby the respondent was to allow the divorce to go against her under this agreement.

Rule 115 states:

Condonation, collusion or connivance between the parties is always a sufficient ground for rejecting a Bill of divorce, and shall be inquired into by the committee. And should the committee have reason to suspect collusion or connivance, and in their opinion it is desirable that fuller inquiry should be made, such opinion and the reasons therefor shall be communicated to the Minister of Justice, that he may intervene and oppose the Bill should the interest of public justice in his opinion call for such intervention.

This does not mean that we should report the evidence to him and ask his opinion on it, but he takes the position in regard to our committee that is taken in the English divorce courts by the officer called the King's proctor. In the divorce proceedings in England a court does not pronounce a decree for an absolute divorce when the case is heard. They pronounce what is called a decree nisi. Nisi is the Latin for unless—unless within six months after that decree nisi is pronounced, objection is taken on any point to the decree being made absolute an application is then made to the court to pronounce the decree absolute, which is generally done. In those cases intervention is made by an officer called the King's proctor, a professional gentleman, appointed I believe, by the government, and he is obliged to intervene in any case where attention is called to facts after the decree is pronounced which would interfere with having the decree made absolute. In the law of divorce by Dixon it is laid down under the head of intervention:

Intervention is the interposing by a third person, not originally a party to the suit, but claiming an interest in the matter in issue, in defence of his own interest, either personal, or as to property which he could not otherwise protect.

It goes on to recite who is to intervene:

Interveners are of three classes :

1. Persons whose names are brought into divorce suits as alleged adulterers, and who intervene because they are not made parties.

2. Any person who can show a ground of intervention in divorce or nullity suits, at the time when the law permits such person to intervene.

3. The Queen's proctor, who may intervene officially, or as one of the public.

It goes on to state the object of intervention :

Their object in intervening is to protect their own rights, and, in the case of the official intervener—the Queen's proctor—the rights of those whom he represents, i.e., the public. The grounds and time of intervention vary, according to the object of the intervener.

3. The Queen's proctor : Intervening officially : At any time during the progress of the suit, and before the decree absolute, in a suit for divorce or nullity of marriage, the Queen's proctor may intervene, on information received, in his official capacity, on the ground of collusion only.

Now, collusion is one of the points we have particularly to look into. When a case is brought before the committee and the committee has evidence of collusion, it is obligatory upon them to ascertain the facts as fully as possible. The principal authority which is up to date, I think, is the case of Churchward against Churchward :

If the initiation of a divorce suit be procured, and its conduct (especially if abstention from defence be a term) provided for by agreement, this constitutes collusion, although it does not appear that any specific fact has been falsely dealt with or withheld.

The petitioner made an agreement with the respondent who had committed adultery with the co-respondent, by which she undertook to settle money on the child of the marriage, and he to take proceedings for divorce, which she was not to defend and of which she was to pay the cost, he not claiming damages against the co-respondent. The agreement was disclosed to the court. The petitioner did not connive at the adultery, and no false testimony was adduced before the court in proof of it. It was not shown that there were any specific facts, material to defence or recrimination, which might have been brought forward by the respondent ; but it was not proved that there were no material facts which she might have brought forward by way of defence of recrimination :

Held, on the intervention of the Queen's proctor, that the agreement constituted collusion between the petitioner and the respondent, so as to disentitle the petitioner to a divorce.

In this case there was an appeal. The president, Right Hon. Sir F. H. Jeune, in giving his judgment, said :

It is clear that Lord Hannon did not intend to insist on such facts being decisive, if they were material, because it would appear, from the case of Bacon vs. Bacon and Ashby, decided shortly before Hunt vs. Hunt, that he considered that agreement between the parties to withhold relevant evidence was one form of collusion ; and also that the evidence need be relevant only and not decisive. The latter point is now established by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Butler vs. Butler, which I recently followed, in Rogers vs. Rogers. It must be remembered, also, that in summing up it is not necessary, or indeed desirable, to do more than state as much law as covers the case in hand ; and I think that the view of Lord Hannon, expressed in his summing-up, ought not to be put higher than this, that, where the main evidence of collusion is an agreement not to defend, in order to find collusion you must see that it was intended to conceal material facts.

The president goes on to deal with the intervention by the Queen's proctor and he goes on to recite certain decisions of the House of Lords. He says :

Those decisions of the House of Lords have been repeatedly recognized as authorities, and notably so, in a case I shall presently mention, by this court. By its standing order of March 28, 1798, No. 142 (Macqueen's Practice of the House of Lords, pages 528,791) the House of Lords imposed on itself the duty of inquiring 'whether there has or has not been any collusion, directly or indirectly, on the part of the petitioned, relative to any act of adultery that may have been committed by his wife, or whether there be any collusion, directly or indirectly between him and his wife, or any other person or persons, touching the said bill of divorce, or touching any proceedings or sentences of divorce had in the Ecclesiastical Court at his suit, or touching any action at law which may have been brought by such petitioner against any person for criminal conversation with the petitioner's wife.'

Then in the Chisim case the judgment reads :

Now it cannot possibly be said that in this case it was shown that any specific material facts were concealed, and it is expressly stated that the adultery was proved. It seems to be therefore that no collusion is possible except that the House of Lords considered collusion to be made out from the fact that the parites in the conduct of the proceedings were acting in concert. No doubt the inference was that where such concert existed it was impossible to be sure that all the truth was presented ; but the point is that proof of concert in the conduct of the proceedings was held sufficient to engender such a doubt.

In the Edwards case the report states :

The evidence of adultery in this case was clear, but a bond signed by the petitioner, Thomas Edwards, was produced, dated December 10, 1778, securing payment of £45 to his wife Judith Edwards, who on the other hand conditioned on her part that she and all those who were or might become concerned for her in her defence to the said Thomas Edwards obtaining a divorce, would not give any necessary delay in the proceeding thereof, but in all things conform herself and themselves so as to bring the suit and proceedings to as speedy an issue as possible, yet nevertheless, not so as to weaken any real defence that the said Judith might be able to make to the said proceedings, or the said Thomas Edwards obtaining his said divorce. The Bill after counsel had been heard as to effect of this document was rejected, and it was so treated therefore, merely on proof that the parties had agreed that there should be no defence, and this single fact was considered to establish collusion.

He further goes on to say :

On the whole it appears to me that the authority of the House of Lords, as shown by its practice, and of Sir Cresswell Cresswell, as well as of Byles and Wightman, J.J., is decidedly in favour of the position that, if the initiation of a suit be procured, and its conduct (especially if abstention from defence be a term) provided for by agreement, that constitutes collusion, although no one can put his finger on any fact falsely dealt with or withheld ; and I do not think that the authority of Lord Stowell, Dr. Lushington, Lord Penzance, or though no doubt this is less clear, of Lord Hannon, can be invoked in favour of a contrary opinion.

It must always be remembered that, on grounds of public policy, second, perhaps, to none in importance, the marriage status cannot, however much the parties to it may otherwise desire, be altered, except on the fulfilment of certain conditions prescribed by law, conditions which relate to the conduct not only of the person against whom, but of the person by whom, relief is sought.

I am not, therefore, prepared to say that the reason underlying what I think is the effect of the decision of the House of Lords and of the Acts of 1857 and 1860, may not be that, when the parties to a suit are acting in complete concert, the court is deprived of the security for eliciting the whole truth afforded by the contest of opposing interest and is rendered unable to pronounce a decree of dissolution of marriage with sufficient confidence in its justice.

Further on the report states :

But it may well be worth while to prevent the parties to a suit from binding themselves by an agreement, which, if there be anything to hide, renders it obligatory on both of them to keep the veil drawn, at least if a petitioner makes the institution of his suit and its proceedings a matter of bargain, stifling defence and recrimination by a covenant of silence, he cannot wonder if the court declines to be satisfied that it has before it all material facts. Such a petitioner has mistaken his position. 'Pacem duello miscuit,' he appears before the court in the character of an injured husband asking relief from an intolerable wrong but, if at the same time he is acting in concert with the authors of the wrong, and is subjecting his rights to pecuniary stipulations, he raises more than a doubt whether in the words of Lord Stowell ; He has received a real injury and bona fide seeks relief.

I have one more authority to quote, which will be found in probate division, 1890, Butler versus Butler :

In my opinion it is very important that in every case brought before the court the proceedings shall be fairly and properly taken, that all judgments shall be fairly obtained and that the court shall refuse to make a decree not only and merely where it finds that the facts suppressed might lead to the conclusion that a matrimonial offence has been committed, but also where it finds as in this case, that the parties by an agreement. between them, have prevented material facts from being brought before the court. Here, by agreement, between the parties, the matter was not fully brought before the court, and that is collusion. It is not necessary that the petition should be presented in collusion. It is enough if it is presented or prosecuted in collusion.

It is said, however, that there is no collusion here, because the matters which were kept back from the court were not facts which would lead to the conclusion that the wife had committed a matrimonial offence. Perhaps they would ; for the jury differed. But, in my opinion, in such a state of things, it is enough, if the parties have agreed together not to put before the court material facts relevant to the issue which has to be tried.

We follow, as far as we can, the English practice, and in this case the English practice lays down very clearly what we have to examine and look into, and while, as I said before, this is not the sole ground upon which the committee refuses to grant the divorce, we thought we had quite sufficient under the authority laid before us on that ground alone to refuse to do so.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—With regard to the agreement for collusion, of course there was an agreement, but that agreement has been broken by the wife coming forward in defence of her case. The agreement for collusion, therefore, falls to the ground. I am not a lawyer, but that appears to be plain common sense. When an agreement is broken by either sides it falls to the ground. If there ever was a case where a man ought to get a divorce it is in this case. The woman behaved in a scandalous way and the man should have his divorce.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not in favour of granting this divorce, but I cannot vote for the report of the committee. I take this view chiefly on the ground taken by the hon. gentleman from Victoria. The report of the committtee is as follows :

5. Your committee, after mature consideration, have resolved to recommend that the prayer of the petition be not granted.

6. In their opinion, the document produced on behalf of the petitioner and filed as exhibit No. 2, a copy of which is appended hereto, taken in conjunction with the testimony of the petitioner, of St. Charles B. Gywnn, one of the petitioner's witnesses, of the respondent, and of Reginald Salmon, the co-respondent, is evidence of such collusion as to bring the proceedings within the provisions of rule 152 of the Senate, hereto appended.

Now, the hon. chairman of the committee has quoted from 'Dixon on Divorce,' and also cites two recent cases in the Probate Division in England. I shall not venture to question the authority of the cases which he has cited, but it seems to me that they do not apply. In the first place, they are decisions under the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, passed by the imperial parliament in 1857. That Act took divorce away from the jurisdiction of the House of Lords in England and placed it in the hands of the court; and our committee does not follow the practice of the court, but follows the practice of the House of Lords which had prevailed up to the Act of 1857. I cite Brown and Powles on Divorce, and I find collusion defined at page 81 in this way:

> Collusion, as defined by former writers, is different from that which the Divorce Act appears to contemplate. The word was formerly used in the sense of connivance and a conspiracy between the parties to commit the offence.

There is nothing of the sort alleged in this case. It continues:

> But the collusion contemplated by the statute is a conspiracy in presenting or prosecuting the petition and embraces cases where the original ground of petition may not have been connived at, but where the parties subsequently agreed to use it as means for a divorce.

I think it is exceedingly doubtful whether the law with respect to collusion which prevails in England would apply in this case. But I take the authority which the hon. gentleman has himself cited, the 'Law of Divorce,' by Dixon, and I find this language at the foot of page 382:

> The collusive agreement must be brought home to the actual parties. The solicitors for the petitioner and respondent so conducted the suit as to raise a suspicion of collusion. The Queen's proctor intervened. Neither of the actual parties knew of the irregularities of their respective solicitors. The court there acquitted them of collusion.

What does the evidence in this case show? I turn to page 17 of the report of the committee and I find that Gwynn, the witness who drew up this agreement which it is alleged was the collusive agreement, was asked by the chairman:

> Q. For whom were you acting ?—A. For Captain Spain, but without his knowledge of the agreement.

Then at page 23, the same witness says in answer to the counsel for Mrs. Spain:

> Q. You had authority from Captain Spain to draw out that agreement in which it appears ?—A. I had no authority concerning any agreement. It was never spoken of between Captain Spain and myself.

And further down:

> Q. Do you mean to tell me that she entered into this agreement with you without you letting her understand that you had authority from Captain Spain to make it ?—A. I let her understand that I was Captain Spain's attorney, and I told her that the question of divorce had never been discussed between Captain Spain and myself.
> Q. But you had authority to enter into an agreement ?—A. I did not tell her anything of that kind.
> Q. You deny it ?—A. I do.
> Q. When did you first know that any divorce was contemplated between Captain Spain and his wife ?—A. It was some little time after that. I cannot fix the date. I had a letter, I believe, from McGiverin & Haydon. It was the first I heard of it, or a letter from Captain Spain in which he said he had instructed McGivern & Haydon.
> Q. It was some time after the agreement was made, was it not?—A. Yes.
> Q. How long after ?—A. A week or ten days.
> Q. Before you knew of any divorce proceedings being contemplated ?—A. Yes.

Then further down:

> Q. You cannot explain it ?—A. I am sure I knew nothing about Captain Spain's desire for a divorce; he may have spoken of it, but he expressed no desire.

I contend that even under the English law as it stands to-day the allegation that there was collusion is not borne out. The collusion should concern the petition, and at this time there was no petition, and according to the authority quoted by the hon. chairman of the committee this collusive agreement had to be brought home to Captain Spain, and it was not.

These may be looked upon, to a certain extent, as arguments more suited to a court than to the Senate, but the hon. chairman of the committee cannot, nor can any hon. gentleman here, find any case in the English law reports where a divorce petition has been fought from start to finish and where it was held there was collusion. What is the object of prohibiting collusion? It is to hinder parties from entering into an agreement, often to conceal facts which would prevent the divorce being granted or to save expense, or some other reason—to conceal the real state of affairs from the court—and allow the divorce to go without opposition, but as soon as there is a strenuous opposition offered to a divorce, then the collusion ends; the reason why collusion vitiates the application ends, and here we have a case which from the day the petition was served on the respondent up to the close of the hearing, was fought in the most strenuous way by the respondent. To my mind it is almost trifling with the intelligence of the Senate to say there has been any collusion. Granting that this was a collusive agreement, if in pursuance of that agreement Mrs. Spain had refrained from appearing, if she had offered no opposition to her husband getting a divorce, then I admit that the production of this agreement would. under the recent English cases at any rate, have been held to be evidence of collusion, and it would be for the House then to decide whether or not it was such evidence as would prevent the granting of the divorce. But instead of doing that, Mrs. Spain from the time the petition was served on her fought it most strenuously, and it seems unreasonable to claim that this man should not get his divorce on that ground. I am not anxious that he should get his divorce, but respect for our own position as a judicial body should hinder us from refusing the relief that the petitioner seeks on that ground. I understood the chairman of the committee to say that the evidence was not considered satisfactory—that there was some difference of opinion in the committee on that point, but that they had agreed on this question of collusion. If the majority of the committee concluded that the guilt of the respondent was not satisfactorily proved, I shall be delighted to vote for the report, but I do not feel that I can vote for a report which is based on what I consider an essentially wrong principle.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I think it is important that we should not place on record a judgment which certainly is open to question and which if placed on record might be a precedent to be followed in other cases. I am not going to make any remarks at all with reference to what one might call the merits or demerits of the case, as to whether there was or was not such a breech of martial duty as to justify divorce, because I do not apprehend that judgment has been pronounced upon that point. If there is, if the committee have come to a conclusion, I think it is very important that the conclusion should be placed on record and the judgment of the Senate might be based on that one way or the other, but it is unfortunate that a case which, to say the least of it, would only be by the strictest possible construction and on the closest possible margin of authority should be determined to be a case of collusion such as this is. Our rule is set out in the proceedings here. We have propounded and interpreted collusion in our rule. That is such collusion as would be sufficient to bar the party. The rule reads :

Collusion in the proceedings for divorce.

First we have in the rules :

Connivance at or condonation of the adultery.

Those are acts preceding anything in the divorce proceedings and they relate to the ground for procuring a divorce. The other is entirely one with reference to collusion in the proceedings for divorce. That points to some arrangement or agreement by the parties for the suppression of the facts or for the presentation of a case different from what it actually was. It is perfectly true that in England there have been a series of cases, all of which are reviewed in the leading cases, adverted to in the report, and the different rulings there have been considered. The effect of those, however, has not been in any way controlled or qualified, but the decision in that case went upon this ground—and it seems to me it is entirely distinguishable—that while there was an agreement between the parties respecting the proceedings in a divorce being taken in the case in question, and there was no admission, on the face of the agreement, of guilt, there was an agreement that the applicant for a divorce should pay a sum of money, the benefit of which the respondent in that case should receive, and that there should be no proceedings against the correspondent in respect to any allegations that were made. Now, in this case, whilst there is an agreement on the part of the wife that she will not contest the proceedings, there is no provision for payment to her of any money or of any consideration, nor is there any provision made for her getting the benefit of any estate or advantage out of the husband's estate, either present or future. On the contrary, she releases and abandons everything of the kind and instead of there being, therefore, a consideration given to her, an inducement held out to her, a special advantage which would have the affect or might have the affect of supressing evidence or of helping to get sufficient evidence to enable the applicant to get his divorce, quite the contrary appears. There is an admission of guilt, and there is in addition to that the fact that the case is contested. All that can be said against the applicant is that he is a party to a collusion by which she admits her guilt, in the face of a document which is to be used, and may be used, and is only to be given for the purpose of being used in the divorce proceedings, and the co-respondent is named as the person with whom the respondent had been guilty. There is an agreement on her part that she will not contest the proceedings, and, if the matter had stood in that way, that would have been collusion; but we have that agreement absolutely ignored by her contesting and disputing and, as far as she could, endeavouring to defeat the application. How is it possible to say, whatever paper may have been signed in which there was an admission of guilt, when that document is followed up by a contest on her part, by a most determined opposition to the application, by the assertion of her innocence afterwards, and by the endeavour to get the committee to find that she is free from such a charge, how is it possible to say there is collusion between them in these proceedings? I am talking of collusion in the proceedings. This paper was obtained prior to the application occurring. What was intended here was collusion in the matters which are matters of trial—collusion in having the proceedings so conducted that the whole facts should not be brought out—collusion in having the proceedings so carried on that the truth will be to some extent suppressed, and what may not be the truth will appear. That is collusion in the proceedings. The prior entering into an agreement on the part of the respondent that she will not appear and defend whilst accompanied by an admission of her guilt, followed by her appearance here and her defence, surely cannot be said in any sense to be collusion? I take it that is the distinction which can be drawn in this case. At all events it is one so close to the line that I think it would be unfortunate if this report stood on this ground. For my part I think it would be much better to refer the report back. My motion would be that the report be not now concurred in, but that it be referred back to the Divorce Committee for further consideration, and if necessary for further evidence, so that if there is anything further to connect this agreement or for anything further to be brought out in the proceedings, it can be done. There is this further fact, that it must be borne in mind that collusion is usually set up by the respondent. He conceals nothing from the tribunal, the committee, but on the contrary opens his case by bringing forward this agreement and uses it as an admission of her guilt. He comes in good faith, presents his case and establishes it. In the case where the Queen's proctor intervened the respondent did not defend at all, and it was the Queen's proctor who brought forward this matter for defence. It seems to me, therefore, that the matter should be referred back, and I would say that even if the House were in doubt about the matter, that it should be referred back for further consideration and the committee could then report, under the rule, for a submission to the Minister of Justice, and they would have a definite, authoritative guidance under which they might proceed. I, therefore, move that the report be referred back to the committee for consideration to deal with the case on its merits or to have a reference to the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (C.B.)—My views of the tribunal which we have in connection with divorce cases have been fully expressed several times already, not that I have not the greatest respect for the men who compose that committee. In the most of cases that have been reported I have thrown the reports in the waste-paper basket, because I did not consider it was very nice literature according to my way of thinking, but knowing Captain Spain, and having had some business with him in his official capacity, I took the trouble to read part of the evidence of that trial. I am not through with it yet, but as far as I have gone my judgment is that if I were a member of that committee I would be inclined to grant him his divorce, and I believe that there are several members in this House who agree with that opinion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend permit me to state to the House, without going into the merits of the case, the rather difficult position from a legal standpoint which the members of the Divorce Committee found themselves in as to this agreement. I would advance for the consideration of the House two or three propositions which confronted the committee. In the first place the agreement having been obtained by the petitioner, it was at the time of getting same a collusive agreement. I think that will be manifest. It was given in contemplation of divorce proceedings about to be taken. The petitioner having obtained this agreement, which is clearly collusive within its four corners, we must therefore assume that it was obtained for collusive purposes. Then, in the next place, the question arises whether if this collusive agreement were used by him for purposes of evidence it would lose the particular quality which attached to it at the time of his obtaining it. Could he blow hot and cold so to speak? Could he approbate and reprobate? If it were collusive at the time he obtained it, and he deliberately used it before the committee, did it then lose by reason of the then immediate circumstance the collusive nature which of necessity attached to it at the time he obtained it? That is a proposition which I submit to hon. gentlemen; and in the next place, it was used by the petitioner to establish the adultery of the respondent, and I must say that in my judgment it was the most conclusive evidence before the committee of her adultery. Could he then use it for a purpose other than for which he obtained it without assuming all the legal obligations which necessarily attached to it at the time he secured it? He obtained it for one purpose and used it for another purpose, namely, to establish adultery, which it unquestionably did. Then having used it could he be heard to say before the committee that notwithstanding his having obtained it for collusive purposes it was not collusive. With these propositions before us we have what I might term to be the final proposition. Did her contestation of the proceedings, notwithstanding the use of the agreement by the petitioner, remove the agreement beyond the doctrine of collusion. Now you have to consider in this connection that notwithstanding her contestation of the proceedings, the agreement appears upon the record and appears as having been placed there by the petitioner who obtained it in such a way as to preclude at the time of his getting it the remedy which he sought by the divorce proceedings. These are some of the difficulties or legal complications that confronted the committee in considering whether this was a collusive proceeding or not. I have no intention of reviewing the evidence. I think I might say that the committee, although each member thereof had his opinion as to whether the respondent was guilty of adultery or not, collectively did not express an opinion upon the merits. The legal results attaching to this agreement rendered it in their judgment unnecessary to go into the question of dealing with the other branch of the case, hence we, being unanimous on the question as to the collusiveness of the agreement, agreed to the report accordingly.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It seems to me that the agreement is complete evidence of collusion, and the very fact that the wife has appeared afterwards in this trial does not, as has been said, cause the argument drawn from the agreement to fall to the ground. To my mind the appearance of the wife in this case is but a second move in the way of collusion. Very likely the petitioner when he came before the court had an idea that this document would be put in and perhaps he intended himself to put it in and then by arranging with his wife to make contestation of the case it might be that they both of them wanted to cover their tracks and take away from the document its collusive character. In my opinion there is nothing in the argument that the fact of the wife having appeared in the case has caused the charge of collusion to fall to the ground, or the argument drawn from it to fall to the ground. It is only a second move in the way of collusion.

The amendment was declared lost on a division; contents, 6; non-contents, 16.

The report was then concurred in on a division.

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

POSTPONEMENT.

The order of the day being called :

House again in Committee of the Whole on (Bill C) An Act to further amend the General

Inspection Act.—(The Right Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I find that there is a very considerable amount of doubt as to certain provisions of this Bill, and my hon. friends from Manitoba and the Northwest have expressed a desire to get further information about it. In any case it is perfectly clear that no Bill passed this session could effect hay which has been made up to date, and under all these circumstances, although I leave it for a short time on the order paper, I do not think I shall proceed with it. I therefore move that this order be discharged and that it be made an order of the day for this day week.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Before the motion passes I would like to represent to the government that the Board of Trade of Winnipeg has worked this matter up very fully and they are very anxious that this Bill should pass.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am aware of the fact, but the Board of Trade of Winnipeg are not apparently quite in harmony with other parties who are effected, and there is a very considerable divergence of opinion. I prefer to wait to ascertain more fully what is the real merit of the question.

The motion was agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE, 1892, AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on Bill (155) An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As I explained on the second reading of the Bill, the object of the measure is to apply the same principle to ordinary charges of offences that is now applied to indictable offences, that is that a judge can issue a commission to take evidence outside of Canada. It is simply enlarging the scope of the law as it now stands.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is one point to which I direct the attention of the minister. Just at the end of the first subclause of the proposed new law there is this proviso :

Provided that no such appointment shall be made without the consent of the Attorney General.

It seems to me that inasmuch as this clause deals with minor offences and with the county court judges and also judges of superior courts, that the meaning is that the appointment is to be made with the consent of the Attorney General of the province, and I would respectfully suggest with a view of preventing any misapprehension on the subject, that the words : 'of the province' should be inserted after the words 'Attorney General' at the end of the first subclause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no objection, although as the Criminal Code is put in force by the province, I see no necessity for it. The federal Attorney General is called the Attorney General for Canada, while a provincial Attorney General is known as the Attorney General for the province. The Bill was drafted in the Department of Justice, and I presume they have reasons for putting it that way.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED. In some provinces there might be doubt as to what that meant.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have an interpretation Bill now before parliament, which has been reviewed by the law clerk of the other House. I do not know whether it contains a definition of 'Attorney General,' but I presume it does.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I find in the second section of the Criminal Code the interpretation is there.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. WOOD, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on Bill (156) An Act to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A question of doubt has arisen in relation to appeals from the Exchequer Court as to what a final judgment is, and this gives a definition :

2. A judgment shall be considered final for the purpose of this section if it determines the rights of the parties, except as to the amount of the damages or the amount of liability.

It is thought necessary on account of a doubt having been expressed by some judge as to what a final judgment meant.

Hon. Mr. McKAY (Truro), from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (134) An Act respecting the Toronto and Hamilton Railway Company, and to change its name to 'The Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway Company.'—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (138) An Act to incorporate the Toronto Terminals Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

ASHCROFT, BARKERVILLE AND FORT GEORGE RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

The order of the day being called :

Consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to (Bill 89) An Act to incorporate the Ashcroft, Barkerville and Fort George Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, de Lanaudière.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This order, and the next three orders, are Bills to which an amendment prepared by the hon. member from De Salaberry relates. He came to me before leaving for the train and asked to have an amendment which he had prepared inserted in these Bills.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This matter was referred to a sub-committtee of the Railway Committee, and the amendment recommended by the sub-committee was adopted unanimously by the Railway Committee; and it is a question whether these Bills should be held over to make an amendment which one member thought desirable. The amendment can be moved at the third reading.

The motion was agreed to.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (174) An Act respecting the Quebec Harbour Commissioners.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill, authorizes an advance of $150,000 to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners for the purpose of completing the new deep water frontage of the Louise Embankment in the tidal harbour.

The Bill was read the first time.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at three p.m.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Tuesday, June 12, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF JUSTICE IN SASKATCHEWAN.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY rose to Ask the government, if they have appointed a chief justice for the province of Saskatchewan, and if not, is it their intention to do so, and when ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Until the provincial legislatures shall have organized courts under the Act giving them existence, there will be no opening for the appointment of a chief justice. The judges appointed at the time the provinces received their charter will continue. The answer I received from the department reads as follows: 'No. The Supreme Court of the Northwest Territories continues, under section 16 of the Saskatchewan Act, until abolished by the local assembly. No provincial Act yet passed so far as I am aware abolishing that court or providing for a new one. Therefore, no office of chief justice to fill.'

CARRIAGE OF MAILS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to Inquire of the government why the mails for the southern parts of Queen's and King's County, P.E.I., are not carried over the Murray Harbour Railway, instead of by teams, as at present ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Authority has already been given for the establishment of a postal car service over the Murray Harbour branch of the Prince Edward Island Railway, and the mails will be conveyed by railway as soon as the necessary contracts can be entered into for the performance of the side services, tenders for which are now being invited.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Did the hon. Secretary of State say that tenders were invited ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Tenders are now being invited.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There can be no necessity for tenders.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is for side service.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (91) An Act to incorporate the Canadian-Minnesota Bridge Company.—(Hon. Mr. Frost.)

Bill (121) An Act respecting the Manitoulin and North Shore Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (132) An Act respecting the Ontario Northern and Timigami Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. McHugh.)

Bill (112) An Act respecting the Huron and Ontario Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (133) An Act respecting the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (87) An Act to incorporate the Vancouver, Fraser Valley and Southern Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

HAMILTON, WATERLOO AND GUELPH RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved the third reading of Bill (104) An Act to incorporate the Hamilton, Waterloo and Guelph Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I thank my hon. friend for having acquiesced in my request on Friday last to postpone the consideration of this Bill until to-day. I have no particular objection to the Bill itself, but I find that it is entirely a local Bill. It provides for the construction of an electric railway situated altogether in the province of Ontario, and I think it should come under the jurisdiction of the provincial government. My intention was at the time to raise an objection to the Bill as being outside the jurisdiction of this parliament. I do not see that the fact of declaring in a Bill that the work is for the general advantage of Canada, makes it really a Bill which should come under our jurisdiction. If such a declaration is included in any Bill in order to bring it under the operation of the federal laws, that declaration should be borne out by the facts. If the facts really are that the work is one for the general advantage of Canada, all right ; but where the work is situated altogether in one province, we should not declare, so as to bring it under the operation of our federal law, that it is for the general advantage of Canada. I think it is a childish way of bringing a local Bill under the operation of our federal laws. The Bill we are now considering contains that declaration, I suppose, but it is not true merely because the declaration is there, and I claim that this Bill does not come under our jurisdiction ; it is entirely a local Bill that should come under the jurisdiction of the legislature of the province of Ontario. I move, therefore, that the Bill be not now read the third time but that it be read a third time this day six months. In the meantime I suppose the province of Ontario might take hold of the Bill and pass it.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If I might be permitted to offer a few remarks in reply, I would say to my hon. friend that the four Bills which have preceded this one are all local Bills, each of them within the jurisdiction of the province of Ontario. In the next place, electricity has become such an important motive power now, that almost every railway charter that we pass gives the privilege of running by steam or by electricity. The question as to the propriety of passing this Bill was fully discussed in committee. This railway will have to cross both the Grand Trunk Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway, and to build a high bridge over a Dominion canal and across Dominion property. It was thought by the promoters that it would be impossible to carry the scheme through unless they had a Dominion charter to enable them to do it under the Dominion Railway Act. That is why they have come here. I earnestly hope that my hon. friend will not press his amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman gave a bad reason when he said that four other Bills that we have passed were in the same anomalous position that this Bill occupies. That is no reason why we should proceed with this Bill. I want to ascertain the opinion of this House on this question of provincial and federal rights, but as his Bill is, fortunately for him, one of the five that are out of order, I shall not press my amendment to-day owing to the thinness of the House ; but I give warning that the next time a Bill of this character comes up I shall call for a division. With the permission of the House, I withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was withdrawn, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

HILLCREST RAILWAY, COAL AND COKE COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved the second reading of Bill (157) An Act to incorporate the Hillcrest Railway, Coal and Coke Company.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—This is a very important Bill, and I think the promoter ought to give some explanation of it. I find also that it is only printed in English and, therefore, the French members have no opportunity of looking into its provisions carefully. I should therefore like the mover to either defer the order, or to let us know what we are asked to vote for.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—As the French copy is not distributed yet, the hon. gentleman might give the explanation in French.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not know very much about this Bill. It is really a coal company in British Columbia, whose mine is in the Crow's Nest Pass, near the town of Frank, and the railway is needed to carry out the product of the mine. The road is near the boundary, and lies partly in Alberta and partly in British Columbia. The company is turning out about 120 tons of coal a day at the present time. It is already incorporated as a coal company, and this short line of railway is necessary to enable the company to bring out its coal.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think the Bill deals with a little more than the question of coal. My hon. friend will see that they have the right to deal in lands and mines and also in coal oil. By the ninth clause that power is asked for, and, if we pass the Bill in its present shape, of course, the company will have that power. They will also be able to deal in roadways and tramways. It is not merely railways, but tramways and sundry kinds of roads. I think my hon. friend should certainly comply with the expressed wish of my hon. friend from Stadacona and either explain the Bill in French or allow it to stand until the French copy is printed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the Bill complies with the model Bill pretty well, and we can have these details all discussed in committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS moved the second reading of Bill (S) An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, as respecting lotteries. He said : When the Criminal Code was passed, I think in 1882, a subsection relating to certain kinds of lotteries was inserted in it. Subsection 6 of section 205 of chapter 29 of the Criminal Code reads as follows :—

> Any distribution by lot among the members or ticket holders of any incorporated society established for the encouragement of art, of any paintings, drawings or other work of art produced by the labour of the members of, or published by or under the direction of, such incorporated society, &c.

In consequence of the growth in some cities of a system of lotteries by which paintings and works of art were used to enable a species of gambling business to be carried on, the law was amended, and the amendment in the law shut out those established art unions, the Art Union of London, the Art Union of Glasgow and those other incorporated art unions which are known to be of a high character, and under which a great many works of art of considerable value have been brought into Canada. The object of this Bill is to enable these unions to resume their legitimate business in this Dominion. There are a number of people in different parts of the country who are interested in these art unions; that is to say, they are annual subscribers. The special art union which I have in mind is the London Art Union, which is well known all over the world.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Can the hon. gentleman give me the date at which the Criminal Code was amended so as to cut out these unions?

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—1901. The London Art Union has sent to every hon. gentleman of the Senate and to every member of the House of Commons a statement of its position with regard to that and a copy of its rules. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen have looked over these or not, but they are in the possession of every hon. gentleman in the House, and it will be seen beyond peradventure that there is no opportunity whatever for anything which might be termed a gambling operation being carried on under its provisions. There is no allowance of money in place of pictures. If a subscriber draws a picture, he can not exchange it in any way unless it be for another work of art. It seems rather hard that we should be debarred from the advantage in Canada of the facilities and advantages enjoyed in England which are afforded by those art unions. The Bill has been so drawn that no art union can take advantage of it unless it is incorporated under the laws of the United Kingdom. I do not know whether that phraseology is sufficient, because the London Art Union is incorporated by what is called a royal charter, by petition to the King or Queen as the case may be. It is presided over by the Earl of Plymouth, who is well known by a number of gentlemen as a patron of art. First, must be incorporated under the laws of England, and it must have obtained permission to sell in Canada these tickets. The second provision is, the art union does not give any money prizes and does not exchange any work of art for any valuable consideration other than another work of art of the same character. The Bill guards the public in every way possible against any misuse of the provision.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—Have there been any prosecutions threatened for carrying on a business of this kind?

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I think not; I have not heard of any. I might say with regard to the London Art Union, that as soon as the law was passed it ceased to do any business in Canada, and although it was advised by some legal gentlemen that it might continue to do business, still there was some uncertainty about it. If Canadians wish to transmit their money to England they might not run any risk, but they do not care to do business in that way.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—In my humble opinion we should proceed very carefully in re-enacting a provision which was dropped from the Criminal Code in 1901. In that year clause (c), of the Act of 1892, was amended, and I see that this Bill proposes to re-enact the very clause that was then struck out, word for word, except that my hon. friend proposes to substitute the words 'Art union' for the words 'Incorporated Societies'. We passed a law last year completely wiping out the provision with regard to trading stamps. This, of course, may not be exactly in a line with that Act, but certainly there must have been some good reasons given for re-enacting this clause when it was eliminated from the Criminal Code by the amendment of 1901. That clause had been in existence since 1892, and this Bill, as I have said, proposes to reinstate that very clause word for word, all but the words I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. If he will look at the Bill he will see that the art union is to be incorporated under the laws of the United Kingdom, and the union must obtain permission from the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The other had to have incorporation within the realms of the kingdom; they acquired corporate powers under the clause that I refer to. I do not know what the object may be. Possibly it may be all right, but I say we should be exceedingly careful in interfering with the Criminal Code or encouraging anything like the disposal of goods by lottery. That virtually was the character of the Bill we passed last year, doing away with the lottery system. This is practically the same thing. It proposes to do business in the same way, and then it makes provision that one article may be exchanged for another. A man may, by lottery, draw a certain picture or work of art and, if he is not satisfied with it, under this Bill he can exchange it for something else from the same company. I do not know whether it is wise ; in my opinion we should be very careful in interfering with the Criminal Code in this way.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It may be pointed out that this is peculiarly class legislation. We seem to have repealed the clause in the Criminal Code by the Act of 1892, which would prevent art unions generally from disposing of their products in this particular way. The difficulty I see with reference to this amendment is, that while the works of this particular art union may be very meritorious, yet what reply can this parliament have hereafter to any other art union that may occupy an equally important position who may ask permission to dispose of their works in the same way ? It is peculiarly class legislation in that regard. Furthermore, it will contribute to a general evasion of the Act. Any institution desiring thus to dispose of their works may, hereafter, make application as, and dignify itself by the name of a corporation, and ask for similar exemption. While I have no doubt in my mind that the disposal of those works of art would not in any way contribute to immoral results, yet immediately you make an exception as to one particular incorporation, you are bound hereafter to give an equal privilege to others.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Is the operation of this art union the same as that of the old one that existed many years ago ?

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—There is no additional power given ?

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—No.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—That was entirely harmless, and was calculated to encourage art. The members had an opportunity of securing a statue, a picture or an engraving at less than the usual price. I was a subscriber for some years myself. I never drew anything, but I know that it was a good thing, and I hope there will be no opposition to this Bill, which has for its object the encouragement of art and the improving of the artistic taste of the people.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I entirely concur in what my hon. friend from Kingston has said. It is clear that parliament thought that these art unions were entitled to special consideration, because, when the Criminal Code was passing through parliament, they were excepted from the operation of section 205. In addition to the exception of these art unions, paragraph (d) of the sixth subsection of section 205 excepted the Crédit Foncier du Bas Canada and the Crédit Foncier Franco Canadien. The objection which parliament had to the exemption applied, I think, rather to the associations mentioned in paragraph (d) than to those mentioned in paragraph (c), and, in 1901, this subsection 6 was repealed and a new subsection was substituted for it, which included paragraphs (a) and (b) but dropped (c) and (d). The feeling of parliament was in favour of encouraging the distribution of works of art, and I think we should still feel that way. In the United States where they are given over altogether to protection, they have, recently, amended their tariff so as to allow works of art to come in free or at reduced rates of duty. It is our duty, if we can, to encourage such an association as the London Art Union. The hon. gentleman from Wellington said that the language of the Bill which is now before the House is absolutely identical with the language in paragraph (c) of subsection 6 of section 205 of the Criminal Code; but if any hon. gentleman will take the trouble to compare the two, he will find there is a marked difference. In the first place, the Bill before us limits the exemption to the members or ticket holders of any art union. The original paragraph said 'any incorporated society established for the encouragement of art.' The language of the present Bill is much narrower. And then this Bill inserts two provisos which were not in the original enactment :—

(1) Such art union is incorporated under the laws of the United Kingdom, and has obtained permission from the Governor in Council to sell in Canada tickets or chances for such distribution ; and

(ii) Such tickets or chances are solely for the distribution of works of art, and the art union does not in any manner give money prizes and does not exchange any work of art so distributed for any valuable consideration other than any work of art of like nature.

These are important restrictions, and they remove any danger of the privilege being abused. Guarded as it is there is really no danger to the public morals or interests in passing the measure. While the hon. gentleman from Wellington has a very strong objection to anything being disposed of by lottery, the law as it stands allows the division by lottery of property held jointly, or raffles for small prizes at bazaars for charitable objects. The art union is really quite as deserving of exemption from the operation of section 205 of the Criminal Code as those raffles for charitable purposes.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—No one objects to the work that is carried on by the two art unions of which the hon. gentleman from St. John has spoken, but the question which we ought to consider is whether an amendment of the law in this way is not wide and could not be easily evaded. A suggestion has been made that the provisos introduced here are so protected that they would prevent much mischief being done. The first is that the art union must be incorporated under the laws of the United Kingdom. Anybody could become incorporated by filing a memorandum in England, and, therefore, that practically means that anybody who takes the trouble to be incorporated in England would be admitted, subject only to obtaining permission from the Governor in Council.

The project which would be submitted to the Governor in Council would be of such a character that it, no doubt, would pass muster as an art union, but, on the other hand, once incorporated, and once a license had been granted it, its operations could be carried on here although the evasion might occur at a subsequent time; therefore, it is open to objection in that way. The second subsection, providing that the tickets or chances are to be solely for the distribution of works of art, and that the art union does not in any manner give money prizes, might be evaded by having one company to carry on the business of issuing tickets and another company placed next door to redeem them. There is no law that I know of which provides against a company's redeeming or otherwise dealing with the tickets of the art union. It would be much better, therefore, if the hon. gentleman will do so, to make a special proviso for the two companies whose character have been established and whose work is known, and to provide that the clause should not apply to their distribution. In that way parliament would know just what it is dealing with. It would know that we are accepting the works of these particular associations or art unions, and that we are not opening the door to imitations of them which might be in their nature just as injurious as any lottery which could be established in any other way.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I entirely concur in the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Toronto. This Bill would clearly be open to the abuses which he has pointed out, and moreover it would be rather strange legislation to give a privilege of that kind, a general privilege, to any corporation now incorporated or hereafter to be incorporated under the laws of the United Kingdom, while not extending the same treatment to domestic corporations, and I fail to see the reason why we should give a preference of that kind. There may be a good reason, because of their being special institutions. In that case they should be treated as the Crédit Foncier was treated. An exception was specifically made for the Crédit Foncier in the law of 1892. On refering to the law of 1892 it will be found that exception was made also for all incorporated art unions, but in 1900 and 1901 it was found that this exception had given rise to so many abuses that parliament removed the exception by amending the Act of 1892. I would suggest that this Bill be made to apply to these two specific art associations, and I would further suggest that power be given to the Governor in Council to withdraw the permit which he would have given. The Governor in Council may find that abuses have crept in under the working of the Act, and then, whether it be two years or five years, after the exception has been made, or the permit has been given, the Governor in Council might take such action as seemed to him desirable.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—While my hon. friend is on his feet, would he point out the distinction between the principle involved in this amendment and that which we repealed in the legislation of 1900 and 1901?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I do not think there is any distinction. I have not referred to the statute recently, but I have quite a distinct recollection of the clause which was repealed in 1901, and, subject to correction, I do not think that there is any distinction except as regard the permit which is to be given by the Governor in Council. I do not think that was provided for; further, the exception is made solely in favour of art unions incorporated under the laws of the United Kingdom. The exception previously was in favour of all incorporated art unions, whether incorporated under the laws of the United Kingdom or the laws of Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The point I desire to have my hon. friend's view upon is this: If the legislation of 1892 was productive of the abuses to which my hon. friend has referred, in what way have we any proof or what satisfactory evidence have we before us to-day that this legislation which is now proposed will not be productive of the same vicious results as that of 1892?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I did not rise for the purpose of advocating the passing of the Bill. I rose merely for the purpose of showing the special objection which I saw to it, and of suggesting in what way, if the Bill is to be passed, it should be limited.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I would suggest that the Bill be given its second reading now, and before it is considered in Committee of the Whole my hon. friend might consider the question as to whether this exception might not be incorporated in the way that I spoke of.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I am desirous that these art unions, the Dublin Art Union, the London Art Union, and possibly the Glasgow Union—which are all art unions of considerable standing, of high reputation, indeed, should be brought under the operation of this measure; but the reason I did not name them in the Bill was because I thought that the objection which my hon. friend from Calgary has taken to the Bill as it stands might then be taken with more force if they were named specially, but I am perfectly willing to make an amendment to the Bill to declare just what it means, and, if the House will consent to the second reading now, I shall move that it be considered in Committee of the Whole two days hence. Meantime I will endeavour to have an amendment prepared which will meet the views of all parties, and at the same time preserve the character of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Bill (Z) An Act to incorporate the Grand River and Western Power Company.—(Hon. Mr. McMullen.)

MARKING OF GOLD AND SILVER BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (U) An Act respecting the sale and marking of manufactures of Gold and Silver. He said: The object of this Bill is to make it compulsory that gold and silver manufactured in Canada should bear certain stamps, trade mark, date, and the quality. If the manufacture is of gold, the number of carets must be marked, the standard caret of course being 24. The Bill is one of detail which has been asked for by the gold and silver manufacturers in Canada, who propose sending a deputation to the Banking Committee, to which committee the Bill will be referred on Thursday next, and with a view of getting their opinion. I am now asking the House to pass the second reading. This measure marks a departure in Canada, and therefore it is very difficult to advance any positive views on the subject. The Bill has been drawn by the manufacturers of gold and silver wares, who consider that it is necessary at the present stage of development in Canada and they say that if they are given an opportunity of presenting their views before a committee of parliament, that they are able to establish the necessity for the measure.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman might inform the House what legislation this Bill follows? There must be similar legislation in the United Kingdom, and probably in the United States and it is desirable that we should know where it came from.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite unable to tell my hon. friend the basis of the Bill. I presume it is based on similar legislation in Ontario, although I have not been able to find any exactly in harmony with it, nor do I know who drafted the Bill. It has been sent to the government by the Manufacturers Association, particularly those who work in gold and silver, and they have stated that the Bill is a necessity, and that they are prepared to establish its importance and value in trade, if they are given an opportunity to appear before the committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say to what extent the Inspection Act would apply to this Bill? By clause 14, it is provided that the matter shall come under the supervision of the Minister of Inland Revenue. The Inspection Act does not seem to be made applicable to it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is not intended to come into operation for more than a year after it receives the royal assent. In the meantime inquiry can be made as to the necessity for such legislation and how it is going to operate. No harm can arise from it, because it is in the direction of having articles honestly marked, according to the proportion of gold and silver they contain. Pure gold is 24 carats, and every article containing less than that must show the amount of alloy in the composition, and the same observation applies to silver. There is a certain standard for pure silver, and the amount of alloy which is put into it must be indicated by a certain mark. The industry is a very large one in Canada. A very considerable number of persons are interested in it. I was asked before bringing the measure to a second reading to have an extra number of copies printed, and I sent 100 copies to the association that is interested in furnishing the information necessary to justify the passing of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I might say to my hon. friend, that I quite approve of the principle of the Bill, so far as I have been able to peruse it; but inasmuch as the Bill, or at least its working out will be subject to the supervision of the Minister of Inland Revenue, it seems to me that a provision should be incorporated in this measure before we go to committee, so as to make the Inspection Act properly apply to it. As it is at present, the machinery of the Inspection Act would not apply, because no express provision is made therefor.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The clause reads:

> The administration and enforcement of the Act shall be under the supervision of the Minister of Inland Revenue, and he shall appoint inspectors whose duty it shall be to have the Act complied with.

I think that practically brings it under the control of the Minister of Inland Revenue.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

MANITOBA AND KEEWATIN RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Kerr (Toronto), moved the second reading of Bill (HH) An Act respecting the Manitoba and Keewatin Railway Company.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—As this is a Senate Bill, and it has to go to the Commons, I move the suspension of rules 17 and 60 so that the Bill may go before the committee on Thursday.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why should the rules be suspended? Might I ask my hon. friend where this road runs from? The expression 'Manitoba and Keewatin' is a very wide range. What is the object of presenting it? Why has it not been brought before the House earlier in the session?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I am not familiar with the circumstances, but, speaking from memory, the petition for this Bill was presented very early in the session, and I think the Bill simply asks for an extension of time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is all.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—It is an extension of time for the construction of a road through Keewatin north towards Hudson bay.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—Yes, the company was incorporated in 1902. It is merely for the ordinary extension of time within which to complete the road.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If it is for an extension of time we do not need a suspension of the rules. We do not want to extend the time by suspending the rules. Leave the rules as they are and it will come up when it is due.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTRAJUDICIAL EMPLOYMENT OF JUDGES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved the second reading of Bill (I) An Act respecting Extrajudicial Employment of Judges. He said: This Bill, as hon. gentlemen are aware, was introduced some three weeks ago, and it will be remembered that on the introduction of the Bill I made several explanations, one of which was that the principle of the Bill had been formally and emphatically accepted by the then Minister of Justice in the House; secondly, that the House of Commons had, by resolution, affirmed and approved the general principle of this Bill. My object in introducing it is to redeem a promise made to the House two or three years ago on this subject, and then, having introduced it, I allowed it to stand over until it would be found whether the Minister of Justice in the other branch of parliament intended to deal with this question in connection with two or three other matters to which he had in a similar way given his adhesion in the House of Commons, one of which was the Bill introduced by the hon. member from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), which referred to judges being employed on arbitrations, to which the Minister of Justice gave his assent on the second reading of the Bill, but indicated that, possibly, later on in the session, he would deal with the subject in connection with some other amendments to the provincial courts Acts. However, we know that Mr. Fitzpatrick has left the parliamentary arena and the intentions he had may not be carried out. That being so, I propose to proceed with the second reading of this Bill. Before doing so, I shall just read for the information of hon. gentlemen who may not carry them in their memories the words used by Mr. Fitzpatrick in speaking on a motion of the hon. member from South Simcoe early in May. He said:

> But under whatever circumstances judges might be appointed, whatever services they might be called upon to render the state, I would lay down a rule, from which I would not depart, that a judge's time belongs to the country, and that whether that time be given to the performance of his regular judicial work or given to the performance of quasi-judicial work in connection with the commissions, there should be no remuneration except his salary alone. That, it seems to me, is a rule that might fairly be established and that could profitably be followed.

Then the House came to a resolution, which is as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, public business should have first claim on the time and attention of each and every member of the government and the permanent officials of the government should give to the performance of their respective offices their whole time and attention.

That resolution was, I think, carried unanimously. That Bill merely provided that if a judge is called upon to perform extra judicial work, he shall not be allowed any remuneration for such service above the usual salary paid him as a judge. The ground of that is, that judges are paid for all their time as it is, and, if they are selected by the government for the performance of any other work, they should not be paid any further sum as salaries; but provision is made in the Bill that expenses generally allowed to judges in the performance of their regular duties would also be paid to them in the event of their performing quasi judicial work of the nature to which this Bill refers. When the other branch of parliament assented unanimously to this resolution, and when the late Minister of Justice put himself on record so very emphatically in regard to this subject—and I may say that Mr. Borden, the leader of the opposition, had at an earlier period of the session expressed himself almost in the same way that Mr. Fitzpatrick did subsequently—seeing a consensus of opinion had been reached on the question, I felt, as a measure of this kind would have eventually to pass through parliament under the care of the government, I would not press the Bill until there would be time for the intentions of the government to develop. The resignation of the Minister of Justice, and his removal from parliament, has intervened and, as the session is not likely to last very much longer, I thought perhaps the House, the principle of the measure being so universally acceded to in the other branch of parliament, might give the Bill a second reading and let it go to the House of Commons. Of course, it cannot pass the Commons without the government taking charge of it there, but we would be adding our assent to the assent already given to it by the House of Commons in the resolution which I have just read.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In appointing judges both to the higher courts and the county courts, the commissions had not in view the employment of judges in extrajudicial inquiries such as are referred to in this Bill; and, therefore, I do not think that the government should ask a judge to make an inquiry such as has been made under chapter 114, concerning public matters, unless with the intention of compensating the judge for the labour. The principle of employing judges on certain commissions is one that has been long recognized as one of very great importance and value. A judge is certainly much more competent than a layman to make an inquiry that in any way involved the examination of witnesses under oath. Take, for instance, as an illustration, a commission that is now sitting; there is a county court judge who is the chairman of the commission inquiring into the working of the Insurance Act. That commission has now been sitting six or seven weeks. It would be scarcely fair to expect the judge to give his whole time and be absent so long from home unless he was paid additional remuneration. I think the Act under which these commissions are issued contemplated that there should be a judge employed. The Act is chapter 114 of the revised statutes, which has been a long time on the statute-book, and it has been the policy not only of this government but of its predecessor, on many occasions, in appointing commissions, to have for the chairman a judge of either the higher courts or of one of the courts of the province. It provides that:

> Whenever the Governor in Council deems it expedient to cause inquiry to be made into and concerning any matter connected with the good government of Canada, or the conduct of any part of the public business thereof, and such inquiry is not regulated by any special law, the Governor in Council may, by the commission in the case, confer upon the commissioners or persons by whom such inquiry is to be conducted, the power of summoning before them any witnesses, and of requiring them to give evidence on oath, orally or in writing, or on solemn affirmation.

It describes how the evidence is to be given, and gives the commissioner sole power of decision as to who are to be competent witnesses and what witnesses should be examined, so that it, practically, contemplates in the powers that are given to inquire into certain public matters such as the one I have illustrated, namely, insurance, that a judicial head should be on the commission. I owe my hon. friend an apology because I have not got an answer from the government as to what policy they propose to adopt with regard to this measure. The pressure of work has been so great that I have not had the opportunity of conferring with the Hon. Mr. Aylesworth as to whether he proposes to follow in the lines laid down by his predecessor, the Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick. I have no objection to the Bill going to a second reading, leaving it open at a future stage, if the government do not concur in the principle of the Bill, that we should then allow the measure to stand over for another year. If my hon. friend will postpone the committee stage until Friday, perhaps I might get Mr. Aylesworth to give me his views on the subject, and we could then decide as to the best course to take. I have no very strong views myself one way or the other beyond the fact that it has been a practice that has been found convenient in the past and this government has availed itself of the existence of that statute to have several inquiries conducted by judges.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT, 1903, AMENDMENT BILL—(MORTGAGES.)

SECOND READING.

The order of the day being called:

Second reading Bill (H) an Act to amend the Railway Act, 1903, with respect to the operation of mortgages.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—This Bill is for the purpose of removing two words from section 112 of the Railway Act, the words 'property and assets' in the fifth line of the section, and by removing these words to reinstate the section as it was before 1903. The section reads as follows:—

> The company may secure such security by mortgage, but such mortgages, charges and encumbrances upon the whole of such property, assets, rents and revenues of the company, present and future or both, as are described therein.

That portion of the section I do not propose to touch at all. It proceeds :

But such property, assets, rents and revenues shall be subject in the first instance to the payment of any penalty then or thereafter imposed upon the company for non-compliance with the requirements of this Act, and non-payment of the working expenses of the railway.

It will be noticed that the words 'property and assets' are repeated in this last portion of the section, and the effect of that is to give preference to working expenditures over mortgages issued by the railway company. This has a very serious effect, and when the present Railway Act was considered in this House I am quite sure that the change was not noticed. I have looked at the 'Hansard' of the Commons and I fail to see that the change was noticed in the Commons either. If we turn to the definition of the term 'working expenditure' in the Railway Act, section 2, subsection (cc), we find that it means and includes :

All expenses for the maintenance of the railway, and all such tolls, rents or annual sums as are paid in respect of property leased to or held by the company, apart from the rent of any leased line, or in respect of the hire of rolling stock, let to the company ; also all rent charges or interests on the purchase money of lands belonging to the company, purchased but not paid for, or not fully paid for ; and also all expenses of or incidental to working the railway and the traffic thereon, including all necessary repairs and supplies to rolling stock, while on the lines of another company ; also rates, taxes, insurance and compensation for accidents or losses ; also, all salaries and wages of persons employed in and about the working of the railway and traffic ; and all office and management expenses, including directors' fees, agency, legal and other like expenses ; also all costs and expenses of and incidental to the compliance by the company with any order of the board under this Act ; and generally all such charges, if any, not above otherwise specified, as in all cases of English railway companies are usually carried to the debit of revenues as distinguished from capital account.

As distinguished from capital account. We can see that this wording is very comprehensive and that it covers, as stated, generally all such charges as in the cases of English railway companies are usually carried to the debit of revenues as distinguished from capital account, and the effect of the introduction of these two words is to give preference to these charges, which should be paid out of the rents and revenues of the railway, because they are charges which are carried to the debit of the revenue, and to make them payable out of the property and assets of the company, I contend, is very serious, because it is opening the door to the creation of any amount of liability by the company. The working expenditure may be allowed to pile up to any extent, and the mortgagee may find that the value of his mortgage has been practically destroyed. I know of a small railway which was recently sold, one which was not of large value, and there was some $200,000 of working expenditure which had been accumulated on the property, representing a large proportion of the value of the property. Happily these working expenditures were created under the old Railway Act and it did not affect the prior charges. If the working expenditures had been created under this Act of 1903 it would surely have been a surprise to the mortgagees or to the vendors of the railway who were supposed to have the first lien on the railway and they would have found that their lien had been practically wiped out to a very large extent. It would be very easy for the persons who are in control of the railway to let the working expenditure pile up, and other railways would feel perfectly safe, because the term covers all traffic exchanges, all claims of one railway against another. It covers all repairs to rolling stock and it covers rents on rolling stock, and, therefore, the owners of rolling stock rented to any railway company would feel perfectly safe in allowing these charges to accumulate to a very high figure, because they could rely on their being paid as preferential claims, and if the parties who have control of the property were dishonest they could buy coal and supplies of all kinds and they might sell them again. Then the question would come up as to whether these would not have a preference also ; if they did not take a preference the party who would have supplied the material would have relied upon a law which would prove to be illusory.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not desire to interrupt my hon. friend at all, but would just ask him as rents and revenues are the only available assets for the payment of penalties, will he say what rents and revenues mean under the Act? Rents, in all probability, would be a charge against the company, or would be outgoings. What constitutes revenues? There is no interpretation given to it in the Act, and the tolls of the road might not constitute revenues under the Act that would be applicable for this particular purpose.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I have noticed that these two words are always coupled together, rents and revenues, for this reason, that very often a railway company leases part of its road and collects the rent from that portion of its line and, therefore, such rent forms part of the revenue of the road, and it is the reason, I apprehend, that the word is coupled with revenues; but, in any case, the meaning of the word 'revenues' is easy to ascertain. The revenues of the road should go towards paying the cost of operation, but to charge the property itself, after it has been mortgaged possibly to its full extent, with the cost of operation, I think, is a vicious principle which would open the way for fraud and which would depreciate the value of bonds. I have no hesitation in saying that capitalists realize that the changes have been made in the Railway Act they would not dare touch any railway security for fear they would not be protected. Mortgagees have no means of controlling the property at all until there is a default in payment of the interest or capital of the bonds. They would be perfectly at the mercy of the persons in control, with out any means whatever of protecting themselves.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The information I desired to obtain from my hon. friend was scarcely given by the answer which I received. It seems to me that rent would scarcely be available for this particular purpose. A railway company in active operation very seldom has rents that would be available. Almost invariably they are the lessees of a road rather than lessors. As to the revenues, I apprehend that they would be first applicable to working expenditure. My hon. friend, in striking out the two words, as he proposes to do, therefore, throws the government back upon realizing out of the rents and revenues for any penalties that may be imposed owing to a violation of the Railway Act. The question then arises, would these be net revenues? Would those revenues first be chargeable with the payment of the penalties, the working expenditure afterwards coming out of those revenues? It seems to me that a further amendment should be made so that no further question might arise as to what portion of the revenues would be available for this particular purpose.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—The hon. gentleman says that a very general rule is that a company leases another railway. But when there are leases there are necessarily rents. One company pays and the other receives.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That would not be the company violating the Act?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—As far as that is concerned, my object is to return to the wording of the old Railway Act as far as this section is concerned, and the recourse of the government would be reasonably secure, it seems to me, out of the rents and revenues of the property, and the working expenditure would come next to the government's claim, as it was before 1904, before this Act came into force. These penalties in favour of the government are very seldom enforced, I think, and, if there were any enforced they should not be allowed to accumulate. If there is any occasion for the exercise of the penalty, the government should act promptly and not permit any large claim to accrue.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The debentures which are issued are generally secured by a mortgage on the road. It seems to me the Bill is in the proper direction, because a capitalist would not be willing to lend money on mortgage on a road, if the other charges came in ahead of the mortgage.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume when the words 'property and assets' of the company were added to theses securities that were necessary to keep the road in running order, this matter was pretty well thought out and considered. The Minister of Railways has now a Bill, which has been elaborated over and over again in the other Chamber, bearing upon the various amendments necessary to the Railway Act, and I think the proper way would have been for my hon. friend to confer with the Minister of Railways and ask him if he would consent to the changes made in the Bill. Of course if he did not, it would be idle to pass it here, because it would not be accepted elsewhere.

Hno. Mr. BEIQUE—I may say that I saw the Minister of Justice and called his attention to the Bill and explained it. I will not say that it was his final decision, but he seemed to be impressed at first sight with the reasons I gave, and I suggest that the Bill be now read the second time, and that the government should take the matter up. I will not press the Bill if the government objects. I do not think I will have time to see the Minister of Railways, as I leave to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think I sent a copy of the Bill to both the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Railways with a view to eliciting their views upon it, but I have failed so far to receive any answer. I have no objection to advancing the measure a step, and name Monday or Tuesday of next week for the committee stage, in order that they may have an opportunity of bringing it up at the council meeting on Saturday. With only three-quarters of an hour given on week days for council meetings, it is quite impossible to get the ear of council long enough to deal with this matter, and as Mr. Emmerson had a Bill with a certain number of amendments I had hoped that my hon. friend would confer with him as to the propriety of making a change.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As my hon. friend has thought this out, and as I have not given any consideration to it and cannot express an opinion, I should like to ask what would be the effect of the amendment on the securities held by the government in the guarantee given by the Grand Trunk Pacific ? If the Railway Act would be applicable to that particular guarantee, then the elimination from the Railway Act of those two words would certainly cut down the security of the government to a very substantial extent and, practically, throw the government upon a security out of which they would not be likely to realize any portion of their indebtedness.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—I think the hon. gentleman will bear in mind that the government's guarantee of security in the case to which he refers is not in virtue of this Act at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, but the Railway Act applies.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—It applies, but the guarantee is specially provided for apart from the Railway Act. There was a special provision guaranteeing all the interests payable to the government.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Railway Act is interwoven in so many complicated ways into those various private Bills or legistion of that character that it is very difficult to say how far reaching such an amendment might be without proper consideration.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It occurs to me that as this Bill meets with the approval of this House, and as it seems probable that it may go to the other House, and the government Bill with respect to railways will certainly not have passed through the committee stage by the time this measure reaches them—that is if it is pushed through this House—the government could decide whether they will embody the provisions of this Bill in the general government Bill or take it up as a separate measure. I think that is probably one of the best ways to bring it to the attention of the Commons.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—After this Bill has received its second reading I shall leave it in the hands of the House, but I am satisfied that the passing of this Bill is very imperative. It is something that is liable to a great deal of abuse and we should let the Bill become law this session. To merge it with the Railway Bill now before the House of Commons might imperil its passage, because there may be contentious points in the other Bill and it might not go through this session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I consent to the second reading now on condition that the committee stage be postponed until next Tuesday. In the meantime I shall myself see the Minister of Railways and discuss it with him.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

LEPROSY BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (115) An Act respecting Leprosy.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—May I ask the hon. Secretary of State if he has an amendment to clause 5?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; I have an amendment to clause 8.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I thought the hon. Secretary of State had an amendment to clause 5.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the precautions taken are quite sufficient. The clause says 'may be examined by a medical officer or officers to be designated by him,' and the minister will designate a doctor familiar with leprosy, if he can be found. The suggestion was made that the person suspected of being a leper should be examined by the man in charge of the lazaretto. Now, as our lazarettos are 4,000 miles apart it would involve a great deal of expense to bring the doctor in charge to a particular point. Of course when the leper has been committed to the lazaretto an examination will be then and there held, and if the diagnosis establishes that he is not afflicted with leprosy, the man would be again at large. There is no possible danger of any one being forced into a lazaretto unless the evidence is of the most complete character that the lazaretto was the only place to send him.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Would he not be examined by the man in charge of the lazaretto?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, when he got there.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—You need not send to New Brunswick for a man to perform the service. The man in charge of a lazaretto should have the preliminary training for such an office, and, therefore, he would be competent to make an examination. The man in charge should certainly be the chief examiner.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The suspect will come under his examination in the end.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The doctor would want to have external evidence of this disease. Then he sends the patient to the lazaretto and the man in charge there examines him, and that is where the examination should be held. I would not care to have an ordinary practitioner who has had no experience of leprosy given the power to confine a man in a lazaretto. I would rely on the man in charge of the lazaretto.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The whole point is well guarded in clause 8, where you have to satisfy a judge in addition to the first preliminary examination. My hon. friends may rely upon it that the minister will not be hasty in confining anybody in a lazaretto, but will only do so when there is ample evidence that that is the only place to send him. Since confederation there has been no complaint that any one has been unduly forced into the lazaretto. The lepers have gone there of their own accord. The people now in the lazaretto on the Pacific coast have gone there of their own accord, showing that there is no coercive influence behind the placing of those unfortunates within bounds and that no action would be taken until the disease became so developed that a medical officer at all conversant even with the theories of the disease would be able to pronounce upon it. But even then the application for the consignment to a lazaretto must be before a judge.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—We met Dr. Montizambert, the chief medical officer of the Dominion, and had a conversation with him, and he agreed to a certain number of amendments which should be made.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have them here.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—If the hon. gentleman has accepted them, I shall not interfere any more in the matter.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE—When this Bill was first considered there was an inquiry whether there was any legislation on the subject. Some hon. gentleman expressed the opinion that it was legislation which interfered with the liberty of the subject. On referring to the statutes of New Brunswick I find that the local Act was passed in 1855. That Act gave the lieutenant governor power to appoint a board of health composed of three persons with power to establish a lazaretto. The third section of the Act provides that each and every board of health appointed under the Act, and each and every member of any such board in their respective districts, shall have full power and authority, individually and collectively, at all convenient times, to inspect any person or persons suspected to be labouring under or infected with leprosy, and to enter houses in which it might be suspected that such person or persons might be found, and if necessary to break open the doors of such houses to obtain entrance and cause to be removed to the lazaretto every person or persons who, upon such examination or inspection, might be found labouring under the disease. The present Bill is drafted very much on the same lines, but it is not quite as severe as the law now on the statute-book, because the latter is now in force. This Act, to which I have referred, was continued from time to time. In 1864 it was continued for another five years. By the Confederation Act it was provided that all the laws in force in any of the provinces should remain in force until altered, so this Act remains in force unless it was repealed or amended by the legislature of New Brunswick after confederation.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I was under the impression that the hon. Secretary of State had an amendment in reference to this clause which had been agreed upon by the medical men. Hon. gentlemen will see that this clause is very arbitrary; so is the law which has been read by the hon. senator from De Salaberry, but the fact of the latter being so severe is no reason why it should be continued. There is danger that some innocent person may be put into a lazaretto where he would be liable to contract leprosy. We know that there are several diseases very like leprosy, and a person having such a disease might be mistaken for a leper and put in the lazaretto. I move that the first four lines of clause 5, and the fifth line down to the word 'is' be stricken out and the following substituted:

So soon as the minister receives information from a local sanitary authority that any person is suspected of being affected with leprosy, he shall order an examination to be made of such person by a duly qualified medical practitioner, together with the local medical superintendent of the lazeretto, and if the result of such examination justifies the conclusion that the person, &c.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—My hon. friend from De Salaberry has given us the authority for instituting the lazaretto in New Brunswick. It was instituted under a provincial law, which was renewed from time to time until confederation took place, when a general law was enacted, continuing in force all the laws of the different provinces. If, at the time of confederation, a law was in force in New Brunswick, the confederation of the provinces in 1877 and the legislation then enacted did not prevent that law from expiring at the end of the five years for which it was to run. If no legislation has occurred in New Brunswick since that time, how has that lazaretto a legal existence?

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—That institution passed under the control of the Dominion of Canada at confederation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In what way? Is the lazaretto a hospital?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The British North America Act provides that in each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the class of subjects specially enumerated, and the seventh clause of that section is as follows:—

The establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, asylums, charities and eleemosynary institutions in and for the province other than marine hospitals.

That lazaretto is not a marine hospital such as is contemplated by section 92 of the British North America Act. If this is a marine hospital it comes under the federal government; if it is not, it belongs to the province, and we have no right to interfere with provincial affairs as we are doing by this legislation.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The matter was thoroughly discussed at confederation between the government of New Brunswick at that day and the government of Sir John Macdonald. The lazaretto may have been regarded as a marine hospital on the plea that the disease came in through mariners. At any rate it has been for 40 years under the control of the Dominion government and all legislation relating to it since confederation has been passed by the Dominion parliament and the officers are employed by the Dominion government, so my hon. friend is 25 years behind time.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Dominion may possibly have jurisdiction in a case of this kind, since the persons afflicted with the disease come from without the jurisdiction of the Dominion. Cases arising within the Dominion or being of a provincial character would come under provincial jurisdiction. I apprehend that most of these cases come from without the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As the federal power has been supplying funds to maintain the institution since 1867, I think it is rather too late to raise the question. The onus of keeping up a lazaretto there has been thrown on the Dominion by arrangement at confederation, and the money has been annually voted to keep it up. It is considered the model institution of the world; it is pointed to as the best arranged institution for lepers to be found anywhere. I gave illustrations of this at the previous stage of this discussion, when I mentioned that several inmates of the institution have been discharged as cured, a result which was thought impossible. I am aware that some hon. gentlemen are sceptical on that point, but there is the fact, that the disease, under hygienic and superior medical treatment received in the lazaretto, has been cured and the patients have been allowed to go abroad. At no time has there been any compulsion. The necessity for action on this account is due to the fact that an unfortunate colony is now confined to an island on the Pacific coast. The British Columbia government declined to expend any money on them or to look after them in any way other than simply providing food for them, and the proposition is that the government should take over that as well as the lazaretto in New Brunswick. The object of this Bill is to give form and shape, and the powers required by the Minister of Agriculture, in order that both institutions may be carried on in the very best manner and on the most modern system. Dr. Montizambert gave me one or two amendments, one particularly, to be clause 16, which reads as follows:

> There shall be a thorough examination annually or at such other times as the minister may direct by the director general of public health, the result of such examination to be given fully in the annual report of that officer.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—That was the least important of all the amendments.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was not considered that he should go and examine each particular case. That would be attended by a good deal of expense if he had to travel to the Pacific coast or to the Atlantic coast in order to make an examination. The medical officer in charge of the lazaretto will, of course, make an examination of the lepers when they are received there, and that ought to satisfy hon. gentlemen on the point of proper evidence being given that they are parties that ought to be received into an institution of that kind. The proposal as made, I think, would be impracticable to carry out, because there are precautions taken all through the Bill to prevent hasty action in connection with placing a leper in a lazaretto either on the Pacific coast or in New Brunswick. What I understood the medical men who examined this Bill to ask was that the fifth clause should be made to read this way:

> The minister may cause any person as to whom it is suspected that he is affected with leprosy to be examined by a duly qualified medical officer, or officers to be designated by him, &c.

I have no objection to the insertion of those words, which were the words suggested when the Bill was up before—to be examined by a duly qualified medical officer.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Very well, if the minister will insert that I will withdraw my amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I find that the hon. Secretary of State does not answer my argument at all. I claim that this lazaretto is either a local hospital or a marine hospital. If it is not a marine hospital it falls under the exclusive jurisdiction of the province. That is my objection. My hon. friend says it is a federal matter, we have cured people there. That is the argument that he advances; because some people have been cured in that institution it must be federal. That amounts to nothing at all. I call the attention of my hon. friend to the British North America Act. Section 92 provides that:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:
> 7. The establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, asylums, charities and eleemosynary institutions in and for the province, other than marine hospitals.

Hon. Mr. JONES—That is not in and for the province. It is for the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The Dominion has no right to have it. Control of that is given to the province. It is for the province of British Columbia. It is not for the province of Quebec. Let them have a quarantine if they desire. People who have any contagious disease are stopped at the quarantine, and, from the quarantine, they might afterwards be sent, if necessary, to these lazarettos; but the marine hospital is not under the provincial government. I raise the objection once more, and I want a better answer than the one which the hon. gentleman has given, that people are cured there.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer is that New Brunswick has declined to take charge of the lazaretto. It is thrown upon the Dominion, and the Dominion has accepted the burden. The hon. gentleman may embarrass the Bill, but he cannot affect the general policy of the government in reference to the supporting of that hospital. That is done year by year.

Hon. Mr LANDRY—What right has a province to say to the Dominion we will give you that duty, or we will impose that burden on you ?' They have no right to say that. There is no arrangement that can be made between the Dominion and the province at the expense of the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the abstract the hon. gentleman may be quite right, but practically he is all wrong.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to be informed how I am wrong. It does not follow that I must be wrong because the hon. minister says so. I quoted the law and gave my authority. The hon. gentleman's ipse dixit does not settle the question.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Stadacona has made his point clearly and distinctly, as he usually does; but I do not think, in the present instance, the hon. gentleman is as correct as he generally is.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I may be so, but let the hon. gentleman convince me to the contrary. I am open to conviction.

Hon Mr. POWER—In the first place, paragraph 7 of section 92 of the British North America Act leaves with the provinces the establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, asylums, charities eleemosynary institutions in and for the province, other than marine hospitals. Negotiations undoubtedly took place between the Dominion and local government about the time of confederation. The hon. gentleman knows quite well that the Dominion government was never anxious to assume unnecessary expense, and they must have been satisfied that it was their duty to take charge of this institution. This institution was established at Tracadie, on the shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The first inmates, as I understand, were men who had come to the coast of New Brunswick in ships from abroad, and this institution would naturally be considered, I think, a marine hospital. But even if it were not a marine hospital, then if there is to be only one institution for the whole Dominion, this institution would not come under paragraph 7, because the province has control only of such institutions as are in and for the province. Then, under paragraph 11 of section 91, the Dominion government have charge of quarantine and the establishment and maintenance of marine hospitals, the Dominion also has dealt with immigration, and hon. gentlemen know that, during the last two or three years, we have dealt with legislation to prevent disease being brought into this country from abroad; consequently as this disease does not belong to the country, is not indigenous, is brought in from abroad, it would naturally come within the jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament and government, and inasmuch as it has been under Dominion jurisdiction for a great many years without any complaint being raised—although if we were going to work de novo we might raise some question about it—it is hardly worth while raising the question now, and I think probably the hon. gentleman from Stadacona agrees with me.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, I am not convinced.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, that is another thing. But I think the hon. gentleman agrees with me. I understand the amendment is being withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—It is withdrawn.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think the hon. gentleman who has just spoken is strictly correct in his statements. I have a distinct recollection when the question first came before the House of Commons. It was in connection with a hospital for the reception of the unfortunate people who were afflicted with the disease of leprosy in the province of New Brunswick. It was the Hon. Mr. Anglin, if my recollection serves me right, who first brought the subject under the notice of the government in the House of Commons, and he asked for aid in order to assist the province of New Brunswick in the maintenance of that institution, and he based his claim upon the grounds that have been advanced by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, that many of the lazaretto patients were people who did not belong to the province of New Brunswick, some having arrived from ships and others having been brought from the adjacent provinces. He argued that it partook more of a Dominion hospital than it did of a provincial institution, and upon these grounds the government placed in the estimates a certain sum to assist in the maintenance of that hospital. What has been done since I am not prepared to say, because I have not followed the estimates in that respect, but my impression is that the late government, as well as the government of the present day, have continued from that time until the present to place a sum in the estimates to assist in the maintenance of the institution, until I think they have arrived at the point that the Dominion sustain it now out of the public treasury altogether. I am not sure as to that point. Perhaps the hon. Secretary of State can tell me. Whether it was ever taken over by the Dominion by virtue of an Act of Parliament I am not prepared to say. I have no recollection of anything of that kind, but I have a distinct recollection of the events and the reasons advanced by the late Mr. Anglin in the House of Commons when he asked for assistance for the maintenance of the hospital.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The exclusive control has been with the Dominion government for the last twenty or thirty years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I desire also to say in reply to the hon. gentleman from Halifax that this is a question that could not have been considered by the fathers of confederation when they were framing the constitution. If it had been, their decision would have been acted upon, whatever that might have been, at confederation. But it was some years after the Constitutional Act had been passed, and we have been working under it when this question came under consideration of parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I find on looking back at the estimates for 1892 the vote is just the same, and it has been continued during the succeeding years, and I fancy 1882 would be the same.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am quite sure it was somewhere after confederation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It strengthens the position I took and all that I have said. What was done in the House of Commons at that time was simply the giving of certain grant of money to that hospital, but what are we doing to-day? We are enacting legislation here. We are creating a lazaretto in the province of British Columbia. I say we have no right to do that. That power belongs to the province. Let the province do that which it is its duty to do. If the provinces require aid they will come and ask for it, and we may give it to them. But no legislation has been passed for that province nor for British Columbia. And now we are passing legislation creating a local hospital for the province of British Columbia. We have no right to do that.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—All the lepers that came to British Columbia came by sea, and passed quarantine, and whether they were afflicted when they arrived or not, I do not know, but all these years they have been supported by the municipalities of Vancouver and Victoria and not by this government at all. They have been for years petitioning the government to take the matter over, but the government never moved until this year. I think the government are doing the proper thing in taking these institutions off the hand of the two towns, as has been done in New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The vote of 1883 was also in the estimate, whatever time it was taken over.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Those votes were all in aid of the maintenance of that hospital.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. They are simply mentioned as the Tracadie Lazaretto. The province gives no aid whatever.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—With all due deference to the hon. gentleman from Stadacona, I am at a loss to know how the point raised can apply to this Bill. It must be conceded that, in certain cases, the federal government is competent to deal with this class of disease. They can deal with quarantine. They have a right to legislate in these cases. There is nothing on the face of this legislation showing it to be of a provincial character. There is nothing in the four corners of the Bill by which the provinces are excluded from exercising whatever jurisdiction they may exercise under the British North America Act, and it seems to me the question raised by my hon. friend from Stadacona can scarcely arise until there is a question between the federal and provincial authorities as to the arrest, say of some leper who possibly may come under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities. It can only be raised in that case; that is to say, if he objects to the authority of the Dominion being exercised, to the exclusion of the provincial authorities. But, so far as the Bill itself is concerned, I find nothing excluding the powers of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If that be true, why should we have quarantine in that part of the country? We have a quarantine at Victoria. That proves it is quite different.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My answer to that is that the federal government would have a right to establish a quarantine at any point whatever.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, but the federal government would have power only to establish a quarantine. They would have no right under the British North America Act to carry on a hospital, either as a lazaretto or any other hospital, except a marine hospital. Turning to section 92 of the British North America Act, we find that the provincial governments have these subjects assigned to them by subsection 7:

7. The establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, asylums, charities and eleemosynary institutions in and for the province, other than marine hospitals.

We have a right to deal with the introduction of small-pox or any other infectious disease from outside the Dominion, and we deal with that with regard to the marine hospitals, and we establish a marine hospital for the care of the sick mariners, because we have to deal with the question, but I would go further than the hon. gentleman from Calgary. A serious question might arise, if this Bill were put into operation even without the intervention of the provincial government. Supposing the minister undertakes to have a person arrested under the provisions of this Act, and seeks to have him declared a subject for the lazaretto. Supposing the party proceeded against employs counsel and says 'You are doing what you have no right to do, you have no power to do; this power rests in the provinces; you have established a provincial hospital and are interfering with my liberty, in sending me there.' I think the whole question would come up in that way without the intervention of the province. The moment the hon. gentleman from Stadacona mentioned it, I began to see the difficulty, and I doubt very much whether this is a Bill which this parliament should pass at all. I question very much whether we can enforce it, and if we attempt to enforce it, and any case arises under it, I am of the opinion the Dominion government would fail, as it would be declared to be ultra vires of the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am informed by a gentleman residing in British Columbia, an hon. member of this House, that when the poll-tax was $100 on each Chinaman, the government collected $500,000. The Dominion government had been collecting a poll-tax upon the Chinaman for a number of years and large sums of money have been added to the revenue from that source. It is only that class of people who are troubled with leprosy, and why should the province be required to maintain a lazeretto there when the Dominion government are reaping the benefit of this tax?

Sometimes it may be a year or two after the arival of the immigrant before the leprosy is discovered, and if that argument holds good in New Brunswick, it should hold good in the province of British Columbia. Because there is no poll-tax on any one coming into the Dominion of Canada on the east side, excepting Chinamen, and we know very well that the west coast of British Columbia is where the Chinamen do come in, and that is where the Dominion government endeavour by putting a poll-tax on Chinamen, to prevent them coming into the country and spreading disease. Even with all the rigour with which the inspection is performed, cases of the disease are discovered after the people have arrived in the country. If there is one thing which goes to show that the Dominion government should do something towards this lazaretto, it is the fact that they have been receiving the revenue from the introduction of the people who have brought in the disease.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is true that the poll-tax was imposed upon every Chinaman that came into British Columbia, but the province represented to the Dominion government that there was a good deal of crime committed by the Chinese who came into the country, and the Dominion voluntarily allotted a portion of the revenue which was derived from that poll-tax to assist British Columbia in maintaining peace and order in that province. My recollection is that it was 25 per cent of the amount collected. Some years passed by and the province represented that it was costing them a good deal more than it did formerly and the percentage was increased, I think, to 50 per cent of the amount collected. I would not be positive as to the exact proportion, but I think, it was one-half of the revenue collected from the poll-tax which was handed over to the province to enable them to meet the expenditures attending any disturbances of the peace. It could not be for the maintenance of this hospital, because that is supported exclusively by Vancouver and Victoria—but this was the manner of distributing that fund to which the hon. gentleman has referred, and I think it has been continued by the present government.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I am not disputing what my hon. friend has said. If it were necessary, in the interests of good government in British Columbia, to give a portion of the poll-tax to the province in order to keep the peace among these unruly Chinamen. surely it is more in the interest of good government and the safety of the people at large, that a sum of money should be set apart to take care of those who may be brought to our shores and are found to be afflicted with leprosy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not arguing that question at all, I am merely telling the hon. gentleman how the fund was disposed of. The province could dispose of that money in the maintenance of a lazaretto or in any other manner they might prefer.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I would like to ask those who argue that the Dominion government should not take charge of this institution, what they would do under these circumstances. Most of these patients come from abroad, from the east, from China, India or Egypt. If the vessel were to arrive after a long journey with cases of leprosy which were developed during the trip, at any port either on the Atlantic coast or Pacific coast, what would you do then? Where is the local institution or the local authority to deal with them? The Dominion government would have to quarantine them, and it could not be done in the present hospitals, because the infection would be spread. The Bill is good legislation in my estimation. The government should have some institution, call it a quarantine if you like, instead of having to put patients of this class into a quarantine hospital. It is proper and right that they should have lazarettos of their own on both coasts.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the government now has an inspector who sends back to the old country all people who should not be permitted into this country. Why should we keep the lepers who immigrate?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Suppose they are too sick to be sent back, what would you do?

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The stage of incubation in leprosy is so long, that is the reason why a man might enter the country infected with leprosy, and yet it might be six months before it would break out.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There can be no doubt whatever that this government has the right to deal with the cases that come into the country from abroad. We could deport them, or we could take care of them in marine hospitals or under the quarantine regulations; but it is another thing altogether to establish a local hospital within the province and deal with the residents of the province who do not come under the quarantine regulations at all. In my opinion, we cannot do it, and if we attempted to enforce the law in that way we would find that there would be a failure.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—We would like to know what the expression 'duly qualified' embraces, what it conveys.

Hon. Mr. POWER—An officer like the hon. gentleman himself, who is a duly qualified medical practitioner.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—My hon. friend is ready to give me an answer, but his answer is no explanation. The question is what the words 'duly qualified' mean. Is it a licensed practitioner, or a person who has been trained in some other way, not a licensed practitioner? The object I have in view in asking this question is to see that the rights and liberty of the patient, whoever he may be, shall be thoroughly and carefully guarded so that no injustice can possibly be done to him. I agree with my hon. friend from Stadacona that this Bill really ought to be part and parcel of the legislation of the provinces. It was asked by my hon. friend here, what right has the province to interfere, because parties of immigrants might come in from a foreign country? I might just as well ask, what would become of a person with small-pox or any other infectious or contagious disease? I might just as well say that they should have a special hospital for such patients. The Act of confederation gives us jurisdiction over certain things and not beyond them. The marine hospital is the only one in this class of institutions that we can make provision for; and if we can make provision for small-pox or for any other disease, we can provide for leprosy with the same propriety, and, therefore, I contend we ought to know clearly what is meant by 'duly qualified.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If my hon. friend will only read the paragraph carefully he will see that it explains itself. It must be a medical officer qualified to practice, and he must be qualified also to pronounce upon cases of leprosy. I think it is quite plain.

The clause as amended was agreed to.

On clause 8,

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I would ask the hon. Secretary of State if it would not be well to have the word 'duly' inserted in the second last line of this clause, as well as in the previous one.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection.

The clause as amended was adopted.

On clause 12,

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I would ask the leader of the government if it would not be well to add to clause 12 the words, 'or who desires to enter voluntarily.' A patient might express a desire to enter the lazaretto of his own accord.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is clearly no objection to that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That would give rise to a serious question in connection with this section, having in mind the sections we have already passed. The preceding sections of this Bill lead up to the admission of the person afflicted with leprosy, 'and the medical superintendent is obliged to receive the persons who have been committed to such lazaretto as aforesaid.' Now we come to this provision, establishing, apparently, some other power of committing a person, apart from all those already passed upon. It gives the minister a power, apparently, apart altogether from what has gone before.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Subject of course to compliance with the preceding conditions.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not read it in that way. The words 'or whose admission thereto has been authorized by the minister' constitute a separate and distinct provision. The word 'aforesaid' has no bearing on the last paragraph of the sentence at all. It cannot have.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is subject to the provisions of clauses 5, 6 and 7, of course.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, they all have a bearing upon this clause up to the comma—up to the end of the word 'aforesaid,' but they have no bearing on the last clause of the paragraph.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no objection, if my hon. friend desires, to saying, 'in accordance with the preceding provisions.' It is really predicated on them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That would remove that objection, but another arises in connection with what my hon. friend from Montague (Hon. Mr. Robertson) said a moment ago. Care should be taken, I think, to provide against people having the right to enter the lazaretto voluntarily. It should be done with great care. For this reason: You might find that a very devoted wife or husband would like to follow the husband or wife into the lazaretto, and you might raise a family of lepers, or a child might be affected and the mother might want to go into the lazaretto also, to care for the child, although she might be free from the disease. That would not be right. I do not think we should open the door to permit people to enter voluntarily into a lazaretto, because healthy people might subject themselves to this disease, and it is not to the interest of the community that they should be allowed to do so. The point I have more particularly in my mind is covered by the suggestion offered by the leader of the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no objection to adding the words.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I do not think it is at all desirable to have that amendment. The reasons given by the hon. senator from Marshfield, are of sufficient weight for us to reject that amendment. At all events, if a person may be admitted on his own demand, it should not be until after the medical examiner has passed upon his case and pronounced him a leper. If such a proviso is added to the amendment, I for one shall accept it; otherwise I do not believe that a person not diseased should be at liberty to enter a lazaretto voluntarily.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I desire to add as clause 16 the following:

There shall be a thorough examination at least annually, or at such other time as the minister may direct, by the director general of public health, the result of such examination to be given fully in the annual report of that officer.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BAKER from the Committee reported Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like the minister to get the opinion of the Minister of Justice on that Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been discussed over and over again.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That does not give the opinion of the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This matter has engaged the attention of the government for days and days.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Not on that point.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, on that point.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We have a new Minister of Justice and we do not know what his opinion is.

The Bill was ordered for third reading to-morrow.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (88) An Act respecting La Compagnie d'Assurance Mutuelle contre le feu des Comtés de Rimouski, Temiscouata et Kamouraska.—(Hon. Mr. Landry.)

Bill (122) An Act respecting a certain patent of Franklin Montgomery Gray.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (153) An Act respecting Placer Mining in the Yukon Territory.—(Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Bill (164) An Act to amend the Rocky Mountains Park Act.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (177) An Act to make further provision respecting grants of land to members of the militia force on active service in the Northwest.—(Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

APPOINTMENT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to inquire of the Secretary of State if he is willing to give us any information in regard to a paragraph published in the Toronto 'World,' which reads as follows :

Hon. Adelard Turgeon, Minister of Crown Lands for Quebec, has been decided upon for Solicitor General.
'La Presse' will make an official announcement to-morrow.
Mr. Turgeon will be returned to the House from the county of Quebec.

I want to know if there is any truth in that report and if there is any one in the lower House to be selected other than the Hon. Mr. Turgeon ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not heard the subject discussed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It might be so without discussion.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

SENATE.

PACIFIC AND EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (N) An Act to incorporate the Pacific and Eastern Railway Company, with amendments. He said : The amendments made to this Bill are matters of form rather than of substance. They are the clauses usually inserted in Bills of this character, and I move that the amendments be now concurred in.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—Before the motion is carried, I may say that I think it was the intention to include another amendment giving running rights to other roads. That amendment was not moved, and for that and other reasons I think the Bill might fairly be sent back to the committee for further consideration. I therefore move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Talbot, that this Bill be referred to the committee for further consideration.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I ask permission to say a few words with reference to the observations which have fallen from the hon. gentleman from Victoria. It is quite true that the clause relating to running rights is not embodied in this report. That omission was only discovered after the committee had adjourned, and it will be within the recollection of those who were present when the matter was fully discussed in committee that this clause was agreed upon, and it was understood that it should be inserted when the Bill was under consideration last week ; therefore, on its being discovered that it was not embodied in the report, I prepared a notice which I intended to give, that at the third reading of the Bill I would move that that clause be added—a standing clause which has been inserted in other Bills giving the same running rights as in the case of other roads. Under those circumstances, it will be quite unnecessary that this report should go back to the committee. The clause may be adopted by the House, and it is common practice to add a clause on the third reading. I propose to give notice that, when the opportunity offers, I will move on the motion for third reading of the Bill entitled 'An Act to incorporate the Pacific and Eastern Railway Company,' the following as clause 4 :—

Clause 4. Whenever, in the opinion of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, owing to the configuration of any portion of the country through which the company's line of railway passes, it is impracticable or unduly expensive to build more than one line of railway through that portion of country, the provisions of section 137 of the Railway Act, 1903, shall apply as regards the company and any other company authorized to construct a line of railway through that portion of country ; but nothing in this section of this Act shall be deemed to limit or restrain in any way the application of the said section 137.

That would of course make it unnecessary that the Bill should be delayed. At this stage of the session, any postponement might have a very serious effect upon the fate of the Bill and I hope, therefore, with this intimation, that the hon. senator will withdraw his motion so that this clause may be added at the third reading.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I may say from the multiplicity of amendments to this Bill read by the clerk to-day, I think an opportunity should be given for considering them before the Bill passes, and I cannot see my way to withdraw the motion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. gentleman might withdraw his motion and keep it for to-morrow. I do not think we should concur in the amendments to-day. We do not know what they are.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I will make the motion for to-morrow. I am perfectly indifferent. I am merely acting as chairman of the committee.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—I would suggest that the Bill should go back to the committee, and that the amendments should be printed so that they may be considered carefully.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I understand that there are other objections to the Bill. Matters have transpired since the Bill was before the committee, and I think it would be well that every opportunity should be given for discussion. I think, therefore, that the Bill should go back to the committee.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Does the hon. senator (Hon. Mr. McHugh) withdraw his motion or not ?

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—I do not.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I wish to tell the House that no Bill before parliament this year has received more consideration in the Railway Committee than this measure has. It was delayed three or four different times to give members an opportunity of seeing it, and of getting acquainted with its contents, and to-day it passed the committee with amendments which are not consequential at all. They merely refer to water-powers, electricity, canals, and things of that kind, but they do not interfere with the principle of the Bill. Of course there are people opposed to this Bill who want a monopoly for themselves, but the Senate has declared against a monopoly in favour of any company. In cases where there is plenty of room they are determined to give every railway a chance to go ahead, and I hope this Bill will not be sent back. We have had the Bill before us in the committee on three or four different days, and will have nothing new presented to us if it is sent back again.

Hon. Mr. COX—I opposed the Bill in the committee, but it was carried by a substantial majority. As the hon. gentleman from British Columbia has stated, it has been before the committee on several occasions, three or four different times I believe, and, having been adopted by the committee, after long and repeated discussions, I think it should now go through without being referred back.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not think the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. McHugh) is in order, because it applies to a motion which is not in order. The main motion is not in order, and I call attention to May, page 555 :

> Concurrence in reports; it is the practice to move concurrence in reports of committees in certain cases. Many motions for concurrence in reports of select committees. (This is a report of a select committee.) Are brought up without notice and allowed to pass by unanimous consent.

That is the practice, but if somebody objects it cannot pass. It must be delayed until the next stage. In view of this authority I do not think my hon. friend's amendment is correct, because it is amending a motion that I find is out of order, and I would ask both parties to withdraw their motions. How could we pronounce on the main motion or the amendment ? We do not know what the report of that standing committee contains. The amendments are very numerous and should be printed so that we may take cognizance of them. That is my only object in asking my hon. friend to be good enough to postpone the motion until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the view expressed by the hon. senator from Stadacona is correct ; the amendments could not be concurred in to-day unless there was a general consent of the House. That consent is not granted, so the amendments could only be taken into consideration to-morrow. I would vote against the amendment of the hon. senator from Lindsay (Hon. Mr. McHugh) for the reason given by the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Cox). This Bill was considered at great length, and very carefully by the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours. It was adopted in its present form by a substantial majority of the committee, and I do not think, if it were referred back, that the effect would be at all different. Any amendments which are desired can be made when the Bill comes up for third reading and the hon. gentleman from Lindsay can give notice to amend.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—The promoter of the Bill has acknowledged there is an amendment which should have been made to the Bill in committee, but was overlooked. He says that was a standing amendment. There is a possibility that some of the amendments which were found suitable in other Bills might not be suitable to this, and the committee, in their wisdom, might change the amendment as applied to this Bill. My hon. friend having acknowledged that there is an amendment which should be made to the Bill, the proper way would be to refer the report back to the committee to deal with it. I am glad we are not concurring in those amendments to-day, as we did in other cases.

The SPEAKER—I am not clear that after the motion was made to concur in the amendments any exception was taken, and anything intervened between that motion and the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Lindsay. If there was no such point taken then, I would say that no objection having been taken to the motion for concurrence in the amendments to-day, the amendment was in order ; but, of course, if it is the desire of the House that the report should be taken into consideration to-morrow and the amendment is withdrawn, we will take the motion of the hon. senator from St. John (Hon. Mr. Ellis) who offers to amend the motion by moving that concurrence be taken to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It must surely be open to any member to take that point any time before concurrence is agreed to.

The SPEAKER—Yes, but the amendment was in order so long as no point was raised.

The consideration of the amendment was postponed until to-morrow.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (II) An Act for the relief of Muriel Violet Spencer.—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

COST OF EXPEDITION TO HUDSON BAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government :

How much did the expedition cost which was made in 1897 by the ship 'Diana' to Hudson bay?

For how many days had the ship been provisioned; what was the number of persons who took part in the expedition?

How much was expended—

(a) In wages, (b) in the purchase of provisions, and more particularly of meats, vegetables, beverages, tobacco ; (c) for clothing ; (d) for the hire of the ship; (e) for the installation and the necessary repairs; (f) for the equipmont of the vessel; (g) for oil and fuel, &c?

How long did the expedition last?

When the expedition was over did there remain any provisions not expended, any clothing not used, any fuel not consumed?

For how much of the purchase price?

What was done with them?

If they were sold how much did such sale bring in?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers to the hon. gentleman's inquiry are as follows :—

How much did the expedition cost which was made in 1897 by the ship 'Diana' to Hudson bay?

The expedition cost $40,141.98.

For how many days had the ship been provisioned; what was the number of persons who took part in the expedition?

Provisioned for seventeen months ; 43 took part in expedition.

How much was expended—

(a) In wages, (b) in the purchase of provisions, and more particularly of meats, vegetables, beverages, tobacco ; (c) for clothing ; (d) for the hire of the ship; (e) for the installation and the necessary repairs; (f) for the equipment of the vessel; (g) for oil and fuel, &c?

Wages	$9,750 92
Provisions	5,968 26
Beverages	386 67
Tobacco	347 26
Clothing	474 91
Hire of ship	9,800 00
Installation and repairs	2,326 25
Equipment	2,676 29
Oil and fuel	6,236 62
Drugs	189 92
Engine supplies	142 94
Sundries	5,089 18

How long did the expedition last?

Five months and eight days.

When the expedition was over did there remain any provisions not expended, any clothing not used, any fuel not consumed?

Yes.

For how much of the purchase price?

(No answer.)

What was done with them?

Sold and returned.

If they were sold how much did such sale bring in?

Goods sold..	$2,559 36
Goods returned..	687 88

PUBLICATION IN FRENCH OF MILITARY REGULATIONS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government:

The Department of Militia and Defence having already twice, without being asked to do so, made known to the Senate its determination not to translate into French for publication in that language, that which the law makes obligatory to publish in French as well as in English in the 'Canada Gazette,' is it the intention of the government to let the Department of Militia and Defence decide, or will the government itself decide, that the volunteers of French origin, who enroll themselves in the service of their country, have in no wise the right and in all cases shall have in no wise the advantage, of being put upon a footing of equality with their other comrades of English origin?

Is it wished to discourage all participation whatsoever by Canadians of French origin in the effective maintenance of the militia?

Does the government intend to countenance this defiance of justice, of which the Department of Militia and Defence renders itself culpable, by persisting in refusing to one whole class of our population that which by the treaties, by the constitution, and by the law, it has the right to have?

What is the name of the person in the Department of Militia and Defence who takes upon himself the responsibility of answering, in the name of a whole government, the just claims of the French element by an unjust refusal?

Is it the minister? the deputy minister? the Military Council?

Is the Secretary of State incapable henceforth of obtaining for us the answer of the government in place of the decrees of a subordinate employee?

And what is the settled policy of the government upon the question of knowing whether, yes or no, there shall be translated and published in French all those regulations and orders of the militia which in order to come into force must be published in the 'Canada Gazette'?

In virtue of this obligation, is it the intention of the government to force the Department of Militia and Defence to do its duty, and to publish in French without delay, the rules and orders of which the 'Canada Gazette' of the 5th May contains the English text, as well as the little volume which the Militia Department has just published under the title of 'Memorandum for Camps of Instruction, 1906—Issued with Militiary Order No. 112?'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Department of Militia and Defence is pursuing precisely the same course with reference to the translation of regulations and orders, and general orders, &c., into the French language as was pursued by the department under the administration of Sir George Cartier, Sir Adolphe Caron and successive Ministers of Militia up to the present date.

The rules and orders of the 5th May, and the memorandum for camps of instruction, 1906, will be published in French at the earliest possible date.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is a reference at the end to a little memorandum. Is that included in the answer?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes; that will be published. My hon. friend refers to the memorandum for camps of instruction?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN HON. MR. LANDRY AND SIR WILFRID LAURIER.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House a copy of the correspondence exchanged between the Honourable Mr. Landry and the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and between the latter and the Department of Militia and Defence, on the subject of the refusal by that department to translate and to cause to be published in French the regulations for the militia which were published, in English only, in the 'Canada Gazette,' of 5th May last.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Does the hon. gentleman wish that motion to be carried now? I have already advised him that the regulations will be published in French, so that there is no great object in passing that address.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I wanted to have the correspondence between the hon. premier and the Department of Militia on that subject.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know that there has been any. I shall make inquiry.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I received a letter from the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and he told me that he had written to the Militia Department. I would confine the motion to the single letter written by the premier to the Department of Militia, leaving out the others, if the hon. gentleman is willing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will see the premier about it.

The SPEAKER—Will the motion stand ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No ; the correspondence will be brought down if it can be done.

The motion was agreed to.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S MILITARY HOUSEHOLD.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government :

I. In the military household of His Excellency the Governor General, what is the number of persons employed :
1. As military secretary.
2. As aides de camp.
3. As honorary aides de camp.
II. Out of this number how many persons belong—
1. To the province of Ontario.
2. To the province of Quebec.
3. To the maritime provinces.
4. To the western provinces ?
III. How many persons of French origin does the province of Quebec count among the number of persons which it furnishes, according to the above figures, to the military household of His Excellency ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The reply is :

I. 1. As military secretary, one.

2. As aides-de-camp, two.

3. As honorary aides-de-camp, thirteen.

II. 1. To the province of Ontario, seven.

2. To the province of Quebec, four.

3. To the maritime provinces, one.

4. To the western provinces, one.

III. Two, besides an honorary surgeon. The military secretary and aides-de-camp mentioned at the head of the list are appointed by the Governors General in England.

ROSS RIFLES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY called the attention of the government to the following facts :

On the 11th May last, Honourable Mr. Landry inquired :
(1) " 3. Where are the balance of the (Ross) rifles accepted by the government stored, and how many of Mark No. I remain, and how many of Mark No. II. ? "

To which the following answer was given by Honourable Mr. Scott :
3 (a) Rifle associations, 267.
Ordnance charge : London 9 ; Toronto 35 ; Kingston 43 ; Ottawa 514 ; Montreal 60 ; Quebec 3,900 ; St. John 33 ; Halifax 45 ; Winnipeg 35 ; Charlottetown 30.
(b) 4,705.
(c) At Halifax, Nova Scotia, 1,000 ; Victoria. British Columbia, 200 ; Quebec, 800.
And that he will inquire—
To what part of the question does part (a) of the answer apply ? To what part of the inquiry does part (b) of the answer apply ? And to what part of the inquiry does part (c) of the answer apply ?
(2) Where is the distinction to be found between the number of rifles marked I. and the number of rifles marked No. II., in those three divisions a, b and c ?
(3) What is the meaning of the words ordnance charge in the answer precited ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer furnished me reads in this way :

With reference to the above inquiry :

1. In the answer to the inquiry, given on May 11, part (a) refers to distribution of mark I rifles from ordnance charge, i.e, government stores ; part (b) shows the number of rifles mark I in ordnance charge, government stores, at date of inquiry ; part (c) gives the number of rifles mark II in ordnance charge, government stores, and their distribution at date of inquiry.

2. Paragraph (c) refers to Ross rifles mark II, and paragraphs (a) and (b) to rifles mark I.

3. 'Ordnance charge' means 'government stores' in charge of an ordnance officer.

NORTH ATLANTIC TRADING COMPANY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved :

That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that he will cause to be laid before the Senate, a statement relating to the North Atlantic Trading Company showing :

1. The names of those composing the company ; and of other persons, or person not formed into a company with whom the Dominion government or any official thereof entered into an agreement, or other arrangement for the promotion of immigration to Canada.

2. The name or names, and the official positions of such person, or persons to whom payments were made under such agreement, or arrangement.

3. The name, and official position of the person who made payments under such agreement or arrangement.

4. The name and official position of the person who certified to the accuracy of accounts previous to payments being made.

5. Is this agreement or arrangement cancelled, if so, on what date ?

6. If such an agreement having for its object bringing to this country immigrants of a desirable class at a reasonable cost, and had been entered into, without giving undue advantage to one party or the other or particularly to such company, person, or persons sharing in the earnings under the said agreement, if cancelled, why cancelled.

He said : I confess to some hesitancy in approaching this mysterious, dark, and secret subject, and if this was not such a public question as immigration, and the expenditure of public money I would not touch it. There could not be a more public question. Why then secrecy ? Who is afraid of the light ? What acts have been committed in connection with a public matter, and the expenditure of public money which will not bear the light of day ? There are questions which may at times require secrecy, but not the one now under discussion. I delayed this motion from day to day in expectation that Mr. Preston's foreign and home associates would give their consent to break the seal of secrecy ; when Mr. Preston would give his consent to the Premier to break his vow of secrecy. This may have been done—in which case the government may not oppose my motion.

We cannot shut our eyes or understanding to what has been going on in another place touching the subject now before the House. We can see what a farce a parliamentary committee investigation is made. When witnesses, under suspicion of wrong-doing, are shielded and aided by ministers of the Crown, and members of parliament, in concealing the truth. I am strongly of opinion that the government has been placed in a false position by the machinations of one minister and his deputies, and cannot see its way clearly out of the hobble.

I am bound to believe that the government as now composed is honest—and that members of parliament are also honest. Such being the case one of the chief duties should be to take care that public officials do their duty faithfully, and honestly. If charges are made, or a suspicion rests on any official, the minister at the head of the department should at once hold an investigation to prove the truth or falsity of the accusation as becomes a cabinet anxious for clean government. This has not been done in the recent investigation, but the contrary, every effort made to conceal the truth. Such conduct might be justifiable in courts of law, but is out of place in an inquiry by parliament into the acts of a public official. I think I will be quite correct in stating that the cabinet as a whole knew nothing of this secret agreement with foreigners, that the whole thing was arranged by Preston and Smart, and approved by Mr. Sifton. Has this government lent itself, to spending public money in an illegitimate, if not an illegal propaganda in foreign countries which would account for the secrecy ? Why do the foreigners and others to this agreement bind Preston not to reveal their names, because they have been poaching, if not kidnapping in foreign countries with the connivance, and monetary aid by the government of this country? Men liable to conscription are induced to leave their country by emissaries of Canada, therefore necessity for secrecy. The government has placed itself and the country in a very humiliating position countenancing men who may be outlaws in their own country for breaking the laws laid down by their government.

If this had been an honest open agreement with reputable men there would be no need for secrecy. Preston and Smart, not satisfied with making a dark agreement with men afraid to be known, get the Premier into the net, letting him into a secret which he is not allowed to divulge. The cancellation of this agreement is ample proof it was not in the interest of the country, but was illadvised, and improper. If economical, legitimate, and honourable why cancel it ? From the evidence of Preston and Jury before committees of the Commons, it is quite evident they were working for themselves and not for Canada, and both should be dismissed from the public service. Preston has certainly lowered and abused his position by carrying out secret dealings with public money to the benefit of unknown, and unworthy foreigners.

The immigration work in Great Britain and Ireland can very well be worked from the office of the High Commissioner, a special official being told off for that purpose and the rent and expenses of separate offices saved to the country. What is required much more than Preston and Jury is reliable medical officials at the ports of embarkation to inspect immigrants as to age, health, and whether paupers likely to become a burden in this country. The greatest care should be taken in the class of immigrants allowed to come into the country—quality and not numbers should be the object. In the words of Mr. Hill, in Ottawa, a few days ago: 'don't be in a hurry to throw your public lands away, or to get a poor class of immigrants.' The Minister of the Interior should consider such good advice.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I may say at the outset that Mr. Preston's opinion does not weigh one feather weight as to the proper course that this government should pursue. It has no influence whatever upon the conclusions that had been reached by the present administration. Any gentleman who has had any familiarity with immigration from Europe for the last 35 years will have been aware that very great difficulties surround the advocacy of immigration from those countries. Every man in Germany and the countries surrounding Germany, Prussia and Austria, has to serve so many years as a soldier. Prescription prevails there, and those countries are opposed to emigration. Immigration service has to be carried on through indirect methods. So far back as 1882, when the late government proposed to favour immigration from Europe, an agent was appointed who had no possible connection with the immigration Department simply because he was an agent representing a steamship company which did a business with the cities of Hamburg, Brussels and other ports of Europe. I have before me a letter written in 1882, from Mr. John Lowe, who was then secretary of the Department of Agriculture, addressed to J. N. Abbott, general passenger agent of the New York and Erie Railway Company. It seemed an odd thing, in favouring immigration from Europe, to employ a gentleman who was in no way connected with the Immigration Department here, or in no way connected with immigration in the United States in any other way than as the representative of a steamship company. In that letter, he is advised that for the purpose of procuring such immigration he would be the medium of paying to emigrants from Germany or Scandinavia a commission of $5 per adult for able-bodied immigrants of the agricultural class, or mechanics in common pursuits, carpenters, blacksmiths, builders, &c., such commission being confined to adults of 18 years and upwards, and being of the age prescribed by the Dominion Lands Act by which a settler may take up land in Manitoba. In addition to that, he was to receive ten per cent which he distributed. It would amount to ten dollars per capita. It would follow that the agents in Europe would have to take the risk of the immigrant going to Manitoba and the five dollars would be a further inducement to promote emigration. The whole commission would amount to ten dollars. That is the amount paid at that time. I call attention to the mode which, at that date, was thought to be the best method to favour immigration from Europe, to those who have given some thought to this subject. It would seem that a very active agent of ours, who was attached to the Liverpool service, Mr. John Dyke, being a German, thought he was immune from prosecution. He went to Germany, and the consequence was he was arrested. He was detained in prison for some time, and was only removed from custody through the intervention of the foreign office.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—How long was that ago ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Somewhere in the seventies.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Thirty-three years ago.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not recollect exactly, but hon. gentlemen will bear in mind that the methods of procedure favouring immigration from Europe are entirely different from that which an ordinary business man would pursue in connection with any business operation. The agreement with the North Atlantic Trading Company was made under the authority of an order in council. I have a copy of the order now in hand. There is no reference whatever in that memo. contemplating a secret agreement—none whatever. On the contrary, after specifying the duties and the objects and the lines to be pursued by the North Atlantic Trading Company in the contract with the government, there is this final paragraph :

It is further agreed that the company shall not act in contravention of the laws of the country in which they are operating in carrying out their agreement with the government.

That is a copy of an order in council passed on September 29, 1904. It recites that an existing contract had been made in 1902, and it authorized the Minister of the Interior to make the contract with the North Atlantic Trading Company of Amsterdam.

Hon. gentlemen will see that it was never in contemplation that any secret agreement would be made. The North Atlantic Trading Company had their headquarters in Europe. Until the recent excitement arose I do not think that a single member of the government, except possibly Mr. Sifton, knew anything of that particular paragraph in the contract which seems to have excited so much criticism. All I can say is, that, up to the time the suggestion was made that the names be shown to the hon. leader of the opposition, even Sir Wilfried Laurier did not know the names of the company. I say for myself and my colleagues, that not a single member knows the names of the men who substantially compose the Trading Company. There are stool pigeons in the letters patent that have been issued from the island of Guernsey. Those names were all given, but they do not represent the people to whom the money was paid. It appears, after the authority was given for the carrying out of this agreement in London, that a further arrangement was made, and the North Atlantic Trading Company, fearing that they might be prosecuted, evidently had insisted on a paragraph going into the contract by which it stipulated that their names were not to be given to the public. Of that stipulation I state here positively that no member of the government was aware, except possibly Mr. Sifton, and then only after the contract had been made.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the curious part of it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What date is the order in council ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—November, 1899. That was on the former agreement.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is not this order in council ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No ; this order in council is later. There was an order in council passed on May 31st, 1902. It was renewed from time to time. The last one was passed in 1904, renewing it for a period of ten years.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Was that the first order in council that was passed ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No ; there was an order in council passed before that. This commences : 'On a memorandum dated 19th August, 1904, the Minister of the Interior, &c.' The company entered upon their work, and they seemed to have done pretty good work, if one can judge from returns. I hold in my hand a comparative statement of immigrants from Europe who came to this country during the years from 1888 up to last year. From this it will be seen that the company did substantial work, and sent very large numbers of immigrants to Canada.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—They did not send out half of them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Well, I presume not. I presume that in all immigration matters, one immigrant who comes out and succeeds is probably the channel through which others come. I have always regarded an immigrant who has been fortunate for a year or two as being the best agent to bring others to the country. When this question was brought to the attention of the government, six or eight weeks ago, the point arose. what are we to do ? Without advising the government of Canada, our office in London, with so distinguished a man at the head of it, had approved of a contract with the parties, in which this clause was set forth, that the names were not to be divulged. We quite recognize that it was contrary to the principles of sound government that the money of the people should be expended without being audited. No one will gainsay that it was a very unfortunate arrangement. The question was, what was to be done ? Those people had entered into a contract with our agents in London, who were certainly authorized to make a contract. I do not feel that they were authorized to make the contract to the extent that they did ; that is, that they had no right to go beyond the terms of the order in council, more particularly that paragraph in it which called attention to the adverse laws existing in Germany and other countries against the propagation of emigration. With that knowledge, I think it was a very great mistake, but the question was, what was this government to do ? Was it to break faith with these people ? The feeling was that it would be a breach of honour. A government stands in an exceptional position. If they authorized their agents in London to make a contract, and it is quite true the agents in London exceeded the authority given them, the parties with whom they were dealing had nothing to do with that. The order in council was not shown to them ; but there was the fact. When we asked for the names, they said : 'No, we cannot give them ; it was understood at the time this arrangement was entered into that the names would not be given to the public. It would subject them to prosecution in the various countries. They are people of some position, and they would probably be imprisoned if their names were made public.' That is an embarrassing position for any government to be in. What would you say ? Would you say : Although it is quite true that this arrangement has been made in good faith with the representatives of the government of Canada, yet the government of Canada cannot approve of the arrangement ? But this was years after—long after they had entered into the work and sent large numbers of immigrants to Canada. I ask any hon. gentleman, just put yourself in the place of the government under these circumstances. You had never heard there was any such arrangement until public attention was called to it only a few months ago. What are you to do ? Are you to say to these people, we insist upon the names or we will pay no more money ? Would that be a position that the people of Canada would uphold ? Unless we were convinced that some dishonesty had been practised ; unless we were convinced that some fraud had been practised ; that they had obtained money improperly ; that they had not sent forward the number of immigrants which they undertook to send, would we be in a position to give their names contrary to the agreement ? I think not. The next point was : What is the best thing to do under the circumstances ? That contract had ten years to run from 1904. Only a part of two years had passed by, and eight years remained. The next best thing seemed to be to ascertain whether the company had lived up to their contract. On inquiry, we were satisfied that the proportion of immigrants coming from Scandinavian countries was not up to what was stipulated in the contract, and the government notified the company by wire at once that from and after the 1st December next the agreement between the company and the government would cease. Would any hon. gentleman say that this government could have done differently from that, or that they did not take the course that any hon. gentleman, acting in his own private capacity, would have taken ? If I authorize an agent to do a certain thing and he exceeds my authority, entering into a contract covering a considerable period, the party with whom he made that contract, acting in good faith and not aware that the agent had exceeded his authority, would I be in a position to break the agreement because the agent had deceived—perhaps that is too strong a word—because he had, in doing what he thought best, made a contract to withhold certain names ? So long as the accounts were audited, and a substantial return was given in the number of immigrants sent to Canada, this country was getting full value for the expenditure made. No one questions that. The figures I have given maintain what I have said, that the immigration at once jumped up to a higher figure than it had ever attained before. I ask any hon. gentleman if he were in the government, and the conditions were such as I have represented, would he have done differently ? Of course, there will be differences of opinion. I quite admit that. Some men are more sensitive on points of honour than others are ; but there was a matter of great importance, one which affected the personal liberty of a large class of men, some of them holding the important positions of representatives of leading steamship companies in Europe. Their position was liable to be seriously affected, and they were liable to be imprisoned. Only to-day a cable came from the Colonial Office advising us that a representative had been fined for engaging men to come to Canada.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—For what crime?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Soliciting emigrants to go to Canada. Some enterprising manufacturer in the maritime provinces had communicated with an agent in Norway, I think he was a Norwegian himself, with the object of engaging a certain number of men —about seventy-five, I think—to work in some particular factory.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before my hon. friend leaves that point, did I understand him to say that a government immigration agent has been arrested in Norway? I thought that Norway was included in the contract with the North Atlantic Trading Company, and that we were to have no immigration agents in any of the countries covered by that contract.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I intended to have brought the despatch with me to-day, but I forgot it. I think the man was sent from Canada. At all events the gravamen of the whole offence was the soliciting of a certain number of Norwegians to come to Canada. He had actually engaged some 75, I think. Their passages were taken and they were paid for their time, but the government of Norway got wind of it, and he was at once arrested. I merely mention that as an illustration.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Were they mechanics?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I really could not say. They were not agriculturists, because they were to work in some establishment in the maritime provinces. That is a departure probably from the subject I was discussing, but it happened to come in opportunely as an illustration of the line of policy adopted by European countries in order to check the exodus of their people. Now we have no apologies to make. This government acted from a high sense of duty. There is not now a single member of the government who knows the name of one member of this North Atlantic Trading Company, that is, the names of the real people—I do not now mean those who formed the corporation that was organized in Guernsey, who were professedly their representatives—except Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and he only learned of them for the purpose of communicating with the leader of the opposition in order that he might be advised of the facts—but no other member of this government, not even the Minister of the Interior—I asked Mr. Oliver to-day, and, therefore, I am not breaking any secrets of the council table—whether he knew at any time the names of the company, who resided on the continent of Europe, and he told me he did not know, and that he never had the names communicated to him. So that it is not a matter at all of Mr. Preston. His view or judgment had nothing whatever to do with it. He, of course, knows the names. Before coming to Canada, knowing that he was to be examined as a witness, before the committee of the House of Commons, he asked the parties if they would consent to their names being divulged, and hon. gentlemen who have followed his testimony, will remember that he said he had a sealed letter containing the names, and if he got a cable in answer to a request he had made, he would be only too glad to give the names. They objected and that was the end of it. So that it is not a matter of which this government can be accused of protecting anybody or concealing anything which they are at liberty to divulge. It is simply a matter where the honour of Canada is involved in the stand which this government has chosen to take. They do not approve of the moneys of the people of this country being expended without their being audited and examined. So far as the payments are concerned, I have no doubt everything has been honestly done, because the parties through whom the money has been paid have examined the vouchers, and we have the living evidence, that the people have come to Canada in accordance with the arrangements that were made. Now I think my hon. friend from Victoria, if he would put himself in the place of a member of this government, would feel that he is scarcely in a position to criticise and use the terms he did in discussing this question, that we were concealing anything or attempting to protect any parties who were drawing money from the public fund, necessarily implying that the money was being misapplied and misappropriated. After the explanation I have given, my hon. friend should be quite willing to withdraw any charge of that kind. I do not know that there is anything more I need say on the subject. I should be glad to give any further information I can to my hon. friend in answer to his address. I shall not be able to give him the substantial part of it, that is the names of the parties whom he seeks to reach. That cannot be done. I do not know that we will ever be in a position to do that. The best we could do was to ascertain, as I said before, whether we would be justified in breaking the agreement. On examination we found that the proportion of immigrants from Scandinavian countries was not up to the mark, and so the government gave notice that the contract would cease.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I had not intended to make any observations as to this question, but my hon. friend has entered upon such a lengthy explanation and apology for what the government has done, that one cannot refrain from making some comments as to this extraordinary contract. I know of no hon. gentleman possessing such a happy faculty for clothing a vicious principle in garments of virtue as my hon. friend opposite.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not apologize.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And I know of no one who would be so qualified to explain away what I might term a fictitious contract as my hon. friend. Now, from the statement made by the hon. Secretary of State, it would appear that the government deliberately desisted from securing any knowledge whatsoever with reference to a contract which, up to the present time, has involved the expenditure of no less than $296,000. He states deliberately that there is not a member of the present government who knows the names of those who really compose this company, excepting the Prime Minister, who only acquired the information since the matter was brought up in the House. Consequently, no responsible head in the government of Canada has any knowledge whatsoever as to whether the contract is actual or fictitious; and, in spite of that fact, the government has deliberately paid out $296,000 for services which they had no possibility of determining were rendered.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, he is quite wrong. They produced vouchers for the immigration.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend takes exception to that statement. I shall deal with that point in a moment. If there are no responsible parties with whom this contract was made; if there was no such corporation as that which was represented to exist at the time the contract was entered into, and if there was no one in the government of Canada having any knowledge as to the parties to the contract, then I ask my hon. friend, in all seriousness, how would it be possible to determine whether the provisions of such a contract had been actually observed or absolutely ignored? In the first place, we find the government entering into a contract with a fictitious company, because it has been proved beyond all peradventure that the company represented to have an existence for the purpose of carrying out this contract did not exist, that is was a fiction. It was not until last year that a company was formed—which was another fiction, which did not represent any responsible persons—made up purely of an inn-keeper, some solicitors' clerks and some satellites that had been revolving around Mr. Preston, who is in charge of the Department of Immigration. We find the Deputy Minister of the Interior, who, at one time, was charged with carrying out this contract, enlisting himself, not on behalf of the government, in checking over the moneys that were paid out and in checking over the immigrants that arrived on Canadian shores, but assisting in every possible way in swelling the revenues of this company, and assisting the financial end of the contract so far as the participants were concerned. When that contract was duly launched, and when it became apparent that it had to be manned upon this side of the water, Mr. Smart deliberately resigned from the responsible position which he occupied, from the position of looking after the interests of Canada with reference to that contract, and took hold, so to speak, of the carrying out of the contract himself, participating undoubtedly in all its advantages.

We find that gentleman, when brought before a parliamentary committee, refusing to give any information whatsoever as to the contract, representing to the committee that he had a knowledge of those with whom the contract was entered into, and afterwards burning and destroying his letters, his books, his vouchers, his documents and everything which might prove of an incriminating character with reference to himself and to those who represented the contract on the other side of the water. We find Mr. Preston, in London, travelling to different parts of Europe, representing the English end of the contract so to speak. How did Mr. Preston come to be introduced into this contract ? Under what terms of the contract was the government warranted in paying over to Mr. Preston, or in accepting his representations as to the parties who became entitled to the $296,000. My hon. friend says that the concealment of this information is not on account of Mr. Preston's wishes or of any representations which he has made; but I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if there is any evidence before parliament of any nature whatsoever to show that any one was interested in that contract other than Mr. Preston himself ? Mr. Preston surely does not expect the members of the Canadian parliament to believe that until he left England he had no idea as to who represented the European end of the contract, yet we find Mr. Preston trifling with the intelligence of the Canadian parliament by bringing out an envelope with five seals thereupon, charged with opening this envelope in the event of his considering it necessary so to do. Now it seems to me that another official of the government in London, Mr. Jury, had probably some knowledge as to who represented the European side of the contract. Mr. Jury makes no hesitation in saying unquestionably—and I contend that he was in a better position than any gentlemen on this side of the Atlantic to determine who represented the beneficiaries under the contract—that Mr. Preston was the chief beneficiary, and yet we have the government protecting Mr. Preston on his arrival here.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think my hon. friend is wrong in saying that Mr. Preston was the chief beneficiary.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am stating what Mr. Jury said.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—He did not swear to that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Mr. Jury said this was Mr. Preston's gold mine.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Preston swore exactly the opposite, that he had no interest whatever.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman surely does not think that seriously ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Preston's word is as good as Mr. Jury's. Jury said he did not believe in a God, and would not take an oath.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Jury is a sufficiently responsible official to place in an important position in London, and for the government to repose all the confidence in him they would naturally place in one of their head officials.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The High Commissioner appointed him.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—All these facts establish beyond question that in the first place the government assumed a grave responsibility in entering into such a contract, that they were wilfully negligent afterwards in not adopting proper means to see the contract carried out. My hon. friend says to-day that not a member of the government, except, possibly, the then Minister of the Interior, know who the beneficiaries of the contract were, or whether it was entered into with responsible persons. That fact will surely not relieve this government from the responsibility of entering into such a contract and paying out public money without possibly knowing the application of it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Lord Strathcona was aware of it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understood that Lord Strathcona did not know who the beneficiaries of the contract were. As I understand it, the parliamentary committee who examined into this matter cabled to Lord Strathcona to ascertain that fact, and that he replied he would make an investigation to find out who constituted the company. It was afterwards found that the company had been incorporated in the island of Guernsey, late in 1905, and the parties who were corporators were simply men of straw. What I take exception to is this, that this government should have deliberately entered into a contract extending over a long term of years, which, if carried out in its entirety, would have involved certainly over a million dollars; that they paid, without parliament knowing to whom it was paid—that is without parliament knowing that the money was paid to any responsible party—no less than $296,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—On vouchers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Signed by whom?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Signed by parties who represented this company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend is not in the position to say that those parties represented anybody, because, in the first place, if the company did not exist, as was the fact, and if the government does not know who the beneficiaries were, how then can my hon. friend say that those parties were the agents of persons that the government had no possible knowledge about?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the hon. gentleman followed the inquiry in the other House, he would have remembered that cheques to a very large amount were produced there, which came from the Auditor's office, which showed the money was paid to parties in Amsterdam.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—To absolutely irresponsible persons. There were large amounts paid out for printing. Mr. Sommerville, who is not in the printing business, received a very large amount of money, and a certain Hebrew in London another portion of it. The man in Amsterdam may have been a fiction, and I believe was a fiction, because we find upon close investigation being made that no such person lives in Amsterdam as the person to whom that payment was made. But what I object to is that the government deliberately entered into this contract——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We did not enter into a contract. There is the order in council, and there is no authority in it to do anything of that kind.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I take my hon. friend's statement, that they did not enter into a contract, and yet they paid out practically $300,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The London office enlarged the contract.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No. I understand Lord Strathcona did not enter into it. It was Preston entered into it, if there was a contract. But the point was this: there being no responsible parties in London or Europe representing that contract, it was impossible for the government to determine whether the services were rendered for which the money was paid. I challenge my hon. friend to show any evidence of service having been rendered that could possibly have been checked or audited by this government with respect to the responsible parties on the other side of the Atlantic. My hon. friend may produce to this House the most elaborate tabulated figures as to the alleged volume of immigration which came to this side of the water. My hon. friend may point out to this House a host of parties who assumed to make returns, but what I contend is—and it comes back to the central point—that there was no centre of responsibility with reference to the entire transaction, and this whole business could be carried out, and the money paid, and the alleged immigrants landed upon our shores to the same extent as if the contract was a fiction and the beneficiaries had not rendered any value for it. Under those circumstances, I am more than surprised at my hon. friend attempting to vindicate what had already been done. If my hon. friend had simply said it was one of those unfortunate occurrences with which any government may possibly be associated without being able to properly investigate, and that upon ascertaining it was a matter that did not commend itself to them, they cancelled the contract, I could very well understand it. The cancellation of the contract, it seems to me, is the very strongest evidence of the improvident act of the government. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that, not only this House, but both branches of parliament, should be in possession of all the information now in the hands of the government with reference to the matter, and this could be done, inasmuch as my hon. friend has stated that the Prime Minister is in possession of the names of those representing the beneficiaries under the contract.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am not entirely surprised at the warmth of my hon. friend. All of us who know anything of the history of Canada for the past twenty-five years are perfectly aware that no one thing has been more distasteful to hon. gentlemen opposite than the magnificent success of the immigration policy of the present government and their success in developing the Northwest, as compared with the miserable failure which attended the efforts of their predecessors. That goes far to explain the persecution—I call it persecution—to which Mr. Preston in particular has been subjected, as being one of the most successful agents in promoting the immigration system and in promoting the settlement of the Northwest, for which the hon. gentleman's constituents—and for that matter, every human being in Canada—has benefited so largely. It is quite true that there are and were notoriously very great difficulties placed in the way of our agents on the continent of Europe obtaining any immigration, and it was necessary to pursue a very peculiar course for the purpose of overcoming those difficulties. All that was fully and distinctly explained in the evidence given before the committee of the House of Commons and in the statements which were made in another Chamber when this matter was brought up there before the parties who investigated those transactions. The plain truth of the matter is this: the hon. gentlemen of the opposition got possession of a mare's nest of the first dimensions. They insinuated—though they dare not make a charge when they were challenged by the party concerned—that they had succeeded in discovering a case against the ex-Minister of the Interior and Mr. Smart and Mr. Preston, but they broke down utterly, with all the witnesses they produced. Mr. Jury did not swear he possessed one particle of evidence to substantiate the assertions against Mr. Preston, If my hon. friend will read that evidence, wholly apart from the question raised as to the credibility of Mr. Preston, he will see that, when cross-examined, Mr. Jury did not swear he had one particle of evidence against Mr. Preston—not a scintilla of evidence except his own suspicion in this matter. Against that we have Mr. Preston's evidence, Mr. Smart's oath and Lord Strathcona's declaration over his own hand and seal, that it was imperatively necessary in his opinion that the names of the parties with whom this agreement was made should be kept secret, and the reason is given. Anybody who knows anything of the policy pursued by the governments in Europe, knows perfectly well that men who promote emigration there, even if they do it in a legal way, are subject to be harrassed by the authorities of that country for endeavouring to promote immigration here. It is not necessary to commit an illegal act to bring them within the purview of the authorities in a foreign country when they are acting in a way that those countries chose to consider, perhaps with reason, inimicable to their policies. With reference to the point raised in the other House, I say that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was perfectly within his right when he refused entirely to disclose the names of men who had entered into this contract on the understanding and pledge of officers of the Canadian government that secrecy should be respected. I would have been ashamed of my hon. friend; I would have been ashamed of my colleagues and of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, if, after it was clearly proved that with the concurrence of Lord Strathcona, with the concurrence of the Minister of the Interior, this bargain had been entered into, he should then, under those circumstances, have violated the pledge given by those officers, and exposed those men to the punishment which they would have undoubtedly have been apt to receive at the hands of the authorities in the countries to which I have alluded.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Serve them right, too.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—For what? For bringing immigrants to Canada?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—For breaking the laws of a foreign country.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well, and if he does not he ought to know, that a great many countries of Europe are very far from enjoying the freedom and privileges we enjoy here, and are subject to something in those countries which we in Canada would characterize as a monstrous tyranny, and if men, under those circumstances, had insisted on bringing immigrants to a country where they will have an opportunity of bettering themselves. I do not care what the laws of the country are, I say they are justified, and it does not become any man in Canada to throw stones for so doing, and, least of all hon. gentleman like my hon. friend opposite, who, with his colleagues, along with their constituents, are benefiting enormously by the success of the present policy the government have inaugurated. I was one of those who witnessed the monstrous follies committed for a period of 18 years, and I saw the result in the west and elsewhere. We were fooling away an empire and were not getting enough to pay for the stakes. We have made a change. If Canada is prospering to-day, it is more because of the immigration policy of the government in peopling the Northwest Territories. I do not wonder that under those circumstances my hon. friends are very sore and are willing to have recourse to any means. I do not say he is, but others of his colleagues are willing to have recourse to any petty insinuations, for the purpose of throwing discredit on the men who have rendered a great service to Canada. If they had any evidence of the truth of their accusations, why did they not, when they were challenged by Mr. Sifton on the floor of the other Chamber, formulate their charge? They have had the opportunity again, and again. If they have anything against him or any other members of the government, let them come forward and have a committee of inquiry and take the consequence. Mr. Speaker, they know better, they were challenged and shrank from the challenge, and it is very little advantage to them and very indiscreet for our friends opposite who are not in possession of the whole of the evidence to renew these charges after it has been proved by a committee in the other House that there was not one particle of evidence on which to support any of these assertions that have been made.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not intend to make any observations on this question, especially at this stage, but I am constrained to direct the attention of the House to the challenge thrown out by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, which he said had been uttered in the House of Commons, wherein members of the opposition had been challenged to formulate charges in this respect. I presume that the challenge is still intended to be directed at my hon. friend from British Columbia and others in this House who may think there is anything wrong in this matter. But it is within the recollection of hon. gentleman—I dare say my hon. friend has not forgotten it, for he was in the House at the time—when Sir Hibbert Tupper, at that time a member of the House of Commons, formulated charges of the most serious and direct character against the same minister who initiated all these transactions; and when he made the charges in the most specific manner possible; and when he staked his position as a member of parliament on his ability to prove the charges and agreed to accept the full responsibility, and to retire from public life if he failed to prove the charges, what happened? Did parliament grant the inquiry that was then demanded? No! The hon. gentleman called on his followers to vote it down, and they did vote it down; and it is no use for an hon. gentleman to endeavour to prove his assertions when we know that is the record of the government with regard to the same minister who figures in the transaction now under discussion before the people of this country. There is another element of weakness in this bold challenge that my hon. friend has uttered across the floor of the House, and it is this: what is the use of an inquiry, if the government will put their hands on the mouths of the witnesses and say that they shall not answer? The witnesses come into the room and take the gospel in their hands and swear they will tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, and yet there are matters they know, but will not tell, and the government stands behind them and says 'Do not answer; the chairman will shield you,' and when the members of the committee ask that parliament shall open the mouth of a witness and compel him to disclose what he knows, the government call in their majority and vote it down. What is the use of these challenges under circumstances of this kind?

Some hon. gentlemen may say that this subject is not one that should engage the attention of this House, especially after it has been so very fully considered in the other branch of parliament, but I submit this is just where the Senate, if it is an independent body, should come in and show its independence. Transactions have occurred, extending over some seven years, transactions which have excited, to use no stronger language, the very gravest suspicions in the minds of parliament and the people of this country. There are a great many circumstances in these transactions which are calculated to excite the very deepest and strongest suspicion. My hon. friend from Calgary has pointed to one of them, and that is in connection with Mr. Smart's conduct. Just a month or two before Mr. Smart left the department, he wrote to Mr. Preston to say that it would be agreeable to him to know that he was prepared to recommend some very important concessions in favour of the company. He made those concessions, and he added that he intended to speak to the minister and get his consent. He intimated to the company that he was going to make these concessions, and they were made, and the last contract of 1904 was made with this company, and before the ink was dry upon the contract in which these concessions were made to the company, Mr. Smart resigned his $4,000 office in the government of Canada, and became an officer, we are told, of the North Atlantic Trading Company. Is that not an extraordinary part when you take it in connection with the statement which Mr. Smart made, when questioned before the committee, that he could not and would not produce the correspondence which took place between himself and the company and which led up to his employment with the company.

When he admitted that he had destroyed this correspondence which he had had with these people, he created a damning suspicion with regard to his own conduct in his official position. It is a strong presumption in law that he who destroys evidence condemns himself, and Mr. Smart tells us that he destroyed all the correspondence which had taken place with regard to his going over from the service of the government to the service of the North Atlantic Trading Company, and Mr. Smart was the Deputy Minister of the Interior during all the time that these negotiations were being made. Let me point out, and my hon. friend has not forgotten it I am sure, that one of the last concessions made to the company was that the contract was to extend for ten years, subject to be cancelled only at four years' notice. In many of the different contracts made with these people, or these phantoms, because they were different people every time you came to deal with them—there was a little longer concession as to time at every extension of the contract. The last one gave them ten years from 1904, and removed some very serious restrictions and conditions, one of which dealt with the means that an immigrant should have on arriving in Canada. This was a concession that Mr. Smart referred to in this letter I have already mentioned, when he wrote to Mr. Preston and said it would be agreeable news to him, that he was prepared to remove some restrictions. One was that the Galicians and Buckowinians should be possessed of $100 on their arrival, before the North Atlantic Trading Company should be allowed $5 per head on them. What was the result of that? It brought altogether about 20,000 of these people into the class in three years, on whom the company would not otherwise have been entitled to collect five dollars a head. It made that provision retroactive for three years, and gave them that additional amount which they would not have earned under the terms of the previous contract. I refer to these things to show the strong suspicion which points against the late Deputy Minister of the Interior, Mr. Smart. I now turn to another officer of the government, Mr. Preston. I might refer to the very strong reasons given by the hon. senator from Calgary, pointing to Mr. Preston as being a beneficiary of this company—that is the evidence of Mr. Jury, another official of this government, I think I may say a trusted official of this government. There is no evidence that he occupies any other position at this very moment; still he refers to Preston as having a gold mine in this North Atlantic Trading Company. But there is stronger evidence than that pointing to Mr. Preston, as a beneficiary.

We have the fact that in contravention of what was announced to be the public policy of the government, that encouragement should not be offered to skilled mechanics and artisans to come to this country, that he entered into an agreement with one Leopold or Lazarous, arranged for offices for him in London, and tried to get a standing for him with the Allan Company. This man Lazarous turned out later, when sifting questions were put to Mr. Preston, to be an agent or officer of the North Atlantic Trading Company. Here we find Mr. Preston violating what was, professedly at all events, the policy of the government, that none of its officers should encourage skilled mechanics or people of that class to come to Canada, which he did in the interest of the North Atlantic Trading Company. We find that he entered into a contract with this man and corresponded with the Allan Steamship Company on his behalf, violating, in the interest of the North Atlantic Trading Company, the policy of the government. I have said it was the professed policy of the government. I think it is now a grave matter of doubt whether the government ever had that policy as an honest policy, because they stand by Preston in every respect. Preston should have been dismissed long ago for giving encouragement to bringing out skilled artisans to Canada if the government was sincere. But there is another point of evidence against Preston, and it is this: When finally the names of those who were organized into this company in the island of Guernsey were published it turned out that a son-in-law of Mr. Preston is the solicitor of the company. The fact that the company was incorporated in the island of Guernsey raises very grave suspicion against somebody, owing to the provision law which excludes companies incorporated in the island of Guernsey from the operations of British law. Putting all these things together, there can be no doubt that they point very strongly with suspicion against Preston. Of course, we have his denial on oath that he had anything to do with the company, or that there were any Canadians connected with it; but we have also a knowledge of this fact that Preston took the Gospel into his hand when he went into that committee and swore to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and after acknowledging that he knew the names of those who formed the company he refused, and persisted in refusing, to give the names. These and other considerations point with a great deal of suspicion to these two men. The part which the late Minister of the Interior played in regard to it is also a matter in regard to which there is very great ground for suspicion. In the first place, we have the very nature of the contract itself. What evidence have the government that this North Atlantic Trading Company ever did any work at all in the way of bringing immigrants to Canada? The government very considerately sent their officers to the different shipping ports to ascertain how many had arrived, took their statements as to whether they belonged to the agricultural class or not; made up a list and paid somebody. They did not know, according to the statement of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce to whom they were paying it. They had to send their money, to a large extent, in the dark, but they assumed that it was going to somebody behind this contract, and they paid it, not upon any work done by this company or any work that could be traced to the company, because the company do not claim even that they booked these immigrants. They say in their correspondence that they did not book many of them. The fact that these people arrived in the different ports of Canada, or one or two United States ports with destinations to western Canada, was sufficient, and the government paid the money on these arrivals, while they have no evidence whatever that the company put forward any substantial work in the way of inducing this immigration. My hon. friend made the statement that this was only a continuation of the policy of the previous government, I cannot assent to that statement at all, because it was only to actual booking agents the money was paid under former governments. But that was all changed in the dealings this government has had with this company; the money was not paid to booking agents but paid to this company who gathered where they had not strewn and who took up where they had not laid down. There is no evidence that they contributed towards inducing these people to come to Canada. The secrecy which surrounds this contract from beginning to end is another very serious element in regard to it. My hon. friend cited the case of John Dyke, who, thirty-three years ago, was imprisoned in Germany. I looked over the history of that case, and I do not find that John Dyke broke any law at all. Some misunderstanding of the part of the police caused this arrest, but it turned out there was no substantial case against him and he was discharged. We have no evidence—and if there were any I think we surely would have had it since this investigation began—that the government of these countries, were pushing very actively against their people coming to Canada. In fact the evidence would rather point in another direction. I did not intend to speak at this stage, only this challenge which my hon. friend made with regard to an inquiry, struck me as calling for an immediate reply, and I felt it my duty, having the facts before me, to make that reply. If the ministers had a record for granting investigations when charges are solemnly made in parliament; if they had a record for assisting parliament in getting evidence from witnesses, there might be some degree of reason or force in their uttering bold challenges about investigation, but we recall our experience in the past of their voting down charges solemnly made and refusing committees just as solemnly asked for, and assisting and encouraging their witnesses in refusing to answer questions. But there is another point my hon. friend made, and that is that Lord Strathcona was largely instrumental in making this contract. In fact, he tried in several ways to create an impression on the House that Lord Strathcona has a great deal to do with this contract and was more responsible for it than Mr. Preston or Mr. Smart or any other of the gentlemen that were named. I will read a telegram which appeared in the Montreal 'Star' on the 1st of May last, singed Windemere:

> London, April 30.—Replying to my inquiry regarding a statement made in the Canadian House of Commons that he had been connected with the North Atlantic Trading Company, Lord Strathcona says: 'I absolutely and unreservedly state I have not and never had any interest in or connection with the North Atlantic Trading Company.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Nobody claimed he had.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He continues:

> It was not I who arranged the contract with the company. I never cordially approved of it.

Nothing could be more plain and emphatic than that, and it will not do to try and throw the responsibility on Lord Strathcona's shoulders.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Is that telegram signed 'Strathcona' or 'Windemere'?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—'Windemere' quotes the reply he received from Lord Strathcona.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—And who is 'Windemere'?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—'Windemere' is the correspondent of the Montreal 'Star.'

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—What is his testimony worth? It is worthless.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He says 'I have this reply from Lord Strathcona', and the words that follow are quoted. Furthermore they have never been denied.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Such evidence is simply worthless.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON— My hon. friend has a very cavalier way of meeting a strong point. His utterances are very valuable, and he can put any value he chooses upon them, but when he meets a statement of this kind he rises in his supercilious way and says it is worthless.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As all anonymous correspondence is.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This is not anonymous. It is from the regular correspondent of the Montreal 'Star'. Lord Strathcona had an opportunity the next day, to make a public contradiction. It is very unlikely that the responsible correspondent of a leading Canadian newspaper would send such a despatch without the authority of Lord Strathcona. It has been published in Canada and its accuracy has never been challenged by Lord Strathcona or anybody else until my hon. friend says now it is absolutely worthless. This goes to show that the plea set up, in this House with regard to Lord Strathcona's responsibility for this contract is not entitled to any weight whatever. I would ask hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who have spoken, and others who may follow, if this has been such a very favourable and beneficial contract for the people of Canada—and it has been going on now for seven years—how is it that it has been now cancelled? Why is it that they do not stand up and claim that it should be continued? Still they say it is a good contract. If it is a good contract it should not have been cancelled. But after this matter was brought up in the House of Commons, and when it began to reach an acute stage, on the 14th April last, the minister telegraphed to London that the contract would be cancelled and a letter follows, alleging as a reason for cancelling the contract that the immigration had not been satisfactory from the Scandinavian countries and Finland, while it was kept up to the maximum in other European countries, such as Galicia, which was not considered the most desirable country to furnish emigrants to Canada. An examination of the figures shows that this plea is not a sound one. On the contrary, it shows that the immigration from the Scandinavian countries and Finland was quite satisfactory and compared well with that from Galicia and other countries of Europe. The government evidently decided that they were being found out. Public opinion was setting in against them. They found they had to get out of it in some way, and they invented a pretext. Unfortunately the pretext which they used is not a good one, and it shows on the face of it that it was not the genuine reason for cancelling the contract. The real reason for cancellation as all the country knows now, is that the exposure made is so great and public feeling is becoming so strong that something had to be done and they took a way not very creditable to themselves of setting up a pretext for cancelling the contract which is not the genuine reason. The whole principle upon which this transaction has been carried on has been vicious. They told us that they had to maintain secrecy on account of the laws of the European countries. Was there not a clause in the contract prohibiting the violation of the laws of the countries in which they were operating? There certainly was. There is nothing to show that they have been violating the laws in any respect. As far as the matter has been investigated, it would appear that they have done so very little that they could not have violated any laws whatever. They have sent some reading matter through the post office, that is about all. They have been gathering the results of the work of other people. Oppressed Jews come to Canada to seek an asylum. They are met by an officer of the Canadian government who finds out what proportion of them are agriculturists, and of the servant girl class over eighteen years of age. They note down every one and pay a tribute to the North Atlantic Trading Company for these people. Other immigrants come to Canada because encouraging reports have been sent to them by friends already in this country, who probably have also given them assistance in coming out, the North Atlantic Trading Company not having done anything in the world towards bringing them. This good natured and complaisant government of Canada send their officers, at the expense of the people of Canada, to Halifax, St. John and other ports where these immigrants land, and count their heads, find out how many are of the class on which the company are entitled to receive tribute, and a cheque is sent over to Europe to the company. The whole transaction is one which cannot be defended. My hon. friend, the Secretary of State, claimed that it was similar to contracts which were made in previous years. I have already dealt with that statement; it is not accurate. The contracts made in former years were with steamship lines and booking agents, and they had to show what they had done, and were paid according to the service they rendered. This company was paid for work which they never performed, which was performed by other people. The government put up toll gates in Canada to collect money for the North Atlantic Trading Company, and these immigrants may not in any degree whatever have been influenced to come to Canada by any effort of the company. The transaction was a very large one but it was initiated in secrecy. It was made at first without even an order in council. I understood my hon. friend to say that there were orders in council; my recollection is that there was no order in council until 1902. In that year an order in council was passed, and in 1904 there was another order in council, and a contract was made with parties who profess to be a chartered company, with headquarters in Holland, and the seal of the company was professed to be attached to their contract. It is now disclosed that at that time they were not a company chartered in Holland, that they had no charter ; and their conduct with regard to that was simply fraudulent. As that act was fraudulent, what conclusion are we to arrive at, seeing that the door was left open to them for fraud in other respects but that a great deal of their other transactions have been fraudulent as well. I had not intended to rise but the speeches having been short, which perhaps is desirable, because this subject has been very much threshed out in other places, and my hon. friend having uttered a challenge, I simply meet that challenge and put my views on record in regard to that company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understood the hon. Secretary of State to say that the government had entered into no contract. Would he inform the House by whom the contract was entered into on behalf of the government, under which this $296,000 was paid ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot answer the hon. gentleman, because the contract was produced before a committee of the other House. I sent over to-day to the Department of the Interior asking if they had the contract there or a copy of it, but they stated that they had not. That the only copy they had is before the committee which is making inquiry into the matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The question I asked was not as to the contents of the contract, but by whom it was entered into on behalf of the government ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not seen the contract, but I assume it was made by the parties representing the government in London. I do not know who actually signed it, but that can be found out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me to be a most extraordinary position for a government to occupy, that a contract should be entered into by some one on their behalf and the members of the government know nothing at all about it. Under this contract, nearly $300,000 of the country's money has been paid out to the assumed contractors, whoever they may be. The hon. gentleman told us in his explanation that he knew nothing of the contract, that no member of the government knew anything of the arrangement or the bargain into which some one had entered on behalf of the government by which this money was to be paid.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend misstates me. I said that this limitation in the contract in reference to keeping secret the names of the parties comprising the company did not conform to the order in council. No member of the government knew the names, but, of course, we knew a contract had been entered into, because we formulated the conditions of the contract in the order in council which I brought down.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand that. The hon. gentleman went further, if my recollection serves me right. What I want to point out is that the government paid a very large amount of public money without knowing the parties to whom it was paid or what services were actually rendered for the money which they did pay. It seems to be a carrying out of the policy which was enunciated shortly after this government was formed, the policy of the government by departments, and not by the cabinet as a whole, so that one minister inaugurates a policy and carries it out, no matter whether it is extravagant or economical, and none of his colleagues know anything at all about it. That appears to be the manner in which the country is governed at the present time. Apart from that, it is not new for me to hear those sweet and melodious tones in which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, utters his philippics of condemnation in regard to everything that was done by the late government. I have heard them before, and if we live long enough we shall probably hear them again. When the hon. gentleman speaks of the immigration policy of the late government, as compared with the policy of the present government, and condemns the one and extols the other, he forgets, I presume, that sometime ago the policy of the late government in regard to immigration, under the late Hon. J. H. Pope, was condemned and the course pursued by the present government was justified on the ground that they had followed Mr. Pope and had adopted the same policy. Now if the policy of the late government was of the same character as that of the present government, the hon. gentleman says the results were not the same. Is it to be wondered at that the results were not the same ? Every man who has any knowledge of the history of this country during the time that the hon. gentleman was condemning the immigration policy and every act of the late government, particularly in relation to the Northwest Territory—knows that there was this difference between that period of our history and the present period ; at that time there were droughts in the Northwest Territory, the crops scarcely reproduced the seed which was put into the ground, and, furthermore, the hon. gentleman and his colleagues were constantly traducing the climate and capabilities of that country. The droughts were not the result of the late government's policy, but they drove hundreds, yes thousands, of people out of that country, and those who thus left the country on account of securing no return for their labour, were the means of preventing others from coming to the Dominion. So far-reaching were the utterances of the hon. gentleman and those with whom he was associated, that the railway magnates of the United States, particularly those of that portion of the United States through which the Great Northern Railway ran, issued pamphlets and circulars containing extracts copied from the speeches of the hon. gentleman's friends —I do not know that they were his own utterances—in the House of Commons, and with the portrait of the gentlemen who uttered them in order to give weight and force to the statements which had been made, showing that Kansas, Minnesota, and the Dakotas were infinitely superior to any portion of the Northwest. That was the course pursued by the opposition at that time, and which, in addition to the droughts which I have mentioned, led to the failure of a policy which they say now they have adopted. They justify the course they have taken, on the ground that Mr. Pope did precisely the same thing. During the last five years, as every one is pleased to know, the farmers of the Northwest have learned better how to cultivate the soil in order to secure a good crop, and the bountiful rains which have fallen and the great crops which have been the result, have been the cause of the increased immigration—not the policy of the hon. gentleman who is boasting about it. Those who have lived in the Northwest know well that the statements which I have made are correct. An hon. gentleman behind me, who has had long experience in that country, told this House upon a previous occasion that when they first went to the Northwest they did not understand the method of farming best suited to that country. They have since learned how to deal with the conditions which are found there, and their business is conducted upon a more scientific basis. The result has been, coupled with the providential rains which have fallen, that there is great prosperity in that country. We hope that it may be continued. I trust the party with which I have been connected all my life will never be found in the position of the hon. gentleman and his party, condemning in the strongest possible manner a portion of the country which we are endeavouring to build up. But what was the difference between the immigration policy of the late Mr. Pope and that of the present government as regards the expenditure of public moneys ? Under the former policy, the arrangement entered into was with responsible parties ; parties whom every one knew, and no money was paid for an immigrant until evidence had been produced of his having been brought into the country by the steamship company and that he had become a settler in the Northwest. The evidence which has been brought before the committee investigating this matter is, that no proof has been produced that the North Atlantic Trading Company had sent out any large number of those who came to this country, but it has been pointed out by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield that government officials visit the steamer when it arrives, look at the steamer's books, ascertain where the immigrants are from and what their character is, report accordingly, and the company gets the money. There is no evidence to show that they were the parties who induced these immigrants to come to Canada. It is nothing new for an old parliamentarian to hear the condemnations of my hon. friend opposite. They are as familiar to him as his night's rest ; but I hope that he sleeps more comfortably than we might suppose, from the manner in which he belches forth his denunciations of everything that existed during the seventeen or eighteen years in which he had the honour of being in opposition. Now, in what position is the government in this matter? It has been so clearly pointed out by those who have preceded me, that I do not propose to weary the Senate by repeating it, I will simply refer to the fact that the government purported to enter into a contract—at least somebody on behalf of the government did—with a company that had no existence; and yet we are told that they were dealing with responsible people. I have seen correspondence from London within the last week or two in which the reasons were given for this company going to Guernsey. The laws in England are of such a character that these bogus people—I say it advisedly—could not obtain a charter. The information which they would have been obliged to give was of such a character as would have carried condemnation to every one of them. There was no responsible party in connection with the whole number. When they are traced to Amsterdam, or wherever they pretended to have their office, every one who reads the evidence carefully must conclude that the transaction was bogus in its character from beginning to end. Why did Mr. Preston furnish money to Leopold when he was complaining that he could get none from the steamship companies for whom he was acting? Mr. Preston was there to furnish him with money, and, as Mr. Jury says, he supposed it was the government money or his own personal cheque. I am not surprised that the Minister of Trade and Commerce should defend Mr. Preston; I should be surprised if he did not. Mr. Jury he sneered at, I forget the exact words, but he spoke contemptuously of this Jury. Mr. Jury was his colleague in all political matters in the province of Ontario, as he himself states, for some twenty years. We in Ontario know now who Mr. Jury was, and we know very well what his political antecedents were, and, having been an associate of Mr. Preston, we can readily understand why these two gentlemen were selected and provided for in the way of appointments, as emigrant agents and representatives of this company in England. It is just possible, as it has been insinuated, that Mr. Preston's absence was necessary, and it was to the advantage of the party and to the advantage of the hon. gentlemen that he should not be in this country at certain times when certain investigations were going on, and, under the circumstances, and when the hon. gentleman boldy defended the appointment of that man Jackson whom the judges accused of perjury, I am not surprised that he should go a little further and justify, or speak eulogistically of Mr. Preston. Neither am I surprised at what Mr. Smart did in burning his books and his correspondence. He learned that probably from the action of certain officials in Ontario, when certain ballots were required, they were accidentally burned. Of course that was the statement made. Every one drew his own inference as to how the accident occurred. It occurred I suppose by taking the ballots out of the vault, where they were stored in the Ontario government building, and tossing them into the fire by mistake. Then when I read the evidence of Mr. Smart, I came to the conclusion that he was pursuing for this government the same policy the Ontario officials pursued for their government, and the best possible way to prevent any evidence being produced was to utilize the furnace, and it has been accomplished. Let me put the case in this way: It is known that in certain European countries they object to emigrant agents from any other portion of the world, and particularly America, entering their country in order to induce their people to leave. The government passed an order in council in which they state that in entering into an arrangement with this company these laws must not be broken. Now if these laws were not to be broken, why was secrecy secured in connection with those who were to carry on the operations? If they were to keep within the law as it exists in these countries, and if this government were desirous that their agents should respect the laws of European countries, why was the policy of secrecy invoked in order to protect these men? If they were not to violate the laws, there was no necessity for secrecy to prevent them being punished, because if they acted under the instruction laid down in that order in council, which the hon. gentleman read a few moments ago, they would violate no law, and the man who violates no law does not require to keep his name secret from his fellowmen. No one should come to any other conclusion than that the government is a party to the violation of the laws of those continental countries, for the reason which I have already pointed out. Otherwise there would be no necessity for secrecy.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce approves of the breaking of the laws of other countries.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not understand the Minister of Trade and Commerce to openly justify the violation of the laws of these countries.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—He did.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If he did, so much the worse. But that does not affect the point I desire to impress on the minds of hon. gentlemen. They entered into a bargain of which secrecy was an essential part, and that secrecy could have been for no other purpose than to prevent discoveries of those who would violate the laws of the country in order to send emigrants to Canada. It is a position that is not honourable to Canada nor to the government who would enter into or endorse such a transaction. The question of daring to make the charges has been very successfully answered, I think, by the hon. gentleman who spoke last; but the whole transaction from beginning to end is one that is unprecedented I venture to say in the history of any constitutional government, that a government should permit a contract to be entered into with parties of whom they know nothing. It is said that Lord Strathcona had knowledge of the company, but there is no evidence to show that. On the contrary Lord Strathcona's statement was diametrically opposed to the statement made by Mr. Preston before the Agricultural Committee of the House of Commons. When his attention was called to the statement made by Mr. Preston, he gave it a most emphatic denial.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—What evidence have you of any such denial?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The telegram from his office.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—An anonymous correspondent?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And from those who interviewed him. I am not surprised at the position taken by the hon. gentleman in reference to this matter, because his habit, if he will permit me to say so, is one of positive denials and sneering at any one who dares to differ from him. Does my hon. friend suppose for one moment that the 'Star' correspondent in London would dare to cable to this country a statement which he declares was given to him by Lord Strathcona without having had that interview with him?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Certainly I do. I would not place the slightest reliance on it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then does the right hon. gentleman suppose, if that is the case, that Lord Strathcona would not deny it at once?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Lord Strathcona would take no notice of any anonymous statement of that kind.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not an anonymous statement.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—It is an anonymous statement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a statement traducing the character of another. When the hon. gentleman from Marshfield was giving a calculation which he stated he had received from an actuary in reference to the members of this House, the hon. gentleman very courteously said: 'Neither you nor your actuary know what you are talking about.'

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Quite true.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not true.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I say it is perfectly true, that neither of them knew what they were talking about.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Very polite, is it not?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Never mind the politeness; we do not mind

it. But no hon. senator in this House knows better than the hon. gentleman that the actuaries of the different life companies make their calculations based upon tables which are the result of centuries of investigation in both England and Scotland, and it was from actuaries making the calculations upon the same basis and upon the same principle that the senator for Marchfield made the statement he did. It may be possible that all these actuaries connected with the life companies of England, Scotland and Europe do not know what they are talking about. If such be the case, it would be a benefit to humanity, and particularly to companies that are engaged in the insurance business, and whose desire and whose whole business is based upon these calculations, if the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce would cross the ocean and give these gentlemen a little of the information which he possesses, and tell them that they are ignorant of what they are talking about. I venture to say that the cable sent to the 'Star' as a result of an interview with Lord Strathcona is literally correct, and that the cable that was also sent from England, in which he denied the statement of Mr. Preston, was also correct. We know there has been difficulty in that branch of the government service in England, and we know Lord Strathcona was over here—at least it was so stated—in connection with that matter, and we know there has been quarrelling going on between Lord Strathcona's secretary, or one of his officials, and Mr. Preston. Under those circumstances, I do not think the country will justify the statement made by the hon. gentleman, that he believes that the statement of Lord Strathcona, as cabled to the 'Star,' was bogus. This country knows what Mr. Preston and those with whom he has been associated in political matters are; and we know further that his whole career in connection with the affairs of this country has been of such a character as not to be justifiable or commendable. We know Mr. Jury. The hon. gentleman has known him for a great many years as one of his ardent supporters in this country, and we know that Mr. Jury stated before that committee that he would not believe Mr. Preston under oath. We know also that in a case of slander at Cobourg what the result was, and that Mr. Preston's own relations went into the box and swore, and brought other witnesses to swear, that they would not take his word under oath. This is the public character of their agents in England, whom the ministers are now defending in the manner we have been listening to. Any one who reads that evidence can come to but one conclusion, and that is that the North Atlantic Trading Company has been a graft and swindle from the beginning to the end, and that the government having entered into these arrangements in the manner in which they have done, and are now justifying, will surprise every one who has any regard for honesty and good judgment.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I had no intention to take part in the discussion, but the hon. gentleman from Marshfield made a statement which I think it is well we should not allow to go unchallenged. He referred to charges made by Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper in his place in parliament regarding the administration of the Yukon. I was in the House, and I had the privilege of following Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper upon that occasion. My hon. friend will know if he will carefully read the speech of Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper on that occasion; that it was a general fusilade. There was nothing specific. He made no pointed specific charges for the investigation of which he asked a committee. He made a great many charges indirectly. He endeavoured to point out the manner in which he thought the Yukon was handled and so on, but to come down and make a specific charge, mentioning what it was, the terms and the nature of it,—he did not do that, nor did he move for a committee for the purpose of investigating a particular charge at all. He merely made a general charge of wrong-doing. Throughout the entire alphabet he made a general outburst of indignation, and so on, in connection with the matter but there was no specific charge.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Did he not leave the House and not come back at all?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Yes, he left the House at the moment, and would not wait for any reply or any vote. With regard to the question that is now before the House, I must confess that I myself at first thought when the charge was made with regard to the formation of this company and the manner in which Mr. Preston was associated with it, that the opposition had struck something that would be worth their consideration and investigation. I followed the evidence throughout. I read it over carefully, and I must admit that I did so with a feeling of suspicion and after all, I frankly confess, that the mountain dwindled into a mole hill. In place of building up a charge and showing a clear case of wrong-doing, it appeared to be explained from time to time, and when it came to about the closing up, the whole thing had fallen into virtually nothing. The question is with regard to the prudence of the government if they did encourage anything of that kind—there is no direct evidence that they did. It appears Mr. Preston entered upon the propaganda of his own motion, with a desire, of course, to secure an influx of immigrants. No doubt he did that. The corporation was formed. It is said his son-in-law had something to do with it. I have no doubt he may have had something to do with it. Possibly he could not get anybody else to assist him in forming that organization. It was formed and there was considerable work done. There were a great many immigrants brought to Canada We know the difficulty very well in connection with carrying on an agitation in Germany or any of these European countries to bring emigrants here. We know it is resented by those people. We know Germany says she has an empire of her own. We have places to go to without going to Canada. We know that agents who have gone there have been put in jail, and there was great dimculty in getting them out. My hon. friend to my left, met with one who had been incarcerated, and had great trouble in getting relief. If that is the case, people have to be very cautious what they do with regard to emigrants, or carrying on an emigration propaganda in a country of that kind. You cannot do it with safety. I suppose it was thought that by the formation of this company something might be accomplished. I am not going to say how far Mr. Preston was justified, or how far the government was justified if they were parties to it. I had my suspicion, and I admit that in entering upon the investigation I thought something was wrong, and was amazed after reading all the evidence to find that there was nothing proven.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—When the House adjourned I was about to make an explanation with regard to some observations made by my hon. friend from Wellington. I had stated, as hon. gentlemen will remember, that Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper had in a former session of parliament made a very formal set of charges against the administration of the Yukon by the Hon. Clifford Sifton, and that the inquiry which was then demanded was refused by the government, of which my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce was a member ; that that government called in their friends and voted the inquiry down. I stated further that Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper on that occasion had made these charges on his responsibility as a member of parliament. The hon. gentleman replied that Sir Hibbert Tupper's charges were not sufficiently specific and formal, in fact that he made no charge at all. I will now read the very words Sir Hibbert used on that occasion, but before doing so will refer to one or two of the charges themselves. They cover, I think, twenty-two or twenty-three columns of the 'Hansard,' they were voluminous, but I will just refer to one or two of them :

That a system of bribery among government officials was rendered necessary by the inability otherwise to procure them to perform their duties.

That blackmailing by officials of persons applying to record claims has prevailed.

He goes on to make what are known as the Walsh charges, but as Major Walsh has been long since dead, I will not go into them.

He goes on in another place to say :

That the said Philp, heretofore a partner of the said minister represented in writing that he was engaged in a dredging venture in the Yukon, and in endeavouring to induce another to join him, represented in writing that Mr. Sifton, the said minister, and Major Walsh, were also interested with him, their names could not appear as he wrote 'for obvious reasons.'

That the Hon. Clifford Sifton gave to the said Philp, a permit or authority signed by him contrary to law, which was offered for sale by the said Philp for a large amount of money.

This is a sample of the charges. Then Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper said :

Mr. Speaker, I want to say, as this is part of my speech, that I propose to move at a later stage, that resolution, and I want to add to the language, that it contains the following statement:—

I am prepared moreover to place my services gratuitously at the disposal of the Attorney General of Canada, to assist the commission of inquiry in probing this matter to the bottom, whether those services be required at Ottawa, Dawson city, or both.

In addition to whatever responsibility attaches to the action I have taken in this matter, I am prepared, if the commission is granted on the terms suggested, to abide by the result and to consider that by failure to substantiate the charges made I will have forfeited my right to sit in parliament or to hold any office in the gift of the Crown.

I make that statement after the most careful consideration I can give to it in order to convince parliament and convince the country of my sincerity. While I am taking advantage, undoubtedly, of my privilege as a member of the House of Commons to bring straight to the front and in the light of the information I believe to be based on fact, and while I could not, nor could any man in Canada, unless he were a millionaire, undertake that responsibility outside of the privilege of this House, and summon from the north, the south, the east and the west all the witnesses and prepare the case as it should be prepared in order to show a court of law his right and his authority for making statements, I must, to satisfy public opinion of my sincerity go a great length. I consider I have the right to exercise the privilege a member of the House of Commons possesses to make these statements without incurring any greater responsibility than the laws of parliament contemplate or impose. But I waive all that and in this parliament, in the face of the country—my native country—I am prepared practically for all the pains and penalties in the discretion of parliament, I am prepared for more than that. I am prepared, that great good might come out of this investigation, as great good will come out of it, and great benefit to Canada, to incur the risk I have mentioned—no small risk to a man even of ordinary ambition, that is to be considered that he has, by failure, after taking an important step of this character, disentitled himself to the confidence of his fellow countrymen in any public matter, and disentitled also to the confidence of the representative of the sovereign in connection with any matter of political preferment or within the gift of the Crown.

The closing words of the charges are as follows :—

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency to desire that His Excellency will be graciously pleased to give immediate orders to his attorney general that the most effectual means be taken for discovering the facts in any way relating to the above charges, and that His Excellency will also be graciously pleased to order the issue of a royal commission to two or more judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, or to any two judges of the superior courts of any province of Canada, granting and conferring the fullest possible powers for a complete effectual and exhaustive inquiry with a view to the discovery of the truth of the statements and charges aforesaid, and to this end that His Excellency be advised that in the opinion of this House such a commission should be clothed by a special Act containing similar provisions, powers, jurisdiction, discretion and authority as are conferred by the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 10, being 'An Act respecting inquiries as to corrupt practices at Elections of members of the House of Commons.'

And then I find, when the division was taken, that my hon. friend from Wellington was one of those who were called in and solemnly voted no, thus refusing an investigation into the charges. This happened in 1899. I want to say a word to my hon. friend from Montague, Prince Edward Island. I understood him to say that after Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper made these charges he ran away from the House and has not been there since.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understood the hon. gentleman from Montague to say that Sir Charles Tupper was not there again that session.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I give my impression of what he said, and if I am not right my hon. friend from Montague will correct me. My impression is that he said Sir Hibbert Tupper disappeared from the House after making the charges, and the hon. gentleman from Wellington added that he did not want to vote. He remained in the House until the division was taken, and his name will be found in many places during the remainder of that session's 'Hansard.' He returned to his place in parliament the next session, and I find, by actual count that he was the author of over 150 speeches or motions or questions the following session of parliament. Not only that, but he then reaffirmed the charges which he had made in 1899, in a speech not so long as the first one, but a speech of considerable duration and asked again for the same investigation, which was again refused ; and my hon. friend from Wellington was one of those that was again called in and who voted 'nay', and my right hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, was duly paired amongst the ministerialists who voted 'nay,' to both these motions. So that so far as Sir Charles H. Tupper not making any formal charge, but rather a fusilade ; as stated by the hon. gentleman he made charges and very direct charges. I have read one or two; it would take me a long time to read the whole of the formal charges against the minister and his officials when he demanded an investigation and pledged himself to the House and to the country that if he failed to sustain the charges he would retire from public life. Instead of slipping away from parliament and being ashamed to face the House again, he remained, taking an active part during that session, and appeared during the whole of the next session as one of the most active members of the House of Commons. Indeed it would be ridiculous to say that Sir Hibbert had anything to be ashamed of. The shame attached to those who refused the investigation.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I might be permitted to say that Sir Charles H. Tupper made charges against the Minister of the Interior, charging him with every thing in the decalogue from murder down to chicken stealing. I think the charges covered no less than 23 pages of typewriting. It took the clerk of the House about two hours to read them over. He had no grounds on which to proceed. He was making charges in the dark, with the hope by multiplying them, that he would find something at the bottom of them. That was the method that he adopted. Had he picked out one or two specific charges and said 'I am prepared on my personal honour as a member of this House to establish those charges,' that is something you could investigate, but to charge a man with everything in the catalogue of offences and expect to get a committee to investigate them was absurd. The time to which I refer was a previous year. There were two or three occasions upon which Sir Charles Tupper made very extended speeches and extended charges. He was one of the best hands at formulating charges without number I have ever seen in parliament. Had he confined himself to one or two, or half a dozen, there might have been some ground for an investigation, but in that matter to which my hon. friend refers, there were between three and four hundred charges of all kinds. The House looked upon it as a farce and a burlesque, and I think rightly so.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I may have been a little astray in the time to which I refer. Sir Charles Tupper made several charges, and I remember seeing the statement in the press that he left the House after making one speech and did not appear afterwards. He did come back here a few years ago and sat for about two hours, and went away, as I am told by reliable authority completely disgusted with the Conservative party, and never came back since.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman means he was disgusted with the reform party.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—I am quite in accord with the hon. gentleman from Marshfield. I read that long speech. It took nine hours to deliver it, and the hon. gentleman from Marshfield spoke of it as a very formal charge. Well, they were very formal charges from beginning to end.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State, if Preston and Jury are still in the service of the government?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that there has been any change. Up to the present time they are in the London office.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I presume that brotherly love continues?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The reason I ask that question is, because the other morning I happened by accident to meet an hon. member of the other House, and I asked him in course of conversation—which is quite usual at this stage of the session—about when he thought parliament would prorogue, and he said that was entirely dependent upon the opposition; that if they had no more questions to raise, or inquiries to make, it might prorogue at a reasonably early date. He said they had already disposed of the North Atlantic Trading Company, and had a vote on that, and they had a vote on the Saskatchewan Valley Land Association business, and he did not know what else might come up. I said then 'I suppose Mr. Preston and Mr. Jury are back at the old stand doing business?' 'Well, he said, he did not know about that; but if he had his way they would not go back. He would dismiss them forthwith. In fact, he said he would dismiss every man in that branch from Lord Strathcona down. He retracted that, however, and said: 'I would not dismiss Lord Strathcona but would ask him to resign; not that he is guilty of any crime or wrong doing, but that he is simply not a strong enough man to handle the gang of scoundrels he has to deal with.' Those are the identical words the hon. gentleman used to me. I thought that was a very strange remark for an hon. gentleman who was taking a very active part in the inquiry, supporting the government in defending these men in the wrongs they have been doing.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Name, name.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Oh, I won't give the name, I can do it. My word is good enough when I say it is a very creditable member of the House. He is a supporter of the government, and he has taken a very active part in the inquiries going on and trying to obstruct every particle of evidence that would tend to convict these men of wrong-doing, which is to my mind entirely contrary to the duties and requirements of members of parliament. I hold that members of parliament and senators are here to serve the interests of the country, and to defend them against wrong-doing, no matter who is the guilty party or where it is done, and I concluded when that hon. gentleman would make that statement, that if a man of the calibre, the status and standing of Lord Strathcona was not able to manage a half-dozen officials, they must have been a pretty tough gang, because Lord Strathcona has been in the Hudson Bay Company for a long time, where he has had to deal with the savage and untutored mind—men who are hard to keep in abeyance, and he has done it successfully. He has managed that company with credit to himself, against a hard class of people, the savage and the wild man in every sense of the word. My idea of things is that we are here to represent the country, and to see that the people get fair play and justice, and why is it that even in this Senate which is supposed to be an independent branch of parliament, where we are supposed to know nobody, but to stand for the rights of the people, why is it there is such an active part taken in defending wrong-doing, because no man can read the evidence given to the country during the last three or four weeks on the management of the North Atlantic Trading Company, the land business and the Arctic business, without coming to the conclusion that there is considerable wrong being done.

If the Prime Minister had, at the start, undertaken, the moment the semblance of wrong had appeared, to declare that he would suspend the guilty parties and have a thorough investigation, he would have raised himself in the estimation of the people very much; but instead of that he himself and his supporters have strained every nerve to defend these men against the consequences of their acts. I think it is a great mistake on the part of members of the House of Commons, and I am sorry to see that the same feeling prevails here to a certain extent. My hon. friend who spoke this afternoon said that he was strongly opposed to the action of the government in the scandals that were coming out in the early part of the session in regard to the North Atlantic Trading Company, and the land deal in the Northwest Territories, and it was well known also that that hon. gentleman was opposed to the Grand Trunk Pacific at the start, but he was soon converted. Now he finds out that there is nothing wrong—practically that—in the way in which these men have been doing business. I say it is not within the memory of any man now in parliament that there was any time in the history of our country in which there were so many charges of wrong-doing made against the government as during the past session or two, and I think it is our duty to investigate those charges instead of raising obstruction. The country knows very well what is going on. They read the papers, and the more we undertake to defend these transactions the worse the country will condemn us for doing so. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon made a strongly partisan speech which, to my mind, was altogether uncalled for. He undertook to compare the policy of this government with the policy of the Conservative party when they were in power. There is no comparison as between the condition of things then and now. I am one of the pioneers of the Northwest, and it is a well known fact that prosperity did not come to that country with the advent of the Liberal party. We had no prosperity in the shape of good crops until 1901, while this government came into power in 1896. It was in 1901 that we raised the first good crop. I was farming quite extensively in 1900, and in that year we raised 600 bushels of oats and 400 bushels of wheat on the same piece of ground on which next year we raised 7,000 bushels of oats and 4,000 bushels of wheat. The government had nothing to do with that; it was because we had learned in all those years of adversity how to prepare the seed bed and when it should be prepared, how to sow the seed and when to sow it. The bountiful showers which we have had of late years contributed to the good crops and the good crops produced the prosperity of the country—not the policy of the Liberal party. If that party had carried out the policy which they announced while they were in opposition, Canada would have been bankrupt ten years ago. The salvation of the country lay in the fact that the government adopted the policy of the very men they had been condemning during all those years. When the merchants and manufacturers learned that there was only to be one fiscal policy in the country, then the Dominion went ahead by leaps and bounds. It is misleading to say that the policy of this government had anything to do with it. They cannot point to any single act of theirs since they came into power that has brought about the present prosperity. On the contrary, it has been one continual round of charges of mismanagement of the public affairs of the country. They know it and the whole country knows it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I wish to say that the hon. Secretary of State met my motion in a very fair and open way, and I have no complaint to make. I am sure the hon. gentleman feels pained over the whole thing. The government were deceived by their own officers. I do not blame him in the least for that; but it is a lesson to the cabinet to be more careful and not to trust to any single member in anything, but let everything be discussed before the whole cabinet. My hon. friend asked me to withdraw the charges against the government. I do so willingly, and rest my whole case on the statement made by the hon. gentleman himself, which is just as strong as anything I could say, that the wrong was done through carelessness on the part of the government and its officials. The officials who led the government into such transactions should be dismissed without any consideration whatever. There is no doubt Mr. Smart and Mr. Preston deceived Mr. Sifton, and Mr. Sifton deceived the government, and a secret contract was made entirely contrary to the minute of council passed by the cabinet.

Now, according to the wish of the hon. Secretary of State, I withdraw the first paragraph of my motion. He says he will give the names of those who received the money, the names of those who paid the money, and the names of those who vouched for the accounts. I regret that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is not here because that hon. gentleman approved of this contract. He approved of a wrong thing—the breaking of the laws of a foreign country. Any man who would do that, if a stolen diamond ring were presented to him that he knew was stolen, he would take it; it is the same thing; those immigrants were stolen from a foreign country and the hon. gentleman approves of that. The hon. gentleman further said that on this side of the House we were grieved and vexed at the prosperity of the country. That statement is unjust and untrue. Every one rejoices at the prosperity and rapid development of this country. I know every member on this side of the House rejoices at the rapid increase of population and prosperity abounding everywhere throughout the Dominion. Why should we not? It is a continuation of the prosperity caused by what was done in the past. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce ought to know that if he had had his way there would be no settlement in the Northwest to-day. The Canadian Pacific Railway made that country. People could not get there without a railway, did not know what it was, and land then was not worth a cent an acre, which to-day is worth $10 or $12 an acre. With his experience and ability he must know that had the policy of the Liberal party been carried out there would have been no Northwest to-day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Since I addressed the House I have been over to the House of Commons to see if I could get the original contract with the North Atlantic Trading Company. It was filed in the committee room of the committee of inquiry. I find the contract bore date the 28th November, 1904; that it was made by the North Atlantic Trading Company and the signers on behalf of that company were G. Gluck, manager and M. N. Cohen, secretary, and Mr. Sifton, signed as Minister of Interior. The contract follows exactly the order in council, so there has been no error on this side of the Atlantic. Any subsidiary contract was made after the contract was sent across the ocean.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How did it come into existence then?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It must have been a side contract that we never heard of until recently. The hon. gentleman's questions are practically all answered. I cannot give him any more information than I have furnished this evening, because we have no information whatever in reference to the important part of it. I think the names I have given were the names of the company that was formed in the island of Guernsey. I find that the Hon. Mr. Foster in the other House gave the names of the promoters, and those two names Mr. Gluck, managing director and Mr. Cohen, secretary, whose business was in Amsterdam, seem also to have been attacked.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—I shall not press my motion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why was the order in council of 1902 not brought down? I find one order in council which I understand was the last passed, is dated 20th September, 1904.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That superseded the former one. I do not recollect anything about it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The terms of it would be in that. It is not indicated in this last order in council that it supersedes the first order in council of the 31st of May, 1902.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh yes, that was the idea. That is the last.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the second order in council.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the one under which the present contract for ten years was signed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the last contract?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the first contract was entered into with a company that had no existence. The date of the incorporation of the company has been given in evidence, and the contract had been entered into a year previous to the incorporation of the company.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They had taken that name. I do not know whether they had any corporate existence as far back as 1901.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They had no corporate existence until the summer of 1905.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They were calling themselves by that name, although evidently not incorporated, because I find references to them in the books as far back as 1902.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then when they represented themselves to the government as a corporation, they told what was not true, and they committed perjury or forgery in signing their names as a corporate body that did not exist.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They may have had an existence in Europe. It is not a matter of consequence anyway.

The motion was dropped.

THE RULES OF THE HOUSE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved:

That the new Rules and Orders of the Senate, contained in the report of the Committee of the Whole as adopted on the second day of May last, and set forth in the volume recently distributed to senators entitled: 'Standing Rules and Orders of the Senate of Canada, adopted during the session of 1906,' be made Standing Orders of the Senate, the senators in attendance on the session being summoned to consider the same under rule 16.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would like to suggest the propriety of naming a subcommittee to revise the French edition of the rules. The motion of the hon. senator from Halifax will bring our rules into force at the end of the session, and I want to make the French version conform in every way to the English version.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I can see no objection whatever to the course suggested by the hon. gentleman. It is desirable that it be perfectly clear that there is no difference between the French version and the English version of the rules.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved that a sub-committee be formed, composed of his hon. the Speaker, Hon. Mr. David and the mover to revise the translation of the rules of the House and report to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (61) An Act to incorporate the Grand Trunk Pacific Telegraph Company.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (147) An Act respecting the Standard Trusts Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

CUSTOMS TARIFF ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT introduced Bill (175) An Act to amend the Customs Tariff, 1897.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman explain the nature of the Bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is continuing the exemptions from duty on mining machinery and the machinery for the sugar factory in the west—beet root sugar.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—For how long?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Until the next session of parliament, and there is also a clause in it authorizing the Department of Customs, when steel rails are sent out of Canada to be re-rolled to calculate the duty to be payable on their return to Canada on the cost of the re-rolling. The Department of Customs thought at one time that they would have to charge the full duty on rails, $7 per ton, and this amendment to the Customs Act was introduced for the purpose of defining what would be fair and reasonable.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is that referring to rails from the United States?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, those are rails of the Grand Trunk Company, that had to be sent out of the country in consequence of our not being able to re-roll them. They were reducing them in length and weight, to use them on their branch lines, and the question arose whether they would not be liable to the $7 duty and the object of this amendment was to make the duty 20 per cent or 25 per cent whatever it might be, calculated on the invoice paid in the United States for the re-rolling.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the difficulty must have arisen under the new tariff regulations, because for years that principle was adopted and carried out. In the case of any article manufactured in Canada, or an article which had been imported and upon which duty had been paid, if it were sent out of the country to be repaired, the duty was only imposed upon the cost of repairs.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It follows that principle.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand the hon. gentleman to say they want to make that the law of the land. All I have to say is that there can be no possible objection to that; it is the principle upon which the customs laws have been administered for the last 30 years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume, although I have not looked at it, that there will be a condition that when rolling mills are established in Canada that principle would not apply. They would be required to have the work done in Canada.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (89) An Act to incorporate the Ashcroft, Barkerville and Fort George Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Riley.)

Bill (108) An Act respecting the Kettle River Valley Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (80) An Act respecting the Pacific Northern and Omineca Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (27) An Act to incorporate the Kamloops and Yellow Head Pass Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Bostock.)

LEPROSY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of Bill (115) An Act respecting Leprosy, as amended.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not want to provoke a vote on this question, but I do protest against this Bill as being an infringement upon provincial rights, and if I am ever arrested as a leper, I will contest the validity of the Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I appeal to the hon. gentleman's judgment on the score of humanity. The province of British Columbia has simply repudiated any responsibility whatever for the unfortunate lepers there, and but for public charity these people would be driven into the woods to die of hunger. Because the province would not do its duty, will the hon. gentleman say that the Dominion of Canada should have its honour smirched by refusing to look after these unfortunate people? I think, on reflection, his better judgment will prevail. I may say that the province of New Brunswick also declines to have anything to do with the matter. We have no law by which we can say to a province, you must do so and so. It is a matter of humanity and high principle on the part of the Dominion to do what would otherwise be left undone. We cannot allow people to die of absolute neglect, or to spread abroad this contagious disease over the whole country. If we allowed this to happen the government would be censured for it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—While sympathizing and fully agreeing with the view put forward by the hon. member from Stadacona, I believe there are many provisions in this Bill which are beyond the jurisdiction of this parliament. I have not the slightest objection to the government of Canada voting money for the purpose of alleviating distress or preventing infection on account of this loathsome disease in any part of Canada. But I do find fault that we should be making laws with our eyes open satisfied, as we must be, that if any question were to arise under that Act, it would be declared to be ultra vires. We could not enforce some of the provisions of that Act if they were opposed, and while I have not the slightest objection on the ground of humanity to parliament voting money to alleviate the distress which may arise in connection with this disease, my objection is to our passing provisions in that law which are not within the powers of this parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I would ask the hon. gentleman a business question. One of the cases which has forced the government to take up this question is the fact that a leper has escaped from one of the lazarettos and declines to return through persuasion. That leper is a source of danger to the whole community. That leper is now employed in a family. We have no way of forcing him back, unless we take authority to do so under this Bill. I am quite sure there is not a judge in all the land who will for a moment question the sovereignty of this parliament when exercised in the direction I have indicated.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If we have no power to build hospitals, we have no power to search houses and to hunt up lepers and imprison them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I venture to say that courts have common sense, and, recognizing the condition of things, will sustain that Act.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—This essentially belongs to quarantine. There would be no difficulty except for the long period of incubation which pertains to leprosy. A person may become affected with the disease and not manifest it for a year and one-half, or two years afterwards, although he brought it with him when he came into the country and in that way the Dominion government are the proper parties to take cognizance of it. In British Columbia, at least, no cases have been known to occur except those where the disease was brought in by Chinamen.

The motion was agreed to on a division and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

BRANDON TRANSFER RAILWAY COMPANY.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS (in absence of hon. Mr. Casgrain, de Lanaudière), moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to Bill (43) An Act to incorporate the Brandon Transfer Railway Company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— I do not know whether the members of the House generally have considered these amendments or the Bill itself. We have heard a good many discussions both in the House and in committees upon what are termed provincial rights, and the infraction by the Dominion parliament of the provisions of the constitution in this respect. This is a Bill for the incorporation of a short line of railway, whether to be operated by steam or electricity I am not sure, but the charter is simply to build a railway or a tramway within the municipality of Brandon, in the province of Manitoba. It is true the Bill is ostensibly to give power to connect with different railways which pass through or near Brandon, but that it is essentially a provincial work of the narrow character which I have described, there can be no doubt. We have discussed the question in the past as to whether a railway extending over hundreds of miles in a province should be incorporated by the Dominion or by the province. The contention has been that all these roads which are exclusively provincial in their character should be chartered and managed by the provinces. The province of Ontario, acting upon this principle, has created a railway commission to look after and manage exclusively these local roads. Now why should we as a parliament go the length which we are asked to go in connection with this road, that is, to grant a charter for the construction of a road exclusively within a town which I do not think contains over 8,000 or 10,000 people ? They tell us it is to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway and other roads. Supposing it is, it is exclusively a provincial matter, and, in fact, you might almost say it is a municipal matter. Taking that view of it, let us look at the provisions. The Bill as introduced in the Commons provided for a capital of $50,000. The committee of the House of Commons increased the capital to $200,000. The amendment which was made to the Bill as it came from the Railway Committee of the Commons by the Senate Committee reduced that $200,000 to $50,000, the sum originally fixed as the capital of the company. Here is a road which they themselves say is to extend through the city of Brandon to connect with other railways—extending, if the different branches are built, for a length of some eight or ten miles, with a capital of $50,000, which would make it, passing through the streets of Brandon a little over $8,000 per mile. But that is not all. This magnificent capital of $50,000 is to construct this road, and the following clause has been added to it :

> The company may construct and operate elevators and warehouses along or adjacent to this said railway.

Elevators and warehouses and a road of six or eight miles, with a capital of $50,000. When the question was asked, why the capital should be reduced from $200,000 providing the Bill passes, to $50,000 what does the Senate suppose the answer was ? The answer was 'Oh the incorporators do not wish to be held responsible for any larger amount than that.' A road such as they propose to build in a city would cost, well, I cannot say what, but take it for granted it would cost ten or fifteen thousand per mile, if the warehouses are to be of any use at all—I could not say what they would cost because I am not able to say of what character they would be, but it gives them power to build the warehouses at any cost, and then they would have elevators, the cost of which would depend in a great measure upon the size, but to expect that elevators, warehouses, and railway through a city, of six or eight miles in length, can be built for $50,000 is ridiculously absurd. It is quite true they are brought within the provisions of the Railway Act and have power to issue bonds to the extent of $50,000 per mile, which simply means that the promoters of this magnificent enterprise intend to issue bonds for a sufficient amount to cover the extra expenditure, and they themselves pay nothing, so that if their enterprise fails in paying the running or any other expenses, it will fall upon the unfortunate bondholders and the shareholders would relieve themselves of any and all responsibilities. These are the provisions of the Bill but, apart from that, I hold the Senate should not consent to grant a charter for a road exclusively within a municipality. It is about time that those who have been talking so much in the past about provincial rights should set their faces against legislation of this kind—either that, or come to the conclusion to grant charters for all railways however insignificant or local in character. The sooner we take a decided stand against such gross and palpable infringements of provincial rights the better it will be for the country, and the more creditable to ourselves. In the past, I confess, I have not taken as strong grounds on this question as I have of late, but if the constitution is to be respected at all, it ought to be in a matter of this kind. It is true the constitution provided that the Dominion parliament may declare any work to be in the interest of the Dominion, but to say that this line is in the interest of the whole Dominion, is asking parliament to come to a ridiculous conclusion. I deem it my duty to call the attention of the House to this matter, because I think it is the most flagrant infringement of provincial rights we have ever had since we have been working under the present constitution. I move that these amendments be not concurred in.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I frankly admit that this session we have gone further in the direction of what might be called infringing upon provincial rights than in any previous session.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—We have been asked to charter more provincial roads—roads entirely within a province and roads to be operated by electricity—than in any previous session I know of. It has been suggested that the government of the Dominion and the provincial governments should come together during the recess and discuss questions relating to subsidies granted to the provinces, and other important matters. They should take up this subject also and come to a decision, so that the central authority may be able, by next session, to announce a policy on the whole question. Let them discuss where the line of demarcation should be drawn between federal and provincial legislation. I admit the point made by the hon. senator from Belleville is a very strong one. This short line is unquestionably entirely within the province of Manitoba. This Bill is undoubtedly a violation of provincial rights, but the same arguments have been used in connection with other Bills. They say their object is to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Canadian Northern, the Brandon, Saskatchewan and Hudson Bay, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and the Hill lines, and that this small road is intended to form a desirable connection for the conveyance of freight from one line to another instead of having to team it from one station to another. With this short loop line you can switch off cars to any of those roads, and, in addition, the object of the company is to erect elevators for conveniently and cheaply handling grain. Lawyers say that if you are going to construct a line which connects with Dominion lines, you must, in order to successfully operate it, have a Dominion charter. That argument has been used with the whole of them. I hope that by next session an understanding will have been reached between the federal and provincial authorities so as to end this conflict between Dominion and provincial rights.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—I have said many times, that when a Bill of this nature comes from Ontario or any other province but Quebec, I do not like to show more zeal than the people of the province affected, and that when a motion is made by a senator from Ontario in connection with one of those Bills I am always disposed to vote for that motion. So, that the question being raised now by the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, I am bound, by the principles which I have enunciated so many times, to vote for his motion, although I think that this Bill is not worse than ten or twelve other Bills of the same kind which have been adopted last year and this year. However, that is not a sufficient reason in my mind to make me vote against the motion of the hon. gentleman. But I am a little anxious about this; I do not know if it is the proper time to make such a motion with regard to the amendment. Should the motion of the hon. gentleman not come more properly on the third reading? I do not know what the amendments are. The hon. gentleman moves that the amendments be rejected. I do not know if the question of provincial rights arises on the amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My motion is not to concur in the amendments, but if the amendments be concurred in by the House, then I shall move and take a division of the Senate, upon the third reading, for the six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Would the hon. gentleman allow the amendments to go? They have been standing on the paper so long, and it advances it a stage so that the third reading can be reached?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No. Were I to do that, it would be concurring in amendments which should not be in the Bill if the Bill becomes law. The idea of passing a Bill to perform the work that this provides for, with a $50,000 capital is a farce.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Does the hon. gentleman complain the capital is too low?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I am very sorry that the hon. senator from Brandon who had charge of this Bill is not in his place, because he would be in a far better position than I am to give an explanation. This is a Bill to empower a company to build a transfer railway between the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian Northern, the Great Northern, or any other railway which may come into the city of Brandon. Unfortunately for the city of Brandon, they have not a union station, which is a very desirable thing to have in any city, and it would be extremely desirable in the city of Brandon. As it stands at present, the Canadian Northern is on one side and the Canadian Pacific on the other, and I have not the slightest doubt the Grand Trunk Pacific will occupy a position on another side, and the proposition is to build between those roads, roads chartered by the parliament of Canada, a connecting link so that freight may be cheaply transferred from one road to the other. It is also contemplated to build spur lines to factories or saw-mills or flour mills and other enterprises which are outside—I do not say outside of the limits of the city but on the outskirts of the city, to put these enterprises in direct connection with the various railways, and I admit, with my hon. friend from Belleville, that the road will possibly be a very expensive one, unless they happen to so arrange with the city of Brandon for a street, or something like that. That is the proposition, as I was advised by the mayor of the city of Brandon, who was here a short time ago. Now so far as provincial rights are concerned, there is no opposition that I know of from the council nor from the citizens. If my hon. friend will scan the list of those who are asking for incorporation he will find the list of names contains, besides the mayor of the city of Brandon, many citizens prominent in business and prominent in the management of the city's affairs, so that as far as the city is concerned there is no opposition there. So far as the province of Manitoba is concerned, I have heard of no objections at all to this legislation being put through in this House, and if it is a sin to pass a Bill of this kind, I must call attention to the fact that it is not the first sin we have committed, for this very day we have passed a terminal Bill for the city of Toronto in the Railway Committee. Not long ago my hon. friend to my left (Hon. Mr. David), and I admire his principles on provincial rights, was instrumental in passing a Bill incorporating the Montreal, Park and Island Company.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—It was incorporated by the federal parliament.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—A great many years ago.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—And I think my hon. friend from Wellington cannot hold up his hands to this House as an hon. gentleman who has not sinned in the same direction, and sinned very recently. So that so far as provincial rights are concerned, we cannot throw stones at one another in that respect. But I would call attention to the fact that if this road is chartered by the parliament of Canada, it will come under the control of the Railway Commission of Canada, which will be very important in the control of that railway in distributing the freight in a reasonable and proper manner to the various roads without discrimination and favour. I am making a very imperfect explanation. If the hon. senator from Brandon were here, he would make it in a much clearer way than I am doing, and I would ask the consideration of the House, under the circumstances, for this order. It has stood so long before this House, that the House should permit this Bill to go through, and when that is done, shut the door at the beginning of some future session, so that the Senate will not be charged with discrimination this session as against the city of Brandon or the province of Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. JONES—From time to time, as railway Bills have come before the House and the committee, I think I have been one among others to suggest that where the Bills were purely provincial they ought not to get their legislation here unless the House assumes that all railway legislation should go through this House. The hon. gentleman who has made this motion, and the hon. gentleman from Montreal, have spoken in the same direction. But, notwithstanding that, within the last two or three days one or two Bills at least have gone through that committee, and so far as I recollect within a week have come up before and have gone through the House, which are just as clearly provincial Bills as this is, and these are in the province of Ontario. The province of Ontario has taken a step forward in the direction of railway legislation, that no other province has taken so far as I know. They have inaugurated conditions and furnished the machinery to take care of conditions through a railway commission, where the roads are built under provincial legislation. I do not think that has been done in the province of Manitoba. I do not think that they have any provincial machinery to enable them to deal with questions that might arise between this road and the roads that are to be connected with it. The House can hardly, as it appeals to me, reject a Bill of this nature because the railway will be only seven or eight miles in length, and pass another as clearly as provincial in every sense as this is, and even more so, because it is twenty or thirty miles in length. We have no special limit of mileage that would bring it within the consideration of the House. This Bill is important to the city of Brandon. It is important to the province of Manitoba. It is a necessity for this railway centre, having as has been indicated, the Canadian Pacific Railway with three branches centering in the city of Brandon as well as its main line running through it, the Canadian Northern, with a branch line running into the city of Brandon, two branch lines in fact, one from the south, formerly the Northern Pacific, as well as a branch from the east and north; the Hill system, which is now building into Brandon, and will be running this year, it is practically graded now; and the Grand Trunk Pacific have obtained or are asking for a branch to go into Brandon also. Brandon is situated on the side of the hill where to connect a railway without a system of this nature would be impossible and impracticable, and so no interchange of freights can take place in Brandon, until some radical road, a belt line road, practically, goes round or through the outskirts of the city connecting different lines. If it were not for that difficulty one mile of railway or two miles at most would connect all these lines. As it is, the delay is considerable. There are several industries growing up in Brandon and the necessity for these connections is very pressing indeed. I know of my own knowledge the great difficulties of shipping to Brandon and the very considerable expense incurred because of the difficulty of transferring goods. I know that there is now a large warehouse being built there; in fact considerable has been built since this legislation has been asked for. It has been built, it is true, on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, because they would, doubtless, carry the most of the freight, but this large warehousing capacity would not have been built there at all were it not for the expectation of the people that a connection with the different roads would be made by such a system as has been suggested by this Bill, and therefore the situation is such, from a provincial and local standpoint, that it appeals to me that this House ought not to draw the line between Dominion and provincial legislation upon this particular Bill; if we do so, and we are consistent, we ought to go back if possible and cancel a number of the Bills that have gone through this session, and some that are coming up, which I believe the majority of the members of this House would favour passing. As to the amount of the bonding powers it is small.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, excuse me it is large.

Hon. Mr. JONES—But the capital is small. They are hoping to be able to arrange with the city which is very anxious to be helpful indeed in this matter, because of the pressing necessity in the city's interests. The citizens of Brandon, not the men of wealth, but citizens generally, intend to subscribe practically as a contribution to establish this line connecting the roads. In conversation with some of those who have been interested in this Bill, I have learned what their anticipation is. In asking for powers for the building and operating of elevators, they would not in the meantime build elevators, but if they were built along their line they would operate the elevators. That would not require much additional capital. They do not expect to do anything more than the grading and laying down, enabling the different railways to use the line, and to keep it in repair, possibly even to go beyond that and furnish the steel or some part of the expense of the steel for the sake of the connection taken into consideration with the lease that would be carried out. The condition is such as, I hope, will command the sympathy of this House, unless it is decided that they will reject all measures of a provincial character. If the House is not going to take the broader or general view of the question, I hope the line will not be drawn at this particular Bill which is a pressing necessity.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—The hon. member from Killarney (Hon. Mr. Young) insinuates that I am guilty of inconsistency on this question. I deny it. I have been so consistent that I do not want to rest silently under the accusation. I have always taken the same stand. In the case of the Park and Island Company the position was very different. The company was originally incorporated by the federal parliament. After it had been in operation a certain time, it came to parliament for an amendment for its charter, and in a case like that we have no right to refuse an amendment. The Bill, under such circumstances, is necessarily a federal Bill and within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, so that there is no parallel between the two cases. In this case what can be alleged to convince me, and all those who insist upon provincial rights is that the Bill deals with a federal railway and comes within the jurisdiction of parliament. It is said that it will connect two or three other railways. It will always be very easy at any time a Bill of that kind comes before parliament, to put in a clause declaring that the object of the Bill is to enable the railway to connect with some other one. That is not sufficient to make me vote against the motion of the hon. member.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Will the hon. gentleman permit me to explain what I said. I said that I admired his principles with reference to provincial rights, but that they seemed to be dormant at times. This road would be entirely useless unless it were to connect with three or four roads which are already declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, and which are chartered by the parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—If they are railways chartered by the Dominion government, the Railway Commission provides for this line making connection with them.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The other roads, I am advised, are in hearty accord with this legislation.

Hon. Mr. FORGET—Supposing this railway was chartered by the provincial legislature, it would not take away any of its privileges, because it would come under the Railway Act and the Railway Commission the moment it would connect with or cross another road.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It appears to me that the discussion is beside the point before the House. It is not a question of determining the principle of the Bill or the jurisdiction of this parliament. The motion which is made is to concur in the amendments which are recommended by the committee. That is, assuming that the Bill is a proper Bill, and that it is one which should be passed in some form, the question is whether these amendments are proper amendments and not whether the Bill is a proper Bill. The question of principle ought to have been discussed on the second reading, or it may be done at the third reading on notice being given. It is only obscuring the question to discuss the amendments concurrently with the matter of jurisdiction, and I think we should have the distinct issue taken upon the question of concurrence in the amendments.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the question of jurisdiction can always be raised at any stage of the Bill. Concurrence in the amendments to-day would be a consecration of the principle of the Bill itself.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—No more than the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—A question of jurisdiction may arise at any stage. You might in studying the amendments, after the second reading, perceive that the Bill is not under its proper jurisdiction. Whenever such a thing is discovered, we have always a right to raise an objection and to act upon it. I claim if we to-day concur in the amendments to a Bill which we know is not within our jurisdiction, we by that concurrence affirm the principle of the Bill a second time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is difficult to understand the position taken by the hon. gentleman from Toronto. The motion is to concur in the amendments. My argument is that they be not concurred in. No formal motion is necessary on my part, because we can vote in the negative, which accomplishes the same object; but if we allow the amendments to be adopted, then we concur to that extent in the principle of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman concurred in the principle of the Bill on the second reading.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I did not. The principle laid down in parliament of late years is that where a Bill is introduced and referred to a committee, you do not affirm the principle of the Bill on the second reading. If that is to be the understanding now, I have no objection in the least, but in that case we will insist upon an explanation of the provisions of every Bill which is introduced, and have the discussion upon the principle of the Bill on the second reading. That has not been the policy in the past; it has been contended that a Bill should go to the committee without concurring in the principle of the Bill at the time of the second reading. I admit that the practice twenty or thirty years ago, both in the late parliament of Canada and after confederation, was different. The argument advanced or the statements made by the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Jones) would apply to every station upon the whole line of the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk Railway. He tells us that he himself has experienced difficulty in dealing with Brandon. There are warehouses at the stations in Brandon. If not, they can be built there just the same as in the city of Toronto. If the hon. gentleman's argument be worth anything, he should insist upon warehouses and sidings being built in the centre of the city of Toronto, or near his works, in order that he could load his cars at the works. Perhaps he does so, I am not sure. I should like to know what greater difficulty arises in the transportation of goods from Toronto to Brandon to have them unloaded at the station, and have them placed in the warehouse at the station, than if they were taken by another company into the centre of the town in order to be distributed. The farmer who buys the article which my hon. friend sells, would come to the warehouse at the station just the same as he would to a warehouse in the centre of the town of Brandon. What is the difference I would like to know? And yet he argues that this road should be built by a private company in order that they may make money out of the transportation of an article from the station to other warehouses in the centre of the town.

Hon. Mr. JONES—I never advanced any such argument as that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.—Let me finish.

Hon. Mr. JONES.—The hon. gentleman is going wrong, and I want to put him right.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I am not going wrong. If there is not to be an extra charge for freight carried over this second road, why is a second company to be incorporated to build a warehouse in the centre of the town of Brandon? I may be so stupid as not to comprehend the difference between unloading your car by machinery at the station or transferring it to another company to do so. What is this other company asking a charter for? It is with the intention of building warehouses in some part of the town, and then connecting them by railway with the different stations in or about the town. They certainly expect to make some money by it, or they would not ask for this Bill, unless they are philanthropic like the hon. gentleman who advanced the argument, and are investing their money purely for the benefit of others than themselves. I have not yet found corporations or individuals who take that position. There is no reason or argument in favour of building this road into the centre of a town for the purpose of connecting with the different railways at their stations, in order that you can take freight that arrives at any station into the centre of the town instead of unloading it at the station itself. We know that there is not a station along the whole of the Grand Trunk Railway or any other railway where there are not warehouses for the reception and delivery of goods, and it is just the same in this case. The hon. member from Killarney is rather facetious in his remarks in saying we have sinned, and therefore should sin again. We have all sinned in this respect. The hon. member from Wellington says we have been sinning all along, let us sin a little longer, and become righteous a little later. I say where we find that we have been sinning, let us stop now. The fewer sins we commit the less we will have to atone for. Now I come back to the position taken by the hon. senator from Toronto with regard to the principle of the Bill. I indicated in my first remarks, that if the amendments were concurred in, I should propose the three months hoist on the principle that it is a gross and palpable interference with provincial rights. That is the only course open to me. There is no necessity for the motion I have made, because we can vote in the negative on the motion to adopt the amendments and accomplish the same object. Looking into the Bill since I spoke last, I find they have reduced the capital for this road, which is to be a belt line. Every one who has been in Brandon knows that it would have to be a belt line in order to reach the level of the Canadian Pacific Railway, because Brandon is built on rising ground. It is quite a high hill before you reach the main street, and I do not suppose this road is to run directly up hill. The Bill provides for a capital of $50,000 to accomplish all that work, but there is an ingenuous provision for the issue of bonds to the amount of $50,000 a mile. That is, the bonds for one mile of the road will provide the whole capital. It is just a speculation, and outsiders are to be asked to put their money in it. If bonds are issued to the full limit, the promoters of this enterprise will build the road, pay perhaps 10 per cent on the stock they subscribe, and pocket the balance.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—This Bill was very fully explained in committee, and the reasons for it were furnished there.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We have had the same reasons given here.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—With two explanations, I am more surprised at the hon. gentleman's attitude. This is practically a charter for the city of Brandon. If the hon. gentleman looks at the names of the corporators, he will find that they comprise nearly all the wholesale merchants of Brandon. While they are not philanthropists, at the same time they want this railway built for the purpose of transferring freight. It is not to build a railway from the station to the middle of the city. It is practically a belt line round the city of Brandon, because there they have the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian Northern and the Northern Pacific. It is not for the purpose of distributing freight, but for the purpose of transferring cars from one railway to another. The transfer line of Winnipeg is used by all the railways there. Brandon is becoming important as a distributing centre. There are four main lines going into Brandon, and several local roads running out of Brandon, and without this short line freight cannot be transferred from one line to another. Another important necessity for this transfer line is the very fact that the hon. gentleman has stated, that the Canadian Pacific Railway is at the bottom of the hill in Brandon and the Canadian Northern at the top of the hill, and the two lines are probably three-quarters of a mile apart. Without this short line freight has to be hauled by horses from one road to the other; with this transfer road the cars can be transferred without unloading. If there is any case which should commend itself to the House for approval of a local road, there is no question this one should.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman knows that the Railway Act gives power to any of these lines to build a road six miles long.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It might take a long time, and the merchants of Brandon want this accommodation at once. This short line will connect with all the railways, and I do not think the provincial government would have power to grant them a charter to build this connecting link. It appears to me, for the reasons which have been given, and the full explanation furnished for the committee, this House should not stultify itself by refusing to pass this particular Bill.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think the hon. senator from Belleville has raised an important question. We have been chartering local railroads by the score. It is generally admitted that we have been sinning. If so, it is time to call a halt. What is this road which is now advocated ? It is a city road which a number of citizens of Brandon want to construct; a tramway around the city of Brandon to connect with the three railroads mentioned. Why did not the promoters of this Bill go to the local legislature for a charter ? Does any one pretend to tell me that a road, which is nothing more than a local trolley line, is a work that can be regarded as a work for the benefit of the Dominion ? It is a road for the benefit of the citizens of Brandon—a local work in every sense of the word. Are we continually to be chartering companies of this kind ? This Bill should have been opposed at the second reading. If it had been properly explained at the second reading, I doubt if it would have gone in its present shape to the Railway Committee. The Bill as introduced called for capital stock of $200,000. In the Railway Committee the amount was reduced to $50,000. Why ? Does it or does it not require more than $50,000 to construct this road ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The explanation given to the committee, and which the committee accepted was this; that the people of Brandon were building this road and could not sell the stock except at a discount, and they could borrow money cheaper on debentures for the whole thing and in a more satisfactory way than they could get the capital by selling stock, and therefore they preferred reducing the stock and increasing the bonds.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The stockholders wished to relieve themselves of the responsibility that might fall upon them if the capital was larger.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It convinces me that the citizens of Brandon who are taking the $50,000 stock are doing so on the understanding that they are to issue $50,000 a mile in bonds, and sell the bonds to pay for the construction of the road, and whatever else may be required, and pocket the balance for their own individual profit. If that is what my hon. friend thinks is a proper transaction, I do not, and I wish to express my dissent. No doubt, in the interest of the city of Brandon, a belt line is required. But is that a matter of interest to the Dominion of Canada ? It is in the interest of the shippers, and for the benefit of the city of Brandon. Then why do they come here for a charter like this ? I do not blame the hon. senator from Toronto (Hon. (Mr. Jones) for advocating a Bill which enables him to handle his freight cheaper ; but I maintain that we should endeavour to protect provincial rights as far as we can. We have been going on recklessly assuming to ourselves control of local railways all over the Dominion. Our local legislatures are appointing railway commissions—for what purpose ? If all the roads are to be assumed by the Dominion, the commissions will be useless. I shall have the pleasure of voting for the motion of the hon. member from Belleville, feeling that it is in the public interest. The Dominion has no right, simply because it happens to be the stronger power, to infringe on the rights of the provinces. I have every confidence in the local legislatures being more competent to look after the interests of local railways than the Dominion. I therefore shall have pleasure in voting against concurrence in this report, because if I were to vote for it I would be giving my sanction to the principle involved just as I would if I voted for the Bill on the second reading.

The House divided on the amendment which was lost on the following division:—

FRANKLIN MONTGOMERY GRAY PATENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 122) an Act respecting certain patents of Franklin Montgomery Gray.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It will be remembered we had a discussion on a Bill in respect to certain patents a couple of days ago, when the hon. gentleman from Toronto called attention to the somewhat easy way in which we let those Bills through. It was suggested then that it would be desirable in future when such a Bill was being read the second time, that attention should be directed to any objectionable provision in the Bill. I wish to direct the attention of the House, and more particularly of the members of the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, to the fact that this Bill contains some decidedly objectionable provisions. This Bill does not provide for the case of those who have commenced to manufacture at any time before the passing of the Act, but it says : 'If any person has in the period between the 28th October, 1904, and the 22nd March, 1906, &c.'

I think that that is an exceedingly unreasonable provision, that any one who has been manufacturing before this Bill becomes law should be hampered or interfered with. There are two patents dealt with, and there are different periods for the two patents, one of the 12th January, 1906, and the other of 22nd March, 1906. When this Bill goes to the committee, the committee should amend the Bill by inserting the date of the passing of this Act instead of the 22nd March last.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is it understood that we affirm the principle of the Bill on the second reading? Because if so we had better not adopt it, or we had better have that particular clause struck out. The objectionable portion of the Bill is that to which attention was called on a former occasion. That is it prevents the manufacturing of an article, no matter how much money had been spent after the expiration, providing they have commenced manufacturing at the date of last November. That I presume was the time the notice was given asking for the protection.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I assume the committee to whom this matter will be referred can deal with that question, and that what has occurred here will of course be brought to their attention for the purpose of having it corrected, and they will hear evidence upon which this clause in either form may be made and can be reported to the House. I understand that this clause of the Bill, which was in a different form, was the subject of debate in the committee and also in the other House. From that fact I assume that there will be some evidence and material before the committee which may be the subject of report here, and I apprehend attention having been called to it, it is not for us to affirm or reject the principles one way or the other. It will be more convenient to take the evidence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Of course the House is well aware that the committee can deal with it, but my object was to let it be distinctly understood that in agreeing to the second reading we do not affirm the principle involved in that clause. I do that from the fact that attention was called to their having passed the second reading of another Bill, and it was then alleged that in doing that we affirm the principle of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—All right.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I do not think there is any principle about it. The question is whether there should be a clause there at all, and if so then on hearing the evidence in the case, the committee can settle the matter. I do not think either the House or the committee should be precluded in regard to that when attention is called to it on second reading.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to postpone it until to-morrow, because when we have it printed in French we will be able to go faster.

Hon. Mr. KERR—Very well.

The order of the day was discharged and placed on the orders of the day for to-morrow.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (174) An Act respecting the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, He said : This is a Bill of one paragraph, authorizing the Quebec Harbour Commissioners to expend $150,000 on the embankment of the tidal harbour, for which they give bonds to pay the interest on them.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a money Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Should we not be advised that the Governor in Council has given his sanction to it ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was done before it passed the other Chamber.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But there should be something done here. We do not know what passes in the other Chamber, and if we make allusions to what takes place there, we are called to order.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If it is any satisfaction, I will say to my hon. friend that it has the approval of His Excellency.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman will look at the rule of parliament he will find it is necessary to make announcement here as well as in the Commons. I may frankly admit that it has not been the practice, but it is a parliamentary rule. I suppose the hon. Secretary of State being a member of the government, would have the authority of the Governor to announce that it is submitted with His Excellency's consent.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. Where the Governor gives his assent, any member of the government is in a position to make that statement. I have made that statement here and I think it is quite sufficient.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until 3 p.m. to-morrow.

WATER RIGHTS IN YUKON TERRITORY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) inquired of the government :

Have all the Treadgold concessions in the Yukon or Klondike been cancelled ?

What concessions, if any, and what special rights have been given the Klondike Water Supply Company, incorporated under the Companies Act, 1902, over rivers, streams and creeks in the Yukon or Klondike district ?

Do such rights carry a monopoly of the water supply in certain rivers and streams ?

Has the company the right to pass over, or under, or expropriate private property and mines in operation in the prosecution of its works ?

Do the rights of the company exclude miners and other persons taking water for mining and domestic purposes ?

Can miners construct dams and sluices on, or from the rivers and streams to which the rights of the company extend ?

Has the administrator of the Yukon been consulted during his recent visit to Ottawa before giving the Klondike Water Supply Company any special rights in any rivers and streams in the district under his administration ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have a partial answer here from the department, but I find that it is incomplete, and I think it had better be sent back again.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Does it answer the portion of my question about a monoply of the water supply?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will send the answer over to the hon. gentleman and he can see it for himself.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The important part of this question is really the part about the administrator. I have great confidence in that young man. He is not made in Germany, but made in British Columbia, and on first going out to that country he did very good work. He formed a large contract for supplying several thousand cords of firewood and discovered that the man who took count of the cordwood had given a certificate for several hundred cords which had not been delivered at all. Mr. McInnes spotted that and brought the man to book, and gave the alternative of having the contract broken or else furnishing the wood, which was a very good move.

The SPEAKER—Does the question of the hon. gentleman from Victoria stand ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He will decide whether the answer that I have given him is sufficient or not.

SHIPMASTERS' CERTIFICATES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government :

On the list of service certificates as shipmasters, what are the names of the holders of the certificates bearing respectively Nos. 1440, 1441, 1442, 1444 and 1445 ?

At what date was each of these certificates issued ? And by whom are they signed ?

Hon Mr. SCOTT—The following is the answer which has been sent me :

List of service certificates, Nos, 1440, 1441, 1442, 1444 and 1445.

Note.—Certificates are issued under different series of numbers, according to the trade for which they are issued, which accounts for different certificates being of the same number.

No. 1440—Master's service certificate, seagoing, issued to John B. Podester, 24th April, 1889, signed by Hon. C. H. Tupper (minister), and William Smith (deputy minister).

No. 1440—Master's service certificates, for inland waters, issued to Jeremiah Slifford, 25th April, 1884, signed by Hon. A. W. McLelan (minister), and William Smith (deputy minister).

No. 1441—Mate's service certificate, seagoing, issued to Richard H. Dooley, 6th May, 1889, signed by Hon. H. C. Tupper (minister), and William Smith (deputy minister).

No. 1441—Mate's service certificate, for inland waters, issued to Louis G. Labatt, 25th April, 1884, signed by Hon. A. W. McLelan (minister), and Wiliam Smith (deputy minister.)

No. 1442—Master's service certificate, sea-going, issued to Clement Royds, 29th March, 1892, signed by Hon. C. H. Tupper (minister), and William Smith (deputy minister.)

Nr. 1442—Master's service certificate, for inland waters, issued to Robert McMaugh, 25th April, 1884, signed by Hon. A. W. McLelan (minister), and William Smith (deputy minister.)

No. 1444—Master's service certificate, for inland waters, issued to Archibald McMaugh, 25th April, 1884, signed by Hon. A. W. McLelan (minister), and William Smith (deputy minister.)

No. 1445—Master's service certificate, for inland waters, issued to David Allan Kiah. 25th April, 1884, signed by Hon. A. W. McLelan (minister), and William Smith (deputy minister.)

APPOINTMENT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the orders of the day are called, I would call the attention of the hon. leader of this House to the following paragraph which is published in the 'Journal' this morning. It is a despatch from Quebec, June 13, and reads as follows :—

Hon. Adelaide Tourgeon has declined the offer of Solicitor Generalship made him by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Some of his friends here think he may reconsider the matter on condition of being later appointed commissioner to France.

I would ask the leader if there is any truth in this despatch, and if it is really the case that the Hon. Mr. Turgeon has declined the offer made to him by the Premier of this Dominion of the position of Solicitor General in this cabinet ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I can frankly tell my hon. friend that I have no information whatever on the subject.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Could the hon. gentleman get a little more information as a minister ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know that I could. It never came up in council. What may have passed in the mind of the Prime Minister I cannot tell. He is the one who is responsible in matters of that kind and, necessarily, it rests with the Premier.

AN ERROR IN THE MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that I am represented as a sort of double ; that I am supposed to have spoken against Bill (43) An Act to incorporate the Brandon Transfer Railway Company—not only having spoken against it, but I am recorded as voting for the Bill after I had spoken in opposition to it. But that is not all. They are not satisfied with that ; I am also charged with voting against the Bill. I am prepared and willing to assume whatever responsibility may attach to any statement I made if I cannot be comprehended, but certainly I was not responsible in any way, from what I said, for being put down as voting for the Bill, after I had spoken against it, therefore I call the attention to the House to the fact that I am misrepresented. I am exalted to that position that I am capable of moving everyway.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (42) An Act to incorporate the Buffalo, Niagara and Toronto Railway Company, as amended.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (100) An Act respecting the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company, (referred back for further consideration, June 7, 1906).—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

Bill (117) An Act to incorporate the Erie, London and Tilsonburg Railway Company, as amended.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (134) An Act respecting the Toronto and Hamilton Railway Company, and to change its name to 'The Toronto, Niagara and Western Railway Company,' as amended.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

Bill (138) An Act to incorporate the Toronto Terminals Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

BRANDON TRANSFER RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the third reading of Bill (43) An Act to incorporate the Brandon Transfer Railway Company as amended. He said : I understood yesterday that my hon. friend from Belleville stated he was going to move an amendment to this Bill, but since then he has told me that the Senate having by a substantial majority confirmed what he considered to be the iniquitous clause he objected to, that he was not going to move his amendment. I therefore move the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (S) An Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, as respects lotteries.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—We discussed this measure pretty well on its second reading. I may say in further explanation of it that these art unions do not draw any lotteries in this country. They have only one annual exhibition, which is held in London and Ireland. The Glasgow Art Union, of which I spoke, is not now in existence. I move to amend the Bill by striking out the whole of clause (c) and inserting simply the words : 'to the Art Union of London and the Art Union of Ireland.'

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. OWENS, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

The Bill was then read a third time, and passed.

ROCKY MOUNTANS PARK ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (164) An Act to amend the Rocky Mountains Park Act. He said : The Rocky Mountains Park was originally laid off in the year 1887, and, by section 4, it was declared that the park should be under the control and management of the Minister of the Interior and the Governor in Council, who had power to make regulations for various purposes, among them to lease for any terms of years parcels of land in the park for the construction of buildings for purposes of trade and industry and the accommodation of persons resorting to the park. It has been found that where parties have only the right to lease the land they put up inferior shacks, which are in no way creditable or ornamental. The purpose of this Bill is to allow certain lands shown on particular plans to be sold, that is :

(i.) Plan of the town plot, Rocky Mountains Park of Canada, in the province of Alberta, signed by George A. Stewart, D.L.S., and dated July 2nd, 1888.
(ii.) Plan of the town plot of Canmore, signed by A. J. Brabazon, D.L.S., without date.

The object of this is to induce parties to put up more presentable buildings than have been erected in the past under the limited period of ownership by lease. The Bill requires that the regulations made from time to time shall be published in the 'Canada Gazette' and laid before parliament.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to ask my hon. friend what may have led up to the introduction of this legislation. I understand that when the National Park was laid out in the first place the policy of the government, after mature consideration, was fixed with reference to leases. That question, I remember, was threshed out in parliament some years ago. Has it turned out to be unsatisfactory? Some assurance should be given, in view of the sale of these lands, that those who now have leases should be protected in their rights and sales shall not be made without due notice being given to the present lease-holders. There is nothing in the Bill of a protective nature as to that particular question. Very frequently sales are made in a reckless way, not taking into consideration those who have prior claims. I would ask my hon. friend what consideration has been given to that subject?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In answer to the first question, the motive which the Minister of the Interior gave for the Bill was the one I stated, to induce parties to put up more respectable and more presentable buildings than the shacks which now rather discredit the park. In regard to the second point, the invariable practice of the Interior Department, as my hon. friend is aware, is to give priority to occupants. The rights of leases would not be disturbed. It would be open to them to buy, but, of course, you cannot compel them to purchase if they choose to hold under lease. This simply gives the minister, under certain regulations, the right to sell absolutely, limited to the two town plots that have been laid off.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will these sales be subject to building conditions ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume so. The object is to encourage the erection of finer buildings in the park.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY BOUNTY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved the second reading of Bill (177) An Act to make further provision respecting grants of land to members of the militia force on active service in the Northwest. He said : The object of this Bill is simply to extend the privilege which was originally granted as far back as 1885 to men who have taken part in suppressing the rising, or rebellion, or whatever you may choose to call it, which took place in the early history of the Northwest. The greater number of parties entitled to these bounty warrants have availed themselves of the privilege, but it appears there is a small number—I believe it is not more than 30 or 40—who have not availed themselves of it ; and the object of this Bill is to extend the time, which has now expired, to December 31, 1908. There is just one clause, and that is the sole object of it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my right hon. friend recall whether in the former Acts the applicants were entitled to two-quarter sections ?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—To two-quarter sections, as I understand.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Except there be special provision in the Dominion Lands Act, there is no such homestead as that of two-quarter sections. There were pre-emptions.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—As I understand in the bounty warrants which were granted in 1885, special provision was made for two-quarter sections being granted. If my hon. friend will send for the statutes of 1885, chapter 73, he will see the whole thing detailed, but possibly we can look into that when it comes up in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my right hon. friend before he sits down if he knows whether clause 1 of the Bill is similar to the clauses in the other renewals Acts? There have been some seven or eight renewals or extensions of the Act.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I understand it is a fac simile. It was stated to me by authority that it was simply an extension. The present law giving the bounty, expired on December 31, 1900, and, as I am informed, this Bill simply contemplates an extension of the time to 1908. In no other respect is it intended to deviate from the former Acts.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—While my hon. friend is on his feet, will he tell us what causes the renewal of the grant now after such a hiatus as seems to have occurred between 1900 and the present time. It will be observed from the marginal notes that between 1885 and 1900 there have been several renewals. Six years have gone by since 1900.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRGHT—Yes, that is quite true. I am told that the number of applicants is small, but my hon. friend will remember that a very large number of persons from distant parts of the country took part in the military movement of that year. I think we sent as many as five or six thousand troops there, taken from all parts of the country, as far east, I think, as Prince Edward Island, and owing, I suppose, to the great distance that many of these people were from the Northwest, sundry of them did not avail themselves of the opportunity and from time to time extension was made. That is the only reason that I am aware of for granting this extension.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suppose the enhanced value of the lands has given an impetus to reviving the right?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I have no doubt that is so. In 1885 those of us who had invested in the Northwest were not taking such a roseate view of the possibilities of the country.

The motion was argeed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

PACIFIC AND EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to Bill (N) An Act to incorporate the Pacific and Eastern Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—What are the amendments. There was one amendment moved by the Hon. Mr. Kerr. Is there any other?

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—Page 591 of the 'Journals' will show it. These amendments are merely improvements of a particular section. As I understand, when the Bill was drafted the solicitor who had charge of it adopted some older form, but since the Railway Commission came into existence the modified form was adopted, and these amendments are rendered necessary.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (II) An Act for the relief of Muriel Violet Spencer.—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

Bill (61) An Act to incorporate the Grand Trunk Pacific Telegraph Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (147) An Act respecting the Standard Trusts Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

FRANKLIN MONTGOMERY GRAY PATENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. KERR moved the second reading of Bill (122) An Act respecting certain patents of Franklin Montgomery Gray.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I think we should certainly have some explanation of this measure.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—This is a Bill to revive a patent. As I understand it, in 1903 a patent was issued which was the reissue of a patent issued in 1902. The patent for 1903 was passed shortly before the Act came into force amending the patent law. It was issued a month or two before that Act came into force. The effect of that Bill was to amend the Act to the prejudice, as to time of renewal, which the patent would have, but the whole trouble was it being a patent in reissue of a former patent, the patent office held that they were not able to grant a renewal although applied for within the time. As I understand it, the new patent was to be the one in operation. I do not know why it was there was a reissue of the patent in the way I have spoken of, but all that will be ascertained in committee. The effect of it was the joint action of the patent being a reissue of the patent of the previous year some months before, I suppose it was some mistake—I do not know what the reason of it was—and under the construction which was put upon the statute by means of the amending law which came into force two months afterwards, the party was deprived of the opportunity of renewing his patent. I understand that was the trouble. All that will appear before the committee. That is the way I understand the matter.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—On all applications for the renewal of patents, we should insist upon an explanation at the second reading. I find that it is becoming very common for parties to allow their patents to run out and then come to parliament and ask for a renewal by special Acts. We have had more of that within the last two years then I can remember during my whole parliamentary life. There are cases, of course, in which it is absolutely necessary that parliament should grant the legislation sought, and this seems to be one of them. However, in all cases where we are asked to renew a patent, we should have clear, distinct and explicit statements on the second reading of each Bill, of the grounds on which the renewal is asked.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—A more important question arises in connection with this patent, and I must say on perusal of the Bill my curiosity has been excited. It purports to make sugar and alcohol out of sawdust. To what extent have the patentees become successful in thus converting a product which was the subject of a very considerable discussion in this House some years ago? If we are able to convert the sawdust which has been filling up the Ottawa, into alcohol and sugar, those two commodities should be within the reach of everybody hereafter.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I do not profess to be an authority on either of the articles covered by this patent. I assume that the patent is a valuable one or the patentees would not want to preserve their rights. I shall see that an investigation takes place before the committee, and possibly we may have samples of the products there to satisfy the curiosity of hon. gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The second reading of this Bill came up yesterday and was postponed. I rise again to call attention to the provisions of the second clause of the Bill, which protects the rights of persons who began to manufacture prior to the 22nd day of March last. The usual, and I think, the proper language, protects the rights of a person who began to manufacture before the passing of this Act, and I trust that the committee to whom this Bill will be referred will see that it is amended so as to give the legitimate protection.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

FRUIT MARKS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Pursuant to the order of the day, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (101) An Act to amend the Fruit Marks Act, 1901.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—What is the proposed change in the Fruit Inspection Act?

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—One of the principal changes, I believe, is to alter the former markings which consisted of X, XX and XXX. Hon. gentlemen will notice that when packages are marked in this way it is very easy to put in an extra X and some trouble, confusion and, they say, fraud, arose therefrom. I might mention that the Minister of Agriculture in introducing this Bill in another place stated that it was the result of a long conference between himself and the representatives of the Fruit Growers' Association from the several provinces of the Dominion. The matter was pretty fully discussed there and apparently, as far as I can judge, there was no division of opinion about it. It passed unanimously after a good deal of discussion.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The explanation which the right hon. minister has made with regard to the change in the law is not altogether complete; in fact, the most important change was not mentioned by him at all. Of course the Bill makes obligatory the marking of packages by the numbers 1 and 2, with a higher quality as 'fancy,' and it removes the right to mark by Xs, altogether, I think that is a decided improvement. It is very much better that all the fruit of the country should go out under one system of marking, and that can be done just as effectively by these numbers as by the use of Xs, while the latter system was liable to abuse, because it was the easiest thing in the world for a trader who got hold of a consignment of apples to put on another X and thus, perhaps, obtain a better price, which would be fraud. But the most important change in the Bill is the one by which the fancy grade is established and also a No. 2 grade. Up to the present time we have had just No. 1 defined. Under the old Act, it was only with regard to No. 1 that penal conditions were attached if any of this quality were not up to the standard that was described. All that seems to be right enough, but the point of objection that I have to the whole principle of this legislation—not only what is here, but the former Acts as well—is that it allows for a No. 1 apple that ten per cent of an inferior quality should be put into each barrel. I do not think that should be the case with a No. 1 Canadian apple at all. No. 1 should really be our very best fruit, and there should be no permission to put 10 per cent of culls, worm-eaten or scabby apples in any package of No. 1 quality. I think it would have been quite sufficient to have had No. 1 and No. 2 qualities. No. 1 should have been just what 'fancy' is described to be by this Bill, and No. 2 might be fixed somewhat lower in size or class. I think we would then have done all that we ought to do in the matter of grading. The permission to put 10 per cent of inferior apples into each barrel of No. 1 quality is doing the country a great deal of harm. It is quite true, as my hon. friend has stated, that the Minister of Agriculture is moved in this regard by the action of the Fruit Growers' Associations, but I do not think that the fruit growers are very wise in this matter. By keeping at home about 10 per cent of all the apples in the various grades described here great benefit would accrue. 'Fancy' quality must have no imperfect apples; No. 1 may have 10 per cent and No. 2 may have 20 per cent of bad or inferior fruit. Of course we know that, as in all other things, the packer might now and then find that a bad apple escapes him, even where he is honestly aiming at perfection, but nobody would think of prosecuting for that if the general quality was well up to the standard. The weakness of the legislation is in regard to No. 1, where we allow 10 per cent of fruit to be put in these packages which may be worm-eaten or scab, or otherwise defective. In No. 2 we are allowing 20 per cent of bad or defective fruit to be put in every barrel. Now, if these defective apples were kept at home, they would only amount altogether to 10 per cent of the total export and they would not represent a great deal of money. I am satisfied a larger amount would be realized for the 90 per cent of perfect fruit which would go abroad than will be got for the 100 per cent which will be sent out under this legislation, besides which it would prevent the great damage that is being done to our trade. I am told on the very best authority that the Australians and also the Californians—and I am glad to see that our own people in British Columbia also—aim at perfection as nearly as possible, and their apples are obtaining a better name than eastern Canada apples have in all the different markets to which they are exported. I did not attend the meeting referred to by the hon. minister; I was not able to be present, but I learned that the representatives from British Columbia were strongly against allowing these imperfect apples to find a price in any of the grades.

Their view was that we should aim at perfection and size and colour might come in as determining what was a fancy No. 1 and No. 2, but that there should be no scabby or wormy apples allowed in any of the grades. I believe the majority of the packers overruled the objection and, ultimately, a unanimous decision was arrived at, and the result is that the suggestions were made, which I believe are fairly and faithfully incorporated in the Bill now before us. It will not become us in this House to oppose these suggestions strenuously or try to raise the standard, in view of the effort that has been made to get the views of the fruit growers; but I am quite satisfied that if the views of the market to which we are sending our apples could have been properly represented and heard in that conference, as well as the views of those who were interested in selling—I am not saying the views of both should have clashed; I think the interests of both sides would have been found to be identical—but if the views of the market to which we are sending the apples were represented in that meeting, and that side given, there would not have been granted permission to continue the provision allowing inferior fruit to find its way into any of the grades. One thing which is satisfactory is, that we are now establishing a grade that should be as near perfection as possible, and that is a grade that should be made up of the best apples grown in our country, and I hope that after a few years more, our fruit-growers will rise to the importance of the situation, and realize it fully, and come to the conclusion that it would be better for them if even 20 per cent more, not 10 per cent, which I think would be all that would be necessary to be left at home, in order to raise the standard of our fruit in the markets of the world; but, even if it was necessary, that 25 per cent should be kept at home, and if no better use could be found for that 25 per cent than feeding it to the swine, it would be better for the country than that we should be sending fruit to foreign countries, while in these packages a very considerable portion of the fruit, 10 per cent in No. 1 and 20 per cent in No. 2, are allowed to be defective and bad. I am not opposing the Bill. The minister has consulted those who are most interested. Representative men I know were present. Ultimately, I am aware, as he has said, they came to a unanimous conclusion with regard to it; but I have it on excellent authority that they were not a few—I think all the representatives from British Columbia and I think many from some of the other provinces—favoured raising the standard and insisting that all the fruit that goes from Canada should be as nearly as possible free from any defective fruit.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I am bound to say that I think there is a very great deal in what the hon. member from Marshfield has stated. There is no doubt that the apple trade might be enormously increased, and might become of very great value indeed to Canada. We, at present, in the best years, export from three to four million dollars worth of apples. I have no doubt if proper precaution could be taken both in the way of packing and in sending forward apples in better condition, and also by a much more extended use of cold storage for the purpose of preserving the aples in proper condition until they are shipped, that the trade could be doubled or trebled—perhaps we might export ten to twelve millions dollars worth of apples annually, to the great advantage of the farmers of Canada. I will take pains, if the hon. gentleman has not already done so, to communicate his views to the Minister of Agriculture. In the meantime, for the reasons he has already stated, it would not be advisable for us to amend the Bill which has received the sanction of the fruit growers. I may state that the commercial agents of my department advised me that, in all probability, if a grade of apples equal to the grade of 'Fancy' is introduced, the others will be eliminated by the process of natural selection. The buyers will give so much more for apples of uniform quality such as are described in 'Fancy' than for No. 1 and No. 2 grades, our growers will find it better to substitute the grade of 'Fancy' for the grading of No. 1. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right in saying that the trade is one of great importance and hardly too much attention can be directed to expanding it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would call attention to clause 'd.' It is the same wording as the existing section of the old Act, but I have always considered it was a weakness to use the words 'with the name of the variety or varieties'. That would imply that there might be two varieties put in the same barrel. Other clauses of the Act are entirely inconsistent with that, and I cannot understand why it should not be 'the name of the variety,' because there is no question about it, that the mixing of varieties is a very objectionable thing.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think the hon. gentleman is right there.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—You might for instance put a few northern spies, and another variety of apples without the same keeping qualities, in a barrel, and mark it 'varieties.' I have heard the argument raised that the packers have a right to put two varieties in the same barrel because of this language in section 4.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—So far as the apple trade of British Columbia is concerned, apple packers put two varieties in a box marking the names of the varieties on the outside of the box; at the same time they recognize that the grade cannot be as good. They are usually marked a lower grade than if the box contained only one variety of apples. I think it will be a hardship on the packers to alter this in the way suggested, because the packers themselves in their own interest will stick to the one variety in a box, and only pack two varieties in a box when they have not enough of one variety to fill the box.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If my hon. friend will look over the Act, he will find that they cannot do that under another provision.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I should imagine, though, of course, the question is open to some little doubt, that if the apples are marked 'variety' or 'varieties' they would have to come under grade No. 2. If my hon. friend will examine the Bill carefully he will find that apples marked 'fancy' or No. 1 must be all of the same quality, and variety.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I turn to the Act of 1901, section 7, of which is still the law, though other parts have been amended, and I find that it contains the following provision:

> No person shall sell or offer, expose or have in his possession for sale any fruit marked in any package in which the face or shown surface gives a false representation of the contents of such package, and it shall be considered a false representation when more than 15 per cent of such fruit is substantially smaller in size than, or inferior in grade to, or different in variety from, the face or shown surface of such package.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—Will the hon. senator look at clause 6? He will see there that fancy quality and No. 1 quality are apparently expressly confined to one variety, and that it is only apparently under No. 2 quality that two varieties may be packed in the same package.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (C.B.)—I do not know that it has been brought to the knowledge of the apple shippers of Canada that they have a practice in Tasmania of putting up apples in 60-pound boxes and strapping the corners of the boxes with iron, so that one box would not press upon another. If a large quantity of our apples were put up in that way, they would find a ready maket in Great Britain.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You can make the Bill very clear if you make subsection 'b' read as follows:

> With the name of the variety, or in the case of No. 2 quality with the names of the varieties.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—You may have lots of apples marked No. 2 which would be only one variety.

Hon. Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—I think it would be better to leave it as it is.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—On further examination, I do not think there is the same objection to this Bill as there has been to its predecessors, because clearly we are making the law against any more than one variety being in either 'fancy' or 'No. 1'; but we are not making the same provision with regard to No. 2, and, that being so, subsection 'b' of paragraph 4 might be allowed to remain in this Bill without causing the friction that arose under the old one.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (De la Vallière), from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (174) An Act respecting the Quebec Harbour Commissioners.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The object of this Bill is the advance of $150,000 to the Quebec board of harbour commissioners to complete work that is now under way, the deepening of the water at St. Louis basin at Quebec frontage.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How does the government check this expenditure made by those harbour commissioners, particularly this commission? Does it exercise any supervision whatever over the works that are being carried on?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think it does while the work is being carried on. The harbour commissioners give their own bonds to the government in exchange for government bonds, so that the harbour commissioners control the expenditure. They have to satisfy the department with plans of the general character of the work. The plans must be approved of by the department.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does the department do anything more than formally approve of the plans?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does it make any examination of the plans or is there any supervision of the expenditures that are being made or the works that are being carried on?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The operations are being carried on by the harbour commissioners. The work is done by them. The money is loaned to the corporation. The chairman of the commission is one of the greatest business men in Quebec, and there are many of the best business men of that city on the Quebec harbour commission. There are some appointed by the government, one by the chamber of commerce of Quebec and Lévis, one by the board of trade, etc. They have to account to the government for the money they handle; they make a report every year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Who appoints the engineer?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The engineer is appointed by the harbour commissioners. The engineer in charge is Mr. Boswell.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Who pays for the work lower down the river where ships sometimes go aground? There is very shoal water below Quebec, and I think the money had far better be spent there than up where it is proposed to expend it. Ships cannot get aground at this place, but lower down two or three ships went aground last year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The deepening of the channel below Quebec is entirely under the control of the federal government. The deepening was required here in order that ships with a greater draught might appoach the St. Louis embankment. The work has been going on for some time.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend why it is the government has not carried out the same policy as to the Quebec harbour commission which was recently introduced in regard to the Montreal harbour commission? It was found that the system did not work satisfactorily, especially in so important a port as Montreal, and it seems to me that the same argument which would apply to the port of Montreal would be equally applicable to the port of Quebec, more especially so since that port is now coming into very great prominence and will likely occupy a very much more important position in regard to our shipping interests than heretofore. If it became necessary to wipe out the harbour commissioners of Montreal on account of the system being antiquated, there seems to be no reason why the same policy should not apply to Quebec.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—I think the Montreal people themselves asked for that change. In Quebec they did not ask for it. The commissioners agree among themselves and they do good work.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—How many form the board in Quebec?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—There are nine members and the president of the corporation of pilots is an ex-officio member, which makes ten in all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The objection in Montreal was that the commission was too large; that it was cumbersome and it got into discredit. For years complaints have been coming to the government and it was notorious that the commissioners were not acting in harmony. The works were really suffering and considerable loss had ensued because there had been a departure from the plans. At Quebec objections of this kind have never been brought forward; there has been no pretense that the harbour commissioners at Quebec were not carrying out their duties.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not cast any reflection upon the personnel of that commission or their intention to administer their duties faithfully, but the system is not one that commends itself, it seems to me, to modern business methods. Gentlemen are appointed by the government to these harbour commissioners, not so much on business grounds, but in many cases on the ground of political claims and the social status which they occupy in the community, and these bodies become very largely ornamental, a kind of semi-social and business body which entertains members of parliament occasionally and the friends who visit the harbour more frequently. I think I am justified in saying that the present system of administering most of our harbours by commission is not one which appeals to modern business methods.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—In Quebec the best men have always been appointed, at least since 1896. This government did not look either for a Grit or for a Tory. As an instance of that I may mention that one of the first to be appointed after 1896 was Mr. Macpherson, who was the treasurer of the Tory party during the election of 1896. I do not say that he ought to have been appointed, but he was all the same, and he is a very good man.

Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Tell us about those who were appointed before that ?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—Before that they were all Tories.

An hon. GENTLEMAN—Were they honest ?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE—The reports of the committee of the other House after an enquête held some fifteen years ago show what some of them were.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—With regard to what the hon. leader of the opposition has said, one can very readily imagine that there is a transition time in regard to the affairs of these harbours. When people settled first on the harbours they had to take charge of them themselves. Gradually the government has been appealed to and by degrees have come into control. I can readily imagine there would be harbours where, if the government undertook absolute control, such as the hon. gentleman suggests, they might run contrary to public opinion at that particular place, and that public opinion would be gradually brought into harmony with the policy of the government. Now, I imagine if at Quebec there were government commissioners they would entertain my hon. friend down there just as readily as the local harbour commissioners would do. The only difference is that there is apparently hope that at some time or another the country will get its money back. I rose to ask the hon. Secretary of State, because we are interested in this harbour question in St. John, what amount of debentures have been issued under section 34 and does the harbour of Quebec pay any interest on the amount of money which has already been raised in that way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Section 34 reads as follows :

> For the relief of the corporation and for the improvement of the harbour of Quebec, the Governor in Council may raise the sum of $382,197.50.

The usual practice has been that they deposit their bonds and get the benefit of the government credit.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. GODBOUT, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The order of the day being called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. David : That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all petitions, resolutions or documents concerning the abolition or reorganization of the Senate.—(Hon. Mr. McMullen.)

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I have agreed to give way in favour of the hon. gentleman from Russell (Hon. Mr. Edwards), with the consent of the House. He is desirous of speaking and I consent.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I desire to say but a few words this afternoon upon the motion which was moved a few days ago by my hon. friend from Mille Isle. It is, perhaps, a very strange procedure for a legislative body to be discussing itself. This, however distasteful to the hon. senators, is forced upon the House. There seems to be an agitation in the land that the Senate has lost its usefulness, and perhaps that there never should have been a Senate at all. This agitation, however, comes very largely from the irresponsible portion of the press of Canada, but, unfortunately, and perhaps a little unfairly, the Commons has devoted itself also to the discussion of the Senate. Perhaps it would be as applicable for the Senate to devote itself to a discussion of the Commons, and if, in the few words which I address to the House this afternoon, I direct some remarks to the Commons, it will not be from any disrespect at all for that honourable body, but it will be because of the fact that I, like many honourable gentlemen in this House, have had very considerable experience in that House. and I have now had a few years experience in the Senate. In discussing the constitution of one of the legislative bodies of the Dominion, my own humble opinion is that that cannot properly be done unless you take the whole legislative body and include the two Houses. There are those who believe that the Dominion never had any necessity for a second Chamber. There are, perhaps, many in Canada who believe that such is the case. There are others who believe also that there is no necessity for an upper House in our provincial legislatures. I, perhaps, may have been one of those who, not having experience years ago, believed such to be the case, but I will say that after having, as I have had, 20 years experience in the Commons and Senate of Canada, I have no doubt at all as to the desirability and necessity of a second Chamber ; and, further, I will make the statement now in case I should foget to do so later on, that I am one of those who believe that the province of Ontario made a great mistake in not having a second Chamber. My reason for so believing is this : the trend of legislation is changing as the years advance, and while it may not have been apparent years ago, it certainly has become apparent in recent years that legislation is becoming too lax. I do not make this statement because of the present political complexion of the House at Toronto. I came to that conclusion long before the change took place. The whole trend of legislation in Canada is towards laxity in chambers where members are elected by the popular voice. It is not necessary for me to explain why such is the case, but I am one of those who thoroughly believe from observation it is the fact, and I think the time has come, when, in the best interests of Ontario, there should be a second chamber. If this is true as applied to the provinces, it is more largely so as applied to the higher legislative body, the parliament of Canada, and in what I have to say this afternoon, I desire to be practical, and to give the result of my own experience in the two bodies. When I first entered the Commons, having been a business man all my life, controlling my own business very largely as I choose to do myself, and observing the procedure of that body, my opinion was, and a very firm opinion, that a committee of three would run the business of Canada very much better than the Commons of Canada. I further believed that legislation was much too slow, that a very great deal of time was wasted in the discussion of measures. On that question I have entirely changed my mind, and my opinion now is that legislation is far too rapid in the Commons, and, in many instances, altogether too rapid in the Senate.

My opinion is that very much greater consideration should be given to Bills both private and public in the Commons. I do not think that it applies to the same extent in the Senate. After having an experience in both Chambers, my opinion is that so far as dealing with Bills is concerned this is the superior Chamber, and I say so without any reflection whatever upon the Commons. A great many of our friends outside who are criticising the Senate believe that because this House does not sit so long or on as many days as the Commons, it is not as useful, but if they would think for a moment they would remember that in the Senate there are no debates on the budget or on want of confidence motions or dealing with the estimates, and that a great many party questions which are discussed in the Commons are never brought up in the Senate. It would be perfectly impossible, even if the Senate so desired, for this House to sit as many hours and on as many days as does the Commons. I have heard hon. gentlemen in this House oppose adjournments of the Senate because of the effect such might have upon the country. I am not one of those who entertain that view. While it is the duty of the the Senate to deal fully with all the questions which properly come before it, it at some time should adjourn and allow its members to be useful some where else while there is nothing to do here. Again, there is a misconception in the minds of a great many as to the value of the Senate in dealing with Bills. There are those who believe that the principal function of the Senate is to keep the government in check. I am not one of those who entertain that view. While it is the duty of the Senate to carefully scrutinize all government measures, we should always be slow indeed in touching measures introduced in the branch of parliament directly responsible to the people of Canada. The history of the past has shown that the policy of the Senate has been such, and it is only in a comparatively few instances that this body has acted as a check upon the legislation of the administration of the day. But there is an important function for the Senate apart from that. This is a rapidly growing and developing country, and as it grows and develops, private legislation will increase in a far greater degree. As a consequence, more legislation is coming before parliament now than in former years, and I will give my testimony, as one who has had experience in both Chambers, that the whole trend in the Commons is to great laxity in dealing with private Bill legislation. I say it with regret, but I have been surprised to see the Bills that have come to this House from the Commons since I have had the honour of being a senator. This arises from two or three reasons; one because of the elected body not having the independence at all times that it should have, and also because of the too frequent changes of the members of the Lower House. It is not in the public interest that there should be great changes in the membership of that body. It is a fact that only seven or eight members of the present House of Commons had seats there when I had the honour of first being elected to the Commons. That great change has taken place in 20 years, and it is not in the public interest, as far as legislation is concerned. A member requires a great deal of experience to become a good legislator, and that is one reason why it is desirable to have a Chamber like the Senate where the tenure of office is long. That is one reason why, in my humble opinion, the Senate is better fitted to deal with private Bills than the House of Commons not only because this body has not the same fear of the popular will outside, but because of life tenure of position in the Upper House. My own opinion is that there is no great change desirable in the constitution of the Senate. If I here refer to the speech of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce I am sure he will not object, because he knows, as every one knows, that I am one of his admirers and have been many years one of his followers, and still am in so far as it is proper for a senator to follow any body. He made what I consider a very admirable speech upon this subject. It is clear from the views that he expressed that he thinks some change in the constitution of the Senate is desirable. I shall refer to some of the suggestions he made and criticise them in compliance with his invitation. He desired a full discussion on the subject, and I am sure hon. gentlemen will respond to his wish. He spoke of the election of 48 senators by the provinces and the appointment of the balance by the government. Senators elected by the provinces would be in exactly the same position as United States senators elected by the different states. I suppose they would be subjects for re-election on the termination of the time for which they should be elected, but even supposing they were not, there would be a tremendous pull for election, tremendous intrigue for obtaining the position, and, for many reasons, I think a Chamber so elected would not occupy the same independent position that this Chamber does. While the same proposition is offered by other very eminent men in the country, I for one do not approve of the proposed change. He also mentioned that a very good class of men from whom to select our senators would be ex-judges, ex-premiers and ex-lieutenant governors.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—All the have beens.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—While it is possible that a few of them would not be a disadvantage in this Chamber, I think it would be very undesirable indeed if the Senate were largely composed of such gentlemen, because men do not usually seek the position of lieutenant governor until their usefulness is pretty well gone owing to advancing years. No active man in Canada who is worthy of any such position would take it as a young man. The same remark applies to judges. It generally happens after an eminent lawyer has practised for many years at the bar he retires to the bench, and certainly after he has occupied that position for some years, particularly if he had never had any education so far as legislation is concerned, it would be a great mistake to appoint him to the Senate. Exministers are in a different position, because in the nature of things they must necessarily have had a good deal of legislative education. However, it would depend a good deal upon the age of the exminister whether he should be appointed here. I certainly would not think of appointing such of very advanced years to the Senate. My hon. friend also referred to a considerable draft upon the legal element. I myself am a farmer, but I say without hesitation that I highly approve of that suggestion. I do not care how clever our business men and agriculturists may be, I believe that a reasonable number of well qualified lawyers are a necessity to either Chamber. I most thoroughly approve of that.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Not too many.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—My right hon. friend dealt also with the question of the age limit in perhaps somewhat a cursory way, and said that it might be changed at both ends. An hon. gentleman behind me says that it is true. I certainly do not endorse this statement. I think the age limit at thirty is not too young. I would rather have appointments at the age of thirty, with improving years before them, than coming in at a later period in life. As to the cutting off at the other end, I contend that if the Senate is well constituted, as it generally has been well constituted, the age limit at the other end is not a difficulty at all. It is the case in the Commons, and always will be the case in the Commons, that a comparatively few men do the most important work in that chamber. Proportionately it always will be so in this Chamber, and if an hon. gentleman retains his faculties and has a very considerable number of years experience, I am not one of those who think there are many who become disqualified, because they are somewhat up in years, from giving a well considered and proper vote on every question which arises. In the country there are a great many who think that unless an hon. gentleman makes long speeches in the Commons or long speeches in the Senate, he is not a qualified member of either chamber. I will say from my experience, with the exception of comparatively few men, the long speakers in either body are a detriment to the chamber and to the country, because they prolong the sessions of parliament for no use whatever excepting to gratify their own vanity in so far as their speaking qualities are concerned. I am sure that a great many in the country in coming to conclusions upon the usefulness of the Commons and in coming to a conclusion on the usefulness of this honourable body, believe that the great value of a member of the Commons or of the Senate is that of making speeches. They forget or do not know the fact—and we must forgive them for it, that the important work of the Commons and the important work of the Senate is done in the committee rooms, the proceedings of which never become known to the country, which in fact become known to no one except a few solicitors who attend those committees. The most valuable work is done there and not on the floor of the House at all, and if I were giving advice to a beginner in the House of Commons it would be to devote his closest attention to the practice and study of the principles of legislation and to the work of the committees, and not to think of making long or eloquent speeches. When I say this, I do not depreciate for one moment the force of the capable, well delivered or eloquent speech. I think it is highly pleasing to listen to those who are able to do it, and it is very necessary in many instances that it should be done—but we all know right well that fully one half and more of the time of the House of Commons is devoted to speech making which is of no practical use to the House of Commons or to any one else. That statement certainly cannot be made in regard to the Senate, and it is one of the respects in which our good people outside of the two Houses very greatly misjudge the legislative bodies of this country. My right hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, also referred to the election of members of the Senate by the grouping of counties, and also the question of representation of the minority. As to the representation of the minority, I most certainly approve of such a policy. If any scheme can be evolved whereby the minority shall be fairly represented in the legislative bodies of Canada, I think it would be highly desirable. He also threw out a suggestion of which I approved : It is the case to-day that any Bills can be introduced in this House —excepting of course money Bills—and I consider that it would be very desirable that almost all private legislation should be inaugurated in this House. My hon. friend who sits on my right (Mr. Ferguson) in the very good speech which he delivered to the Senate the other day, did not speak so very approvingly of that portion of my right hon. friend's utterances. My reason for taking this ground is that the first legislative body having to do with a Bill has the greatest opportunity for criticism and a great deal of shaping may be done, before the Bill reaches the other Chamber. As a consequence, it would take very much less time to deal with it there. I think if most of the private legislation were introduced here, it would assign to this body a very good function indeed, and again I say that so far as private legislation is concerned my own experience is that this House is the superior Chamber. I said in beginning that I would detain the Senate but for a short time. I have endeavoured to give, in the short time I have spoken, my views upon this question, and have also endeavoured to criticise as fairly as I can the suggestions made by my right hon. friend. I also listened with very considerable pleasure to the speech of my hon. friend from Marshfield, and I will say this : that I am thoroughly in accord with the conclusion at which he finally arrived. I do not think, in so far as the Senate is concerned, that any great remedy of material value can be made excepting that I do think it desirable, when it can be done, to appoint to the Senate those who have had a previous legislative education. When I say that, I do not reflect for the moment upon the ability of hon. gentlemen who have come here, highly qualified gentlemen—who have not had that advantage ; but I do think it is a decided advantage, and I thoroughly agree with the sentiment expressed by my right hon. friend, and also by the Senator from Marshfield, that it is not in the best interests of the country that the Senate should become lobsided politically as it was some years ago, during the long term of office of Sir John Macdonald, and as it is now becoming under the present government. While it was not a written law at the time of confederation, it was tacitly understood, I believe, that the Senate should be maintained as evenly as possible representing both the political parties in Canada. But there is another opinion which I hold, and perhaps it may appear a little strange that it should come from a strong radical like myself—because I admit I am a very strong radical. I believe that this body is a judicial body, and should be a judicial body. If there is any body in Canada that should be judicial in its nature it is the Senate, and I believe that just as the judges who go on the bench in Canada should lose their political identity, in the same way the hon. gentleman who becomes a senator should, in a very great measure, in so far as his acts here are concerned, lose his political identity. My hon. friend says, hear, hear, and I know that he is a little amused, because he thinks that I am too much of a radical to do anything of the kind myself. My hon. friend beside me says he is mistaken. My humble opinion is that we should have in this parliament two bodies, one elected by the people and directly responsible to the people, and an upper chamber, perfectly independent in its character, which will deal with private Bills and public Bills when brought before it, in a perfectly independent way. If each hon. member could assume that position, it would make no difference whether a gentleman of one political complexion or the other were appointed to the Senate; but I suppose, in the nature of things, it is impossible for hon. gentlemen to such an extent as that to divest themselves of their political identity. That being the case, it is my opinion that some system should be evolved whereby the equilibrium should be maintained in the Senate as nearly as possible, and this is the only important change which I would suggest. I do not know exactly how it could be done, but I firmly believe it should be done. In the nature of things, in a few years, if the present administration continues in office, the Conservative party will practically have disappeared from this Chamber. I think that is an undesirable state of affairs, and I think it is regarded even by the administration as undesirable. I cannot myself make any suggestion by which it might be obviated. My hon. friend from Marshfield suggested the other day that it should be left in some way to the leader of the opposition to make a certain number of nominations. No matter how it may be done, I think it should be done, and, that being accomplished, I do not think you could improve upon this honourable body in so far as its constitutional complexion is concerned. As regards election of senators by the provinces, while I have all respect for the great republic to the south of us; while there is much perhaps which Canada might borrow from it in so far as energy and enterprise in matters of manufacture and commerce, in my humble judgment there is no single element of legislation that Canada should ever borrow from the United States; and I would be no more in favour of having senators elected or appointed by the different provinces, than I would be in favour of electing our judges as is done in the United States. If we have a smaller country, certainly we have a superior country, so far as our legislative and judicial systems are concerned, and so far as the order prevailing in the country generally is concerned; and for that reason let us be very careful how we borrow, unless we can borrow that which is superior to our own.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not intend to interpose in this debate for the purpose of suggesting any radical reforms in the Senate. My object is rather to follow in the line of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, and direct the attention of the House to some of the advantages which we enjoy under our present system. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches which have been delivered upon the subject since the debate commenced and I have read the speeches which were delivered when I was not able to be present, and, although there have been many opinions expressed which have evidently been the result of a great deal of thought, of historic knowledge and research as well as of political experience, and which are worthy of very great consideration, I must admit that, as far as I am concerned, I am not prepared yet at all events, to commit myself to any of the propositions for reform which have so far been submitted to the House. There are some features of this discussion which have impressed me. There has not been throughout the discussion any charge against the Senate, of incompetence or inability to discharge the duties which devolve upon it. On the contrary, the tenor of the speeches which have been delivered, and the facts which have been brought to the attention of the House have been in line of defence of the Senate and a vindication of its character and action in the past. There have been some evils and imperfections pointed out, and some conditions which exist under our present system which it is desirable to change, but I think it is worthy of note in this connection that there has been a rather wide difference of opinion as to the character of the reforms which are needed and also as to the method to be adopted in order to bring them about, and we have further this remarkable fact, that the reforms which have been suggested, I think with very few exceptions, were admitted to be open to some objection. So far, therefore, as my own opinion has been influenced by this discussion, that opinion has been strengthened, that the history of the Senate of Canada in the past has not only justified its existence, but that it has furnished a very strong prima facie case in favour of its continued existence in its present form, and I trust that this discussion will have a similar effect upon public opinion throughout the country. I wish now to say a few words with regard to some of the points which have been raised in this discussion. It has been stated that some change in the Senate is desirable in order to bring it more in touch with the people and more in harmony with public opinion. This is a statement that very often appears in the press throughout the country when the press indulges in criticisms of the Senate, but I think it may be safely stated that, when this statement is made, it is merely an assertion unsustained by proof. I do not think it could be very easily proved that the Senate is not in harmony with public opinion, or that there has ever been a lack of harmony between the judgment of this Senate and the public opinion of the country. The facts which have been brought to light, or which have been referred to by the different speakers in the course of this discussion, seem to me to furnish a very conclusive argument that the judgment of the Senate, as a general rule at all events, has been directly in harmony with the general opinion of the people of this country. We heard in the course of this discussion, from the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, that he had known cases in his own experience in which the Senate had seen fit to defeat measures which had been passed by the House of Commons, and that in doing so they had not only voiced the sound public opinion of the country, but also voiced the honest convictions of the House of Commons itself. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield dealt very fully with this phase of the subject. He reviewed the history of the Senate; he referred to the several measures in detail which had been passed by the House of Commons and afterwards defeated in the Senate, and I think the facts, as he stated them, furnished very clear and convincing evidence that no charge could be brought against the Senate of having differed from the public opinion through the country or that their action could ever have been said to be detrimental to the public interest. Whether that general assertion can be supported or not I feel perfectly safe in asserting that no instance can be found in which the Senate influenced by personal, political or other unworthy motive, has wilfully or arbitrarily obstructed legislation which has been demanded by the people at the polls. And I might add in addition to that, that in all its history it has never in any of the measures with which it has had to deal shown a hostility to or disregard of public opinion of so marked a character as to merit or receive any general public condemnation and these statements are the strongest proofs which we can furnish of the ability of the Senate to correctly gauge the public opinion of the country and the desire of the Senate to act in harmony with it, and form the strongest claim we could establish upon the confidence of the public.

I wish to say a word with regard to the proposition which has been referred to by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, which was referred to by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the hon. member from Marshfield and others in this debate. That is, the objection to our present system that under its operation occasions may and do arise when the great political parties in the country have a very unequal representation in this body. A notable instance is the condition of things which occurred after the elections of 1896, when the present government were returned to the House of Commons with a very considerable majority, and in this Chamber of 81 members the government of the day then found itself opposed by 70 members who had been appointed by the government which preceded them.

These conditions are, in my opinion, exceptional and are not likely to occur again, but while it is, perhaps, desirable that a greater equality of representation between the two political parties should be preserved in the Senate, I do not regard it as of such serious import as some other gentlemen who have expressed their opinions on this subject. No serious consequences followed from the condition of things which existed during the years after the elections of 1896. It is hard to anticipate what may occur in the future. We know that actors on the political stage are usually short lived. New issues will arise, and it is quite possible that present party lines may in the near future be almost obliterated. But, however that may be, I see no reason even if the same conditions recur, that we might not expect the same moderation which was exhibited by the majority in this House during the years after the election of 1896 to be exhibited again by hon. gentlemen opposite when in the course of time the Conservative party may be returned to power. However this may be, I am not prepared at the present time to commit myself to any of the propositions which have been submitted to the House to improve this condition of things. The suggestion of the hon. member from Marshfield, which has been endorsed to a certain extent by the hon. gentleman who has last spoken, that a proportion of the senators should be appointed by each of the political parties, is a very plausible suggestion and appears to be a fair one, and as such should commend itself to our consideration. I fear there will be serious difficulties in putting such a plan into operation. Whether these difficulties can be surmounted or not, I am not in a position to say. This proposition, so far as I am concerned, is an entirely new one. I am not aware that it has ever been suggested before. If it has been, it has escaped my notice and for the present I prefer to express no opinion in regard to it. The suggestions which were offered by the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and by some others who have spoken, including the hon. gentleman who introduced this resolution, all involve the adoption of the elective system. To that I am opposed in any form. I do not believe it is in the interest of good legislation in this country to adopt any elective system in connection with filling vacancies in this Chamber. There are various objections to it. One is the fact that it increases very materially the number of our elections. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce saw this objection, and admitted that it was undesirable that the number of elections in this country should be increased. If the elective system was applied to the Senate as well as to the House of Commons, we would have a general election at least once in every five years for the House of Commons; we should have periodical elections to the Senate, occurring probably every two or three years; we should have the by-elections which would be rendered necessary by vacancies as they occurred in both Houses, and these with the provincial and municipal elections, would, necessarily keep the country in a state of constant turmoil and political excitement. Business would be interfered with, and, to a very large extent, injuriously affected and I do not think that any proposition should be favourably considered looking to a change in the constitution of the Senate which would in any way involve an increase in the number and frequency of our elections.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce suggested a change in the method of election with a view of bringing about an equilization of the two great political parties in this parliament. That proposition is one to which he has evidently given a great deal of thought, and if it will accomplish the object which he has in view, it has a great deal to commend it to our consideration. Whether it will do this or not I am not prepared to say. I am not convinced that it would have the effect which he anticipates. I have rather grave doubts upon the subject, but, in any case, I think it should be confined, if it were adopted, in its application to the House of Commons. Indeed, I understood this to be the desire and the ultimate aim of the hon. gentleman himself. I certainly cannot assent to one proposition he made, that this system should be adopted in the case of the Senate in the way of experiment in the hope that, if it proved successful, it might afterwards be applied to the House of Commons and it did not appear to me that this proposition was entirely consistent with his statement, in the earlier part of his remarks, that it was very undesirable under any circumstances to increase the number of elections in this country. But there are other objections to the elective system besides the increase in the number of elections. The introduction of the elective system in connection with the Senate would certainly have the affect of intensifying party feeling throughout the country, and embittering our election contests. With a body constituted as the Senate is, with a fixed term of office, it would have the further affect of fostering the spoils system with all its demoralizing and corrupting influences. The tendency of adopting the elective system for both Houses of parliament, would, in my opinion, be to divide this whole country into two hostile camps; party lines would be much more sharply drawn than they are at the present time. Men of independent thought and action would be deterred from entering public life; party loyalty would be the first qualification demanded of candidates for either Chamber. Questions of personal character, and personal ability would be given a secondary place, and questions of great national importance would be made subservient to party interests. Our present system may not be perfect, but we can claim for it this advantage; that its tendency is towards independent thought and action. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce informed us that during the period following the election of 1896, the party in power found it inconvenient to have so large a majority of persons opposed to the government sitting in this Chamber. He did not tell us to what extent that inconvenience was felt. Whether it had the effect of preventing any useful legislation from being presented to this House or not we do not know; but I feel I can safely make this statement, that so far as any legislation was presented to the House by the government during those years, it was dealt with in a fair and independent spirit by this Chamber; that the conduct of the majority of this House in dealing with those measures was marked with an independence of political control and a freedom from party influence which has never been attained and which could not be hoped for under any elective system. There is another consideration in this connection; it cannot be assumed that the elective system would furnish any guarantee that the two parties would have a majority at the same time in both Chambers of parliament. On the contrary, to any one who reflects, it must be evident that under any circumstances and under any elective system, occasions will arise when one of the great political parties in the country will have a majority in this House and the other a majority in the House of Commons, and I think this further statement may be made, that it would be possible under any elective system and not improbable, that one of the great political parties in the country, under favourable circumstances, and by a proper combination of powerful interests, might maintain a majority in this House opposed to the majority in the House of Commons for a greater length of time than it possibly can under present conditions; and it must be remembered that for party purposes a small majority is equally effective for the purpose of embarrassing the government, or obstructing legislation as a large one. Our present system has this advantage; it works, so to speak, automatically. The changes in this House after a change of government come with the same certainty that vacancies occur. There is none of the uncertainty which always attends election contests, and they come not only with certainty but with a regularity and rapidity which one would scarcely think credible. The experience of the past has proved this. After 1896, when the Conservative party had a majority in this House of upwards of 60, the changes began, and in six years the parties were reduced to an equality, and in the session of 1903, the government had a majority of seven. These conditions, as I said before, were exceptional, and I doubt if the same conditions will ever occur again. Under ordinary circumstances, with the parties fairly equally divided, the change of political parties in this House would come in a comparatively short time, probably in two or three years; but, in any event, the history of the past proves that even under the exceptional conditions which existed in 1896, no party in this House can retain a majority for any great length of time, scarcely more than the legal life of a single parliament opposed to the majority in the House of Commons.

Suggestions have been offered by some who have addressed the House, that an improvement would be effected in the personnel of the Senate if a portion of the appointments were made by the provincial legislatures. I should be entirely opposed to an innovation of this kind. I do not think the gentlemen who have proposed this change have furnished any very strong arguments in its support. I fail to see any advantages which have been presented to the House as resulting from a change of that nature. I do see very many serious objections to the adoption of such a principle. It would, in the first place,—and it is the most serious objection—have the tendency of introducing Dominion issues in local contests, and of dividing local legislatures on Dominion party lines.

This, in my opinion, would be a very undesirable result. I have always opposed the mixing up of Dominion and local politics. I regret that this evil exists to such an extent under our present system. The practical working out of this interference has often been that the influence of the Dominion representative in any particular constituency is the means of electing the representative for that constituency to the local House ; and, in return the representative in the local house feels bound to use the patronage, and exercise the influence which his position in the legislature gives him, to strengthen the party and to ensure the election of the Dominion representative when the time for the Dominion election comes round. It is very clear to every one that conditions of this kind do not conduce to purity of public life, to honest administration, or to good government in any form. This would be, to some extent, adopting a system very analogous to that adopted in the United States, and would be open to the evils which are attached to that system. I intended to refer to that, but shall not do so further, if the House permit me to read a few sentences from a work which I have in my hand by an American author, Professor Woodburn, of Indiana University, which very clearly voices my own opinions on this point, in fact does so much more concisely and much better than I could myself. Speaking of the American system of appointments to the Senate, this writer says :

> The present method has aroused great opposition and severe criticism. It has been called one of the most corrupting elements in our national political system. Every vote in the Senate is a bone of contention between the national political parties, and these parties, therefore, through their national organizations strive to control various state legislators by whom the senators are elected. This means that parties in the States are made to coincide with parties in the nation ; that legislatures are to be chosen, not with reference to the needs and interests of the state, but with reference to the election of a United States senator ; that the people of the state cannot divide naturally on questions of local interests and importance, but are divided artificially by the greater or more dominant interests of national parties ; that in voting for state legislators we are led, not to vote for the best and most competent men, who would take the best care for the interests of the state, but to vote for the man of certain party allegiance, that he may vote for a senator who will promote the party policy which we wish to see successful in the nation.
> The problems of state government are by no means the same as the problems of the national government, and there is no reason why the two should be mixed as they now are in the election of senators. The legislative candidate who represents the best man for the Senate may be altogether unfit for the office of legislator. The voter cannot vote intelligently when he is compelled to vote on two wholly different sets of questions at the same time, yet that is what every voter is compelled to do when he votes for state legislators to elect United States senators.

That, as I said, expresses very concisely my own opinion on that subject. I have referred to the extent to which these evils exist under our present system. I should very much regret if any system was adopted which would have the tendency of increasing this evil.

There is just one other point to which I wish to refer before resuming my seat, and that is to the effective remedy which we have under our constitution as it is at present, for any of the evils which have been complained of. The character of the complaints which have been made with regard to the Senate as the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce says, are rather vague. We are charged with too long adjournments, with not taking sufficient interest in public matters, and with not introducing new legislation, and a variety of charges of that character. I am not admitting that any of these charges or complaints are justified. But, if they are justified, it does not prove any defect in our constitution ; they are rather chargeable to the respective governments who are responsible for the appointments to this Chamber. If there is anything in the character or ability of the Senate as it is constituted to-day which does not come up to the standard which it should do, it does not argue any defect in the constitution, but rather an error of judgment, or want of discretion on the part of those who are responsible for the appointments. And, as one hon. gentleman in the course of this debate has pointed out, the remedy lies in the hands of the government itself; it lies in the hands of the House of Commons, which is elected by the people, and ultimately, therefore, in the hands of the people themselves. It may be said in reply to this that while this may sound theoretically very well, it does not work out practically the results which we should expect. Even if that were so—and I do not admit it—it is no reason why we should abandon a theory which is sound because those who are charged with putting it in practical operation have not done so in as efficient a manner as they should. If there is to be any reform, the reform should begin with those who are charged with putting into practice this theory of government. And, I repeat, this ultimately places the whole matter in the hands of the people themselves. If the people of the country generally are dissatisfied with the work of the Senate as it is performed to-day, or if they are dissatisfied with the character of the gentlemen who compose this body, they have the remedy in their own hands. They can instruct their representatives to insist that the government of the day in future, shall appoint only men who possess the qualifications which will bring them up to the high standard of what they think a Senate should be. Our present system in my opinion accomplishes, or very nearly accomplishes the results which we theoretically expect it should. The results under our present system are not far different from what hon. gentlemen desire to accomplish by the changes which they propose. I do not intend to enlarge upon this point. It was very fully referred to by the hon. gentleman from Smith's Falls, and I heartily endorse all that he said upon that subject.

There is just this point to which I should like to draw the attention of the House, as one of the advantages of our present system over any that has been proposed; that is, that in the choice of hon. gentlemen to fill vacancies in this Senate, the government have the utmost freedom; there is no limit to their power of selection, except the boundaries of the provinces where the vacancies occur. They are free to select from any of the classes which have been referred to as desirable persons to fill seats in this Chamber, they are free to select from the members of the learned professions, they are free to select those who have distinguished themselves for their literary or scientific attainments, as well as those who have achieved success in business life, or in agricultural or commercial pursuits, and it is the duty of any government in making appointments to the Senate to select only those who, by their attainments and experience have proved themselves well qualified to discharge the duties of the position. In my opinion, the fathers of confederation were wiser in their day and generation than are their critics of more modern times. In the provisions which they placed in our constitution for the appointment of the Senate of Canada they avoided the objectionable feature of the hereditary system, which prevails in England, and they avoided the still more objectionable feature of the elective system which prevails in the United States. In placing the appointment in the hands of the government of the day, they gave them the utmost freedom in making their selections. They are free to select from every class and the representatives of every desirable interest in the country, and the experience of and the history of the Senate in the past, have shown that no party, however large the majority it has in the Senate at any one time, can very long retain that majority, if opposed to the majority in the House of Commons, and, by attaching the life tenure to the position, they have attached to it the strongest possible inducement to preserve independence of thought and action. They have placed the Senate of Canada in a position where they are practically free from the influence of sudden changes in public opinion, which may be very transient in their character. But the Senate responds with absolute certainty to any permanent change in public policy or public sentiment in the country. I do not see that any change in the constitution of the Senate or in the method of appointment can be made with any advantage to this body, and I hope that no changes will be attempted until their necessity, and the advantages which are to result from them are more clearly demonstrated than they have been up to the present time.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY moved the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until three p.m. to-morrow.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Friday, June 15, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

TEMAGAMI, COBALT AND TEMISCAMING RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Standing Orders, presented the twenty-third report of that committee with reference to the petition of B. G. Connolly and others praying to be incorporated as the Temigami, Cobalt and Temiscaming Railway Company. He said: Rule 50 requires the presentation of a map before the Standing Orders Committee in cases of this kind. These parties had no map, but having in view the district in which the railway is proposed to be constructed, we did not consider that the Bill should be held back on that account, therefore, we ask the House for the suspension of the rules in this respect. I move concurrence in the report.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—A question arose the other day as to whether or not the proper procedure was to move in a case of this kind that the rule be suspended. In case there be any question, I would make a special motion with reference to this petition, without such action being taken as creating a precedent until such time as the matter can be looked into.

The SPEAKER—So far as I remember, the rule was formerly that there should be such a motion, but its observance had lapsed because of a different practice growing up.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (21) An Act respecting the Huron and Erie Loan and Savings Company.—(Hon. Mr. McHugh.)

Bill (BB) An Act to incorporate the General Accident Insurance Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Poirier.)

Bill (CC) An Act to incorporate the Chartered Bank of London and Canada.—(Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.)

Bill (60) An Act to incorporate the Inter-Ocean Fire Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

PACIFIC AND EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved the third reading of Bill (N) An Act to incorporate the Pacific and Eastern Railway Company as amended.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I move in amendment that all that portion of clause 7 from the word 'Alberta' in line 8 of said clause, to the end thereof, be struck out.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I hope the House will reject the amendment. It is intended to give a monopoly to another company.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—Before the motion is put, I beg to move in amendment to the amendment that the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be read a third time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is that strictly speaking an amendment? I do not think it is.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not germane to it. The other amendment must be disposed of first, and this one can be taken up afterwards.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I submit the sub-amendment is not germane to the motion which is before the House, and that this amendment will come in more properly after the other one is disposed of.

The SPEAKER—The point is well taken. This cannot form the basis of a sub-amendment. It can come in as an amendment to the main motion when the other amendment is disposed of.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it is to be regretted the hon. gentleman from Wellington did not explain the effect of his amendment, which I take to be this; this company ask to be allowed to build a railway from Victoria, B.C., through the Island of Vancouver, crossing the straits, and running through the Yellow Head Pass to Edmonton, from Edmonton to Prince Albert, and from Prince Albert to Fort Churchill. The amendment which the hon. gentleman proposes is that the company shall not have power to build from Edmonton to Fort Churchill, largely on the ground that other companies which are now at work, have charters covering that ground.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Of course one can understand that this amendment would have the effect of killing the Bill. The project is one to start at Vancouver, go through Edmonton, and pass on to Hudson bay. The exclusion of the portion of it which is provided for in the Bill, by the amendment, would be simply to kill the enterprise altogether, and that I suppose is the object in view. A great deal has been said with reference to this being a paper charter. I may state that I have a telegram from the promoters of the Bill informing me that the railway will be built if the charter is granted. They give me that assurance.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—As I understand it, the amendment moved by the hon. senator from Wellington would have the affect of cutting off that portion of the line which runs from Edmonton to Hudson bay.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am particularly interested in the Hudson Bay road, as the part of the country I live in, Prince Albert, is practically dependent upon the opening and development of the Hudson Bay country. We are located in the northern part of Saskatchewan province and in order to be on a main line of railway we have to get a road built to Hudson bay. Ninety-nine out of one hundred people in our part of the country favour the building of the Hudson Bay road. I should like to see as many Hudson Bay roads built as we can get; still, if the granting of another charter to Hudson bay should in the meantime endanger the project in any way, I would support the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Wellington. This Hudson bay scheme has been before the country for a great many years—over twenty years. A portion of the road to Hudson bay was built at one time—about 40 miles in the province of Manitoba. After it had been built and the steel put on it, the road was not operated. I understand that it has passed into the hands of another syndicate. It has taken concrete shape, and Mackenzie and Mann have undertaken to extend that road to Hudson bay. They have already a large gang of men working on the road between Irwin on their main line and the Churchill river. I understand they will have close on 100 miles of the road completed this year. It is a very difficult matter to finance this proposition, because while people have faith in the prairie part of the Northwest—while they may have absolute confidence that a road going through the wheat fields will pay—it is a question whether a road to Hudson bay will eventually pay or not, and there are not many people who would like to undertake it. Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann have undertaken this work and I think we should not do anything to hamper them in the meantime. I would like to see these people getting their charter, but I think if we give them a charter as far as Edmonton, that ought to be satisfactory for the present. This Bill, it will be seen, provides for a very large mileage. My hon. friend on the other side of the House says he has assurances from the company that this road will be built. I have no doubt of the bona fides of the company; they may be able to build the road; but if you give them a charter for 1,500 miles of road through the Rocky mountains, portions of British Columbia that will keep them busy for a year or two years at least. In the meantime Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann are working towards Hudson bay. Let this company build their road through British Columbia, we shall not interfere with them, and give Mackenzie and Mann a chance to open up the road to the bay. Then if this company shows its bona fides by building a road as far as Edmonton, and they want an extension to a port on Hudson bay, no one will deny them the right to build it, because we want all the roads in there that we can get; but I do not see the object in doing so at the present time, if it is going to endanger the other project. This company could not get to Prince Albert in less than two years. This House will be in session again in November next, and it will be in session next year, and they can rely on getting a charter to Hudson bay after they have completed the road to Edmonton. In the meantime I think it would be wise to accept the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Wellington and leave the road open for Mackenzie and Mann. If you give two or three charters covering the same ground, then the gentlemen who are interested in building the railway when they go to the money markets of the world to get money to put into a new road may have difficulty in financing it. There might be people who would be willing to lend a certain amount of money to build one road to Hudson bay. It would be reasoned that there would probably be traffic enough for one road, but as the season is short and there is navigation for only three or four months, if you grant two or three charters over the same ground it would be very doubtful whether all these propositions could succeed. It would tend to make investors suspicious; therefore I do not think we should do anything to hamper the project, because, as I said before, Mackenzie and Mann are now actually building towards Hudson bay and they should be given a chance.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—The strange part of the hon. gentleman's speech is with regard to the usual complaint about the opposition to Mackenzie and Mann. Now I find that my hon. friend has a Bill exactly on all fours with the measure now before the House. He wants this Bill strangled so that his own may get through. What about his Bill menacing the interests of Mackenzie and Mann? I am sure that the Bill before the House does not interfere in any way with Mackenzie and Mann's project. Their project comes from the east; this line comes from the west, and we are assured by the people of British Columbia that they want to have an outlet from their province to Hudson bay just as well as the people of Manitoba and Northwest Territories. I do not think it is asking too much from the Dominion parliament to allow the people of British Columbia to have some rights to Hudson bay as well as Mackenzie and Mann or the hon. gentleman's Bill marked (Y). He has not pressed his Bill before the committee; he left the other day before the order was called, but I have been waiting to see the course he is going to take with reference to Bill (Y), because if the Bill now before the House is objectionable from the standpoint of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, surely the hon. gentleman's Bill is much so. The hon. gentleman has the idea of getting this Bill withdrawn so that his own Bill may live, and or perhaps somebody else might have a chance to get a paper charter. It has been told around the corridors of the Senate that the gentlemen who are interested in this project are only half-hearted in the matter. It has been stated on more than one occasion to several hon. gentlemen who have spoken to me with regard to the matter, that Sir Henry M. Pellatt did not care for the Bill and simply lent his name to it. Now I am here to say that Sir Henry M. Pellatt has been negotiating in England with reference to the building of this railway, and that is probably the reason why my hon. friend is seeking to oppose it. Sir Henry Pellatt and Mr. Blain, of Toronto, are two men who are well known both in the province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada generally. They are well enough known to make it certain that whatever they undertake to do they will carry through. If this were a paper charter there would not be half the opposition to it, but it is the fear that the railway will be built that causes the opposition. Surely Hudson bay is large enough. We had the other day a discussion with regard to the Yellow Head Pass being only capable of admitting one railway. On the assurance of Sir Sandford Fleming we were told that there was room for 15 railways, without any one of them using the rails of another—perhaps not fifteen at the mouth of the pass, but through the pass generally speaking, there was room for fifteen railways. Any one who has taken the trouble to look at that large sheet of water, of which Canada is very proud, called the Hudson bay, can easily see that railways could be built to there from every part of the Dominion of Canada without interfering with Mackenzie and Mann or any other railway company. If anybody can prove to me that with the development of the great Northwest, the development of British Columbia and our new territories, Hudson bay cannot be served by one railway, I submit that we ought not to oppose this Bill.

The conditions of the country are such, the progress of our west is such, with the rapid development of it, the increased area under cultivation and the increased immigration that has taken place, something like ten per cent more than last year, that encouragement should be given to every railway company which asks for a charter to build to Hudson bay. My hon. friend, as usual, is very much concerned about Mackenzie and Mann. If I understand the Hudson bay charter aright, it is pretty well provided for, and I venture to say without fear of contradiction, that my hon. friend would not be anxious, neither would Mackenzie and Mann be as anxious, to build the road were it not for the subsidy it carries with it. But this railway is not asking for a subsidy or a land grant. Surely when a railway company comes before this House and asks simply to get a charter for the purpose of building a railway, not for the purpose of bartering their charter away, but for the purpose of developing the country, the Senate is the last body to defeat a measure of this kind.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I have listened to the debate with some interest to see whether any fresh points were raised against this Bill that were not raised in the Railway Committee. We have met all the points that have been raised against this Bill today, and I do not think any argument has been advanced which in any way affects the granting of this charter. There is one more charter already granted for a railway to Hudson bay, and if we are to rely on what we hear in the committee, the other company is prepared to go ahead and build this road; so that the argument that the granting of this charter is going to affect the interests of Mackenzie and Mann in the financing of their road is, I think, a falacious one. If there had been no other charter already granted to build a railway to Hudson bay except the one held by Mackenzie and Mann there might be something in the argument for not granting this charter, but inasmuch as there are other charters already granted, I think the granting of this one cannot prejudiciously affect the scheme.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I want to say that I hold no brief for Mackenzie and Mann, for the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Canadian Pacific Railway. I simply wish to take a stand in what I conceive to be the best interests of this country. We know that several charters for the construction of lines to Hudson bay have been granted, not one of which has ever materialized. They have remained a dead letter on the statute-books of the country, and nearly thirty years have passed since the first of these charters was granted. Two lines are now on the way to Hudson bay, one of which is being pushed northward by the Ontario government, and which will very likely reach Hudson bay before many years. Mackenzie and Mann have also started a line and have made very good progress so far. I believe they have the financial strength, the courage and the determination to carry that undertaking through. Any one who has looked over the history of the surveys and explorations in that country must come to the conclusion that the construction of a road there will be an exceedingly expensive undertaking. The construction of the first line will be perhaps fifty per cent more costly than the construction of the second line, if it runs at all close to the first constructed line. We know what enormous expense it will be to get supplies into that wilderness to carry out the undertaking. Mackenzie and Mann no doubt know what they are facing, but those who are about to invest their money in that enterprise will look carefully into the scheme before putting their money into it. I understand that Mr. Mackenzie is going to Europe for the purpose of procuring money to carry out that enterprise. As I said before the committee I now state before the House, every charter that is granted which will conflict with this enterprise in any way tends to retard, to interfere with and seriously cripple his efforts to finance his undertaking. We are all anxious to see a road built to Hudson bay. For my own part I have no very glowing expectation of what will result from the opening up of that route. I am justified in coming to the conclusion, from the reports of explorers, that Hudson strait is not open for steamers more than four months a year and for sailing vessels two months of the year. For steamers they are open from about the first of August until the first of November, and it is quite clear there will be a very serious problem in utilizing that route for the exportation of the surplus products of the Northwest. Possibly wheat may be stored at Fort Churchill, but if so it must be held there until August of the following year. I doubt if in this era of rapid transportation you will get many men to purchase wheat to be stored at Fort Churchill from the fall of the year until the following August. No doubt there is considerable mineral wealth on the shores of Hudson bay, and it is to be hoped that considerable mining enterprise may take place there. It is also believed that a very extensive fishing business may be carried on in those waters. What I advocate is to encourage the construction of the first line to Hudson bay the same as we did when the Canadian Pacific Railway was constructed through the Rocky mountains. Let us pick out the line that is most likely to be constructed and encourage its construction. I do not think we can make any mistake in granting assistance and encouragement to Mackenzie & Mann to carry out their project, not because they are Mackenzie and Mann, but simply because they have shown more life and courage, have done more work and built more roads in Canada than any other company within the last two or three years, not excepting the Grand Trunk Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway. They have made wonderful progress, and I am glad to know that their credit stands high. I believe they will succeed in carrying through their undertaking. Let us give them a chance. I know nothing of the personnel of this other company. I have looked at the names and none of them have been associated hitherto with railway construction. I do not know whether they have the financial strength to carry through a scheme of this kind, but I do not care if they have the Bank of Montreal at their back, we should not interfere with those who are already at work trying to construct a road to Hudson bay. Let us encourage the scheme that is now under way and likely to be carried out. It is our duty to do that, and if it succeeds we will have one road to Hudson bay. I venture to predict if we assume the responsibility, by granting this charter, of preventing the financing of the undertaking which is now in progress, we may seriously regret taking such a false and unfortunate step, because I am satisfied that it will take four or five years to mature the scheme for the construction of the road under the charter that we are now asked to pass before they can do anything, and as my hon. friend from the other side of the House has said, they are asking a charter for 2,500 or 3,000 miles. If they had come here asking for a charter for a smaller project through the Rocky mountains and after carrying out some portion of the work, thereby showing their bona fides, I say it would be reasonable, but they are now asking for a charter that very seriously interferes with an undertaking that is alive and will be carried out. That is the fault I find, and that is the reason why I oppose it. I say that in my humble opinion it is the interests of our country—and I believe every man here is patriotic as well as myself, I do not claim a monopoly of all the patriotism in this Chamber—by no means—I have no doubt every hon. gentleman here is just as patriotic as I am, but perhaps they do not see matters the same as in my humble opinion I see them, I am quite willing to allow them their opinion. I may be mistaken, but I hold very tenaciously to the views I entertain upon this question. I hold no brief for that or any other railway company or any financier or any speculator—none at all. I am actuated by what I believe to be my duty in this matter. I am willing to give this company a chance to mature their scheme, and construct their road on a reasonable scale and, after that is done, if these people come along and say we want a charter to extend our road, I should have no objections, but I do not want by my vote to assume the responsibility of interfering with a project that is now under way, and I believe will be a success if we only let it alone.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I wish to say a word in explanation. My name is appended to the resolution of the hon. gentleman from British Columbia as a seconder. That is simply as a matter of courtesy. I may say that I have not been converted by the arguments of the hon. gentleman from Wellington. I had long ago formed an opinion on this subject. I think no arguments are required about it. The matter is simply in a nut shell. Mackenzie and Mann are building a road to Hudson bay ; they are sound and solid men, and they intend to push their scheme. Another party comes along and wishes to build not exactly on the same track, but in the same direction. These men come before this Senate, and they say 'If you grant this proposed charter you imperil the object which we have in view and which we really intend to carry out, and are in process of carrying out." That is simply the reason I thought I was in honour and duty bound to the Senate to vote accordingly.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I may say that at the inception of this Bill I had some misgivings as to how I should vote upon this question. I am a great admirer of what may be termed our three great transcontinental undertakings. I think it would be very detrimental to the country if anything should be done which would in any way hamper or interfere with the development of these great undertakings. But while that is true, I do not think it is right that Canada should be handed over body and bones to these three great transcontinental roads. The people of the great west seem to desire the construction of the road which is now in question. We in the east perhaps are not so very conversant with or able to determine the full merits of this undertaking. I have endeavoured myself to come to a sound conclusion upon it, and I must confess that I cannot see how, in that very great country, with its broad areas and its great possibilities of production, the granting of this charter can be so detrimental to any other system. It does appear to me that there is far too great an effort put forth, a tremendous effort put forth, to defeat the undertaking which seems to be reasonably brought out, and, as stated by the western members, a road which they strongly desire. As regards this question of capital, and this question of guarantee, I take no stock whatever in that. The railroads of this country are not built by the capital of the gentlemen who engage in the promotion of the road. The people of the various parts of the world subscribe to these undertakings, and each one is constructed in exactly the same way. No individual puts up the capital for building any such road. However, it is always desirable that there should be good names behind the undertaking, and in this instance certainly no objection can be raised to the names. They are just as good names as have ever come before parliament for incorporation, and I think it is absurd to raise the discussions which have been raised on the ground of capital and with reference to individuals. The markets of the world are sought when capital is desired for these undertakings, and the capital generally comes from outside. I would suppose that the gentlemen who have this undertaking in hand are just as able to go to the markets of the world to borrow money to build their road as the promoters of any other railroad.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Before the motion is put to the House, I desire to give my reason for the vote which I shall very likely give. I might say at the outset that the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert really ought to have an idea as to the probabilities of this road being constructed, and as he expressed himself, he is in favour of one or more roads being built. He is not opposed to this road per se, but he is afraid that if we grant a charter to this company we may interfere with a company which is more likely to construct the road than this company is. He is desirous of having this road built. I understood from the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Beamsville that he was not hostile to the construction of roads to Hudson bay. He advocated strongly the construction of the road. But the fear of my hon. friend from Prince Albert was that if you granted a charter to this new company and interfered with Mackenzie and Mann you would interfere with the road they were desirous of building. I doubt if this company has any very strong hopes of going on with the construction of their road. I see, by looking over the Bill, that they have no time within which to commence it, and no time within which they will complete it. There is no limitation to the charter at all. It is a perpetual charter, and what is the object of it ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I beg to call the hon. gentleman's attention to a fact that he has lost sight of that no Bill in its first introduction contains a time limit provision. The Railway Act provides for the time.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—That may be, but I am taking this Bill. If they have five years to commence, according to the Railway Act, the general rule is not to give that length of time.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The hon. gentleman does not want to misstate the matter I am sure. He has not looked at the Railway Act or he would not make such a statement. The law requires that each company shall begin construction within two years, and finish within five years.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Why is this Bill not in accord with the majority of the Bills passed through this House ? My hon. friend from Toronto perhaps knows well why the provision is left out here.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I cannot have that statement go unchallenged. No Bill granting incorporation to a railway company has that time limit, because the Railway Act provides for it.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I have seen the majority of the Bills passed by this parliament and the time limit is fixed in them. The company must commence within a certain period and build the road within a certain period, and, if they do not do so, they forfeit their powers under the Act.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It is never done.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is for a new charter.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—That may or may not be the case. I ask the hon. gentlemen of this House who know these individuals, is there a single railway financier among the whole lot ? There is not a single one of them a railway man, and, therefore, I contend that this scheme is an unreasonable proposition. My hon. friend beside me hands me Bill No. (30) An Act respecting the Kootenay and Arrow Head Railway Company. In that Bill is a limitation when the work is to be commenced and when it is to be ended. I ask my hon. friend from Toronto why he would desire to lead me astray and make me believe that such a limitation is not in accordance with other Bills which have been passed by this House. If it is necessary to limit this charter, Bill (20), why is it not necessary to limit the charter now under discussion ? If it will satisfy the hon. gentleman I will read the clause :

2. Such branch lines shall be commenced within two years and completed within five years after the construction thereof has been authorized by the Governor in Council ; and if such branch lines are not so commenced or are not finished and put in operation within the said periods respectively, the powers of construction conferred upon the said company shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of such branch lines as then remains uncompleted.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—That is not a charter. The hon. gentleman is wrong ; that is an Act amending a charter all ready outstanding, and unless the clause prescribing that time limit were put in, they would not be able to have any time to build.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—No doubt whoever drew the Bill and made the application for the charter before the House, did not understand the railway law as well as my hon. friend from Toronto. Some people have all the knowledge ; others of us may be a little limited in our knowledge, but here we find a Bill going through the House with a provision contrary to the idea that my hon. friend contends is the proper and just form of a Bill. Why didn't he object to that ? Why didn't he say that this provision was useless and should be struck out. Take the position in which this section of country is at present. Attempts have been made for years and years to obtain railway charters for this territory and some have been granted. Here is a company that has gone on year in and year out constructing roads not only in the Northwest but through other portions of the Dominion of Canada, and are now building to Hudson bay. Are we to thwart their energies and tie them up ? Are we to say to them that when they go abroad to find money to finance their road, that we will put them in the position of having to face another charter covering the same territory, and thus prevent them from selling their bonds to advantage ? If we pass this Bill we are going to injure the financing of their bonds in the money markets of the world. Remember the importance of the construction of the road to Hudson bay. True, it is said that Hudson bay is not open for navigation many months of the year. That may be so, but we have at the present time a little appreciation of the vast teeming trade that will flow from the wheat fields of the great Northwest through to the Hudson bay, to be conveyed by water from a port there across the ocean, and the result of this will mean to the general public cheap freights from all that section of the country. If we grant a charter to a company that is merely on paper, a company that never constructed any road, and which is not prepared to do that which Mackenzie and Mann have done, I feel that it would be doing an injustice to Mackenzie and Mann's road and endanger the construction of a road to Hudson bay.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not wish to be understood as taking the course which has been followed by the hon. senator from St. Thomas. I am strongly opposed to people coming here for charters for a speculative purpose. I hear a good many 'hear, hears.' The objection has been raised to this Bill that it is promoted for speculative purposes. An hon. gentleman who favours this Bill says 'no.' Some names have been mentioned in connection with this Bill, but if they are not coming here to procure a charter for speculative purposes, they are travelling in very bad company, because their names are associated with the name of a gentleman who has been engaged in that business and is engaged in it to-day—a gentleman who tries to buy options on charters passed by this parliament for the purpose of speculation. For that reason I am opposed to this Bill. I have no brief for Mackenzie and Mann, but the people of the west are anxious to have a road built to Hudson bay. I do not think the road will ever be built without a subsidy. Any company that would do so would be foolish, because the railway is bound to be an experiment. It may prove a success—I hope so. If it does it will be a great advantage to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, but I do not think any company would undertake to build that line or that parliament would expect any company to do so without being subsidized. A charter for the Hudson bay road has been in existence for ten years. It has carried with it a very large land subsidy during all that time, 6,400 acres per mile in the province of Manitoba and 12,800 acres per mile outside of Manitoba. Notwithstanding that immense subsidy, the line has not been built. True the Canada Northern built a portion of that road some years ago on account of the land grant in the province of Manitoba, and a small subsidy of $80,000 a year for twenty years, and on receiving a guarantee from the province of Manitoba as a road which served colonization purposes as well as a route to Hudson bay. From Erwood for a distance of about 100 miles the Canada Northern has extended its line this year and is receiving a land grant of 12,800 acres per mile. That land grant will lapse in a few days, but it has to be revived if the company is to get it. I do not propose to hold up any charter for the purpose of giving Mackenzie and Mann a monopoly to build that road, but I am in favour of any corporation that comes along getting power to build that line. In the Lower House a Bill has passed which will be before the Senate in a few days—I refer to the Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Bill. That contains a right to build a branch to Hudson bay. I should say the company behind the charter to build a road to Hudson bay will be much more likely to be a stimulant to the Canada Northern to go on and complete its line to Hudson bay in the near future than the charter now before us. For that reason, no argument can be advanced in favour of this Bill as being an incentive to Mackenzie and Mann to build that road, or that it will be built any the sooner by reason of this charter being granted. I should prefer if a motion had been made to refer this Bill back to the committee, because a question has been circulated here as to the genuineness of the names in this Bill. I do not know the financial ability of those gentlemen. I never heard of them in railroad matters, but it does not necessarily follow that because a man is not a railway builder he cannot assist in building a road. It is a question of finance. Every one who hears me will appreciate how easy it is for a schemer who wants a charter from the parliament of Canada to go to gentlemen and allow their names to be attached to his Bill. There is no trouble in that. I have referred to a gentleman as being a charter monger, and for fear that there should be any mistake as to his identity I may say that he is John Thomas Bethune. That gentleman is in the business and represents himself as being 'the sole and only agent of Jim Hill in Ottawa' looking for charters to build roads in the west. I believe Mr. Hill says he has nothing to do with him. That is the gentleman who is promoting this Bill, and if he is on intimate terms with the gentlemen whose names appear in the Bill he can get them to come to Ottawa and show their good faith. I am opposed to this Bill because it is a charter for speculative purposes. The intention is to hold up persons who are endeavouring in good faith to build a road to Hudson bay and to so interfere with their legitimate work as to compel them to give some consideration for their charter. I should prefer to send this Bill back to the Railway Committee for further consideration and allow Sir Henry Pellatt and the other gentlemen whose names are mentioned here to come before the committee and show that this is not simply a charter secured for speculative purposes. Unless the Bill is referred back to committee I shall support the amendment with a view to defeating the measure.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—When my eye first fell upon this Bill, I thought then, and I still think it to be, the most important piece of legislation that has come before the Senate this session. I am not naturally suspicious, because I presume what the law requires me to presume, that everybody and everything is honestly intended; but the title of the Bill aroused my suspicion. 'An Act to incorporate the Pacific and Eastern Railway Company.' I knew where the Pacific was, according to my knowledge of geography, but I did not know where the 'eastern' was. When a railway company comes here for legislation I want to see them come down with something definite. I want to know that their project begins somewhere. This does; but I want to know whether it ends somewhere.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Which it does.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—The heading of this Bill is calculated to lull an unsuspecting person into false security. When I saw the title of the Bill I thought it meant some road for local convenience, leading from the Pacific into British Columbia, but what do I find by the 7th clause of the Bill?

> 7. The company may lay out, construct and operate a railway of the gauge of four feet eight and one-half inches from a point at or near the city of Victoria in the province of British Columbia, thence northerly by the most feasible route to a point at or near the northerly end of Vancouver Island, thence to the mainland to a point at or near Bute Inlet; thence easterly through the district of Cariboo, via the Yellow Head Pass to Edmonton in the province of Alberta; thence easterly to a point at or near Prince Albert in the province of Saskatchewan; thence northeasterly, by the most feasible route, to Fort Churchill on Hudson bay; and also a branch line from Edmonton to Dunvegan on the Peace river.

My suspicions would not have been aroused if it had provided for a railway from the Pacific to Hudson bay. There we would have had a beginning and an end. I do not charge any one with trying to mislead, but it is unfortunate that such a title was given to this Bill. It so happens that I am acquainted with one or two of the names of those who are provisional directors. All I know of any of them is in their favour; that is, as far as being respectable people. I was surprised, I must confess, when I heard the names of Sir Henry Pellatt and Mr. Blain mentioned as incorporators, because I knew their previous life had not been devoted to railway construction, and I felt that before I was called upon to vote upon this question either in committee, or in this House, it would have been a great relief to my mind that either of these gentlemen had appeared before the committee in person and shown that he was interested in the project. But this is an immense proposition. It contemplates building a railway from Victoria, B.C., to the north end of Vancouver island, crossing to the main land, traversing British Columbia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, and thence to Hudson bay, a distance of about 1,800 miles.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Why not ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—Because it involves an expenditure of between seventy-five and one hundred million dollars. Are we to throw a blanket over British Columbia and over Alberta and Saskatchewan up to Hudson bay by a charter of this kind ? For I contend it will be nothing but that. I do not expect that any one of you, perhaps, will be in the slightest degree influenced by what I may say. I am not speaking for that purpose ; I am speaking to call the attention of every member of this House to what is involved in his voting for or against the motion before the House. Not even the surveys could be made in the time specified within which this road is to reach Hudson bay. As I said a few evenings ago, when we were discussing a motion of my hon. friend from Prince Albert of a similar nature, I am as anxious as any man in this House or in the country can be to get to Hudson bay; but I do not want to put an insuperable obstacle in the way of those who are earnestly trying to get there as soon as they possibly can. I feel that by giving a vote in favour of this charter I would be throwing an insuperable difficulty in the way of bona fide railway builders, and I will not do it. I am told that Mackenzie and Mann have one hundred miles of the road already built. That is not what has influenced me. I am told there are other charters granted ; that is not what has influenced me, although people who do things, and not people who say things are the people for me, and the men who are now in the act of building a road to Hudson bay, if this has the effect of impeding their project or thwarting it or hindering them, I say we should not throw an obstacle in their way but wish them a hearty God speed in their venture. I had been in hopes all the time that those who were promoting this charter would be satisfied with something like a reasonable, honest and straightforward compromise ; that they would be content to have the eastern terminus of that new railway at Edmonton. I was willing even to grant them the right to go to Prince Albert ; but it seems nothing will satisfy them but to secure a blanket charter over all that western country from Victoria to Hudson bay. If they build as far as Edmonton, they would show their faith by their works, and they will have enough to do to get to Edmonton for many years to come, much more so to get to Prince Albert ; and until such time as they do so, they should not ask for more. I wish to say that if they build to Edmonton or build to Prince Albert and I am spared so long, there will not be a member of this House who will vote with greater cordiality in favour of giving them the right to extend their road to Hudson bay. I am sorry that I have to differ from some hon. gentlemen in this House, men who know a great deal more about railway construction than I do. I do not profess to be a railway man, but I do profess to be able to appreciate the great, the incalculable importance of bona fide railway construction in this or any other country. If anything has made the Dominion of Canada the proud country it is to-day so that it has become the pride of the British empire and the envy of other peoples, it is largely owing to our railways. Now I hope hon. gentlemen will not vote hastily on this question, and I know they will not. I am utterly opposed to granting this charter in its present shape, I am suspecting nobody of bad faith ; but I cannot believe that this road will ever be built within the time or by the men who were put forward as the people who are at the back of it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—No danger of them.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I was greatly relieved when the hon. gentleman from Lincoln assured me—and anything he says has great weight with me, and I do not doubt his word for one moment—that he had reason to know that Sir Henry Pellatt, was aware of what was going on here. I had a suspicion that most of these gentlemen named as provisional directors were entirely innocent, and had knowledge of this application for the charter, and I shall be surprised if I do not know before many weeks after this session that Mr. Blain and Sir Henry Pellett and two or three others are really in downright earnest ; that they want legislation and that they want to confer upon Canada the great boon that it would be if this railway was built. But let them build it part way, and the best claim they could have on the confidence and support of the Senate would be to come here and say: 'There you said we could not build it. There is a road from Victoria to Edmonton. What are you going to do with us now?' We would say: 'We will let you go to Prince Albert and to where you ultimately desire to go, Hudson bay, and God speed your work, but I consider this a very serious piece of legislation, and, as at present advised, I am utterly opposed to granting this charter in its entirety.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH—Before the motion is put, I desire to give, in as brief a manner as posible, the reasons which prompted me to oppose this Bill. I considered from the start that the Bill was somewhat of a speculative character. I believe this parliament should bend its energies as much as possible to encourage whatever company or corporation was most likely to construct a road to Hudson bay. As the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie said a few moments ago, a Bill has passed the other House, and is coming over here, known as the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill, asking to build a road to Hudson bay. The Canadian Northern is a corporation that we know of that are railway builders. It does not look much like a business proposition when men come here asking us to pass a Bill to cover a stretch of country such as the one that is covered by this charter; men who never had the experience of building a mile of railroad. I fear very much that the granting of legislation of that kind is going to be detrimental to the construction of roads by corporations that have been known as railway builders in Canada. It is very seldom that I can see eye to eye with the Canadian Northern Railway Company, perhaps not always with the Grand Trunk Pacific, but I take the stand that whatever corporation I believe is going to carry out in a legitimate way the legislation they are looking for in this House, that I think is beneficial to this country, is the corporation that is going to have my support, and I am going to condemn by my vote anything that I believe is of a speculative character, and giving of charters for roads to men who are not going to construct them, but look round to see where they can place obstacles in the way of corporations that are going to carry them out legitimately. It is a hazardous road to build; it is one that is problematical as regards the business that will accrue to it when it is built. I think the energies of this parliament should be directed to encourage the parties who are most likely to build a road in there at the earliest possible moment. The Canadian Northern—who have built some hundreds of miles nearer to Hudson bay than any other corporation has done—give us their assurance that they are going on to the Hudson bay with the construction of that road that they are building now. I am not one who is going to place difficulty in the way of financing the scheme when they are proceeding to accomplish it. Sufficient rivalry will be had from the Grand Trunk Pacific to insure the country of the best services from them. For these reasons I am opposing the Bill now before us.

Hon. Mr. JONES—I should like to say two or three words with reference to this question before the vote is taken, particularly in reference to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, who said that the people of Canada did not put their money into railways but that it came from abroad. It appears to me that if any country in the world has put its own money into railways it is peculiarly so of Canada. Whose money built the Canadian Pacific Railway? Where was the capital that built it? I think every hon. gentleman in this House would agree with me in the statement that, practically speaking, the people of Canada built that road. Who is building the Grand Trunk Pacific? The people of Canada largely are building it by their money and guarantees. Take the roads of the various provinces, and the subsidies that have been given by the Dominion parliament and the provinces to the various railroads in Canada and point me out a railway system in Canada of any considerable extent that has not been built with our own money and land grants and guarantees. The International Railway was entirely built by the people of Canada. I am one of those who probably have less faith in the immediate building of a railway to Hudson bay than many of the hon. gentlemen in this House. I do not believe personally that the Canadian Northern or any other railway company will build this railway that we are discussing, or that any other company will build a railway to Hudson bay in the near future without a very large subsidy from the people of Canada. I do not believe that the people of Canada as a whole are satisfied that for the present it is the best direction to build a railway for the carrying out of the products of western Canada. The legislation of two years ago would indicate that the people of Canada as a whole believe that great trunk lines east and west would be in the best interests of Canada, and so the credit of Canada has been pledged very largely for the construction and the guarantee of an additional transcontinental railway. I am one of those who would like to see that road built, and largely successful before the branch lines are built, taking the traffic either north or south from the trunk system until its success was assured. I would be glad in the near future to consider the further strengthening of the trunk lines east and west, and connecting what may be called the Canadian Northern system east of the lakes and the Canadian Northern system west of the lakes through that part of Canada that is found difficult for railway construction, and in the meantime not affording any considerable traffic. That would be the direction in which it appears to me the people of Canada could afford to put their money, which they might reasonably look forward to be in the best interests of the future of the Dominion. When the time comes that the trunk lines constructed and being constructed east and west are unable to handle successfully the traffic from the west, or vice versa, then we will possibly know more about the Hudson bay problem than we do now. The question of building a line to the Hudson bay was a very live question in western Canada 25 years ago. Probably no railway scheme that came up in the local House in the province of Manitoba was so keenly debated and so anxiously discussed by the people there as this one. Substantially it is little further advanced to-day than it was 25 years ago. It is true that the Canadian Northern system has reached materially nearer, but that is the fact because it affords feeders to its main system, and the traffic over the system that is reaching to Erwood and from there to Prince Albert, and the traffic over the branch now being built from Erwood to the Saskatchewan river at Pas will be a feeder of the present trunk line. I do not anticipate that the balance of the road from there to Hudson bay, shorter as it would be than any other line, and in the right direction, as far as is known, for a continuation to Hudson bay, will be built in the near future, unless the parliament of Canada grant very large subsidies for that purpose. I must confess that I have been a good deal in doubt as to what I should do with reference to my vote in connection with this question. I have no wish to prevent railways being built; it would be my wish to see that they were built as far as they are required. Whether the duplicating of charters over practically the same section of country is the best way to bring that about or not, I am in doubt. My own personal view is that the parliament of Canada should not have in the past granted, and should not in the future grant a charter to any company unless they had first ascertained that the route laid out to be covered by the charter was one that would be in the interests of Canada, and unless they had such assurances as would leave no doubt that the road would be built, and then, having granted such a charter, they should not grant other charters blanketing the same section of country. I believe it has been the rule for many years in Great Britain that no charter goes though the British House unless the government take the responsibility of seeing practically that that projected railway line covers a section of country through which it would be in the interests of Great Britain that a line should be built, and that the people asking for the charter have given such assurances as would warrant the belief that the road would be built if the charter were given. We did not begin that way in Canada. Probably it would not be practicable, because of what we have already done in the way of legislation, to begin that course now; but it does appeal to me that in the great stretch of country such as Canada has, where there are such enormous dis tricts without railway facilities, the parliament of Canada, if they could now see their way to do so, should refuse to grant charters except in such directions as would not be duplicating existing lines and adding railways where they are unnecessary, because railways must be made self-sustaining after they are built. In the southern portion of the province of Ontario it is well known to many hon. members here that we have a duplication of roads which were quite unnecessary in the interests of Canada and in the interests of the province of Ontario. If the legislation in past years had been such as would have forced railway companies to give running powers one to another over their respective systems, enormous expenditures would have been saved to the people of Canada and lower freight and passenger rates would be sufficient now to make these roads pay, where unnecessarily duplicated systems have to be maintained. The hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, who has opposed the Bill, I had hoped would give some explanation of the Bill which is to come a little later, of which he himself is a promoter, because to be consistent he should have indicated to the House what his position would be with reference to that Bill and explained how it would be possible for a senator to advocate one charter called Bill (Y), over the country from Prince Albert to Hudson bay while he opposed another called Bill (N), over the same section of the country.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I will give an explanation if the hon. gentleman will allow me. This point has already been brought up by the hon. gentleman from Beamsville and it may as well be settled now. I am not going to make a speech. The Bill which stands in my name is promoted by the city of Prince Albert, because there is a lot of fine land on the north side of the Saskatchewan river which they want to see developed, and they have asked for a charter to Hudson bay. However, if in the judgment of the House it would be better to cut it off at the Pas, I am quite willing to agree to that, and I believe that the people behind the Bill will be agreeable also; but if there is going to be free trade in railways in future I hope it will go through in full.

Hon. Mr. JONES—I do not think the hon. gentleman has answered the question. He says if the House vote for the amendment and agree to the cutting off of the Hudson bay end of this road he would be content to have his road cut off in the same way. He knows perfectly well if the House does not adopt the amendment it will be cut off in that way, but what is his position personally with reference to the charter? That was the question I had hoped he was going to answer, but which I did not think he did answer, at least not to my satisfaction. There is one other question with reference to this charter, and that is as to the gentlemen who have made the application. I am bound to say to the House that I have been influenced somewhat in my judgment on this Bill because some of the names which appear as applicants are those of gentlemen who have already dealt in charters, and when they come asking the House for additional charters it naturally makes one wonder what is going to happen hereafter. I have been advised that in at least one case the name appearing is what might be termed a charter monger or charter seller, or whatever term may be applied, and that one or two charters at least have been traded in by him before. It may not follow that it is their intention to do so in this case. I do not say that it is.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Is that quite correct? Is it not that he was buying a charter? Is it not that he was a charter buyer?

Hon. Mr. JONES—I had especially in mind that he was a charter seller for about $30,000. I do not refer to either of the two Toronto gentlemen whose names are on the Bill. Their names stand for what is best in the interests of Canada so far as I know; but these are matters which one naturally has to consider. The other difficulty I find is this: It has been stated by several speakers that there are already a number of charters granted practically over the same route for which this charter is being asked. Some hon. gentlemen who have spoken have indicated that it would be a very serious matter to the Canadian Northern system—they spoke of that because that is more nearly in the Hudson bay direction than any other, and that is the sense in which I speak of it—if this charter were granted, because it would interfere largely with the financial arrangements for the construction of the Hudson bay road. I am not going for or against this Bill on that score. I do not believe that one more paper charter added to the number will make any material difference to any bona fide arrangements which may come up in the near future. I am bound to say that I do not believe that this road would be built in the near future, not a mile of it, not a foot of it, in so far as Hudson bay is concerned, and I am not objecting to the Bill for that reason. Whether that portion of the road in British Columbia and in the west is necessary and may be built or not I do not know. I would regret if by my vote I prevented any road being built which would have been built if this charter had gone through, and I sympathize, therefore, with the resolution of the hon. gentleman from Wellington that that portion of the charter leading well up into the prairie country of northwestern Canada should be given to the promoters and that we should see what takes place within the next two, three or four years, and be as helpful to the company hereafter as it is possible or necessary to do, if they are successful in going on with their enterprise.

The Senate divided on the amendment which was rejected on the following vote:

Hon. Mr. JONES.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto), moved that the following be added as clause 4:

Clause 4. Whenever, in the opinion of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, owing to the configuration of any portion of the country through which the company's line of railway passes, it is impracticable or unduly expensive to build more than one line of railway through that portion of country, the provisions of section 137 of the Railway Act, 1903, shall apply as regards the company and any other company authorized to construct a line of railway through that portion of country; but nothing in this section of this Act shall be deemed to limit or restrain in any way the application of the said section 137.

He said: It will be within the memory of hon. gentlemen that when giving notice of this amendment I stated that this clause had been in fact agreed to in committee, and it was understood that it was to go into the Bill, but no minute was made of it and so it did not appear in the report.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The House should certainly have some time to consider this clause as well as other matters connected with the Bill. I therefore move that the third reading of the Bill be postponed until Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It is the standard clause which has been put in every other Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Why was that not done in committee?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Because of a misunderstanding as to what the committee had in fact done.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Now that we have had so many amendments and such a discussion over the amendments proposed by the hon. senator from Wellington, I agree that it would be only a right and proper thing to send the Bill back to committee in order that it might be carefully considered.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The amendment results from an amendment proposed by the hon. Secretary of State to a Bill which went through the House some days ago. The Railway Committee appointed a subcommittee, who prepared this clause to meet the case. It arises in connection with all the transcontinental railways, and all railways running through British Columbia. Proper self-respect renders it necessary that the clause should be inserted in this Bill.

I voted for the last amendment which was defeated, and I am not, on the whole, in favour of this charter ; but we ought to be prepared to accept the decision of the majority. A substantial majority has decided that this Bill should pass, and I do not believe in jockying. The right thing is to give the Bill fair play. It can go down to the House of Commons now with some chances of being considered before prorogation, and that is the fair thing to do.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Seeing that this Bill has come before the House in the manner it has, and that different amendments have been moved at various times, I am sure that while my hon. friend who had charge of the Bill may have a grasp of all the different amendments, there are others who, perhaps, have not. I made the statement before that I think it would be wise to have this Bill go back to the committee to be reconsidered. There is more in the Bill that needs reconsideration.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I rise to a point of order. The question has been put from the Chair for third reading and although the Speaker has not declared it carried it is impossible now to move an amendment. The hon. gentleman has lost his right.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to another point of order. An amendment cannot be moved to a private Bill at the third reading without notice. I do not understand that any notice of this amendment has been given. The motion is therefore out of order.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I do not understand that the third reading of this Bill has been carried. I am quite in order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman cannot move an amendment without notice.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I am going to move that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be read the third time this day three months, and I ask for the Speaker's ruling.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It cannot be done.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Seeing that we cannot have this Bill back to the Railway Committee for reconsideration of the different clauses, I should like to say a few words on the Bill itself.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman cannot discuss the principle of the Bill now.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have a perfect right to show why I move the three months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. One of the rules which is always insisted upon in this House, and which is perfectly clear in our book of rules, is that no substantial amendment can be moved to a private Bill at the third reading unless notice has been given. There can be no more substantial amendment that the motion that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be read the third time this day three months, and the hon. gentleman cannot move that amendment without giving notice. He has given no notice and he is out of court. If a majority of hon. gentlemen in this House agree with the hon. gentleman they can vote against the third reading and kill the Bill in that way.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think my hon. friend is within his right in moving the three months' hoist and giving the reasons why he thinks the measure should not be read a third time now. In other words, he may give reasons why he thinks the Bill should be thrown out. There are no rules to prevent that. We are governed entirely by the rules, and the rules specify that we have a right, on the motion for third reading, to move the three months' or six months' hoist as we desire to do.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman need not move any amendment. He only need to divide the House on the motion for the third reading and effect his object just as well.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I should think, when I move that this Bill be not now read a third time but that it be read a third time this day six months, that I have a perfect right to give my reasons for making that motion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I insist on the point of order. The hon. gentleman cannot make the motion.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I want a ruling.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman may speak to the motion for the third reading without moving an amendment.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I can speak to the third reading ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Then I will speak to the third reading of the Bill. I do not wish to trespass on the time of the House, but I will have to make some extended remarks with reference to this Bill : I might say I opposed this Bill when it came before the committee because it contained clauses that I did not think should have been incorporated in any railway Bill.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has already spoken on the third reading of the Bill ; and I ask the ruling of the Speaker whether he can speak a second time on the motion ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman spoke to the amendment moved by the hon. gentleman from Wellington, which has been voted down.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The point of order is not well taken. Any hon. gentlement has a right to speak to any motion.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Not twice.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The hon. gentleman merely spoke to the amendment moved to the Bill by the hon. gentleman from Wellington and it was not upon the third reading of the Bill at all. Therefore, the point of order is not well taken.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER—The hon. gentleman has a right to speak on the motion.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Before proceeding with my remarks on this motion I wish to answer a few of the statements made by the hon. gentleman from Lincoln with reference to this measure. I am opposed to the Bill, and I desire to put on record my reasons for opposing it. My hon. friend from Beamsville, when replying to anything I say, usually misrepresents me, and he misrepresented me in this case. When I was speaking to this Bill I did not oppose the whole principle of it. I said that I thought if these people were to get a charter to build as far as Edmonton, which would give them close to 2,000 miles, that they might very well wait for a year or two before obtaining a charter from Edmonton to Hudson bay, and in the meantime it would give the other company who had undertaken the work a chance to finance their road to Hudson bay and to complete it. The first clause of the Bill reads as follows :

Whereas a petition has been presented praying that it be enacted as hereafter set forth, and it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petition : Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows :—

1. Sir Henry Mill Pellat, of the city of Toronto, in the province of Ontario, knight ; Benjamin F. Pearson, of the city of Halifax, in the province of Nova Scotia, manufacturer ; John Thomas Bethune, of the city of Ottawa, in the province of Ontario, financial agent ; Hugh Blain, of the city of Toronto aforesaid, wholesale merchant ; and Emmanuel Tassé, of the city of Ottawa aforesaid, journalist, together with such persons as become shareholders in the company, are hereby incorporated under the name of 'The Pacific and Eastern Railway Company,' hereinafter called 'the company.'

With reference to the gentlemen asking for incorporation here, I will not take such strong grounds as some hon. gentlemen have taken who spoke of this matter. I believe they are all worthy gentlemen. Mr. Pellatt is a man who has lived a long time in this country, and if he undertook to float the proposition perhaps he would be successful. I do not know very much about Mr. Benjamin F. Pearson, of the city of Halifax, in the province of Nova Scotia. The information I have received is that he has not done very much in railway building and would not be likely to carry a proposition of this kind to a successful completion. Mr. John T. Bethune, of the city of Ottawa, is a well know financial agent, and I think he perhaps could do a great deal towards floating a scheme of this kind if he undertook it. I believe he has connections which would enable him to assist in such an undertaking. I do not agree with some hon. gentleman who spoke about Mr. Bethune this afternoon. I believe he has the right to deal in the matters referred to—anything that passes from hand to hand. With reference to Mr. Blain, I know that he is a very worthy gentleman, a man of some substance, in the city of Toronto, but I venture to say that Mr. Blain knows more about granulated sugar and canned goods than he does about steel rails, ties or fish plates, because I have not learned that he has ever been a railway contractor. Last, but not least, in this list of gentlemen who are asking for a charter to build about 3,000 miles of railway, I find Emmanuel Tasse, of the city of Ottawa, journalist. I have never heard of Mr. Tasse being connected with any large railway enterprise in this country. Perhaps he is, but I have never heard that he was connected with railways or any other public works. Now we find these four gentlemen coming to this House and asking for what ?

Clauses 2 and 3 read as follows :

2. The persons named in section 1 of this Act are hereby constituted provisional directors of the company.

3. The capital of the company shall be twenty-five millions of dollars. No one call theron shall exceed ten per cent on the shares subscribed.

With reference to the capital, could any body undertake to build a railroad from where these gentlemen propose to start on the Pacific coast through the rockies of British Columbia with this capital ? Every one knows what it costs to construct a road from British Columbia through the rockies, through mountains and tunnels, and this company ask for a capitalization of $25,000,000. When they come to the Yellow Head Pass, they are undertaking to build a road across a quarter of the continent to Hudson bay. If the Canadian Pacific Railway had undertaken to build their road with $25,000,000, where would they have been ? We gave them $25,000,000 in good hard cash, together with 25,000,000 acres of land, and then they had all they could do to float their proposition. Yet this company present us with a proposition: 'Give us the right to start this road for $25,000,000 ; we are going to build 3,000 miles of road with expensive bridges costing two or three hundred thousand dollars a piece.'

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Did the hon. gentleman say three thousand miles ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It would amount to more than that, I think, if it was calculated up. It is very easy to come to the Railway Committee and hang up a map and draw a blue line across the map and say : 'We intend to start at one point and go to another' ; but when you come to put your engineers on the road and go over that road you may find it is impossible for you to define a road that you can follow in the straight line that has been made across the map. If you take a scale of the map it might show that the route was only a thousand miles long, but when you come to put the engineers in the field you may find you would have over 2,000 miles to travel before you could accomplish your object. These gentlemen would have to build three thousand miles through a mountainous country, with tunnels and expensive bridges, and right of way to purchase to the Hudson bay, and when you get within a hundred miles of Hudson bay you come to muskeg and swamp where it would cost hundreds of thousands of dollars to construct. So that $25,000,000 would be a very limited capital to start the company with. If these gentlemen were bona fide railway men and felt that they were going to carry the project to a successful issue, they would never submit a proposition of this sort. I undertake to say that the road will probably cost $200,000,000. Look at our Transcontinental Railway from Moncton, N.B., to Winnipeg, which is not nearly as long as this proposed road, yet it is going to cost this county something like $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 before it is completed, and it is not as difficult a road to build as the one now under discussion.

If the Dominion government could not build a road from Moncton to Winnipeg, through a comparatively level country, for less than that enormous sum of money, how do these gentlemen expect to build a great mileage of road through a rougher country, where the cost of construction will be twice as great, for the sum of $25,000,000? It goes to show that these gentlemen do not know what they are undertaking. If they understood railway building thoroughly they would ask for a capital of $100,000,000 and a right to issue bonds for an equal amount. Clause 7 of this Bill provides that the company may construct and operate a railway from a point at or near the city of Victoria, B.C., northerly on the most feasible route from a point at or near the northerly end of Vancouver island. Now, that is a form of clause which you find in a great many Bills, more particularly Bills promoted by gentlemen who are not railway builders. They ask for power to build by the most feasible route. It shows that they have a very good idea of the country they are going through. They might have to build in a circle, or wind through the hills like a snake. They ask for power to take any route they like, whether they interfere with other roads or not. It will be found, if you look at the map, that they are asking for power to build over 2,000 miles of road. They ask for power to build easterly to a point at or near Prince Albert. If they were going to build a railway from Edmonton to the city of Prince Albert, I would be very much pleased to support the measure, but we should not give them too much at once. We might give them 500 miles this year, and I fancy they would be able to float that scheme much easier than a line of 3,000 miles. It is an enormous undertaking to build 3,000 miles of railroad through a mountainous country. Even a gentleman like Sir Henry Pellatt would find it difficult to float such a scheme in England. Financiers would not be inclined to take it up. They would first send out their engineers to investigate this proposition. It would take a body of engineers close on two years to make a thorough examination of the country.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It would be all right if it took three years.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—My hon. friend says perhaps it would take three years to examine the route. If that is the case I do not see what injury this company is going to sustain if we ask them to come back later, and go ahead in the meantime with what they have. I take my hon. friend's word for it that it would take three years to examine the country through which this road is to run. If that is the fact, how long would it take to examine the portion from Edmonton to Hudson bay ? It runs through a tract of country where perhaps a white man has never been. If it took three years to examine that portion of the proposed line in the province of British Columbia we might safely assume that two years would be required to examine that portion of the road leading from Edmonton to Fort Churchill. That would make five years. Even supposing these gentlemen concluded all their arrangements this year and went to the old country and submitted their proposition in the money markets there, the next thing would be the financiers would say: 'This is a big proposition, 3,000 miles of road through a mountainous country, we will have to send our engineers to examine it.' After the engineers came here we would find that five years must elapse before a dollar could be got to put into the road, and all that we were asking a while ago was that one small end of it should be cut off, which would really enable these gentlemen, as I think, and as many other hon. members think, more easily to finance their scheme by not undertaking too much at once. That is one of the reasons why we should not allow the Bill to go through in its present form. I would like very much to see a road built from Edmonton to Prince Albert, but there is a portion of road between these two places on the North Saskatchewan river which we are now trying to get the Dominion government to assist. The passing of this charter is going to interfere with that, because you are granting a charter through country which is tributary to this road. There are a large number of settlers in there; there is plenty of lumber there as well as fish, and the minerals are being opened up. The country is being gradually developed and we want that railway built.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—This other line will do for you.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—If I saw any prospects of this line being built in the near future I would be quite satisfied, but it would be cold comfort to the settlers in my district along this proposed line of railway, people around Shelbrook and that vicinity, to say to them : 'You will get a railway by and by when this company has floated a 3,000 mile scheme in the English market ; when they have built 3,000 miles of railway with a capital of $25,000,000, then you will have a railway. In the meantime you can carry your wheat to market on your back.' If the hon. gentleman told the settlers there a story like that, I am afraid he would find they would not be prepared to listen to him. The lot of the settler in that new country is not a bed of roses. When a man goes into a new country where there is no railway communication he has to bridge creeks, drain swamps and fix up roads in order to get in and out, and it is nothing but human nature that the man should look forward to the time when he would see a locomotive passing with a train of cars to carry his produce to market.

Hon. gentlemen talk about freight rates. A farmer living thirty or forty miles from the railway station, finds that it costs him more to get his wheat to the railway than it would cost a man living near the railway station to send his wheat down to an ocean port. The settler at a distance from existing lines of railway deserves to be looked after. If it costs the farmer living along the line of railway 25 cents to have a bushel of wheat carried to the sea-board, it will cost nearly 50 cents to the man living forty miles away from the railway, so that these people cannot farm to advantage, and cannot make any money until such time as railway facilities are afforded. Does any hon. gentleman think that by agreeing to a proposition of this kind we are going to assist the farmer? If the farmers could carry their grain out by railway charters they would be the happiest people in the world, because there is scarcely a mile of Alberta or Saskatchewan which is not covered by a charter. If the farmers could haul their produce on the railway charters we would have no discussion in this House, we would be better served then than they are in the province of Ontario or in Nova Scotia or Quebec. If any hon. gentleman will refer to the statutes of Canada he can easily satisfy himself of the large number of railway charters granted in that country; because it is a country of great possibilities every district wants a railway. If I thought that agreeing to this proposition was going to help the settler I would be one of the first to vote for it, but I do not look at it in that light. The more charters you grant the harder it is to finance a road. That is an established fact, notwithstanding what some hon. gentlemen have said. Mackenzie and Mann, when they came to the boundary of the province of Manitoba on the direct route of Hudson bay, were induced to build to Prince Albert in order to give railway communication to the people living in the Carrot River valley. If they had not been induced by the government and by parties from the west to build this branch they, perhaps, would have been at Hudson bay by this time. That goes to show that they are trying to give railway communication to the settlers. They were several years in building that railway to Prince Albert, and the Dominion government had to assist them by a guarantee of bonds. I have already pointed out that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann are building from Erwood towards Hudson bay. That is a distance of about 500 or 600 miles; but it has been pointed out by, I think, the hon. gentleman from Wellington, that Mackenzie and Mann are nearer Hudson bay by some 300 miles than any other corporation in the country at the present time, and they are actually going on with the work of construction. Their main line runs to Battleford, and there will be a branch to Prince Albert and connecting with Erwood. I look to see this accomplished next year, and then the people of that section will get some relief; but to pass this proposition will not assist them in the least. If we do not pass it, the promoters will suffer no harm; that is to say, if we leave out the permission to build from Edmonton to Hudson bay. If they come here next November and show that they have sufficient capital to go on with the work, and give us a little more information about the topography of the country, this House will be more inclined to consider their proposition than it is at the present time.

We find that clause 8 of the Bill provides in part:

> 8. The company may, in connection with its undertaking and for the purpose of its railway business—
> (a) Construct, acquire and navigate steam and other vessels for the convenience of passengers, goods and merchandise and construct, acquire, lease and dispose of wharfs, docks, elevators, warehouses, offices and other structures to be used to facilitate the carrying on of business in connection therewith;

Not satisfied with building 3,000 miles of railway through a mountainous country, they are going to put on a line of steamers with this same capital of $25,000,000. A line of steamers running, we don't know where, to all parts of the world, and they are going to build elevators and wharfs as well. I think by the time they get through building 3,000 miles of railway through British Columbia to Hudson bay there will be very little money left with which to build wharfs, piers, breakwaters, and elevators, and I don't think there would be very much left to build steamships.

There is no doubt these gentlemen might be able to bond the road, but we do not give them power to bond it for enough to construct it. My hon. friend from British Columbia has not told me how they propose, with $25,000,000, to build steamships, piers, elevators, breakwaters and all that they are asking powers to build. One steamship of the character that would be necessary for successful navigation to Hudson bay would cost over $1,000,000. The traffic of all western Canada must be considered, and probably traffic from a large part of the United States, because Mr. Hill says there is no doubt that a large part of the trade of the Northwest States will be carried out by the Hudson bay route. I believe it will, and if you are to get all that trade, 15 or 20 ocean steamers will be needed, apart from the wharfs, elevators, docks, and other constructions, incidental to the traffic. I could understand how Mackenzie and Mann, or the Grand Trunk Pacific, or the Canadian Pacific Railway, with their great experience and transportation facilities, could do this work cheaper than a new company. Before this company is properly organized, one-third of its capital will be gone, and where is the rest of the money to come from. No doubt the Dominion government will be asked to expend money in surveying the waters of Hudson bay and lighting the strait. Bear in mind the strait must be properly lighted if the navigation there is to be successful, and that will cost a large amount of money. Is the Dominion government prepared to spend such an amount of money for the lighting of Hudson strait ?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—There is plenty of money.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Yes, but the government is not so generous as to vote it for propositions of that kind. I am glad there is plenty of money; it shows that the country is prosperous. Does the hon. gentlemen suggest that $25,000,000 would do all the work these gentlemen propose to undertake under this Bill ?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—It would make a good start.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I will admit that.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—They can get more money as they want it.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—But they cannot issue stock for more than the law authorizes. They would have to come back to parliament for increased capital and bonding powers, and, if they have to come back at all, why not let them build as far as Edmonton and then the following year get power to go to Hudson bay ? There is a feature of this Bill which only now strikes me. They ask for power to 'construct, acquire, lease and dispose of wharfs.' Not satisfied with the powers of common carriers, they ask for powers to go into the construction of wharfs and other erections, with a view to disposing of them. Who is likely to buy wharfs on Hudson bay ? Surely the Esquimalt or the Huskies Indians there are not likely to be purchasers. Under the powers they ask for in clause H they can go into any undertaking they like. They can enter into competition with carpenters, stonemasons and other builders. The clause is wide enough to cover all that. It is reasonable to give them power to build elevators and wharfs, if they need them for the purpose of their business, but it is not a fair proposition that we should give them power to go into building hotels, theatres, or anything they like. It would be unjust to the small contractor, who would be driven out of business by such unfair competition. Therefore I say it is a vicious principle to allow railway corporations to act as ordinary contractors.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to know from the hon. Secretary of State, whether it is his intention to have the House sit this evening or not ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, the House must go through the order paper at this stage of the session.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Perhaps it would be convenient if the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert would give way, and allow the rest of the orders go through and let the debate be postponed.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I thought perhaps most of the senators had heard the hon. gentleman as long as they wished to hear him this afternoon, and might be disposed to proceed with the business on the order paper.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have no objection to adjourning the discussion to some future time.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I was merely asking the hon. gentleman to suit the convenience of other members.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Would the hon. gentlemen let the other business go through ?

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—Yes, if this Bill is postponed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My suggestion is that the other orders be allowed to go through, except any that may be seriously opposed, and then this debate can be taken up immediately after.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I have no objection.

The order was postponed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (175) An Act to amend the Customs Tariff, 1897. He said: At the present time the machinery for beet root sugar and for alluvial gold mining are on the free list, and the object of the first two paragraphs is to continue the importation of such machinery free. Then the third clause provides that rails that are sent out of Canada to be rerolled shall be admitted back to Canada, the owners paying duty on the value that has been given to the article by rerolling.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

ROCKY MOUNTAINS PARK ACT.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (164) An Act to amend the Rocky Mountain Park Act.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The object of the Bill is to authorize the sale instead of the lease of lots in the town plots in the park.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—What quantity of the park is now under lease?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are two town plots. The Bill is limited to them.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—What are the terms of the leases, and what rent do the lessees pay ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The rent is almost nominal. The lots are leased to parties connected with the tourist traffic.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time, and passed.

MILITIA LAND GRANT BILL.

THIRD READING

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on Bill (177) An Act to make further provision respecting grants of land to members of the Militia Force on active service in the Northwest.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are a few of our brave defenders who went up to the Northwest in 1885, who have not yet drawn their land grant. In that year parliament passed an Act granting to each person who took part in the Northwest troubles two quarter-sections of Dominion lands. They were issued under certain conditions, and from time to time since that date the period has been extended. It was first extended in 1886. Then it was extended again in the years 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1898, 1900. I think, from the observations made in the other Chamber, the number of parties who are still out, who have not drawn their land grant, are comparatively few, considerably under 50. If my memory serves me right, there are only between 30 and 40, and the object of this Bill is to authorize the department to place them on the same basis as the others who drew their lands or scrip under the authority of the preceding Act. The scrip was issued, and with the scrip they were, under certain conditions, enabled to take up their land.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Are they allowed to sell their scrip.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, they are. The terms of the old Acts were very liberal. The Act of 1886 extended to every officer, non-commissioned officer, every scout, to every person appointed to the medical staff to the nurses and hospital doctors, and men of the force, who started with the corps, but were incapacitated, and had to return home.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—A person who receives a scrip is permitted to sell it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, by the Act passed in 1900, the Governor in Council may grant free homestead or scrip to any person entitled to it under the preceding Act, provided such person complies with the conditions within the current year 1900. There are certain conditions to be performed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not rise to oppose this Bill, but I really think it is a Bill which we should hardly expect now. I think there should be a statute of limitations about these things. Twenty-one years have expired since the services were rendered for which these grants of land were made. It is the duty of any man who is entitled to a pension or to a land grant to look after his own interest, and I think people who have allowed 20 years to elapse have been guilty of such negligence that parliament should not interfere. And there is another feature about it; I find that the Bill speaks of 'The person to whom the warrant was granted, or the substitute of such person.' I imagine that most of the persons who will get the benefit of this provision will not be the persons who went up there and took some risks for their country, but will be the persons who have acquired the scrip from the persons who earned it; and, further, these people who have been guilty of negligence, or the persons who got hold of their scrip, are getting probably ten times as much as the people who took up their lands within a reasonable time. I know how sensitive the country is to anything that looks like hard dealing with militia men, but I really think this is a measure we could hardly have expected to see brought before us, and, for one, I should not be at all sorry to see it defeated.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—I should like to say, in connection with this, that I know of several cases in my own district, outstanding claims for scrip which have not been located, and the reasons given by the parties I thought were sufficient to warrant any person advocating the passing of this measure. I wish also to point out that the party who receives this bounty warrant has to perform homestead duties, the same as any person else, and they are all Canadians. We know there was a great deal of hardship and suffering by those who went through the Northwest Rebellion. Many of those men were out of the country when the scrip was allotted, and some did not come back in time to enter the scrip. Some of them did not consider it of value. Well, they have it. It is something the government gave them. There are 20 or 30 veterans in the Northwest, who want to locate on these lands. I think it would be a hardship if we did not pass the Bill and allow them to take the locations. I know of one party who lost his scrip. He hunted for years for it, and it was only last year a gentleman cleaning out his safe found the scrip, which had been given to this party 15 years or more before. There are several cases of that kind, and it would be a hardship to prevent such claimants from getting the land.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I agree very much with the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Halifax. While I have no doubt the country is willing to recognize the great value of the services rendered by the veterans, there should be a limit to these extensions from time to time, and still holding out inducements for these people to make demands. As soon as that is done you will always find some person who is willing to try to establish his claim to a grant, and I think there should be very distinct and clear notice given in some way that no claim, after a certain fixed date, will be recognized. There should be a time limit fixed. In the United States immense abuses have grown up under their system of granting pensions to those who served in the civil war. That war came to a close in 1865 or 1866, and yet they are granting pensions to veterans up to the present time, and an enormous amount or imposition has been practised. Over $100,000,000 is paid out annually in the way of civil war pensions. People have made application for pensions, and have established, apparently to the satisfaction of those in charge, that they were entitled; but years after the application has been granted, investigation has shown that it was nothing short of a clear fraud upon the American people. I have no doubt attempts will be made in the same way to practise fraud here, unless the government looks very carefully into all applications coming before it. A time limit should be placed in this Bill, and it should be distinctly understood that nothing further will be granted—not only that, but applicants should be required to establish beyond all doubt their right to recognition at this late date.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—I would call the attention of the government to the fact that, in all probability, these claims will be made the subject of speculation. That has happened in the province of Quebec in connection with the rebellion of 1837, and we have had the same thing in other places. There is a strong probability that the volunteer who actually served in the Northwest may be now dead, and that it is some of his children or descendants who are claiming the money. There are people who are on the lookout for a chance to make money in connection with these claims, and they will buy up the right to the scrip from these heirs. It would seem to me to be safer and more honest if the government would value these claims in each case, and give, either to the volunteer himself who fought during the rebellion, or to his children or descendants, the sum which may be decided upon. Let it be given to the rightful claimant in person, so that no one else can interfere and say 'I have paid so much for this claim, and I am entitled to the money.' If this is not done we shall have speculation, and the persons who actually are entitled to the military bounty will perhaps receive but a small percentage of its value.

Hou. Mr. WATSON—There appears to be some misconception about this Bill. It provides for granting a homestead, and the individual who is entitled to this scrip is entitled to a homestead of 320 acres instead of 160 acres only. The party entitled to the scrip must perform settlement duties, so that there can be no speculation about it. It is simply giving to the volunteer, the person entitled to the scrip, the right to 320 acres of land instead of 160, on account of military service.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—Children or minors cannot do the necessary work to fulfil the conditions of a homestead, and some one else will have to take hold of it for them. A child of a volunteer will not be able to avail himself of the grant, if there is a condition attached that he must go on the land and do work on it. Further, the bounty is not in the form of a homestead only, but also of scrip. It may be either a homestead or scrip.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

RIMOUSKI TEMISCOUATA AND KAMOURASKA INSURANCE COMPANY.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called:

Second reading (Bill 88) An Act respecting La Compagnie d'Assurance Mutuelle contre le feu des Comtés de Rimouski, Temiscouàta et Kamouraska, and to change its name to La Compagnie d'Assurance contre l'incendie de Rimouski.—(Hon. Mr. Tessier.)

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—In the absence of Hon. Mr. Tessier and on his behalf, I move, seconded by Hon. Mr. McMullen, the second reading of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—In the absence of the Hon. Dr. Fiset I would ask to have it stand until Tuesday, so that he may be here, as he wishes to be heard on this Bill.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—My reason for wishing to have the second reading now is that Mr. Tessier, owing to the advanced stage of the session, is anxious that the Bill should go before the Committee on Banking and Commerce as soon as possible.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The hon. gentleman I spoke of is opposed to the Bill, and he wishes to be heard.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This Bill has already been postponed twice, and I do not think it is fair to hang a Bill up in this way.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—If there is any opposition, the parties should be prepared to go on.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—We are only taking unopposed Bills now. That was the understanding, and when Dr. Fiset left this afternoon, he asked me to see that this Bill should not be taken up until he would be here. The objection which was taken to it before was that it was not printed in English and French.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I am sure that Hon. Mr. Tessier does not wish to be unreasonable, but any one who wishes to do so can oppose this Bill on the third reading. I would ask to have the second reading proceeded with.

The SPEAKER—Was it the understanding that only unopposed measures were to be taken up ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, that was the understanding.

The SPEAKER—Does the hon. gentleman insist upon the second reading now.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—I do not wish to do so, in face of the request that has been made.

The consideration of the Bill was postponed.

CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

DEBATE POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. David :—That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all petitions, resolutions or documents concerning the abolition or reorganization of the Senate.—(Hon. Mr. McSweeney.)

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I have been requested by a number of gentlemen who are not able to be present to ask that a certain day shall be apointed to take up this debate. If I am in order, I move that it be taken up on Wednesday next and form the first order of the day.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think that would be an objectionable course to take. This discussion has been very interesting and instructive, and it is a very good thing to have at the end of the order paper. On Tuesday there is little or nothing on the order paper, and the better way would be to let it stand as it is.

The SPEAKER—It will stand on the order paper.

PACIFIC AND EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There was an item under consideration, as to which the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert was addressing the House; we had better dispose of that before we take up any other business.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I understand it was the intention a short time ago, for the House to sit this evening, to discuss that Bill. The idea seemed to be that there were hon. gentlemen here addressing the House who were talking against the Bill for purposes of obstruction. I have consulted these gentlemen, and I think it would be rather far fetched to say that they were obstructing. I believe they are quite prepared to have a vote taken at the next sitting of the House, when it will be possible to have a fuller vote than we could have this evening. If this is acceptable, I think any hon. gentlemen who have opposed the Bill will agree that the vote should be taken at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—With that understanding, I move the adjournment of the debate until Monday next.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The hon. gentlemen assents, I understand, to the proposition which has been made. He does not say anything about a vote being taken on Monday.

Hon. Mr. DAVIS—It is understood that a vote is to be taken at the next sitting of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (114) an Act to incorporate the Anglo-Canada Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, de Lanaudière.)

Bill (146) an Act to incorporate the Windsor, Chatham and London Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, Windsor.)

Bill (163) an Act to authorize the exchange of certain school lands for other Dominion lands.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

The Senate then adjourned until Monday, at eight p.m.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Monday, June 18, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight o'clock p.m.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before proceeding with the orders of the day, I might say that a meeting of the Committee on Banking and Commerce was called for to-morrow. I found, however, that there were a number of persons who wanted to appear before that committee in connection with the Bill for authorizing the marking of manufactures of gold and silver and I thought it was best probably to give them another day as some of them live at a distance, so that the meeting of the Banking and Commerce Committee was postponed from to-morrow until Wednesday at the same hour. I telegraphed Sir George Drummond; I did not know whether he would come up for to-morrow or not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I not suggest that my hon. friend should have allowed the committee to sit to-morrow and dispose of the other items upon the order paper?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps so, but I did not know whether Sir George Drummond would like it or not after my telegraphing him.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me it is the chairman of the committee who should assume that responsibility. A second thought on the part of my hon. friend would have indicated that the Bill in question would occupy a whole morning and we could have postponed the Bill he has mentioned and disposed of the other matters.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I endeavoured to get him through the long-distance telephone, but could not communicate with him. I am quite in accord with the committee to have a meeting to-morrow and take up the other questions although the chairman might not be present.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no personal feeling upon the subject, except that it is getting late in the session and it would not be unreasonable to expect the committee to meet every day until the business has been cleared off. I think there will be sufficient business to occupy the attention of the committee to-morrow, but I speak without definite knowledge on that point. I am sure that the committee would be quite agreeable to postpone the consideration of the Bill which my hon. friend refers to until Wednesday.

CUSTOMS TARIFF ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (175) An Act to amend the Customs Tariff, 1897.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would my hon. friend have any objection to stating again to the committee the object of these changes in the tariff?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As the law now stands, the machinery for beet root sugar, and the machinery for gold mining are admitted free of duty. That extends until the end of the present session, and the object of this Bill is to postpone the time until the end of next session, giving parties interested a further period within which to import machinery. The second clause of the Bill provides that where steel rails are sent out of Canada to be re-rolled, that on their being returned they should pay the duty on the increased cost of the re-rolling. The Customs Department thought there was no item under which they could be admitted, and they proposed to charge $7 a ton. That was considered to be rather unreasonable as the rails could not be re-rolled in Canada and had to be sent outside. It was thought only fair that the duty should be paid only on what it costs to re-roll them in the United States.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask my hon. friend if any of the machinery of the kind in clause 1 is not manufactured in Canada ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not manufactured in Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has the government any information of the manufacture of this machinery being entered upon in Canada ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—At whose instance is this extension being made ? At the instance of the manufacturers of beet root sugar ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The people who are interested in the beet root sugar.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Or the importers of this particular kind of machinery ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. The people who are interested in the refining in the gold region and the people who are interested in the beet root sugar concerns. It has been continued for a number of years in the same way—extended only from one session to another, limited to one year first, and then extended from year to year. This Bill extends the privilege until December next.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It may be subject to the criticism that so long as the government pursues this policy of extending the time for importing machinery of this class, it will not afford very great encouragement to the manufacturers in Canada to enter upon the production of such machinery in this country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If there was any possible sign of the machinery being made in Canada, we should not do it. It is only in the absence of it that this Act is being extended from time to time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have just sent for the Customs Act, to ascertain what difference is in the wording of this amended section and the section as it appears in the present Tariff Act. If it is merely for an extension of the time ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is all it is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In the Customs Act it specifies the different articles which are to be admitted free for these purposes. The proposition at present is with regard to machinery of every kind of structural iron and steel.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was extended last year. It is item 55A of schedule B. It is machinery of every kind of structural iron and steel when imported under regulations to be made by the Minister of Customs, for use in the construction and equipment of factories that are engaged in the manufacturing of sugar. It is extended to June 30, 1906. Then the next clause relates to machinery and appliances of the kind not made in Canada, for alluvial gold mining, and the time is extended to June 30, 1906. This Bill grants a further extension of six months.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 2,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The legislation of last year extended the power vested in the Minister of Customs to apply it to all machinery, while in the original Act the different articles are specially mentioned and specified. That is the only difference. The present proposition is only to extend the powers vested in the government at the last session of parliament.

Hon. Mr. JONES—It would appear, from the reading of it, that it covers the material required for the buildings themselves. The clause reads :

> Machinery of every kind and structural iron and steel when imported under regulations to be made by the Minister of Customs for use in the construction and equipment of factories.

It is very wide. It covers engines, boilers, shafting and structural machinery for the buildings themselves.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think it has been so interpreted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is precisaly the same provision as we had before ; it is only an extension.

Hon. Mr. JONES—I had not heard of it being so interpreted, and probably it has not been.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not see how it would be possible to place two constructions upon the term 'construction of factories'. It certainly would refer to the building of factories. It would permit of free importation of structural iron, which is certainly manufactured in Canada.

Hon. Mr. JONES—I think it is very clear indeed :

Machinery of every kind and structural iron or steel when imported under regulations to be made by the Minister of Customs for use in the construction and equipment of factories for the manufacture of sugar from beet root.

The regulations would only apply, I presume, as to the safeguards to be thrown around it so that it would be sure that it would go into the use it was imported for and no other; but I think it is very clear indeed that it is intended to cover building material and all classes of machinery, engines, boilers, shafting, everything required, in addition to the special machinery, for the manufacture of beet sugar.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest to my hon. friend that he should postpone the consideration of this clause until tomorrow. It seems to me very valuable information might be forthcoming.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We cannot amend the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We cannot amend the Bill ; still it is desirable that information should be furnished to the House. We know that structural iron and steel are being manufactured in Canada on a large scale.

Hon. Mr. JONES—No, not on a large scale.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—To say that the manufacturers of Canada cannot make enough structural iron for the building of beet root sugar factories to be established in Canada is a very poor compliment to pay them.

Hon. Mr. JONES—There is not at present all kinds of structural iron and steel made in Canada such as would be required in erecting buildings of any considerable dimensions. Structural iron and steel of certain sizes and kinds are manufactured, but if you desired to erect a factory of any considerable dimensions it would be impossible to get all the material manufactured in Canada ; so if the government desire to assist in the construction of these buildings it is necessary that this clause should be in the law, or the sugar factories would have to pay the duty, because they could not buy all the material in Canada. The Canadian manufacturing establishments for the production of structural iron and steel are growing, but it is well known to those who have had experience in the matter that the material turned out by these establishments is limited in sizes and styles. Beams and angles are not made in all the sizes suitable for large factories.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The answer is apparent on the Bill. Since 1897 the government has been permitting the importation free of duty of this class of iron. It seems illogical to say that you can encourage the manufacture of this particular kind of product so long as you have on the statute-book a provision permitting the free importation of structural iron and steel.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is only on the statute-books because we cannot get parties to manufacture them in the country. It is only for a short time at the most ; this question will be up again in November.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman from Toronto what character of structural iron is required for the erection of a building, that is not required for putting up these iron and steel bridges crossing such rivers as the Niagara and the Ottawa, and these are manufactured by the Dominion Bridge Company. As I understand it, they manufacture all kinds of structural iron, because ten or twelve years ago, or even longer than that, when I was administering the affairs of the Customs Department, we had difficulties presented to the department upon this very question, and heavy penalties were imposed on those who had imported this kind of structural iron for the construction of bridges. I must confess I am not sufficiently acquainted with the character of structural iron and steel required for a sugar factory to say whether it is different from what is required for the construction of a bridge. We know that in many of those buildings now being constructed, the iron and steel are procured in Canada.

Hon. Mr. JONES—Of course I am not conversant with the different sizes that the Dominion Iron and Bridge Company produce, but I should be surprised if they roll everything they use. I know in other large bridge companies in Montreal and Toronto they import very large quantities, indeed, of structural steel and iron for their work. There are thousands and thousands of tons coming into Toronto for the Toronto Bridge Company, but there is a material difference between structural steel required for bridge work and structural steel used in buildings. I have had a good deal of experience in the way of building, and have found it absolutely necessary to go out of the country for some kinds of material. I am not advocating going out of the country, you may be sure, if it is practicable to avoid it. But I understand that the policy of the government to be that for six months longer they would favour the construction of the building; if the company have to go out of the country for any material they can bring it in without paying duty. I am not objecting to that feature of the Bill, because we are very anxious, naturally to see beet sugar factories built. I think there are only three or four which have been built since this law was brought into force, and as it is only to remain on the statute-book for six months, until we shall have an opportunity of considering it again, it is probably less objectionable than if it were going to date for any considerable time, because in the time specified it would be practically impossible to put up a factory without importing a part of the structural steel necessary for its construction.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Could the hon. gentleman inform us whether the companies in Toronto who imported this structural iron which the hon. gentleman says cannot be rolled or manufactured by them, paid duty or imported it free?

Hon. Mr. JONES—I take it for granted they paid the duty. I should hope they did. I am not personally interested, and have no personal experience further than having been in close friendship with men interested in the business.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My reason for asking is this: If the other manufacturers in Canada had to import their iron and steel for the purpose of erecting buildings and had to pay duty upon it, then this law permits the importation free by other parties who could build in competition with and take the work away from competing establishments.

Hon. Mr. JONES—For the purposes of beet sugar factories?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the true reason underlying this legislation from year to year has been to give encouragement to the production of beet sugar, and when we remember that there have been but few factories of that kind in operation in Canada, and it is a very important matter to the agriculturists of Canada that this industry should be developed and encouraged, I presume that is the reason why this legislation was first enacted and the reason why it has continued from year to year. The fact that it is now being continued for six months only, I would take to be an indication that the government are thinking of changing their policy. Might I infer that that would be the case?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been renewed from year to year in the hope that some factory would be established in Canada and that it then might be discontinued. It is only from time to time. We will have a session within six months when the matter will come up once more.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I regret that I do not see present in the House at this moment the hon. gentleman who so readily describes himself as a radical. I should like him to give us his views upon this tariff measure. It grates very severely upon my feelings as a free trader to support it. In fact I do not know that I do support it—perhaps it makes no difference as to whether I object or not. This is such a clear case of protection that as a member of the old Liberal party, as one who has endeavoured to teach the people the principles of free trade, I decidedly object to this proposition.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The whole Liberal party has been doing that.

Hon. Mr. JONES—There are exceptions.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They prove the rule.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—In regard to the general proposition, in view of the great demand of the people of this country for railways, and of the real necessity that exists for railways, I think these rails might be allowed to go out of the country to be re-rolled and come back again without any duty at all. Perhaps it is right; it may be that the necessities of the country demand that the increased value of the rails—if there be any increased value—should pay duty. But the last provision, declaring that a protective duty shall be placed upon these rails as soon as a mill is established, is rather going beyond what I think there is any necessity for. I think that might be omitted altogether. If at some time or another a mill is established and reasons could be shown why there should be a duty upon rails, it would be well enough, but on the face of it, this a clear declaration of protection, and I dissent from it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Surely the hon. gentleman has not found this out just now? The late tariff imposed a duty of seven dollars a ton upon rails to encourage their manufacture in Canada. As I understand, both in Cape Breton and also at the Sault, they are now manufacturing these rails in sufficient quantities since the imposition of a duty of seven dollars per ton, so that the principle is not new. The hon. gentleman may have overlooked that when the tariff was brought down a year or two ago. It is a capital provision in the interests of the industries of this country. The only question is, with an out-and-out protectionist, as to whether that concession to permit rerolled rails to be reimported subject only to a duty on the work done on them, should have been given in the first place. My own impression is that the imposition of the duty should have been made operative at once, and that would have encouraged the manufacturer of rails in this country long, long ago. Even the late government, protectionist as it professed to be, never was prepared as a whole to go as far as that, while individual members of the government would have gone that distance. I believe it is the only way to build up the industries of this country. The provision is a good one if the government will carry it out. There is some objection to placing too much power in the hands of the government in connection with matters of this kind.

Hon. Mr. JONES—The hon. gentleman says, the late government were never prepared to go as far as that. They never had the opportunity, because in their time there was no duty on rails, and while that was the case it would have been impossible to have an Act of this kind. I think this is most practical legislation; and I believe the hon. gentleman from Belleville will agree with me in that. We have large quantities of rails in Canada, worn at the ends, a lighter rail generally speaking than those which are being rolled in Canada,—rails for which the two rail mills now in operation in Canada have not in the meantime established trains of rolls suitable to that shape and weight of rail. It is a very expensive process to build a mill for that purpose, and there are various sizes of rails. If these lighter rails can be sent out of the country and the ends cut off them, have them re-rolled and practically made new, there will be an immense saving and great advantage will arise to the transportation companies of Canada, while the government will get the full duty on the cost of the work—that is on the additional value of the rail when it is returned. It appeals to me as being splendid, practical legislation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman misunderstands me, I think. I was objecting to this clause under the circumstances. The hon. gentleman is also in error in saying that the late government had not an opportunity of doing this because rails were placed on the free list. Who placed them on the free list?

Hon. Mr. JONES—Likely you did.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Certainly, and if the late government had acted upon the strict protectionist views which I hold—I repeat what I said a moment ago—they would have imposed a duty and encouraged the manufacture of rails in this country long ago. That is the position I take. They were in a position, if they thought it advisable, to do so; but they did not, on the ground that there were no manufacturers of steel rails in Canada and the present duty has been imposed because two industries have been established for the manufacture of rails.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I wish to say a word in reply to the hon. gentleman from St. John. I am in entire accord with this enactment. I think it is a proper and prudent one. My hon. friend takes exception, and says it is not in accordance with Reform principles. As far as I know, and I have had the opportunity of ascertaining the opinions of a great many men, I think the feeling in Canada at the present moment is that we cannot afford to do anything else than build up our own industries as best we can. I admit with my hon. friend, that free trade would be a good principle if we could get the world to free trade with you, but when you cannot do that, you have in self defence to adopt a policy that will give you and your country a chance. Consequently I am in entire accord with this legislation. It will encourage the establishment of these industries, which will be an advantage. I observe that the hon. gentleman from Belleville is amused at what I say. Permit me to tell him that 24 years ago, when I issued my first address to the people of North Wellington, it contained a clause that I was in favour of a revenue tariff so adjusted as to afford incidental protection and encouragement to home industry. That was the first address I ever issued, and I have never departed from that principle.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman from North Wellington is to be congratulated upon the very modest way in which he issued that address; because he certainly succeeded in hiding his light behind a bushel for a great many years. As far as my recollection goes, there has been no more doughty advocate of the principle of free trade in the country than my hon. friend. But this is somewhat consistent with the attitude of the Liberal party, to advocate free trade and practice protection.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I never was an advocate of free trade, I never violated the principle contained in my first address. I challenge any man to read the 'Hansard' and point out where I advocate free trade.

There is a great deal of difference between a revenue tariff adjusted to the interest of home manufacturers, and a protective tariff levied chiefly and first to protect manufacturing industries, and making the revenue a secondary consideration. To use a common expression, that is a horse of another colour. I never advocated a policy of that kind, but I did advocate the other, and I hold it is the only course we can possibly adopt under present conditions, and in view of our relations with our neighbour to the south.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I submit, as a matter of order, that we are not now discussing the record of the hon. gentleman from Wellington nor the record of the hon. gentleman from Rockland—their consistency or inconsistency. The matter before the House is the 3rd clause of the Bill, which has nothing to do with either of these questions.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—After all the principle of free trade is involved, and I must advert to the remarks of my hon. friend from Wellington. I for years honestly believed he was a free trader, and I recently——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend thought he was one himself too.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—And I recently believe he became a convert to protection; but now he tells us that he always was a protectionist and we will accept his word. I took exactly the opposite line the first election I ran and I have stood to my guns ever since, and I think always shall do so. Every measure which has protection in it is a detriment to the very best interests of Canada, I do not care what the article is, even steel rails which are exported out of the country to be re-rolled and returned. I think it is a detriment to Canada to impose a duty thereon and when my hon. friend suggest that he would be a free trader if he could get other countries to free trade with him, he simply declares himself to be a protectionist. The free trader does not care what the rest of the world does; he does not want to impose penalties on the Canadian people because the United States or other protected countries choose to do so. He is one that legislates for the people of Canada, and in legislating for Canada, I think there can be nothing more detrimental than protection, and I must enter my protest against it.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

SECOND READING.

Bill (146) An Act to incorporate the Windsor, Chatham and London Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, Windsor.)

EXCHANGE OF SCHOOL LANDS.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (163) An Act to authorize the exchange of certain school lands for other Dominion lands. He said: This Bill authorizes the Minister of the Interior to reserve the north half of section 11 of township 18 of the second meridian to be appropriated for forestry purposes, substituting a lot of equal value for school lands. The next clause authorizes the Minister of Interior to do a similar act in reference to a quarter section for an oil company giving school lands of equal value.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As to the first clause, may I ask if there is an experimental farm or forestry station beside this particular section?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a forestry station.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it intended simply to establish a forestry station?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That will be part of the forest taken under the Act that was passed some weeks ago authorizing the Governor in Council to lay aside certain lands as forest lands.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The second clause of this Bill has nothing to do with forestry.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is for an oil company.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It provides for a sale of land to a private company?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why is this exceptional legislation made for the benefit of a particular company?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will give fuller particulars to-morrow when we go into committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend at the same time ascertain if operations are being carried on as to the cultivation of forestry on the adjoining land?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Are these lands required for government or for private purposes? It looks as if some covetous person had cast his eye on this land.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is very suspicious, that is all I can say.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

PACIFIC AND EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for third reading Bill (N) An Act to incorporate the Pacific and Eastern Railway Company, as amended.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved that the Bill be amended by striking out all the words in line 4 and the words after the word 'bay' in line 5.

Hon. Sir MACKENXIE BOWELL—This is a substantial amendment; has any notice been given of it? I would suggest that it be allowed to stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is simply striking out the part authorizing the construction of the road from Prince Albert to Hudson Bay. The object is to save time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand it, the hon. gentleman who was, when we adjourned the debate on this Bill, addressing the House in opposition to the third reading of the Bill has withdrawn his opposition with the understanding that that portion of the seventh clause which authorizes the company to build from Prince Albert to Fort Churchill shall be omitted from the Bill. The hon. gentleman who has moved the amendment, and who represents the promoters of the Bill, has agreed to accept that and he appeals to the House to be allowed to make the amendment with a view to getting his measure before the other House promptly. I think it is a reasonable proposition. It is to strike out that part of the seventh clause which empowered the company to extend the line from Prince Albert to Fort Churchill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the course we are pursuing now is not correct. The main motion is for the third reading of the Bill. Who made that motion ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman who is moving the amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is he allowed now to come in with an amendment ? He has lost his right.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is appealing to the good feeling of the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—To prove my good feeling, I offer to take his place ; I move to strike out the words in line 4, page 2, of clause 7, and in line 5, up to and including the word 'Bay'.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think we ought to have some further explanation. There was some considerable debate on this Bill when it was before the House and we were informed that capitalists were ready to put their money into this scheme for the purpose of building a road from Victoria to Churchill. Have the capitalists been notified that they are going to drop this section from Victoria to Churchill ? It is now to be a road terminating at Prince Albert, a pretty good place for a terminus no doubt, but there should be some explanation from the hon. gentleman who informed us that the capitalists had been informed about the matter and that the money was ready to build the road. It is now stated that arrangements have been made—between whom ? Between some other railway corporation and the promoters of this Bill, or between the gentlemen who favoured the Bill and those who objected to the Bill on a certain principle ? So far as I am concerned, the dropping of the section from Prince Albert to Churchill does not make any difference in my opposition. I oppose the Bill because I believe it is a paper charter, intended entirely for speculative purposes. I gave my reason for thinking so before. I have no reason to change my opinion now, but apparently other hon. gentlemen are satisfied because some individuals are satisfied to let the Bill go, with an amendment ; but I still have the same reasons for opposing the Bill. It has been suggested that when other Bills were before the House, I took a different stand entirely. I never suggested that any Bill should be allowed to pass unless it had some substantial backing. Reference has been made to my support of Bill (41). A gentleman has part of that road built ; we know that he is a man of standing, and able to build roads and for that reason I supported the Bill. This projected line passes through the same territory, and I believe the object of it is to block the other undertaking. That is my opinion, and it is not changed because of some understanding between railway promotors.

The amendment was agreed to, and the Bill as amended was then read the third time and passed.

CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. David :—That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all petitions, resolutions or documents concerning the abolition or reorganization of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I do not know whether it is the desire of the House that I should go on with the debate to-night. The hour is late and hon. gentlemen are probably tired after travelling all day.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—Go on.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The question of the reform of the Senate is one that has received a great deal of consideration at the hands of the people of this Dominion for many years. I suppose the agitation regarding the Senate goes back some 22 or 24 years ago. The Senate, of course, is part of the organization adopted at the time of confederation; the Senate Chamber was provided for. At that time, in my humble opinion, the government machinery, if I might so speak, of this Dominion was a little too expensive. It was based upon a system that imposed more expense than was necessary. The development that has taken place in Canada has not been perhaps as rapid as it was expected it would be when confederation was entered upon. Now the general feeling that prevails throughout all intelligent nations, as we were told the other evening by the hon. gentleman from Smith's Falls, is that second chambers are a necessity. Almost every nation that we know of, whose object is to secure peace, order and good government and sound national development, has two chambers. The United States, one of the most democratic countries in the world and one of the most expensive systems of government, has two chambers. Many of the states, if not all, have two chambers. Then we have England itself, the mother of parliaments, with two chambers. I am not here to justify, to advocate or to endorse a hereditary chamber such as she has. I admit, however, that it renders desirable service on many occasions. It gives to the legislation, I dare say, a certain amount of independence that would not be exercised if the Commons did not have a House of Lords to deal with. It has on many occasions proved itself to be the balance wheel of parliament and has prevented the passage of legislation that, perhaps, was put through the House of Representatives hurriedly or in such a shape that its application to the general conditions of the people might not have been to their best interests. We know perfectly well that if democracy prevailed without any check very great evils would creep in. We have seen that in countries where the people rule without any restriction whatever. There is a happy medium, I think, between democracy and despotism. Despotism, on the one hand, recognizes no right of the individual to be represented, while democracy claims that the people have a right to be represented, and that they have a right to rule themselves and have a right to go wrong if they chose to. That is a very liberal doctrine, but I believe that a constitution such as we have here, if it is properly administered, will secure the development, progress and prosperity of the country I believe very much better than it would if we had only one Chamber. The late Hon. Mr. Mowat was brought into this discussion by an hon. gentleman who spoke a few days ago. I know that the Hon. Mr. Mowat, who was one of the most astute and able politicians we have ever had in the province of Ontario, stated that if he had the recasting of the British North America Act that he would have an upper chamber in that province; that he believed it would have been a good regulating power; that he believed it would have been the balance wheel that would have regulated legislation, and in many cases put the polish on it and contribute very largely to proper legislation being enacted in Toronto. He was of that opinion after some twenty-seven years of experience. With regard to the existence of the Senate, I do not think there is any use in discussing its abolition. Under our Confederation Act I cannot see that we could propose for a moment the abolition of the Senate, unless the consent of every province of the Dominion was secured. The smaller provinces down by the sea no doubt consented to the formation of the Senate as a means of getting some little protection against any legislation that might seriously interfere with their rights and privileges in the Dominion. The provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island got a larger representation in the Senate in proportion to their numbers than the other provinces. The province of Quebec was allowed the same number as Ontario. The right hon. Sir Richard Cartwright proposes to keep the number of senators at 72.

I cannot understand very well how that can be accomplished. It would violate the Confederation Act—you would not proceed along the lines laid down by that enactment. We must keep within the limits of that Act, and, if we do, we must continue the representation at present existing in the maritime provinces and in Quebec and Ontario. I question whether we would be able to find any province which would consent to a reduction in its number of senators in order to give the west representation. The prairie provinces certainly will ask from time to time for an increased number of representatives in this House and they will be entitled to get them. If the objection is on the ground of expense, it is hardly worth taking about. I went carefully into a calculation of the expenses of the Senate last year, and with the increased indemnity, the expense last year was $309,614. If the population of Canada is as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has stated,—and as we believe it is—about 6,200,000, the Senate of Canada costs each inhabitant annually five cents. A family of five therefore would contribute annually 25 cents towards the maintenance of this Senate, and our population will be increasing steadily so that from the standpoint of expense the abolition of the Senate is not worth discussing. Then again with regard to the system of appointment which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has suggested, I cannot see very well how it would be possible to make the appointments and secure the proportionate representation in this House of the Reform party and the Conservative party. His proposition, to my mind, is very clear. He proposes that the Senate should be continued with a membership of 72, that 48 out of that seventy-two, should either be elected by the Dominion House—I presume by a ballot vote, or by the local legislature. When a vacancy took place in the representation from the province of Ontario for instance, a ballot would be taken in the provincial legislature at its next meeting for the purpose of electing a senator. That is virtually the way it is done in the United States. There they take a ballot of both Houses jointly. They have to ballot until some individual gets the necessary number of votes. It is sometimes a very long time before they elect a senator; in Missouri last year they balloted every day, Sundays excepted, for six weeks. Those who were in favour of certain individuals held very tenaciously to the men of their choice, and the contest was long drawn out before they arrived at a conclusion. For my own part I think it would be better if any change is to be made at all, that at least a portion of the senators should be elected by the legislative assembly, because I think the government should be relieved to some extent of the enormous responsibility which rests upon them in connection with appointments both to the Senate and to the civil service. Probably one-third of the time of ministers of the Crown is taken up in answering communications regarding applications of this class. Only one man can be appointed to a vacancy when it arises, and the result is that all those who are not appointed are annoyed, disgusted, and in many cases go into opposition. To remedy this, I think it would be better if the appointment of a portion at least of the senators was left to the province, to be decided by a ballot vote of the legislature when it meets. I also agree with the limit of service of twelve years. I do not think it would be wise to go back and have a second Chamber like this elected by the people. If that were done the probability would be that the influences which would be brought to bear by combinations, trade unions, and such organizations, might become very powerful and they might be able to put legislation through both Houses which they cannot do now. One or two years ago a Bill was passed by the House of Commons to legalize the use of union labour labels. The label of the union was to be placed upon all productions made by union labour and the union would have the right to dictate to the owner of the article, after putting his own mark upon it, that their label should also be attached. I think it is well that that Bill was thrown out by this Chamber. A similar measure was passed in several states of the American union. I have carefully followed the history of its operation, and it has been nothing short of a curse. Because some men were engaged in manufacture—particularly in the manufacture of hats—would not consent to have that label put upon their goods, they were boycotted and in some cases they were driven out of business, by the labour unions. I know in one case where a man lost almost his entire business. He turned round and sued the different organizations and got judgment against them; and in hundreds of cases men who belonged to these organizations, had their homes and everything they possessed sold out to defray law costs, &c. That taught them a leason that I dare say would do some good. If we had a second Chamber elected by the popular vote, legislation of that kind might creep through both Houses, when it could not possibly do so if the second Chamber was independent and could act on its own responsibility. The question of the limit of age is one which I frankly admit is hard to regulate. I entirely agree with the statement of one member of this House that some of the brightest and most active members of this Senate—men whose presence is most desirable, who are well posted, and whose minds are well stored with information gathered during their long experience in parliament—are men who are over 70 or 75 years of age ; yet they are capable of performing the duties devolving upon them as well as men of 25 or 30. It would be a great loss to the country, and a great injustice to these men, if an age limit were fixed so that their seats would become vacant simply because they had reached a certain period of life. I cannot see how we can very well alter present conditions in that respect. There may be a few men well up in years who are perhaps not capable of rendering very efficient service ; but after all the country can surely afford, after a life's labour on their part—after they have rendered faithful and efficient service for many years—to allow them the same right which we allow to a superior court judge or to a county court judge. The law provides in such cases for allowing judges of the Superior Court to retire on full pay after they have been a certain number of years on the bench, and I think the country can well afford to treat senators in the same way. In our legislation we copy many things from the United States, and I suppose the United States copies from us. There is one thing which I very greatly regret we copied from the United States, and that is the Gerrymander Act. I regret that it was ever brought here, it was a great mistake. I know that there are men in this House to say that this is ancient history. That may be, but after all that Act is very fresh in the minds of men who, like myself, were under the political harrow for many years, men who occupied seats in the other Chamber, and who had from year to year to fight for their lives because of the operation of that Act. I am not using too strong language when I say that it was one of the most vicious, contemptible pieces of legislation ever introduced and carried through the Canadian parliament. Mr. McCarthy who was a high-minded man, a man who was honestly and earnestly devoted to the Conservative party, a strait Conservative all his life, admitted on the floor of parliament, in my own hearing that he was ashamed to have to confess that he had lent his support and assistance to that measure. It was intended to act as a political guillotine to cut the heads off a great many Reformers, which it did. For instance, take the case of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. His constituency was not only injured by lopping off a township here and adding one there, but it was completely obliterated. They put out the constituency he represented altogether.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What constituency was that?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—He represented one of the Hurons. I do not remember which one, but it was quite wiped out by the Gerrymander Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, it was not.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I beg my hon. friend's pardon; if he will get the map he will find that the constituency that Sir Richard Cartwright represented was wiped out. There was no such constituency. The county was there, but not the constituency. If I am not right I want my hon. friend to bring the 'Hansard' and show that I am wrong. He cannot do it. Then the Hon. David Mills, a man blessed with a large amount of ability and who was a credit to his country as an able, devoted Canadian, was gerrymandered so that he lost his seat immediately in the elections after 1882. Let me just for a moment give some facts. The subject may be considered a little harrowing, but, as I said before, we cannot help it because we suffered. We were under the heel of that abominable Act for eighteen years, and it is not much wonder if when we speak about it our blood rises. In 1882 the Liberals polled 131,618 votes, the Conservatives 132,615. Now, that includes all the votes in Toronto and every where else. They had not one-third of one per cent more votes than the Reformers, but they elected 55 members while we elected only 37. That was the first experience of the Gerrymander Act. Then take 1887. The Liberals polled 170,371 votes and the Conservatives 174,080, but we had only 40 members while they had 52. In 1891 we polled 179,451 votes, the Conservatives polled 175,639; that is, we polled one per cent more than they did, yet we had only 44 members while they had 48. Then we come to 1896. The Reformers of Ontario polled 185,415 votes, the Conservatives 179,181 votes, or virtually we polled nearly two per cent more than they did, yet we had only 40 representatives and they had 44. In 1900 the Reform party polled 193,417 votes and Conservatives 199,138. We had 37 representatives elected while the Conservatives had 55. Now, that was our experience under the Gerrymander Act. The Act was copied from the United States and I exceedingly regret that it was ever brought into operation in this country. It is said by some of those who defend that Act that Sir Oliver Mowatt gerrymandered in Ontario. For my part I can say fearlessly that I never for one moment on the public stump or in the House or any other place defended any Act of the Hon. Oliver Mowat that was of the character of a gerrymander.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would my hon. friend, who has the figures before him, tell us the result of the last election in the Dominion under the redistribution of the present government.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I have not the figures here That redistribution just put things back to where they were before. It simply undid the gerrymander.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What have these remarks to do with the amendment of the constitution of the Senate ?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I am simply discussing the constitution of the Senate, and replying to some remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is not replying : he is trying to verify those remarks.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The hon. gentleman was pointing out in his speech why some change should be made so as to give a fair representation to each party in this Chamber, and in connection with that he referred to the unfortunate and dishonest Gerrymander Act of 1882, and he went on to show that he was opposed to it. So am I, and I have pointed out the fact that we copy some things from the United States, and I say this, with other objectionable features, was copied from them, and I earnestly hope that we will never copy any legislation of that kind again. Referring to the agitation for the reform of the Senate, commenced in 1882, immediately after the passing of this Act, which went through this House in half an hour, it was well known to every senator who was here that it was an Act that was deliberately concocted to behead the reformers in the province of Ontario and the Senate passed that measure in half an hour. If that proves anything, it proves that the Senate at that time was the obedient servant of the party that was then in power. They just carried out what the other House did. They endorsed it without any hesitation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Will the hon. gentleman excuse me for a moment. I had an impression that the late Hon. David Mills, had moved in the matter of the change in the method of appointing senators some years before the time the hon. gentleman refers to ?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I do not know what Mr. Mills may have done with regard to the reform of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I cannot speak positively, but that is my impression.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Quite right.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—At that time the Reform party in Ontario, from highest to lowest, all took umbrage at the course of the Senate with regard to that Gerrymander Act and the agitation continued from that time down to the present. No doubt at the convention that was held in Ottawa, before the Reformers came into power, they declared there should be a reform of the Senate. The present government is committed to the principle of reforming the Senate. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has outlined the plan he desired to suggest and I was going on to explain my proposition, but I broke off in order to point out what was the reason of the hostile feeling, especially in our province, towards the Senate, and I explained that it was based on that unfortunate Act, the Gerrymander Act of 1882. It laid the foundation of the bitterness that grew up in the minds of the Reform party, and they never got rid of that bitterness engendered by the action of the Senate on that occasion. With regard to the question of proportionate representation of both parties in this Chamber, I do not know how that is going to be carried out very well. My own impression is that it would be better to leave the appointment to the local legislatures. For instance, in Ontario, supposing a vacancy occurred to-morrow, the Conservative party is in power in Ontario. No doubt they would appoint a Conservative, and I would justify their doing so, and the probabilities are that they would continue to appoint Conservatives as long as they remained in power. Then you have a Conservative government in Manitoba, and they would also appoint Conservative senators. In that way you would tend to produce an equilibrium between the Conservatives and Reformers in this House, so that, in my opinion, that would go a long way to adjust matters. Then the government would control the appointment of one-third as the hon. gentleman suggested. He proposed to fill the seats by the appointment of ex-lieutenant governors and other distinguished public men who had served the country, perhaps for a considerable period. Possibly it is the intention that the leaders of the opposition, whether the opposition was Reform or Conservative, should be consulted with regard to the twenty-four members to be appointed by the government of the day, and if the government utilized that power for the purpose of equalization the representation when it was not secured by the appointments from the provinces, in that way they might keep the parties equally represented. Without that I do not see how they could very well do it. I have not been here as long as some hon. gentlemen. Many members have been here for a number of years before my time, but I have noticed that business in this Chamber is sometimes rushed—I might say almost indecently rushed—without very much consideration. That tends to render the Senate unpopular. If we are only here to register the will of the other House, undoubtedly we will get into disrepute. If the Senate will not carefully examine Bills when they come before us and review and amend where there is just ground for amending, then we are not going to get credit from the country for doing useful work. Another thing, in my humble opinion, is that every senator should know the district he represents. Under the present arrangement senators are appointed to vacancies without being named to any special district. That I consider is wrong. Every senator should know the district he represents and the people of that district should know that there is a senator to represent them. I should think that would be better than making general appointments without any special district to represent. It would give the people a better claim upon their senators if matters came up in which they wanted to utilize the influence or the assistance of their representative; they could communicate with him just as well as they now communicate with a member of parliament. I think that would be a decided advantage. Another thing is that during the time our opponents were in power the Senate was often made a means whereby seats could be made vacant in the House of Commons in order to meet the exigencies of the government who wanted to find a seat for, perhaps, a minister of the Crown. I do not think that should be done by either party. Men should be appointed to the Senate independently, and the power of appointment should only be exercised in that way. In my opinion it is not doing the Senate justice that it should be merely a place in which to provide seats for members and ministers of the other House. I think the Senate should be used in a different way. I think I have outlined the policy which Sir Richard Cartwright proposed to take and I do not know that it is worth my while further to detain the House. I presume it is not a matter of much importance to the present members of the Senate what the government's decision may be with regard to the future of this body. As Sir Richard Cartwright has said, all the senators here will put in their day as senators; the change whatever it may be, will take place from time to time as we drop off. My opinion is that Canada can afford to retain both Chambers, in view of the fact that the Senate costs so little. The Senate is destined to render good service to the country for the little it costs. It is not for us to boast of the amount of work we do, but I may say that since I came here I have been amazed at the condition in which many Bills come to us from the House of Commons. For instance the Bill constituting a Railway Commission for Canada, after having been studied and debated in the House of Commons for weeks and months, was in such shape that we had to make no less than 55 amendments to that one Bill. It shows that while they pass legislation in fairly good shape, and have many very clever lawyers in the House of Commons, after all there is room left for a good deal of improvement. Another thing about the House of Commons is that great changes take place in its membership every election. The new members coming in do not know much about legislation. They have to learn, just as we know members coming into this House have to learn, a good deal about the rules and procedure. I know after I had been 18 or 19 years in the House of Commons. I found when I came here that I did not know the rules and methods of the Senate, but I soon learned to take part in the proceedings. Men who come here without legislative experience take some time before they get into the way of doing business in this Chamber. I contend that it is a great advantage to this country to have a number of men who have had years of experience in both Houses to look after the public business. The changes are not so rapid or so great in this House as in the Commons, and this body is therefore in a better position to consider measures coming before them, than a Chamber which is so largely changed at every general election. I think the Senate has done good service to the country. We have amended many Bills and improved in other ways the legislation which has come before us. We may not have done as much in that direction as some think we ought to have done, but most legislation which passes through the Senate is in a satisfactory shape. I notice that most of the Bills that we amend are accepted by the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY PEACE CONFERENCE.

The SPEAKER—I deem it my duty to communicate to the Senate a letter which I received from Lord Weardale to-day, which reads as follows:—

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION
(British Group).
House of Commons, London, S.W., 1906.

President—Lord Weardale.
Hon. Secretary—W. Randal Creamer, M.P.
Executive Committee.

Hon. Arthur Stanley, M.P.
John Ward, M.P.
Lord Welby.
Henry J. Wilson, M.P.
Sir Howard Vincent, M.P.
Henry Vivian, M.P.

Dear Sir,—It having been decided yesterday by the council of the Inter-Parliamentary Union to accept the invitation of the British Group, with the sympathy and support of His Majesty's government, to hold the XIVth conference of the union in London on July 23, 24, 25 next, and it having been further resolved to invite the attendance of the members of the Canadian federal parliament, we have now the honour to ask you to convey to the members of your House our cordial invitation to take part in the deliberations of the conference in London.

You are probably aware that the union was founded in 1888 with the object of uniting the members of all parliaments in concerted action for the promotion of international arbitration and concord.

As a result, groups have been formed in nearly all the parliaments, composed of members who are in sympathy with our object, and at the conference held last year in Brussels no less than sixteen different parliaments were represented.

As it is the object of our union to secure as wide a parliamentary representation as possible, we are anxious to obtain the advantage of the participation of members of your parliament to whom we offer the most cordial welcome.

If, as the result of this communication, members of both your Houses of parliament were disposed to accept the invitation, we should be obliged if they would kindly intimate their intention to us as soon as convenient, and we will at once communicate to them full information with regard to the programme of the conference and of the fêtes which will be given in connection with it.

It would much facilitate our future correspondence if the members of your parliament who intend to be present would be so kind as to form a group and authorize their president to place himself in personal communication with us.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Yours very faithfully,
WEARDALE.

The President of the Canadian Senate.

The International Parliamentary Congress for Peace has been sitting nearly every year in one of the capitals of Europe, and came to America and sat at St. Louis three years ago. It was my privilege to sit among the members of that congress in 1900, at the Luxembourg in Paris with Sir William Hingston. There were there representatives of all parts of the world. That congress is bringing representatives of all nations yearly together, with the object of a better understanding between nations. I will be in London on July 24 next, and will be glad to communicate the names of any members of the Senate who will be able to attend this conference.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it is my duty, in the name of the Senate, to convey our thanks to Lord Weardale, and the committee he represents, for their kind invitation. I hope that as many members as can be in London at that time will attend that congress.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I join readily in the thanks expressed by the hon. leader of the government, and I hope that the invitation, with our acknowledgement, will appear as of record.

WESTERN TRUST COMPANY'S BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto), from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (35) An Act to incorporate the Western Trust Company, with two amendments. He said: The amendments which have been made are in the first instance limiting the class of investments which the company may make, and, secondly, providing penalties for failure to make returns. I move that these amendments be now concurred in.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If the House will permit I will move that this Bill be re-referred back to the Committee on Banking and Commerce for further consideration. I may say that this Bill stands in my name. I did not know that a meeting was called for to-day, in fact I was otherwise engaged, and I understand from the solicitor that he had no notice of it at all. He would like to have been present as he does not agree with the amendments which have been made. I am satisfied, as I am the promoter of the Bill, that the House will have no objection to referring it back to the committee. There was no person present representing the Bill before the committee to-day, and the solicitor of the company informs me that he is prepared to give full reasons why the Bill should be passed in the shape in which it was prepared.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—This Bill and the amendments which have been recommended, were discussed at a former meeting of the Banking and Commerce Committee. The amendments were not adopted then but were laid over so that any person having an interest in the Bill could have an opportunity of being heard. The committee met for the second time to-day, but no person appeared with reference to this measure. The amendments were the deliberate judgment of the committee on both occasions. It would, perhaps, meet the views of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken if, instead of moving concurrence now, I move that the amendments be taken into consideration to-morrow. The first amendment provides simply for a limitation of the class of securities in which the Trust Company may invest its funds, and the second amendment is one adding a substantive clause providing for the enforcement of penalties if the returns are not made which the Act provides shall be made. I do not think any object can be served by sending it back to the Banking and Commerce Committee. At all events I would suggest, with the permission of the House, that my motion should be amended as I have indicated and then if the hon. gentleman, after considering the matter, finds it necessary to refer the Bill back to the committee it can be done.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I am not familiar with the provisions of the Bill, and I do not suppose any member of this House is ; but the gentleman who prepared this Bill is very desirous that it should be passed in the shape it was presented to the committee. True, these clauses did stand over because they were not thoroughly understood, but I think this meeting of the committee was called hurriedly to-day. Very little notice was given ; some members of the committee were not notified at all of the meeting. I understand the committee purpose meeting to-morrow, and surely it would be much preferable to have the Bill referred back to the committee and have the solicitor who represents these applicants present his case before the committee. He cannot come into the House, and if the amendments stand until to-morrow for consideration here we will be no further ahead than we are to-day. If, after the committee have heard counsel in the case, they see fit to stand by their decision, all right, but I rather think they will not do so after he has made his explanation.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto).

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think any advantage will be gained by ordering the Bill to be sent back to the committee to-morrow, because there is a very important Bill coming up then, and we have people coming from Montreal and Toronto and other distant places to be heard before the committee at ten o'clock to-morrow morning. Possibly the suggestion which my hon. friend has made, to have these amendments set down for consideration to-morrow will meet the case. If anything wrong has been done my hon. friend might meet it by giving notice of a further amendment which he would move to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I want the counsel who is familiar with the Bill and prepared it for the incorporators to be present and explain it. He was deprived of that privilege to-day because he did not know that there was a meeting—knew nothing about it at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not say that further consideration of the Bill should be refused, but there will be no possibility of giving proper consideration to it to-morrow morning.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Well, later on; I am not particular.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—There was some misunderstanding about the meeting of Banking and Commerce Committee to-day, and those who are representing the interests in this Bill felt aggrieved that they did not have an opportunity of appearing before the committee. Without discussing the merits or demerits of the amendments, surely it would only be fair to give these gentlemen an opportunity of being heard before the committee in defence of the Bill, which has passed the House of Commons. It is a matter of courtesy, and inasmuch as there has been a misunderstanding and many members of the Banking Committee did not receive notice of to-day's meeting I think there is no question that the report should be referred back at the earliest possible moment, and if the committee can deal with it to-morrow well and good. If they cannot, it will be dealt with at the next meeting.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Why can the House not deal with it now?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie is the member who had charge of the Bill, and when he asks that the Bill be referred back I think it would be a very remarkable thing if the Senate refused to let it go back.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—As far as I am concerned I have no objection to deal with the matter in any way that may be thought proper, but I think it is due to the committee that I should make the statement. When reports are brought in from the committees I do not think that they should be referred back as a matter of course simply because some person had neglected his duty.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. gentleman cannot charge these people with neglect of duty, because I understood on good authority that the meeting of the Banking and Commerce Committee was fixed for Thursday.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I do not know whether the gentleman who is trusted with the matter has considered the nature of the amendments. If he has read the amendments and thinks they are too important to be carried through, so far as I am concerned I do not care whether it goes to committee now or then, but I think it is due to the committee that some case should be made out before the report is sent back. I am not chairman of the committee, and I am not accustomed to speaking for the committee; it is for the committee themselves to say whether that would be a reasonable course or not.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I should like to see the suggestion of the hon. member from Portage la Prairie adopted. I am a member of the Banking and Commerce Committee and was present on both occasions when the Bill came up. There was no one there to give very full explanations, and there were several points on which the committee desired information which was not obtainable. As far as I am concerned I should be glad to see that suggestion adopted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This discussion may probably prove of some advantage to the committee. It has been too much the practice of late to send Bills from the House of Commons without asking any senator to take charge of them here. Some person rises and, as a matter of courtesy, moves the second reading and reference of the Bill to the committee. That is the position we are in to-day in the Banking and Commerce Committee. Two or three Bills were sent to the committee which required explanations. No one being there, the Bills were carefully considered by the committee, and they concluded, in the interest not only of the company itself but of those who would be affected by the adoption of the legislation, that the amendments that were proposed should be made to the Bill. Complaint was made then by every member of the committee, and especially by the chairman, that Bills of so important a character affecting the investment of moneys, should come before us without the slightest explanation. It was thought better to amend the Bills or, as was suggested by some, to strike them off the notice paper altogether. The members of committees and of this House should adopt some plan by which explanations shall be furnished of Bills coming to us from the House of Commons, and when such explanations are not furnished the Bills should be struck off the roll. That would be a lesson to others who seek legislation, and would relieve the committee of a great deal of trouble and annoyance to which they are now subjected. There is every reason why we should agree with the suggestion of my hon. friend from Westmoreland. Let the amendments appear on the notice paper so that every one can read them, and should it be necessary to move the amendments to-morrow, or to send the Bill back to the committee for reconsideration, that course can be followed, but it would be rather an unusual thing to make a motion now on the presentation of the report of the committee itself to send it back immediately without any one, not even members of the committee, knowing anything about the amendments.

The amendment was agreed to.

THE TREADGOLD CONCESSION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) inquired :

Have all the Treadgold concessions in the Yukon or Klondike been cancelled ?

What concessions, if any, and what special rights have been given the Klondike Water Supply Company, incorporated under the Companies Act, 1902, over rivers, streams and creeks in the Yukon, or Klondike district ?

Do such rights carry a monopoly of the water supply in certain rivers and streams ?

Has the company the right to pass over, or under, or expropriate private property and mines in operation in the prosecution of its works ?

Do the rights of the company exclude miners, and other persons taking water for mining and domestic purposes ?

Can miners construct dams and sluices on, or from the rivers and streams to which the rights of the company extend ?

Has the administrator of the Yukon been consulted during his recent visit to Ottawa before giving the Klondike Water Supply Company any special rights in any rivers and streams in the district under his administration ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers are :

1. Certain concessions were granted to Mr. Treadgold and associates by order in council dated 21st April, 1902, but in June, 1904, the concessionaries asked to be relieved of the obligations imposed by the said order in council, and on the 22nd June, 1904, an order in council issued rescinding the said order in council of the 21st April, 1902.

2. There is no record whatever here of any concession or right granted the Klondike Water Supply Company.

Questions 3, 4, 5 and 6 are answered by the answer to the second question.

7. The administrator of the Yukon was not consulted during his visit to Ottawa before giving the Klondike Water Supply Company any special rights, for the reason that no rights whatever were given that company by or through the Department of the Interior here.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I am very glad to hear that the Treadgold concessions have been cancelled. I think the new company has no special right whatever, and cannot prevent miners or householders taking water. That is the great point to guard.

PAYMENTS FOR PRINTING, TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government :

Since the 1st of March, 1904,—

1. Which are, more particularly at Quebec, Montreal and Ottawa, the newspapers, or the printing companies or firms, which publish advertisements or printed documents on account of the commissioners of the Transcontinental Railway ?

2. How much has each of these newspapers or of these companies or firms received, and what is the date of each payment ?

3. For what kind of services, advertisements, printing or puffs, and how much for each kind, have these newspapers or these companies or firms been paid ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If my hon. friend will move for a return I will accept that. The information is being prepared.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move that an humble address be presented to his Excellency the Governor General in Council praying that the information asked under this head be laid before the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

YUKON TERRITORY OFFICIALS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED inquired of the government :

1. What officials, other than mounted police, are employed by the government in the Yukon Territory and what are their respective pay and allowances ?

2. Were any recommendations made by Commissioner McInnes, on the occasion of his recent visit to Ottawa, in favour of a reorganization of the official staff, by reducing the number of officials employed ? If so, what was the nature of these recommendations ?

3. Is it proposed to reorganize the staff of officials in the Yukon ? If so, in what manner ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have the information here from the Department of Inland Revenue, the Customs Department and the Mounted Police as well. As the information is somewhat lengthy I will lay it on the Table as a return.

The document was laid on the Table.

STATE UNIFORMS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate copies of all correspondence between the imperial authorities and the government of Canada relating to the uniform to be worn upon state occasions by privy councillors of the cabinet, privy councillors not of the cabinet, deputy heads of departments, and by any other of the government officials.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know that there is any correspondence. I presume there is a formal paper intimating the uniforms which are to be worn by the difference classes, first, second and third. I think there is such a paper in existence. I have not taken much interest in it myself and have not conformed to it. There is no objection to bringing down the correspondence.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (JJ) An Act to incorporate the Temagami, Cobalt and Temiscaming Railway Company.—(Hon. Mr. McHugh.)

ABSENCE OF JUDGES AT THREE RIVERS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to direct the attention of the government to a fact which has just occurred in the district of Three Rivers. We all know that Three Rivers now has two judges; still there are no judges there. Yesterday a court was convened; one of the judges had gone fishing and the other had gone I don't know where. All the officials, lawyers and clients that were in court were obliged to return after incurring expenses. If there are two judges in Three Rivers one should be there to perform the duty, and I call the attention of the government to this denial of justice to litigants. I hope the hon. Secretary of State will call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact so that the public will learn the reason why these two judges in the district were absent from Three Rivers at the time the court should have been held.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall be very glad to bring the subject to the notice of the Minister of Justice and suggest that he should communicate with the court and ascertain what is the cause of the omission to hold the court on the day selected.

THIRD READING.

Bill (II) An Act for the relief of Muriel Violet Spencer.—(Hon. Mr. Perley.)

RAILWAY ACT, 1903, AMENDMENT BILL.

ORDER OF THE DAY POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called :

Committee of the Whole House on (Bill H) An Act to amend the Railway Act, 1903, with respect to the operation of mortgages.—(Hon. Mr. Béique).

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think Mr. Béique understood that this Bill could not possibly go through this session. There is a Railway Bill before the House of Commons at the present time, and I have asked the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Justice whether they propose to incorporate this proposition, which takes away certain liens that are now in the Railway Act for the security of the bondholders. I am not expressing any individual opinion as to whether that is a reasonable proposition or not. Mr. Béique's contention was that there was great extravagance in many railways and that this was giving the running expenses too great an opportunity to increase the cost. However, without entering into that phase of it, I have mentioned several times to Mr. Béique that it was hopeless to expect that this Bill could go through the House of Commons unless with the concurrence of the Minister of Railways and Minister of Justice. I think the more dignified course for this Chamber to adopt would be to cancel the order rather than pass it here and have it defeated in the other House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is not the hon. gentleman under a misapprehension in saying that the intention of the Bill is to cut down the security of the bondholders ? Quite the contrary is the case ; the object is to enhance the security of the bondholders, at the expense of the government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, just the reverse.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The working out of the Bill would result in this ; that the property and assets of a railway company would not be available for the payment of penalties which might be incurred under the Railway Act. It seemed to me at the time the hon. member from De Salaberry introduced his Bill that it was peculiarly a Bill which should have been introduced by the government and not by a private member. It trenches on the domain of the government with regard to having a field on which to realize for the payment of penalties and, without the consent of the Minister of Railways or the consent of the government, this House should not infringe upon that particular class of security.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from De Salaberry left me in charge of the Bill, and I hope the House will not have any objection to discharging the Order of the Day and putting it down for to-morrow. I shall then be in a position, I suppose, to withdraw the measure; but I am not prepared to do that at the present moment. I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and that the House go into Committee of the Whole on this Bill to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTRAJUDICIAL EMPLOYMENT OF JUDGES BILL.

BILL DROPPED.

The order of the day being called:

Committee of the Whole House on Bill (I) An Act respecting the Extrajudicial Employment of Judges.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Does the hon. gentleman propose to go on with this Bill after the withdrawal of the Bill in charge of a member of the House of Commons? In view of the expression that fell from the Minister of Justice it would be hopeless to expect this Bill to go through, certainly at this stage of the session, when they are trying to run off Bills as fast as they can in the other Chamber. The Bill would not have an opportunity of getting fair consideration.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Perhaps it would be hardly fair of me to press this Bill at this stage of the session after having had it on the order paper so long. I would say, however, that the fate of another Bill in the House of Commons should not necessarily mark out that course for us, because it relates to a different principle altogether. Hon. gentlemen will remember that that measure was to prevent judges from acting on arbitrations; this Bill is to prohibit judges from receiving fees for acting on commissions. Of course they both deal with judges. It has been felt from the outset—I know that has been my feeling—that this is a subject which should properly be dealt with by the government in a general Bill. The late Minister of Justice accepted the the principle of the Bill with regard to arbitration, and gave the hon. member for South Lennox credit for discovering what he deemed to be a defect in the law, and allowed the Bill to be read a second time with his assent and agreed that he would either adopt it as a government measure or include it in a general government measure, or give the hon. gentleman an opportunity of pressing it later. The same principle is not at all involved in this Bill. It simply prohibits judges from receiving extra remuneration for their services when acting upon commissions. The hon. gentleman may remember from the previous discussions we have had, that my object, at all events in a great measure, was to prevent the employment of judges on political commissions. The late Minister of Justice unhesitatingly and unqualifiedly declared himself to be in favour of that principle, and when the House of Commons passed a resolution that all public officials, apart from ministers of the Crown, should give their whole time to the public service in return for the salaries they are receiving, and when the leader of the opposition, entirely concurred in that view, I thought the way was open for this legislation, and having given notice of my intention to introduce it, and then having introduced it and these declarations being on record, I thought the courteous course to persue was to leave it for the government to deal with in the way they thought most proper in connection with other subjects, one of which was the arbitration Bill of the member for South Lennox. However, the late Minister of Justice has left the political arena, and the present Minister of Justice apparently does not entertain the same views—at least not to the same extent. That being the case, and as the session is now approaching its close, I would agree that possibly the best way is not to press this Bill any further at the present time, in the hope that by another session this and many other questions relating to the judiciary will be dealt with by the government in a general measure. I firmly believe that a great deal of harm has been done to the judiciary by the employment of judges on political commissions. I believe that harm is being continually done to the interests of justice as long as the door is left open for the government of the day to throw rewards in the way of judges. I believe this is wrong in principle and should be stopped. We cannot stop it in this way in this House however, and as the matter has now been brought prominently before the attention of the government, and especially of the Minister of Justice, I am content to let the matter rest. I wish to point out that the usefulness of this House is continually being challenged, and reference is continually being made to the small number of Bills which are introduced in this Chamber and which are carried into law. I submit that if we come to the conclusion that any Bill before us is a good measure, we should proceed with it, and in that way we would get credit before the country for doing substantial work; but when we drop Bills in the hope that somebody else, in another place, and at another time, will take the matter up, we lose the opportunity of showing that we are fully alive to the best interests of the country, and we cannot blame the country for coming to the conclusion that we are not doing much good. I move that the order be discharged.

The motion was agreed to.

HADLEY DIVORCE BILL.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE CONSIDERED.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved concurrence in :

The eighteenth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce, to whom was referred the petition of George William Hadley, together with the evidence.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that, in my judgment at least, this report should not be concurred in. The evidence is very voluminous, probably more so than in any other divorce case which has come up since I have had the honour of a seat in this House. I listened to a great portion of the evidence as it was given, and have since read the report carefully. Probably it is presumption on my part, not being a lawyer, to attempt to dissect the evidence and in the remarks which I am about to make in opposition to the adoption of the report I wish it to be understood that I have no reflection whatever to cast upon members of the committee. I think the members of the Divorce Committee are entitled to the thanks of the Senate for the time and patience they devote to eliciting the evidence in such cases. However, they are simply there to hear the evidence and report if they think there is a case for divorce, and the Senate accepts or rejects that report upon the evidence submitted. This is one of the unfortunate cases where two young people come together who are not apparently suited to live with each other. They seem to have come to that conclusion themselves some time ago by agreeing to separate, and Hadley, the petitioner in this case, agreed to pay his wife $5,000 for entire separation. She accepted that amount and left him. Some time afterwards Hadley, apparently I should judge with the object of being put in a position to marry again, applied for a divorce. He never seems to have thought that there was anything wrong with his wife; he swears in his evidence that he had no suspicions regarding her while she was living with him in the hotel, and he has no charge to make against her conduct since she left him after agreeing to a separation. I should judge from reading the evidence that Mrs. Hadley is more sinned against than sinning, because, according to the evidence, their life together was not a happy one. After they had separated, and when Hadley decided that he wanted a divorce, I should judge in order to be in a position to marry again, he employed one Foster, a private detective in the province of Manitoba, to look up evidence to secure that divorce. Foster proceeds to get that evidence, and I should say that it is evidence that is practically paid for, because in every case the strongest evidence given was given by men who were in the employ of Hadley the petitioner. I think we should be very slow to place much confidence in such evidence. I think I am safe in saying that to members of the committee and to any person who was present and heard the evidence of at least one of the witnesses, that witness was certainly guilty of perjury, because he came here and swore to things as to which he could not have been telling the truth. I shall refer to his evidence as I proceed. But the very fact that Mrs. Hadley received $5,000 from her husband—that he was willing to pay that amount when they separated, after all the acts of improper conduct charged against Mrs Hadley had been committed—is strongly in her favour. If there had been glaring immorality on the part of Mrs. Hadley within a stone's throw of the Palace Hotel, I do not think Hadley would have been willing to pay his wife $5,000 for a separation; he would have applied for a divorce as he is doing to-day. There is another serious consideration involved; the characters of other people independent of Mr. and Mrs. Hadley are at stake. Three co-respondents have been mentioned, one of them named Campbell, a respectable citizen of Brandon. In fact when I mentioned Campbell's name to the mayor of Brandon he was surprised to hear that his name should be mixed up in such proceedings. Campbell is a jeweller by trade, and one of the most respectable citizens of Brandon. The members of the committee and the senators who were present and heard Campbell's evidence will endorse the opinion expressed by the mayor of Brandon, because he certainly gave his evidence in a straight forward manner, swearing positively that the statements of other witnesses were untrue. Parks, another jeweller whose name was mentioned as a co-respondent, also gave evidence contradicting those who had connected his name with the case. The only evidence, to my mind, that was produced for the plaintiff was the evidence of Howden the solicitor for Hadley, who some two or three years after the event that he swore to had occurred, after he had drawn up the papers, and assisted Hadley in procuring the separation from his wife, came forward and said that this man Parks had made statements to him in his office which were certainly of the most immoral character. I am surprised that such evidence should be admitted. It was simply hearsay evidence through Mr. Howden as to what Parks had said in his office.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He says himself it is hearsay.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Certainly. There is no question about it at all. Howden says Parks told him certain things, which he stated before the committee, and Detective Foster was eavesdropping and heard the same statement made, and those statements are admitted in evidence. Foster goes on to say that he does not know this man Parks at all. He never saw Mrs. Hadley and Parks together and would not know him if he saw him. He did not know where he resided. I wish to call attention to the fact that there were several adjournments of the committee. I do not know who asked for them or why they were granted. The case dragged on for weeks and apparently there was a missing link in the evidence—something that should be proven, and Foster, the detective, goes back and brings down the missing link—a witness whose evidence is not worthy of much consideration. Foster says he does not know where Parks lives, but he knows enough when he gets back to go up to Dauphin and find him there, and tries to persuade him not to appear here to give evidence, but the counsel for Mrs. Hadley brings Parks here and he swears that the statement made by the other witnesses are false; that he never had improper relations with Mrs. Hadley, barely knew her by sight; that he was boarding in the hotel some six or seven months. The other gentleman referred to is a Mr. Nicol, a gentleman I know well and have known for years. He is one of the men who was supposed to have improper relations with the respondent, although he is an old gentleman 70 years of age, one of the most respectable citizens in the province of Manitoba. I think some hon. gentlemen in the Senate know him. His name is brought in by one of the braided hair bartenders who says he saw Nicol and this respondent in a compromising position. Mr. Nicol is now dead two years, but the other two co-respondents come here and swear positively the evidence is false. Under the circumstances it appears to me that we ought to be very careful in passing on a matter of this kind, because it is not only Mrs. Hadley that is being reflected upon, but it is these other gentlemen who are named as co-respondents. I have been informed—in fact I know—that Mrs. Hadley wanted to produce a witness to prove what her life had been since the separation. It appears to me that if Mrs. Hadley was of the character described by those witnesses; that she had committed the acts she had been charged with in Brandon in her own home, where her husband was living, in the same house and other places within a stone's throw of the hotel.

I suppose evidence would have been brought to show the character of the woman and the life she had led since the separation. Evidently she intended after the separation not to live with Hadley again, and one would suppose that she would court rather than oppose divorce proceedings. She is a young woman, thirty years of age, and she offered to produce witnesses before the committee to prove as to her conduct and life since the separation. One would suppose, if she was of the character described by the bartenders—I won't say by Mr. Hadley, because Hadley says he had no suspicion of anything being wrong with his wife, and it was not called to his attention until after the separation, and none of these witnesses ever mentioned the circumstances to anybody else until two or three years afterwards, until Foster was employed to obtain evidence to get the divorce, that her conduct after the separation was worth inquiring into. I understand the committee said—and fairly so—that she was not charged with any improper conduct after the separation, and consequently there was no use hearing the evidence, that she was prepared to submit. To my mind such evidence as to her conduct since the separation would go a long way to upset the evidence given as to her conduct while she was living with Mr. Hadley as his wife. No doubt the evidence has been read by members of the House, and it is not for me to take up very much time with it ; but take the evidence that is given : We find first that Foster, who is an alleged insurance agent and bartender ; there is Smith, the bartender in the petitioner's hotel ; Voight, a bartender in the hotel; Boyd, a policeman; Clapp, a brakeman, and Howden, solicitor in the proceedings for Hadley. With the array of evidence, coupled with the fact that Howden, as solicitor for Hadley, drew up the separation document under which Hadley agreed to pay Mrs. Hadley $5,000, I do not think his evidence should carry any weight for the reason that he, as counsel for Hadley drawing up that document under which he granted his wife a separation for $5,000, was aware of the facts of the story Parks told him, of which he gave evidence in the divorce proceedings. If he is to be believed, he was in possession of that evidence at the time, and can one imagine a counsel advising his client to pay $5,000 to have a separation when he claims he had in his possession evidence whereby he could procure a divorce without paying a cent? I think on the face of it that is a reason why Howden's evidence should not be accepted at all, and as far as the other gentlemen employed by Mr. Hadley are concerned, I place them in the same position. This man Clapp, the alleged brakeman, came down here and gave evidence. Hon. gentlemen who have read the evidence remember that it was stated that Mrs. Hadley went out at night while Hadley was absent in Banff, and that she came in through basement windows to get into the house. One of the bartenders who was on duty as night watchman after 12 o'clock stated that Mrs. Hadley came up from downstairs with all her clothes on. Mrs. Hadley said it was simply absurd to make any such suggestion, and that even if she wanted to, she could not get through the windows because they were too small. There was an adjournment for two weeks, and Foster goes to Brandon and comes back and swears as to the size of the windows. Why did he go and measure the windows ? He swears the divorce proceedings were not discussed between him and any person at the hotel, that he knew nothing about what was going on at Ottawa; simply out of curiosity, without a suggestion from anybody, he goes downstairs with a rule and measures the windows, and comes to Ottawa and gives us the size to an eighth of an inch. Can you believe that story is true ? It is absurd on the face of it. After giving that evidence, he testified to seeing Campbell and Mrs. Hadley through a window while he was driving along the street in a buggy. That is another part of his evidence. We have also a story told by a detective who was paid for giving evidence that he tied shoe strings on the door, and said that Mrs. Hadley was up there in Campbell's room, and he had put the shoe strings on to ascertain when they came out. He apparently knew nothing about when they did come out, but he says they were there in the morning. The woman may not have been there at all. This had all happened some two or three years before. He said nothing about it, and no mention was made of it until the divorce proceedings were started, and this man Foster was employed to secure evidence to get a divorce. Hadley in his evidence swore that he had no suspicion of any improper conduct on the part of his wife, during their married life. Only one incident had occurred which had aroused his suspicion and he recalled that incident. After this evidence of Foster—that Campbell one night went into his room with Mrs. Hadley and they were there talking and he suggested to his wife that it might be more proper to go down to the public sitting room and carry on the conversation there. In all his evidence that is the only suggestion he was able to make that Campbell and his wife had been familiar. Both Mrs. Hadley and Campbell referred to the incident and I think their evidence justifies their conduct on that particular occasion. The three men most interested in this case are Hadley who, of course, wants his divorce. Foster, the detective who, no doubt, will be paid handsomely if a divorce is secured, and Howden, the solicitor, on the same line. I think this House ought to be very careful in granting a divorce. In all cases where the committee have great doubts—in fact are almost certain in their own minds—that any witness before the committee is guilty of perjury, he ought to be prosecuted. If that were done, there would be fewer applications for divorce, because I believe it is quite possible for any person who wishes to procure a divorce to hire a detective, and that detective in turn could hire witnesses to give evidence before the committee. The respondent appeared here with her counsel and gave her evidence and ably defended her case. The young woman was evidently determined, so far as she could, to protect her good name, and I do think we ought to be very careful about granting this divorce. I heard some of the evidence, and read what I did not hear given, and I had opportunity of seeing the demeanour of the witnesses, and from all that I could see and learn I do not think this is a case where a divorce ought to be granted. For that reason I am opposed to the adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—From my experience of the Divorce Committee within the last few days, and my experience in connection with divorce cases in this House, I would honestly recommend the government to seriously consider the advisability of establishing a divorce court. I am a member of the Divorce Committee, and I know that the committee endeavour to do their duty and mete out justice impartially in all cases coming before them. Every member of this House has a right to attend the meetings of that committee, and hear all that is said, and suggest questions if he thinks proper to do so. Now with regard to the question of Mr. Hadley buying a separation from his wife, I may say such is not the fact. Mrs. Hadley made a demand on her husband for $5,000. She declared that she would not live with him and the only terms upon which she would agree to separate was the payment to her of $5,000, and on receipt of that she would go out and do for herself. Hadley on the other hand begged of her, got down on his knees and implored her to stay with him, promising to give her private rooms and every comfort and privilege she could possibly desire if she would only agree to live with him, and she refused. She insisted upon a separation and on the terms she demanded. Now my hon. friend presents it as if he had negotiated with his wife to get a separation on payment of $5,000. In the next place he says that Hadley wants to get married again.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I said the presumption was that he did.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I put the question to Hadley myself if he had any contract or expectation to enter into a marriage relation with any other person if he got a divorce, and he distinctly swore that he had none, and had no present intention of getting married. Any person who will read the evidence will find that the statements I make are borne out by the evidence. It is true he did not know of the infidelity of his wife up to the time she separated from him. He swears that he loved, worshipped his wife and that he had no suspicion——

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Will the hon. gentleman refer to the evidence where he swears he loved his wife?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The best evidence that he loved his wife is where he swears that he got down on his knees and begged her to stay with him, promising to give her a lady's life. If he had not loved her he would not have done that. He swears that he did not know anything about the improper conduct of his wife until after the separation, and then these things turned up, all tending to show the object she had in urging the separation and stipulating the terms upon which it should be granted. Now with regard to Parks; she swore on her examination that she did not know him; that she had never seen or met him. Parks swore that he had lived at the house for eight months; that he sat at the same table and was in the drawing room and knew Mrs. Hadley very well. When Mrs. Hadley swore that she did not know Parks, he had gone away from Brandon, and the supposition was that he had got out of reach of any summons. They did not anticipate that he could be got, and in view of that she swore that she had never known Parks.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Who brought Parks here?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I will come to that in a moment. Afterwards Parks did turn up, and an application was made to the committee for an order to bring him here. We granted the order and a subpœna and made an order that Hadley should pay the expense of bringing Parks here. Parks came an swore that he knew Mrs. Hadley, had met her at her own house, but he swore at the same time that there had been no improper relations between them. I have been a member of the Divorce Committee for three years, and my experience has been that any man guilty of improper relations with other men's wives as a rule will not admit the truth. Now, take the case of Parks. He is a young man and was married five months ago. What an admission it would be to go home to the ears of his young wife, that on an investigation before the Divorce Committee at Ottawa he had admitted having had improper relations with Mrs. Hadley.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Why bring him here?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Mrs. Hadley's counsel brought him here to prove that he had never had improper relations with Mrs. Hadley.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Who gave the order?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The Divorce Committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—With the idea that he would not tell the truth ?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Don't you suppose that they brought Parks here to swear to the truth and not to prove a certain thing ?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—They brought him here to prove that there had been no improper relations between him and the respondent, and he swore to that no doubt. He was in an extremely embarrassing position when he was asked to give that evidence. With regard to Mr. Foster, he is an ordinary detective in Brandon. Nothing has been established against him. He was employed as a detective to do detective work. I have not heard that he is either a blackguard or an untruthful man. No attempt was made to show that there was anything wrong with his character. The committee after carefully reviewing the whole case came to the conclusion that Hadley was entitled to a divorce. In coming to that conclusion they were unbiased and based their judgment wholly on the evidence taken before them. If sympathy had been allowed to play any part in the matter they might have decided in favour of Mrs. Hadley. She is a very nice woman and it is a great pity that any trouble has arisen between her and her husband, but the facts are there, and the committee came to the conclusion that the conduct of the woman was such that her husband was entitled to the relief prayed for. I repeat, it is time the government seriously considered this whole question and established a divorce court. I think further that this House should, when a fair case is made out, sustain its own committee. We should expect fair treatment at the hands of the House when we come to an honest conclusion in any case.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—I do not think the speech of the hon. gentleman agrees with his letter in the Toronto 'Globe.'

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I did not oppose a divorce court. I said that where there were divorce courts more divorces were granted than in the portions of the Dominion where there are no divorce courts, but after all in order to secure justice to people who apply for it, I would prefer to have a divorce court rather than have the wranglings that we have over these cases in parliament.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—As the hon. senator from Wellington has referred to the Divorce Committee, and as I, fortunately or unfortunately, am a member of that committee, perhaps it would be proper for me to give my reason for dissenting from the finding of the majority of the committee. The majority of the committee felt that they were in a position to report in favour of the petitioner. But while that was the case, and while some of the evidence if it had been to my mind reliable and if I could have believed that there was nothing back of that evidence, no discreditable means whereby the evidence was brought forward to prove the case, I might have said perhaps that the woman was guilty. But it is a very serious matter for an individual to make up his mind, unless he has evidence of the strongest kind, to step in between a husband and wife, especially a wife with a small child eight or nine years old. I feel that we have no right to tarnish the character of a woman, if she is innocent, upon the evidence of, perhaps, hirelings. I further say that the innocent child who has never committed a wrong should not be branded as the offspring of a mother who has been guilty of sin without absolute proof of her guilt. It is a serious matter to reflect upon the character and the conduct of the wife in such cases unless we have the very best evidence. Hadley says that he had no cause of complaint; he knew of nothing wrong, and he did not suspect anything wrong with Mrs. Hadley until after the separation had taken place. Why didn't he submit to the separation? Why didn't he remain faithful to the agreement he had entered into? Why did he seek later on to obtain a divorce? If there were any acts that would have justified obtaining a divorce they took place before the time of the separation. They were acts committed, not after the separation, but before it. My hon. friend has referred to the evidence of Howden. Who is this Howden? He is Hadley's solicitor. He drew up the agreement by which Mrs. Hadley should get $5,000. Now, if he believed what this man Parks said, if he said it, which I doubt very much, that this woman was guilty of what Parks confessed, I ask why did he agree that his client should pay $5,000 when he had ample and sufficient evidence in his possession at the time to get a Bill of divorce? I place no confidence in that statement of Howden's. It looks to me as the statement of a man devoid of a proper sense of duty, and a professional man who would act in the capacity of a solicitor between party and party, knowing and believing that Parks had sworn to the truth, had sworn to this woman being guilty, and yet that Hadley, his client, should pay her $5,000 when he could have gone into court and got a divorce, is a man whose evidence should not carry weight. He gave no reason why he came into court excepting that he had heard later on, after the separation, that Mrs. Hadley had been guilty of these crimes. We have the evidence of Hadley stating positively and plainly that he had no suspicion of his wife; that he had no reason to doubt her truthfulness and her honesty towards him —that he did on one occasion, after Mr. Campbell and Mrs. Hadley had been in Hadley's room together talking over various matters, see Campbell go into Mrs. Hadley's work room, sitting room, parlour, if you like—it was a place where she received her guests—and enter into conversation with her there. As to this Campbell swore, and so also did Mrs. Hadley, that he went into the room merely to exchange a book and the evidence showed that the door was not closed, that it was open quite a little way.

Now, we have Hadley asserting one thing and we have Mrs. Hadley declaring positively that she is innocent of all the charges preferred against her. What are we to do? We also heard what my hon. friend refers to regarding this man Parks. He made a great point, or tried to, upon the fact that Mrs. Hadley said that she did not remember Parks, but did he state that when the photograph of Parks was shown it was of an entirely different appearance, because Parks when he was in Brandon had been baldheaded, with a mustache? When the photograph was shown there was a beautiful wig and the moustache was shaved off. I suppose any man or woman after the lapse of three years might have forgotten. Then the great point is made that he was there for a length of time. Parks swears that he never slept in the Hadley hotel except on one occasion, when he was up where he is living now and came down and stayed in Brandon over night; that when he came to Brandon to go into employment there he roomed in another place and boarded for a time in Hadley's hotel. We have his sworn evidence that very frequently when he would come in at 1.30 for dinner Mrs. Hadley would not be there; frequently Mr. Hadley was present. Mrs. Hadley was down in the kitchen, she swears, attending to her domestic duties, and it may be that day in and day out she would not have an opportunity of seeing this man Parks. Therefore, the evidence falls to the ground. She positively said that she did not recognize him. Then she is charged with intimacy with another man—a man over 70 years old, a respectable man; and she swears positively to the contrary.

No evidence is brought to substantiate the charge that he had ever been under any circumstances intimate with her. What evidence is there that any of these other men had been intimate with her? None whatever—merely hearsay. Then further when did the petitioner commence proceedings for a divorce? Was it before or after the separation took place? Hadley said he had no suspicion of his wife; but they say now that they did not live peaceably and harmoniously together. From the time they were married at Rat Portage, she joined heartily in work and entered with her husband into the various necessary industries of life, and they accumulated quite a large amount of money. It is clear they must have lived in peace and harmony, though he says his life was not very agreeable with her. But why should it be? It is sworn by her that two or three weeks after they were married, he presented her with a bill for her wedding ring, and other things of that kind. What would any wife think of a husband if he were to present a bill of that nature to her? It is true he said he did not do it, but here we have the two statements. Further, she had just cause and reason why she was not friendly with him and why she left the hotel. My hon. friend from Wellington did not refer to that phase of the case. There was a woman in the affair; a Miss McDonald was working there, and Miss McDonald got on the right side of Mr. Hadley and he would not dismiss her. Mrs. Hadley said: Take your choice between us, either dismiss Miss McDonald or else I will leave. He said 'go'.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—My hon. friend knows better than that. Let him turn up the evidence and see what he said. He begged his wife to remain; he did everything he could to get her to remain with him. She swore that he said 'go', but he denied saying anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Did he deny that he said it, that he told her to go?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—She swore that he said that, but he denied ever saying so.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—There was a reason why they did not live peacebly and harmoniously together. Did he deny being intimate with Miss McDonald? If he had not been intimate with her, and had not sided with her in preference to his own wife, he would have given his evidence to that effect.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Shame, shame. My hon. friend knows full well there is nothing in that.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It appears that my hon. friend does not know as much about this case as I thought he did. There were two men charged with being co-respondents. One was Park. Park went by the name of Parks in Brandon, but his correct name is Park. He went therefore by a name that is not is own, and I can, therefore, understand that Mrs. Hadley did not fully understand when the question was put to her: 'Did you know Morris Parks'? She did not know Morris Parks, because it was Maurice Park; therefore she was quite correct. My hon. friend laughs; he knows full well that he went by that name and not by the name of Park, as he should have been called.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Which was his real name?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—My hon. friend should know his real name. He swore that his name was Park, not Parks, and my hon. friend who has introduced this report and who has the evidence before him, questions me as to what the correct name of this witness was. The correct name was Park, not Parks at all. Again we have other evidence submitted, that of Mr. Campbell, who is said to be one of the most respectable young men in the town. He worked in a jewellery store there. He was charged with being one of the co-respondents. He swears positively that no intimacy ever existed between him and Mrs. Hadley. Are we to take Hadley's statement pure and simple, and are we to deny Mrs. Hadley's statement altogether when we have the co-respondent swearing distinctly that he never had any intimacy with her?

I think that that evidence ought to have some weight. No man ought to be so demoralized that he would not tell the truth under oath. Park, who is another co-respondent, also swears most emphatically that he was never either directly or indirectly intimate with Mrs. Hadley. Do you want more evidence than that? The evidence against Mrs. Hadley is that of the petitioner, and his hirlings who came down here to testify for him. We all know full well how that evidence was obtained. We had before us a man by the name of Foster, a detective. We all know what the evidence of detectives amounts to. You know that if you go to a court of law and had nothing but evidence procured by secret detectives, the court would not be inclined to base a decison on the evidence of such hirelings. These hirelings were employees of Mr. Hadley. They had worked in his hotel. They were just the ones that would be always ready to make change at the bar, or to tell anything that would further the interests of the proprietor that supplied them with their change at the bar. We find those men who knew, if they knew anything—and we learn that they did know in 1902—did not tell a single thing. Nobody knew what evidence they were going to give before this committee, but Foster, the secret detective, collected these witnesses. First one would come down and swear to a story, and then the next time some other witness would come down and swear to a similar story. If you asked them whether they had heard anything of this case, they would reply that they might have been telling this to Foster. He was the one who prepared, arranged, distributed, and gave these witnesses to understand what they were to swear to when they came down here. Now are you going to believe that evidence? There is evidence given that Parks had made a statement in Howden's office in the hearing of Foster. Foster was always very happy to turn up just at the time he wanted to get certain evidence that would prove the guilt of the woman, who is no doubt far superior in every respect to Foster, because Foster's reputation in Brandon is not any better than it should be. Mrs. Hadley swore that she would not believe him under oath, and another witness stated that what he said was false. Therefore you cannot rely on the detective's evidence. Again, if Foster and Howden knew at the time of the separation that this woman was guilty, I ask why they permitted Mr. Hadley to be bled to the tune of $5,000 for a separation? Is it reasonable to expect that they should allow that? It is unreasonable. There is no reason why they should have acted in that way, and if any one told me that Howden was a lawyer of good standing, I would say that I would not like to trust a case in his hands after knowing that a transaction of that kind had taken place between him and his client. Howden was Hadley's solicitor and no doubt advised him what to do. Then as to the agreement for separation there is a dispute. Hadley states one thing and Mrs. Hadley another. Which are we to believe? Which is telling the truth? I am inclined to think that when a man would tell his wife that she was to go to the devil, or go to hell, or something of that kind, that he was not in strong sympathy and unison with her.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—He denied it. Hadley swore he never made any such statement.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—She swore that he did.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is getting a little hot.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I would believe one as well as the other. He is anxious to get a divorce and she is not; she is defending her honour. She was apparently quite well satisfied to take the $5,000. She went off to the United States and intended to live there in peace, because she was driven from Winnipeg on account of the conduct of Howden making known he was going to ask for the divorce, and the employees in the place where she was working for a living looked down on her, and she was dismissed from her employment and had to go away to the States. If we pass this Bill we add injury to insult on this woman. She was willing to leave the country and reside in a foreign country, but her husband was not satisfied. He appealed to the courts to disgrace her name, and disgrace his offspring, his little girl, that he might be relieved of the wife and have an opportunity of marrying again. I ask hon. gentlemen if we are going to allow a thing of this kind to take place? I appeal to the House to do justice between this man and woman. We find that all the witnesses, every one of them, has either been directly or indirectly employees of Hadley or in Hadley's hotel. There is a statement made in reference to the size of the basement windows. It is in evidence that she was seen coming up from down stairs at a late hour of night, and one of the employees thought that she had come in from the street through the cellar window and come up stairs. Her husband was away, and, as a true wife, she would naturally be looking after his interest, having the welfare of her husband at heart. What did she do? When she came home she would go down and see that everything was all right, because they had a fire there a short time before. She wished to see that the doors were locked and everything in proper order, yet because as a wife she was true to her duty, witnesses come before the committee and swear they thought that she must have climbed through some of the windows before coming up stairs.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—Is this evidence not all printed?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—Why should it be rehearsed now?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Because there are some hon. gentlemen who are not so industrious, so studious and ready to read and digest the evidence before the Divorce Committee, as my hon. friend from Halifax. If we were all like my hon. friend, it would not be necessary for me to make a single remark. We would all say 'this man is not entitled to a divorce.' Therefore I am willing to leave the thing in my hon. friend's hands. It is a serious matter to all of us, and we should see that this woman receives simple justice; therefore I will give way and allow my hon. friend to interpret the evidence in the way he thinks best, and try to convince hon. gentlemen if there are any who have not read the evidence themselves. For these reasons, I shall vote against the resolution.

Hon. Mr. JONES—Before voting upon this motion, I should like to say a word or two, and I hope the House will bear with me. I have no knowledge of or acquaintance with either of the parties, or any witness appearing before the committee. Possibly I should not have read the evidence quite so carefully if I had not first heard indirectly some evidence relating to one of the principal witnesses, an employee of the petitioner, a Mr. Smith, who, in the course of his evidence, made very damaging statements because of the alleged relationship between the defendent and Alec Nichol. I happen to know Alec Nichol. He was in the employ of my company for eighteen years. I knew him very intimately indeed. I never knew a higher minded, better citizen in the course of my business life than Alec Nichol. If Alec Nichol had been living it would have been unnecessary for me to make that statement to the House. Between the time that this is said to have occurred, and the time these divorce proceedings were commenced he died, and, therefore, in justice to his family and in justice to his name, I feel that it would be unfair for me not to state to the House that one of the reasons that impels me to differ from the conclusions of the committee, is because of that particular evidence, and I submit to any hon. gentleman in this House who has read the report that if he will read again what the witness says the circumstances were, and what is alleged to have taken place between the defendant and Nichol, and the conditions under which it it is alleged it took place, it will appeal to a majority of the members of this House as being absolutely untrue and ridiculous.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—And the age limit. too.

Hon. Mr. JONES—I am not going to say anything about the age limit. I cannot imagine that such evidence had weight with the committee. I may say first that, leaving aside entirely the evidence of the petitioner and the respondent, I am bound to say that in reading the evidence it impressed me that the story of the respondent was told in a straightforward manner, and would create in my mind as favourable an impression as the evidence of the petitioner. But the plaintiff himself says under oath that he of his own knowledge knows of no reason why he should have a divorce. It appeals to me therefore that the evidence of the plaintiff may, for that reason, be set aside, and you may put aside if you will the evidence of the defendant also, and take the evidence of the witnesses which influenced the committee. I was impressed with the fact that many features of that evidence did not carry great weight. Take the evidence of a Mr. Foster, and the incident described by him. He alleges that he saw the respondent go some distance and enter rooms occupied by Mr. Campbell at between ten and half-past eleven in the evening. He says he saw this accidently, because he was on duty on the street, and he was curious to know how long the respondent was likely to remain. I will just read what he says. He speaks of the respondent going upstairs, and then the question is asked :

Q. Did you go in ?—A. No, I did not go in and did not want to stay there to watch. I was not in that business, watching anybody, but I thought 'for curiosity, I am going to see how long this woman stays there ; ' so I fixed the door so that I would know if she came out, or if it was opened I would know it.

Q. How did you fix the door ?—A. I took a little piece of shoe string, and took a pin, and stuck it in at each end, and put one into the door, and one into the jam at the top and as long as that string was there there is nobody comes out.

Q. Did you do that with one door ?—A. I done it with all the doors.

Q. What time was this?—A. That would be between ten o'clock at night and about half past eleven. It might be about eleven o'clock, somewhere there, I could not fix the hour because I was not very much interested. I just wanted to see how long she would stay there.

Q. Did you examine the door after that ?—A. I did. I examined the doors at 6 o'clock next morning.

Q. How were they ?—A. The same as I left them.

Q. Had you any instructions from the petitioner Hadley to watch Mrs. Hadley?—A. I never did.

Q. You did that on your own responsibility,? —A. Yes.

Q. And these strings were intact ?—A. Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—She is there yet ?

Hon. Mr. JONES—He swears he had no interest in this matter, and that he acted out of simple curiosity. I appeal to the members of this House is that evidence that a man who is simply actuated by curiosity would be likely to give ? Does it sound reasonable that if this woman went to the rooms of a young man that she would stay until it became necessary to go home in the morning to a busy hotel ? The evidence indicates that this hotel was full of travellers practically all the time, and we are told that she did not go home until the hotel was all astir and every servant about the place could see when she came in. When I read the evidence it sounded so absurd, that it was bound to prejudice the plaintiff's case. Another portion of the evidence refers to the respondent crawling through the windows of the house into the basement. I happen to know something of the locality in Brandon. This hotel faces on the busy street of Brandon, and the rooms mentioned face on that street. It does not appeal to me that the conditions which I have described would be likely to happen if there was any desire on the part of the respondent to visit those rooms. It seems to me that if she made the considerable number of visits mentioned, she would be likely to go home at such reasonable time as not to attract the attention of the people of Brandon moving about in the early hours of morning and evening. She would not let them know about her movements if she had anything that she would desire to conceal. Then the statement that she crawled through the basement window to return to her own home, did not impress me as evidence which is of any value. I am sure the members of the committee ought not to feel, as one hon. member has indicated they should, that this House acting practically as a jury should accept without questioning the decision of the committee. We have to consider the evidence and give our votes as we think justice demands. I do not think the hon. gentleman intended to indicate that an adverse vote would be any reflection on the committee, although he said it would in so many words.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I did not intend to convey any such idea.

Hon. Mr. JONES—The hon. gentleman conveyed that impression to me, and I am sure it was not intended. Everybody in this House would be pleased if these cases did not come before us, but so long as they do, it is our bounden duty to read the evidence carefully and to vote as we believe is in the best interests of justice. Taking it all in all it appeals to me from a careful reading of this evidence that I was bound in honour, from the convictions I have formed and for the reasons I have given, and many others which I might give, to vote against the recommendation of the committee.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I cannot say that I am at all averse to having this matter brought up as it has been here to-day. I am always anxious for an honest criticism of anything that is done. I like to hear matters discussed, and I like to see the interest this House takes in reading the evidence in these divorce cases. That is very apparent, because if by any chance I attempt to move the adoption of a report before every member of the House has had an opportunity of reading the evidence thoroughly, I am always called to order and obliged to postpone it to another day. I am always willing to do that, and anxious that everybody should possess himself of all the facts in connection with every case. I have said before, and I reiterate now, that the members of this committee have absolutely no interest whatever in seeing anything except the law carried out as it is given to us. In this House there are many members who are opposed to divorce from religious and other scruples, and who consider it their duty because of these scruples to oppose the granting of a divorce if they consider there is an opportunity of having it defeated. I am anxious to see justice done according to the law of the land, and I do not think any Bill should be defeated simply because of the religious or other scruples of some of our members. In this case we had a most exhaustive trial. I hope hon. gentlemen will not expect me to go into a resume of the evidence. We have been censured by some hon. gentlemen who have spoken because of some incidents which took place during the trial. One was that adjournments were allowed for the purpose of procuring evidence. That was done on behalf of the defendant.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I had no intention of censuring the committee. I said there had been adjournments from time to time, I do not know at whose instance.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I am explaining that it was done on behalf of the defendant, because the committee considers it a plain duty not to take advantage of any technical objections which might be made to the reception of evidence. We are instructed by our orders to hear and determine, and for that purpose we open up every avenue so that parties can state their case without prejudice. The respondent was given an opportunity to bring evidence in support of her case. Another point that was taken here was that we had not allowed the respondent to produce evidence as to her character subsequent to the events which brought about these proceedings. We did not do so because it was not necessary. Her subsequent character was not impugned. We admitted everything that was put forward on her behalf, but there was no object in bringing evidence from a distance as to what there was no controversy about. The hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this case have taken the position, apparently—certainly one has taken the position, that all the evidence given on behalf of the petitioner was not entitled to credence, but that all the evidence on the other side was to be believed. I never conceived that credence was to be given to one side more than to the other. My hon. friend from St. Thomas (Hon. Mr. Wilson) is a gentleman to whose opinions on medical matters we attach great weight. He always gives us good advice. He is an able doctor, and on medical questions, which frequently come up in these cases, we always pay the greatest attention to his views. But outside of that he does not know more than any one else, so far as evidence is concerned. We always like if there is an adverse report to have it presented, but when a member of the committee thinks that the evidence on one side only is entitled to credence it is not evidence of good judgment.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—What I did say was that the evidence produced to corroborate the charges was evidence prepared by Foster, and that the witnesses were employees of the Hadley hotel who came here to give their evidence.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I am quite able to understand what the hon. gentleman said. It must be understood that the evidence on the other side was the evidence of parties to the suit—the respondent and the co-respondents. We have all heard stories of people who consider that a co-respondent is entitled to come, as was said of the Prince of Wales in the Morduant case—into court and perjure himself like a gentleman. Many people think it is the correct thing to do. We have seen it done by co-respondents over and over again, and what have we found afterwards? Two years ago, in a case from Montreal, a man swore that he had never been alone with the lady in his life—this in contradiction to what other witnesses had sworn to positively. Three weeks after that he was married to the party with whom it was alleged he had been living with in improper relations, in the United States.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Was the fact that he was living with the woman as her husband evidence that he had committed adultery?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I mention it to show that we must take with a certain amount of hesitation evidence which is distinctly applicable to the parties themselves, and in which they are concerned. In this case we had evidence on the one side which was absolutely independent. Because a man is a bartender, there is no reason to conclude that he is a perjurer. There was not a man who gave evidence for the petitioner in that case who had reason to give evidence contrary to what is true. On the other side the co-respondent is always anxious to clear himself, especially if he be a young married man. Mrs. Hadley is a very smart, clever young woman. She gave evidence on her own behalf. A good deal has been said about Hadley not having taken notice of his wife's misconduct until the divorce proceedings commenced. As a rule we know that everybody in town is posted about these things before the husband learns of them. As a rule he is the last to hear of them. He has respect for his wife, and while everybody else knows he does not know. What brought this to Hadley's notice was the finding in his bed room of garter buckles with Campbell's initials on them. He questioned her about it, and there is an explanation given as to the intimacy existing between Campbell and herself. It is as follows:

Q. What do you say as to the intimacy that existed between Campbell and yourself during the time you were in Brandon? What was the nature of it?—A. Why, Mr. Bethune, to give it to you in my own words, Mr. Campbell seemed to be the only one in Brandon who interested me.

Q. What do you mean by that?—A. Well, I went into his store one time, and he said to me that I put him in mind of a great actress, one that was leading a double life, and Mr. Hadley and I had some indifferences that day, or some differences, and I started to cry right in the store, and I told Mr. Campbell little parts of my life, and he seemed to understand me, and Mr. Campbell was rather a superior man, and he was a gentleman and an honourable man, so far as I knew and one whom I might say I had been better for knowing, not worse.

Then she was asked at the same time about Maurice Parks:

Q. You have heard to-day some evidence about a man called Maurice Parks?—A. Well, yes I did.

Q. Do you know Maurice Parks?—A. No, sir, not to my knowledge.

Q. Did you ever know any such man as Maurice Parks?—A. If I had his photograph I might say 'I have seen that man' or 'I know that man,' but to the best of my knowledge at this moment I do not.

Q. You do not know any man of the name of Maurice Parks?—A. No, Mr. Bethune. I did not know this man Forester that was here to-day. I never saw him to the best of my knowledge until to-day.

Q. Never saw him?—A. No, sir, not to the best of my knowledge.

And further down she is asked:

And you swear that you do not know any person by the name of Maurice Parks?—A. Yes, I swear.

A little further on we get some evidence of her intimacy with this man Campbell, when a question is asked about the garters he gave her:

Q. What are Campbell's initials, do you know ?—A. W. M. Campbell.

Q. Did you ever wear garter buckles with W. M. C. on them ?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where did you get those ?—A. Well, I took those from Mr. Campbell.

Q. You mean you took them as a gift ?—A. No, not exactly. Mr. Campbell showed me these garters in the store one day without any initials on them and he told me he was going to give them to a certain young lady, mentioning the lady's name and I said 'you are,' and he said 'yes,' and the next time I was in Reesor's he showed them to me with his initials on them, and asked me if I did not think they were pretty, and I told him yes, and he said, 'I am going to give those to that young lady on conditions. I said 'what conditions.' Well, he would not tell me for a while, and I said 'well, tell me what conditions ?' 'Well,' he said 'on conditions that I put them on.' 'Why, I said, Mr. Campbell you would not do such a thing. I know you would not. You would not be the Mr. Campbell I think you are if you would,' and he said he was going to do it, and I did not go near Mr. Campbell for quite a while, and when I did go in there I said, 'Well, how did you get on with the garters ?' and he said 'I thought better of it, and did not do it,' and I said, 'You have not got them,' and he said, 'Indeed I have and showed them, and just in fun I picked them up and I said 'I will remove the temptation from the weaker brother' and I put them under my arm and walked off with them, just for pure devilment, and I kept them in the top drawer of my dresser for a couple of months—well, scarcely that—we were cleaning at the time, and I put them in the top drawer of the dresser, and then I put them in my trunk, and I thought I must take those garters to Mr. Campbell, but I forgot all about it, and one day I said 'I have got to bring those garters down. I have been intending to bring them down all the time and I forgot,' and he just said 'Mrs. Hadley, you just keep them,' and I said 'I do not want to' and he said 'You just keep them' and Mr. Hadley saw them, and to save a row I told him they were Winnie Cameron's initials, but they were not. They were Campbell's initials that is true.

Q. You wore them ?—A. Yes.

Q. With his initials ?—A. Well, not because they had his initials. I did not wear them because they had his initials.

Q. You did wear them ?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. And you did not tell Hadley how you got them or where ?—A. No, Mr. Hadley asked me whose initials they were and I told him they were Winnie Cameron's, and I cut all the elastic pieces out of them and put the little sterling silver bits away, and I do not know where they are.

Innocent little woman !

Hon. Mr. WILSON—You would not think that there was any guilt established by that evidence ?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Oh, no, it was the most innocent thing in the world. Then the question came up afterwards about this man Maurice Park. Maurice Park was sworn and examined and asked how many times he had met Mrs. Hadley. His evidence is as follows :

By the Hon. Mr. Lougheed :

Q. Approximately how many times have you met Mrs. Hadley ? If you had been mealing there in the hotel from August till March, I suppose you would have met her fifty times at least ?—A. That is a question.

Q. I mean in a casual way to say good-day to her, or see her ?—A. I may have.

Q. I do not refer to meetings between you?—A. I may have met her casually just the same as I would meet anybody else.

Q. Could you explain to the committee why Mrs. Hadley made the statement that she did not know that such a person as you existed ?—A. She might easily do it in three years' time.

Q. With the knowledge both of you had of each other ?—A. She might easily do it inside of three years.

Q. That would be your explanation ?—A. That would be my explanation.

Q. Although you and she knew each other at the time, yet in that time she would entirely have forgotten that you existed ?—A. Yes, she might.

Q. How long ago is it since you left Brandon?—A. Well, it was on March 28th, 1903.

Q. Did you return to Brandon after that ?—A. I was there twice.

Q. During what time ?—A. 1903.

Q. And for what length of time did you stay ?—A. The first time I stayed over night. The train got in about 6.30. I had my time.

Q. And the next time ?—A. The time of the Brandon Fair, I do not remember the date.

Q. Did you stay there?—A. I was there a day and a half.

Q. Did you see Mrs. Hadley on either of those occasions ?—A. No.

Q. Did you go into the Palace Hotel ?—A. Not the second time.

Q. You did the first time ?—A. Yes.

Q. And you have not seen her, nor has she seen you since that time ?—A. Not until the night before last.

Q. Do you think that possible she could have forgotten your name during that period ?—A. Why, yes ; she might have done it. I know I have forgotten names in that length of time.

By the Hon. Mr. Wilson :

Q. Did you go by the name of Park or Parks ?—A. Park is my name, some call me Parks.

Q. Do you think it would be possible for her to confound your name, as the name given was Parks; and she did not understand that it was Morris Park ?—A. No, I do not think so.

Q. She always called you Park whenever she spoke to you ?—A. I do not remember whether she called me Park or Parks.

By the Chairman :

Q. Do you remember her ever addressing you by name ?—A. Mr. Park or Mr. Parks, I do not remember which.

Now this was the lady who gave evidence stating that she did not know there was such a man in existence as Maurice Park. My hon. friend tried to make out that it was a different name and that she was entitled to lenient treatment when she said that she did not know the man on account of this 's' being added to his name. I do not wish to go over the other evidence that has been given. It is claimed that she would not likely have known Park, because of the wig he wore. It was not a question of her recognizing him now, it was a question whether she knew him in the past. Now in all these cases we have to judge, where there is contradictory evidence, by such extraneous circumstance. We have to inquire whether the parties have any interest in the matter and, if such is shown to be the case, I would not weigh their evidence in the same way as if it appeared to be entirely independent. But where a party is caught in a direct falsehood as the respondent was in this instance, that would as far as I am concerned cause me to give less credence to a great deal more of the evidence she gave. For my own part I do not care how this case goes. It is out of our hands when we make our report, so far as I am concerned. If the House sees fit to turn down the report of the committee they are welcome to do so. I have been 14 years on the committee and I am sick and tired of it. I do not utter this as a threat, but no matter which way this case goes, if there is anybody who wants my place he can have it. It will be a relief to me to have done with it altogether. I shall not consider the vote of censure, only if the House does not consider that the six or seven gentlemen who hear the evidence and see the parties, and the manner in which they give their evidence, are not entitled to form a good judgment as to whether that evidence is trustworthy or not, we are not fit to be there. If the House is satisfied that our report is wrong then it would be really a wrong thing for us to remain in our places.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I regret that the hon. gentleman should have chosen to conclude his speech with a threat.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I distinctly stated that it was not a threat.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I may say to another party 'I am going to threaten you, but we wont call that a threat'. Well, we will say this is not a threat, but we will take it as such.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I assure you it is not a threat. I think hon. members ought to take the word of a gentleman.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—All right I will say it is not a threat. But if we don't accept what the committee says, the hon. gentleman will resign from the committee, isn't that a threat ?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I said I would do it whether you accept the report of the committee or not.

Hon. Mr. JONES—It could only have been said to influence the vote of the House, or else to advise the House that the hon. gentleman intended to resign anyway.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I don't want the House to be influenced by what I have said and the hon. gentleman can show that he is not influenced, if he wishes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am glad to learn that we are not obliged to accept the hon. gentleman's ruling, on pain of his resigning his position. I know that is not his intention ; but it has already happened once that we differed from the hon. gentleman, that the House took a view different to that held by the committee on divorce, and if I remember right the whole committee tendered their resignation—they went on strike, but they came back to the fold. I hope we shall not be threatened with such a disaster in the near future. Whatever the committee may decide, the moment the report is brought into the House the House should be left at perfect liberty to draw their own conclusion. Why should we not differ from the committee when we see the committee differing among themselves ? We hear of differences of opinion which have taken place in the committee. We have seen one member of the committee advocating one thing, and another member of the committee advocating another. If those hon. gentlemen can enjoy that kind of sport why should we not enjoy it ourselves ? and why should we not be at liberty to differ ? Now two or three questions have been put to the witnesses to which I would like to draw attention, one on page 24; it is Mr. Geo. Hadley who is answering as a witness : The question is put to him—a very good question :

Q. You are prepared to say on your own part that you have lived a proper life, and had no connection with any woman since that ?

What does he answer? 'No.' That is all the answer he gave. I think that matter should be dealt with at greater length.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What does 'No' mean there?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It means that he is not prepared to answer. Now Mr. Forester, one of the witnesses heard in the case, swears (page 26) :—

Q. And what did you do after you had seen what you have told us happened in the Fleming block?—A. I did not say a word to anybody.
Q. You have spoken about it since to somebody?—A. Yes, I have to Mr. Foster.
Q. When?—A. This was in 1904, I think, some time after the separation.
Q. Did you ever talk to Mr. Hadley about it?—A. Mr. Hadley never knew a word about it till here a month ago.

The petition was fyled before a month ago. In that petition Mr. Hadley complained of that fact, and when he sent the petition he knew it. That is in contradiction of what the witness says further on page 27 :—

Q. Did it ever occur to you that Hadley should know how his wife was behaving herself?—A. I did not think it was my business to go and tell.
Q. At any rate you did not tell?—A.No.

Further on we find the following :

Q. Was there any reason why you should mention it when you did to Mr. Foster?—A. No. In conversation Mr. Foster was telling me about Mr. Hadley. She was a nice woman and it was too bad, and I told him what I had observed.
Q. Did you ever tell any person?—A. I told Mr. Hadley.

He swore two or three times before that, he had never told Hadley, but he did tell Hadley. The examination continues :

Q. When did you tell Mr. Hadley?—A. Shortly before Christmas.

That was on the 25th day of April he swore Mr. Hadley did not know it till a month ago, and in that same deposition he swears that he told him shortly before Christmas. That shows the kind of evidence that was adduced before this committee. Now, with reference to Maurice Park, everybody knows what memory is. There are different kinds of memory. One man will remember dates. One man will remember facts. Another man will remember faces? If I were asked about a person I would say 'I do not know him,' but if I would see him face to face I would say 'I recognize that face, but I forget the name.' There is not always something in a name, as we know. What does the respondent say in her evidence? She is asked :

Q. Do you know Maurice Park?—A. No, sir, not to my knowledge.
Q. Did you ever know any such man as Maurice Park?—A. If I had his photograph I might say 'I have seen that man' or 'I know that man,' but to the best of my knowledge at this moment I do not.

And that is what the hon. gentleman calls perjury—because it amounts to that. That is the truth, the real truth—she did not remember the man. She says that if she had seen the man she might have said 'I know him, but I cannot from memory give the name.' It was in a hotel where everybody goes, and very few live a very long time. She might have seen the man and might have known the man at the time, but she does not remember, and how could she say she knew him when she did not remember? And because she tells the truth she is charged with committing perjury. If she were committing perjury, why should she be a party to ask that man to come here to give testimony in favour of her contention? If she had been a perjurer she would not have desired to procure his testimony. The mere fact that the respondent applied to the committee to have that man brought here to give testimony proves that she was in earnest and that in her evidence she spoke the truth. Besides that, what do we hear today? The hon. gentleman from Wellington says 'A co-respondent is never a credible witness. We never put faith in what a co-respondent says when he is in the box.' If that is so, why did they bring him here? And further than that, they ordered a certain amount of money to be paid to bring that co-respondent here. Why did the committee adopt that course? They either believe or do not believe the word of the witness they bring here. Otherwise, why should they force the petitioner to pay that man $90 or $100 to bring him to Ottawa? If we do not believe in his testimony, if his testimony is to be cast aside in advance, there is no use in taking his evidence under oath. The fact that the committee has forced the petitioner to supply that money to pay the expenses of that witness, proves that the committee placed reliance in the testimony that was to be given. For all these reasons I think the report of the committee should not be accepted.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY resuming the debate said: If we look over the whole case we find that the charges against the respondent are two in number. We have the Campbell case and the Park case. In the Campbell case the fact is established by the evidence of one witness and it is denied by two. In the Park case also there is one witness on one side for the affirmative and two on the negative side. This should have its weight in the minds of the members of the Senate, coupled with the other facts which have been elicited. Mr. Hadley, who seems to be so scrupulous about his wife's conduct, should have had more regard for his own. Turning to his testimony at page 20 I find the following

> I never saw Campbell in the house until—oh, it was a long time after that, we had a banquet for the hockey boys, and he came in there and took a little girl that was stopping there up to the hockey match, and I saw him the next following summer. There was a prostitute there, Madam Van Lester, I do not know how many men she lived with, and he came in, and I was right behind him, and he said: 'What room is Mrs. Lester in, Mr. Hadley'? She was a palmist.

I think it was a very bad example for Mr. Hadley to set in his own hotel allowing a woman to remain there that he calls a prostitute.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I suppose she paid well.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I suppose so. Further on at page 35 I find the following in the evidence of John E. Smith

> Q. Did you know a Madam Van Lester ?—A. Yes.
> Q. What was she ?—A. She was a palmist. Mrs. Hadley and her slept together the last week before Mr. Hadley come home, and I carried them up beer to the room and they drunk it up there. They were both in bed and I carried it to the room where they were.

That is further evidence that this woman was living at the hotel and receiving all the attention she wanted. For a man who was so scrupulous about his wife's relations with other men he set a bad example in keeping such characters in his house simply because they were paying well. I would also call attention to the fact that all these offences charged against the respondent have been settled by the separation. Hadley fixed a sum of money and gave it to Mrs. Hadley in settlement of the differences between them, and that arrangement having been made he has no right to ask afterwards for a divorce.

This is certainly a condition; the whole matter was arranged and the woman went away with the money. If she were the guilty party which he pretends her to be, no doubt after she received the money she would have behaved very badly, and I think it was a great mistake on the part of the committee not to inquire more fully as to her conduct after the arrangement was made. The committee should have ascertained if possible if she had conducted herself as a good woman or as a prostitute as Hadley pretends she was. That evidence is missing; I think it is a pity that the committee did not allow that evidence to be given. They took it for granted that she conducted herself well. The Chairman of the committee says: 'We did not want that evidence, we took her word, we supposed that she conducted herself in a fair way.' Let that be the proof, the admission of the chairman of the committee that she had conducted herself in a respectable manner. If that be accepted as proof then all these accusations fall. If she conducted herself in a respectable manner why does this action come before us? Evidently because Mr. Hadley now, I suppose, finds another party whom he wishes to marry. It is not only divorce he wants, he wishes to marry again. That is the only conclusion we can come to after reading the evidence.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—The man swears he did not want to marry again, that he has made no contract of marriage.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I believe he did not make a contract, but I believe him also when he says that he is not prepared to say on his own part that he has lived a proper life and had no connection with any woman since that. At all events the hon. gentleman is so ticklish, when Park gives his evidence, asks 'Where will you find a co-respondent who will admit the fact of his guilt?' I say where will you find a petitioner who will admit his guilt. How could he exact from the petitioner an avowal that he had entered into a promise to marry again? Certainly the hon. gentleman cannot have too weights. He must put the evidence of the parties in the same scale and weigh them with the same weights. There is not a single accusation brought against her of wrong-doing after the settlement which took place, and this House will admit that all the witnesses that appeared during the last portion of the inquiry are witnesses that have been driven here, and they all knew what they had to say. When they come here with the measurements of the windows in that hotel they all had the same measurements, and they say that they took those measurements without any notion at all of what was going on at Ottawa ; nobody having spoken to them in any way. They were suddenly inspired, and they ran down to the cellar like rats.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—Miraculously.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Miraculously, and they took these measurements. Nobody asked them to do so. Foster never said a word to them except that they were subpœnaed and they came here to give evidence. I say that the testimony of all these people must be set aside. It is false testimony in that particular. I think we should lay stress on the fact that the respondent in the case did all that was in her power to bring witnesses here. She brought every body with whom she was connected, to give evidence in her favour ; and all those who came here after the adjournment of the case, coming from far distant places, testified in favour of the respondent. For these reasons, and for others which would take too long to recite in this discussion, I feel that it is our duty to reject the Bill. I am not speaking from the point of view of religious feeling in the matter. I am speaking as a common lawyer would do before the court ; as a man of common sense would do on reading the evidence that is now before us. We must come to the conclusion that this report which is submitted for our consideration should not be adopted. Everybody knows now that the committee was nearly equally divided when the report was made, and if a minority report has not been produced to this House, it was I suppose because the evidence in support of the petition was so frail and of so little weight that everybody would perceive for himself that the report should not be adopted. I shall certainly vote against it, not only as a Catholic, because I should do so on principle, but also because the evidence itself cannot sustain the contentions of the petitioner.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Before the question is put, I wish to say a word or two as to what guides me in the decision which I have come to and how I shall vote in this instance. There is distinct evidence if it is to be believed, of such improper conduct on the part of Mrs. Hadley as entitled her husband to a divorce. That is definite, as to the acts and definite as to the circumstances under which the acts were committed. The witnesses are not interested parties in any way. There is no reason shown in the evidence why their testimony should not be accepted and believed. The only contradiction that we have is the contradiction of such a character that it must be influenced by the circumstances in which the person who gives that evidence was placed. We have the conduct and demeanour of all the witnesses before the committee, and no written statement of the evidence can convey everything in the way of facts, information or justification for accepting one statement or respecting the other, as much as the personal hearing and observation of the demeanour and appearance of the witnesses. Under those circumstances, it appears to me that if we have confidence in the judgment and discernment of the committee—and I believe we all have that—and if we have confidence in their ability to determine questions of fact, we ought to take the same position as any court would take in reviewing the judgment of the judge who heard the witnesses, saw their demeanour and passed judgment on their credibility. In this case the court was the committee ; the committee have arrived at a judgment observing all that could be observed calculated to enable them to pass judgment on the credibility of the witnesses. After seeing the witnesses on the other side they have chosen to discredit the contradiction, and we are therefore bound in justice to the committee, in justice to the applicant, and in justice to ourselves, having appointed a committee in whom we have confidence, to sustain the finding and judgment of that committee. Just one word further as to a reason why I am very strongly disposed not to accept the contradiction of Mrs. Hadley. We had the account of the incident respecting the garters. I do not think any one will say that that incident is one of an innocent woman, talking to a man on such terms of intimacy as, at all events, would lead to a suspicion of his being her paramour—taking from him a pair of garters. The conversation that ensued on the occasion when he referred to the garters and said they were to be given to another lady on conditions, the conditions being that he was to be permitted to put the garters on the other lady's legs.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Will my hon. friend say that was a criminal act.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I do not say it was, but I say it was an indecent act for an innocent woman to be guilty of. An act of levity on the subject which no respectable or virtuous woman would be guilty of—walking into a shop, picking up a garter, entering into that conversation, taking the garter and saying she would help a weaker brother, and appropriating it to herself with his initials on it, putting it away in her cupboard drawer and afterwards when her husband's attention is called to it, lying to him as to where she had got it, and whose initials they were. Had she been an honest woman, without any feeling of having a guilty intimacy with Campbell, would she not have told the truth to her husband that the initials were Campbell's and explained how she got it ? But she tries to lie and deceive him, speaking of the initials as those of 'Winnie Cameron,' a young lady they appear both to have known—some young woman acquaintance that they appear to have had. That circumstance so discredits her in my jugdment, in connection with the story of guilt which is told with reference to her, that I cannot accept her denial, and I think, therefore, that the only course to adopt here is to vote for sustaining the report.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I feel I would be doing an injustice to the members of the committee who made this report, of whom I am one, if I did not make some observations as to the evidence which induced me to come to the conclusion that the petitioner had established his case. I quite concede the right to every hon. gentleman to review the evidence which is before him and to exercise his own judgment as to what conclusion he shall arrive at. He is perfectly at liberty to do so. The only position I take is that the members of the committee are in a very much better position than gentlemen who are not on the committee to judge of the credibility of the witnesses and as to whether the facts are established or not which are placed in evidence. Now it would seem to me that the impression is fixed in the minds of some hon. gentlemen that cases of this kind are cases in which one's sympathetic nature should play a prominent part instead of his reasoning faculties. That, of course, does justice to the humanity within us, but cases which come before the Divorce Committee are peculiarly cases in which the head and not the heart is called upon to play the leading part. It is almost impossible for hon. gentlemen to judge of the credibility of the witnesses without having had the opportunity of hearing them. Now taking the present case for instance. I would appeal to hon. gentlemen who have spoken against this Bill as to what they would do under the circumstances which I am about to review. In the first place, the duty devolves upon the petitioner to establish his case ; the duty is then upon the respondent to answer that case—to explain away if possible the incriminating evidence which has been placed before the committee. In this case we have no less than six witnesses, five of whom swear positively, practically, to having seen the respondent in flagrante delicto with the parties named, and we have the confirmatory evidence of one other witness. In the first place, we have the evidence of Mr. Forrester, and if hon. gentlemen have the evidence before them they will find on pages 25 and 26 the statement of Mr. Forrester. Hon. gentlemen will not conflict the two witnesses Forrester and Foster. Forrester swears positively to having found the respondent under incriminating circumstances with the party named. Forrester is an insurance agent in Brandon, and not in the employ I might say of the petitioner. The only witness who has positively sworn to have seen her under the incriminating circumstances alluded to is Foster, pages 28 and 29 of the evidence. These were two eye witnesses of two different cases; one, Forrester, dealt with the case of the man Parks; the other Foster dealt with, the case of the man Campbell. Now if any hon. gentlemen who is not actuated by sympathy will read the facts stated under oath by these two witnesses, I fail to see how any other conclusion can possibly be arrived at than that which would warrant the committee and they had no alternative other than to report the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That makes only one witness for the fact.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, we have the witness Forrester as to the case of Park and the witness Foster as to the case of Campbell. If hon. gentlemen will look at the evidence of the witness Smith, pages 34 and 35, they will find there two distinct cases in which the guilt of the respondent is clearly established. There can be no question about that.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—If you believe the evidence.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I will deal with that phase of the question afterwards. Now we come to the evidence of Voight, on page 75, in which he states that he saw Campbell go into her bed-room and at an hour of the night when only one conclusion could be arrived at by any man who applies his brain to determining the presumption to be drawn from certain facts. That evidence is not controverted in the slightest, and Voight's evidence is practically confirmatory of Smith's evidence as to Campbell having gone on several occasions to her bed-room at a very late hour of the night, and having remained there. Then we have the evidence of Clapp on pages 78 and 79 in which he stated he saw her go into Park's room, and on another occasion he saw her at a late hour of the night in Campbell's room. If hon. gentlemen will refer to these pages they will find that Clapp's evidence is unquestionably clear upon that point.

Then we have the evidence of Mr. Howden, which I term as corroborative of the statement of Park. Howden is a respectable professional man, as I understand, a man of good standing in the community. It surely cannot be said that because he happened to be the solicitor of the petitioner he deliberately perjured himself to establish a statement made by Park? What was that statement? Park denied that he made any statement to Howden. Howden stated under oath that the criminatory statement was made by Park as to the respondent having visited his room and that was corroborated by Foster, who happened to be in another section of the room and heard Park make that statement, and the confirmatory evidence of Foster is to be found on pages 100, 101 and 103. These statements will appear clear and most conclusive evidence. If there had been an arrangement between Foster and Howden; that is to say, if the statement were a fictitious one, they would have agreed in the minutest details as to that statement, but I think hon. gentlemen reading the two statements will find them sufficiently different not to be contradictory, but to establish a presumption in the mind beyond all doubt that the evidence was truthful and not manufactured. Therefore, we have the evidence of Forrester, Smith, Voight, Clapp and Howden, all establishing beyond all question in my mind the guilt of the respondent. Now we come to the evidence of Boyd, the chief of police of the city of Brandon, a man occupying a responsible position, and a man whom I think it difficult to conceive, would deliberately come down 2,000 miles with manufactured evidence against the respondent. In his evidence on pages 66 and 67 he states that for over two hours he watched her movements on a particular night, saw her go into Campbell's room and remain there for that time, and her going into the room under such suspicious circumstances and at such a time that there could be no doubt as to the purposes for which she went there. With this array of evidence before us, I ask of hon. gentlemen who have presented their argument against this Bill, what would they have done if they were on the committee, with six witnesses who practically swore to seeing the defendant commit the offence charged against her? Can there be any question in the mind of any reasonable man sitting upon that committee, with six witnesses swearing positively as to the respondent's guilt, that there was any other conclusion to be arrived at than the one reached by the committee? They very reluctantly were obliged to find that the charge was clearly proven against the respondent. It has been said by the hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie, who opposed this Bill, that the evidence consisted of that of a detective and also of employees, and I think my hon. friend from Toronto accentuated that idea that this evidence is not to be relied upon. Let me say in the first place there is no good reason why the evidence of a police officer or a detective should not be accepted in a case of this kind where it is consistent, where it is presented to the committee in such a way as to lead to the impression that it is truthfully told. The petitioner and the respondent were represented by counsel. A rigid examination took place of every witness heard before the committee. The most rigid cross-examination that could have taken place. In fact there were four counsel in the room most of the time, two on each side. It, therefore, cannot be said that the proceedings were loosely conducted or that there was not such a thorough ventilation of all the evidence as would be conducive to extracting the truth from the witnesses. Such were the circumstances under which this evidence was taken. Against that array of evidence what have we? I think every hon. gentleman in this Chamber, even those who have opposed this Bill most vigorously, will conceive that with that evidence before the committee there could not be any question as to the committee being justified in reporting the Bill. Now let us look at the other picture; what was there before the committee to disturb that evidence? If it had been answered sufficiently to seriously disturb it and lead to the impression that it was manufactured evidence, then of course we would have found for the respondent. The first witness to answer the case of the petitioner was the respondent. I do not think that any hon. gentleman here would say, or seriously think for a moment, that even though the respondent were guilty of the charges brought against her she would go into the witness box and deliberately admit them. There is something in human nature by which a woman will sacrifice all to establish her chastity. That is the experience of every lawyer, and I think of every man who has had occasion to weigh evidence, to analyse human nature, and to form a conclusion as to what had been done or said. I have been on this committee since 1890, and although there have been many contested cases, I cannot recall a case in which the respondent has ever gone into the witness box, no matter how strong the evidence against her, and admitted for one moment the slightest infirmity in her chastity. The first impulse under all circumstances is to protect her chastity at the expense of truth. Consequently my hon. friend to my right would not have expected under these circumstances that this respondent would have affirmed the charge; she must have denied.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The point I desired to make was that she would not contest the case if she came here to plead guilty.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is equivalent to saying that all a respondent has to do is to come here and deny, and the presumption is that she is not guilty.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is the only presumption that can be drawn. I am addressing myself to the House to ask the attention of hon. gentlemen to this point; what evidence was there before the committee—and I am attempting to review the evidence—what evidence was there before the committee to disturb the conclusion which was absolutely fixed in our minds by the evidence of the petitioner? I said a few moments ago that the first witness in the defence was the respondent. She denied absolutely, of course, the statements which had been made, and that we would expect her to do. Then the co-respondents were called. The first man was Campbell. My experience has been—and I think it is the experience of every member of this House who has watched the proceedings of the Divorce Committee for years—that the co-respondent invariably and without exception denies the charges brought.

Hon. Mr. JONES—Have there not been co-respondents during the present session who have admitted the fact?

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the Vaughan case.

Hon. Mr. JONES—I have read evidence in one case where the witness admitted it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, they were brought here as witnesses.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman says they were brought here as witnesses. But have we not co-respondents here ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I know that, but I am using the term as a convenient one. We would not expect this man Campbell, whom my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie has pointed out occupies a responsible position in the community, to affirm the charges brought against him, but I do say that there was such evidence obtained from Campbell as to lead us to the conclusion that the charges brought against him were established.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—They did not lead me to that conclusion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It may be more difficult to convince my hon. friend than seven or eight other members.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—There were only five on the committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There was the evidence as to Campbell's frequent visits to her place, and the admission as to the garter incident referred to by the hon. gentleman from Toronto, and other small collateral facts from which we drew conclusions. As to the evidence of Park, my hon. friend from North Wellington has pointed out the peculiar position in which Park was placed. We would have expected Park to deny. Every hon. gentlemen in this room would expect him to deny the charges brought against him, and he did deny them, but could we accept the denial of those three parties who were the three principals in the charges brought against the parties? Could we expect those witnesses to affirm what had been alleged by the other six ? We have Campbell's evidence contradicted by the chief of police. Campbell denied being in the building referred to by the chief of police, on pages 66 and 67 of the evidence, and the chief of police at Brandon, who occupies a responsible position, who is a responsible officer of the law, swore to Campbell being present in that building on that particular night for at least two hours. That fact being established, and its being a material fact the other evidence of Campbell would go for naught.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The hon. gentleman states that Campbell was there two hours. Will he be kind enough to let me know when Campbell went in there, and when he came out so as to locate the two hours.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the hon. gentleman will peruse pages 66 and 67 of the evidence he will find the fact clearly established.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—What is it ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman has the evidence before him, I will not take up time reading it. It is the evidence of Boyd, I refer to as chief of police. The evidence of Park is contradicted by witnesses who were not employees of the petitioner, independent witnesses who could have no object direct or indirect in giving their evidence other than to establish the truth. With those facts before us, I ask hon. gentlemen in all seriousness, that that committee having before them six or eight witnesses who swore positively to those acts having been committed, and having simply the denial of the principal, a denial made under such circumstances that 999 people in a thousand would make the same denial, I ask what conclusion can we come to ? The evidence of the detective, unless impeached, I submit should be accepted. The evidence of employees should be accepted just as much as the evidence of disinterested parties. I ask the hon. gentleman from Toronto who accentuated the point that the evidence of employees should not be accepted, what would he think if he had a case before a judicial body and he called responsible employees and the counsel on the other side said : 'Those employees, from the very fact of their being employees, cannot be believed.' I do not think we, in all seriousness can advance a proposition of that kind and accept it seriously.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman referred to the evidence at page 67. The question is asked 'what became of Mrs. Hadley,' and the answer is 'Mrs. Hadley was upstairs.' There was no doubt about that, because she was not in the store.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the hon. gentleman will read the whole of the evidence on pages 66 and 67 and not pick out any isolated passages he will find——

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It is a conclusion he gave. He saw nothing at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He saw her go in there and knew she did not come out until two or three hours. She went into Campbell's room and the only exit from that room was through a particular passage or door which was watched by the police. Allow me to again say that the committee in coming to this conclusion had a very unpleasant task before them. Their duties are certainly unpleasant ones. It is no pleasure to them to have to report a Bill dissolving the tie between man and wife, and particularly when the wife, as in this case, is an attractive woman possessed, apparently, of certain charms and very much opposed to the dissolution taking place. I am satisfied, without casting the slightest reflection upon the observations made by gentlemen who have opposed the report of the committee, that sympathy is playing a very much larger part in the position which has been taken against the report than the reasoning faculties.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I should like to know upon what grounds the hon. gentleman makes the bold assertion that sympathy rather than reason influences their statements or the vote they are likely to give?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I say it does credit to the heart and humanities of hon. gentlemen who have come to that conclusion. But I have a perfect right to arrive at any conclusion that I deem just with references to the analyses which hon. gentlemen have made of this evidence, and if I conclude that the reasoning faculties have not played as prominent a part as the sympathies, I think I am justified in saying so.

Hon. Mr. JONES—Does not the hon. gentleman think that sympathy would be much more likely to be felt by those who have heard the evidence and seen the witnesses than by those who have not seen the parties or witnesses in the case at all?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—With all due deference to the good sense of my hon. friend, in my judgment he took a most startling position when he arose in this Chamber to oppose this Bill. He said a certain reflection was cast upon a certain employee with whom he had been associated. He had known him for a great number of years, and had such a very high opinion of his character, that under no consideration could he permit this Bill to be dealt with without vindicating the character of the deceased gentleman; and he indicated that that was the reason he took such a strong stand.

Hon. Mr. JONES—I said that was one of my reasons.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If that principle were accepted for the weighing of evidence, and for disposing of cases of this kind, it would place courts of law and the administration of justice in the most serious jeopardy. It would be utterly impossible to administer justice on well accepted principles of evidence if a proposition of that kind be accepted in this House as to evidence because gentlemen may favourably know the parties, and because of that knowledge set at naught sworn testimony establishing facts contrary to the conception of the character of the party, then I say we might as well wipe out the whole machinery of this committee, and decide cases upon the superficial knowledge which we have of human nature. Now I regret just as deeply as any hon. gentleman who has opposed this Bill that we were forced to arrive at the conclusion which the evidence warranted, but we have a duty to perform. We had sworn evidence before us and unless that evidence was impeached, and unless the evidence of the respondent was so overwhelmingly strong as to lead us to conclude that we could place no credibility on the evidence of the petitioner, then, as I said before, no alternative presented itself, than to report the Bill notwithstanding our reluctance to do so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not make a practice of interfering in discussions of this kind, but the hon. gentleman who has just sat down has made two or three statements which seem to me to call for some reply. The hon. gentleman stated that it was very important to hear the witnesses and to observe their demeanour. Now the reason I venture to say anything in this case, is that I did what I rarely do, I happened to go into the room where the Divorce Committee were sitting, and I heard some of the witnesses giving their testimony and observed their demeanour. I saw a lady who, I was informed, was the respondent sitting there ; and although I do not pretend to be much of a physiognomist I ventured to say to myself : 'That woman has not the appearance of a vicious woman'. I did not propose to remain any time in the room, but as it happened the respondent, Mrs. Hadley, was put on the witness stand a few minutes after I entered the room, and I heard her give her evidence for some quarter of an hour or so, and I was impressed with the fact that she gave her evidence in the matter of a witness who was telling the truth. I also heard the witness Park. I did not feel quite as clear about him, but I saw nothing about his manner to indicate that he was not telling the truth. I should not have had any remarks to offer if I had not happened to go into the room and heard these two witnesses, and observed their demeanour. This case is a singular case in some respects. It is a fact that with the single exception of the man Forrester, about whom we do not know anything, all the other witnesses who have testified on behalf of the petitioner, are in some sense the employees of the petitioner, bartenders or bookkeepers, or other employees of the hotel. There is a private detective whom he employed to hunt up evidence in order to secure this divorce, and there is a police officer who is probably a pal of the private detective. Now I wish to refer to a book which was cited by the hon. chairman of the committee the other evening as a good authority in divorce cases, which it undoubtedly is—Browne and Powles on Divorce—and I wish to call the attention of the House to what this work says upon evidence of this character. It will be noted that one of the witnesses said that his way had been paid by the petitioner to enable him to visit his home in Ontario and to go back to Brandon. This work says, at page 415 of the 5th edition:

> Evidence given by paid witnesses—called testes lupanares—and accomplices was looked on with suspicion in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and since the institution of the divorce court, where in support of a petition by a wife for a judicial separation, direct evidence was given of several acts of adultery committed by the husband, in consequence of the improbability of that evidence, of the discrepancies in the statements of the witnesses, and of the improper manner in which it had been got up by the private detectives employed by the petitioner, the court refused to act upon it and dismissed the petition.

This man Forrester was apparently the only independent witness procured on behalf of the petitioner. We do not know what his connection with the petitioner may be, but apparently he is independent ; and the hon. leader of the opposition laid a great deal of stress on Forrester's evidence.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What about Clapp ? He was not an employee ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—That evidence is so ridiculous that it would strike any one as being incredible on the face of it. I do not propose to go into the evidence, but I wish to refer to this particular witness. It is a question of the credibility of Forrester. At page 26 he is asked with respect to what took place in the Fleming block :

> Q. You have spoken about it since to somebody ?—Yes, I have to Mr. Foster.

Now, remember that these gentlemen were neighbours of Hadley's; that these events took place in 1902, and that the separation took place in August, 1904. The proceedings for divorce were taken in the spring of 1905. Now here is a man, a neighbour of Hadley's, who knew of these things and never said a word to Hadley about them.

> Q. Did you ever talk to Mr. Hadley about it? —A. Mr. Hadley never knew a word about it until here a month ago.

That would be March. I turn to page 27 on this very point, and find that in reply to a question from the hon. gentleman from London, the witness testifies in a very different way. The hon. gentleman asks him:

> Q. Did you ever tell Mrs. Hadley ?—A. No, I never knew her personally to speak to. . .
> Q. Did you ever tell any person else ?—A. I told Mr. Hadley.
> Q. When did you tell Mr. Hadley ?—A. Shortly before last Christmas.

Here is a witness who in the space of a quarter of an hour contradicts himself emphatically on what is really a vital point. I say that is the only independent witness, and I think that these two statements of his when put together go to show how much value is to be attached to his evidence. I claim that all these men are in some sense in the employ of the petitioner, and consequently their evidence is to be regarded with a certain amount of suspicion. You find that all of these witnesses were aware of the alleged facts in 1902. They were men employed by the petitioner. They knew, if their story was correct, that this man was being most frightfully wronged by his wife, but not one of them ever thought of mentioning the circumstance to his employer or to any body else. And it seems to me that it is a most incredible thing that not until Foster, three weeks after these events took place, began to look around to get evidence for a divorce for Hadley did any of these witnesses divulge the things they knew. I appeal to hon. gentlemen : is that consistent with our knowledge of human nature ? Would it not be just the other way? If these men had known these things would they not have been common talk within a week, particularly with men of that stamp ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They did not like to tell the man about his wife; it is a delicate matter.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If any body, Howden, who was the solicitor of the petitioner, was bound to protect the interests of Hadley and guard his honour. What do we find? On page 101, where Howden is cross-examined by counsel for the petitioner, he is asked when he told Hadley :

Q. When did you first tell him about this statement Park had made..?—A. I never discussed this with Hadley until 1905 ; that is about the time we took proceedings to get the divorce.

This professional gentleman had been acting for Hadley from 1903. In August, 1904, this gentleman prepared an agreement of separation between Mr. and Mrs. Hadley, under which Hadley agreed to pay his wife $5,000. What opinion must hon. gentlemen form of a solicitor, the confidential professional agent of a man, who would allow his client to pay out $5,000 when he had in his own possession knowledge which showed that the man should not pay a dollar? That is a circumstance which you cannot get over. There is another circumstance; there is the point made by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, when interrupting the hon. member from Calgary, which I think really embodies an argument of the strongest character. If Mrs. Hadley was a vicious woman she had her $5,000 and why should she oppose the divorce? She had nothing to gain by opposing the divorce; she had everything to lose. She did not propose to come back and live with her husband. She had the $5,000 and why should she oppose the divorce if she were the woman she is described? There is one other circumstance to which I think proper to refer, and that is the extraordinary character of the actions attributed to the respondent by these witnesses. The hon. gentleman spoke of his experience on the Divorce Committee. I do not know much about the evidence that is brought before the committee, but I venture to say that no such story as that which is told of the respondent and Park was ever told before a Divorce Committee before; and then that other tale about this woman getting in through a window 2 x 3, and 4 feet from the ground, even according to the witnesses produced by the petitioner to rebut her own evidence, all these statements are to my mind in themselves simply absurd and incredible. If the tales that were told were credible, reasonable stories, I should have more difficulty in voting against giving this divorce

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Will the hon. gentleman say that all these employees who appeared as witnesses were guilty of perjury ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have not said anything of the kind. We all know with what suspicion such evidence is regarded.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—If Campbell and the others wish to clear their skirts, they can enter an action for libel.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is one unfortunate circumstance that attends all these divorce discussions in this House, and it is not unnatural. It arises from the anxiety of the committee, to find their judgment sustained. I presume that if any of us were in their place we would have the same desire to have our judgment sustained. I do not find any fault with them for that, but I do find fault with appeals made to the House such as the appeal made by the hon. senator from Wellington that it was our duty to sustain the committee. There are just two classes of divorce cases that come before the House about which I would always have a considerable amount of doubt, and on which I should be inclined to apply my own judgment. The first is cases not contested. When a woman is the respondent and she is out of the country and has no means to protect her own interest, we have a right to look very closely into the case, and for this reason, that the committee are not prosecutors. It is their duty to hear a case as it is put before them, and where there is no attorney watching the interest of the party who is absent, the petitioner might have it pretty nearly his own way. There is often a danger of the evidence not being carefully sifted. I had occasion to speak of that once before; it made a strong impression on my mind. It was the first time I had seriously considered the question, and I then pointed out that the committee should be in a position to call upon some lawyer to discharge the duties which the King's proctor discharges in England—that is, to bring out all the facts and show the weak points in the prosecution so that the committee might come to a proper decision. I was rather gratified to find that in a discussion on a divorce case in the House of Commons some three days ago, the leader of the opposition, Mr. Borden, expressed himself in exactly the same way, holding that there should be some intervention in Canada like that of the King's proctor in England, in cases where there is no defence set up. Where there are lawyers employed on both sides, and witnesses are thoroughly examined by competent attorneys, and the committee makes an unanimous finding, I for my own part, would not be inclined to go very much beyond it. Of course if I had read up the evidence, and my judgment did not coincide with theirs, however unanimous they might be, I would be disposed to hold to my own opinion. But in cases where there is a difference of opinion in the committee, the House is properly called upon to exercise its own judgment in the matter. I am not going to discuss the evidence. That has been done very fully, perhaps as fully as the House is at all willing that it should be discussed. The hon. member from Calgary has pointed to some, what he considers and what I dare say he is right in considering, pretty strong evidence against the respondent in the case, but I have heard the other side and have followed the evidence pretty closely, and have found very strong points made in favour of the respondent and against the contention of the petitioner. I may say that my feeling in favour of the report of the committee was not strengthened when I heard the acting chairman of the committee referring to this garter incident as strong evidence against the respondent, and I was rather surprised to find the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Kerr) referring to it in the same way. To my mind the garter incident ranks with the 'chops and tomato sauce and don't trouble yourself about the warming pan' incident in the celebrated Bardel case, in the Pickwick papers. We remember all that was made about that remark by Sergeant Buz-Fuz. I think I know of people who are inclined to joke with each other, perfectly innocent people and just as virtuous as any member of this House is, might use just such remarks as that without the slightest harm. There is nothing in it from beginning to end, as the woman tells that story, that would be sufficient to criminate her. As to weighing the evidence in other respects, I will not do it, but I take this ground where the committee was divided, and, from the long argument we have heard, the evidence is divided, it is our duty to find against the divorce. Every hon. gentleman will agree with me when I say that under any circumstances the most you can say for divorce is that it is a necessary evil, and that where the evidence is anyway balanced between the two contestants, with all respect for the members of the committee, I think it would be our duty to refuse to give our assent to the Bill. I notice that my hon. friend from Toronto and, to some extent, my hon. friend from Calgary, seemed to take what I might regard as peculiarly the lawyers view, that if a certain amount of evidence points to the petitioner's case and establishes it in their minds pretty strongly, there is no other duty before the House but to do precisely what they would do in a court of law under similar circumstances. What I want to submit to hon. gentlemen is that this House in dealing with a divorce case is something different from a court of law. When a properly constituted divorce court or any other court tries a case and hears the evidence the case is decided according to the preponderence of evidence, irrespective of all other considerations. The court must find a verdict according to the weight of evidence. I hold that in dealing with divorce in this House we have a higher duty than that. It is true a divorce petition in this House is to some extent a trial between individuals, but it is more than that; really, if you follow it back to the origin of parliamentary practice, the application is just the same as any other private Bill for the redress of grievance or wrong and after the complaints of all the parties are heard and settled on in the minds of those who are acting judges, parliament has still to consider the general well being of the community. Let me read to hon. gentleman what a very eminent man, still a member of this House, and an hon. gentleman who has had more experience in divorce than any other member of the Senate has to say on this point. In 1891 when discussing this question of divorce in the House, Judge Gowan made these remarks on a Bill introduced by my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Macdonald) for the establishment of a divorce court. Judge Gowan argued against the establishment of a divorce court mainly for this very reason, that if a divorce court were established it would be bound to grant divorces according to the practice and requirements of the courts, in a great many cases where parliament, on account of its superior authority and superior obligations would be justified in refusing the divorce. Here are his words:

> In entertaining applications for divorce and making a law to set the parties free to marry again—changing their status—parliament can properly bring in view considerations of expediency or public advantage. A court of justice is necessarily restrained within fixed limits and its procedure controlled by fixed rules in matters assigned to it for adjudication between party and party. Parliament would be making a law, and the supreme power of the state (within constitutional limits of course) would have to consider what would most tend to the public good. The courts but expound and administer law which parliament enacts.
> The point is forcibly put by a learned writer on the sources of law. The functions of the legislator are in reality not legal but moral. With him the primary inquiry, is what ought to be? And he only inquires what is, to suit his provisions to the law, already in force. With the lawyer, on the other hand, what is, is always the primary inquiry and there his inquiry stops.
> 'Tis true applications for divorce have always been based upon a specific charge and the facts necessary to support that charge established by satisfactory evidence, and so far the proceeding is quasi judicial. Inquisition is made and the truth or falsity of the facts alleged determined, and to that extent there is an analogy to the proceedings of a court. But whether, by reason of the facts proved, the prayer of the petitioner should be granted opens considerations for parliament which could not be permitted to judges when called upon to pronounce what the judgment should be.

I think this is a case where we should exercise the high functions of parliament and consider the well-being of the community. Some of the very best men in the House have given their consideration to it, and they have come to us divided. The evidence is so balanced that they are agreed in their finding. We have had a long argument on the case, and I have not delved into the evidence far enough to form an absolute opinion for myself. The argument is pretty evenly balanced, and with that state of affairs I feel it my duty, holding the view Judge Gowan held in reference to divorce, to vote against the Bill, I do it on another consideration akin to the one I have stated and it is this, divorce applications are becoming day by day more numerous. We only had 11 divorces in the first 17 years after confederation. We have 24 applications this year. I do not know how many Bills have been passed, but think altogether fifteen or sixteen. At the rate at which these applications are increasing this Senate will be swamped with divorce proceedings before very long, and I believe it is our duty when there are cases in which the balance of evidence is at all close, to vote against the divorce and in that way we will be discouraging applications and preserving the best interests of the community as a whole.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Cobourg)—Before the debate closes I should like to make two or three observations. Some hon. gentleman has remarked that the divorce committee naturally wish to have their report sustained. That is the natural feeling on the part of the committee, but while I admit that, I wish to say as a member of that committee and I think I voice the views of the other members of the committee, that we are more anxious that when this Senate gives a decision, whether it be to accept or reject that report, that the decision is right, because the Senate is the court of final appeal, so to speak, in these matters. Now to say that the committee on all occasions exercised the utmost care and judgment of which they are capable is simply to state what I believe every one present will admit to be true. The committee are anxious from the time they enter upon one of these inquiries, until the last word is appended to their report; their conduct, their judgment, and their whole dealing with the divorce case is liable to be submitted to the scrutiny of the searching light of this Senate; not only that, but the same evidence has to go before another critical chamber, so that we have not only the judgment of this Senate before our eyes, but we know that the report has to run another ordeal elsewhere. It is some consolation, some gratification to that committee—I feel very proud of it personally—that although I have had the honour of serving on that committee for seven years and have dealt with a great many divorce cases, no single case has arisen in which the report of that committee has been rejected by this Chamber and only once so far has a report been rejected, in the other chamber. I understand that some Bill was reported on adversely, but it has gone back to that committee again, so that I say we have a proud record, and whether our days be many or few upon that court, it is my purpose that so far as I am concerned we shall never be ashamed of what we have done there. It was hinted some days ago, in connection with another Bill, that the members of that court were very human, that they were susceptible to female charms or to personal attractions. I took occasion to say then, and I repeat it now, that so far as I am concerned I am blind in hearing the evidence and coming to my conclusion upon it. I see nothing but what I believe the evidence established, and I will not accept proof until I get sufficient legal evidence. There is only one way in which I could have brought in a report recommending the rejection of this petition, that is as I see it, by ignoring the evidence not only of the petitioner but the evidence for the respondent—the whole of it—by ignoring the evidence and by disregarding my duty, which I will never do while I am on that committee. I am trying to make my words as weighty as I can. I do not know that this report is right; it is right according to my judgment. That is as far as I will go, and I hope the Senate feel, as I have no doubt they will feel and will act with a sense of that responsibility that they see they are called upon to assume in rejecting that report. My hon. friend from Toronto alluded to an incident—it was only an incident—but to my mind it was a very damaging one and told heavily. It was not conclusive in itself. I refer to the incident of the garters. But it established at least this much, that here was a young woman, a young girl I might almost say, much her husband's junior who went into a public shop in a town where she was a comparative stranger and talking to a person whom she had only met for the first or the second time, had this conversation which, in my view, showed that she was a very forward, a very bold woman, and not a very modest one. I do not think the hon. member from Toronto commented too strongly upon that incident. It was a very damaging one, and it was unfortunate for the respondent in this case that she participated in it. While every member of that committee would like to have spared that young girl—my sympathies all went out for her—if I could allow my sympathies to go out to her, I could not ignore the evidence, and I will not ignore the evidence as I see it. We would have gladly spared her the great mortification and humiliation of having a decree of divorce pronounced against her for the cause for which alone divorce is granted by this parliament; but even that painful thing had to be done as many another painful thing has to be done when a man believes he is doing his duty. I believe that committee, those of them who recommended that report, did their duty conscientiously. I have thought of it almost every day and every night since that report was brought in, asking myself had I made a mistake, had I by any chance overlooked any point, or had I given credence where credence ought not to be given; had I relied upon any one who was a broken reed. I cannot throw away the evidence of these men Foster, Forrester, Smith, Howden and Voight, and say that they are not worthy of belief. I cannot do it and I will not do it. Now, hon. gentlemen, you have a high responsibility before you, and I hope you will be equal to it. I have said this much according to my view of the evidence: I would have gladly done anything I could to save that young woman from the consequences of this report; but I cannot do it and I will not do it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—A good deal has been said about opposing the view of the committee in this matter. Now, I appreciate very strongly the pains taken by the committee in going into these questions which are brought before them, and I think every credit is due to them, but it seems to me that in this case there is considerable difference of opinion even in the committee itself, as may possibly be shown when a vote is taken in the House on this matter. Therefore we may be in the position of supporting that side of the committee that has not said very much in this matter, but at the same time have, I presume, given all the attention to it that was due to the case. Now in the matter of this evidence, there is one point which has struck me very strongly, that is the evidence given by this man Howden. His evidence was admitted, but it seems to me it was rather curious evidence to admit in a case of this kind, in face of the fact that, before the separation he had this information which is said to be very damaging, but he made no mention of it to Mr. Hadley. He acted as Mr. Hadley's solicitor in February, 1903, and at the time that the separation deed was drawn up he allowed Mr. Hadley to give his wife the sum of $5,000. He stated before the committee that he had this information in his possession in 1903. Further on in his evidence he says: 'I never discussed this with Mr. Hadley until 1905.' Now that is part of the evidence on which my hon. friend from Calgary based his plea in this case, and from the way in which he put the case, what he deduced from the evidence would lead one to suppose that this Mrs. Hadley was an exceedingly bad woman. All this evidence of Howden's is allowed to be put in, but when the question is brought up of bringing evidence to show the life that Mrs. Hadley led after the separation, that evidence is not allowed to be put in. Now it seems to me that if Mrs. Hadley is the bad woman she is made out to be in this case, evidence showing that she had not led that life after the separation that she is presumed to have led while she was a married woman, was rather important evidence to put in.

I think if she was as bad as she was made out to be before the separation deed was signed, she would not have suddenly changed and become a good woman after the separation and before this divorce was applied for. It seems to me a very curious fact that no evidence of that kind was allowed to be put in, and for that reason I feel that in this particular case a divorce should not be granted.

McDonald,	Young.—34.
(Cape Breton),

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest to the House that inasmuch as this motion is carried, and that the debate appearing upon our records might prove an injustice to the respondent, much as I disagree with the finding of the House, I would move that the proceedings be expunged from the debates.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I second that motion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Since the last discussion on the question of divorce took place, I understood that all these discussions were to be conducted with closed doors. I think that was the understanding arrived at at that time. If that were carried out in future, there would be no necessity for our reporters doing the amount of work they have to do and then having to expunge it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—As far as I am concerned, I have no particular desire to see the debate recorded, but it appears to me that it ought to have some importance and appear on the record, because it is a debate lasting for several hours to-day on a report of the committee, which is rejected; and surely if the record is worth anything at all the arguments advanced, good or bad, should be recorded in some way. I do not think that during the whole debate anything has been said that has been objectionable or which would be termed light reading.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I entirely approve of the motion of the hon. gentleman from Calgary. When the House has come to the decision it has in the matter it would be very unfortunate for this woman and her child, and in fact for all concerned, that this argument should go on record. It might be quoted and they might be confronted with it, and it might do a great deal of harm.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think for the protection not only of the woman and also the child the proceedings should be recorded.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The vote will tell the story.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—We want it upon the fyles of the Debates. I see no object in withholding it, I cannot for the life of me understand the reason why the leader of the opposition should desire the debate expunged from the record. It is a proceeding of which we should not be ashamed, and if we do things in the dark and hide them from the general public we will be censured more than we are at the present time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The motion is to strike it off Hansard and the result will remain in the Journals.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friends who have fought this battle against the Bill feel that the delicacy so to speak, of the woman's character will not be impugned by reasons of the reflections made in the argument. I shall willingly withdraw my motion, but it seems to me in justice to that woman, who practically, has been vindicated by the vote of the House, a report of this nature which will go broadcast will certainly prove a very serious reflection upon her character, and that of her child in the future, and it was purely for the purpose of not placing her in the embarrassing position of having to confront the criticism which might be made upon the arguments advanced here that I made the motion. I can assure my hon. friends behind me that I have no objection whatever that the remarks that I have made should go broadcast. I have no hesitation in assuming all responsibility for the argument which I have made with reference to the evidence which was adduced before the committee, but if the friends of the respondent choose to look at it in the way indicated I shall consent to withdraw my motion.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—The debate has been conducted with a good deal of circumspection, and there is nothing discreditable in the whole discussion, and if it is not generally published in the press, the Toronto 'Globe,' the Montreal 'Herald,' The Star' and all the leading papers in the Dominion will have a very fair outline of the debate to-morrow and I think it will be just as well for us, because I think it is about the best debate that we have had on this unfortunate subject of divorce, which should never appear in this House at all.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I should just like to add one word to what has been said by some gentlemen who took the same view I did. I neither voted for nor against the resolution. I did not read the evidence and was not in a position to decide on the merits of the case. I do appeal to hon. members on the ground that the newspapers will no doubt report part of the proceedings of the House this afternoon and to-night. At the same time it must not be forgotten that the papers will disappear and the evidence with them, but the evidence taken in this House will never disappear; it will always be brought up in testimony. Assertions have been made for and against the respondent this afternoon, and for the sake of the honour and dignity of the House and for the sake of the children of the marriage I appeal to the House to carry out the suggestion of the hon. leader of the opposition.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—If the reasons which prompt us not to divulge the evidence taken by the committee to the public are good, those reasons ought to be also good, to prevent this debate going before the public. We sit here as a high court of justice, and the public is not more interested in having the details of this case than they would if it had been a divorce case before a judge. The evidence taken before a judge in such a case, as hon. gentlemen know, is with closed doors; they are not open to the public. There is no good reason that I can see why anything else but the verdict in this case should be printed. The newspapers will not be able to give the details, especially if our reporter is instructed not to furnish notes of the debate to the press. I believe that in all decency, and out of consideration for the woman who will now go before the world as an honest woman, the discussion which has taken place in which her character was more or less besmirched should not go to the public. I therefore hope that my hon. friend will maintain his motion and that it will be carried.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—With regard to the observations of hon. gentlemen so far as the press report is concerned, it cannot be stopped. The report of the afternoon's discussion has been sent away, but the reporter can be guided by our expression of opinion and suppress as much as possible of what has taken place since eight o'clock.

Hon. Mr. JONES—I hope this motion will be carried, and I think it ought to carry with it an understanding in this House that the Chamber will not put itself in this position again, but that hereafter discussions of this character shall be conducted with closed doors. Then we will be absolutely in control not only of the official record of the House, but also as to what should reach the newspapers. We cannot help what has been sent to the newspapers, but we can expunge the official record if this motion is carried.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON.

Hon. Mr. JAFFRAY—I hope that in the interests of the woman whose character has been discussed before us that the report will be suppressed. It is stated that the newspapers will have it. As I understand the newspapers will get the report from our press reporter, and it is in the power of our reporter to prevent any report being sent to the newspapers. I am sure no decent newspaper wants to report more of this class of matter than they can help, and I hope that this House will not do more than record the vote. That is the best justification of what we want to arrive at, namely that we believe that this woman should not be divorced.

Hon. Mr. POWER. As a matter of fact, the report of what took place in the afternoon was sent out by our special reporter at six o'clock, and we cannot recall that. Further I submit hon. gentlemen that there is no special reason why we should undertake to suppress this discussion. As my hon. junior colleague has stated, the debate was conducted with a good deal of prudence. There was no unnecessary discussion of the evidence and I do not think that if the official report is printed there is any thing in it to offend the feeling of the most refined person. In future it is not at all unlikely that the report of this discussion will be referred to on many occasions in dealing with the question of divorce, and really it seems to me that there is no sufficient reason for departing from our usual rule that our proceedings, which are conducted with open doors, should be on the record.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—While I usually bow with a great deal of respect to the hon. gentleman from Calgary in matters connected with proceedings in the divorce court, and I have learned to respect that ability in this matter I do not quite agree with him for the simple reason that I believe the debate that has been held upon this case will in all probability contribute more to the establishment of a divorce court than any debate that has yet been held.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I have the right to form my own opinion. There is in this country a very strongly pronounced opinion held in favour of a divorce court. That has been expressed. It has been supported and urged by the best journalists in the province of Ontario that we should have a divorce court.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I rise to a point of order.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I am speaking to the question before the House, will the hon. gentleman sit down a minute. I say this debate will be taken notice of by the public of this country and it will tend more and more, in my humble opinion, to show the necessity of a divorce court. I never was myself in favour of a divorce court. The fact is I have opposed it on the ground that in that portion of the Dominion where we have not had a divorce court there have been fewer divorces than in the provinces where there are divorce courts. At the same time, in view of the discussion, and the decision of the House, and the evidence submitted in this case, which no doubt will be open to lawyers and others for investigation, I believe it is a valuable contribution towards pointing out clearly the necessity for the establishment of a divorce court at an early day, if we are to have divorces at all. I think it is better that we should have them, and in view of that fact I want to see all this debate on record so that those who are disposed to consider the question will have an opportunity of doing so and of coming to their own conclusion and whether, under all the circumstances, the verdict arrived at to-night would be the proper one in the event of a court or judge sitting on it in place of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should be very sorry indeed to forfeit the good opinion the hon. senator from Wellington has been good enough to express with reference to myself, and I therefore shall very gladly withdraw the motion with the consent of the House. I moved it, not with respect to any wishes I myself had except to do a bare act of justice to the woman in question, and I am bound to say and I am very strongly of the opinion that, in justice to this woman, in view of the vindication of her character, the proceedings should be expunged. However, as there is no unanimity I, with the consent of my seconder, beg leave to withdraw the motion.

Some hon. GENTLEMEN—No, no.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think the hon. gentleman is not in order. His motion is one which might initiate or continue a debate and requires notice. No notice of the motion has been given.

The SPEAKER—I am disposed to decide the point of order against the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Was there a notice of motion given ?

The SPEAKER—No notice has been given, but this is a matter of routine proceedings which I think the House can dispose of.

Before the beginning of this debate any one could have moved that it take place with closed doors. This would have had the same effect as this motion has: the debate would not have been reported. If a notice was exacted the object of the motion would be debated.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 88) An Act respecting 'La Compagnie d'Assurance Mutuelle contre le feu des Comtés de Rimouski, Témiscouata et Kamouraska, and to change its name to 'La Compagnie d'Assurance contre l'incendie de Rimouski.—(Hon. Mr. Tessier.)

Bill (No. 114) An Act to incorporate the Anglo Canadian Insurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Casgrain, Windsor.)

EXCHANGE OF SCHOOL LANDS FOR DOMINION LANDS BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (163) An Act to authorize the exchange of certain school lands for other Dominion lands.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When this Bill was up for second reading the question was asked, for what special purpose was the land referred to in the first clause required. I was not then sure whether it was part of a forest or a forestry station. I find, however, it is for the latter use the land is needed. It may be a matter of interest to know that it is being largely used now for the propagation of seedling trees. Five years ago 40,000 seedlings were distributed. Now the distribution amounts to 2,000,000, and the demand from farmers for the young trees is so great that within two years it is expected that the distribution will come up to 4,000,000.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend say from what stations the distribution will take place ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—On this particular lot described in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is this from the Experimental Farm at Indian Head ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. It is the land described in the Bill. In the memorandum which I have, the character of the land referred to for this purpose is described. While it would not make good farm land, because it is rough and broken, it is better adapted for the purpose that it is now used for, than for any other purpose.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In what part of the Northwest is this ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is the only discription I have of it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is near the Indian Head farm.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What seems to me to be singular is that it is included in any reservation now or hereafter to be made. We should know if there is a reservation already made there.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a reservation there. For many years it has been used as a nursery to distribute plants to the farmers.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The particular section and part of the section is here described. The government must know now whether that is included in the area they have already set aside.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is not in the forest. It is a forest nursery, and has no connection with the forest itself.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—From the language used here it seems to be a case where they are hereafter to establish a forest nursery

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This land is established as a nursery for the growth of trees to be distributed among the farmers of the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then why this particular phraseology 'now or hereafter to be established,' if the nursery is now in existence?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know. I did not draw the Bill. This is not a new feature. Repeatedly during the last 25 years school lands have been taken for special purposes. Sometimes persons have settled on them without knowing they were school lands. At other times, for special reasons, Acts of parliament have been passed directing that the Governor in Council may set apart these lands for general purposes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But when the gov. ernment know precisely the half section they want for this purpose, they must also know whether they have the forest nursery which would include it or not. Why use this language ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it is drawn in harmony with the policy of the department. This is a reservation set apart for a special purpose. It is taken away from the school lands, not to be sold to individuals, but to be continued as a nursey for the propagation of trees to be distributed among the farmers of the Northwest.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This is one of the peculiar anomalies of the Department of the Interior. Here is a peculiar condition requiring an Act of parliament for the government to appropriate a half section of school lands for a public purpose, yet we find the Minister of the Interior vested with power to practically alienate the whole public domain at $1 an acre. I point it out to my hon. friend as one of the anomalies that confront us in the transaction of public business. Let me instance the case where the Minister of the Interior, on his own responsibility, alienated 250,000 acres of the public domain at $1 an acre, without the parliament or the government having anything to say about it ; and yet here is a case for the purpose of promoting public forestry where the government has to come for a special Act of parliament to appropriate a half section of school land. It seems to me that this proposition lacks that particularity which should characterize all Acts of parliament. The school lands are held in trust by the Dominion government, and it seems to me that a value should be placed on this particular half section and an appropriation made that should be carried to the credit of the school fund.

What machinery is to be set in motion to carry out the exchange and who is to judge of the land which will be conveyed for school purposes in exchange for this particular half section? I apprehend the government has no land of equal value in this vicinity. The whole of the public lands near Indian Head, I presume, have long since been disposed of. School lands there I judge would be worth in the vicinity of $30 or $40 an acre.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Act requires that the government shall set apart land of equal value. The course which is proposed to be adopted here has been followed in a dozen different cases in the past, particulars of which I have in my hand. Without the authority of parliament it is impossible for the government to dispose of school lands otherwise than by public auction. It is proposed to take this lot out of the category of school lands, and in place of it to donate from the public domain a lot equivalent in area and of equal value. Surely the Department of the Interior can be trusted to do work of that kind. I cannot see that it has any possible connection with the illustration my hon. friend has given; they are entirely different. Under the General Public Land Act school lands can only be sold by auction and the money is vested for the benefit of the schools. It has been a common practice in the past from time to time for the government to take authority from parliament to divert school lands in this way and substitute other lands in lieu thereof. In 1893 an Act was passed to amend the Dominion Lands Act, empowering the Minister of the Interior to grant homestead entry to a number of persons whose names will be found in the statutes for school lands of which they were in occupation prior to the first day of January, 1880. The Act went on to provide that the minister might cause to be selected in lieu of these school lands an equal area of Dominion lands for the purposes of the school endowment. In 1895 there was a similar Act passed; in 1897, for reasons set forth, certain school lands were withdrawn and disposed of. There is nothing peculiar about it. I may say that this particular parcel of land does not appear to be prairie land; it is not specially suitable for wheat growing.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What I take exception to is that it is not a clear cut proposition, considering that school lands are held in trust for specific purposes. The government should not baldly propose to make the exchange, but should carry to the credit of the trust the value of that particular parcel of land. The trust fund would then be augmented by that amount. The public would then know the value placed upon the property in question. The system by which the exchange is left possibly to some official in the Department of the Interior, is, I think, very unsatisfactory except it is done upon some principle.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Probably it was taken up before the school lands were set apart. We have an instance of that in the next clause of the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The difficulty I see in carrying this out is the one pointed out by the hon. gentleman from Calgary. This half section is situated where lands, as I understand, are the most valuable in the Northwest Territories. This school land is to be removed from the reservation for school purposes. Will an equal quantity of land be taken in its stead? If so in what section of the Northwest Territories or Manitoba are you likely to get as valuable land? Has anything been done to ascertain the actual value of the land which is to be expropriated, if I may use that expression, because that is really what it is? If the land be worth $30 an acre, and another half section be substituted for it which is only worth say $10 or $20 an acre;—the hon. gentleman may shake his head, but there is nothing improbable in that. Supposing you passed a Bill to exchange a lot on Sparks street, Ottawa, for a lot somewhere else, you would have to consider the value of the two properties, or it would not be a fair transaction; and unless the land which is taken in lieu of the half section which is to be reserved for forestry purposes be of equal value, then the school fund will be deprived of the difference in value between the two. I have not seen any explanation as to how that is to be carried out, either in the debates in the Commons or in the remarks made by the hon. gentleman. If this land be now valued and it is understood that the land which is to be substituted for it is to be of equal value as well as equal in area, then the school fund would be protected.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—It has been the habit in the past to set an upset price on all the school lands sold either in Manitoba or the Northwest Territories. Two or three years ago they had a sale of school lands in the district near where this land is, and the highest upset price was $9 an acre, and although some of the lands were possibly worth more than that, generally the buyers make a bargain among themselves that they will not compete against each other and perhaps divide the section up into quarter sections and so secure it for the upset price.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a fraud.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—No, the land was sold legitimately and fairly by public auction, but it only brought about $9 an acre even in that vicinity. The advantage of having a good nursery for the benefit of the farmers in that locality will be very great, and I do not think the government would lose anything by the exchange.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the statement of the hon. gentleman is one which the government should take cognizance of, that there is a combination among those who go to bid for school lands in order to divide it among themselves at the upset price. The sooner that is brought to an end the better. That is little less than a combination to secure property at less than they would have to pay for it if there was no combination. A good deal has been said against combinations both here and in the provincial legislatures. My hon. friend tells this House that this is the mode in which the public lands have been sold in that country, and school lands in particular, which makes it all the worse.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The hon. gentleman comes to a wrong conclusion. School lands are sold by the quarter-section. There is not nearly as much competition for a quarter-section as there is for a whole section. By selling by quarter-sections the land is only available for the farmers living around it, and the result is that it sells for about the upset price.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They combine to keep the prices down.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—There is nothing illegitimate about that. If you and I were to go to an auction sale here, and we were to agree that I would not bid against you there is nothing wrong about that.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT—As far as the province of Alberta is concerned, the Senator from Wolseley is wrong, for I know personally that the sale of school lands held there realized much more than the upset price. The land sold from $30 to $60 an acre, while the upset price had been $15.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I don't think the hon. senator from Wolseley can be serious because the government do not recognize the combining together of bidders to keep down the prices.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I did not say they did.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The hon. gentleman from Belleville says that the charge has been made that the government has allowed that, and he wants the government to take cognizance of it. There was some little work of that kind done in Manitoba a few years ago, but the government did not permit the sale to go through, and the land was resold. So far as the exchange of land is concerned, school lands have never suffered by the exchanges. Probably a hundred quarter-sections have been exchanged in the province of Manitoba where squatters or homesteaders had gone on the land, and the Government took other sections instead. In many cases I know that the school lands fund did not suffer from the exchange, because land was generally selected of equal or even greater value. So far as this particular half section is concerned, probably the government would have power to deal with it without a special Act, but it is all along the line of education. I believe this is the Indian Head experimental farm extension, and it is for the purpose of encouraging forestry in the territories. No one need fear that the Government will not have just as good land substituted for it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I would call the attention of the House to the language of subsection 2, which makes it clear that land of equal value as nearly as may be is to be selected. Surely that ought to satisfy the House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is no objection to the principle involved in making the exchange. The whole question is centred upon the mode of exchange.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No other mode could be fairer. It seems to me that there was a suspicion that the Department of the Interior had some job to put up.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is good reason for that suspicion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I don't think they are likely to go into a small job like this.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has a distinct recollection of a case to which the attention of the committee was called by the senator from Portage la Prairie. Those who have taken any interest in the disposition of lands in that country know that there was a job put up among the officials at that time, and when it was exposed it was of such a flagrant character that the government were obliged to cancel the sale.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In reference to this case, I may say that many years ago, before this land was surveyed, and before it was known to be school lands, a prospector named Mr. Aldrich was examining the country for oil, and he selected this lot as a suitable one and spent considerable money on it. Subsequently he formed a company, known as the Western Oil and Coal Company, and they have, I understand, expended over $20,000 upon this land. It is now proposed that the land shall be withdrawn from the school lands and sold to this company, land of equal value to be transferred to the school fund.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does this exchange carry the minerals with it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not suppose it would.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I doubt the conclusion of my hon. friend, because the provincial government is entitled to the minerals in the school lands, or at least the trust fund would be augmented by the value of the minerals. Is the government divesting itself of its title to the minerals in the land which is to be conveyed to this party for $1 an acre? It seems to me there should be a reservation made of all minerals excepting oil. Is there any necessity in conveying to a company of this kind, of making a gift of the oil, because $1 an acre is simply a nominal consideration, to hand over the minerals as well? This land is in the coal bearing area and consequently that point assumes some importance. This might be adopted as an evasive means of securing mining lands of very great value for a nominal sum. I am casting no reflections upon the company to whom the sale is to be made, but would simply point out that an application might be made—I do not understand what the regulations require as to what money shall be expended by the discovery of a claim, but I understand that evidence must be submitted to the minister showing what has been done by the prospector. If that evidence is satisfactory, the government conveys the land at a dollar an acre. Now let us assume that that applicant was aware of this being very valuable mining land, and with the object of getting it for a nominal sum he should say that he had discovered oil, and had expended a certain amount; I can very well fancy his securing a large area of land at a nominal figure in that way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am told that a very large expenditure has been incurred in this instance, over $20,000, in experimenting in borings, &c., and therefore, under the regulations of the department, the party would be entitled to the land at a dollar an acre. At the time when the experiments were begun it was not known that it was school lands—it was not even surveyed. It would be very unfair to a prospector to deprive him of his expenditure in developing an industry of that kind.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not questioning that.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. JAFFRAY, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment. It was then read a third time and passed.

REVILLION BROTHERS LTD. BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY moved the second reading of Bill 76 'An Act respecting Revillion Brothers, Ltd.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I would call the attention of the House to this Bill. It is an important one, as will be seen from a perusal of its clauses. I suppose the Bill will go to committee, and I hope there it will be shorn of some of the powers which are asked for. They want to carry on the business of bankers and to do all kinds of things. Sections 9 and 10 read as follows:—

9. The company may carry on the business of a money fowarder by post, telegraph, or other means.

10. In connection with its employees and servants, its posts, settlements or offices, the company may carry on the business of a savings bank, with the powers incidental thereto which are set out in an Act respecting certain savings banks in the province of Quebec, being chapter 32 of the statutes of 1890, which Act shall apply to the company in so far as it does not conflict with the provisions of this Act.

The Bill is an important measure and requires close scrutiny before it becomes law.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—I move that this Bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would reserve to myself the right to take exception to the Committee on Banking and Commerce dealing entirely with this Bill. It involves the work of all the committees, practically. It is a Bill for the Private Bills Committee, the Banking and Commerce Committee, and the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—It might be better to let it go to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, I would object to that. When it goes to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, objection might be taken to the other clause being dealt with by that committee, and then the Bill might be referred to other committees.

The SPEAKER—If the principal object of the Bill carries it to that committee and the others are only incidental, that committee can still deal with the principal object of the Bill, but I do not know what is the principal object of the Bill, so that I take it for granted it must be referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. JAFFRAY—I think this Bill is of such importance and of so wide a scope that we should be very deliberate about it, and it would be much too soon to bring it before any of the committees to-morrow. I suggest that it be left over for a day or so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It cannot go before the committee to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY moved the suspension of rules 70 and 60.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the effect of that?

The SPEAKER—It is to dispense with the week's notice. To send it to the committee this week.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If we dispense with all the rules, the objection taken to the rapid progress of the Bill will be defeated. I think my hon. friend wants to suspend the rules to enable him to send it to the committee at once.

Hon. Mr. JAFFRAY—I think we ought to have time to consider Bills of this nature. It was laid on my desk this evening, and that is the first I have seen of it, and I would object under the circumstances to the suspension of the rule.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The posting of this Bill for 24 hours would not be at all unreasonable; it was only distributed this afternoon. It is not printed in French yet. Still I do not take objection on that ground. I think sufficient time should be given so that the law clerk may be able to inspect the Bill and make a report to the committee to which it should be referred.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY—I have no objection, so long as it gets to the committee this week.

The motion was allowed to drop.

FORT WILLIAM AND PORT ARTHUR TERMINAL RAILWAY AND BRIDGE COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved the second reading of Bill (120) An Act to incorporate the Fort William and Port Arthur Terminal Railway and Bridge Company.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read a second time.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved the suspension of rules 17 and 60 so far as they relate to this Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know that it is necessary to take any serious objections on the ground of provincial rights. The House has passed much more objectionable provisions than are contained in this.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It is a small Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, no. But after the decision of the House on a question of this kind it is folly to raise objections to this Bill such as were raised to the other measure. We have been sinning so long that we may just as well continue it.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

SALE AND MARKING OF MANUFACTURES OF GOLD AND SILVER BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (U) An Act respecting the sale and marking of manufactures of gold and silver, with amendments.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill was very thoroughly discussed in the committee on two occasions, and on the first occasion an order was made by the committee to have it redrafted. It appears now in a very much simpler form than it did on its introduction. I may say also that the trade—that is the manufacturer and dealer, all persons engaged in the manufacture of gold and silver as well as those who sell it —were fully heard. The differences of opinion between the varied interests were not very great. So far as the stamping of articles of gold and silver was concerned, there was a consensus of opinion, except on the one point, as to whether such articles should be stamped and sold in Canada of a grade lower than ten carats. There was not very much opposition to it, and the better opinion was that we should not reduce the standard below ten carats. In regard to the marking of gold and silver there was practically no difference of opinion between the different members of the trade—those who simply sold and those who manufactured. In regard to plated articles, there was a difference of opinion, but in the judgment of the committee, I think I am safe in saying, they thought that the better way to protect the public would be to adhere to the provisions set forth in the Bill as to the proper stamping of articles that were professedly not gold and silver according to the classification given in the former paragraph of the Bill, to what were known as plated articles. Certainly no subject that ever came before a committee, as far as I can remember, was more intelligently or more fairly and freely discussed than the one we had the opportunity of considering to-day, and I think the Bill as it now stands will be satisfactory to the great majority not only of purchasers, but also of those in the trade. Evidence was given that the Bill was demanded by the trade ; that there was a general demand for some legislation, because it was said that the public were being defrauded day by day, and those who were honestly manufacturing articles of gold and silver stood at a disadvantage, because others who were disposing of cheaper goods were taking advantage of the fact that there was no law on the subject to sell goods of inferior quality representing them to be of a higher grade. At this stage of the session I hope the House will concur in the amendments so that we may proceed with the Bill.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How will the inspection be carried out, and what will become of goods imported from the United States, Germany and other parts of the world, which are below the standard ? Will they have to be confiscated ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Bill provides that it shall not come into force for a year, and that goods already in the country shall not be subject to its provisions. The only point seriously discussed in the committee was as to whether we should allow goods to be marked which were below the standard of ten carats. The Bill as a rule conforms closely to the law as it exists in the United States. I have forgotten the number of states in which a similar Bill has been passed—something like twenty different states, and a Bill has also been passed by the Congress of the United States to apply generally on the same lines.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Will the inspectors be attached to the customs house, or how will they operate ? It will require a great many all over the country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All parties need not mark their goods if they choose to sell them as they appear, but if they do mark them they must take the responsibility of making them of the requisite standard. That is the whole purport of the Bill. If the mark is put on, it must be an honest one. I move concurrence in the amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—(In French.)—I think it would be well that the amendments should be printed, and that the report of the committee should be considered to-morrow. That will give hon. gentlemen an opportunity of acquainting themselves with the nature of the amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no objection, only that it endangers the Bill, because the House of Commons yesterday put through six or eight government measures, evidently showing a disposition to close up the session as rapidly as possible. As this Bill has to go to the other Chamber, I would ask my hon. friend to allow the amendments to be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. DeBOUCHERVILLE—It will only be twenty-four hours delay.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That may decide the fate of the Bill. Of course if the hon. gentleman is not willing to withdraw his objection, it will not be possible to proceed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (KK) An Act for the relief of William Edward Ogden.—(Hon. Mr. Frost.)

ENROLMENT OF MEN IN THE VOLUNTEER FORCE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Does the Militia Act allow the enrolment of men in the volunteer force, at any time, provided that it takes place in the establishments that it is wished to fill ?

If the Militia Act authorizes the enrolment or the recruiting of men at any time in the volunteer force, in order to fill its establishments, is it the intention of the government to make a restriction or a limitation of the Militia Act by decreeing that in future no such enrolment or recruiting shall take place during determined periods to be fixed by the Department of Militia ?

In virtue of what section of the law, could such a restriction or limitation be decreed ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers are as follows:

To the first question, yes.

To the second question, there is no such intention at the present time.

To the third question, by virtue of section 26 of the Militia Act, 1904.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I call the attention of the government to this fact because a militia order has been issued, No. 64, which reads as follows :

It is notified for the information of all concerned that commanding officers whose corps are authorized to perform annual training in camps of instruction shall be required to forward service rolls of their respective commands so as to reach headquarters not later than seven days before the commencement of camp, and that no pay shall be issued nor transport furnished to militiamen whose names are not on service rolls forwarded to headquarters accordingly. This regulation will be rigidly enforced.

By the Militia Act a man may be enrolled at any time, as the hon. minister has just stated, enrolled any day of the year. When he signs the service roll and takes the oath of allegiance, his time begins with the signing of the roll and he is engaged for three years, but there is a provision in the law which says he may retire from the militia on six months' notice and cease to be a member of the corps. According to this regulation, which is the law of the land, every militiaman is engaged for three years, wth the exception I have just mentioned. Suppose a man has given six months' notice and that the time at which the notice expires is three days before camp, there is a place vacant in the company; you cannot engage a man except to fill up the list. If the commanding officer engages that man three days before camp, he is not paid, according to that militia order. I contend that the militia order is against the law. It might act very fairly perhaps in cities and towns, but take the rural districts; take a district like the Temiscouata, or like the Montmagny and L'Islet, the length of which is about 100 mies, if you impose on the officers the obligation to send their pay rolls before the camp starts; it is really impossible in a territory so vast as the one that covers the regiment to enroll recruits, and if they do enroll recruits they are notified by the militia order that the men will not be paid either for transport or for the time they are in camp. So that I contend that this order is directly the intention and wording of the military law, and I do not know why they should limit to a certain date the enrollment of officers against the provision of the law. For that reason I bring this order to the attention of the minister so that it may be modified in consequence and not interfere with the law as it stands now on the statute-book.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall be glad to call the attention of the minister to the observations made by the hon. gentleman. Section 26 gives power to the Governor in Council to make regulations which practically have the effect of law. The hon. gentleman is familar with section 26.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes, but it is not to make regulations against the law. They have a right to make regulations to provide for things that the law does not provide for, but not regulations against the law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will call the attention of the department to it.

ERROR IN MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. BAIRD—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to bring to the attention of the House the fact that in the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday my name is not recorded as voting. I wish to say that I was present and voted against the report of the committee in the Hadley case, and I should like to have my name recorded.

The SPEAKER—The clerk will make the change.

CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The order of the day being called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. David : That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all petitions, resolutions or documents concerning the abolition or reorganization of the Senate.—Hon. Mr. Perley.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I have always made it a practice since I have had the honour of a seat in the Senate not to attempt to speak frequently, nor to make very long speeches. I have always endeavoured to listen carefully to the remarks made by hon. gentlemen in discussing the various questions which have come before the Senate, and then make up my mind and vote. This question, however, is an exception to that rule. If hon. gentlemen had discussed the subject in the manner in which I think its importance demanded, I would have remained silent, but notwithstanding that there have been able and clever speeches—speeches which will reflect credit on the Senate, they have not voiced my sentiments in regard to the reformation of this chamber, and for that reason I desire the indulgence of the House for a short time this afternoon. I conceive it to be my duty to express my high appreciation of the honour done me by the hon. Secretary of State. The motion was on the order paper for the greater part of the session, but the hon. member, out of kindness to me on account of my going home to-night, had it placed at the head of the orders of the day. Therefore I appreciate the compliment he paid me very much ? I propose to leave for my home to-night and I must say that my associations, under the leadership of the hon. Secretary of State this session, have been very pleasant in all respects. I think all members of the Senate will agree with me that the hon. gentleman has led the Senate in a creditable and satisfactory manner, and I will carry home with me not only pleasant recollections of this Chamber so far as the hon. Secretary of State and leader of the government is concerned but also with regard to every member of the Senate. I realize the importance of the resolution which I am about to discuss—as presented to us by the hon. gentleman from Mille Isle. He is deserving of the credit of every hon. gentlemen of this Senate for placing a motion of such importance to the people of Canada on our order paper. Whilst the hon. gentleman has included in that application all that he perhaps thought was necessary, he did not to my mind fill in all that should have been inserted. In addition to the petitions and the resolutions that have been presented to the government from time to time in respect of the Senate, he should have added the speeches made by several hon. gentlemen who are at present members of the Senate, when they were in opposition in the House of Commons before this government came into power. I am sure many of those would have been in striking contrast to the speeches made by the same hon. gentleman since they have occupied a seat in this Chamber. So far as I am concerned, I believe this Senate should be an independent branch of parliament. I do not believe that any partisan speeches should be made here.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I do not hesitate to say that I think it should be non-partisan. The constitution of the Senate would imply that it was to be non-partisan, and when we divide this Chamber into government and opposition we assume a position that is not worthy of the Senate, because if the Upper House is anything it should be independent, and maintain a position of independence as between the people on the one hand and the parliament and the government on the other, and when you undertake to resolve yourselves into partisans and make partisan speeches in this House, as has been done, in my judgment it is a breach of etiquette on the part of the Senate of Canada that should not be countenanced. The hon. gentleman from Portage la Prairie would imply by his interjection that perhaps I had myself made party speeches on some occasions.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—But if I have, I challenge any one to say that I made such a speech as the agressor himself. It was only in defence of the party to which I belong ; when that party was assailed I felt it incumbent upon me, in the discharge of my duty, to defend my position, and that is the only circumstance in which any hon. gentlemen can impute to me that I have made partisan speeches. That is in striking contrast with the speeches of many other hon. members, because if I have violated the rules of the senatorial decorum, I only follow the lead of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), because he never made a speech since he had the honour of occupying a seat in the Senate that had not a party leaning in it. My hon. friend from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen) had to spice his speech the other night with strong partisan sentiments entirely outside of the issue before the House. Not being a very fluent public speaker—because like the hon. senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Edwards), I belong to the farming class and farmers generally are not fluent speakers—I shall, like farmers generally, come to the point very quickly.

I divide my subject into three parts, first, the Senate of Canada, to serve the purpose which it was intended to serve, must be independent of all party influences as it was at the start. Secondly, I purpose to refer to the fact that the Senate as now constituted is not independent of party influence; and thirdly, I intend to perform my duty and point out how the senator can be appointed and not be partisan. That is a task that a good many hon. gentlemen have undertaken, but so far without success, and it prompts me to make a few remarks on the subject myself. I speak from my own judgment, not only in the presence of hon. gentlemen who hear me, but before the whole people of Canada, and I am willing to be judged by them whether my views are correct or not. The Senate of Canada, to fulfil the functions it was intended to perform, must be an independent branch of parliament. If you make the Senate partisan you destroy its usefulness and it would be better to abolish it altogether and increase the representation in the House of Commons if larger representation is desired. In order to perform its proper functions under the constitution, the Senate must be independent, otherwise it cannot serve as an equilibrium between all parties. When the Senate was first appointed, it contained representatives of all parties; even the religious faith of the people was recognized in the constitution of the Senate. All classes of business, trades and occupations and politics were represented, and that Senate has been regarded as the [illegible] that Canada has yet seen. I did not know very many of its members from the west, but I knew quite a number of senators from the maritime provinces personally, and they were a good class of men. Therefore I say that to be of service the Senate must be as independent as it was when first appointed.

I need not use any elaborate argument to show that it is not at present independent, because it is generally accepted that this Senate is as partisan as the House of Commons. I am wiling to stake my reputation before the country upon that assertion. The Senate is not independent. Why would it be? The moment you say that a senator should be independent and should not vote against the government, you virtually say that he must be a man without gratitude. The first principle I wish to lay down is that we are servants of the people; we are the power between the people and the parliament and the government. That is to my mind the true function of the Senate; the highest mandate we have is that of the people. We are their servants, but we are to be independent, and in order that we may be independent we are appointed for life, so that as far as the people are concerned we are beyond their reach. That makes us still more responsible for the discharge of our duties in a way that is creditable to ourselves and satisfactory to those whose servants we are. The Senate is often recruited with men who have not the sanction and support of the people. I do not say it as a reflection upon senators, but it is well known that this Senate is largely made up—and I am not speaking in regard to this from a party standpoint, I am simply taking the case as I find it—of men who have been defeated in electoral contests. The appointment of these senators was not by the mandate of the people, but by the mandate of the government. The independence of the Senate is at once destroyed the moment the government appoint a man who has been defeated by the people. Such a man can scarcely help feeling grateful to the government which appointed him, and thus his independence is destroyed. It is a characteristic of most men to be grateful. It is a noble trait in the mind of any man, and when a government takes a man from the cold shades where the people have left him and puts him in the Senate, it is a commendable trait in that man's character to feel that he must support the government. He must be partisan, and he is partisan; the evidence shows it clearly. I say, therefore, that the Senate as now constituted is not an independent branch of parliament. In every speech which has been made on this subject the cry has been 'We want the system of appointing senators changed.' Could anything more strongly support my argument that this body is not independent? The whole gist of the speeches has been that the Senate is wrongly constituted because the appointments are in the hands of the government. Almost every hon. gentleman who has spoken has admitted that, but no one has yet defined a workable policy by which the evil could be remedied. He sees the evil, but he has not the constructive genius to provide a remedy. This of itself is proof that the Senate is not what the members of this Chamber think it ought to be. Another evidence of that is found in the fact that the constitution under which we live and have our being so far as the Senate is concerned has been constantly violated. The British North America Act provides that we should have a certain number of senators, yet in the representation of the city and county of St. John in this Chamber there has been a vacancy—and the same is true of other parts of New Brunswick—for two years and a half. Why is that vacancy in the Senate not filled? Simply because the government are holding that appointment back in order to influence the House of Commons, and the effect is not only to corrupt the Senate, but the House of Commons as well, by having the prestige and power of appointment in the hands of the government. If the reason I have given is not the true reason, why have they not filled that vacancy in the city of St. John? If this Senate is to be independent, that vacancy should have been filled within 24 hours; but I would not have the government act so hastily as that. I would give them a month or six weeks. The fact that it has remained a vacancy for such a long time certainly shows that the Senate is not constituted in the manner it should be. While the power remains in the hands of the government to appoint the members of the Senate, it is a weapon by which they can use undue influence over the members of the House of Commons, many of whom have in times past been appointed to this Chamber, and many more of whom are expecting a seat here. It is not human nature for a member of parliament to act independently when he has an eye upon the red Chamber, when he wants to enter into this place of repose, and ease and quiet, to get away from the excitement and turmoil of elections. It is not natural I contend for such a man to act the independent part which a member of the House of Commons should play. If he does act independently, he may displease the government, and then he loses his chance for the coveted seat in the Senate. I am willing to let it go to the judgment of the country, and I am convinced that there is not one man in 500 who will not say that I am right. Now the Senate can be improved; it can be made independent if properly appointed. This is the crucial point in the whole matter. The hon. Sir Richard Cartwright launched out first. He is one of our cleverest men, and one of the most brilliant debaters in the Senate. Yet when he was through with his argument no one could tell what he proposed to do. He is a skilled lawyer, but you cannot tell half the time what a lawyer means when his argument is made. The right hon. gentleman had several schemes which he proposed. The hon. gentleman from Wellington (Hon. Mr. McMullen) endorsed his views; then the hon. gentleman from Marshfield (Hon. Mr. Ferguson) had another scheme; and half a dozen other hon. gentlemen propounded schemes but none of them are practical. I am not a constitutional lawyer, nor a great parliamentarian, but I have undertaken to provide a plan,—not one but two—my mind is fertile—two methods by which a senator might be appointed under such conditions as would enable him to exercise the highest functions of a senator, because he would be independent of everybody. I will take one constitutency, say the city of St. John, N.B., because it has been robbed of its rights for a long time. It is a great commercial centre, but if it were a backwoods constituency the principle of the violation of the constitution, would be just the same. St. John is the great commercial emporium of the province of New Brunswick, and if there is any city in the Dominion of Canada which has a right to be represented in the Senate it is that important port. If it is not considered necessary to appoint a representative from that constituency, it is the strongest argument one can advance that there is no need of a Senate. Now, taking the city of St. John as an example, I will tell you in my humble opinion the way in which a Senate could be created which would be representative of the people of Canada, and which would fill the bill in every respect. When a vacancy occurs, no matter under what circumstances, it is soon known to the whole of the Dominion of Canada that a certain constituency is vacant. At that moment I would have the clerk of the Senate notify the Prime Minister, whoever he may be, the leader of the opposition whoever he may be, the chief justice of the province of New Brunswick, or if there is more than one chief justice, as there is in Ontario and Quebec, then the one nearest the vacancy, that such a vacancy has occurred and that he was going to hold a court at a certain time to fill it. Then I would provide in the Act that the Prime Minister should select eight of his cabinet. I give the government a preponderance in numbers because they have the majority of the people behind them. Then I would notify the leader of the opposition to select six out of his supporters, and it would be his bounden duty in the interest of the party and of himself to select good representative men in the House of Commons. Then I would notify the chief justice who would select three of his colleagues. The eight selected by the government with the Prime Minister would make nine ; the six selected by the leader of the opposition with himself would be seven, making 16. The chief justice of the province with three of his colleagues would be four making twenty in all. Twenty men of the highest standing for intelligence politically and otherwise, men of the people, representative men in every respect. Then I would have the clerk notify these men on a certain day to hold a ballot here. They would come here with the clerk and the ballot box, and each of these men would write on a ballot the name of the man that he thought fit and qualified by virtue of his intelligence and his knowledge of the business of that particular district to fill the vacancy ; and they would elect him by ballot so that the man with a majority of votes would be the senator for that district.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And if every body votes for himself ?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—That is unreasonable, because he would not be here to vote—he could not vote for himself. The man elected would be chosen by 20 good men from all parts of the country and would not know who elected him. He would therefore be under no compliment to the government or to the opposition. The government would have a majority on the committee, and then the independent chief justice and his colleagues would certainly make an independent, honest electorate. They would be unbiased, or if they were not, the man elected would be unbiased because he would owe allegiance to no one party. His honour and character and reputation would be at stake to discharge his duties fairly and properly. I may be confronted with the objection that I am not competent to interpret the law. I am free to confess that lawyers in framing acts of parliament do not always use language to carry out their intention. I shall now refer to the British North America Act. We know the circumstances under which that Act came into existence. There was a deadlock between upper and lower Canada so that the public business could not be carried on, and the maritime provinces were solicited to join in a confederation. The Confederation Act provided for a union with the maritime provinces, but it included only Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario, and provision was made that each of the three sections should have 24 senators. This is an Act of parliament and not a royal proclamation, an Act of parliament such as we can pass here to the extent of our power. Section 10 of that Act reads as follows :—

> The provisions of this Act referring to the Governor General extend and apply to the Governor General for the time being of Canada, or other the chief executive officer or administrator for the time being carrying on the government of Canada on behalf and in the name of the Queen, by whatever title he is designated.

However, that is not the most important clause. Section 7 provides :

> There shall be a council to aid and advise in the government of Canada to be styled the Queen's Privy Council for Canada ; and the persons who are to be members of that council shall be from time to time chosen and summoned by the Governor General and sworn in as Privy Councillors, and members thereof may be from time to time removed by the Governor General.

There is a definite and distinct power and authority given to the Governor General to select his own cabinet and the power to dismiss them. I am quite well aware of the fact that some of the Governor General's functions have been usurped, first by Sir John Macdonald, and he being a good authority in politics, his successors have followed his practice. I hold that Sir John Macdonald interpreted that Act to suit his own purpose, and I am only astonished, if I am at all right, that hon. members of the opposition, when the Conservative party was in such a large majority in this Senate did not then detect where the error was and try and have it remedied. There is a large portion of clause 12 which has reference to the provinces which it is not necessary to read. The latter portion of the clause reads :

Or by those governors or lieutenant governors individually shall as far as the same continue in existence and capable of being exercised after the union in relation to the government of Canada be vested in and exercisable by the Governor General with the advice or with the advice and consent of or in conjunction with the Queen's Privy Council for Canada or any members thereof, or by the Governor General individually.

There is a distinction between his powers. He can act under and with the advise and consent of the Privy Council, or he has powers relegated to him in that Act by which he can act individually. Then paragraph 13 reads :

The provisions of this Act referring to the Governor General in Council shall be construed as referring to the Governor General acting by and with the advice of the Queen's Privy Council of Canada.

It provides that he can act in conjunction with the Queen's Privy Council of Canada. I now come to the appointment of senators. So far I have been referring to general powers of the Governor General. Paragraph 21 reads:

The Senate shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, consist of 72 members who shall be styled senators.

Paragraph 22 provides :

In relation to the constitution the Senate of Canada shall be deemed to consist of three divisions :—
1. Ontario.
2. Quebec.
3. Maritime provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which three divisions shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be equally represented in the Senate as follows :

This is the constitution under which we were created and which we are working under. The paragraph proceeds :

Ontario by 24 senators, Quebec by 24, maritime provinces, 24 senators, 12 thereof representing Nova Scotia and 12 thereof representing New Brunswick.

Since Prince Edward Island came into confederation two have been taken off Nova Scotia and two off New Brunswick, so that the representation in the maritime provinces is twenty-four—ten from Nova Scotia and ten from New Brunswick, but there has been a violation of the constitution. It was one of the planks of confederation that they were to have a fair representation in the Senate to see that their rights were not sacrificed to the other provinces. The constitution has been flagrantly violated, and at the present time Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have only eight senators each. A vacancy in Nova Scotia has existed for the last year, and in New Brunswick this session and last session, and there is now another vacancy in New Brunswick. That shows that under the sanction and approval of the government the provisions of the constitution have been broken. It proves conclusively that if a Senate is necessary appointments should be made, and if they are not appointed then the Senate is no use, and the interests of those provinces is being sacrificed. Why do they not fill the vacancies in Nova Scotia and in New Brunswick? It is because the appointments are dangling before the eyes of certain people to give the government power—

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—In what way have the interests of the people been sacrificed ?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I was going to say that that was a foolish question, but I won't say it, but if you have a right to a certain representation and you do not get it, you are injured and the bargain giving you that right has been violated.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—For political purposes.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Yes, and I am surprised at the hon. gentleman, because he is the one who should rise and condemn the government for permitting his province to be insufficiently represented in the Senate. The constitution of the Senate is not being complied with in that respect. Consequently it is wrong. I am coming now to a more important point, and certainly that is a very important point—it shows that the Senate is beyond peradventure partisan to the core, because if it was not for party purposes, why are not these appointemnts filled up at once? Why are these provinces denied their rights? Why are the maritime provinces at the mercy of Ontario and Quebec? I say the constitution of the Senate is not being complied with. Clause 24 is the important clause in my estimation. It provides how the Senate shall be appointed. It reads as follows:

> The Governor General shall from time to time in the Queen's name by instrument under the great seal of Canada summon qualified persons to the Senate, and subject to the provisions of this Act, every person so summoned shall become and be a member of the Senate and a senator.

It does not say the Governor General in Council. It says the Governor General. And in a previous section referring to the constitution of this country it says the Governor General had certain authority by and with the advice of his ministers, and in another part it states that he can work individually, 'by the Governor General individually'. Here is one of the cases where the Governor General individually can appoint a senator and it is his function: they appoint the Speaker of the Senate and it goes on to say that the House of Commons shall then elect a speaker and the province of Ontario and Quebec shall elect their speakers in a similar manner. So it makes a distinction from start to finish showing the Governor General has the appointing power. Now coming to the point, who would be more qualified or a better authority to fill vacancies than the Governor General? He is a statesman, a man familiar with the constitution and the requirements of the legislature. He is, by virtue of his life-long training, a statesman of the highest class. We look upon Governors General as of the highest class. He is elected for that position because of his fitness, and he does not know Grit or Tory. He comes out to fill up the Senate with what he considers to be fair, honourable, creditable and worthy men. He does not have to select them from the whole of Canada, but from certain points in Canada, and it would not be very difficult for him to find out who would be a good representative man in a certain district. No man would undertake to approach him and make a political hack of him. His dignified position would prevent it. Even now he is very reserved, and does not associate with the people, by virtue of the fact that he is supposed to be impartial and to act fairly between parties. He is a qualified man in every sense, and he would take means personally to find out who, in the city of St. John, for instance, would be a competent man to fill this position. It is a reflection upon St. John that the government does not make the appointment. It is as much as to say 'We have no man in our party fit for it'. But the Governor General will select a man not because of partyism, but because of his eminent fitness in every particular for that high function and the very fact of the man being so selected and not being amenable to any party would make him independent. He would have no gratitude to extend to any one, but his highest ambition would be to discharge the duties of his position in a creditable manner.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Halifax)—How would he receive the information that would qualify him to make the appointment?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I have known every Governor in Canada from Lord Lisgar down, either personally or by reputation, and I desire to say to the hon. gentleman who interrupted me that I never felt prouder of being a British subject than I did when I heard Lord Lisgar speak alongside of the President of the United States, when the President arose and said: 'Mr. Chairman and gentleman, I thank you.' Lord Lisgar made a statesmanlike speech, such as every English Governor General can make, and I was proud to know that in Canada we had as our official head a gentleman who could make a speech that would cast the President of the United States at that time into the shade entirely, and I say every Governor General from that time to the present has been a gentleman of high attainments—a credit to the country, and the people of Canada have always expressed their satisfaction with his conduct as Governor during his term of office. Therefore, if the Governor General of Canada would not be a fair and impartial man to select senators, God knows where we could get one. I have in these few remarks endeavoured to put my case as plainly and as fair as possible. In his speech on this subject the hon. gentleman from Wellington made a reference to the gerrymander. He waxed eloquent and wrathy. He got furious all at once, and the old partisan spirit arose in him; he forgot the spirit of independence he used to boast of so much and he got down to the spirit of partyism.

As far as I am concerned, as a senator I desire to explain my own position and others can do the same if they wish. During the regime of Sir John Macdonald the first well defined policy we have had since confederation was formulated in 1878. It was the protective tariff, the national policy, so-called, and it was the railway policy of building the Canadian Pacific Railway. Those were the two great features that Sir John A. Macdonald initiated as the national policy. It is not within the recollection of any hon. gentleman here —it is not within my recollection any way —that any pledge or promise that Sir John Macdonald made during the time he was leading the Conservative party, the whole eighteen years, was ever violated. When he made a pre-election promise he always carried out that pledge by an Act of parliament, having the mandate of the people. We in the Senate have a right to look to the people and to serve their interests. We followed suit and supported the measures which he submitted, because he had the authority of the people and we took that authority as our authority to act in the way we did. There is a striking contrast between the policy of his government and the policy of the present government, because it is a well known fact that with few exceptions they never attempted to carry out a pre-election promise, consequently when the Reform party in the Senate undertake to vote for certain measures they have not the mandate of the people for the measures they are voting for. When the hon. gentleman from Wellington talks about gerrymander he knows very well that it did not deprive any man of a vote. If he did not vote in one place, he voted in another. How can the hon. gentleman tell that a man's grandson is of the same politics as himself? How does he know that I am of the same politics as my grandfather?

We are living in an age when men's political views are mainly based on the measures introduced by the government from time to time. My own policy is to support the government whose policy is in my judgment best calculated to promote the interests of Canada, and I have pursued that course in the Senate. I have supported many measures introduced by this government and it is only when I think they are wrong that I vote against them. That is very different from the position taken by hon. gentlemen on the other side, who vote for the government right or wrong. I support the government when they are right, and oppose them when they are wrong. The hon. gentleman from Wellington spoke about the Gerymander Act as he called it, condemning it as being unfair to the Liberal party. The people of Canada did not think so. On different occasions when the electors were appealed to they supported the government that passed that Act. But when the hon. gentleman undertook to compare the policy of the late government with that which has been pursued by the present government, I expected that he would blush, and if he had the modesty of any ordinary man he would have blushed, when he undertook to defend the conduct of the present government. We know how partisans of the present government stuffed ballot boxes and sunk others in the waters of the lake in order to hide their crimes against the people. The hon. gentleman speaks about voters being disfranchised; the Gerrymander Act did not disfranchise any man, but partisans of the present government have disfranchised their opponents. We know that in the province from which I come the Prince Albert election was managed and controlled by partisans of this government who stuffed ballot boxes with one hundred and fifty ballots that never were polled within 150 miles of the district where the election was held. I wonder that the hon. gentleman did not blush for shame when, in view of these facts, he undertook to criticise the Gerrymander Act of the late administration.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER moved that the debate be suspended. The motion was agreed to.

PLACER MINING IN THE YUKON TERRITORY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (153) An Act respecting Placer Mining in the Yukon Territory. He said: In submitting for the consideration of the House this Bill respecting placer mining in the Yukon Territory, I may observe that in the past the Yukon Territory has been largely administered by orders in council. It is now proposed to pass an Act creating a law affecting the mining industry. I may say that the policy of the government with reference to the government of the Yukon has been more criticised than almost any other part of the policy of the administration. The reason for that is quite apparent. When in 1897, I think it was, gold was discovered there, the time required to reach the Yukon was probably 5 or 6 months. During the winter season it was absolutely inaccessible, and the original arrangements were, no doubt, very crude. From time to time they met with the opposition of the miners more particularly interested, and changes were suggested. Radical changes have been made since 1897. It is now proposed to consolidate those regulations and make very material changes at the instance of the Yukon council. The people in the Yukon were, no doubt, persons who had been somewhat familiar with the methods of mining in other countries, and therefore had very positive views as to the best mode of administering the various claims, so that considerable embarrassment has arisen from time to time. It was therefore decided, on the advice of the Minister of the Interior, to allow the Yukon council to submit for the consideration of parliament this Bill which has largely been drawn up on the suggestions of the persons forming the council at Dawson. The changes could much more properly be considered when the House is in committee, as they are more in the nature of details of administration, than of any general principle. I may perhaps briefly refer to some of the principal suggestions made by the Yukon council. Free miners' licenses are abolished. This was a tax with the absurd penalty of forfeiture of property if not paid. The loss of revenue will be nearly made up by increase in other fees. This relates to section 3. By section 5, mining rights are made paramount, and possible conflict between holders of surface and mineral rights is abolished. The person holding surface rights has the prior claim to any rights below the surface. The terms in use are simplified. 'Placer Claims' on creek or elsewhere is substituted for 'Creek Claims', 'Hill Claims', 'Bench Claims', 'Bar Claims', &c. A definition is given for the term 'Creek' which avoids the present serious difficulty of distinguishing between 'Creek', 'Gulch' 'Draw', 'Pup', &c. As to surveys, the side lines of creek claims are to be surveyed in future with base line. The prospector by section 20, is encouraged by being allowed to prospect ground for a long time before recording. By section 21 he is allowed to stake two claims for his grub stakers. Section 27 deals with the security of title. By section 30, jumping of claims and taking advantage of technicalities is done away with. Co-owners are compelled each to do his share of assessment work (section 31). By section 37 grouping can only take place in cases of genuine partnership in claims grouped. Under exceptional conditions claims not contiguous can be grouped. As regards water rights, fuller notice has to be given to the public, and the holders of such rights are compelled to use them. The sale of rights is subject to government supervision as to price and distribution. By sections 60, 62 and 64 a speedy method of arbitration is provided for the settlement of disputes. Litigation is discouraged and in many cases prevented. Concessions cannot be granted in future; all placer mines must be acquired by the one process, under section 91 of the Bill. These are the material points. I do not pretend to be familiar with the mining industry, and therefore must ask the House to allow the Bill to be considered as to its various details as they come up for discussion when the House goes into committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—While I am not prepared to controvert the principle which enters into the Bill, it is regretable that at this very late hour in the session so important a Bill, involving so much expert knowledge, should have been introduced into this Chamber. I am quite within the mark when I say that there are few subjects involving so much technical knowledge, or so much controversy in local circles as mining regulations or mining laws. The difficulty which I see before us in dealing with this Bill at the present moment is that at this hour of the session one cannot say that the mining community in the Yukon district has any knowledge whatever of the regulations which are embodied in the measure.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It emanates from the Yukon.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out that in the first place the Yukon council is an absolutely irresponsible body. It is not an elective council and it does not, I am safe in saying, represent public sentiment in the Yukon. It is within my memory that memorials have been presented during the present session asking that the present system of government in the Yukon be changed, and that the people be given a voice in the administration of their local affairs, that the nominative council, which as I understand, simply represents the commissioner of the Yukon, should be wiped out, and that the voice of the people should be heard in the administration of its own affairs.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Half of the commissioners are elected by popular vote in the Yukon.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, but the majority of the council is nominated, not elected. Furthermore, I understand from these memorials that that council is not representative, as at present constituted, of public opinion and of public sentiment in that country. I know exactly how the same machinery of government worked in the Northwest Territories in the early days. It simply reflected the voice of government officialism, and not that of the public. That of course is no reason why this legislation should not be passed, but it is a reason for saying that the widest publicity should be given to this legislation which, possibly, may entrench very seriously upon the rights of the mining public in the Yukon. I have been told by those who are interested in this subject that the Bill is characterized by very great crudities and evidently has been prepared by those who do not understand placer mining, particularly placer mining under the conditions to be found in the Yukon Territory. The gentleman who informed me of that fact is a most responsible individual and, I might say by the way, a very great supporter of the present government. I, however, do not accept that bare statement as warranting any condemnation of the Bill, but I do desire to point out that it is unfortunate at this time of the session that we are not in a position to ascertain whether the mining public of the Yukon has been made aware of this legislation or to obtain expert knowledge as to its practicability as well as its desirability. Whatever the government may do, I hope my hon. friend will have this Bill sent to one of the select committees and not have it sent to the Committee of the Whole House, so that it may be possible to have expert knowledge as to the practicability of its provisions brought before the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Personally, I should see no objection to the Bill being referred to a special committee where parties could be heard. I presume it is not likely that any one from the Yukon would be here just now who could give us an intelligent view of its provisions, but it may be that officers of the Interior Department could be called who would be aware of any representations which have been made pro and con. As I understand, this Bill has been for some time in preparation, and as it was suggested by the members of the Yukon Council by those on the spot, it was thought by the government that we would be able to secure a Bill which would be acceptable to the people there. Every hon. gentleman knows that it has been quite impossible for the government to meet the views of all parties, there was so many conflicting interests and so many different suggestions made from time to time. Orders in council were passed, only to be amended or changed within a few months, and it was felt that the people who were immediately on the spot would be better able to give advice as to the best law to be adopted to meet the peculiar conditions which exist there.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think the member for the Yukon in the other House could give very important information. My hon. friend from Regina (Hon. Mr. Ross) knows a great deal about mining matters, and if he were to scrutinize the Bill he might be able to point out some of the defects in it. I have very little faith in a Bill prepared by a council of officials. It should be prepared by free miners who know the conditions. I had a great deal to do with mining regulations in the early days, and the gold commissioners in British Columbia, when coming to the council, used to bring the opinions of the miners, and from year to year the regulations were amended so as to suit the condition of the country, and there has never been a hitch about water rights or mines in British Columbia. From year to year the regulations were amended as the result of the experience gained by the gold commissioners from the miners on the spot; and if the miners of the Yukon were to meet together before this Bill became law and scan its provisions and give their opinions upon them, we would have a good Act I believe.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A Bill of this kind, in the ordinary course of proceeding, goes to the Committee of the Whole House, where every hon. gentleman has the opportunity of considering and discussing it. Perhaps we had better follow that rule, and if it appears afterwards that the House desires that any parties should be heard in connection with the Bill, there is no objection to its going to one of the special committees, the Committee on Banking or any other which may be named. We might first go through it ourselves and discover exactly what objections exist. A good deal of it, no doubt, will be found to be not of a controversial nature. I move therefore that the Bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Edwards) moved the second reading of Bill (57) an Act respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that the Bill be referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—This Bill, I suppose, deals with the construction of the Ottawa canal. It seems to me that a Bill of such importance should be referred not to the standing committee, but to a special committee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This is peculiarly a Bill for the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, inasmuch as it deals particularly with the subject of the construction of a canal, and heretofore Bills relating to this project have gone to that committee. Still I do not know that it makes any difference.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Committee on Railways and Telegraphs and Harbours is the proper committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Bill is safe to be carefully considered.

The motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved that the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to Bill (54) an Act to incorporate the Pacific Marine Insurance Company, be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understand that the promoters of the Bill desire that it should be referred back to the committee, to make some explanation as to the changes which are made in it. The Bill came before us yesterday as a derelict, nobody being in charge of it, and I understood they had spoken to the hon. member from Yale, who has charge of the Bill, to ask that it be recommitted so as to allow an explanation to be made.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I did not know anything about the meeting of the committee yesterday or I would have been in attendance. The promoter of the Bill came to see me this morning, and I got the record of the amendments and discussed the matter with him, and the affect the amendments would have on the Bill. At the time he left me he said he was quite satisfied to let the amendments go through. That was about a quarter after eleven. I do not know whether he saw my hon. friend before or after that time.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—About that time —probably before.

The motion was agreed to.

PENITENTIARIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (176) An Act respecting Penitentaries. He said: Since the year 1886, when the laws of the Dominion were consolidated, there has been no revision of the Acts relating to penitentaries, although very considerable changes have been made from time to time. The object of this Bill is to consolidate all the laws and to make a few changes to which attention can be called at a later stage of the Bill. Provision is made, however, by this Bill for the establishment of a penitentiary at Edmonton for the two provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. The material change, I think, is in the arrangement of the salaries. Since the salaries were fixed it has been found that the cost of living is somewhat increased and so the salaries of all the officials connected with the penitentaries—there are six penitentaries—have been revised, and the results are contained in the schedule to this Bill. When the Bill is in committee I shall endeavour, with the assistance of one of the wardens, to give the House any explanation that may be desired where changes are made from the law as it at present stands.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Might I ask my hon. friend how this consolidation will fit into the general consolidation going on this year. Is this a measure which will find its place in the new consolidations.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes; it is with that view that it is being brought forward this session in order that it may be included in the new revised statutes. That is the main object of it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It would be very convenient in the consideration of this Bill, which is very voluminous, if we were supplied with information which would show wherein we are dealing with the old law and where the new provisions come in. The old law has run the gauntlet so long that most of its provisions that remain, we may be satisfied, will work well, but the changes to be made we would like to know something about.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have a detailed statement under my hand now showing the changes made in each clause of the Bill, where clauses have been altogether changed, and where others have been struck out. The language of several clauses have been simplified to a very great degree. I have that information which I will read to the House when we are in committee.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It would simplify matters very much if the hon. gentleman would supply copies to members. It would save a great deal of discussion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I feel reluctant to be censorious and to again refer to bringing down comprehensive legislation such as this so late in the session. I think this will be an opportune time for my hon. friend to impress on the government the desirability of our dealing with legislation of this kind, particularly in the Senate, earlier in the session. Recurring for a moment to what my hon. friend said as to the statutes, may I ask the leader of the government when we may expect the new revision to be issued?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not until after the session. All the laws passed this session will be embodied in that, and the revision will be continued for some little time after. It will probably be August or September.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Are the statutes published?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will they be ready for distribution during the recess?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT— Oh, yes.

Hon Mr. LOUGHEED—That is the revision?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, the revision is complete, but of course the legislation of the present session is not embodied. The object of this consolidation is, as some changes no doubt have been suggested in the long period since former amendments were made, to consolidate them by an Act of parliament so that it would be transferred bodily to the new statutes to be issued during the current year.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But invariably legislation is introduced by the government with reference to the revision itself.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That has been done in advance. It does not again come before parliament.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Legislation is had for the revision, but I doubt if the revision will become law until it is adopted by parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was very much of the opinion expressed by the hon. gentleman myself, but the late Minister of Justice thought differently. He thought it would be proper, as some delay would arise after the session involving the loss of a year or more, to pass an Act providing for the revision, and the issuing of the authorized volumes of the statutes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (194) an Act to amend the Indian Act.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time to-morrow. He said: As the law at present stands where lands are sold for the benefit of a tribe, the tribe get directly only ten per cent of the amount, the balance, the ninety per cent, is funded and very often where it is in the interest of the public and even in the interest of the band itself to sell lands, particularly where lands belonging to the tribe do not form part of the reserve, the tribe object. They say: 'We get so small an amount of it that it is not worth while.' It is proposed where lands of that kind are outside of the reserve, when it is in the interest of the band, from increased value given to the land or other causes, to make a sale, that the band should have distributed among them fifty per cent of the amount instead of ten per cent.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does it give any increased power to the government to take or sell those lands?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no, that stands as the law is, but the percentage up to the present time, by various statutes, has been limited as I have described, and the bands have been rather unwilling to allow the lands to go. It is thought that it would be an inducement to them to allow the lands to be sold if a larger sum is distributed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has the government considered the propriety of taking to itself larger power to dispose of many Indian reserves contiguous to settlement, rendering it undesirable that the Indian should be there in the first place, and in the second place that the lands should be withheld from settlement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT— I do not think any provision has been made.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That, I might say, is becoming a matter of considerable importance to growing centres in the new provinces. Very large tracts of land are tied up immediately adjoining important centres of civilization and settlement, and it is both prejudicial to the Indians and prejudicial to settlement that such be the case.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I appreciate that.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

CURRENCY ACT AMENDMENT BILL

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (196) 'An Act respecting the Currency.,

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that the Bill be read a second time to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask what the Finance Department propose to do in regard to redeeming defaced currency ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The clause of the Bill reads as follows :

1. The Minister of Finance and Receiver General may, under regulations of the Governor in Council, redeem any silver, copper or bronze coins which may have been issued for circulation in Canada and which by reason of abrasion through legitimate usage are no longer deemed fit for circulation.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITIA PENSION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (200) 'An Act to amend the Militia Pension Act, 1901.'

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time to-morrow. He said :

This Bill provides, in regard to pensioning officers, that the time served in regular forces may be counted in certain cases.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT BILL

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (201) : 'An Act to amend the Militia Act.'

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time to-morrow. He said :

In the taking over of the Esquimalt and Halifax Garrison, a number of non commissioned officers and men belonging to the imperial force have come over. It was thought it would be to some advantage, and this Bill provides that the term of service they have given in the imperial ranks shall be counted in their pension when they retire.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The imperial government I suppose is paying their proportion of the pension.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

ROADS AND ROAD ALLOWANCES IN ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (202) An Act respecting the roads and road allowances in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.'

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time to-morrow.

He said : The object is to vest in the Crown the present road allowances in the township of these provinces. The surveys of roads and trails are likewise vested in the provinces.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The order of the day being called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. David :—That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all petitions, resolutions or documents concerning the abolition or reorganization of the Senate.—(Mr. Poirier.)

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—On the 23rd April, 1890, I had the honour to move, in my seat in this House, that an humble address be presented to Her Most Gracious Majesty, praying for the amendment of the British North America Act so that senators shall henceforth as their seats become vacant be appointed by the provincial legislatures, the Crown to retain the right to the appointment of three or six additional senators, as it now has under the constitution. That motion, a similar one to the one under consideration to-day was taken up sixteen years ago by the Senate and discussed fully, just as the present resolution has been discussed for a week or more. Most of the senators took part in the debate. I need not say that my views were not concurred in. But I, as a young senator then, having entered this parliament without being at all prejudiced and with an open mind, at any rate, could see without being a prophet where the Senate was drifting and would land if the government continued to appoint senators exclusively from the Conservative side of politics. I took the stand then that there was something wrong in the appointment of senators; that if we were here as representatives of the provinces, the provinces should exclusivly have the nominating of senators. I particularly studied at that time the constitutions of the civilized countries of the world, and found that nearly all had two Houses. I found, as any hon. gentleman may find and as you likely all know, that in all other countries of the world but our own the chambers are elected by those whom they are called to represent, and that any other mode of election is illogical. You cannot, either in Europe or America—other countries, as we know, have no free institutions—find a place where the lower House is not elected by the people, and the upper House by those whom they represent. I am talking here of the people that enjoy free institutions. Countries which have not free institutions but have two chambers, are supposed to derive their power from the autocrat by whom the country is governed. We will not refer to them. But all civilized countries enjoying the privileges of free institutions have the right to elect or appoint their own legislators; any other system of election or appointment, I say, would be illogical. Even in monarchical countries like Germany, you find that the council of the empire is constituted of representatives from the twenty-five kingdoms, states or principalities which compose the empire, and that they sit by virtue of the mandate they get. These kingdoms and principalities even keep to themselves the right of recalling their representatives in case they do not properly represent those whom they are sent to represent. Such also, at least to a certain extent, is the case in Italy, where there is a mixed representation in the upper house. So it is in Spain. But if we go to countries that bear a closer analogy to our confederation, say in Switzerland, there you find twenty-two cantons, and two representatives from each canton, whether large or small; and in order to ensure a true and faithful representation, those representatives are paid by the cantons they represent, and the mode of their election is determined absolutely by each canton. The same condition exists in South Africa, in the Argentine republic, where the different provinces nominate the upper House. You have another example, the United States, which also is represented in the upper House by the nominees of the different states of the union, but I will refer to that later on. I know that our Chamber is designed to represent to as large an extent as possible the House of Lords. But we must not forget the exegesis of the House of Lords and ours is quite different. The Lords owe their origin, not to popular favour, or even to the Kings, but to their own status in the land. They were the peers, the equal of the King in many respects. The Kings of the Saxons, were merely the first amongst their equals, and, although the King held the sway, the peers and barons were, of their own right, the councillors of the King. You find no instance, no epoch, in the British history where the House of Lords has been created with a set purpose. We have been. We could not, of course, rely upon our ancestry. We were created for a set purpose, and that was to represent the provinces. Hon. gentlemen know the history of the upper House in Canada.

In 1763 a council was nominated to govern Canada, with General Murray at its head, which was all right at that time, because we had no representative institutions. In 1774, under the Quebec Act, the council was also a nominated one, which was logical because the authority then was derived from the Crown, was in the Crown. At the separation of the two Canadas, in 1791, the Upper Chamber was also a nominative one, which was again logical because we had not then representative institutions; but after the union of the two Canadas there came a time when the Upper Chamber, a nominated Chamber, sitting along with an elected Chamber came into pretty much the same extremity in which we are here today. It was found necessary to change the order of things, and this change took place 1856. In 1856 the Upper House from being a nominated one was made an elective one, and let me read a few remarks made by Sir John Macdonald which will show that the state of things which exists now practically existed then:

'It is admitted on all hands,' said Sir John Macdonald in the course of the debate 'that the present upper Chamber is not an efficient check. Without wishing to speak disrespectfully of the upper House I may say that we all know, except in some few isolated cases, they have contented themselves with being mere registrars of our Bills, which they read over and perhaps correct some errors in spelling or grammar and then send them down to us. They have exerted no real influence in the state. They are of no use, and all that can be said of them is, to employ the language of the member for Lambton (Mr. Brown) they have done no harm.

That was the dire state to which the upper Crown nominated chamber had fallen in 1856. I think we have to admit that it is pretty much the state in which we are today. It was then found necessary to have an elected Senate to legislate for a people enjoying civil and political rights. In my estimation there is no other way for us to attain to that status, that importance, that utility which is expected of us, but to have the mode of our nomination changed so that we shall be appointed by the provinces which we are here to represent. We all know that at confederation the reason for the Senate being called into existence was to more especially represent the different provinces, 24 members being appointed from the Maritime provinces, 24 from Quebec and 24 from Ontario. Now do we really and truly represent our provinces? I say no. We hail from our respective provinces, but we and each of us represent here the parties that appointed us, and the parties that appointed us are the several political parties. We hail, true, from the provinces, but the provinces have nothing to do with our appointment. We are not amenable to them, what is more, having been appointed by the Crown we fail to get that authority which we otherwise would have and hold. I would go further and say it is an anachronism, an anomaly. It is illogical for us here to have legislative and judicial powers given to us by a power which does not itself possess them. We are appointed by the Crown. Article 24 of our constitution reads as follows:

> The Governor General shall from time to time, in the Queen's name, by instrument under the great seal of Canada, summon qualified persons to the Senate; and, subject to the provisions of this Act, every person so summoned shall become and be a member of the Senate and a senator.

We derive our authority from the Governor General who holds it from the Crown. Now the Crown has no power to legislate such as we have. The King of England has not the power to legislate which the House of Commons or the House of Lords possesses. How can the governor or the Crown logically delegate a power which it does not possess. That is the state we are in; an illogical state. Under present conditions we cannot expect ever to occupy the position in this country which upper chambers occupy in other civilized countries. It has been argued as against my proposition, which in fact was to put our Canadian Senate under a status similar to that of the United States, that the American Senate has acquired too much power; that it is overwhelmingly powerful. It is true that the American Senate has become exceedingly powerful, but that is because by the American Constitution it possesses more power than the House of Representatives. The American Senate has practically all the powers of the lower House, even that of legislating on Bills relating to revenue. They cannot originate such Bills, but they can take a Bill relating to revenue and do with it very much as we do with some motions here, strike out all the words after 'that' and change it altogether, so that practically the Senate in the United States can be said to initiate revenue Bills. It has the exclusive powers of making treaties, conjointly with the president. It has the appointment of all the public servants except those whose appointment is expressely reserved to the president and the other House; practically it has the patronage in its hands. It has the foreign relations in its hands; it has the appointment of judges of the Supreme Court; it has the right of impeachment; and it is on this meat that this American Caesar has grown so great. My suggestion is that the members of the Senate in Canada should be appointed by the provincial legislatures, but that they should not be given such extraordinary powers. It has been said by very many that if the United States Senate possessed only the right to legislate that it would be an ideal second Chamber; such would be our House here if we were appointed by the different provinces. Hon. gentlemen would then come here with a mission. I find no fault of course with the composition, with the personnel of our Senate, but the provinces would then see to it that their very best men would be appointed. As we would have no patronage to give, the excesses that the plutocracy has fallen into in the United States would not obtain here. We would come simply as representatives of our provinces. Our provinces would look to us to guard their interests, and, in our seats here, we would not be in the humiliating position in which we are. If I may be allowed to speak plainly, I say that I for one, and possibly each of you remember, and must remember, when it comes to a crisis, by whom I was or you were appointed. You know what I mean hon. gentlemen. On very many questions senators have been appealed to—I have: 'You will vote that way because Sir John Macdonald appointed you? Have I not know of late years of Liberals voting here in a certain way, because Sir Wilfrid Laurier wanted them to vote in that way! It is logical, it is simply gratitude; they hold their appointment from Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as I hold mine from Sir John Macdonald. A delegate represents the one who delegates him. The reform of the Senate must come. Hon. gentlemen, it is now more than ever a necessity. We are going down. A bad example was set by the Conservative party in appointing exclusively, except on one or two occasions, Conservatives. It is felt now that before ten years have passed, if the Liberals remain in power—which of course is doubtful—the Senate will be practically all Liberals; and then the cry that was raised against the Conservative Senate will be raised against the Liberal Senate, and the utility of the Senate will be gone. Hon. gentlemen, if you wish to save our Senate; if you want to put yourselves on a solid, on a useful basis, let us be brought into touch, into contact with the power which we represent here, otherwise we are of no use as representatives. We can amend Bills it is true—that sort of work regarding which we have heard so many compliments delivered from one to another during this debate. Hon. gentlemen know that in France they have a conseil d'etat, who are practically civil servants, to do such work. What are we? What difference is there between our appointment from the Crown, by the Governor General, and the appointment of the Clerk or the Sergeant-at-Arms? We are—let us admit it—functionaries, civil servants—occupying a higher position, but nothing else. In a democratic country, we do not directly represent the people; in a confederation, we do not represent the provinces. We are a species of functionaries, with more authority than some others, that is all. The checking power we have—I would like to know what check the country may to-day expect the Senate to exercise upon any legislation coming from the other House? Very little indeed. We are here to represent the governments who appointed us; and we are called upon more or less with a whip to do it. Let us admit the whole truth. It may be hard, it may be humiliating; but the fact is that we can, in many instances, be forced, that we can be persuaded to vote a certain way. It is logical. If I appoint an agent, if I give a commission to a man I have a right to have that man look to me for instructions.

If I wish him to do a certain thing I have a right to see that he shall look to me before taking certain steps. We are the appointees of the government and not of the province and the government has a right to see that we vote a certain way, and they do see to it, too. I, therefore, restate the position I took in 1890 that is, that the reform of the Senate should be brought about in a logical way, and that logical way is to derive our authority from the provinces. Now is the time. We live peaceably together. We started with three sections in the confederation; we now have four. Let us equalize matters and make this a harmonious confederation. The maritime provinces started with twenty-four representatives. If Newfoundland should ever enter the confederation I predict that it will insist upon naming its own representatives in the Upper House as a safeguard of its rights, just as each state in the neighbouring republic, whether small or great, has two representatives in the Senate, so that state rights may be protected.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—Does the hon. gentleman want to have the senators appointed for life or elected for a term of years by the provincial legislature?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—That is another question. I would prefer the life tenure, but if you read the constitutions of different countries you will find that the members of the Upper Chambers very seldom have life tenures. In France they started with life tenure; now they have abolished it. In Germany the different states vote, not individually, but en bloc, each state, principality, or kingdom voting as one, just as was the case in the United States before 1789. The different members of the union voted not a personal but a state vote. The life tenure would be more in keeping with the traditions of the House of Lords which we are here to imitate, and which we do follow to a large extent. There would be a sufficient guarantee that the interests of the province would be maintained if we only held our positions from them. But I was referring to the growth of the confederation. The west is now being settled, and will before long have a dense population. Let the west have its twenty-four senators. Then each section of the Dominion will have equal representation in this House. Before 100 years the Northwest will have a population of probably 50,000,000. With my system, the eastern parts of the Dominion will be able to hold their own in the Senate and in the country. Quebec will be as strong as Ontario, and the maritime provinces will be able to maintain an equilibrium which the western provinces will not be in a position to destroy. While in the House of Commons the different provinces will be represented by population, there will be a check upon undue influence on the part of the most populous sections because of a different basis of representation in the Senate. We must not be so optimistic as to imagine that troubles will not come in this country. Troubles have arisen in other countries and may arise in Canada. Then it will be the Upper Chamber that will prevent the possible disruption of the confederation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke very appropriately, as he always does, of proportional representation. Peopled as this country is by different nationalities we could enlarge upon that principle. We could, for example, for the sake of harmony, and in order to build up here an ideal Dominion for intelligence, progress, harmony and liberty, enlarge upon his idea, and have in the Upper House proportional representation for the different nationalities. That would be conducive to peace and harmony. It would be easy, before appointing a senator, by referring to the census, to find out the representation to which each nationality is entitled, and the following table would show how such representation would work out:

——	Total.	French.	English.	Irish.	Scotch.
Quebec	1,620,482	13,222,115	114,710	114,842	60,068
		Senators.	Senators.	Senators.	Senators.
	24	19	2	2	1
Ontario	1,928,099	158,671	701,413	624,332	399,530
	24	2	9	8	5
New Brunswick	317,068	79,979	104,683	83,384	48,310
	10	2	4	2	2
Nova Scotia	442,898	45,161	159,753	54,710	143,382

Prince Edward Island	105,629	13,866	24,043	21,992	41,753
		1 (?)	1	1 (?)	2

In the case of the Irish population, I take the Catholic and Orange together.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What are you going to do with the Irish Protestants who are not Oragemen?

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud)—And the Jews?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—That would be a matter for further subdivision. The census will tell all about that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What are you going to do with the Germans ?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—A race must come up to a certain standard of population before being entitled to representation in the Senate. They must have sufficient population to entitle them to one representative. It simply goes to show that if the constitution is to be remodelled, these are facts which are worth being taken into consideration, and if we are going to have proportionate representation certainly the adoption of such a scheme as I propound here would be conducive to general harmony. The re-modelling of the Senate is an old idea that was discussed at the time the Tories were in power and in resuming the discussion to-day we are simply dealing with what was very elaborately discussed sixteen years ago.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS moved the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to

HUDSON BAY EXPEDITION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the House adjourns I would ask the hon. leader of the House if there is any choice made of the master of that new vessel of 300 tons that is going into the Hudson bay waters ? I am told that they are trying to get a master from Newfoundland. We have in our own country masters who are able to man those ships, and I think the government should appoint a Canadian before going to Newfoundland. I therefore want to know if any action has been taken and what the action was ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know. It rests with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. It has not come under the notice of council yet.

The Senate adjourned until three p.m. to-morrow.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Thursday, June 21, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

RIMOUSKI FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (88) An Act respecting La Compagnie d'Assurance Mutuelle contre le feu des Comtés de Rimouski, Temiscouata et Kamouraska, and to change its name to La Compagnie d'Assurance contre l'incendie de Rimouski, with amendments.

He said : The amendments inserted in the Bill were proposed to secure the interests of the original stockholders in the event of the project of the formation of a further company being carried out.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER moved that the amendments be now concurred in.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We do not know what the amendments are. They have just been submitted, and I think they should stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—The amendments are very simple, and provide that the Bill will only come into force with the consent of all the shareholders, which may be given at a general meeting convened for that purpose.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND—The amendments were proposed by the promoters of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I am not against the Bill at all, but I want to see that all interests are protected. I understand that the hon. senator from Rimouski (Hon. Mr. Fiset) was opposing the Bill, and as he is not here I wish to have an opportunity of seeing what kind of amendments are brought in.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND—I think the answer I gave just now ought to be sufficient. The amendment was proposed by the promoter of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not care at all about that. A man may be the promoter of a Bill which may affect the interests of third parties.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND—It met with the approval of the gentlemen who where opposing the measure.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I see the hon. senator from Rimouski has now taken his seat, and I ask him whether he is willing to accept these amendments, as he is the most interested party ?

Hon. Mr. FISET—The committee accepted the amendment this morning. I accept it also.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER moved that rule 70 be suspended and that the Bill be now read a third time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I oppose that. I want to see the Bill before it is read a third time.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—Then I move that it be read a third time to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (D) An Act respecting the Northwest Commercial Travellers Association of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

GRAY RELIEF BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto), from the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, reported Bill (122) An Act respecting certain patents of Franklin Montgomery Gray, and moved that the said Bill be read a second time to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When this Bill was at its second reading I directed the attention of the House to the fact that it did not follow the usual form. The usual form protects the interests of all persons who have made or sold the article up to the time of the passing of the Act. This Bill does not do so, but only protects those who used, sold or manufactured up to the 22nd of March last. I call the attention of the hon. member from Toronto to the fact that that is not the proper form.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND.

Hon. Mr. JONES—The Bill is objectionable, as I pointed out to the House the other day. I am not a member of the committee, but I had the advantage of being present at the meeting of the committee when this Bill was under consideration, and I pointed that out to the committee ; but because the House had put through a Bill this session with this objectionable feature in it, the committee thought, apparently, they would not be doing worse with this Bill than with the other and that because the House had done wrong on one occasion they would be justified in doing wrong a second time. Personally I am not in favour of the Bill as it stands, and if there is an opportunity offered I shall vote against that feature of the Bill. I can see no reason why the Bill should provide that any citizen who had begun manufacturing after the 22nd of March and before this Bill becomes law should not be protected in his right. The advertisement did not appear until some fifteen or eighteen months after the patent had been practically void, because the article had not been manufactured in Canada. The advertisement, as I understand it, appeared in the 'Gazette' about the middle of March, and the Bill provides that if any citizen of Canada had begun to sell or use or manufacture the article between the date of the first appearance of the advertisement and the time that this Bill becomes law, he should not be protected.

As I understand it, this House assumed that if any person in Canada began the manufacturing of the article after the applicant for this legislation had inserted an advertisement in the 'Gazette,' indicating to the country that it was his intention to ask the Parliament of Canada to enact this law to vest in him the rights which he had in the earlier years, that they ought not to be considered. My view is that that is not a principle that this House ought to accept. No citizen has a right to conclude that because an advertisement is published in a paper, indicating that an application will be made, that that request will be granted, and I claim that between the time of the advertisement, the first publication, and the time that this Bill becomes law, it was public property just as fully as it was public property previous to the time of publication, and that the Bill in that regard should not provide that the citizen who began the manufacturing previous to March should be protected, and the citizen who began after March should not be protected. It is a principle that I do not think the House ought to endorse. I know that in one or two cases it has been done. My own view is that it is a mistake. If it is a mistake it ought not to be continued. I do not wish to detain the House by expressing my views with regard to this matter. I hold very strong views in regard to it, and I have every reason to believe personally that in this particular instance no harm would have been done to the applicant, the foreigner who applies for this, or the foreign patent which is being reinstated, if the Bill had read as I think it should read, that the public should be protected up to the time that this becomes law. For that reason I thought it might have been so amended. However, the committee did not see with me in that matter and the Bill comes before the House in what I consider to be the same objectionable condition in which one or two Bills previously passed this House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is nothing before the House.

The SPEAKER—The only motion before the House is that the Bill be read a third time to-morrow. Is there any other motion in amendment ?

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If we discuss it to-day there might be some understanding arrived at that the clauses of the Bill might be altered.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—My hon. friend is not in order. Surely he will wait until to-morrow and discuss the matter then.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the hon. gentleman is going to suggest any change he must give notice of it to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

BRITISH AMERICA INSURANCE COMPANY BILL AND WESTERN ASSURANCE COMPANY BILL.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Standing Orders, presented the 24th report of the committee on Bill (198) An Act respecting the British America Insurance Company, and Bill (199) An Act respecting the Western Assurance Company.

The report was concurred in.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Following the course pursued the other day with reference to these Bills a suspension of the rule is required until we have further light on the matter, I move that rule 49 be suspended in this relation.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bills were placed on the orders of the day for second reading to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The motion for suspension of the rule applies to both companies ?

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—Yes. One Bill is short one week in its notice and the other I think two weeks. It is owing to an emergency which has recently arisen in the affairs of the company that they have to seek legislation at this late date, and they ask the indulgence of the House on this ground.

COMMANDER SPAIN'S CERTIFICATE.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

What is the name of the ship, or the names of the ships, if there are more than one, on board of which Commander Spain discharged the duties of a master of a sea-going ship in the merchant marine, before obtaining his certificate of service on the 2nd February, 1893 ?

What was the length of service thus performed by Commander Spain in the merchant marine, specifying the dates of command which he exercised on each of the ships in question ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no answer to this question or to the one which follows.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Is commander Spain absent ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I really do not know.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I think it would be very easy to get an answer to that question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not with all I have to do, I have to rely on the department to send me answers.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I presume the department is not very reliable.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps not.

ST. THOMAS BANK GAS BUOY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Was the substitution of acetylene light for the Pintsch gas light in the luminous buoy on the St. Thomas bank—a substitution which according to the statement of the government took place on the 24th of October, 1905—announced in the 'Canada Gazette,' and on what date ?

Was it otherwise announced and in what way was it communicated to those interested ?

And when ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no answer to this question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It would take five minutes for the department to say whether that was announced in the 'Canada Gazette' or not.

FRENCH TRANSLATION OF MILITIA HAND-BOOK.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the government :

Has the little volume entitled 'Memorandum for camps of instruction, 1906, issued with military order No. 112,' been translated into French, published in that language and distributed to the regiments which are commencing their annual training at the camps at Lévis and at Three Rivers on Tuesday, 26th June instant

If such distribution has not yet been made, will it be made for the date in question ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The memo. has been translated into French and was sent to the Bureau. I am not aware whether or not it is printed yet. I telephoned myself to the Bureau and spoke to Dr. Dawson about it. He knew my anxiety to have it printed at the earliest possible time, and he assured me it would be ready possibly by Saturday or Monday.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It might be sent direct to the different camps and distribution take place there.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot act for all the departments.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The two previous inquiries will stand I suppose ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At present I can give no assurance on the subject. It is quite impossible. The hon. gentleman is the most unreasonable man in this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. Minister could only keep cool—I know we are approaching the dog days but I think he should keep cool. I was simply asking if the two previous questions might be permitted to stand ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They will stand of course. I am not going to answer them today.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—We are not sure that we will ever get an answer to those two questions.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps not.

QUESTIONS IN DISPUTE BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the orders of the day are entered upon, may I ask my hon. friend for information with reference to the following cable which appeared in today's Montreal 'Gazette:'

United States and Canada.

Agreement reached with Great Britain, says report.

(Special cable service.)

Birmingham, June 20.—The London correspondent of the 'Post' states that a telegram has been received in an official quarter from Washington to the effect that an agreement has been reached by Sir Henry Durand, the British ambassador, and Secretary Root, on the questions at issue between the United States and Great Britain, with regard to Canada. The agreement refers several points to a small official commission on which Canada is represented. A decision is expected before the end of July. Canada is said to be highly pleased, particularly with regard to the settlement of the fisheries dispute.

May I ask my hon. friend if he has any information to give to the House on the subject?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no knowledge whatever of it. I have no doubt that Mr. Root, who is an exceedingly polished statesman, a most courteous man, full of suavity, as we know from his recent utterances, and Sir Mortimer Durand, the British minister, who is equally suave, polished and courteous, have assumed at Washington to settle Canada's affairs, but Canada proposes to settle her own affairs so far as that is concerned.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend has any knowledge—

Hon. Mr SCOTT—I have no knowledge whatever.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That the representatives of Great Britain and the United States are assuming to act, there should certainly be a protest against any such assumption.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I give both gentlemen more credit for diplomacy and skill than to assume that they would make arrangements as to what Canada will do with regard to interests that specially affect the Dominion and no other part of the empire. Canada is quite able to take care of herself. When those questions come to be discussed, Canada will have an opportunity of naming a representative on the commission to look after her interests.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What led my hon. friend to assume that those parties might possibly interfere?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not assume anything of the kind, but my hon. friend may have read that very fine address that Mr. Root made on the occasion when Lord Grey attended the Pilgrims banquet in New York. He, no doubt, is most anxious to see those questions settled. I have no doubt that if Mr. Root's advice had been taken they would have been settled, but Mr. Root cannot speak for the United States, and the British minister cannot speak for Canada, unless Canada has been first consulted and given her views on the subject. So far we know nothing about it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have any communications been received by the government suggestive of the good offices of those gentlemen being enlisted in that direction?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I have heard nothing about it. I think not. It is all born in the fertile brain of a reporter. It is stuffing to fill up, most interesting material no doubt to cable across. A good many people get interested in it, or get excited over it, but no progress will be made until Canada has been consulted. We are ready of course, most anxious that all the questions that have been cropping up for a good many years between Canada and the United States shall be settled. It is a great pity they are not. Canada is most anxious to do so, but we think it would be very unwise to select any one case and drop all the others.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the orders of the day are called, I would ask with all the politeness possible, if we could have in a few days, before the House prorogues, the return to an order given by this House for the production of the papers in the insurance inquiry. I made that motion some weeks ago and I hope the House will have those papers very soon.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What particular insurance was it ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The Insurance Commission.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The expenses of the Insurance Commission.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That commission is still sitting.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Well, we might have the return up to the day I made the motion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know that there are any expenses to bring down. I do not know that the commissioners have drawn any money. There was an appropriation made of $15,000 I think for the commission in the earlier part of the session, and in the supplementary estimates there is a further item. I am not very sure about that, and I speak subject to correction. It was quite evident the Insurance Commission would sit longer than we had originally contemplated, and I think there was an additional vote taken or proposed to the House of Commons for, I am not sure as to the amount, but at all events an increase on the $15,000.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In this connection, may I ask my hon. friend if the government is aware that the senior counsel, in fact the counsel in charge of the investigation, has left for England and does not propose returning until September and what steps the government have taken to fill the office or to proceed with the investigation, or will it stand pending his absence ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite unable to answer. I saw the paragraph in the papers to which the hon. gentleman alludes. I was rather surprised at it, but the subject has not been considered, nor has reference been made to it. Perhaps the Minister of Justice, who is the official specially charged with a matter of that kind, may have considered it and made some proposal, but it has not come before council.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The question asked by the hon. senator from Stadacona is not of the character that one would have been led to suppose it was from the remarks made by the hon. Secretary of State ; it was simply asking what retaining fee was paid or is to be paid to the lawyers who have been employed to conduct the case and the per diem allowance and information of that kind in reference to other officials.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will trace it up.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I refer to page 512 of the minutes of our proceedings. Hon. gentlemen will find the address was voted there, asking for the names of the commissioners and the officials and other details. I should not have risen to ask that question were it not for the fact that I am leaving for the annual militia drill, and during all the time I will be there the hon. Secretary of State may enjoy peace, but I should not like him to forget me. Therefore, before I depart, I make my last will in his favour.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman's suggestion that he proposes leaving will be an incentive for me to get him the information, in order that he may leave the city.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (35) An Act to incorporate the Western Trust Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (54) An Act to incorporate the Pacific Marine Insurance Company, as amended.—(Hon. Mr. Kerr, Toronto.)

SALE AND MARKING OF MANUFACTURES OF GOLD AND SILVER BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved concurrence in the amendment made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to Bill (U) An Act respecting the sale and marking of manufactures of Gold and Silver.

He said : The changes made in this Bill as redrafted are not very important. They are as follows:—

Page 1, line 33.—After 'to dispose of' insert 'for valuable consideration.'

Page 2, line 3.—After 'date' insert '; nor to any article which by regulation made by the Governor in Council under the authority of this Act, may be exempted from the application thereof.'

Page 2, line 4.—Leave out 'in Canada.'

Page 3, line 8.—After 'article of gold' insert 'less than ten carats in fineness.'

Page 3, line 43.—Leave out 'paragraph (b)' and substitute therefor the following :

'(b) A mark plainly and truly indicating that the article or part thereof is made of rolled gold plate, gold filled, gold plate, silver plate, silver filled, or gold or silver electroplate, or of any similar material as the case may be, which mark must be accompanied by a trade mark registered in accordance with the Trade Mark and Design Act, chapter 63 of the Revised Stautes of Canada, may be applied ;' and

Page 4, line 40.—After 'sections' insert '3.'

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—It is a very unfortunate thing that this Bill should be put through the Chamber with so much haste. I do not want to appear to be saying anything which is not becoming or which might look like a reflection on any member of this House, but I doubt if there are more than three or four members who know the full scope of this Bill. It was only brought down a couple of days ago and pased the committee the following day. It was only seen by members the morning the committee met. and it was put through, it is true after some consideration, but I must say that it is a Bill of so much importance that it ought not to be pushed on until there is more time for the Senate to consider it. One of the great reflections which is cast upon this House is that its legislation is hasty, that it acts without deliberation, that it does not give sufficient consideration to the Bills, and one of the great complaints that was made in this House is that we do not get the important Bills for consideration until it is too late to give them careful study. We have only had such a short time to consider many an important Bill from the Commons that we have not been able to give them that careful criticism which is due them. That is the complaint on the one hand, and the defence, so to speak, of the Senate on the other. This is, however, a Bill emanating from the Senate. There is no possible excuse for its receiving hasty consideration. There is no reason in the world why it should be hurried on for criticism in the other House, and no reason why the Senate should place itself in the position of being criticised in regard to a Bill, the scope of which they do not thoroughly understand. In order to illustrate what I mean, I would like to put a question to the House. I have asked one or two members of the Senate about it and have not got an answer from them. I should like to ask if any member of this Senate, being in London, purchased for himself a gold watch from Benson's or Streeter's, or any other house of repute, and, having brought it to this country, whether he would be guilty of an indictable offence, because reputable makers like these people not only have their goods stamped, assuming it to be an article of value, with a goldsmith's mark, but they put their name on it and they generally describe it, if it is valuable, with the number of jewels that are in it. The section of the Act which deals with this feature provides that:

It shall not be lawful to make or sell in Canada, or to import or attempt to import into Canada, any article composed either in whole or in part of gold or of silver, or of any alloy of gold or of silver, except the articles mentioned in section 11 of this Act, if to such article there is applied any mark other than—

(a) trade marks registered in accordance with the Trade Mark and Design Act, chapter 63 of the revised statutes of Canada; and

(b) such letter as is, by schedule 'A' to this Act, required to indicate the period of time during which such article was manufactured; and

(c) marks truly and correctly indicating, as required by this Act, the quality of the gold or silver, or alloy of gold or of silver, used in the construction of such article.

What would be the position of a person or a dealer who bought articles manufactured by these people whom I have named into this country? Does this clause not prohibit that? Does it not provide that a person who would do that would be guilty of an indictable offence? Streeter has not registered his name here, and probably none of these people ever will register their names here. It might not be one of them, but it might be another dealer. So that we have then the condition which I have stated. I should like to know if there is an explanation of that state of things, that articles such as I have named and bought from reputable dealers, marked, as they always are, with their own name, and sometimes with other marks on them, too, could or could not be brought in without violating this law? I have looked at the Bill to see how it was, and if I am wrong about that perhaps the hon. Secretary of State will kindly point out to me where I am wrong.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the hon. gentleman had known as much of the history of this measure as has come to my notice, he would not feel warranted in making the criticism he has made with regard to this Bill. It was printed three or four months ago, perhaps longer than that, by the people who are interested in the trade in manufactures of gold and silver. The watchmakers and dealers, the people who make use of gold and silver, both wholesale and retail have taken an interest in the measure. Any gentleman who has given attention to the correspondence presented before the committee would readily understand that every watchmaker and dealer from Halifax to Victoria knows all about this Bill. Certainly no measure that has come before parliament has been more discussed by an intelligent, appreciative body than this. They quite understood what they were discussing.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The very argument which was presented elsewhere for this Bill being pushed forward now, to my mind presented the very reason why we should stay our hand. The argument was that it was presented by those who were promoting the Bill, those interested in the trade and in the passing of the Bill, those who have an interest in the trade being protected in manufacturing, thus preventing competition of a certain kind in a certain line. If this was a Bill emanating from the government who had considered the matter themselves, then we would say that responsibility is with the government, and we could probably relieve ourselves to a certain extent of its consideration; but when we are told that it comes from the promoters of the Bill, and stands therefore on the same footing as a private Bill although it affects a very large public question, it is our duty to say we must investigate this with more care than an ordinary application and an ordinary Bill. It is said that the promoters of the Bill have spent a great deal of time in preparing it. That is what was stated elsewhere.

They have, according to their own statement, been a year getting this together. They have done what no one here has done, I venture to say; they have consulted all the laws of all the countries using trade marks and have considered which of them would be the most drastic, which would suit them best, and the House adopted not the England trade mark law, for in England it is entirely optional whether a trade mark is used or not, but the American laws which have been framed with regard to the interests of particular states. It is admitted that these laws vary in their character and scope as much as one state differs from another. Many of the state laws on the other hand, are very much on the same lines. This law does not agree so far as I can see with any of them although founded and based on them. I have not examined the law, but I am told that it does not agree with either the German or French law, certainly not with the English law and therefore it is a patch work, a compilation of foreign laws, chiefly taken from the United States, handing over as far as possible the trade in these businesses to particular persons and shutting out from the trade largely those who desire to do business on free lines, and who, although it is said they are selling cheap jewellery, sometimes called bogus jewellery, are probably conducting their business as honestly and as fairly as others who make more pretension. Under these circumstances we should look carefully at what we are doing, and so far as the Senate is concerned, should deal cautiously with the matter lest in future we may be under the necessity of amending the law, finding that we have been acting hastily, and in many instances foolisly. It is said that there is no necessity for opposing the Bill now because it is not to go into force for a year. If so, what is the reason for haste? Why could not the matter be held over until the next session of parliament, five or six months hence, and then the legislation would come into force within a shorter period? What notification has been given to the public about this legislation? How far have those who are interested in the sale of this class of goods been made aware of it? We know that those who are directly interested in the legislation have been notified and consulted, and that they have had committees working for a year past, as was stated by them the other day, obtaining all the information which they required and having it put in order. I am not saying that I oppose the adoption of the Bill; but it is a new proposition; it differs from the law they have in England; and, under these circumstances, I think it would be reasonable to ask that the Bill should be held over for further consideration later on, so that the public might know what it is. Then they could make their voice heard, and we would understand what objections there are, if any, and what different interests are likely to be affected. We could then determine what should be done in the way of an enactment much better than we can at the present time. I would ask hon. gentlemen how far they feel satisfied that they know all they should know before declaring by Act of parliament that men shall be guilty under certain circumstances of indictable offences and punishable by heavy fines and penalties.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is scarcely paying the House a compliment when he says they cannot understand this Bill. I should like to know in whose interest the Bill has been prepared if not in the interests of the public? The public are the parties protected by it. Its whole purport is that goods shall be sold honestly. There is nothing to force a man to mark his goods; he can sell them without a mark if he chooses, but if he puts a mark upon them it must be an honest mark. Some of the manufacturers say that they are being seriously injured because they are selling articles of gold and silver indicating exactly the purity of the article, while some few of their competitors in the trade, who are not so scrupulous, mark up their goods. These latter are selling washed goods, with a very thin film of gold on them which would not wear even six or eight years, but which are guaranteed for twenty years. That was stated in the committee, in the presence of all parties. It was not denied or questioned at all. I venture to say that no Bill has ever come before this Chamber which was more thoroughly discussed or more thoroughly understood by the people interested. I think every jeweller, every dealer and every manufacturer from the Atlantic to the Pacific knew of this Bill, had considered it, and was represented before that committee as to any objections he might desire to make. As to the first part of the Bill there was absolute harmony, that is, in reference to gold and silver pure. There was a difference of opinion in reference to the standard of purity, whether it should be a standard of nine carats, the English standard adopted in 1854 before gold became as common as it is to-day, or the standard which this committee adopted, which was only one higher, a standard of ten carats. The ordinary standard is eighteen, so that we were allowing goods to be sold which were marked eight below the ordinary standard. That is the goldsmiths' mark as a rule, because in England they never sell nine carat standard. Evidence was given before the committee pro and con showing that articles sold in England were never marked as low as nine carats. 'We mark them down to nine carats for the colonials,' was the statement made. So that if Canada wishes to come under the class of colonials, then let us mark down our standard and let us have spurious jewellery. It can be had in abundance now; there is no difficulty about getting it. You can get it even under this Bill, because this Bill only provides that if goods are marked at all they must be marked correctly.

If you choose to sell inferior jewellery, sell it, but do not put a mark on it to deceive the people, and do not give a guarantee that jewellery which will not last five years will last 20 years. One gentleman who is very strong on this guarantee, and an expert on the subject, said he thought it ought to be a civil contract; but it was represented by another gentleman that there are other ways of robbing a man than stealing his purse. If you induce a man to pay $50 for an article represented as being value for that amount, but which is worth only $20, it comes pretty near stealing and it is right that a law should be enacted to protect the public. I cannot understand the hon. gentleman's argument at all, because in reference to the first part of the Bill the only objection was to one degree—whether the standard should be raised to ten or allowed to remain at nine. I thought Canada should adopt as high a standard as Congress and some 20 states of the neighbouring union have adopted. Canada is wealthy enough to deal in genuine articles and not have spurious articles pawned off on the public. The clause of the Bill as to which there was some difference of opinion was with reference to electroplating, because it was argued by some experts that the thin film of gold which is put on the baser metal would wear off within a very short time. It was represented that in the trade they simply wash it with good gold. That is the only point as to which there was any substantial difference before the committee, and in the evidence given; but the people who are interested in this Bill, that is the manufacturer, the dealer the importer and the general departmental stores that now sell jewellery, they were all cognizant of this Bill, had all discussed it over and over again. It was sent to Mr. Fielding first some three months ago and correspondence was held, which Mr. Fielding handed over to me. I said: 'I will introduce it in the Senate if you are not prepared to introduce it in the Commons'. All who are interested had notice. We represented the general public here. The general public are protected by this Bill. No man will feel that the Bill has been forced through parliament. It is more likely he will feel that it ought to have been forced through parliament 10 years ago, and he would not have had so much inferior jewllery pawned off on him.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am entirely in accord with this Bill, and I congratulate the hon. Secretary of State on having introduced it, and on the great pains he has taken in having it thoroughly understood by hon. gentlemen in the committee. I trust it will be similarly explained and understood in this House. In the committee stage of this Bill it has not been my experience during the many years I have been in the Senate to have ever known a Bill that has been better explained by the gentlemen who appeared in promoting it and those who appeared yesterday not altogether opposed to it, but opposed to some of its provisions. We had the advantage of the clearest and best explanations, and after the first meeting of the committee our law clerk was instructed to go over it along with the promoters and look more carefully into some of the provisions of the Bill in order to assimilate it with the laws of other countries. I know it is not according to parliamentary usage to refer to what took place in committee, but it is quite proper to say, as the hon. Secretary of State has already said, that when the Bill came before us yesterday the line of cleveage between the two sets of advocates that appeared before us was not very great. With regard to the first eleven clauses of the Bill there was only one point of difference, and that was as to whether we should permit the use of nine carat gold or should require a standard of ten carat gold as a minimum. The preponderance of opinion was undoubtedly in favour of using the ten carat. It was held, and not successfully contradicated, that 9 carat gold will discolour, and that 10 carat was as low as we could justly sanction under the operation of this Bill. The line of cleveage between the supporters of the Bill and those who were against that part of it with regard to plated goods, was this, that the latter seemed to advocate retaining the practice which now prevails with regard to plated goods, and that is that a guarantee is given that they will wear so many years, while the advocates of the Bill want to have the law provide that there will be a standard of quality on which the sale shall be made, and not a guarantee that the goods will wear so many years. Hon. gentlemen have only to have this proposition simply stated to them to see what it means. A guarantee of any article where a base metal is used, and finished with gold or silver, that it will wear so many years, is almost fraudulent in the very statement of it.

We were told that a guarantee of twenty years was given in very many cases, where experts would tell you distinctly that the articles could not hold their value for more than ten years, and at that time where was the purchaser to look for redress. He would probably be dead himself, or if he lived he would find the man who made the sale had disappeared. Further than that, it would be so hard to prove the contract that hon. gentlemen will understand at once that it is a form of guarantee which could not possibly lead to honest trade. The Bill provides that there shall be a guarantee of quality and on that guarantee the sale shall be made. The provisions for bringing that about are very simple, and I trust they may prove effective. If they should not be found in every respect satisfactory, time will tell, and like all other Acts we can have this one amended if necessary in future years; but notwithstanding the soft impeachment of my hon. friend who wishes to convey the impression that no member of the committee understood this Bill, I must claim that with the assistance we had I did not find it much more difficult to understand it than many other Bills that have come before us. I found that we soon got down to a few very simple points and beyond that there was no argument whatever. I have much pleasure in supporting the Bill, and I congratulate the hon. Secretary of State on the pains he has taken in putting it before parliament in a satisfactory manner.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I think we would be almost at liberty to use the arguments that we heard in committee, because this is a public Bill, and the hon. Secretary of State, in his wisdom, in order that the Bill might be properly discused sent it to a committee where those in favour of the Bill and those who opposed it could be heard on equal terms. The Bill might as well have been passed through the House as the hon. Secretary of State brought it down, but he took the precaution to send it to a committee in order that those familiar with the trade might be heard, and I quite argree with every word that has fallen from the hon. senator from Marshfield. With reference to the nine carat standard, which is the lowest standard in the old country, we were told by those who were opposed to the Bill almost in its entirety that this class of gold did not form a very large factor of the importation from the old country into Canada. What I think should be considered more than anything else are the views of men who are dealing with matters of this kind in the trade generally. From every part of Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, petitions were signed in favour of the Bill. I care not whether the Bill was promoted by those who favoured it or not; it certainly is a government measure, and we are treating it as a government measure. It is only fair to say that these men have an honest desire to place before the trade of Canada and the public generally articles really of the value and quality they purport to be. I will leave it to any member of the House if he were presented with two rings, or watch chains, or watch cases, one marked to indicate its purity and the other with a guarantee of twenty years, would he not take the one that was hall marked? He undoubtedly would for this reason, because if the quality has been misrepresented he has recourse at law. He can take it to any other jeweller and ask him to test the quality and if it is not up to the standard marked upon it he can have redress. In the case of a guarantee there is no protection. What these men ask, and what the hon. Secretary of State wishes to have embodied in this Bill, is that when a mark is put upon metal of any kind it shall correctly represent the quality of the article. Nothing can be fairer than that, and we are protecting the public when we support this Bill. Yesterday I was shown two gold cases, and it would be simply impossible for any person not familiar with the trade to say which one was the better. They were identical in appearance, but when you examined the one case you found the name of the watch company with a guarantee for so many years upon it, while in the other you had the name of the company and the quality marked upon it. Surely the latter is the fairer condition of things, better than allowing articles to be sold as gold on a guarantee. If the article is stamped you can follow not only the man who sells the goods, but also the manufacturer. Every consideration should be given to this Bill, because its object is to protect not only the middle men, but the general public who are interested in buying these articles. After the discussion that has taken place and the trouble the hon. Secretary of State has taken with the Bill and the thorough explanations given when the Bill was before the committee, I hardly expected this opposition to the Bill to-day.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I should like to have a question which was asked by the hon. senator from Toronto answered. If, under the fourth clause of the Bill, a gentleman goes to the old country and purchases an article with a mark upon it, he is liable to the penalties provided in this Bill? We hear a great deal about the desire of the gentlemen who are interested in getting this legislation, but under the Bill itself there may be not only a large measure of protection, but also a desire to prevent the introduction of articles from Great Britain, and in that way it may be in restraint of trade.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would direct attention to clause 8 of the Bill. I think there is the fullest protection of the outside manufacturer who is an honest man. The hon. gentleman from Toronto suggests that the Bill should be laid over until next session in order to give notice to the public. It is not the practice of the government in introducing measures with respect to inspection and measures intended to protect the public from imposition, to say that these measures shall not become law until they have been before the public for a long time. But clause 15 of the Bill goes quite as far as any hon. gentleman can reasonably ask:

> This Act shall come into force and effect until twelve months after the date of the signification by the Governor General of His Majesty's assent thereto.

That is in order to enable dealers who are interested in the matter to become familiar with existence of the law, and there is a further provision that the Act shall not apply to goods which are in the country before the Act becomes law. I quite agree with the hon. gentlemen who have spoken that it is a meritorous and deserving Bill and that we would make a great mistake if we singled this Bill out as one upon which we should exercise our power to obstruct the government. The hon. gentleman from Toronto has spoken of the Bill coming up during the last days of the session, but this Bill was received and read the first time on the 17th May.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Not this Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The second reading was fixed for Wednesday, the 6th June. The original Bill was referred to a committee. The committee held a meeting and considered the Bill to some extent, and then they had it redrafted by the law clerk with a view to improving and simplifying it. Then the Bill as redrafted and improveed—that was done on the 14th June—was yesterday before the committee, and there is no breach of propriety in saying that the various interests were fully heard. The Bill was considered in the most careful way, and the committee accepted the Bill in the form in which it comes to us almost unanimously. Under these circumstances, I do not think there would be any justification at all to decline to pass the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Bill (KK) An Act for the relief of William Edward Ogden.—(Hon. Mr. Frost.)

LA BANQUE PROVINCIAL DU CANADA BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

The order of the day being called :

Consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to (Bill 49) An Act respecting La Banque Provinciale du Canada.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière) moved that the report be concurred in. He said : I gave notice that I would move on the motion for the third reading that the said Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by the insertion of the following clause :

5. The bank may use in all its transactions the name of 'The Provincial Bank of Canada' as well as that of 'La Banque Provinciale du Canada,' and may contract and otherwise bind and obligate itself under either of the said names.

I have here an Act passed in 1900, when several other banks were continued in existence, and I call attention to the fact that they have also been allowed to use either the French or the English names. I refer to the Bank of Montreal, the Quebec bank, the Bank of Toronto and others. It is very essential for this bank to have both names.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that Act to which the hon. gentleman refers not a translation from the English to the French ? Can the hon. gentleman point out any charter granted to any bank that gives them the right that they ask in this fifth clause, that is, to change their name at any time they see proper ?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I was only moving concurrence in the amendments of the committee. I must move concurrence, because the Bill is in my own name, and I could not bring it to a third reading unless the report of the committee was first adopted as amended. There are other amendments and I am moving concurrence in them all ; that is why I explain that I wished to reserve the right on the third reading to move this amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will move an amendment afterwards.

The amendments were concurred in.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I move that the Bill be now read the third time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I move in amendment that the Bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended by the insertion of the following clause :

5. The bank may use in any of its transactions the name 'The Provincial Bank of Canada' in place of 'La Banque Provinciale du Canada, and may contract and otherwise bind and obligate itself under either of the said names.

There is a slight amendment in the amendment. But it is only a change of form.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Some explanation should be given. This is a most extraordinary step to take. If a bank is to have two names, as this bank evidently desires, to use either the one or the other as it sees fit, some reason should be given why they want this change.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would give the reason which common sense furnishes me. It is this : all the banks which my hon. friend gave a list of a moment ago, the Banque du Peuple, the Bank of Montreal, and all these others have been translated into French. The charters were given in English and the names were translated and the translations are admitted in our courts as the French names of the banks. But two or three years ago a new departure took place. The name was given in English or in French as the case may be, but it was not translated. When the translation of the statute is made they repeat the name as it is given, and they translate it as well. That gives an advantage to these banks, because in a French community they can do business under a French name, and in an English community under an English name. We want to give this bank the same advantage; it does not give them any more power but it puts them in the same position. In a French community the bank will be called La Banque Provinciale; among English people it will be known as the Provincial Bank. It is the same bank and the same name; there is no change.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—My hon. friend will admit this, however, that there is not another bank which adopts both the English and the French names as he suggests. We all know that the French record of the chartered banks has the English and the French translation merely as a matter of convenience, and, as a matter of right, I should say, so far as the French edition is concerned; but none of these have that right by Act of parliament. The Bank of Montreal appears in the French translation as La Banque Montréal, but you do not find in the charter that it should be known by both an English and a French name.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Yes. I will show you another. I have here the statutes of Canada, 2 Edward VII., chapter 77, from which we find that certain parties are constituted La Caisse de pension de la Banque Molson, then between brackets 'Molsons Bank Pension Fund'.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—I have no doubt but what the hon. gentleman is reading is literally correct; but when these banks were chartered was the French name inserted in the English charter?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In the French charter it is inserted in English. It gives also the words of the English charter, Molson's Bank Pension Fund. We are not asking more than that.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Would they issue bank notes under both names?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That would be just the same as issuing a stamp in both languages.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—If that is what is intended, will it not look like two different banks?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They intend to issue bank notes in both languages, but not to have two different issues. They could have two names, both the French and the English.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What would my hon. friend say to this proposition: That parliament is giving to this bank two distinct corporate names? I think that is the point or difficulty that really confronts us. There is no doubt that two distinct names are being given to the bank. The cases cited by my hon. friend are simply the French translations of the English corporate names, and that is the difficulty which I see before us.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The consequence of that translation is that to-day you could sign a note in favour of La Banque du Montréal in Quebec or elsewhere with a French name.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That may be.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is, you have the French statute which is the opposite language to the English.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—Does the Bank of Montreal issue its currency in French as well as in English?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, only in English.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—This bank would have that power under the proposed amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is a matter of fact and as a matter of right, taking the French statute, the bank would have the same right to issue it in French.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—It could not issue any more notes than the law allows.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Oh, no. It does not double the number of the issue. The only difference is that when you deal with the French community the business is done in the French name and with the English in English.

Hon. Mr. GIBSON—My hon. friend must remember the fact that their currency is not confined—and I am glad to see it is not—to the Province of Quebec; the French bank bills find their way into the province of Ontario and into the western provinces, and it would be very misleading if under this Act you were allowed to use the English as well as the French on your bills. There would be a great deal of trouble in connection with it. So there would be with the Bank of Montreal or any other bank.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I feel a great deal of difficulty with respect to this amendment. It struck me, on the face of it, that it was not desirable that a bank should be allowed to call itself the Provincial Bank of Canada and then if it wishes to call itself La Banque Provinciale du Canada. The hon. gentleman from Stadacona spoke of La Banque du Peuple, but I do not think it was ever known as the People's Bank, and there are other People's Banks in the country besides La Banque du Peuple. I am not at all clear that there may not be another Provincial Bank of Canada besides La Banque Provinciale du Canada. I feel that while I may be in doubt as to the matter, the Banking Committee which had this measure under consideration and which I presume gave it careful consideration—because we know that committee always does give measures submitted to it careful consideration—arrived at the conclusion to strike out the fifth clause of the Bill, and the hon. gentleman a few moments ago moved that the report be concurred in. Apart from the merits of the case and from the conclusions which we should draw from the actions of the Committee on Banking and Commerce there is the fact that the House would be guilty of—well, self contradiction at any rate, in agreeing that the fifth clause should be struck out, and immediately afterwards reinserting the same clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I find that in granting the charter to the Bank of Montreal, chapter 25, 1st George IV., the charter is given in two languages. It was spoken of in one as 'The President, Directors & Co., of the Bank of Montreal' and on the opposite side it is a French version. I find also that in the incorporation of the Quebec Bank there is the English: 'Quebec Bank,' and the French 'la Banque de Quebec.' The charter was given in both languages, evidently indicating that so far as those banks were concerned they would have a right to use either the French or English title. The Bank of Montreal some years later got a new charter, and I do not find that they continued the dual names. I do not think the Quebec Bank ever changed. The charter was originally granted in both languages.

Hon. Mr. COX—I should like to ask if it gives this bank any additional power by reason of having the two names?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No.

Hon. Mr. COX—All our banks, in putting up their signs in the province of Quebec, use the French translation and this bank would have the power to do that without this change.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, not since the new departure. They do not translate the names as they did before. They take their names either in French or in English. The statute does not translate the names.

Hon. Mr. COX—What additional power does it give them? Would they have power to issue their circulation in French as well as English?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—Yes.

Hon. Mr. COX—The Bank of Commerce has power to issue their notes in the French language but this is the only bank, as far as I know.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No.

Hon. Mr. COX—The chairman of the committee took strong grounds against the two names being used, and the committee were unanimous on that point. If it does not make any difference, why depart from the usual custom of using the one name only in the charter?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Take the case of the hon. gentleman's own bank, the Bank of Commerce; while they might issue their notes in French they would have to observe the name by which they were incorporated : 'The Bank of Commerce,' and then put the rest in French, the reason of that is that in the French translation they do not translate the names. They did that at one time but they do not now. In the English translation it would be the French name that would appear, and if there was a French translation it would be the opposite. But what I want to point out is that they are not proposing to change the name or take the double name. They are proposing simply to get leave to use French names; in transactions to use the same corporate name, the same as it is in French. They want the liberty to use in transactions and contracts the English name. It does not seem to me that there is the confusion that was thought of. They are not two corporate names. You might have given them the power to use John Jones in English. Instead of that you give them the right to use the name which represents John Jones.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I must take issue with my hon. friend on that point. I do not say that I am opposed to the Bill, but they are two corporate names. You cannot give a corparate name to a company and then by a French translation convert that into French and use both names as representing the one corporate identity. These two names are just as distinct corporate names as if an individual would call himself Mr. White and Mr. Blanc. The question would be, could that individual under the English law use both names ? That is a precisely analogous case to the one we are dealing with.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—If the law provided that this bank, as well as other banks, should have the right to issue their bills both in English and French there could be no objection. If they wanted to print on the bill the French and English names at the same time I cannot see that there would be any objection to that, and if they enter into a contract with a Frenchman I see no objection to permitting them to use the French language, as long as their bills are issued and printed in English, and if they choose to print them in French interlined with the English there could be no objection. Then again, if they entered into a contract and wanted to use the French language they might be doing business in a province perhaps where they did not understand English.

The amendment was adopted.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

PLACER MINING IN YUKON TERRITORY BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (153) An Act respecting Placer Mining in the Yukon Territory.

(In the Committee).

On clause 1,

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—On looking over this Bill carefully, I find it is an excellent measure, and it would require an expert miner who knew all about the conditions of the country to amend it. I think it had better be sent to the Yukon and distributed among the miners, and they could peruse it and make suggestions. I think clause 18 and clause 21 are excellent provisions. I would accept the measure as it is.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—I may say that in the Yukon last summer a committee was formed partly of the council and of miners from every portion of the territory. They visited every creek, took evidence from the miners on the spot and this is the outcome of the suggestions of the miners themselves. This is copied from orders in council which have been passed from time to time. The committee met and discussed this question and these suggestions received the approval of the people of the Yukon before the Bill was introduced in the House. The miners have asked for this measure to be passed, not because the orders in council were defective but because from time to time the financial people were afraid that an order in council might be passed affecting their investments and they preferred that an Act be passed giving more security to money which may be invested.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Who composed that committee ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—The miners themselves. The commissioner was the chairman. There was a select committee of council, and meetings were held from time to time all the way up the creeks. At every creek and claim the miners had a right to be heard before the commission. The member in the House of Commons, Dr. Thompson, was present at the meetings, and, under the circumstances, surely we can very well take it that the Yukon people require this Bill and look for it.

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does 'person' include a woman ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think under our statute it does, under the general interpretation Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Under the Homestead Act it would not. Can the hon. gentleman from Moosejaw say whether a female can take up a claim under this Act.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me that the interpretation clause should define what a 'person' means. I would suggest that. Up to the present time females can take up claims in the Yukon, but in the absence of any interpretation I am disposed to think they could not.

The clause was amended accordingly.

On clause 4,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Surely there are other government reservations in the Yukon beyond those mentioned in this clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a clause which it is proposed later on to add, but which does not appear in the printed Bill bearing on this point. Some lands are in dispute; some licenses have been cancelled, and the parties are disputing the power of the minister to cancel them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What will be the policy of the department ? Will those lands be brought under this Act by order in council immediately the controversies are settled ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Controverted cases are removed from the operation of the Act until a decision is reached, probably after a discussion in the courts. The clause I refer to will come in later.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend say in what way the mining recorder can become aware whether this security which is necessary has been given ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The mining recorder will of course be cognizant of any adverse claim.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He may not be.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He has to have some discretionary power.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What statement is to be made by the applicant ? Has he to make a statutory declaration that the land is not lawfully occupied ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Schedule A gives the form of application. The applicant has to give security that he is not encroaching upon anybody else.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What court has jurisdiction in these mining disputes ? Is there more then one court there, or has the one court jurisdiction in all matters ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—The gold commissioner has the power of a judge.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The judges are a court of appeal from him.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has the mining recorder original jurisdiction ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He would have, of course.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He would not have it as a matter of course except it were given to him by statute. Clause 73 provides for jurisdiction being given to the gold commissioner. How is the gold commissioner appointed? You are vesting him with very wide powers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He is appointed by the Governor in Council under section 71.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 5,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will it be the policy of the department to put a price upon the surface rights ? Will the sale be by auction or how is it proposed to deal with them ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Each one depends upon the circumstances. In the case of a discovery the man who discovers gets a prior right.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He gets a prior right to the placer mine, but not the surface right. What is the policy of the department with reference to the surface rights ? Has he an opportunity to buy at a certain price per acre ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—They charge $1 to $5 an acre for the surface rights.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How is the difference established between these two prices ? Is the report made by the mining recorder ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—Yes, and it is submitted to the Crown Land Department. The commissioner has the power to fix the price.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The valuation is under regulations which vary according to conditions from $1 to $10.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Are these conditions governed by the value of the surface right, or by the location in which the mine may be, or by the value of the placer mine itself ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The value of land in the locality I presume. Some creeks are more valuable than others.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 6,

6. A placer claim on a creek shall not exceed five hundred feet in length, measured along the base line of the creek, established or to be established by a government survey. The rear boundaries of the claim shall be parallel to the base line, and shall be defined by measuring one thousand feet on each side of such base line. In the event of the base line not being established, the claim may be staked along the general direction of the valley of the creek, but it will be necessary to conform to the boundaries which the base line, when established, shall define.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How do those claims correspond with the placer claims in British Columbia ? I have always understood that the British Columbia Mining Act was regarded as really a model mining Act. I have heard it spoken of in the very highest terms by miners from every part of the continent and it seems to me that no better model could be taken. How will the placer claims in the Yukon correspond with the British Columbia claims ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—The size has been changed from time to time. At one time a claim extended about 100 feet on the creek and 500 feet wide, but finally they adopted 500 feet on the creek and 1,000 feet on each side. On hill claims the size is 500 feet by 1,000 feet. They changed it to a larger claim, because the value of the claim is somewhat increased. It would not pay a man to take a small claim, because at the end of working it he would have nothing but the machinery to the good. It was the will of the people themselves to have the size of the claim increased to 500 feet on the creek by 1,000 feet on each side of it. That would give a claim 2,000 feet wide, but every creek valley is not 2,000 feet wide. A hillside claim is 500 feet by 1,000 feet.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand the department has followed the British Columbia regulations as far as possible, wherever they could be properly applied.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 18,

Full Christain and surname of the locator. The posts shall also be numbered 1 and 2 respectively. It shall not be lawful to move post No. 1, but No. 2 may be moved by a Dominion land surveyor, if the distance between the posts exceeds the length prescribed by this Act, but not otherwise : Provided that failure on the part of the locator of a claim to comply with any of the . . deemed to invalidate such Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Assuming there is to be a conflict in this appointment how is it remedied ? Five miners can make the appointment ; suppose two groups of miners undertake to appoint emergency recorders ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The majority would rule. I have never heard of any difficulty of the kind.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let us assume there are two men and they divide into two groups of five each, each group appointing an emergency recorder ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They can go to the gold commissioner.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But they cannot reach the gold commissioner. There should be some provision for a conflict of this kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In all the experience of the Yukon no such case has arisen.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Macdonald), who has had very extensive experience in mining, says such a thing might occur. I can conceive of a conflict of that kind being created for the purpose of depriving a discoverer of his claim.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The mining recorder overrules everything.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Under clause 19 of the Bill the mining recorder must recognize the emergency recorder.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But if there is a dispute of the kind the mining recorder would naturaly be the referee.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The mining recorder is but the creature of the statute and he certainly cannot go beyond the powers given him by the statute.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He would not record the claim.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He is bound to record it, under clause 19.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know that we need anticipate trouble arising.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We are here to take precautions to prevent trouble arising. Under this clause a group of five miners, where the mining recorder is distant 100 miles, can appoint an emergency recorder. What is to prevent another group who may not be in harmony with them saying 'We refuse to accept your appointment. We shall appoint one of our own.' You would then have two emergency recorders appointed. The mining recorder could not recognize the two, and it would lead to litigation, and some designing person might step in and restake the claim, or another group of five might agree upon an emergency recorder and thus defeat the object of the first legitimate discoverers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If my hon. friend will read further on he will find that all that is provided for in clauses 59 to 66. The mining recorder would not recognize a claim obtained by fraud.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The mining recorder must take the claim as presented by the emergency recorder.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not if there is a dispute.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He has no discretion.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—We have no lynch law in the Yukon yet, but a mining recorder who would act against the wishes of a majority would not be there very long.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is to say, it would lead to lawlessness and they would promptly dispose of the gentleman.

The clause was agreed to.

On the 27th clause, relating to title,

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—The old law provided for the location of the claim for one year, and that was to be renewed from year to year. Now they are given the right to hold a claim for five years by doing certain work. The miner is not interfered with from year to year and nobody can jump the claim. The miner must go on and do the work, but his title is good for five years.

On clause 29,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is this $200 referred to in clause 27 to be distributed over the five years, or is it two hundred dollars annually ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Mossejaw)—No, annually.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—During each year ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understand that he has to renew the claim from year to year, that he does not in the first place get the claim for five years, but that each year he has to renew it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The clause reads 'Within fourteen days from the date of the exploration of the said deed or renewal' ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes one or five years. May I ask my hon. friend what is the nature of the work that is usually done on those claims ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—Some times by a shaft and they may bring water on a claim.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is the character of the work entirely within the discretion of the miner, or is it prescribed by regulation ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would depend on the character of the claim.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They are all placer claims.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—It is not confined to one portion of work.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it confined to the condition of the mine or is there certain work prescribed ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—There is a schedule of prices for doing certain work. There is certain work he can do. Supposing he is on a shaft he would be allowed so much a foot for the shaft.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But I mean is the class of work specified ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—Yes.

On clause 30,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me this is a rather extraordinay power to give to the commissioner. It ousts the jurisdiction of the court to say whether a claim is a valid claim, recoverable under the common law, or by statute or otherwise, except it be an adverse right.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A third party cannot step in. A man who has an interest has an adverse claim, he has a right to come in.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The right may not be an adverse right ; it may be a right arising practically out of the same title. It may be a joint right. I am not prepared to say that under this clause that would be an adverse right, yet he would have to obtain the leave of the commissioner of the Yukon before starting proceedings. This is an extraordinary power. It seems to me the courts should be the judges as to all rights in connection with claims. Why is the Yukon commissioner in a better position to determine as to what claims should be brought before the courts than the courts themselves ? The contestation of the claim could not be proceeded with except upon the consent of the Yukon commissioner. If the claimant were to institute proceedings in a court of law, I presume that these proceedings would at once be defeated by the question arising as to his not having obtained consent ; that being a condition precedent his proceedings would fall to the ground. My hon. friend, as a practitioner for years, will see the extraordinary power which is vested in the commissioner.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In settling mining claims you must have an authority on the spot and not let it go to a court. It might take four or five years to settle in the courts. Where it is a serious matter there has never been any difficulty ; parties are allowed to go to the courts with their claim.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is not a question of settlement, it is a question of beginning proceedings and having the courts take cognizance of them. Take for instance the question of a joint right. There may be rights other than adverse rights. What constitutes an adverse right ? Where is this clause from ? I should like to see some precedent for it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The necessity for this clause has arisen because there are always a number of persons who put in adverse claims which have no justification whatever. It is thought the proper course would be to vest jurisdiction in some authority who could deal with the matter promptly. It does not, of course, shut out from court a party who has a substantial claim.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would not my hon. friend, as a lawyer, say that a court would not have jurisdiction until the consent of the commissioner had been obtained ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The commissioner, if it is a substantial claim, and one which he thinks should be dealt with in the courts, allows the parties to go to court.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But he is vested with absolute discretion. Surely a man's common law rights should not be taken away as is clearly done in this case.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If my hon. friend has had any experience of contests between rival miners he will know that it is necessary to have some arbitrary and dogmatic way of dealing with such matters.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—This clause is intended to stop what they call claim jumping. In the Yukon, as soon as a man has a paying claim, all kinds of rival claims are immediately put forward. These claimants put down stakes after the discovery is made, and try to blackmail the man who has the claim. It is to shut out people who can't prove a good claim of some kind.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He is not bound to do so. The hon. gentleman from Moosejaw says the object is to prevent claim jumping. Now let us instance the case of a claim jumper. He lays claim to the particular location which he has jumped. He would have an adverse right and he would have a right to involve the original claimant in litigation. A party possessing an adverse right can go into court, but if he has not an adverse right, then he has to obtain the consent of the commissioner. I want some light on it. I must confess that the clause is drawn in such a way as not to be self explanatory. It is difficult to conceive what class of cases would arise under it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The clause was specially inserted in the Bill by the miners of the Yukon Territory.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The object is probably a good one, but it is certainly not framed in such a way as to assist the object in view. Any one claiming an adverse right may institute legal proceedings; but if it is not an adverse right, the consent of the commissioner is to be obtained. The very class of cases which, in my judgment, the miner would have in view, namely, claim jumping, would not come under this clause at all. It would be an adverse right. I would say I have an adverse right in that claim, and I might set the law in motion. Supposing he goes in there after the discoverer and puts down his stakes with the object of jumping the claim, and he denies the rights of the original discoverer, he certainly has an adverse claim. This clause certainly would not help the original discoverer. I just point that out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not see the difficulty.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What case will it cover?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it is a very proper clause to be there, knowing the multitude of cases that do arise in any mining camp and the class of men that are there; there must be some authority on the spot to deal with them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend misapprehends the point. I am asking for information as to what class of cases would arise under clause 30 which would not be adverse rights. With reference to an adverse right, the person having the adverse right has the power to set the courts in motion, but if the right is not an adverse one, then he has not. It seems to me it should be the other way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My judgment is this: that no man who has not an adverse right ought to have any liberty or privilege of contesting a claim. If he has, he may contest it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The rights referred to by my hon. friend are adverse rights, and those should be referred to the Yukon commissioner. They are not the cases referred to in section 30. I would ask my hon. friend to look at that and consider it.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 31,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would it not be fair, in a case of this kind, that the co-owners should perform the assessment work of the defaulting owner and have a charge against the claim for that work? That seems to me to be very inequitable. Take the case of three co-owners having a mine; it would devolve upon each one of them to perform a certain amount of assessment work. But supposing two of the owners conspired against the third, and lulled him into a position of false security, so that he does not perform the work which, under the assessment clause, he is called upon to do, they at once confiscate his interest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is left to the judgment of the gold commissioner.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—His judgment is limited by the statute. It is not discretionary with him. Immediately it is brought before him that the co-owner has not done the work, he is bound to vest it in the others.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He is not bound to do so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He is the judge as to whether the work has been done or not. His judgment is limited to that. He can not exercise his discretion to say whether it is equitable or inequitable, or as to whether it has been a pure oversight, whether it has happened through the man being ill or something of that kind. The co-owner may have met with an accident, but he cannot exercise his discretion apparently under clause 31. He certainly should have that discretion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no objection to strike out the word 'shall' and substitute 'may'.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—The trouble is, one of the parties may have left the country entirely, and the other may have been performing the work for two or three years. When the man does not turn up, it gives the other party a chance to go on with the work and get the product.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I quite agree with it. I think hardships have arisen in a great many cases of this kind. I cite the case of a man who may have become ill; then all the gold commissioner can do is to investigate, and, upon its being established before him that default has arisen, he is bound to do a certain thing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will make that read 'may' instead of 'shall'.

The clause was amended and adopted.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

On clause 37,

37. Upon application being made to him by any person or persons owning adjoining claims, the mining recorder may, with the approval of the commissioner of the Yukon Territory, grant permission for a term not exceeding ten years to any such person or persons to perform on any one or more of such claims all the work required to entitle him or them to a renewal grant for each claim so held by him or them: Provided, before any such permission is granted, the government mining engineer shall furnish a report on the application, and (where the application is made by more than one person) the applicants shall file with the mining recorder a deed of partnership creating a joint liability between the owners of the claims for the joint working thereof.

2. When the owners of adjoining claims cannot be included in such a partnership and it is shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner of the Yukon Territory that the interests of the locality in which the claims are situated would be materially benefited thereby, the said permission may be granted, notwithstanding the claims are not all contiguous.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This provision might be subject to the criticism that it would permit of a great number of claims, in fact all the claims on a particular creek, being taken up by an aggregation of individuals or by a company to the exclusion of the individual miner. The question is as to whether that is a desirable thing to do.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It requires the concurrence of the mining recorder and the commissioner of the Yukon, and the government mining engineer would have to report also on it. I think it is well guarded.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 39,

39. Every person owning a claim shall be entitled to the seepage water on his claim and to the use of so much of the water naturally flowing through or past his claim, and not already lawfully appropriated, as, in the opinion of the mining inspector, is necessary for the due working thereof, and shall be entitled to drain his own claim free of charge.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We have heard a great deal of comment as to the water rights of the Yukon being absorbed by companies and other capitalistic aggregations. What can my hon. friend say about that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would have no bearing on that certainly.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend will see that this limitation is embodied in the section that the miner is not entitled to the water naturally flowing through or past his claim except it has not already been appropriated. Now, to what extent has there been an appropriation of the water in the Yukon? It has been a matter of public notoriety; it has been stated, I do not know with what truth, that practically all the water rights in the Yukon mining creeks have been absorbed by large companies. My hon. friend from Moosejaw will probably have some knowledge on that subject as he was the commissioner at that time.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—As a matter of fact this clause would not refer to that at all. These large grants of water were given from the principal creeks or large rivers for the purpose of bringing water on the miners' land. It was not the water flowing upon or through the miners' land.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But let us assume that the waters of a creek are flowing past a claim. As a matter of fact all those claims are laid off on the creeks. As I understand the base line is parallel with the creek.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—The hon. member is now speaking about concessions given to big companies. The large companies would not have those rights at all. We are providing there in regard to water which has been given by law, small grants of water before this claim was reported on. A man is entitled to such water as passes by his claim, except that which has already been given by law, but not to big companies.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If reliance has to be placed upon these reports which we have heard, many large companies have appropriated a very large portion of it, in the Yukon Territory and I suppose that water consists chiefly of the various creeks throughout the mining territories.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—No, that would be the Klondike. The hon. gentleman is speaking of the Klondike and there is no mining there to speak of. They were talking of taking water from the Klondike over to the creeks and the government had given what they thought was too large an amount to one company, but, as a matter of fact, nobody yet has taken the water from the Klondike to the creeks.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I believe there are no monopoly rights in the Yukon. The Treadgold concessions have been cancelled, and the company chartered last May have no special rights. There are certain rivers they can take water from, but other companies have the same right.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has any company been formed to convey water from the Klondike to the several mining claims, and if so have they been successful? My hon. friend knows that to carry water from the Klondike to any of the camps would require the expenditure of a very large sum of money, and I can readily understand that that never could be accomplished except by the government, or by a company that was wealthy. Unfortunately for that country, what are called the creeks, and those I have read of, are very small, and it is with a great deal of difficulty and trouble that they utilize it. The small quantity that they have is utilized by means of contrivances to carry it back three or four times until it is almost exhausted. What I should like to know is whether any company has yet been successful in carrying the water from the Klondike to the mining camps and, if so, has it been done through the aid of either the council of that Territory or the Dominion government?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—A company has been formed lately for the purpose of trying to get some assistance from the government here, but I understand so far the government have not given any aid. A company has been formed with about $5,000,000 capital for the purpose of putting on water on the Dominion, Bonanza and Eldorado creeks, but I am afraid, unless the government give them large assistance, no water will be brought from the Klondike.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should be very glad to hear they were successful.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—So should I. They may be some day.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 40,

40. A mining recorder may, with the approval of the commissioner of the Yukon Territory, upon application being made as hereinafter mentioned, grant to any person or persons for any mining purpose or any purpose incidental thereto, for any term not exceeding five years, or in special cases for such length of time as may be determined, the right to divert and use or sell the water from any stream or lake, at any particular part thereof, and the right of way through and entry upon any mining ground, for the purpose of constructing and repairing ditches and flumes to convey such water.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This, I understand, would permit the government of the Yukon Territory, through the commissioner, giving to companies or individuals not engaged in mining the right to divert this water. What I should like to know is, what would be done to protect the rights of miners who may own claims along those particular streams ? I apprehend that due consideration, of course, would be given to the protection of their rights, but it occurred to my mind that that right should not be given to those who are not operating claims, so as to prevent any monopoly from controlling the waters and in that way extorting from the miners unreasonable charges for water.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Of course no concession of that kind would be granted without due provision being made for that. It is doubtful if any company will undertake it, important and useful though it is to the miners. It could only be done by capitalists. The government have been approached, but the government have no idea of undertaking it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Would it not be well to give power to the Yukon commissioner to grant the right, subject to a tariff of fees, for a distribution of the water. That apparently is not contemplated in clause 40. It simply gives the right, and having given the right, no restriction would be placed on the company as to what they should charge for the water.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That would be all subject to the terms and conditions.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It might not be the case.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—The miner would have a right to the water passing through his claim, excepting the water which has already been given by law. A man may get a right to erect a dam and can conserve all the spring water in that dam. He is entitled to that water although it may pass through another man's claim to where he uses it. A man has a right to all the water that would flow naturally through his claim, but the man who may have spent $100,000 on a dam to conserve the spring freshet is entitled to take that water through a claim and used it on his own.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend is doubtless talking with reference to the practice in mining districts as to the appropriation of water. The practice is determined by the necessities or considerations of the cases or conditions; but now that we are reducing the practice in mining districts into statutory form, he of course cannot do that except under the statute he has a right to do it. By clause 39 the miner is only entitled to the seepage on his claim and to such water as has not been appropriated by those who are entitled to obtain water grants. Now the miner, so far as I can see in those clauses which we have already reviewed, has no statutory right to the water flowing through his claim except he secures a water right.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—Just read clause 48.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I concede that section 48 would meet the difficulty which I pointed out a few moments ago, but the other point has arisen during our discussion as to the superior right which the miner should have as being entitled to a sufficient amount of water to work his claim properly above all other applicants. Is that right preserved to him under any of these sections?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I have under my hand a charter given this year, in the month of May, to a company to operate on water courses in the Yukon. It reads as follows :

> To install and operate a system of works whereby water may be brought from the Klondike river and other water courses in the Yukon Territory to such place or places in said territory, and such elevation and in such quantities as may be required to enable gold-bearing ground on Bonanza, Hunker, Eldorado, Gold Run, Sulphur and other creeks within said territory to be worked on an extensive scale by hydraulic methods, and in connection with such system to construct, carry out, maintain, improve, manage, work, control and superintend ditches, reservoirs, flumes, pipe-lines, stations, roads, ways, bridges, water-courses, aqueducts, hydraulic works and other such works, contrivances and conveniences as may seem to the company to be directly or indirectly conducive to any of the objects of the company and to contribute to, subsidize, and otherwise aid or take part in constructing, carrying on, maintaining, improving, working or controlling the same or any of them; to divert, collect, store and carry water and to distribute sell, barter and dispose of same.

I should like to know whether the rights given to this company under the charter interfere with the rights of the miners?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—This company are asking for the right to bring water from the Klondike, which will be several miles, perhaps, from the mining camps, and they will sell water to the miners. It does not affect the miner in so far as any water is concerned in the creek on which he is working. He is entitled to the water flowing through his claim. This charter will help him rather than hinder him, even supposing he did not buy water from the company, because there would be a certain amount of seepage from the new water coming in and he would benefit to that extent. No harm can happen to the miner; he is benefited in every shape.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand that charter applies exclusively to the utilizing of the water from the Klondike. That does not affect the point raised by the hon. member from Calgary. Any company, as I have already stated, which will invest their money in order to carry water from the Klondike into the mining districts is what is really required in that country. What I would like to know, following up the question proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition, is this: How would the granting of a license of the right to supply water under the fortieth clause affect a miner who has discovered mines upon some watercourse or creek where the mining would be principally in the bed of the creek, or near it? If some person had secured the right to the territory before that discovery was made, would the miner or prospector making the discovery have the right to utilize the water upon the claim, or would he be subject to the tax which the lessee of the water right might impose upon him? We know that the discovery of gold in that country has generally been made on some creek. The Gold Run, Eldarado, Hunker and other mining districts are upon small creeks, with not a very large supply, in any of these places. I desire to ask if the discoverer of the existence of gold on the claim which he may have staked out through which water would run would be subject to the tax?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I consider that the inalienable right of every miner would exist as to the water of the creek flowing past his claim. There is a certain amount necessary for the working of the claim and nothing could take that from him. That is the basis of the claims that front on a creek unless the water has been given away, and then a man would not take up the claim. In taking a claim a man would know what water was there.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I find that clause 47 provides for it. I am bound to say that if expressed statutory provision had not been made reserving to the miner a fixed quantity of water he would not be entitled to the water as against any person to whom it might be given by the commissioner.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The law would be very defective if it were not so, because I have always understood that the water rights were inalienable. The claim is worth nothing if there is no water.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The rights are defined by statute. He has no common law right should parliament choose to make other disposition of it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it is unfortunate, in dealing with an important measure of this kind, to have a Bill containing 100 clauses affecting important industries, placed before the Senate and discussed before we have had time to consider the provisions of the law. I rise to apologize for not having the information, and I was asking questions that suggested themselves to me in the practical working of a mining claim, without having seen the clause that provided for it. I question very much if there are many hon. members in the Senate outside of my hon. friend and the Secretary of State who has really read the Bill or knows what it contains.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think we have given more time to it now than the House of Commons did.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is saying very little for the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That statement will not commend the House of Commons very largely to the public, and will not inspire the miners with confidence as to the adequacy of the Bill to meet the conditions.

On clause 41,

41. Every applicant for a water grant shall, for twenty days previous to the making of the application, post at the following places a notice in writing of his intention to apply to the mining recorder for the grant therein referred to, viz.: at the point of proposed diversion; on the mine on which such water is intended to be used; on each mine or person's land to be crossed by the water in course of transit to the place of user; and in the office of the mining recorder for the district; and shall forward a copy of his noitce of application to the gold commissioner.

2. Such notice shall contain the following particulars:—

(a) The name of the applicant;

(b) The name, or if unnamed, a sufficient description of, the stream, lake or other source from which such water is intended to be taken;

(c) The point of diversion or intended ditch-head; and the point where the water is to be returned to the stream shall be given;

(d) The means by which it is intended to store or divert the same;

(e) The number of inches of water applied for;

(f) The purpose for which it is required, stated with reasonable particularity;

(g) The mine upon which the water is to be used, or if the right to sell water is asked, within what locality the right is to be exercised;

(h) The date of the posting of the notice, and the date on which application will be made to the gold commissioner for the granting of the record.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend know what provision is made as to showing cause why these rights should not be granted?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There seems to be ample notice given.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But what provision is made for the opponents of this right appearing before the mining recorder and filing objections, and so on?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—The hon. gentleman will find it is provided for.

On clause 45,

45. Every holder of a water grant shall take all reasonable means for utilizing the water granted to him, and if he wilfully wastes any water or takes a quantity of water in excess of his actual requirements, or has worked out or abandoned the claim or claims with respect to which the water grant was issued, the mining inspector may, upon notice, cancel or reduce the grant, or impose such conditions as he thinks proper. An appeal may be taken, at any time within ten days from any such action of the mining inspector, to the gold commissioner.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman think ten days is sufficient, when you consider the distance from the mines to the headquarters of the mining recorder?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We could make it twenty days.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—A man may not have utilized the water which he has, and as a matter of fact there are only a few days in the season to wash a dump, and if a man has water which he does not utilize it would be a mistake to give him more than ten days.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In the meantime he cannot utilize the water.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Ten days is given for the appeal. Does the hon. gentleman think that is sufficient time considering the distances between the mining localities and the headquarters of the mining recorder?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—The inspector is on the creek himself.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But where is the gold commissioner.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—In Dawson.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He may be a considerable distance from the particular camp at which the cancellation of the water right is made, and he has to fyle his appeal from the decision of the mining inspector within ten days. Is that sufficient time to permit him to fyle his appeal?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—I think so. The great majority of the mines in the Dawson country are within fifty-five miles of Dawson.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Gold Run is fifty odd miles from Dawson, and there are others beyond that.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—I say the great majority are within fifty-five miles. Gold Run is about the end of the mining district.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There may be other camps opened up in this territory at a much greater distance from Dawson than the present camps. We must take into consideration that we are legislating for the whole of that country and fixing terms which may render it impossible to carry out the provisions of the statute.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Clause 71 gives the Governor in Council power to appoint gold commissioners, so it is presumed if other camps are established some distance off, a gold commissioner will be appointed for that district. I presume the same method would be followed as in British Columbia where we have gold commissioners in all the districts and in that case ten days would be plenty of time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Are not the mines on Forty Mile Creek a greater distance from Dawson than fifty miles?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—No, about that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is on the line that divides the Yukon territory from Alaska.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Yes, but the mines are east of the boundary. It would not be more than fifty-five miles from Dawson.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 46,

46. Every grant of water on an occupied creek shall be subject to the rights of such miners as shall, at the time of such grant, be working on the stream above or below the ditch-head, and of any other persons lawfully using such water for any purpose whatsoever.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That protects the miner who was there before the license was granted, but it does not protect the discoverer of a mine after the license has been granted.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How would that affect the miner working on the stream above the ditch? Tapping the stream below his claim it seems to me, could not lessen his flow of water.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—These clauses we are now considering were framed in the event of any company being formed to carry water. There is no water company there; the Treadgold Company fell through.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We wish to make this measure as logical as possible, not to make it an absurdity. It speaks of preserving the water rights of the men above the ditch and below the ditch. The diversion of the water cannot effect the man above the ditch.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—I don't see why that should be included.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Perhaps we might have an explanation. The water may act differently up there to what is does elsewhere. There may be different natural laws in the Yukon.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 47,

47. If, after the grant has been made, any person locates and bona fide works any mining claim below the ditch-head, on any stream so diverted, he shall be entitled to forty inches of water if two hundred inches be diverted, and sixty inches if three hundred inches be diverted, and no more, except upon paying to the owner of the ditch, and all other persons interested therein, compensation equal to the amount of damage sustained by the diversion of such extra quantity of water as is required, and in computing such damage, the loss sustained by any claims using water therefrom, and all other reasonable losses, shall be considered.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do I understand from the later part of this clause that the miner who is locating below the ditchhead, having used the quantity of water allotted to him, can of his own motion divert additional water on his claim? Without some regulation restricting him, it seems to me that would be a very dangerous power and would render entirely uncertain and impracticable the carrying of the water in any ditch of that kind below the claim.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—He is allowed so much water. If he takes more than he should he will be liable to pay damages.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But should he be permitted of his own motion to take that water without obtaining a license or making an application for it? It presupposes that he enters upon the property of another of his own motion. That seems to me to embody a very dangerous principle; one which certainly should be regulated by an application or by the issue of a license.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—He may as a matter of fact take more than the amount of water he is entitled to, but that would have to be proved. If he does that he can be fined.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, but what about the miners below him, if a series of miners should, of their own motion appropriate more than the allotment provided for in the statute, then they prejudice the rights of those below them.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—These people reserve the water and take it down the ditch. They are either selling it themselves or selling it to somebody.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This clause deals with the amount of water which the miner is entitled to from the creek contiguous to his claim. It does not contemplate or presuppose that those people are selling water.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—It is a grant of the water. These people have a ditch or reservoir for the purpose of holding the water, and a miner is entitled to take so much on the creek and if he takes more than that provision is made that he shall be subject to damage for taking the water. The man who puts the ditch in will see that he does not take more than he is entitled to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But supposing they take all the water before it reaches a certain man? The value of the property down stream is lessened in proportion to the amount of additional water these people take above him.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—Then I suppose he will obtain damages.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That will be a poor compensation.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—The man who took charge of the matter of bringing water from the creek has made some contract with the miners below to supply them with water or to obtain water for himself. He is not going to allow this other man to take the water out of his ditch without looking after it. He is bound to do it.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The latter part of clause 48 reads as follows:

And the water shall be supplied to all claim owners who make application therefor, in a fair proportion and according to priority of application therefor.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is inconsistant with clause 47, because it presupposes the right of the man to take not only the proportion alloted to him, but whatever additional water he needs, entirely irrespective of the wants of those below him, and there is no regulation to control or regulate that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I think the mining inspector has the power of controlling that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Under what clause? If the mining inspector can do it, that would be quite satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Under clause 83 the mining inspector has certain powers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It strikes me that the only difficulty that can arise would be that the owner of a mine below the head of a ditch, as intimated by the hon. gentleman, would be effected, if there is not a clause in the law which would prevent the diversion of the water in some other direction. Otherwise after the water is used by one miner, it is not exhausted, it flows on down the creeks until it reaches the next miner. If there is not a clause to prevent the diversion of that water from its natural course down the creek, so that it could be utilized by the miners below, then the miners below would suffer.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—The water has to come down a hill. It cannot go up the hill, you know.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But it might be diverted?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—This is a clause which has been framed from the practice up there and by the usage. It is a very difficult matter to deal with. If these people have evolved a scheme of this kind for dealing with it, and practice has shown that it has worked all right, I think we should not disturb it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have those clauses been in operation as you have them here?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have they been taken from the regulations?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—Yes.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 49,

49. In measuring water in any ditch or sluice the following rules shall be observed:
(a) The water taken into a ditch or sluice shall be measured at the ditch or sluice head;
(b) No water shall be taken into a ditch or sluice except in a trough placed horizontally at the place at which the water enters it;
(c) One inch of water shall mean half the quantity that will pass through an orifice two inches high by one inch wide with a constant head of seven inches above the upper side of the orifice;
(d) The sluice head shall consist of fifty such inches of water.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What constitutes half an inch of water? Does it mean every second or every hour or every minute?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—Every second.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I confess my own ignorance on the subject, but I should like to know from the Secretary of State whether it means every second or every hour or every minute.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the rule is general I know that in estimating the horse power at Niagara Falls the volume taken is so much per second. I do not know whether it is universal or how it applies here.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—It is per second.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I know that in calculating the Niagara water power that is the rule.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 61,

61. Except as hereinafter provided no person mining upon any claim shall cause damage or injury to the holder of any claim other than his own by throwing earth, clay, stone or other material upon such other claim, or by causing or allowing water which may be pumped or bailed or may flow from his own claim to flow into or upon such other claim.

2. If the owner of a claim wishes to deposit the leavings or deads therefrom on an adjacent claim, he may do so upon the terms hereinafter set out, if the latter claim is of five years' standing and he has given one month's notice in writing to the owner thereof: Provided, if at the expiration of the said one month no agreement can be arrived at between the claim owners as to the price to be paid for the dumping ground, the owner giving the notice may apply to the gold commissioner or mining recorder to have the value and size of the dumping ground determined by the said board of arbitrators, and the said board shall have power to permit so much of the said claim to be used for dumping, and at such a price as it deems just.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There are many cases for which this clause, I suppose, is intended to provide. Many miners working on bench claims have no place to deposit the tailings, and I suppose this clause is intended to meet cases of that kind. The only trouble is that with many of those mining claims there really is no room to deposit the tailings, particularly where the mining is on a side hill, or what is called a bench claim. It is a point I remember discussing with some of the miners. When I asked the question why such and such a claim was not worked, the answer was 'we have no place to deposit the tailings. The man above us and the man below us and the road in front of us give us no room.'

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—It is intended to meet such cases.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It will be difficult to work it out.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—It is intended to meet a case of this kind. A man has a creek claim and has worked all but a small portion of it, and he holds it as for blackmail to prevent the man above him putting tailings on the claim. Provision is made here for using the claim for a dumping ground under certain circumstances.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The commissioner would have to use a good deal of discretion in such cases, because depositing tailings on an adjoining claim might destroy the whole claim.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Those tailings having been deposited on the dumping ground, who owns the tailings? Very frequently those tailings turn out to be very valuable.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—I think the tailings would belong to the man who placed them on the dumping ground, because he pays for the use of the ground. The question has never come up yet that I know of.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It will arise some day, because experience has demonstrated that tailings frequently have been found to be very rich and have been worked over and over again.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As illustrating what my hon. friend has said, I once saw an old miner washing with a roller the tailings which had been already washed over, and from which the owner of the mine had obtained a very rich reward. He had been at work three hours—it was on a Sunday too—and in the three hours he had washed out ten dollars. In the washing of the gold bearing dirt through the sluices, the gold is not all taken out. No doubt these tailings will be re-worked at a profit as soon as they can get sufficient water to work them. This clause does not settle the point whether the man on whose land the tailings are deposited will own them or whether they will belong to the miner who deposited them.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Moosejaw)—These are new clauses. Does this clause provide for the purchase of the land for the purpose of putting the tailings on it. If so, the purchased would own the land and the tailings both. I think it does.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The question is as to whether it is expropriated. It does not seem to be very clear as to whether the expropriation of the land is simply for the dumping privilege or whether the man who expropriated gets title to the land.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No absolute title is given.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—He simply has the use of it for dumping the tailing, but as he has gone on the other man's claim, a very nice question might arise as to who would be entitled to the tailings, and it is one which I think ought to be determined now. Possibly they should belong to the former owner who has deposited them there. Then of course the other question would come up as to whether he has not prevented the owner of the adjoining claim from using his own land for the purpose of extracting whatever mineral there may be upon it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have just made inquiries from a gentleman representing the department and he informs me that the tailings belong to the person who put them there; that he merely secures the right of deposit and the tailings belong to him.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—He pays rent for the land and secures the right.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 64,

64. There shall be no appeal in any litigation arising out of the interpretation of this Act beyond the courts of the Yukon Territory, except where the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of ten thousand dollars, exclusive of costs.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The framers of this Bill have very great confidence in the territorial court of the Yukon—very much more confidence than those who live in the provinces have in their provincial courts.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The miners want to settle their own grievances among themselves.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the miners are satisfied, I see no objection.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The great virtue I see in the clause is that it prevents the lawyers making money out of it.

Clause 85,

85. On all gold shipped from the Yukon Territory there shall be levied and collected a royalty not exceeding two and one-half per cent of its value; such royalty to be paid in currency to the Comptroller of the Yukon territory or to some person authorized by him in that behalf, and the gold for the purpose of estimating such royalty shall be valued at fifteen dollars per ounce.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is $15 per ounce the rate at which the banks buy the gold in the Yukon ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—The lowest value of gold there.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It depends in a great measure on the mine from which the gold is obtained. Some mines produce a much finer gold then others, and the value ranges from $15 to $17.50 per ounce.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—The comptroller has to weigh the gold and not assay, as the value is fixed at $15 per ounce.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I suppose the word currency in that country means gold dust ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Gold dust is virtually currency in that country, but not under the law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is two and one-half per cent the present royalty ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Yes. They used to take pay in gold dust, but now we have banks and currency there.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This only imposes a tax upon gold exported. Then in selling gold to the banks as the miners do, the banks, I suppose, have to pay the two and one-half per cent when it is sent out of the Yukon district. Is that the practice ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then any portion of the gold which is taken from the mines that is used in traffic and trade will not be subject to any tax? It is only the gold exported?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—It is on gold going out, and it all goes out.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 88,

88. Should it be proven to the satisfaction of the Mining Recorder that any person has been guilty of misrepresentation in the statement sworn to by him in recording any claim or in any of the statements required to be made by him under oath under this Act, or has removed or disturbed with intent to remove, or has defaced any legal post or stake or other mark placed under the provisions of this Act, the Mining Recorder may, in his discretion, order that such person be debarred from the right to obtain a grant or renewal of a grant to a claim for any length of time which he deems advisable. The Mining Recorder shall, forthwith, upon any such decision by him, notify every other Mining Recorder of such decision. Every such person shall have the right to appeal from such decision of the Mining Recorder to the Gold Commissioner.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The point arises, what is he to notify the other mining recorders about? What decision? The decision not to grant another claim or the misdemeanour?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The decision that the party should be debarred from taking up a claim.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, but I think it should go farther than that; the mining recorder, upon ascertaining that a misrepresentation had been made, because it must have been made deliberately, should notify every other mining recorder of that fact.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—So he does.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, he simply notifies them of his decision not to grant a renewal.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That would be all that would be necessary.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Such a person, knowing that the mining recorder of that particular district would refuse to grant him a renewal, might go into another district or camp and take up a claim, and by a series of removals in that way obtain all the advantages which an honest man would be entitled to.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—He has to notify all the other mining recorders.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The mining recorder does not notify the others, except he makes up his mind to refuse to grant a renewal. The knowledge of the misrepresentation should be conveyed.

On clause 91,

91. No person shall be granted or acquire a placer mine or any right therein, or carry on placer mining in the Yukon territory except in accordance with the provisions of this Act. This section shall not affect any rights which have already been acquired under the 'Regulations for the disposal of Mining Locations in the Yukon territory to be worked by the hydraulic or other mining process approved by order in council dated the third day of December, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight,' and amendments thereto, and shall not affect any rights which have been or which may hereafter be acquired under the 'Regulations governing the issue of leases to dredge for minerals in the beds of rivers in the Yukon territory,' approved by order in council dated the eighteenth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does the hon. gentleman know to what extent those exceptions would permit of operations there?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, but I will have it looked up to-morow before the third reading. I propose to add to that clause the following words: 'Or rights may otherwise have been granted.' That is to protect vested rights.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend from Moose Jaw know to what extent the applications for mining locations to be worked by hydraulic or other mining process would overlap the grants as to placer claims?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does it cover entirely different classes of grant?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Yes. There may be groups of placer mines, but they have been put under one claim for work.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is, placer mines that could be worked under the provisions of this Act?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hydraulic process would apply, from a practical standpoint, to those as well?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—Yes.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 92,

92. 'The Regulations governing Placer Mining in the Yukon Territory,' approved by order in council dated the thirteenth day of March, one thousand nine hundred and three, and 'The regulations for the disposal of the right to divert and use water from any stream or lake for mining purposes,' approved by order in council dated the third day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, and all amendments thereto, are hereby rescinded and repealed: Provided that in the case of valid and subsisting rights which have been granted for a fixed period under any of the said regulations this Act shall not apply to such rights until the termination of such period.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I propose to strike out the last five lines of this clause, and I propose to add after the words 'thereto' the following:

'Whether by ordinance or regulation of the Governor in Council.'

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has the department power to repeal and cancel all its own regulations?

Hon. Mr. ROSS—They have the power to pass ordinances as well as the orders in council, by the old Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What regulations are referred to there? Is it the regulations of this government or those of the Yukon council?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Regulations of the governor in council. It is just a safety clause.

The clause was adopted.

On schedule D,

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (British Columbia)—The first part of this schedule is the scale of prices to be charged for claims, and the last part of the schedule is for water, but there is nothing to indicate for what length of time the water is granted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—For the term, whatever it may be, whether for a year or 5 years.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Why is the charge for 5 years $70, and for one year $10.

Hon. Mr. ROSS—It is an advantage to the miner to have his claim for 5 years instead of one.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton)—From the committee, reported the Bill with amendments which were concurred in.

INTERPRETATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Moved the 2nd reading of Bill (171) An Act to amend the Interpretation Act. He said: In explaining this measure in the other Chamber, the Minister of Justice read a letter from his deputy, Mr. Newcombe, setting forth what was necessary. Four of the clauses are taken from the English Interpretation Act.

It is a very techincal interpretation. Clauses 1, 2, 5, and 6 are the clauses taken from the English Interpretation Act, and the other were suggested by Mr. Newcombe.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Moved the second reading of Bill (194) An Act to amend the Indian Act. He said:—This Bill authorizes the Supt. Gen. of Indian affairs, when the band have given their approval to the sale of a lot, to apportion to them 50 p.c. of the amount received instead of ten p.c. as the law now exists. The law is intended to apply in those cases where the land is not included in the reserve. In some of the older provinces there are Indian Lands which are not occupied by Indians, and it is desirable both in the interests of the band and the improvement of the lands in the neighbourhood that they should be sold and put into actual use. Where the Indians were only getting 10 p.c. to be divided at the moment among them they rather hesitated. They said there was no particular interest in doing it, they got such a trifling sum out of it that they did not care about selling it, and wished it to remain as it was. It was yielding nothing to the band, and it was thought more in the interests of the development of the country, and in many cases where the land is in the neighbourhood of cities, not occupied, not subject to assessment, which are a nuisance, people thought it would be better if they were sold and occupied.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is this money paid them in addition to the Treaty money ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes. When the Indian Lands are sold, the money is funded ; they only get 10 p.c. Supposing a lot was sold at $1,000, under the law as it now stands, $100 would be divided among the band, and the $900 would go into the fund. But now it is proposed to allow say $500 to be divided among the band and the other $500 to go in the fund.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This applies principally to the treaty Indians in the older provinces, does it not ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where they have had reserves not occupied, does this Bill give power to the government to sell these lands without the consent of the Indians ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no, the Indians must approve of the sale.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the only object of the Bill, I understand, is to make a division of the proceeds arising from the sale, giving 50 instead of 10 per cent to the Indians, and the other 50 per cent to be funded for the purposes indicated in the latter part of the clause ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—For the band.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The investment and management of the Indian funds is to be regulated by the Governor in Council. I understand from this that the 50 per cent is to be set apart, from time to time, to cover the costs incidental to the management of reserves, lands, property and moneys under the provisions of this Act, and may authorize and direct the expenditure of such moneys for surveys, for compensation to Indians for improvements or any interest they have in lands taken from them, for the construction or repairs of roads, bridges, ditches and watercourses on such reserves or lands, for the construction and repair of school buildings and charitable institutions, and by way of contribution to schools attended by such Indians. Is the interest on the other 50 per cent to be paid to the Indians annually or to be utilized for the purposes indicated in the latter portion of this clause ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The clause gives the head of the branch of the Indian Department very wide powers, enabling him to act according to the conditions in each case. In some cases it may be paid into the fund, or, if the band desire it, applied to building roads, bridges, churches, school-houses, &c.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But in all cases that has to be subject to the approval of the band ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Because in our section of the country the Indians are a very intelligent class of people, as well educated as any other portion of the community, and consequently would take the same interest in the preservation of their lands as the whites do.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CURRENCY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (196) An Act to amend the Act respecting the currency. He said : This Bill authorizes the Minister of Finance to redeem debased coins and coins that are worn.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask the hon. gentleman if the government has considered the question of calling in all the copper coin? We have an abundance of nickel now in Canada, and I noticed that in some other portions of the world nickel has been utilized for the smaller currency. It would be a very great advantage to this country if all the copper coin were called in and a new issue made composed to a very great extent of nickel. It would be a smaller coin, not so apt to be defaced, or deteriorate so rapidly in value as either silver or copper.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The subject has been referred to. I cannot say it has been actually considered with a view to entering upon it, but I have no doubt it will be as soon as the mint is finished. They are constructing the building pretty rapidly, and I have no doubt that will form one of the subjects that the government will take up.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second and third time and passed.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (200) An Act to amend the Militia Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does the present Act exclude the authority of the government to deal with imperial officers ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. The necessity for the two Bills arises in this way ; it was felt it would be an advantage if a portion of the regular troops that were stationed at Esquimalt and also at Halifax would be taken over, a certain number of officers and a certain number of men who were willing to join, and the provision here is made to meet those particular cases. One of the Acts provides that the term of service in the Imperial Army and the term of service in the Canadian Army, if you may so call it, shall count when the officers or men receive their pension from the Imperial Army.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This has nothing to do with pensions.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, but Bill 201 has. This has to do with the command.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What recognition will there be by the imperial authorities of the regulations which may be passed by this government ? It seems to me this can only be carried out by a recognition of our authority in this particular direction by the imperial government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The understanding is now that the imperial officers shall hold precedence over the Canadian officers—if they are of equal rank in the service.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is intended to place the Canadian officer, as I understand it by reading it hastily, in a position not inferior to an officer of the imperial army. If I understand, the practice in the past has been that where an imperial officer was in command, though of an inferior rank to a Canadian officer, he took precedence of him when they were on duty or off duty, and this is to give to the Canadian the position that the rank entitled him to as if he were of the imperial service. Is that the meaning of it ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the intention.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know that I object to this measure. On the contrary, I am quite satisfied that many Canadian officers in the volunteer forces have made it a study ; they have been to the military school, and some of them passed examinations and are quite equal to many of the officers that come from England. Many of the English officers have not had practical experience in the field, anymore than the Canadian officers, and therefore it is rather 'infra dig' to a Canadian officer holding a commission which is higher than that which is held by an officer from another portion of the empire to be superceded.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

MILITIA PENSION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (201) An Act to amend the Militia Pension Act. He said : This Bill provides that the time served in the regular forces may be counted, and the services in Canada also. They count consecutively with regard to officers, and time served with regard to non-commissioned officers and men will count the same. I explained both Bills together the other day. The measure simply provides that the time served in Canada and the time served in the imperial service shall go to the credit of either the officer or the non-commissioned officer or private when he gets his pension from the Imperial government.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And the proportion is paid by the Imperial governement for the time served in England.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And we pay the balance.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has there been any law placed on the statute-book providing for the pensioning of privates from the British army who join our volunteer force?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, they will be paid by the imperial service. But they will allow the time served in Canada to count, so that the men will be under no disadvantage. The time served in Canada will inure to their credit.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA ROAD ALLOWANCES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (202) An Act respecting roads and road allowances in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. He said: The object of this Bill is to transfer to Alberta anad Saskatchewan the road allowances. They will be vested in the Crown in the right of the provinces. That is practically the whole Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

DEBATE ADJOURNED.

The order of the day being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. David:—That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all petitions, resolutions or documents concerning the abolition or reorganization of the Senate.—(Hon. Mr. Ellis.)

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I move that the order of the day be discharged and placed on the orders of the day for Tuesday next, to be the first order after third readings.

The motion was agreed to.

FOREST RESERVES BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (47) An Act respecting Forest Reserves.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time to-morrow. He said: I presume hon. gentlemen are well aware of the purpose of this Bill. It is to set apart certain sections wherever the Crown, as represented by the federal government, own the land, probably in the railway belt of British Columbia and in certain districts in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, for the purpose of preserving the existing trees and growing additional ones, in order that there may be a forest reserve in those particular sections. It is considered, both for climatic reasons and for the purpose of preserving the level of our streams and rivers, that it is essential. The rivers take their rise, as a rule, in the woodland, and it is most desirable the water should not all flow away in the month of April or May, that it shall be preserved by the thickness of the trees in the locality.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I concur in that idea, but I would like to call the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that there is no reason why the same privilege, so far as it affects any argument based on the climatic causes, should not apply to the forest of New Brunswick. It is true the Crown lands belong to the province, but they are a source of wealth to the whole country. Some persons, including myself, made a representation based upon knowledge of the natural conditions upon the government of New Brunswick, giving reasons why they should set apart the forestry reserve there. They passed an Act, but have never put it into operation. The lumbermen are too powerful to allow that Act to go into operation, and in the meantime there is a deterioration going on with regard to the streams in the province. Now, if it is a good reason that there should be forest reserves—and undoubtedly there should be—in these other provinces, it applies also to the provinces which are not so well off as the provinces of the west. There is quite a migration yet from New Brunswick, owing to the falling off in the lumber trade. The principal export from New Brunswick is lumber, but the timber there is decaying so fast that the business is not as profitable as it was. The consequence is a large number of people leave the province yearly. I wish the government would extend its consideration to the maritime provinces, particularly where the lumber trade is so important. On the River St. John now the freshets are almost irresistible at times in consequence of the denudation of the river banks.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the Dominion government have power to set aside forest reserves in any of the provinces?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, we would have to buy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I realize, like the hon. gentleman, from experience in our own locality, the effect of removing the timber and cleaning up the land, and if the area to which the hon. gentleman refers is fit for cultivation, the same result would follow the clearing of the land and the removal of the timber from it.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—The case which was made out by the persons seeking this reservation was so good that the provincial government passed the law. Therefore it seems to me it is only necessary for the Dominion government to make a move in the matter and the logic of the case would compel the provincial government to do something. They would have to pay for the land, no doubt.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know what view the hon. Secretary of State takes of it, but it seems to me the Dominion government would have no power to compel the province of New Brunswick to enforce its own laws. They have no control over the province. It is a pity, under the circumstances to which the hon. gentleman refers, that something could not be done to preserve the streams; but if, as I indicated a few moments ago, they had the power and set aside these timber limits, or that section of the country, for a forest reserve and the land was fit for settlement, it would retard the settlement of the country. I know in my own section of the country when I was a boy we had water at all seasons of the year, but as the forests were removed and the land became settled and the swamps drained, the rapid thawing of the snow and ice in the early spring has created floods, and towards the end of the season there is very little water in the river.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I am afraid the settlement of New Brunswick is not proceeding so rapidly as the section of Ontario to which my hon. friend refers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would say to the hon. gentleman from St. John that the people of New Brunswick are on his showing singularly unfortunate in the government they have. It is a most extraordinary statement to make in this House that the local government will pass legislation of this character and yet not be able to enforce it. A provincial government that has no power to enforce its own statutes must be a remarkably weak and unprogressive government.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I would make no reflection on the government of New Brunswick. I merely state the fact that the government took power to put the law into operation when it pleased, and it has not yet seen fit to do so. Probably it considers the time has not arrived for it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—If this regulation is to be applied to the province of New Brunswick, it would be a good thing to extend it to British Columbia outside of the railway belt, because we have not been able to accomplish anything in this direction yet. We have not been able to stir up the provincial government to realize the value to the province of its timber resources.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When the forestry convention was held a few months ago, it was believed that the evidence of the great value of the forests, not only those under the control of the federal, but also those under the contol of the provincial authorities, would have been so manifest that public opinion would have forced the governments of the provinces to set apart forest lands for preservation in order to effect hereafter enormous benefits not only to the present but to coming generations. It was not contemplated that the federal government should be put to the enormous expense that would be involved in buying out interests that are now to a certain extent vested—that is the timber interest of the provinces of New Brunswick and Quebec. In Ontario they have appreciated the value of forests to a very great extent, and the provincial government has laid off pretty large areas of forest lands, and they are likely to continue that policy for some time to come, so that the country will be pretty well protected, because they recognize the absolute necessity of it. It is rather regrettable that the observations made by the hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to New Brunswick should go forth—that the people there are not sufficiently patriotic to protect the interests of their own province. It would be too large an undertaking, at all events for the present, for the Dominion to think of buying up the forest reserves of the various provinces.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (135) An Act respecting the Empire Trust Company, and to change its name to the Dominion Trust Company.

Bill (162) An Act respecting the Fiscal Year.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

IMMIGRATION AND IMMIGRANTS BILL

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (170) An Act respecting Immigration and Immigrants.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the second time to-morrow. He said: This is a consolidation of the Acts relating to immigration.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is a Bill that has occupied a good deal of time in the other House. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that it was simply a consolidation?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Consolidation and revision, making more stringent provisions to prevent undesirables coming to Canada.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Hear, hear; it is time something of the kind was done. The poll tax has been stricken out, has it not?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Friday, June 22, 1906.

The Senate met at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NORTHERN COMMERCIAL TELEGRAPH COMPANY BILL.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE CONSIDERED.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière), from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (139) An Act respecting the Northern Commercial Telegraph Company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—Before this is done I wish to move that the Bill be referred back to the committee for further consideration, because I find that there are not the usual protecting clauses, as I understand the matter, in this Bill which I think there should be.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—This Bill, as originally drafted, gave the company power to build in the direction of the Yukon, and, as a consequence, very little attention was paid to the insertion of restrictive clauses such as would have been included if the line were running through the more settled portions of Canada. My hon. friend finds that the restrictive clauses are missing, and I am sure that the promoters of the Bill, like the rest of us, are only anxious to see that legislation is made as uniform as possible.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would ask my hon. friend from Yale if he has looked into the statutes as to whether the exercise of the powers to be granted is safeguarded the same as in other Bills of a similar nature?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK—I have looked at the statute as it was passed in 1898 referring to this Bill in the first instance, and as far as I have been able to look into it I do not think it is safeguarded in the same way as other Bills we are putting through the House at the present time.

The amendment was agreed to.

RETIREMENT OF LIEUTENANT COLONEL HUDON.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. Was Lieutenant L. Denis Hudon in command of the 87th regiment of infantry in 1903 ?
2. Was he in that year, and on what date, put on the reserve list, and upon whose recommendation ?
3. Why did he not obtain an extension of command ?
4. Who replaced him in the command of the 87th regiment, and upon whose recommendation was this new appointment made ?
5. Since the name of Lieutenant-Colonel L. Denis Hudon was put upon the reserve of officers, has he been transferred from that list to the retired list ?
6. When and why ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answers are :

1. Lieut.-colonel L. D. Hudon was in command of the 89th Regiment, (not the 87th Regiment), in 1903.

2. Yes, from May 2, 1903, on the expiration of his tenure of command.

3. Because there was no special reason for extending it.

4. Major J. A. Gilbert, the senior major of the regiment, who was strongly recommended for the promotion by the district officer commanding, succeeded to the command of the 89th Regiment.

5. Yes.

6. On January 16, 1906, he having reached the age limit.

DISMISSAL OF LIEUTENANT-COLONEL RAY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before the House, a copy of the correspondence exchanged between the Department of Militia and Defence and any person whomsoever on the subject of the dismissal of Lieutenant-Colonel W. I. Ray from the command of the 8th regiment, royal rifles ?

The motion was agreed to.

SAWDUST IN THE OTTAWA RIVER.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER rose to :

Direct the attention of the Government to the fact that certain saw-mills in the neighbourhood of Ottawa continue to throw sawdust and mill-refuse into the River Ottawa ; inquired whether it is the intention of the minister and within whose department this contravention of the law falls to cause this state of things to cease ?

He said : This question has been repeatedly brought before this House and brought to the attention of the government by our late lamented colleague (Hon. Mr. Clemow) the senator for Ottawa. What he was unable to do through long persistent and energetic efforts, I do not believe I will myself be able to effect, but as some of the mill-owners around Ottawa continue to transgress the law with impunity I simply desire to enter my protest against this difference in the application of our laws, or some of our laws, as between the wealthy and the non-wealthy. Has it come to pass hon. gentleman that while mill-owners all through the Dominion, small mill-owners, are coerced to abide by the law, to burn the refuse and sawdust, the Ottawa plutocrats are to be left unmolested while breaking the law ? Has it come to pass that the plutocracy in this country is to enjoy privileges which men who are not wealthy are not to enjoy ? Last week while cruising on the river here I felt scandalized at the state of things which exists. I simply wish once again to call the attention of the government to the facts. I consider such open violation of the law to be immoral. If it cannot be enforced it would be better to repeal it. Then everybody will be on the same footing ; but if the law is in existence, for the honour of this country let it be law for all, for the rich as well as for the poor.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I brought this subject under the notice of the Minister of Public Works who is charged with looking after the river, and he said he was not aware that the law was being encroached upon. His attention had not been called to it, and no complaints had been made this year. Mr. Booth, who is, I presume, the chief sinner, has built a very extensive incinerator, and it was thought that he was consuming all the rubbish and edgings in this incinerator.

but I think that is a mistake, for sawdust still finds its way into the river. For 25 or 30 years this subject has been brought up in this Chamber, but we do not seem to have made much headway. When I was on the other side of the House I brought it to the attention of the government of the day, but it seemed there were difficulties in the way of enforcing the law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. Secretary of State might with great propriety have pointed out to the hon. gentleman from Acadie (Hon. Mr. Poirier) that if the hon. gentleman from Toronto should succeed in getting his Bill (No. 122) through parliament respecting a patent which has for its object the making of sugar and alcohol out of sawdust, this great abuse would not continue much longer. No doubt we shall in the near future have a proposition made to the government on the part of manufacturers to buy up the Ottawa river to extract these commodities from the sawdust.

STANDARD APPLE BARREL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired :

Do the government intend to introduce a bill at this session of parliament to provide that an apple barrel of uniform dimensions and size shall be used in Canada, as recommended by the conference of representatives from the various fruit growers' associations, held in Ottawa, in March last ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The subject of this inquiry comes under the jurisdiction of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is absent, through illness. I asked the Minister of Agriculture whether he was familiar with the subject and whether he knew of anything that was being done. He said he did not understand that any recommendation had been made at the recent convention. He thought the subject had been discussed, and that it was favourably regarded, but that no resolution was passed at the time calling on the government to introduce legislation during the present session. I think he fully appreciates the importance of it, but I am afraid at this period of the session it will be impossible to do anything more.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My information, as gathered at the time from gentlemen attending the meeting, is that a resolution was arrived at recommending the government to adopt the barrel that is now designated in the Act as the barrel of capacity for Canada. I was given to understand that that resolution was arrived at. Of course the resolution, if it was passed, would have been communicated to the Department of Inland Revenue. It is that department which would deal with this subject, not the Department of Trade and Commerce or the Department of Agriculture.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will inquire from Mr. Brodeur and let my hon. friend know on Monday or Tuesday.

NAVIGATION OF HUDSON BAY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to direct the attention of the Chamber to a report which has been made, or rather an extract from the report of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, which I think should be put before the public so that attention may be drawn to it. There is a good deal of attention directed now to the question of the navigation of Hudson bay, and if this report of Superintendent Moody is allowed to go unchallenged, it may injure projects which are now before the public. I do not think the report is correct. On its face it is a foolish report. Here is what he says :

Passing through Hudson strait, the 'Neptune' kept north of Chas Island, and land was made some 30 miles east of Cape Wolstenholme at 11.30 p.m. on the 4th.

That is the 4th October.

At 7 p.m., on the 5th, rounded north end of Mansfield, and set course for Churchill.

That is the northeast part of Hudson bay, and Churchill is on the southwest of Hudson bay, so his route took a direction from the northeast of the bay down to the southwest of the bay. He continues :

On the 6th the sun was only visible for about 5 minutes and no sights were obtained. At 4.15 a.m., on the 7th, position by dead reckoning being lat. 60·20 N. long. 86·50 W. (almost in the centre of Hudson's bay), we struck heavily on reefs, pounding over them for 15 minutes. The morning was pitch dark with snow squalls. After apparently getting inside the reef, vessel again struck three times. The captain kept her as nearly as possible in position until dawn when the seas could be seen breaking on the reefs all around us. He then took her through the only visible channel with barely water to take us through. Wind increased to strong from S.E. by E. true, with heavy short seas. Weather thick with frequent squalls of snow and sleet. Vessel's head was kept to wind, engines going slow. Morning of 8th was fairly clear, course S.W. by S., engines going slow.

Now all this was supposed to happen in the middle of Hudson bay, while he was steering his course in a southwesterly direction. He continues :

Just before noon the sun appeared for a short time and a sight was obtained giving us the latitude of Marble Island, which was sighted at 5·30 p.m.

But Marble island is in the northwest corner of Hudson bay, so it is quite impossible that this report could be true or that that vessel could have at latitude 60 and longitude 86.50. After leaving Mansfield he must have directed his ship to Marble island, because if he said he went south—and he maintains he was still going south—how could he waken one morning in the northwest corner of the bay. I call attention to this report which is manifestly untrue. There are no reefs in the middle of Hudson bay.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The fine old crusted port may have been the trouble about that time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is it possible the latitude was substituted for longitude ?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, it could not be. If he was going in the direction he says he was going, he could not have gone to Marble island.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He was sailing north by south.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The vessel must have been going backward. I call attention to this, because it might injure a project which is very much debated at this time, the navigation of Hudson bay, and it is in the public interest that such a manifest error should be brought to the attention of the government.

MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF RIMOUSKI BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER moved the third reading of (Bill 88) An Act respecting La Compagnie d'Assurance Mutuelle contre le feu des Comtés de Rimouski, Témiscouata et Kamouraska, and to change its name to La Compagnie d'Assurance contre l'incendie de Rimouski, as amended.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to call the attention of the House to two or three phases of this Bill which, in my opinion, constitute this measure as most outrageous legislation. In Rimouski a company has been in existence known as the Mutual Company of Rimouski. Every insurance taken there is on a deposit note for a certain amount, which becomes the property of the company, and every year for 5 years 20 per cent of the note is collected. They do not wait until a fire occurs before making a collection. The money thus collected is deposited, and forms a reserve fund. This fund amounts to $100,000. A law had been passed by the local legislature of Quebec first fixing the amount of this reserve fund at $50,000, and no company was allowed to have a higher reserve fund. I am told that two or three years ago an amendment to the law was made increasing the reserve fund to $100,000. This Bill purports to create in that mutual company a new company which will be a stock company. New subscribers will step in and subscribe stock, and that stock will constitute then a company within the company, and clause 15 of this Bill provides that the annual profits of the company, not including the premium or deposit notes which are reserved for future losses, shall be applied first to setting aside a dividend upon the paid-up capital, and shall be paid to the credit of the shareholders. I call attention to the fact that the dividend will be paid to the stockholders, and not the mutual members. Those dividends have been created by those who deposited notes under the mutual system, but this Bill proposes to take that money and pay it in the form of dividends to the stockholders. That is, it takes the earnings of those people and gives them to those who subscribe stock. The clause reads as follows :

15. The net annual profits and gains of the company (not including the premium or deposit notes) shall be applied, first, to setting aside a dividend upon the paid-up capital, which dividend shall be placed to the credit of the said shares respectively, and such dividend shall not be paid to the holders of such shares so long as such amount does not reach twenty-five per cent of the par value, but such dividend shall be then paid to the holders of the said shares, that is to say, when the amount at their credit reaches one-half of the capital subscribed, including the twenty-five per cent paid by the shareholders themselves, after which the dividend may be paid to the shareholders by resolution of the directors, and the balance of the said profits, if any, shall be carried to a reserve fund or to profit and loss account, or to both of them, in order to provide for future contingencies.

So they have a right to apply all the profits and gains of the company to paying dividends to the shareholders—that is to say, to one class of members of the company. If I were to do a thing like that somebody might call me a robber. I regard it as legalized robbery. If there are any dividends to be paid they should go to all the members of the association and not to a special class, as is done in this case, and especially the members who have not contributed in any way up to the present time to the creation of the reserve fund or of the profits now accumulating and which are to be paid in dividends. I see by the report of this year to which I refer that the profits in that small company for that one year were $36,000 odd, and they have already cashed as profits $62,239.86. They have in force about 20,000 policies, with a deposit of $376,000. I think it is time that the attention of this House should be called to such dealings so that they will be prepared to go into the matter again and to settle things right. If they want to divide those profits let them be divided between all the members of the association and not amongst a certain class of members. For that reason I move that this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee for further consideration.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—I will answer in a few words the remarks which have been made by my hon. friend. The Bill has been extensively discussed before the committee of the other House and has also been discussed at two sittings of the Committee on Banking and Commerce here, and, after a full discussion, where the arguments on the two sides were presented with a great deal of force, the committee decided to make a favourable report. There is one amendment which the promoters have accepted, that this Bill will not come into force except after a meeting of all the policy-holders of this company and a resolution adopted by a majority of these policy-holders under the mutual system. The committee in adopting this amendment thought that it would give all possible safety and security to everybody. The promoters of this Bill represent evidently the great majority—because they would not be here if they did not—of those interested in this company. They represent the policy-holders. They represent the directors who have been elected annually by the policy-holders, and I do not see that there can be any danger as to the rights of the policy-holders when you have put a clause in this Bill that this law will only take effect when the policy-holders approve of it. If they are not satisfied with the enactment of this measure they need not accept. They will pass a resolution by which they will express their dissatisfaction and the Bill will not come into force. This clause has been introduced into the Bill for the reason that the promoters did not wish to do any injustice to the policy-holders. You can understand the law which has been adopted to carry this out. This is a mutual insurance company, incorporated under a statute of the province of Quebec. They now desire to extend their business and wish to be brought under the insurance laws of Canada. They also wish to get permission to enter into another branch of insurance business. They are not asking the right to form a new company, it is the same company which will continue to exist, but besides being a mutual fire insurance company they wish to do insurance business at fixed premium rates and to extend their operations outside the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—They had that right before.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER—If we look at clause 1 of the Bill it will be found that all interests are protected. The clause reads as follows :

1. La Compagnie d'Assurance Mutuelle contre le feu des Comtés de Rimouski, Témiscouata et Kamouraska, hereinafter called 'the Company', as now organized and constituted under the statutes mentioned in the preamble, is declared to be a body corporate and politic within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada ; and this Act and the Insurance Act shall, upon the company obtaining a license under the Insurance Act, apply to the company and its business, instead of the Acts mentioned in the preamble : Provided that nothing in this section shall affect anything done, any right or privilege acquired, or any liablity incurred under any of the above mentioned Acts up to and at the time of the passing of this Act, to all of which rights and privileges the company shall continue to be entitled, and to all of which liabilities the company shall contnue to be subject.

This shows, as well as the other clause which I cited before, that all rights are amply protected. My learned friend says that the reserve fund ought to be distributed. This company does not want to be put into liquidation, it wants to do more business, and we want the reserve fund which now exists to remain where it is for the protection of those who will continue to do business under the mutual system, and, besides that, the company will require some funds to make a deposit in the hands of the Dominion Treasurer in order to do insurance business under the laws of the Dominion of Canada. For all these reasons I think the report of the committee ought to be sustained.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I would have no objection at all to the incorporation of a new company for insurance business if it was done under ordinary circumstances. But as the present Bill stands, I strongly object to it. If the members of the old Mutual Rimouski Company want to form a new company they have a perfect right to do so. They can form a new company among the policy-holders in the old company and act independently of the old company. But the great objection that I have to the present Bill is that the new company will have the right to deprive the policy-holders of the reserve fund which is in the hands of the old company at the present moment. I see by the last report of the company that they held in cash $65,239.86. The profits of last year were $33,000, forming a total of over $100,000. Every policy-holder has a right to a portion of that reserve fund. Even if the great majority of the policy-holders would pass a by-law to deprive one single policy-holder of his right, I believe it would not be just. The endeavor of the mutual company is to insure for the smallest amount possible. It is true that a uniform charge is made wherever a man is asking for insurance, but the intent of the law is that the man who makes a deposit of a promissory note will not be assessed more than is necessary. We see that during the year 1905, the company has paid $46.000 for losses. They had last year a surplus of $33,000, making a total surplus, as I said before, of $95,000 to $100,000. I believe that a policy-holder of the old company has a right to say this: I am insured for five years. I have paid two assessments, now the company does not require the balance of my deposit note, and I have a right to ask that instead of paying 20 per cent every year the company should reduce my payment to 15 or 10 per cent provided, with the amount assessed, there is enough to pay for all damages caused in each year by fire; but instead of that, the organizers of the new company, who are members of the old Rimouski Mutual Company, want to form a new company, to have two companies in one. Do they ask to put their own money into the new company, and draw the benefits only on the money they so invest in the new company? No, they ask the right by this Bill to use funds of the old Mutual Company to pay dividends for the new stockholders. I believe that when the question is fully discussed in this House the opinion of the members of the Senate will be strongly against such a provision. It is true they say that the proxies are given to certain members of the company to vote at the general meeting, but we know very well how that is done. A member of the company will send proxies to different policy-holders who do not take much interest in these matters, and who do not understand really what is the meaning of what is asked from them. When all these proxies are secured, the directors are in a position to do according to their own wishes. By clause 15 of the present Act, the stockholders of the new company will be entitled to two-thirds of the directors in the two companies, so that the directors representing the old company will have no say and no show. For these considerations I hope that the Senate will reject this Bill.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—As a member of the Banking and Commerce Committee I wish to say that we spent several hours at three different times upon this Bill. We heard all the arguments for and against it, and I am perfectly satisfied it is only right and just to pass it as it is. I am satisfied that under the various clauses of the Bill the rights of the policy-holders and the shareholders will be protected. I draw attention to the form of clause 4, which reads as follows :

All acts lawfully done, and all contracts, agreements and instruments in writing heretofore lawfully made, entered into or executed by or on behalf of the company, or in relation thereto, with respect to the undertaking of the company, under the authority of any of the Acts mentioned in the preamble, are confirmed and declared to be valid and binding upon the company and upon all other parties thereto.

That amendment moved in the committee was—

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The amendment moved in the committee does not bear on the case at all.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY—Yes, it protects all the policy-holders. They have to hold a meeting before this Bill becomes law. I think it is only right to give to these people the power they want under this Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It must strike every hon. gentleman how exceedingly inconvenient it is, and how unparliamentary, if I may use the expression, after a measure has been referred to a standing committee and has been fully considered in that committee, to discuss the details in the House. The presumption is that the report of the committee is right. This Bill, in the form in which it went to the committee, appeared to protect the interests of the policy-holders pretty satisfactorily. But the committee went further than the original Bill, and they inserted the following provision at the beginning of clause 12 :

So soon as the policy-holders under the mutual system shall have given their consent by a resolution carried by those present or represented by proxy at a special meeting duly called for that purpose and the shares have been subscribed, and so on.

Then the new work of the company can go on. If the policy-holders express their satisfaction with the action as proposed to be taken, surely it is not the part of this House to undertake to say they shall not have the right to do so, and the company shall not have the right to go on with the work under this charter?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would have no objection at all to withdraw my motion if the policy-holders were to be consulted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They are.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But we know what those proxies mean.

The House divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following division:

FRANKLIN MONTGOMERY GRAY PATENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto) moved the third reading of Bill (122) An Act respecting certain patents of Franklin Montgomery Gray.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved in amendment:

That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by substituting for the words 'twenty-second day of March, one thousand nine hundred and six,' the words 'the date of the passing of this Act' wherever they occur in the second clause of the Bill.

He said: I do not wish to say anything of the merits of the Bill, because the measure has been discussed, but I wish to make one observation, that I am informed by the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Jones) that one of the promoters of the Bill who is here has no objection to the adoption of this amendment.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—I am a little surprised to hear the statement made by the hon. gentleman. If it was his intention to make it he should have done me the courtesy to refer me to those from whom he had heard it. I have not heard such a statement, and I know of no reason why it should have been made. I am sure if Hon. Mr. Jones had known of it he would have mentioned it to me, but he has not done so. I am quite sure that the hon. gentleman who has heard it has got that impression from something stated to him or he would not have made the statement here, but it is not one which should be made on the floor of the Senate for the purpose of influencing a vote. The gentleman who is alleged to have made the statement—I do not know whether he made it or not—probably knew nothing about it and did not understand the circumstances. I am therefore entirely taken by surprise. After all, it is not a question of what he said about it. The question is one of what the merits call for and what in fairness and in justice should be incorporated in an Act of parliament. This Bill was deliberately considered in the committee to which it was referred. It was the subject of discussion as to what this date should be. The promoter was represented there by his representative who stated the case. The question was brought up by the hon member from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Jones) who is not here, and was discussed by him and by the representative of the promoter, and the position then taken was one of entire antagonism. The promoter most distinctly stated the importance to him of this patent being protected, as far as possible from any kind of invasion whatever. After consideration and after hearing all that could be said about it, the committee accepted the Bill in the form in which it is, and that being so, the hon. gentleman at all events should not oppose it. I could state no higher authority than the hon. gentleman himself on this point. A few moments ago he said he was entirely opposed to interfering with Bills which had received the deliberate consideration of a committee, and it was our duty when a Bill was referred to a committee to let them deal with the matter, so I have no doubt whatever that, on reflection, he will agree with that view. At all events, if he does not he will not agree with himself. As to the merits of the matter, the whole position is this ; the applicant gave notice of intention to apply for this Bill. He presented his petition on the date mentioned in the Bill and having presented the petition in that way, parliament from that moment was seized of the Bill and it is for parliament to say whether, under these circumstances, if by any chance any person had commenced to manufacture, they should be encouraged in doing that or whether they should not be given to understand that once the Bill was before parliament, parliament would deal with it, and they could manufacture at their peril. Under the circumstances, I leave the matter entirely to the Senate to say whether the date which has been fixed in this case, after hearing the parties discuss the subject, should be sustained or not.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—With reference to Mr. Jones, I saw him last night, and he made an arrangement with me to pair with him, and never hinted about such an arrangement or I would have been very glad to have agreed to any change that he thought best. It is of the utmost importance that this Bill should go through now, because any delay might prevent its passage at this late hour of the session. It is the most important private Bill that has come before the Senate. If it be true that the company can do what they claim, if they can convert this sawdust which has been such a nuisance into a marketable commodity, it will be a public boon. The nuisance is one which heretofore nobody has been able to remedy. No matter what authority is brought against it, sawdust is still thrown into the beautiful Ottawa, destroying its beauty as well as its utility and endangering people's lives from the explosions which occur occasionally in the river. Anything which would have a tendency to convert what is now a nuisance into useful commodities should receive the most careful consideration of the House. Now this process seems to be almost magical. By adding a certain chemical, sulphurous acid, to the sawdust, they convert it into glucose, and from that alcohol is manufactured, 27 gallons of alcohol being produced from a ton of sawdust. But that is not the whole of the story ; the residue, after the alcohol is taken from it, is made into small bricks and these bricks are converted into charcoal.

My informant tells me it is the best kind of charcoal, and they have an offer from England or from the United States, I do not remember which, to take all the charcoal they can manufacture. In view of that, I do not think the hon. gentleman would himself try to imperil so important a motion or to delay it. They have spent $400,000 on this process, and I think if ever there was a case which ought to receive the favourable consideration of the Senate, it is this. I hope nothing will occur to prevent the Bill passing.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If I thought that the adoption of the resolution which has just been moved was going to imperil the passage of the Bill I should not persist in it, but it is simply to make a very small amendment in one clause of the Bill, an amendment which will, as a matter of course, be concurred in by the other House, and, inasmuch as we are safe to be here for another fortnight, I do not think there is the slightest risk of the Bill being lost. The hon. gentleman from Toronto who has the Bill in charge seemed to think that I had been guilty of some very remarkable breach of courtesy inasmuch as I did not mention to him the fact that I had been told that Mr. George had expressed his willingness to have this amendment made. I had given my notice that I was going to move this amendment at the third reading, and, honestly, I did not realize that I was guilty of any want of courtesy in not communicating a fact which had been communicated to me by the other hon. gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Jones) who was obliged to leave here in order to go down to Montreal. I have every confidence in the veracity of the Hon. Mr. Jones and I take his statement as being correct. He gave me the name of the gentleman who made the statement to him, and he told me quite distinctly what the statement was, so that it is just a question for the House to consider. Further, there is a great deal of force in what the hon. gentleman says about our agreeing with the recommendation of the committee, but this case is somewhat exceptional. We have recently had a discussion which lasted for some considerable time on this subject of extending patents, and I gathered that the general sentiment of the House was against interfering with the rights of persons who had begun to manufacture or to sell the patented article before the passing of the Act. Now, if any one has begun to manufacture or to deal in this article between the 22nd of March and the date when this Act passes, his rights should be protected. That is the only point, and that seemed to be the general sentiment of the House. It was because a general principle was involved that I moved the amendment; it was really not specially with reference to this particular Bill.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I am not familiar with the subject before the House, and will not undertake to deal with it further than to say this: The hon. gentleman from Kingston referred to sawdust being poured into the Ottawa river. As one who is engaged in the lumber business, I wish to say that I am not aware of any mills about Ottawa putting sawdust into the river. In the use of water power mills it is physically impossible to hinder a small proportion of sawdust falling into the river, but there is not the hundredth part of one per cent of the sawdust which is produced going into the stream to-day. A great deal of sawdust is now being burned up and goes to waste. If there is any means by which it can be turned into a valuable product, it is certainly in the interests of the country that such should be done. I believe it is possible that it can be done, and I hope sincerely that this legislation will have the desired effect.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is something that has been overlooked in this case. The petition presented to parliament was presented, I think, on the 22nd of March. The revival of the patent will not destroy any right whatever on the part of any person who has manufactured in that line since the date of the patent up to the 22nd of March. Any man who has entered into that line of manufacturing may continue. But when the petition was presented here, and when the notices were given in the newspapers, it might happen that the fact of publishing the notice of intention to revive the patent, or the fact of bringing a petition before parliament, might have impressed somebody who, without that, would never have gone into the business. If those people who went into the business after that date were led to do so by reason of the petition being brought before parliament, I do not think it would be right that they should be protected, or that we should prevent the applicant from having his patent from the date mentioned. That is the point I want to make and I think it is but justice. The same thing is found when application is made for a patent. You go to the department and you take out what is called a caveat. As soon as the caveat is issued nobody can exercise the rights which you have not yet, but which you intend to take by the patent; and in this case the notice given by the parties wanting to revive their patents might be taken as a simple caveat and put the petitioner in the same position.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—I have no desire whatever to oppose this Bill, but I am very much afraid that the precedent set by our adopting this Bill will be referred to in coming years, and others will come here for the revival of patents, possibly for valuable articles which they are manufacturing, the patent for which they have allowed to lapse. Take for instance a valuable article, such as a range heating apparatus, for which a man holds a patent. He perhaps makes up his mind that he will not renew the patent. Some one else puts up a large establishment for the purpose of producing this very thing which he has been producing under a patent for many years. The moment he starts to do that, the man that owned the patent makes up his mind that he will apply to parliament for a renewal of his patent. The other man goes on, erects his mill. The owner of the patent comes to parliament and asks for a renewal of the patent. Supposing we suggest he shall take it from the date that parliament passes the Bill, but he says I gave notice on the 22nd of March last, and I want it now confirmed from that date. I think that in that way injustice may be done to some. I am afraid that the precedent which we are establishing by the passage of this Bill will be made a basis for the enactment of many other Bills reviving patents in the same way. I am afraid of the precedent; I have not the slightest doubt others will take advantage of it. They will say we did it in such a case; that we revived a patent excluding all that did not commence work prior to the date of the notice; why therefore should we not do the same for them.

The amendment was declared lost on division.

The Bill was then read a third time and pased.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (198) An Act respecting the British America Assurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (199) An Act respecting the Western Assurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

PENITENTIARIES BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (176) An Act respecting Penitentiaries.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—For the information of the Senate as we proceed I will be glad to announce whether a change has been made and to what extent, and it will save reading the particular clause. I may say that the principle change has been in reference to simplifying the administration under the present Bill. The Governor in Council has the right to appoint the warden and deputy warden and the minister appoints all other officers. Then the salaries have been increased, and the increase in the salaries in the aggregate amounts to 14 per cent, but the general increase of the whole cost of the penitentiary has been diminished, making an increase of only 6 per cent. I may say that provision is made for a penitentiary for the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, the penitentiary to be located at Edmonton. I have one of the inspectors here who will give us any additional information the House may want.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does it apply to all penitentiaries?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it is general.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend know what has been done with reference to establishing a penitentiary at Edmonton?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The appropriation has been taken and the penitentiary has been built, and it will be open on the first of July next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman stated that the warden of the penitentiary is to be appointed by the government, but that the Minister of Justice has virtually the appointment of all the other officers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The warden and the deputy warden are appointed by order in council. The power of the minister is limited to the appointment of officers in the penitentiary. The officers outside, such as inspectors and officials of that kind, are appointed by order in council.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The minister would have the appointment of guards ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, and instructors and other officers within the penitentiary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not sure that that is a good policy, but it is following the principle that has been guiding the government since it came into power. That is, governing by the minister instead of by the cabinet. As a consequence, we find many Bills brought before parliament emanating from the minister without the knowledge and consent of the cabinet. The cabinet become responsible for the action of the minister without having considered or even knowing anything about the measures introduced by the minister. I am not particular in this case, so long as the higher officers, such as the surgeons, chaplains, wardens and deputy wardens are appointed by the government and not by the minister.

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no change in this clause, except that hospitals and asylums are omitted. They are now under the control of the provincial authorities.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 6,

This clause is a recast to define the territory of Alberta. That is the only change.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I notice that the Alberta penitentiary is to be used apparently for both provinces?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understand that the jail at Regina was, by statute, made a penitentiary, or was it by order in council ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Regina jail will be handed over to the province of Saskatchewan, and some provision will have to be made for Alberta. I do not know how that has been arranged.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would like an explanation to be given to line 26, which describes Alberta penitentiary being for Alberta and Saskatchewan and for all that part of the territories of Canada except the Yukon. What will be the status of the Regina jail which, up to the present time, has been used as a penitentiary ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it has been used as a jail.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It will revert to its former status of a jail and not a penitentiary?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it will be handed over to the provincial government on the 1st July.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not quite understand the description of the territories attached to each of the penitentiaries, but my recollection is that some few years ago when the Hon. Mr. Mills was in this House, part of the province of Ontario was attached to the Manitoba pentitentiary. Does that still remain?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no ; it does not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then this law must change it, because I remember very well that we made that provision; it was shown the district around Rat Portage was very much nearer to Manitoba than to Kingston, and I remember having quite a tilt with the hon. gentleman who then led this House over this very subject. He lost his temper.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend has a good memory. It was proposed, I am told, but never carried out.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We made it the law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There has been no change in that part of the paragraph. The clause reads: 'The penitentiary situated near the city of Kingston, in the province of Ontario, known as the Kingston penitentiary.' That is the penitentiary for the whole of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That law was absolutely ignored in practice, and now it ceases to be the law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What is the 102nd west meridian, to be found in lines 24 and 25 of section 6? That is the boundary of the Manitoba penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the boundary between the territories and Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, but we do not know it by that description. There is the first principal meridian, the second, third, fourth and fifth.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the one hundred and second degree of west longitude.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That may be, but it is certainly not the meridian. It may possibly be the territory east of the second meridian that is in the mind of the department.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the description of the various meridians in Manitoba there is some evident confusion. That is the meridian west from Greenwich, the regular meridian which divides Manitoba from the territories.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You will find none of the authorities there counting from Greenwich as to meridians. We had better adopt the survey which is recognized under our Dominion Lands Act for all boundary purposes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—For the purpose of the Dominion Lands Act my hon. friend is right, and that is known to everybody in the territories. It would be a confusion to introduce references to Greenwich.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think it is clearly a mistake.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The eastern boundary is described as the western boundary of the province of Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The second meridian is the easterly boundary of Saskatchewan. My hon. friend will find that in clause 2 of the Saskatchewan Act, chapter 42.

This comment might be made with reference to divisions. Apparently the Manitoba penitentiary, which I fancy will be quite as large, if not larger than the Alberta penitentiary, will be exclusively used for the province of Manitoba. It is proposed now to erect a penitentiary in Edmonton, for the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, The population of those two provinces is very much greater than the population of Manitoba, and the territory is many times larger. The population of either of those two provinces will, within the next four or five years, be far in excess of the population of Manitoba. It seems to me, therefore, that this is a very unwise arrangement to make, unless it is contemplated in the near future to build a penitentiary for Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The next clause gives the Governor in Council power to change those boundaries, and the Governor in Council will therefore be able to provide for such altered circumstances as are almost certain to take place.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 11,

11. Every street, highway or thoroughfare of any kind along or across which it is necessary or convenient that convicts should pass in going to or returning from their work, or upon which it may be deemed necessary or expedient that convicts should be employed, shall be considered, while so used, as a portion of the tract of land forming the penitentiary; and every escape, or attempt at escape, and every rescue, or aid in rescue, which takss place on such street, highway or thoroughfare, while so used, or on or from any wharf, boat, scow, or other vessel which a penitentiary is by this Act declared to include, shall have the same effect as if such escape or attempt at escape, or such rescue, or aid in rescue, had taken place within the prison walls or penitentiary limits.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend state what superior rights can be exercised by the guards and other officers in contradistinction to what may be exercised on other highways?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It removes any question as to any liberty the convict might have by being on a highway.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If a convict should attempt to escape on a highway, even though that were not within the confines of a penitentiary, the officials could exercise all the powers necessary for recapturing, and so on.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is to make it clear that they have the same absolute power there that they would have within the walls of the penitentiary.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 13,

13. The construction and repairs of buildings and other works in the penitentiaries shall be under the control of the minister.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have the Public Works no authority with reference to these buildings? This goes beyond repairs and includes the construction of buildings.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Once the Public Works completes a building and hands it over, that department has nothing more to do with it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But my hon. friend will see that the construction of such buildings is under the authority of the Minister of Justice. The word 'construction' would cover the erection in the first instance of any building, even the penitentiary. You transfer that power in its entirety to the Minister of Justice. It seems to me that the Department of Justice will not have the proper machinery for erecting a penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have nothing to do with the erecting of a penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Under this clause they certainly have. That is to say, you give to the Minister of Justice now, under this clause, precisely the same power that has been exercised hitherto by the Department of Public Works.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is not contemplated. It is intended to apply to buildings within the walls—the minor buildings—because once the Public Works complete and hand over the main building they cease to have anything further to do with it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Pardon me, hereafter that will not be the law. Section 10 of the old Act reads as follows:

The construction and repairs of buildings and other works in the penitentiaries shall be under the control of the Minister of Public Works.

Now you enact that they shall be under the control of the minister. Who is the minister? Under the interpretation clause the minister is the Minister of Justice, so that you are re-enacting the old clause, but you transfer to the Minister of Justice the authority to carry out the works.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been going on for years. They build whatever wings and additions are required. The moment the original building is completed, it is handed over by the Public Works Department and all minor works are performed by the penitentiary after that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then they have been contravening the existing Act. Surely it is not intended that the Minister of Justice shall supersede the Minister of Public Works, and proceed to erect penitentiaries as well as to make repairs to buildings and other works in the penitentiary?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is governed by clause 3.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There can be no doubt whatever that the hon. gentleman from Calgary is right. If we pass this law, and a new wing had to be constructed it would have to be done by the Minister of Justice. Supposing it is decided by the Department of Justice that a wing, equivalent perhaps in value to the whole building as it stands, should be added. Does it follow that the Department of Justice shall proceed to erect it? If so, where is the staff to do it. No provision is made for an architect.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have been enlarging penitentiaries, I am sorry to say, as the number of convicts increases, and the Public Works Department have had nothing to do with that branch of the work for many years.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend look at the amendment to the Penitentiary Act of 1895. It reads as follows:

The construction and repairs of buildings and other works in the penitentiaries shall be under the control of the Minister of Public Works except in cases where, in the opinion of the Minister of Justice, such works can be performed by convict labour.

Hitherto the only works which have been under the authority of the Minister of Justice have been such as can be performed by convict labour.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If my hon. friend thinks the clause should be redrafted, I will call the attention of the Department of Justice to it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend will direct the attention of the Department of Justice to clause 13, they cannot say anything else than that it vests in the Department of Justice the entire authority to construct penitentiaries as well as to do other subsidiary works.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It does not refer to the original building.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What did it mean in the original Act? It is word for word taken from the original Act, except the Minister of Justice supersedes the Minister of Public Works. If the word 'construction' applied to the original building in the original Act, then surely it applies with equal force in the present case.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All I can say is that the moment a penitentiary building is handed over, as the Alberta building will be handed over on the 1st July next, all additions and improvements will be absolutely under the control of the Department of Justice.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That seems to be perfectly right with regard to repairs where convict labour can do it, but as regards the penitentiaries in the west where new wings will undoubtedly be necessary, I think it is absurd to say that convict labour will be available or suitable. There certainly should be provision that the Public Works shall have control when it comes to a matter of that kind, and I think my hon. friend should hold the clause over for further consideration. If the Minister of Public Works were to know of it, I am inclined to think he would regard it as an infringement on his jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At the Kingston penitentiary, they are making additions all the time, putting up buildings and adding wings, all done by convict labour.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is within the Act—anything that can be done by convict labour; but the construction of a penitentiary in the first instance—does not my hon. friend see that he is taking power to enter upon the construction of penitentiaries?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No change is contemplated.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Looking at the list of officials, for instance, in the Alberta penitentiary, I do not find any one who would be an official competent to act as architect for the construction of a wing which may perhaps cost $50,000. Neither the warden or the deputy warden would be competent, nor would the matron, I presume. Then we have the Protestant and Roman Catholic chaplain, the surgeon, the accountant, the storekeeper, baker, hospital steward, school instructor, engineer and blacksmith instructor, chief trade instructor, keepers, guards, watchmen, &c.—no provision is made for any official who could be capable of taking charge of the erection of a wing of the penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—It appears to me that the building when first constructed would be under the control of the Minister of Public Works. After it is completed and ready to be handed over to the Department of Justice, the Minister of Justice assumes the responsibility of keeping the building in repair, and employs convict labour for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Supposing an expensive wing has to be added, what then?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—He will get a contractor to build that wing and be responsible for the work being done.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Who will?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What have we a Minister of Public Works for?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—My hon. friend need not worry. They will put up a building in the new territories so that he will be amply protected. When they are erecting that new building the Minister of Public Works will be required to look after it. After it is completed the Minister of Public Works will transfer it to the Minister of Justice and he will keep it in repair.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is my hon. friend speaking for the government?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—No, I am speaking in reference to what the statute says. My hon. friend is not willing to be governed by the statutes. He wants to be governed by the idea he has in his head.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman had not better give himself away in a hurry. He had better wait until the minister decides.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—There was a serious conflict between Sir John Thompson and Sir Hector Langevin, and I understood Sir John Thompson assumed as Minister of Justice that no one had a right to forbid the architect of Sir Hector Langevin, the then Minister of Public Works, from entering the prison at all, though the guard would not allow Mr. Bowes, the architect of the Public Works, to enter the penitentiary. We had better leave that to the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The change was not made during this administration. It was made in 1895. The construction of all buildings within the penitentiary was done by the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, my hon. friend is mistaken in that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, only where the work should be done by convict labour. They have had an architect for twelve years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The change was not made in 1895. The Act of 1895 relegates the duty to the Minister of Public Works except the work that can be done by the convicts. I am not so sure whether the Minister of Justice will take the trouble to go to the penitentiaries and investigate the matter. I know that in olden times we had great trouble in erecting buildings for customs and inland revenue, that the Minister of Public Works would act upon his own responsibility and very often directly in opposition to the wishes and what was believed to be the requirements of the service in the construction of public buildings for customs and inland revenue, but I am quite satisfied I never saw a Minister of Justice yet who would go to the penitentiary and look after it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—For the last eleven years the Public Works have had nothing to do with the penitentiary, and large buildings have been erected and work done there.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If that be the case, the minister was acting without the authority of the law, because the law says it shall be done by the Public Works Department.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have their own architect and clerk of works.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—They always had an architect there.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not see any clause here which could under any construction be held to cover an architect.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—By clause 26 the Governor in Council may appoint a parole officer, accountant or architect.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 22,

22. If the inspector at any time finds that any penitentiary is out of repair, or does not possess the proper or requisite sanitary arrangements, or has become unsafe or unfit for the confinement of prisoners, or that it does not afford sufficient accommodation for the member of prisoners confined therein, or the requisite accommodation for the proper industrial employment of the prisoners, he shall forthwith report these facts to the minister.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has my hon. friend any knowledge whether there is a systematic inspection of the sanitary conditions of those penitentiaries.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The attention of the public has been recently directed to extensive inquiries which had been made by the Governor General as to the conditions of the jails throughout the Dominion, and the verdict seems to be very unfavourable as to the sanitary conditions of those institutions. Whether the penitentiaries are any better looked after than the jails of the country, I cannot say, but I would be somewhat inclined to doubt it.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The warden is the chief officer and the one who must be relied on for the management of the prison, and he is ignored in this clause. The warden should be allowed to have the same power as an inspector as he is really the most important official.

On subclause 2, of clause 23,

On sub-clause 2, of clause 23,

2. The inspector may at any time assume control of any penitentiary and exercise the powers and functions of warden with respect to the control and management of such penitentiary and of all its concerns.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is new.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What reason is there for giving to an inspector power to govern a penitentiary independent of the warden who is supposed to be the head of the penitentiary ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been found in one or two instances absolutely necessary. The case of St. Vincent de Paul is the one I now have in mind. The inspector had to take charge because of the inefficiency of the warden, until new arrangements could be made.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 26,

26. The Governor in Council may appoint a parole officer, an accountant, an architect, and such other officers as are necessary, to perform the work in connection with the penitentiary branch of the Department of Justice, who shall be officers of the Department of Justice and perform such duties as the minister directs.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Speaking of officers in penitentiaries, I have recently seen some comments, especially by the warden of the Central Prison, as to some of the prisoners having a pull where this parole system comes into play. Does the hon. gentleman know the official or officials ?

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Is the parole officer a new officer ? I never heard of a parole officer in the penitentiary before.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He is not a new official.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It would seem to be preferable if these officers referred to in clause 26 were included in a schedule and salaries provided for them. I do not see why that should not be the case.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are paid out of the bulk sum voted, and that is why they do not appear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Are those attached to the staff of any penitentiary or to the department?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are attached to the department and paid by the department.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It amounts to this, that the department employs an architect whose services can be had at any penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Is the parole officer the same?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The minister has appointed a Salvation Army officer whose duty it is particularly to look after prisoners whose times expires or are released on ticket-of-leave. He looks after them and sees that they get employment.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—How are the salaries of the officers provided for? Does it allow the minister to fix any salary he sees fit?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The salary is fixed by the Governor in Council. It is fixed this year at $1,300. His name does not appear among the officers of the penitentiary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What further power does this clause place in the hands of the minister that he did not exercise before? The hon. gentleman told us a few moments ago that all the officers, other than underlings, were appointed by the government. This clause empowers the Governor in Council to appoint a warden and a deputy warden who shall hold their office during pleasure, and then I find these words in the following clause.

The minister may appoint or authorize the appointment of such other officer as may be necessary for the proper administration and police of any penitentiary.

Now, are not the doctors and the chaplains to be appointed by the minister? The hon. gentleman told us a few moments ago that they would be appointed by the Governor in Council. If this clause means anything it places the whole power in the hands of the minister.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What I said was all the officials within the walls of the penitentiary who are subordinates to the deputy warden would be appointed by the Minister of Justice. Those named by the hon. gentleman, surgeon and chaplain, are not within the walls; they are without. Clause 26 is not changed. There is no extra power taken.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman will look at section 22 of the Act, referring to appointments, it vests in the Governor in Council the appointment of a number of these officers. For instance, it says the Governor in Council may appoint the warden and deputy warden, as this Bill provides, but there the new Act stops and places the appointment of all the other officials in the hands of the Minister of Justice; but the old section proceeds after that to read :

> A Protestant chaplain, an assistant Protestant chaplain when required, a Roman Catholic chaplain and an assistant Roman Catholic chaplain when required, a surgeon and accountant, all of whom shall hold office during pleasure.

Now, these officers were all appointed by the Governor in Council, but the new Act places the appointment of all these officials, excepting the warden and deputy warden, in the hands of the minister, unless there is some explanation which I have not yet been able to find.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am under the impression that in an Act subsequent to that amending it, the power was taken from the Governor in Council and given to the minister. I am not sure of the year, but it has been done since I have been a member of this House, and I think since the present government came into power.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I remember discussing these questions with the late Minister of Justice, the Hon. David Mills, when he had a Bill before the Senate in reference to the government of penitentiaries, and he accepted some suggestions I made then with reference to appointments and salaries, but I have no recollection of power being vested in the minister alone to make these appointments.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Would not the minister be the most efficient official to make the appointment? He is responsible for the proper management of the penitentiary and if he empowers some officer in the penitentiary to make the appointment that would not be as much in the public interest as if the appointment were made by the minister himself. I can remember discussions of this kind having taken place when Sir John Thompson was minister, and I, fortunately or unfortunately, was in the House at that time. Sir John Thompson convinced me I was wrong and he was right in the appointment, and I do not suppose the hon. gentleman from Belleville will object to any opinion expressed by Sir John Thompson, one of the cleverest men they had in the Conservative ranks.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I venture the assertion that whatever position Sir John Thompson took was correct, and I would venture another statement, that he never advocated anything of the kind so far as appointments are concerned. It is possible my hon. friend might judge of the propriety of placing so much power in a minister from the fact that I believe, if my recollection serves me right, that he himself might have been a surgeon in the penitentiary, and that is one good evidence why the minister should not have had the power.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—My hon. friend knows full well what view Sir John Thompson took.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not on that point.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—He knows the position he assumed with reference to all the supplies and necessaries for the penitentiary. I remember his expression very well. I remember taking an opposite view to the one I am taking now. I am not conservative enough not to be converted. I have been converted and see the error of my ways ; therefore it is that I am speaking as I do.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If Sir John Thompson held the views upon this question which my hon. friend says he did, it is somewhat singular that they are not in the law. I am speaking of the law as it exists now, and also the amendment to it, and if Sir John Thompson held the views my hon. friend says he held, I am quite satisfied he would have suggested to parliament the propriety of changing the law.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—I think my hon. friend misunderstands me. I take the view to-day I have always held, that the law intended that the Minister of Justice, being responsible to the government and to the country, should have the control of these matters. Why is it desired that some one else should make the appointment? Who is to appoint the minor officers, the guards, &c., unless you leave it in the hands of those who are responsible?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not talking of the guards. There is a general principle involved. I hold that all important appointments should emanate from the Governor in Council upon the recommendation of the minister who is at the head of the department and, under responsible government, that is the only principle upon which to act. My former leader, Sir John Macdonald, never would permit the appointment of even a lighthouse keeper until it had come before council, because the Premier and every other member of council is personally and politically responsible for the appointment of every officer, no matter how high or how low. The minister should not have the power to place in office a number of officials without the knowledge of his colleagues. If they are aware of all that is being done, then when they are attacked in the House for having made appointments which are alleged to be improper, they are in a position to justify the appointment. Under this law nothing of the kind can take place. You might have surgeons, chaplains, and all the other officials, other than the two who are indicated in the statute, appointed, and from the Premier down no other member of the cabinet would have any knowledge of it. That is not the principle upon which the country should be governed, neither is it doing justice to the colleagues of the minister who makes the appointment.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The hon. gentleman from Belleville is taking a different course now to what he took years ago. He is now condemning government by order in council. He says that the Minister of Justice who has the right, and who exercises the right to appoint these men, is not responsible. Why is he not? Must he not bring every single appointment before his colleagues and be responsible for each appointment he makes in that asylum? He is responsible to the government and also to the country. Who else would be? The warden, the deputy warden, or the Governor in Council? It is virtually the Governor in Council that has the appointment upon the recommendation of the Minister of Justice, and, therefore, I see no reason why my hon. friend should feel so strongly upon this point, nor do I see any reason why he should condemn government by order in council. I remember in years gone by he was a strong advocate of the very principle he is now condemning; therefore he is more inconsistent than I am.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a great pity the hon. gentleman does not know enough to draw a distinction between an order in council to carry out something not authorized by law, and the appointment by the Governor in Council of some official.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Is this not governed by law? Are we not passing a law to-day by which we will hold the proper persons responsible?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is just what I say we should not do.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 32,

32. No officer, on the permanent staff of a penitentiary, shall carry on any trade or calling of profit or emolument other than his employment in the penitentiary, except by consent of the Governor in Council; provided always that in cases where such exemption shall be granted a reduction of at least twenty per cent shall be made from the salary attached to the office or position held by such officer.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me it is discretionary under this clause whether the official shall carry on any other occupation.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—That should not be. They all get about the same salaries.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The last three or four lines permit the warden to follow any other occupation. It seems to me it is not good policy. He will have all his time occupied in the performance of his duty. He is not like a surgeon or some officer employed only for a portion of his time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the warden should not be allowed to do any other work under any circumstances. I think it would be prejudicial to the interests of the penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Neither the warden nor the deputy should be allowed to do it. The surgeon is not allowed in Kingston.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It only applies to smaller penitentiaries such as Dorchester, and is not likely to be abused.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has my hon. friend any knowledge of what induced that discretion to be placed in the Governor in Council. I do not think there is anything in the old Act of that kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is new. It is intended to apply to the surgeon and chaplain, where his whole time is not given to the public.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—This opens the door to all officials.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The old clause was a salutary provision—No officer, warden or servant, except the surgeon and chaplain, shall carry on any trade or calling or profit or emolument, &c. Apparently this discretion was not exercisable under the old Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Could you give us any reason why this wise provision is made ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume the reason the change took place was a simple one. One of the guards was keeping a boarding house, and it was thought under the law that he was liable to be dismissed. I think it was an unwise change.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He could not continue that under this clause except with the consent of the Governor in Council, and all he would have to do would be to say to the guard 'You must give up that boarding house or give up the position in the penitentiary.' What we object to is leaving the power with the Governor in Council to give the warden and others permission to carry on other business.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I might point out that the construction to be placed upon the exercise of the discretion would apply to the warden and deputy warden, because those are the only two officers appointed by the Governor in Council. The other officers are appointed by the minister.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 33,

The minister shall fix the salary to be paid to each officer or employee ; provided always that such salary shall not exceed that prescribed by schedule A. to this Act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You give the power to the minister to regulate the salaries providing he does not exceed the schedule we have in this Act.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Are those the maximum amounts mentioned for salaries ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The only point is, whether this power should be exercised by a minister or by the Governor in Council. The tendency in all the departments for a long time has been to take the power away from council and give it to the minister. The reason stated by the hon. gentleman from Belleville that all the members of the cabinet should be personally responsible for the appointments they make, is a good one. We hear members shaking their skirts clear of responsibility of the government. Take the Wagner appointment. The minister should make his recommendation to council and all these appointments should be made by council. That is parliamentary government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is not parliamentary government as it is in England. The minister in Canada does not exercise the same powers as the Secretary of State does in England. This is a broad subject and I do not propose to discuss it now. But to my mind it is absolutely impossible for any one but the individual minister to gauge the value of services of inferior officers. It is better to have one man responsible. Thirteen or fourteen gentlemen sitting round a table never heard of Jones or Smith, and when the appointment comes up they cannot pass any intelligent judgment upon it and they could not have time to inquire into the matter. It is absolutely impossible.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think it is nevertheless wrong. If the old practice were maintained it would be better and every individual minister would have to come before his colleagues, and as they would have to take the responsibility with him, more care would be exercised in making the appointments. They are responsible still, but they are able to make a great many people believe they are not. If it were done in a constitutional way they could not put the blame on a minister who has resigned or died.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Let me ask the hon. Secretary of State as a member of the cabinet would he have consented to the appointment of that man Wagner, or the reappointment of Wagner in the west after he had been convicted of stealing from the immigrants and sent to gaol and punished for it? I venture the assertion that the hon. gentleman would have put his foot on it at once.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not if I had any knowledge about it. How would I get the knowledge? You cannot inquire into the antecedents of every name.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a matter of public notoriety. He was a government official who had been convicted of stealing from the immigrants and defrauding them. He was appointed by the minister and no one knew anything about it until it came before parliament. While I have very little confidence in the government, speaking politically, I question very much whether the head of the government, or my hon. friend whom I have known for upwards of half a century, would have consented to such an appointment, but we have in this case an illustration of the danger of placing the whole of this power in the hands of a minister, who, by his actions, shows that he has no regard either for the honour of his office or those with whom he sits in council.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Can my hon. friend imagine himself going to the government asking for an order in council reappointing a man who is an ex-convict, without advising his colleagues that the man had such a record?

The clause was adopted.

On clause 34,

34. The minister instead of appointing a Protestant chaplain for any penitentiary, may direct that the clergymen of the different denominations represented in the community where a penitentiary is situate, shall be permitted to perform the duties of the Protestant chaplaincy in rotation, each in his turn taking three months, the assignment being under the direction of the warden, in which case the salary allowed for a Protestant chaplain shall be divided among the clergymen of the several denominations performing such duties in proportion to the time given to such duties by each.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I notice that this clause is entirely new. I do not know whether it is obligatory upon the minister or not. I presume that the Protestant clergyman who shall minister to the spiritual requirements of the convicts will have to strike an average theology. Has my hon. friend any idea how that can be carried out? How long may each clergyman minister?

Hon. Mr. POWER—They are each to act in turn for three months.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In that case, by the time a convict serving a long sentence is released, he will have the ministrations of all the different denominations. I doubt very much the propriety of that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Each case has to depend upon the peculiar circumstances. It is quite impossible to lay down in advance any fixed rule. The proper thing is to give the minister discretionary powers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But immediately you put that provision on the statute-book, then you subject the minister to the importunities of every religious denomination which calls itself Protestant. Surely the minister should be sufficiently responsible to exercise discretion in saying what Protestant ministers should attend the convicts in a particular penitentiary, without saying that every denomination should participate. It seems to me that a clergyman who ministers for a term of three months only to a number of convicts cannot become sufficiently interested in them to follow up the peculiar requirements of any particular individual.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think there is the germ of a very good principle in this clause, but I can hardly see that it is right to fix the period at three months. I think convicts are entitled to the religious consolation of the denomination, whatever it may be, to which they belonged, even though they may not have been very good members of it, but dividing the time into periods of three months each among the four leading denominations of Protestants in Canada I am afraid would not work satisfactorily. It might happen that in a particular penitentiary at a particular time there would be no convicts connected with the denomination to which the officiating clergyman might happen to belong. If there were greater elasticity so that the service might be rendered in proportion to the religious tendencies of the convicts it would be better.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I quite agree with the last speaker. I think the proper thing is to make some per capita arrangement, if it may be so termed, and allow the clergymen of different denominations each to attend the members of his own denomination. This provision may be less objectionable in the future than it would have been in the past, because I understand that there is a movement on foot which appears likely to be successful, looking towards the union of two of the great Protestant denominations, but I think this clause is very badly drafted, and I suggest that it should stand over to be redrafted. In its present form it is not calculated to meet the approval of any denomination.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—If the convicts were consulted they would probably agree to this, because they would have the spice of variety. But the chaplain stands in a peculiar relation to the convicts. He is their confidential advisor and friend, and when you get a good chaplain the influence he wields is very great indeed. It is really not worth while dividing up this small salary of $1,200 between the great Protestant denomiations of Ontario, and I think to do so would destroy the influence of the chaplain altogether. A man who is retained permanently in such a position takes an interest in the convicts to a much greater extent than would one who is only there for a few months at a time. I think it is a very bad clause, and if I were a Protestant I would not vote for it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I take a different view of this clause from the hon. gentleman from Marshfield. As I understand it, the difference between the various Protestant denominations merely relates to questions of church government. The great fundamental principles of Christianity are recognized by them all, just as they are in many respects recognized as between Protestants and Roman Catholics. There are a great many points on which all may agree. It seems to me that this is opening the door for a good deal of trouble and annoyance. I can see plainly that it is an attempt to meet the clamor, if I may term it, of the different Protestant denominations when these appointments are to be made. The Presbyterians claim it, the Methodists claim it, or the Church of England claim it upon the ground that the man who previously held the position belonged to their particular denomination. I think it is a great mistake. Either the hon. gentleman should let the clause stand or strike it out altogether. I think the hon. gentleman from Kingston has put the case clearly. As a Protestant, if I were one of the clergymen, I never would accept the offer of a position of that kind for a term of three months. I would treat it with contempt.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK, from the committee, reported that the committee had made some progress with the Bill, and asked leave to sit again.

The Senate then adjourned until Monday at eight p.m.

STANDARD APPLE BARREL BILL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to :

Inquire whether the government intend to introduce a Bill at this session of parliament to provide that an apple barrel of uniform dimensions and size shall be used in Canada, as recommended by the conference of representatives from the various Fruit Growers' Associations, held in Ottawa, in March last ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is out of the city. I inquired at the department and they stated they had heard nothing of this matter. They have not been advised in any way, so that I may say there will be no chance of a Bill being introduced this session.

THIRD READING.

Bill (149) An Act respecting the Central Railway Company of Canada.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

PENITENTIARIES BILL.

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The House resumed in Committee of the Whole the consideration of Bill (176) An Act respecting Penitentiaries.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 34,

34. The minister instead of appointing a Protestant chaplain for any penitentiary, may direct that the clergymen of the different denominations represented in the community where a penitentiary is situate, shall be permitted to perform the duties of the Protestant chaplaincy in rotation, each in his turn taking three months, the assignment being under the direction of the warden, in which case the salary allowed for a Protestant chaplain shall be divided among the clergymen of the several denominations performing such duties in proportion to the time given to such duties by each.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I observe that in giving an explanation in the other Chamber, the Minister of Justice stated that it was intended to apply this provision to the Dorchester penitentiary where he thought it was regarded as an advantage. It is not the kind of principle which can be laid down absolutely. In a matter of this kind it would be wise to leave it to the discretion of the head of the department as to what action should be taken in each case. Evidently the sentiment of some is in favour of the provision, while to others it is objectionable.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What does my hon. friend propose to do about it then? If it is objectionable, as he has pointed out, surely some change ought to be made.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said that from the standpoint of some parties it is objectionable. From the standpoint of others it is advantageous. It appeared to be rather sought at Dorchester. The clergymen might agree among themselves as to the period of time each should serve. It might be ten days or twenty days. I certainly would object to the three months fixed period. I think if anything is to be left to the discretion of the minister it would be well to leave it all to him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do you propose to strike out the three months?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I propose to strike out the three months. I would let the minister give it a trial. It might not succeed, and of course it would be changed five or six months from now.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How does the system work in the other penitentiaries?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It work satisfactorily. I have heard of no complaint.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—A permanent chaplain is appointed under the present Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes. You see the Dorchester penitentiary is a very small one, and the number is less than anywhere else.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is a very bad reason for departing from a well established principle, established from long experience, and for introducing a unique proposition of this kind, because a small penitentiary finds that the old system has not worked satisfactorily.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have made some inquiry into the case of the Dorchester penitentiary and the chaplaincy there, and I find that the plan which is laid down in the clause now before the committee has actually been in operation in Dorchester for some time, and I am informed that on the whole it has not worked very satisfactorily. If that is the case, our better way would be to strike out this clause, or to amend it, so as to put it into a more satisfactory shape. It must strike any one that the provision made in this clause, cannot work satisfactorily. Suppose there are prisoners of four different denominations in the penitentiary at Dorchester. Under this clause the whole year may be divided up equally into periods of three months amongst these four clergymen. During nine months the convicts of any one denomination are deprived of the benefit of clergy so to speak; that is if they are strong in their own creeds; and it may be that there are only two or three prisoners in the penitentiary belonging to one denomination, but that denomination may have a three months chaplain as well as a more numerous denomination, and if we are to have a different system from the present one, it should be a system based upon the work done by the several clergymen, and that the clergymen should be paid in proportion to the number of convicts whom they attend. That seems to me to be the more equitable and reasonable way. I am assured by persons having the best reason to be informed that the system set out in this clause which has been in operation in Dorchester penitentiary for some time has not worked satisfactorily. If it is the pleasure of the committee, I shall submit an amendment embodying my own views on the matter.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Read the amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would suggest this:

34. The minister, instead of appointing a Protestant chaplain for a penitentiary, may direct that clergymen residing in the neighbourhood and representing different Protestant denominations shall be permitted to hold religious services and otherwise minister to the spiritual wants of the inmates of the penitentiary who belong to their respective denominations, the times and places of such services to be fixed by the warden subject to the approval of the minister; in which case the amount allowed as salary for a Protestant chaplain shall be divided among the clergymen holding such services in proportion to the number of inmates belonging to their respective denominations.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no objection to that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How have the clergymen of Dorchester penitentiary been paid in the past, and in what way?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The allowance has been $800 a year for two chaplains, one Catholic and one Protestant. They are paid different salaries in different penitentiaries, depending on the number of convicts of course. I have no objection to the amendment, because as I stated a moment ago, I would leave it to the minister to make the arrangement he thought best. I do not think that a hard and fast rule should be laid down by an Act of parliament as to how the stipend should be divided up.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The suggestion made by the hon. member from Halifax is an improvement on the other, because a difficulty would arise from the causes which he has suggested. The difficulty, to my mind, has been to secure under the proposed clause the services of any chaplain because the Methodist clergyman, for instance, could not well afford to leave his congregation in order to attend three months at the penitentiary. In fact, all the Protestant denominations that change their stations every three or four or five years would be placed in a very difficult position. Perhaps it would be well to put the motion on the order paper, so that we may have an opportunity of studying it.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Hon. gentlemen speak as if they were seeking to favour the convicts. Lay that aside. The theological views of convicts are very general indeed. The convict simply says he is a Protestant or Catholic according to whichever denomination gives him the greatest facilities for a good time. That is what governs him entirely. One good man is better than this division you are making, and the Church of England have, I contend, the right of going. That is in anything approaching to a general Protestant church, and moreover, it has had the position from the beginning, and therefore the minister should engage some Protestant clergyman and for goodness sake give him the salary and not a pittance of $200 for a clergyman from every denomination. You want to get the best man you can, and in order to secure the best man, you should give him the full salary. I know it is not enough to support a man of any eminence, but some man in the neighbourhood belonging to a Protestant denomination will take it, and being attached that way will do his work and do good. The chaplain is the confidential friend of the convicts. He looks after their interests, writes their letters, &c., and of course everything is done with the knowledge of the officials of the prison. He ought to be conversant with and have full experience of those men. As to the shades of the different Protestant denominations, it would be folly to think of arranging it in that manner. I would give it to one clergyman, whoever he may be.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The weak spot in the amendment is the distribution of the allowance amongst the various clergymen, in proportion to the number of convicts belonging to the respective churches. It seems to me that will create a rivalry to a certain extent amongst the various churches as to which will receive the largest allowance. We shall have a certain number of convicts professing Armenianism, and a certain number professing Calvanism, and thus through the various phases of theology, and you will find a rivalry amongst the different clergymen, as to who has the greatest number of adherents. This allowance for a chaplain might be distributed evenly among the various denominations in the neighbourhood of the penitentiary, and thus prevent a canvass being made which possibly may result in an endeavour to secure the largest number of convicts as belonging to one denomination.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the observations of the hon. senator from Kingston ;* I do not undertake to say that I differ from him ; but the position is this : in the Bill before us provision is made for departing from the plan adopted in the past, and my contention is that it is more equitable and fairer that the sum set apart for the salary of the Protestant chaplain should be distributed amongst the clergymen who do duty, in proportion to the amount of work they do. With respect to the observation made by the hon. leader of the opposition, I have a higher opinion of the clergymen of other denominations than my own than that which the hon. gentleman seems to have. I can hardly imagine a clergyman canvassing amongst the convicts with a view of securing their nominal adherence to any particular denomination. We have scriptural authority for the belief that the labourer is worthy of his hire, and if one clergyman attends to fifty convicts and another attends to only five, surely the former who does more work is entitled to more consideration than the latter ? I should be perfectly willing that the clause be stricken out altogether, but I contend that, on the whole, the principle contained in the amendment is the sounder one. I shall move that amendment, and if it is the wish of the committee it can stand over to be considered later.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I entirely agree with the hon. gentleman from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Sullivan). I think the old system of appointing a permanent clergyman to look after the spiritual wants of the prisoners would be much better than to divide it up. Any person who knows anything of the class of men who are to be ministered to is aware that they have no very strong religious convictions, and I do not think any particular fault would be found by protestant clergymen if the old system were continued. It appears to me that the class of men who are found in penitentiaries are of peculiar dispositions, and do not possess strong religious convictions and if there is any way in which any clergyman will be able to induce these men to lead better lives it will certainly be by permitting him to become familiar with the parties. I think the clause in the present Act provides that the minister had the right to appoint a Protestant clergyman, and I think it would be much better to strike out this new clause and leave it as it was before, or leave it to the minister to appoint the clergyman. I do not know that any fault has been found with that system in the past, and if it has worked satisfactorily, why make the change ? I rather think the clause as it now stands provides for the regulation of the pay as suggested by the hon. gentleman from Halifax ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think the last two lines of clause 34, 'Among the clergymen of the several denominations performing such duties in proportion to the time given to such duties by each,' appear to qualify, and the clergymen performing the duties would be the clergymen for the time being. If it is left to the warden and the minister to select the clergymen they might be selected just as has been suggested, but you might have five Presbyterian and fifty Methodist convicts. I should judge that would be the proportion that might be there —and while the clergymen who were being paid to administer to the fifty Methodists would be occupied for nine months, the poor Presbyterians would only have thirty days of a clergyman, if they were employed in proportion. I think it would be much better to strike out that provision and allow the minister to appoint the clergyman as in the past.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In addition to the objections already urged, which were in the mind of the government, no doubt, when they framed the Bill, there is a further objection—and it is a strong one—that in this matter political patronage comes in and our knowledge of politics, as they are current at the present moment, is that they come into everything, and the political views of the different clergymen in the town where the penitentiary is located would be thoroughly gauged by those who had the control of the patronage, and the chaplain would be forced on the minister. The appointment would be made upon political grounds. Apart from all the other reasons urged, that would be a very bad state of things, and it is the state of things, from our knowledge of politics in Canada at the present time, which would be sure to exist. I rather like the amendment suggested by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, and he should move it in order that it might go on record, but it might not be pressed to a division until further consideration was given to it, and it could then be found whether it might not be modified or some other changes brought into it that would make it fair and harmonious. I can scarcely agree with my hon. friend from Kingston when he is disposed to act as an umpire and settle this matter between the different denominations of Protestants by telling them they could bow to the Church of England because it has better claims. All the churches in this country are on an equal footing and the Church of England has no better status than any other denomination. I think the amendment suggested by the hon. gentleman from Halifax would have a good effect. There is no question about the Catholics. Whatever proportion of criminals are Catholics, they would receive consolation from the Catholic clergy, and those who belonged to the Protestant denominations, or were adherents of any Protestant denomination, would receive consolation from their own clergymen under that clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand that is the system that is in force now, and I find on looking over the notes, that it was supported by the minister who comes from New Brunswick who certainly ought to know. The Hon. Mr. Emmerson thought that that was a better way, and by striking out two lines I changed the reading of it and I would suggest to make it read as follows :

> The minister, instead of appointing a Protestant chaplain for any penitentiary, may direct that the clergymen of the different Protestant denominations represented in the community where a penitentiary is situate, shall be permitted to perform the duties of the Protestant chaplaincy in rotation, each in his turn taking three months, the assignment being under the direction of the warden, in which case the salary allowed for a Protestant chaplain shall be in proportion to the time given to such duties by each.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—This clause is subversive of what we call the principle of conscience, I quote the first two lines, which read :

> The minister, instead of appointing a Protestant chaplain for any penitentiary, may direct that the clergymen of the different Protestant denominations in the community, &c.

The different Protestant clergy may be vastly different from the prisoners——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. In our penitentiaries there may be lots of Church of England people who will not accept the services of these clergymen.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—They can have their own.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—It is suggested that they shall have their own ministers. It should be put in the clause that the men in the penitentiaries have the right to call in any minister they please.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—It would never work. Every convict would have a chaplain of his own.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—Why should the state have a right to dictate to the prisoner what clergyman he should have ?

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—He need not take them.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—The prisoner in the penitentiary should have the right to call a minister to suit his conscience.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—They have no consciences.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—If these people have no consciences, wait until they have consciences and when that time arrives let us cultivate their consciences. I think this clause is an interference with the right of liberty of conscience. It depends upon the ministers of that community as to who shall be appointed, whether they shall be Baptist, Calvinist, Church of England or whether they shall be Catholics. Supposing there are a number of men in the penitentiary who belong to none of these churches, are you going to deprive them of religious succor and aid? That is what this clause means or would effect.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I move that clause 34 be struck out altogether, leaving the appointment to the minister, because I think it much better to have a permanent clergyman.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then you would have no chaplain at all.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Yes, the minister has power to make the appointment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend from Halifax read his amendment again.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I withdraw my amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I made the clause to read by striking out the words from 'Protestant chaplaincy' in the 12th line, cutting out the term of three months. However, I am quite ready to adopt any view the House may take.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Before the clause is dropped, I desire to ascertain first where the power comes in to appoint a chaplain?

Hon. Mr. POWER—That will be found under clause 27.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED— I venture to say that a chaplain would not come under that section. Chaplains are not necessary for the administration and police of a penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no use in criticising what has been done for the last thirty-five or forty years. These chaplains have been appointed all along and no one has ever questioned the right to do so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Has my hon. friend the Act there?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The fact is undoubted.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If this clause is struck out and you leave the schedules, there will be full power to appoint Protestant and Roman Catholic chaplains.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have that right now. This is simply a special case for Dorchester, to divide up what was allowed to the Protestant chaplain among three or four religious denominations.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The matter will then become simply one of political patronage.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I object to the Secretary of State sweeping aside every objection which is made without having a knowledge of the statements which are being put forward. My hon. friend said that the old Act made no provision for the appointment of chaplains.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I said the very reverse. I said it has been going on for thirty years.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I asked my hon. friend to point out to me the existing law with reference to the appointment of chaplains. My hon. friend answered that clause 27 of the Bill was practically the same as the old law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was an answer made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In section 22 of the old Act, we find express power given to the Governor in Council to appoint Protestant and Roman Catholic chaplains. Now, the position I take is this: if this clause be striken out there is no power in the Bill, as far as it has been pointed out to me by my hon. friend who has charge of it, to appoint chaplains. Under section 27 power is not given to the minister to appoint chaplains.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I say it is.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would not give that power because chaplains are not necessary for the administration and police of a penitentiary. The Act now in force reads as follows :

The Governor in Council may appoint for any penitentiary a warden and deputy warden, Protestant and assistant Protestant chaplain, when required, Roman Catholic and assistant Roman Catholic chaplain, when required, surgeon and accountant, all of whom shall hold office during pleasure.

Unless express provision is made in the Bill we are now revising, certainly the power to appoint chaplains will not be given to the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not agree with my hon. friend. When I introduced this Bill I stated that so far as the officers were concerned the Governor in Council would appoint the warden and deputy warden. For all the other officials the minister was authorized under this Bill to make the appointment, and I say so still.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I ask my hon. friend to point out to me any clause in the Bill giving the minister power to appoint chaplains ? That power is not given as far as has been pointed out to me.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a matter of interpretation, and I think my interpretation is right.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would draw attention to the fact that the accountant and surgeon are not provided for by name in this Bill, any more than the chaplain. The general principle is laid down that the Governor in Council appoint the warden and deputy warden. All other necessary officials are appointed by the minister. The chaplain is just as necessary an officer as the surgeon, if the hon. gentleman from Kingston will excuse me for saying so. The surgeon looks after the bodies of the convicts, and the chaplain looks after their souls ; and surely the souls are of as much consequence as the bodies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The difficulty which presents itself seems to be as to the interpretation to be given to the latter portion of clause 27. The point raised by the leader of the opposition is, the chaplains and surgeons are not necessary for the proper administration of and police of any penitentiary. That is the position he takes. If the hon. Secretary of State will accept this suggestion, let the government assume the responsibility collectively to appoint the surgeons and chaplains as well as the warden and deputy warden and leave the balance with the minister ; that is the interpretation, if my recollection serves me right, which the hon. Secretary of State put upon the clause when we were discussing it before.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I was perfectly clear from the beginning that the Governor in Council had only the appointment of a warden or deputy warden, and that all the other officials were appointed by the Minister of Justice. I stated that distinctly. The Bill was drawn with that view; it was drawn in the Department of Justice and they knew what they wanted. In the schedule, provision is made for the different officers, and chaplains are specifically cited.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I should say that the minister, in drafting this Bill and putting clause 34 there, certainly understood he had the power.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I think the amendment suggested by the hon. Secretary of State should be adopted. In looking at these different clauses it appears to me that clause 27, where it provides that the minister may appoint or authorize the appointment of such other officers as may be necessary for the proper adminstration of any penitentiary, and section 33, which provides that the minister shall fix the salary to be paid to each officer or employee, cover it. If there is any doubt about it at all, it could be remedied by inserting in section 27, 'Such other officers and employees.' Then schedule 'A' would designate the different employees to whom the clauses apply. If clause 34, as I understand it, were eliminated entirely, there could only be one Roman Catholic and one Protestant chaplain. Clause 34 as amended by the hon. Secretary of State gives the minister discretionary power; he may, if he thinks proper, allow the ministers of different Protestant denominations to officiate in the penitentiary. It appears to me that that on the whole is a wise discretionary power to give the minister and, under certain circumstances, it might be found very useful to have a discretionary power to appoint ministers of different denominations, and divide the money among them in proportion to the duties they perform. I believe this is the practice which has prevailed in Dorchester penitentiary, and I have not heard of any complaint against it. It has worked very well and very satisfactorily all round. I agree with what has been said by some hon. gentlemen, that with regard to a great majority of the prisoners there is not any necessity of making very fine distinctions as to the theology of the clergymen who administer to them while they are in confinement; but circumstances may arise when it may be desirable, and it would be for the benefit of certain prisoners that they should have the services of a clergyman of some particular denomination. I think the suggestion that the minister should have this discretionary power when he thinks proper to exercise it, is a wise one, and I should be glad to see it adopted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should like to call the attention of the leader of the opposition to interpretation clause (b) :

The expression officer means and includes any officer or employee of any of the classes mentioned in the schedule to this Act, or any servant in the employ of the penitentiary.

In the schedule to the Bill the clergymen are named.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is only by implication.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, nothing could be clearer.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then why should wardens and deputy wardens be mentioned ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have explained already that the Governor in Council have the appointment of warden and deputy warden, and the Minister of Justice has the appointment of all others.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I agree with the remarks of the hon. senator from Westmoreland, and think that the amendment suggested by the minister, would meet the case very fairly. On close examination it will be found that clause 27, taken in connection with the interpretation clause and the schedule, would give power to appoint these two chaplains and other officers. But if we were to adopt this clause as proposed to be amended, by the hon. Secretary of State, it would simply modify the matter as far as the appointment of a Protestant chaplain is concerned, and enable the minister to apportion the work of the chaplain among the resident clergymen of the different Protestant denominations. I understand that this principle has alredy be applied, although the old law scarcely admits of it, but it was found to be in itself so fair and reasonable that it has been applied in the Dorchester penitentiary even without a provision such as we are now proposing in the law. Having been found that it was necessay there that is a fair and reasonable way to admit that principle, we should make the law so that the principle may be legally applied there and elsewhere. It also gives rise to another advantage which I have already presented to the House ; with regard to the Roman Catholic chaplain there would usually be at the site of the penitentiary only one priest, but when you have to select a chaplain from each of the Protestant denominations it would be found, from the way political pressure is brought to bear on the minister, that he would be scarcely able to resist the influence brought to bear upon him to appoint a clergyman in sympathy with the government of the day. It would remove that pressure altogether if the minister were allowed to apportion the work and distribute the allowance among the ministers of the different denominations.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Suppose a number of the convicts were to claim that they were Methodists to-day, and to-morrow claim to be Baptists, and then some other day Presbyterians, the odium theologicum would be introduced. I say strike it out altogether. If you knew these gentlemen that you are legislating for, you would find them the greatest blackguards and scoundrels imaginable, and it is not for them to indicate what denomination they belong to. It is for you to say under what code of morality they can best be attended to. It all depends on the man ; it does not matter whether he is a Salvation Army officer, a Catholic priest or a Protestant minister, it is the individual himself that influences the convict. Therefore this patched up, mean, miserable condition you have of dividing a few hundred dollars amongst five or six denominations makes me sick. I wonder that Protestantism has got down to that degradation that such a thing could be tolerated for a moment. I scout the idea. I hope the hon. gentleman from Calgary will prevail and that this condition will be entirely removed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move to strike out the line 'in rotation each in his turn taking three months,' and leave in the rest.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think a great mistake would be made to divide up the salary among different denominations. One chaplain who meets the prisoners from week to week and from month to month, and gets acquainted with them is better qualified to give them spiritual advice than a succession of chaplains.

The committee divided on the amendment to strike out clause 34, which was adopted on the following vote:—

Yeas, 25; nays, 11.

On clause 35,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me that subsection (c) has been productive of a great deal of mischief in bringing about the superannuation of many officers who are well fitted for duty, but for unknown reasons secure a general superannuation.—'Who may be retired to promote efficiency or economy.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think so—I have not known it to be abused in the manner my hon. friend speaks of. In fact, it is very rarely invoked, not as often as it should be.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This does not provide for superannuation, but for a gratuity to an officer who is going out, and I think it is a reasonable proposition.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It permits the payment of a retiring allowance to an officer who for certain reasons, may have to retire from the public service. If he has the necessary political influence he invokes this clause. The expression is: 'Who may be retired to promote efficiency or economy.' Of course that will permit of the government giving a gratuity to any officer who, for fixed reasons, would retire in any event, and it seems to me unless there are good reasons advanced and not general reasons, such as are embodied in this subsection, the government should not have the power to give a retiring allowance or a gratuity to an officer because he is retiring from the public service.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is done now. It can be done. There is the power to do it. All you require is to get the order of the treasury board but it is very rarely invoked, because there is always the disposition not to throw a man out unless for very strong reasons. Superannuation, as my hon. friend knows, was done away with many years ago, and a man going out now, unless he is under the old system, receives a very small gratuity in proportion to the length of service.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 31,

36. No officer shall be allowed any perquisite except as follows:

(a) Any officer whose duties require him, and who is directed by the minister, to reside on the penitentiary reserve may, during the will of the minister, occupy free of rent any house or quarters, with any grounds attached which forms part of the penitentiary property;

(b) Wardens and deputy wardens shall be entitled to free residence or quarters and to such allowance of heat, light and water as the minister deems necessary therefor;

(c) The ornamental grounds attached to the residence or quarters of a warden or deputy warden may be kept in order and cultivated by convict labour, but otherwise no convict labour shall be employed in keeping in order or cultivating any grounds occupied by an officer;

(d) Any officer may be allowed such uniform as the inspector, with the concurrence of the minister, prescribes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is simply redrafted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It has added water to the perquisites, and in these days of watered stock, perhaps it is very appropriate.

On clause 3,

37. The warden shall be a corporation sole known by the name of 'The warden of the penitentiary,' (designating the place as named in this Act, or named in the proclamation establishing it as a penitentiary), and by that name he and his successors shall have perpetual succession and may sue and be sued, and may plead and be pleaded unto, in any of His Majesty's courts.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the law as it stands.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would ask my hon. friend, purely out of curiosity, why a warden should be 'a corporation sole' as distinguished from other officers of public institutions?

Hon. Mr. POWER—In order to enable him to make contracts without any trouble, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That would apply equally to officers of other public institutions?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is word for word what is contained in the Revised Statutes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, but does my hon. friend know what led up to it? It would apparently be unnecessary to obtain a fiat from the government to institute a suit against the Crown in such a case.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is the same as section 34 of the old Act. He would not be allowed to make contracts otherwise.

On clause 45,

45. The warden shall receive into the penitentiary every convict legally certified to him as sentenced to imprisonment therein, unless certified by the surgeon of the penitentiary to be suffering from any dangerously infectious or contagious disease, and shall there detain him, subject to the rules, regulations and discipline thereof, until the term for which he has been sentenced is completed, or until he is otherwise legally discharged.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What becomes of the convict if this certificate is made by the surgeon?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He is not received. If he was sent from a jail he would have to be sent back again, and they would have to take care of him. Where there are 1,000 in a penitentiary, it would be a very serious matter to admit any convict suffering from a contagious disease.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If he is sent from a jail, the provincial authorities having once delivered him over to the federal officer for transference to the penitentiary, would refuse to receive him back. It seems to me there should be a clause providing that he be returned from whence he came. Otherwise the provincial authorities will say, 'We have issued the necessary warrant transferring him to the federal authorities and we absolutely refuse to accept him.'

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—There is no isolated hospital in any of the penitentiaries, although there is a good one for patients suffering from ordinary diseases. If a convict were found to be suffering from a very slight attack of smallpox, he might not be unwell enough to prevent his coming to Kingston, but he could not be admitted to the penitentiary. They would send him back immediately; there would be no other alternative.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But here is a case in which a prisoner, after having been tried and convicted, receives a long term sentence such as entitles the province to send him to the penitentiary. At the door of the penitentiary he is examined by the surgeon, who finds or claims to find that he has some infectious disease. The question is, what is the status of that prisoner? The long term sentence passed upon him qualifies him for the penitentiary and obliges the federal government to accept him. The federal surgeon finds that he has some infectious disease. What is to be done then? Is he to be sent to the provincial jail, which is not a place where he can be properly incarcerated?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—You can't send him back, because the railways would not take him.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Furthermore, he is not a provincial prisoner. He is a prisoner of the federal authorities. Immediately the judge sentences the man to the penitentiary he then is in the custody of the federal authorities.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. Secretary of State ascertain how prisoners who contract contagious diseases in the penitentiary are treated now? There are contagious diseases such as typhoid fever which are contracted in the penitentiary, and if the penitentiaries have not isolation hospitals they ought to have.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I may say that the penitentiaries have splendid hospitals.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If hon. gentlemen will refer to clause 44, they will see there that it is the duty of the jail surgeon to certify in the first instance and I will read the memorandum that has been sent me :

A convict is not in the custody of the warden until the latter has given a formal receipt to the sheriff. The section is intended to authorize the wardens in case of doubt to withhold the receipt until the prison surgeon shall have examined the convict: If the surgeon reports adversly the warden will refuse the receipt, and the convict still will remain in the custody of the sheriff. As the latter is a provincial officer, we have no power to direct him as to the subsequent disposal of the prisoner.

That is the practice observed, and a recent case arose in Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me that immediately the prisoner is sentenced to the penitentiary, he is in the custody of the federal authorities, and the sheriff is simply an officer of the federal authorities to deliver him to the warden. True, he is a provincial officer, but he is carrying out the functions of a federal officer in so doing. After a prisoner is sentenced to imprisonment in a penitentiary, he cannot be said to be in the custody of the province.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes, that is the law.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I question that very much.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It has certainly been settled long ago that long time prisoners are subject to be taken charge of by the federal government. I remember a case of that kind in Prince Edward Island, in which we pressed it against the federal government and obtained a settlement of it because they would not take charge of long time prisoners for a number of years, and the province was put to the expense of keeping them. Finally a settlement was made, the federal government admitting our contention and paying the amount to the province; therefore, I hold that after a prisoner has been sentenced by a court of competent jurisdiction for a long term of imprisonment, sufficiently long to entitle him to be sent to a penitentiary, then the provincial authorities have a right to forward him. He may be under the charge of their officers—of course he will be during the court and at the time of the sentence and for the purposes of the trial he is incarcerated in the jail of the province, but as soon after his conviction as possible he is sent to the penitentiary, I should say it was the duty of the federal authorities to take charge of him if he is afflicted with any disease, and they should transfer him to the hospital.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On clause 51,

51. The minister may, at any time, in his discretion, by warrant under his hand, cause any convict in a penitentiary, and who appears to the inspector to be under sixteen years of age, and susceptible of reformation, to be transferred, for the remainder of his term of imprisonment, to the reformatory prison, if there is one, of the province where such convict was sentenced.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The only change in this clause is that the minister is substituted for the Governor in Council. I happen to know something about the working of this arrangement. The Governor in Council, of course knows nothing about these matters.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But, of course, they have to take the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They cannot possibly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to know what kind of government we are governed by? If the minister does anything the government are responsible for it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, but in a matter of that kind it would be most idle to bring it before the Governor in Council.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 55,

55. When a surgeon of a penitentiary reports in writing to the warden that any convict confined in such penitentiary is insane, and ought to be removed to an asylum for the insane, the warden shall report the facts to the inspector.

2. The minister may thereupon, if an arrangement exists with the lieutenant governor of any province for the maintenance of such convict in an asylum for the insane of the province, by warrant under his hand, direct the removal of such insane convict to the custody of the official in charge of such asylum, for the unexpired portion of his sentence; and the warden of the penitentiary, when required so to do, shall deliver up to the constable or other officer or person who produces such warrant, the insane convict, together with a copy, attested by the warden, of the sentence and date of his conviction, as given to the warden on reception of the convict into his custody; and the constable or other officer or person shall give a receipt therfor, and shall thereupon, with all convenient despatch, convey and deliver up such convict, with such attested copy, into the custody of the official in charge of such asylum, who shall give a receipt therefor; and the convict shall be kept in custody in such asylum under his sentence, until the expiration or sooner determination thereof, or until his removal elsewhere under the provisions of this Act, or his discharge by law.

3. If, before the expiration of his sentence, any convict so detained in an asylum recovers his reason, and such recovery is certified to by the surgeon or medical officer in charge of such asylum, the minister may in like manner direct the removal of such convict from such asylum to the penitentiary ; and thereupon such convict may in like manner be removed and delivered again to the warden of such penitentiary, where he shall be kept in custody under his sentence.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no change in this clause except that the minister is substituted for the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No matter whether there is a change or not, we are now passing an Act from beginning to end, and I should like to have the information upon this point in reference to section 55 which has just been declared carried. If the convict becomes insane, this section provides that he may be sent to an insane asylum. As the insane asylums are all in charge of the provincial governments, what financial provision is made for such a case as that?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—It is in the law.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What part of it?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON—The federal government makes an arrangement with the provincial government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is one of the misfortunes which results from not reading the clauses. That practice leads to a great deal of discussion, simply for the reason that one clause is governed by the other, and none of us had time to look over the clauses to see what they contained. We are galloping along as though we were running a horse race.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Where we are not making any change, it was thought that it was not necessary to read the clauses. Where the law has been on the statute-book for thirty-five years, the clause is not read.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We have discussions which last half an hour, and when we look back at clauses which have not been read, we find discussion was not necessary. If the law as it stands on the statute-book for thirty-five years was all right, there was no necessity for consideration. It might, however, be possible that some suggestions could be made to improve the old law just as it is proposed to improve it by the amendments which are being offered by the government.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 57,

57. If the surgeon certifies that the person is insane, the warden shall report the fact to the inspector; and the minister shall thereupon communicate the fact to the lieutenant governor of the province within which the person was sentenced, so that he may be removed to a place of safe keeping.

2. The lieutenant governor may, thereupon order the removal of the person to a place of safe keeping within the province, and he shall, upon such order, be delivered to the person therein designated, for transport to such place, and he shall remain and be detained there or in such other place of safe keeping as the lieutenant governor, from time to time, orders until it appears to the lieutenant governor that he is of sound mind, when the lieutenant governor may order him to be discharged ; but if, at any time after his removal to such place of safe keeping, and before his complete recovery, the lieutenant governor thinks fit to order that he shall be given up to any person by him named, he shall be given up accordingly.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is, as hon. gentlemen know, an insane ward in Kingston penitentiary and, except in the case of Manitoba and British Columbia, the insane are sent to Kingston. In British Columbia and Manitoba, the provincial governments are paid $1 a day for the keep of the men who are sent from the penitentiary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is a lunatic asylum in connection with the penitentiary in Kingston. Is that a provincial institution?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no, federal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is only used for convicts.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the provincial government of Ontario pay the expenses in connection with that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I think not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It cannot be under the control of the province.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, these are under the control of the province of Manitoba and British Columbia, and in such cases the federal government pays to the province $1 a day for each convict.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then is there a lunatic asylum in Kingston penitentiary? The hon. gentleman has just told us there is an asylum connected with the penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What does it mean by the lieutenant governor discharging the insane person, in line 37? It appears to me that if a convict were confined as being insane, in the provincial asylum, that upon his recovery he should be again transferred to the federal authorities at Kingston or whatever penitentiary he may have come from; but under this clause it would appear that the lieutenant governor may discharge him.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend look at lines 45, 46 and 47.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It only applies in the case of Manitoba and British Columbia. In all other cases the convict who becomes insane is still retained and goes to the Kingston penitentiary. If he recovers from his insanity he has to serve out his term. The same rule exists as regards Manitoba and British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The insanity from which he may suffer may be but temporary. If he recovers, he should again be transferred to the custody of the Dominion authorities.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think that has been done. Provision is made in subsection 3 of section 55.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The answer of the hon. Secretary of State to the question which I proposed a few moments ago does not seem to be borne out by clause 57. The question I asked was, what was done with the prisoner who became insane while he was in the penitentiary. The answer given by the hon. gentleman was that he was placed in the asylum which is under the control of the Dominion government situated in Kingston, and which is connected with the penitentiary. That interpretation is not borne out by clause 57, which reads as follows:—

57. If the surgeon certifies that the person is insane, the warden shall report the fact to the inspector; and the minister shall thereupon communicate the fact to the lieutenant governor of the province within which the person was sentenced, so that he may be removed to a place of safe keeping.

That certainly implies that if the prisoner becomes insane the government of the province is to be notified of the fact and he is to be sent to a provincial lunatic asylum.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is only where they have no insane ward in the penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It does not say so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That has been the law ever since the penitentiary was established.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not find any provision in the law for carrying out what the hon. gentleman says.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume where the existing law has been found to work satisfactorily, they have made no change in it; that is the only explanation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But I was discussing the question on the merits of the case, as well as the law. If the person becomes insane in the penitentiary, then one would suppose he would be sent to the lunatic asylum connected with the penitentiary. If, however, there are no asylums in connection with the penitentiaries, at Dorchester or at St. Vincent de Paul, he must be sent somewhere else.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He goes to Kingston from Dorchester or St. Vincent de Paul.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How does that comport with the clauses I have just read, which provides that the lieutenant governor shall be informed of the fact, and the province takes care of him?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would infer from clause 58 that there is no asylum in connection with the Kingston penitentiary and that provision must be made by the province.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But there is.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What does clause 58 mean?

58. If the lieutenant governor of the province within which any such person was sentenced has made arrangements with the lieutenant governor of the province of Ontario for the safe keeping of any such person in Ontario, and such arrangements have been communicated to the minister by the lieutenant governors of the provinces concerned, the minister shall, in the case of any such person, communicate, under the next preceding section, with the lieutenant governor of Ontario, who shall, in such cases, have all the powers thereby given.

Assuming that a convict belongs to, say Nova Scotia, and there is no asylum in connection with Dorchester penitentiary, then it would seem that lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia would have to make some arrangement with the lieutenant governor of Ontario in order to provide for the prisoner's maintenance in an asylum in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The way it operates is this : During the term for which the convict has been sentenced, he is kept in the penitentiary, and at the expiration of his sentence, if it happens to be in the province of Ontario, he would be sent to the provincial asylum the moment his term of imprisonment there terminated.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then he would finish the term of imprisonment in the Kingston asylum?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, but in Manitoba and British Columbia he would have to go direct from them because they have no insane ward connected with either of them. In that case, the federal government pay the province $1 a day.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 66,

66. Any convict who is furnished with money or with tickets for transportation in pursuance of the provisions of subsection 4 of section 70 and who uses the same for any other than the purpose intended is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What has led to the adoption of this clause ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A certain sum of money is given to the convicts when they leave, for the purpose of taking them to the patricular part of the country to which they elect to go. If, instead of making the journey, a man spends that money in Kingston and gets drunk, he is liable to be taken up for it.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 70,

70. No convict, upon the termination of his sentence, or otherwise, shall be discharged from a penitentiary during the month of December, January or February, unless at his own request, but may remain in the penitentiary until the first day of March following the termination of his sentence ; and no convict who, at the expiration of his sentence, is found to be suffering from any acute, dangerous, contagious or infectious disease shall be discharged unless and until in the opinion of the warden such discharge may safely be made ; provided that a convict remaining from any cause in a penitentiary after the termination of his sentence, shall be under the same discipline and control as if his sentence were still unexpired.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Previously the time mentioned here covered five months instead of three. It was formerly November, December, January, February or March, but it has now been cut down to the three months mentioned.

The clause was adopted.

On schedule (a).

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have under my hand a statement showing increases and decreases as regards the Kingston penitentiary. The following is a list of the officials showing what changes have been made :

KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

Warden (with free quarters, heated and lighted) $2,600	No change.
Deputy warden (with free quarters, heated and lighted).. 1,500	"
Matron (with free quarters heated and lighted.. 600	"

Temporary guards.. ..	500	"	400.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do these officers get their meals in the penitentiary ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think so. Of course the surgeon and the chaplains do not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Are the increases in the other penitentiaries in the same ratio ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—On the same lines.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I learned that these officers do not get their meals in the penitentiary except they are detained there and cannot get home.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—St. Vincent de Paul is on a slightly lower scale.

The schedules were adopted.

On clause 32,

32. No officer, on the permanent staff of a penitentiary, shall carry on any trade or calling of profit or emolument other than his employment in the penitentiary, except by consent of the Governor in Council ; provided always that in cases where such exemption shall be granted a reduction of at least twenty per cent shall be made from the salary attached to the office or position held by such officer.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It may be well enough in the case of some of the smaller penitentiaries to allow some of the subordinate officers, perhaps a surgeon or chaplain or some other officer who lives outside, to engage in other occupations, but the warden and the deputy warden who reside in the penitentiary should certainly not be allowed to do any other business, and I would suggest that we add at the end of this clause words to this affect :

And provided that no such exemption shall be granted to any officer who resides in the penitentiary.

If the surgeon is a permanent officer and lives in the penitentiary, he should not be allowed to practice outside. Clause 28 provides that the warden and the deputy warden shall live in the penitentiary, and this proviso would prevent them from engaging in any other business.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me that this clause as it reads can only apply practically to surgeons and to clergymen. It may be possible that surgeons for the smaller penitentiaries might not have their whole time occupied in attending to them. And they might be appointed at smaller salaries than $1,200 because there is provision that the salaries may be regulated not to exceed those provided in the schedule, and clergymen if they are appointed to the penitentiary might be appointed at a lower salary than $1,200 and allowed to perform other duties at the particular stations in which they are located. I do not know any other officers connected with the penitentiary who should have that exemption. But the proviso suggested by the hon. gentleman from Halifax should be inserted to prevent the possibility of allowing the warden or deputy warden who reside in the penitentiary from doing any other business. Their time, of necessity, must be fully occupied.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The explanation given by the minister in the other House reads as follows:—

We provide an exception so that in case of some of the smaller penitentiaries where the work of the penitentiary would not fully occupy the whole time of the medical man or surgeon he might be allowed to continue in general practice outside.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I had not read that, but it is just what I supposed it was. Does the hon. gentleman accept the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, Yes.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 45,

45. The warden shall receive into the penitentiary every convict legally certified to him as sentenced to imprisonment therein (unless certified by the surgeon of the penitentiary to be suffering from any dangerously infectious or contagious disease) and shall there detain him, subject to the rules, regulations and discipline thereof, until the term for which he has been sentenced is completed, or until he is otherwise legally discharged.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What about this clause ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not really see that we can do anything. I was reading a rule of the penitentiary here. They would not receive a man and he is not considered their prisoner until the warden gives a receipt for him. It is the duty of the jail surgeon to make an examination, and this is an extra precaution in case the jail surgeon has neglected his duty.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 6,

6. The Kingston penitentiary, for the province of Ontario,—the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, for the province of Quebec,—the Dorchester penitentiary, for the province of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island,—the Manitoba penitentiary, for the province of Manitoba and all that part of the territories of Canada situate east of the one hundred and second west meridian,—the British Columbia penitentiary, for the province of British Columbia, and the Alberta penitentiary, for the province of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and for all that part of the territories of Canada, except the Yukon Territory, situate west of the one hundred and second west meridian, shall each be maintained as a prison for the confinement and reformation of persons lawfully convicted of crime before the courts of criminal jurisdiction of the province, territory or district for which it is the penitentiary, and sentenced to confinement for life, or for any term not less than two years.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest that we pass this clause, and then my hon. friend can make inquiry into the matter and when we come to the third reading, if it is necessary to make the amendment it can be done.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I have consulted a map with regard to this matter, and I think that clause 6 is all right. It takes in a portion of Saskatchewan west of the 102nd west meridian, but it is easier to reach the Manitoba penitentiary from there than it would be the Saskatchewan penitentiary.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK, from the committee, reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

INTERPRETATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (171) an Act to amend the Interpretation Act.

(In the committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The commission on revising the laws had substantially made the interpretation as it is here, but it was thought better that it should be enacted by parliament rather than that the commissioners should take upon themselves to include the clauses in the Interpretation Act. Clauses 1 and 2, and 5 and 6 are taken bodily from the English Interpretation Act. The Bill was suggested by the Deputy Minister of Justice who has had charge of the revision of the statutes, and it is at his instance that these changes are made.

Hon. Mr. JONES, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment, and it was read a third time and passed.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The order of the day being called, Committee of the Whole on Bill (194) an Act to amend the Indian Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said: As I explained on a former stage of this Bill, it is changing the amount that is payable directly to a band by the Crown, for instance for taking any portion of the land of a band, and disposing of it for the benefit of the band. Instead of funding the whole amount, it is proposed to give to the Indians for the benefit of improvements on the reserves a portion equal to one-half. Probably the House would understand it better if I just read the reasons given by the head of the Indian Department.

The amendment to the Indian Act whereby it is intended to increase the amount from ten to fifty per cent in cash that may be paid to the Indians at or about the time of the surrender of their lands to the Crown to be disposed of for their benefit has been submitted to and returned from the Justice Department and is now in form for presentation to the House.

There are in the Dominion of Canada between 1,400 and 1,500 reserves, containing in round numbers 5,000,000 of acres of land. These reserves are to be found in every province of the Dominion and consist in many, if not the majority, of cases of well selected and very valuable land.

The number of the reserves, especially those of British Columbia and, to some extent, in Nova Scotia are seldom inhabited by the bands to whom they belong, and in other sections of the country, particularly Ontario, Saskatchewan and Alberta, while the Indians permanently reside on the reserves, yet considerable portions of these are not used or occupied, and it is evident that it would be better for the Indian were these unoccupied lands disposed of and the money applied for the benefit of the band. Representations have been made to the department from time to time in the press, by ordinary correspondence and by members of parliament in the House and out of it that an effort should be made to secure the surrender of these lands in order that they may be sold, not only for the benefit of the Indians, but in order that an opportunity may be given to settlers to acquire these lands. Under the law as it now stands no portion of a reserve can be sold, alienated or leased without the consent of the Indians being first obtained under the provisions of the Act.

The Indian has evinced no very great desire to give up his land, one of the reasons advanced being that the money received from the sale thereof is kept by the department, very little of it spent on the reserve and only a small amount coming back to them by way of interest.

After making full allowance for the rights of posterity to share either in the land or the proceeds thereof it is considered advisable to increase the proportion that may be paid in cash from the proceeds at or about the time of surrender as an inducement to the Indians to consent to the department disposing of the unused portion of the reserve and thereby place in the market considerable quantities of land that may be made available for the benefit of the community generally.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand the reasons given to imply that these lands cannot be disposed of without the consent of the tribe?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They must agree to the surrender first.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The first portion of the memorandum that the hon. gentleman read would lead to the conclusion that the government may take the power without the consent of the band.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It gave reasons why power should be given to the government to sell these lands, and then afterwards it says it should be by the consent of the tribe. Do I understand that the only purpose is to give the Indians the 50 per cent instead of 10 per cent now given them ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that to be divided among the members of the tribe or to be used for the improvement of lands? The latter portion I concur in, because it is much better that the land should be sold than left in the hands of tenants. I am speaking now of Indian lands in the county where I reside. How Indian reserves in the far west are affected I do not know, but I know there are very valuable lands in the Mohawk reserve which would be better sold and in the hands of owners than remain as they are to-day occupied by tenants. Most people know how tenants, as a rule, use lands. Do I understand that the only purpose of the Act is to give the Indians a larger proportion of the money than they now receive ?

Hon Mr. SCOTT—That is the whole object.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no indication how that 50 per cent is to be disposed of. Is that left to the tribe ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I know there is some necessity for this legislation. For instance in Manitoba the Indian inspector was instructed to try to make arrangements with the Indians to surrender part of their reserve, and they decidedly objected, because the amount they were to receive was so small, and they could not appreciate the benefit of the interest later on, and some arrangement had to be made to throw that land open. Hon. gentlemen will understand that large reserves were made for the benefit of the Indians, which are not occupied by them. One reserve, the Rosseau, a portion of which was surrendered a short time ago, was sold by the government to the highest bidder, and a large sum of money was placed to the credit of the Indians, much to the benefit of the municipality in which the land was situated. I know of other large reserves in the same position. There is one at Kamsack, where not more than 25 per cent of the land is occupied by the Indians, and the government is endeavouring to get the Indians to surrender a part of that land also. The reason for asking this legislation is to empower the government to give the Indian more cash so as to get him to agree to surrender. The government cannot take the lands unless the Indians agree to relinquish them, and this legislation will permit the government to give the Indians a larger proportion of what is realized for the sale of the lands. Most of the Indians who are on the reserve where this Act will be applied in Manitoba and portions of the Northwest Territories, are Indians who are living on and cultivating their lands. They are buying wagons, horses and machinery, and farming the land generally. Most of this money will be applied by them to purchasing machinery and improving their farms. That relates particularly to the province of Manitoba. I got that information from the inspector. I think this is a good provision to make. It will facilitate making arrangements with the Indians to surrender valuable lands which they do not require, in order that they may be occupied by white settlers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no doubt about that—at least that is the view I take of it. The question I asked was whether there was to be any control by the government or its officials as to the manner in which the 50 per cent of the money paid for the lands and 10 per cent for the timber, was to be paid to the Indians, or is that left exclusively to be disposed of and managed by the Indians themselves ?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I understand the Indian receives the full benefit of the land that is sold and the 50 per cent.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who is to spend it?

Hon. Mr. WATSON—The money is given to the Indians and they spend it as they please.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not rise to oppose the measure, but I really feel a great deal of doubt as to whether it is a sort of legislation which we ought to pass. Those reserves are not intended for the Indian of the present day alone. They were intended as a permanent provision for the Indians.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is right.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And the law as we have it in the revised statutes provides that only 10 per cent of the money is to go to the Indians, and one of the effects of that is that the Indians, as a rule, are not anxious to part with their reserves because they get very little money out of them. Now we are offering half the price of the land to the Indians. That is a much greater inducement, and my own feeling about it is that there will be a tendency on the part of the Indians all over the country to part with those reserves, which would be rather an unfortunate condition of things. If the disposition of the reserves was confined to the older provinces like Nova Scotia and Ontario, I should not so much object; but in the western provinces, where there are a great many Indians, and where the lands are becoming more valuable every year, I doubt the wisdom or the fairness of the legislation.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I do not think there is any possible danger of the government who are guardians of the Indians, asking them to surrender more land than they should.

They will protect the Indians and permit them to retain enough land. It is much better in the west, particularly in Manitoba, for the Indian reserve to be further north, because they are no good where there is civilization. They are all right in other territories. If they would relinquish those lands and take other lands further north where the soil is not fit to grow wheat, they would be much better off. They should be where they could hunt and fish. In Manitoba they occupy reserves where every acre, practically, is good wheat land, and so far as any fear of the Indians being able to bargain away more land than they should, I think the Indian Department will take sufficient care that enough reserve is left for the use of the bands.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We know that in this country there are millions of acres of land in the hands of the government for sale. Why should we touch the Indian reserve? It is a foolish move; an improper thing to do. If there was a scarcity of land; if it was found that the Indians have too large a reserve, a portion might be sold with discretion, but we know that there is some one else at the bottom of this whole thing. Some one has taken a fancy to the land and has worked upon the minister or the deputy, and that is the whole scheme.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is nothing in it for the Indian. It is for the benefit of some person who wishes to get hold of the Indian reserve. Furthermore, there is no power given in this Bill to sell that land. Under this measure the government cannot give a title to it. The clause says:—

70. The Governor in Council may, subject to the provisions of this Act, direct how, and in what manner, and by whom, the moneys arising from the disposal of Indian lands, or of property held or to be held in trust for Indians.

It does not give power to sell the lands. It says the proceeds from the sale shall be disposed of.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—They have power now, if the Indian will relinquish the claim, but the land is disposed of by public tender, and they will still be disposed of in that way. But it is to induce the Indian to agree to part with his reserve by giving him a larger amount of the money.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They will do anything for money, and the money will be gone in one month. If you give an Indian three or four hundred dollars to-day, to-morrow he won't have a farthing. He spends it on guns, clothing and many articles which are of very little use to him. I do not like this Bill at all. I am sure that it is not at all for the benefit of the Indians, but in the interests of some white man who has taken a fancy to part of the reserve.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The minister in the other House said it was not proposed to interfere with the reserve. It was the isolated lands that belonged to the Indians, as a rule that are not occupied at all, and have no connection with the lands occupied by the band. Assuming the Indians would be entitled to 160 acres each, in Manitoba alone there are 106,073 acres over and above the assumed area that each Indian would be entitled to receive.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Does the hon. gentleman say it is not part of the reserve ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is not.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—It is land not occupied but is a part of the reserve. That is particularly the case in the older provinces where the lands are not occupied.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We know that the Indians occupy very small parts of the reserve. There are beautiful reserves in British Columbia, and out of 600 they cultivate about ten acres. They have a potato patch and a few cattle and horses. They do not occupy the whole of the reserves, but it would not be fair to sell them because they are not occupied.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The only portion of the Act that may be detrimental to the Indians is the handing over to the tribe of the fifty per cent of the receipts of the sale of land and the ten per cent for the timber. If that money were invested by the government in other lands where the Indians or the increase in their population could go, then the difficulty could be met. In the past the receipts of the moneys derived from sales of these lands have always been funded for the benefit of the Indians ; now they propose to take fifty per cent of the money derived from the sale of the land and give it to them as an inducement to surrender the reserve. I was going to call the attention of the senator from Halifax to an illustration of the administration of trust lands by the late government. A great number of acres of the Mohawk reserve in the township of Tyendinaga, were included in the town of Deseronto, which was a very thriving town increasing in population. This reserve land was occupied by huts and all sorts of shelters of that kind. After a great deal of persuasion, the Indian tribe met in council and consented to the sale of a portion of the reserve which was within the corporation limits, but they made this condition, that the receipts from the sale of all these town lots should be invested in land up in Bruce or in Huron district, where the younger portion of the tribe could go and settle. There was water there and hunting facilities conducive to the comfort of the Indian tribe. I do not know whether the tribe in other portions of the Dominion increases as they have been doing on the Mohawk reserve. That reserve is settled by Indians who are educated men, occupying very prominent positions, but they adhere with a tenacity that is truly wonderful to their tribal rights and the lands which belong to them. And it was only on condition that the proceeds of the sale of land should be invested in lands up on Lake Huron and Lake Superior for the younger portion of the tribe that they would consent to sell at all. If that were done in dealing with the reserve in the west it would preserve the rights of the Indian tribes. The only fear I have is that the fifty per cent of the money given to the tribe will be squandered.

Hon. Mr. RILEY—I do not think it is the intention of the department to give 50 per cent of the money derived from the sale of the lands in cash in all cases. It might be well to do that where Indians are well civilized, but where they are not civilized they should not get the money. The Indians of the west only get the treaty money, $5 a head. It is intended to furnish those agencies with stock, implements, etc.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If those tribes to whom the money is to be given are not civilized and do not know how to use it, that is the strongest possible argument that they should not be allowed to have it.

Hon. Mr. RILEY—They would not give the 50 per cent to any but civilized tribes.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—I think the power taken under this Bill is that they may use it to get the Indians to relinquish the land. The management of the Indians of Canada in the past, under all governments, has been such that they can be trusted to look carefully after the interests of the Indians in the future. They ask for power under this Bill to give the Indians the immediate use of 50 per cent of the money derived from the sale of their lands. The land I speak of was sold at $15 an acre. The Indians who held that land, as a matter of fact, lived away back on another reserve 15 miles from the place. I know the agent had a great deal of difficulty to get the Indians to relinquish the land, because they wanted to get a steam threshing machine, and some wind mills. I know the agent made some arrangement with them by getting some advance from the department, to assist in getting those things before they would relinquish the land. The interests of the Indians will be perfectly safe in the hands of the Indian Department.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I see the minister stated in another place that the lands held by Indians in the Territories of Saskatchewan and Alberta, are 2,171,114 acres over and above the 160 acres granted to each family of five.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They require room for hunting,

Hon. Mr. JONES. There is this danger to be considered: any land sold hereafter will bring increased values. I should think that 35 per cent or 40 per cent is the proportion of the money received from the sale of the lands that will be paid to the Indians under this Bill. Though the department take power to give 50 per cent they will not exercise that power except under exceptional conditions. I should think beyond all question that the amount left after paying 50 per cent to the Indians would leave a far larger sum in the hands of the government than at the time of the passing of the Bill we are proposing to amend would have been left, on the basis of paying the Indians even 10 per cent. The lands have grown in value, the sum that will be given to the Indians will be helpful if it is reasonably well used, and I suppose it is reasonable to expect that it will be more appropriately used than it was in earlier years. The sum left in the hands of the government would, in my opinion, be much larger than in the earlier years in the history of the country. There are hardships to the settlers that live in the vicinity of reserves which also should be considered, in the matter of taxation, the making of roads, the building of schools, &c. The settlers will be materially helped in certain directions if the law is, as it has been so far as I know—and I heard no complaints—intelligently administered; so that new conditions having arisen it is natural that some greater power be given to the department to deal with what are materially larger sums for the Indians than there were when the Act of 1898 was brought into force.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Indians deserve the first consideration above every white man and every settler. It is their country, and they are a helpless people requiring the fostering care of the government and they should not be robbed of an acre of land to please any white man.

Hon. Mr. JONES—I should be glad, if the department thought it workable, to see a condition in the law providing that where a tribe dispose of a part of their reserve or all of their lands if they will, should they dispose of such portions as will leave them less than 160 acres each, then to that extent, it should be made up by a reserve elsewhere. Some scheme of that kind might be considered by the department. I think it will become a necessity, because there are a number of reserves where it will be in the best interests of the tribe themselves, as well as in the interests of the country that they should be treated in that way, give them what will be to them a very considerable sum of money indeed, and in lieu of the remainder such land as will be worth more to the Indian than the land he has now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The explanation given by the Minister of the Interior in another place indicates that he thinks it is only reasonable that some of the vast values which are held in land in trust for the Indians should be turned to account instead of coming to parliament for the money. He said that he did not wish to advance 50 per cent of the purchase price unless it was necessary to do so to procure a sale of the land, recognizing that it is better that the Indians should have the money in fund and only receive the interest from year to year. But where it was desirable in the interest of a growing town to secure lands, the urgency of the case must, to some extent, govern the action of the department.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A good deal of argument has been advanced, it seems to me, with the idea that I or those who have spoken upon this question were opposing the principle of the Bill. That is not the difficulty I have in reference to it, my only objection was to the payment of the 50 per cent of the proceeds of the sale of these valuable lands. Unless great care is taken it will be found that the same harpies will hover around the tribes when the money is paid as were in evidence when the scrip was given to the half-breeds. Some people managed to find out that this scrip was to be issued and they were thus placed in a position to secure a transfer of it at very low prices. The Indian has no idea of providing for the future. If he can satisfy the needs of the moment, that is sufficient, and if the band gets this 50 per cent the fear I have is that it will fall into the hands of just such characters as those who robbed the half-breeds of their scrip.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the Chair.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that the Speaker do now leave the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The chairman will observe that we have already fully discussed the provisions of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. THIBAUDEAU (Rigaud), from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment. The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

COURT OF APPEAL FOR MANITOBA BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (195) An Act respecting the Court of Appeal for Manitoba. He said: This Act is to come into force so soon as the Act of the legislature of Manitoba passed at the session thereof held in the 5th and 6th years of His Majesty's reign, intituled an Act respecting the Court of Appeal, is brought into force. When Manitoba brings that legislation into force we are to be prepared for it. The chief point is that the contested elections are to be tried before the Court of Appeal, rather than before the Court of King's Bench in Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There is some discrepancy as between the title of the Bill and clause 7, which makes a provision applying to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, British Columbia and the Northwest Territories, while the title of the Bill says that it is an Act respecting the Court of Appeal for Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the provinces named this class of cases are left to the Supreme Court to control, but in the province of Manitoba it is provided that when the Court of Appeal is brought into force by proclamation it will have control of controverted elections.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think that meets the point I have called attention to. If one were looking for something relating to courts in the lower provinces, one would not expect to find it under such a title as we have in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend will observe that what the Act purports to do is to amend another Act which does not concern the Court of Appeal for Manitoba at all. There should be a substantive Act to carry out the provisions of this amendment. It may possibly affect Manitoba but it has nothing to do with the constitution of the Court of Appeal.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is not the difficulty that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield thinks. Chapter 14 of the statutes of 1894 is an Act dealing with the disfranchising of voters who have taken bribes. Section 20 of that Act deals with appeals from the decision of the court which disfranchises any voter, and it provides that the appeal shall be, in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia and in the Northwest Territories, to the Supreme Court en banc in the said provinces and territories respectively, and in Manitoba to the Court of Queen's Bench. The Bill now before us, instead of saying that paragraph (c) of section 20 of the Act which I have referred to shall be amended, re-enacts the whole of paragraph (c) with the desired amendment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would have been very much better had that Act been amended by a substantive Act instead of introducing the provision into an Act which has nothing to do with the subject.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, the appeal is to this Court of Appeal.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I quite appreciate that. May I ask my hon. friend, while I am on my feet, if the government have made their selections of judges for this court?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That means they have not appointed them yet I suppose?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have not thought of it yet.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the government has not thought of who the judges are to be, the proposed judges have given very serious consideration to their own appointments.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

On the motion that the Bill be considered in Committee of the Whole to-morrow—

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend recall whether the salaries mentioned in clause 7 are the same as those paid in the Court of Appeal in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I think not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They are certainly not in excess of the amounts mentioned in clause 7. However, we can look into that when we are in committee.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Bill (47) An Act respecting Forest Reserves.—(Hon. Mr. Scott).

FISCAL YEAR BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (162) An Act respecting the Fiscal Year.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the suspension of rules 17 and 41 as far as affects this Bill. He said: The Deputy Governor is to assent to Bills to-morrow, and perhaps it would be well to have this disposed of to-night.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I may say that the 5th clause of this Bill says: 'This Act shall come into force on the 1st day of July, 1906. We are not likely to have the Deputy Governor down again before prorogation, and we shall not have prorogation before the 1st of July.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

(In the Committee).

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct the attention of the committee to what is clearly an error. Clause 2 of the Bill reads :

2. Section 37 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, chapter 29 of the revised statutes, is repealed and the following is substituted therefor :—

37. The public accounts shall include the period from the first day of April in one year to the thirty-first day of March in the next year.

That leaves out at least one or two days in the year. The section which this repeals reads as follows :

The public accounts shall include the period from the 30th June in one year to the 30th June in the next year.

And clearly that is more nearly correct.

Hon. Mr. JONES—That leaves out a day also.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It may do that. Although there is nothing in our Interpretation Act about it, I think one day is included, and one day excluded in the calculation of time in that way and my suggestion is that we should substitute for the 1st day of April, the 31st day of March in the first instance so as to make it correspond with the original Act. The nine months is made perfectly clear.

The clause reads :

5. This Act shall come into force on the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and six, except that the fiscal year 1906-1907 shall consist of nine months only, beginning on the said first day of July and ending on the thirty-first day of March.

That would certainly include both dates.

Hon. Mr. JONES—If you make changes it will have to go back to the Commons.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But you cannot assent to a Bill which leaves out one day.

Hon. Mr. JONES—The hon. gentleman's contention is that heretofore there has been one day left out, and now there will be two days.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, I did not say that. In the calculation of time you include one day and exclude the other.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The first year certainly is well defined, because it says it shall begin on the 1st of July and end on the 31st March. If it should be thought wise to change it another year we can do so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I must take issue with the hon. gentleman from Halifax. In a lease would not those three days be included ? The text of the Statute must be taken into consideration, and I would have no hesitation in saying that both days would be included.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We have set that matter completely at rest by the first clause of the Interpretation Act which we have passed this evening. I think the following makes it entirely clear that it will include both these dates :

1. Where an Act, or any order in council, order, warrant, scheme, letters patent, rule, regulation, or by-law, made, granted, or issued, under a power conferred by any Act, is expressed to come into operation on a particular day, the same shall be construed as coming into operation immediately on the expiration of the previous day.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not say anything about when the Act is to come into operation.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (170) An Act respecting Immigration and Immigrants.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (135) An Act respecting the Empire Trust Company, and to change its name to the Dominion Trust Company.—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

PETITION FROM AN ALIEN.

The SPEAKER—I have received a petition from James T. Patterson, from New York, an alien.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not in order now, it should be read to-morrow.

The SPEAKER—Praying for the payment of money. When the motion is made to receive the petition, any other motion can be made then.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—The hon. Speaker has charge of the petition and it entails an expenditure of money. I ask is it in order? It looks bad for the Speaker to present a petition that is not in order.

The SPEAKER—I mentioned the fact that it was from an alien and that it asked for an expenditure of money.

Hon. Mr. YOUNG—I should think that the fact that it asks for an expenditure of money was sufficient to rule it out.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

SENATE.

OTTAWA, Tuesday, June 26, 1906.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (198) An Act respecting the British America Assurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Young.)

Bill (199) An Act respecting the Western Assurance Company.—(Hon. Mr. Watson.)

Bill (135) An Act respecting the Empire Trust Company and to change its name to the Dominion Trust Company.—(Hon. Mr. Mitchell.)

REVILLON BROTHERS BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (76) An Act respecting the Revillion Brothers (Limited), with amendments.

Hon. Mr. COFFEY moved concurrence in the amendments.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suggested to the chairman of the committee that some of the paragraphs of this Bill should be restricted in their operation. The Bill already contains larger powers than have been given to any other company, and some of the powers are quite unusual. As originally drafted, I think, the provisions were too general. My suggestion was that the paragraphs which particularly affected the public interest should be restricted. For instance paragraph 1, of this Bill reads:

> 1. Revillon Brothers, Limited, hereinafter called 'the company,' may make contracts with any government, corporation or person, for the carriage of the mails in any portion of the territory in which its fur and trading posts are now or hereafter may be established.

There is nothing to prevent their having trading posts at Toronto, Ottawa, or Montreal, and that would practically give them power to run a mail between those places. I suggested that it should read as follows:

> May make contracts with any government, corporation or person for the carriage of mails in any portion of the unorganized territory in which fur and trading posts are now or hereafter may be established.

There can be no objection to that. I am quite sure it escaped the attention of the government and the members of the House of Commons; otherwise it would never have been allowed to come up in that form. Then the expression in clause 3: 'between any of its posts or settlements' evidently contemplated that its operations were not to be carried on wherever telegraphs and telephones had already been established, and I should also limit that to the unorganized territory where they are operating. It would not in any way prevent them from making a connection at the boundary with any company, either telegraph or telephone, which has already been chartered in Canada. Then in regard to clause 9, it is quite evident that the company themselves had not any notion of carrying on an express or money-order business in any part of the settled parts of the Dominion, because this clause distinctly speaks of the territory in which its fur and trading posts are now or may be hereafter established. All I ask is to qualify that by inserting the words: 'In any portion of the unorganized territories.' If the promoters of the Bill are willing to accept my amendments, I have no objection to their going through now. Otherwise I shall move that they be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Hon. Sir GEORGE DRUMMOND—The points now proposed by the hon. leader of the government were duly placed before the committee and were considered at some length. They did not meet the views of the majority of the committee and, therefore, were not adopted; but I must say that I hold a similar view myself. I do not object to the powers and privileges granted to the firm of Revillon Brothers, but I think it was their purpose and intention, and it is only fitting, that these powers and privileges should be limited by some territorial definition, which the words now proposed by the hon. leader of the government would effect, in my view.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite sure the promoters of the Bill, if they apprehended the character of my suggestions, could have no possible objection to them. Every one, I think, will recognize that it would be preposterous to say that the firm might carry on a mail or money order business, between say Montreal and Toronto. That was never contemplated. The powers asked for will be of great advantage in connection with their posts in the unorganized territories. I will give a formal notice later on that the amendments will appear on the order paper; meantime I move that they be taken into consideration to-morrow..

The motion was agreed to.

COMMANDER SPAIN'S SERVICES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Landry) inquired:

What is the name of the ship, or the names of the ships, if there are more than one, on board of which Commander Spain discharged the duties of a master of a sea-going ship in the merchant marine, before obtaining his certificate of service on the 2nd of February, 1893?

What was the length of service thus performed by Commander Spain in the merchant marine, specifying the dates of command which he exercised on each of the ships in question?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Commander Spain's service has been in the Royal Navy, and in the Department of Marine. He was thirteen years in the Royal Navy, and has been sixteen years in the Marine Department.

By law he is entitled to, and obtained his merchant marine master's certificate in accordance with section 99, 57-58 Victoria, chapter 60, Merchant Shipping Act, on account of his previous service in the Royal Navy. During his 16 years service in the department he has had a great deal of experience with the merchant service, the branch of the department under his supervision bringing him constantly into relation with merchant shipping.

THE LUMINOUS BUOY ON ST. THOMAS BANK.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Landry) inquired:

Was the substitution of an acetylne light for the Pintsch gas light in the luminous buoy on the St. Thomas bank—a substitution which according to the statement of the government took place on the 24th of October, 1905—announced in the 'Canada Gazette,' and on what date?

Was it otherwise announced and in what way was it communicated to those interested?

And when?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer to the first question is 'No'. To the second and third questions: It was not otherwise announced as no change was made in the aid to navigation beyond substituting acetylene for Pintsch gas. Changes of this nature are never advertized by the department.

PENITENTIARIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The order of the day being called:

Third reading Bill (176) an Act respecting Penitentiaries, as amended:

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said: I was giving the House information on the point of describing the boundary between Manitoba and the Territories. I made inquiry in the survey branch of the Interior Department and the answer was that it was correct, but that it would be verified more properly if it read in this way:—

Of that part of the Territories of Canada situated east of the province of Saskatchewan, and of the 102nd meridian.

I move that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by inserting the words I have just mentioned.

Hon. Mr. WATSON—According to that description a portion of the territory north of Saskatchewan and east of the 102nd meridian will be left out.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Should it not read 'And for all that part of the territory of Canada except the Yukon territory, situated west of the 102nd meridian?' You are now making provision for the inclusion of certain territory within the district of the Alberta penitentiary. Consequently the territory must be west of the 102nd meridian.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, east of the 102nd meridian; we are describing the territory of the Manitoba penitentiary.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I will point out that the same amendment should be made in the 28th line of the 6th clause, only substituting west for east.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a rather delicate matter. I referred it to the Interior Department and they have taken the responsibility of it. Possibly there is a neck of land to the north that would not be included, but I am not prepared to make any further change.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understand the position, it is this: there is a sort of corner of the province of Saskatchewan which extends to the eastward of the 102nd meridian. The amendment which the hon. Secretary of State has just made provides for that corner on the one side. It provides that everything east of the eastern boundary of Saskatchewan, and of the 102nd meridian shall come within the territory of the Manitoba penitentiary, and it seems to me that the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition is a very important one. That if you define the territory of Manitoba penitentiary on one side, you have to define the territory of Alberta penitentiary on the other side, and I think that the same words should be inserted before 'the 102nd meridian' in the 28th line.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the information given me, it was not considered absolutely necessary to put this clause in at all, but it was for greater certainty and to make it more easily understood. The line which my hon. friend states ought to be changed, is situated west of the 102nd meridian. That is the correct description. I do not think we need repeat these words again.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am satisfied it won't work out on the map correctly.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move the third reading of the Bill as amended.

The motion was agreed to, the Bill was read the third time and passed.

MILITIA PENSION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (200) An Act to amend the Militia Pension Act, 1901.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This clause is the same as clause 1 except that it is in regard to the non-commissioned officers and men who are taken over to the garrison at Halifax from the imperial office.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In what Bill do you make provision for contribution to be paid by the imperial government for the time served in the imperial force?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is arranged with the imperial government.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why is it not embodied in this Bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is simply a matter of correspondence.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will it not then be obligatory upon the Canadian government to pay those men a pension?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not with the assurance of the War Office that they are prepared to pay them. They have agreed to transfer to Canada from time to time, and, as each man is transferred, he is entitled each year to so much of his pension and a certain amount is handed over annually to Canada, which is passed to the credit of the fund here. Their men are in a different position from ours. Our men make a payment, as under the superannuation fund, toward a fund from which they get their pensions.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This is a mutual arrangement between the two governments, as I understand it. The pension is a right to which the pensioner is entitled; he can collect it by law I suppose. Consequently in this Act it is not conditional. The Canadian government is not making it conditional upon this time being counted that the imperial government should contribute the proportion to which the soldiers would be entitled. It seems to me it should all be conditional upon the imperial government contributing the proper proportion of the pension.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume we can place confidence in the imperial government that they will carry out what they propose, without including a provision in an Act of parliament. It would not have any more effect even if we did, because we cannot coerce them. They have already agreed as to the men we take over that they will account to Canada for the proportion of the pension which they should pay.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am rather surprised that the hon. leader of the opposition should raise any question, even if there is no provision, that the imperial authorities should pay a proportion of the pension. I think if we get the services of these British officers and soldiers we are doing our duty as citizens of the empire in allowing the time which they have spent in the service of the empire under the imperial authorities, to count towards their pension.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is simply equivalent to saying that because of the existence of an imperial spirit, we should recklessly draw Acts of parliament and make no provision for the proper carrying out of a compact of this nature. That is no good reason why the statute should not be conditional upon the imperial government contributing their share of the pensions.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The suggestion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax might work out very adversely as regards Canada if any considerable number of these officers had put in the greater portion of their term of service before coming to Canada. Assuming that some of them have only one or two years to put in in order to complete their term of service, it would be scarcely fair that we should undertake the duty of pensioning them for the rest of their lives; but, as the hon. Secretary of State has told us that there is an arrangement between the two governments with regard to the matter, no doubt it can be worked out. I should like to know whether these men who become officers of the permanent force of Canada will become contributors to a pension fund in the same way as our own officers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The imperial government do not exact any annual payment as we do. We exact 5 per cent each year.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will our principle be made to apply in these cases?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, the time they serve in the imperial army is credited to them. I observe that the leader of the opposition in the other House asks whether the imperial government would reimburse the Canadian government year by year. Sir Frederick Borden replied that they would, that an account is kept with each officer, and that he is credited annually with the proper amount. That amount will be paid to the Canadian government when the officer has earned his pension under the Canadian law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do our mititia volunteers who are on service, pay into a superannuation fund?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, 5 per cent is deducted from their pay annually and funded. The Minister of Militia informed the House of Commons that that fund was practically self-sustaining. The men have to serve a long term before becoming entitled to a pension. If they retire before the expiration of 20 years they do not receive a pension, simply a donation, so that the fund practically is large enough to meet the demands upon it at the present time. That is with regard to the permanent force.

Hon. Mr. DAVID, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

BILLS ASSENTED TO.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (201) An Act to amend the Militia Act.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (202) An Act respecting roads and road allowances in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (157) An Act to incorporate the Hillcrest Railway, Coal and Coke Company.—(Hon. Mr. Gibson.)

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

ORDER POSTPONED.

The order of the day being called :

House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill (C) An Act to further amend the General Inspection Act.—(The Right Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT (in the absence of Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) moved that this order be discharged and placed on the orders of the day for Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend must know that the government has no intention of proceeding with this Bill during the present session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not care to discharge it in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce—that is the reason.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

ORDER DISCHARGED.

The order of the day being called :

Committee of the Whole House on (Bill H) an Act to amend the Railway Act, 1903, with respect to the operation of mortgages.—(Hon. Mr. Béique.)

Hon. Mr. POWER (in the absence of Hon. Mr. Béique)—I find that it is impracticable to get this Bill passed this session. I, therefore, move that this order of the day be discharged.

The motion was agreed to.

GRAND RIVER AND WESTERN POWER COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

The order of the day being called :

Consideration of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to (Bill Z) an Act to incorporate the Grand River and Western Power Company.—(Hon. Mr. McMullen.)

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved that the amendments be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN moved the third reading of the Bill. He said : The parties have come together and the opposition is withdrawn. I have here a copy of the agreement executed between the parties. I spoke to Mr. Gibson, and he said he had no further opposition to the Bill. They have agreed with the town of Dunnville to give them some two hundred horse-power for all time to come, free, and have also agreed not to lower the Grand river below the ordinary level of the water.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I am very sorry indeed that my temporary absence from the House caused me to miss that which I intended to do.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has plenty of time yet.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—I think not. My intention was to move that this Bill be referred back to committee. My reason for so intending is that the Bill is absolutely without the jurisdiction of this parliament. It deals with properities entirely within the jurisdiction of Ontario. All the streams involved are provincial streams, over which this parliament or the Dominion government have no control whatever, and in so far as the Bill is concerned it will be a dead letter under any circumstances. It will have no effect, because as I said before, it is entirely without the jurisdiction of this government or this parliament. I may be answered : 'Well if that is your view, why not let it go ?' Simply because I do not want to see this Senate do what I think it should not do. However, it is now too late, I regret to say, to make the motion I intended, and the only thing I can do is to avail myself of the motion of which I gave notice a day or two ago, that on the third reading of the Bill I would move that clause 17 be striken out, which I now do. In making this motion I am simply adhering to a principle which I have advocated ever since I have had the honour of a seat in parliament ; namely, that the power of expropriation is an extraordinary power—a power which should only be exercised under extreme circumstances. Under any circumstances it is an infringement upon the right of the subject, but in dealing with railways, telegraph lines and enterprises of that kind there is perhaps justification; but in so far as a private undertaking is concerned, purely an industrial company, there is no reason whatever why any such power should be given. It may be said that this is a very large company. It is true it appears to be a large company, but the principle is exactly the same as if it were a small company, and if the principle is to be adopted by the parliament of Canada that such power is to be given to large companies, then it must also be given to small companies.

What would be the effect if all the industrial companies throughout the land possessed the power of expropriation? I was one of those who firmly believed that the rights of the subject would always be guarded in the Senate of Canada, and I am one of those who would be very sorry indeed if the principle ever prevails here that this injustice—for I consider it unjust legislation—should prevail. I have been many years in parliament, and I have attended, perhaps, as many committees dealing with private Bills as any other member. I have heard several discussions upon this subject, but the first occasion, in my presence, on which a company of this kind has received powers of expropriation was a few days ago in the committee when this Bill was assented to. I may not be able to accomplish anything, but there is one thing I always will do, and that is to adhere to the principles which I believe to be right, the principles which I believe to be best in the interests of the people of the country, and I shall never consent to a private corporation—because this is a private corporation —obtaining the right of expropriation for private purposes. For these reasons I move that clause 17 of the Bill be stricken out.

Hon. Mr. POWER—One cannot help having a great deal of respect for the opinion of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down; but I think he is somewhat mistaken. One would imagine that the rights of private individuals were going to be subjected to a very great danger, and that there was great risk of serious injustice being done if the right of expropriation was granted to this company. Now the right of expropriation which is granted by this Bill is the same right which the united wisdom of parliament has caused to be inserted in the Railway Act. The rights of the owners of lands are very carefully protected; and, as a matter of fact, instead of having their property taken from them without sufficient remuneration, as a rule the owners get a great deal more than the lands are worth. I think that is a fact about which there can be no question. Still, if the hon. gentleman's statement that this right of expropriation had never been given to a company of this kind until this case came up were correct, there would be a great deal of force in his contention, and I for one should be somewhat disposed to support him; but the hon. gentleman is quite in error. With the permission of the House I wish to call attention to a few enactments contained in the statutes of 1903 and 1904. The first Act to which I direct attention is chapter 96, of the Acts of 1903. That is an Act respecting the Canadian Northwest Irrigation Company. Section 6 of that Act gives powers of expropriation, and makes the provisions of the Railway Act applicable to the works of that company, just as they are made applicable to the works of this company.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is that a private Bill?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes. I shall not cite any but private Acts. Chapter 109 of the same year is an Act to incorporate the Columbia River Improvement Company, Limited, an Act very much on the same lines as the Bill before us. Section 17 of that Act gives the same powers of expropriation which are given by section 17 of this Bill. Chapter 119 of the Acts of the same year is intituled 'An Act to incorporate the Erie, Ontario Power Company', and section 17 of that Act gives powers the same as those which are given by section 17 of the Bill before us.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—One wrong does not justify another.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Chapter 170 is the next one to which I call attention, 'An Act to incorporate the Ottawa and Quebec Power Company'. Section 7 of that Act, subsections 2 and 3 give powers of expropriation such as are given in the Bill before us.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—What company is that ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Ottawa and Quebec Power Company.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Where is the location of their operations ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Their operations were to be near the Ottawa river and the works were to be near the head of the Remoux rapids on the Ottawa river. Chapter 188 is 'An Act to incorporate the Sault St. Louis Light and Power Company.' Section 12 of that Act gives the same powers of expropriation as are given in the Bill before the House. Then I take the next year, 1904, and I find chapter 65 of the Acts of 1904 is, 'An Act to incorporate the Cedars Rapids Manufacturing and Power Company.' Under section 12 of that Act the company has the same rights which are given by section 17 of this Bill. Chapter 107 of the Acts of the same year is 'An Act to incorporate the Okotoks and High River Lumbering and Developing Company,' and section 9 of that Act gives the same power that are given by the 17th clause of this Bill ; and, unless I am very much mistaken, we have already passed this session an Act giving similar powers. I do not think it would be fair to single out this particular enterprise for exceptional treatment.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS—I do not think we should single out this company and treat it differently from any other company, but it really seems to me time the attention of parliament was directed to Bills of this kind. I quite agree with the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Russell, that it is all very well, where there is a great public undertaking, to come in and take private property, and that no doubt was the reason why many Acts contain this particular clause. But to apply this particular clause of this Bill to purely a private company seems to me to be going far beyond what is just and fair. It makes no difference that a man is to be compensated for his property if he does not want to part with it. This is a private company, organized entirely for the benefit of the persons incorporated in it, and we should give the company no more right than an individual. If I came to parliament and wanted power to expropriate the property of the Senate for the purpose of carrying out some project the position would be the same as in the present case. If the company cannot get it, then it cannot get it, and that may be no very great harm. I do not think the Parliament of Canada is bound to do an injustice simply to enable a private company to expropriate the rights of another person, even if those rights are paid for, and even if the parliament declares that this company, which is a private company purely, is going on with an undertaking for the general benefit of Canada. If we continue to stretch the constitution to the extent to which it is stretched, what earthly right can there be guaranteed to a province, and what is the use of my hon. friend bringing forward the rights of Quebec. It seems to me that on no occasion, except for a public undertaking of an undoubted character in which all the country can share, should individual rights be taken, whether they are paid for or not, so long as the individual does not wish to part with them.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—I do not understand how this can be called absolutely a private company when you have a declaratory clause stating that the works are for the general advantage of Canada. That clause has been unanimously passed. This company will develop power for the use of all the industrial enterprises that may be on the borders of this canal. If you do not wish to grant this company the power of expropriation, you render the Bill absolutely void, because any single proprietor along the course of the undertaking could block the whole enterprise. We have discussed this over and over again. This is not like a private concern, such as a sawmill or a store ; this is an undertaking to supply power to the public generally, under certain regulations, and at certain prices, for the benefit of the whole surrounding country. I do not see why you single out this particular company from all others unless there is a desire to kill the charter and prevent the Bill becoming law, because the Bill would not be worth the paper it is printed on without the power of expropriation. I submit, therefore, that the clause should stand as it is and the report of the committee should be adopted.

Hon. Mr. McGREGOR—The declaration that it is for the general advantage of Canada does not make it so.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—Next to railways, power and light are two of the most important matters affecting the welfare of the people of Canada to-day. Electricity has been working wonders in manufacturing. This project is for the production of electric power that will be used, in all probability, in the immediate vicinity of where the power is produced as well as in Hamilton and Toronto. It is just as necessary to the development and prosperity and progress of this country that electric companies should be given a free hand to produce power cheaply, as it is that railway companies should have power to build railways. They are both necessary in the development of the country. As my hon. friend said a moment ago, if the power of expropriation were asked by a milling company, for its own use solely, it would be a different thing: this is for the development of power to be supplied at a low rate whereever it is needed in that neighbourhood. It is a matter of vital interest to this country that we should encourage the development of cheap power.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—That is a very nice argument advanced by the hon. gentleman. He always does make a nice argument when he is going to support anything. This power of expropriation should be guarded very carefully, as each case is a law unto itself. I seconded cheerfully the motion of my hon. friend from Ottawa to expunge this clause, because I think it is the most dangerous power ever exercised in this Senate to give to any private individual the power to take land from individuals and pay them whatever they like.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They do not do that.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—If I were sure the project was for the general advantage of Canada, I might not object. But who knows whether it is or is not ? Do you think these people have organized this company for the special benefit of Canada ? Is it not for the benefit only of those who compose the company ? Unless they can show that there are good reasons why this scheme is for the benefit of the public in the immediate neighbourhood of the work, the power of expropriation should not be granted.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (de Lanaudière)—The hon. gentleman from Kingston says that unless they can show it is for the general advantage of Canada, and in the public interest, this power should not be granted. They are not being granted the power asked for unless they can show to the satisfaction of the Minister of Railways and to the railway board that it is for the general advantage. They must have produced their plans of expropriation, due notice must have been served on the owners, and the owners can then be heard in opposition to the application. There is plenty of notice and plenty of recourse, and it is only after this company has made it absolutely certain to the satisfaction of the Minister of Railways and Canals, and of the railway board, that these rights are absolutely needed, and later all the parties are heard and after the plans have been deposited in the registry office of the county where they are doing the work, for 30 days, that the power will be granted. I think therefore, that the public interest is perfectly guarded.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—We are perhaps getting a little away from the real issue. This charter gives great powers and privileges to a company of individuals who have joined together for their mutual profit. It is not a public enterprise being formed solely from philanthropic motives, nor is there evidence that there is any special demand for it, or any great outcry in the community for the granting of this charter. Those who are asking it are asking for the great privilege of creating power to be farmed out and sold by them and transmitted to distant parts. For that purpose they are proposing to use the waters of a public stream over which this Dominion has no control, but which is vested in the province of Ontario, which has a legislature of its own and which can deal with its rights if they are interfered with. We have heard of no application to the province ; of no right conceded by the province. Power is asked for to pass over private lands, to divert the waters of the Grand river across a section of the country passing over private lands. The waters are to be discharged into a stream known as the Jordan, which flows also through private lands. The Jordan is a small stream which used to be called Twelve Mile Creek. From that it will discharge the waters down into Lake Ontario. I ask any one seriously to say, is it not a farce to call a work of that description, one for the general advantage of Canada ? The Senate has not assented to that yet. It is open to the Senate to refuse to pass this Bill, with that clause in it.

Hon. Mr. DAVID—But the declaration is there and the committee accepted that declaration.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—Yes, but it is open to the Senate to say that with that clause in the Bill they will not pass it. It is just as open for consideration on the next motion that is to be made as it would be at any time, so that this Senate has not concluded itself at all by the action of the committee. The point that I want to make is, that here is a scheme of private individuals who seek from us an Act of incorporation and ask us to give them power of interfering with streams under the control of the province of Ontario, and out of that property to be enabled to create a power company and to produce power for mercantile purposes entirely for their own gain. That is their whole proposition, and although this declaration that it is a work for the general advantage of Canada is in this clause, we are not bound as yet by that because we have not affirmed it in this House. Although the committee did pass it, I do not think we are in any sense concluded by it. Under these circumstances, what should we do ? Confer this power ? Oh, yes, the railway companies have it. Sometimes great hardship is experienced by individuals in the exercise of the rights which are conferred upon railways with respect to that power of expropriation. The compensation given for lands taken, it is true, is sometimes high. In other cases everybody knows the people are not at all compensated for the injury which has been done them. It is a question of definite interference with provincial and private rights. What call is there, what necessity is there, for this? Why should this parliament declare that this company shall have the power to take the land of a farmer in the county of Haldimand or in the county of Welland? Why should they take any part of his land ? Why should they cut his farm in two, possibly destroying it altogether ? What would you think if it were your own farm that was being dealt with in that way ? And yet that is the way you should think of it now. If a case were made out of necessity for this power being given to the company ; if a case were made out that while it was going to injure some people it was going to confer a great benefit upon others, and that the community at large were interested in seeing that the power was conferred ; then there would be some excuse ; but no case of that kind has been made out. It is simply a case of certain persons forming themselves into a company and coming here and asking for incorporation, obtaining powers which as individuals they could not have, and then asking this additional power from you. I say it is wrong. I submit that the fact that it has been done in other cases is no precedent at all. We have done it in some cases and we have refused it in others where the demand has been resisted. Where it has passed through unobserved it has been granted ; but it has been refused many times. In 1904 it was refused two or three times.

Hon. Mr. McMULLEN—In what case ?

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—The power company here at Hull for one.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That was a very exceptional case.

Hon. Mr. KERR (Toronto)—If ever there was a case where private rights should give way, it seems to me it was in that case, but nowithstanding the fact that there was a demand for power, that the water-power was not producing all the energy required, and that by introducing such works as were proposed the available power for manufacturing would be increased a great many times ; yet in that case it was resisted, and because private rights were going to be interfered with it was refused. So in the case of the Thompson River Company, where those who were erecting booms were going to interfere with the rights of parties and expropriate their property, this power was struck out. There are other instances; there is no use in multiplying them, and the cases in which the power has been granted cannot be considered as forming a binding precedent. As the hon. gentleman from Kingston says, if we have done wrong in the past, that is no reason why we should repeat it now. There is no reason shown why that clause should be inserted in the Bill, declaring the work to be one for the general advantage of Canada. It is a distinct interference with the present use of the waters of the Grand river, which are within the control of the province of Ontario, and dependent upon which are great rights in the town of Dunnville, both public and private, where Dunnville may, by the raising of these waters, be flooded or where it may be, as was explained to the committee, that if the waters are drawn off to too great an extent, private interests might be seriously interferred with and the whole community affected. Under these circumstances I do not think any case has been made out for this power being included in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I did not think when my hon. friend from Rockland (Hon. Mr. Edwards) made his motion that it would be regarded serious as to call for very much of an argument. I thought the proposition was so simple at this time of day that it did not call for very much discussion. However, some hon. gentlemen seem to think that it does, and, therefore, it becomes necessary to put the case as it appears to me. Great stress is laid on the fact that this is a private company. It is no more a private company than a company seeking a railway charter. They are precisely in the same position. Neither of them come to the parliament of Canada as philanthropists. They come for the purpose of making money for themselves, but their proposition is of so public a nature, and so much to the public advantage, that parliament sees good to the public arising from the building of the railway or the construction of the works, and they are therefore prepared to do what is necessary to facilitate their operation. It is a fact which need not be argued, that we could not have railways without the power of expropriation, and I am inclined to think we could not in many cases have power works without the power of expropriation. What is the difference between the two? The railway company proposes to build a railway to sell transportation and to make money out of it. The power company seeks incorporation in order to sell power to propel railways as well as for other purposes. The public advantage comes in equally well in both cases. Then take the case of irrigation. Farmers own land, or it is a part of the public domain, it is not blessed with a copious rainfall. Irrigation becomes an essential matter, and irrigation cannot be had in a great many cases without the power of expropriation, and parliament steps in and gives the power of expropriation. Therefore I have thought that the matter was so simple that it scarcely required to be discussed. Of course it is a serious matter to exercise the power of expropriation. We know that. Private interests have to succumb to what are the broader public interests. I remember two or three years ago when the government introduced a Bill in this House for the purpose of extending the power of expropriation as far as the government was concerned, I tried very hard to impress the hon. gentlemen—I do not know whether my hon. friend from Russell (Hon. Mr. Edwards) was one of my audience or not—but I tried strongly to impress the hon. gentlemen sitting on the opposite side of the House with the danger of the proposition that was then submitted to us, and which has been made law.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—What proposition?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—To enlarge the power of expropriation, so that the government could take private property, and if they found afterwards that they did not want it they could throw it back on the hands of the owners. They could take a limited interest in it or an interest for a limited time. It was extending the power of expropriation in what I conceded to be a dangerous manner, and I have very little doubt that already hardships have arisen under it. At all events, great hardships will arise under it, if it is not administered with great caution and care. However, parliament gave that power. We are not in this Bill giving that extraordinary power. We are giving the right of expropriation, and a final tribunal will determine what the owner is to receive as compensation for the property which is taken from him. I cannot see any difference in principle, or for that matter, in a great many cases in practice, between the power of expropriation to a railway or giving it to a power company.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Would the hon. gentleman give it to every private corporation ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would give it to any company that is seeking a charter from this parliament, where it is of such a nature that the project cannot be successfully carried on without it.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—That has not been shown to us.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am not acquainted with the locality in this case, but I assume it is similar to a good many other localities, and that a great many private interests will be affected, and one man owing a little strip of property, perhaps not worth $100, might prevent the construction of a work which might give employment to hundreds of people, and which might supply power to electric railways and to factories all over the country. Is that right ? Unless you have the right of expropriation, one man who might hold an interest not amounting to $100, could block a very important project. That is why we give the power of expropriation. The object is not to take land at less than its value. The private interest has to yield to the public interest, and it will not be left in the power of any one man to prevent a useful public work from being carried on in the general interest of the public. My hon. friend from Russell started with the declaration that the whole Bill was wrong, because this work was situated entirely within the province of Ontario, and my hon. friend intended to refer it back on that ground.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS—Allow me to correct the hon. gentleman. I said the streams involved from which this water is to be obtained are provincial streams, absolutely within the jurisdiction of the province of Ontario, over which the Dominion has no control.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Dominion has control over the canal.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would not set up my view against that of a lawyer of standing on that point, but I am strongly of the opinion that if we grant this charter and give them this power, declaring the work to be for the general advantage of Canada, they can do anything they require to do ; but if they have not that power they can go to the legislature of Ontario, as I have no doubt they will if necessary, and I have not the slightest doubt they will obtain there any powers necessary to supplement what we are giving here in order to carry on such a useful work as this is. I am quite convinced no parliament will refuse it because power companies are as essential for the progress of any country, just as railways are, and in other parts of the country irrigation is just as essential as either of them ; therefore I have no hesitation in giving my assent to the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WILSON—Before the vote is taken, I desire to give my reasons for voting on this Bill.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Which way is the hon. gentleman going to vote ?

Hon. Mr. WILSON—The hon. gentleman will find that out full well if he will wait a few minutes. I believe there is a principle involved in the Bill which we as members of this House ought to support. As far as clause 17 is concerned they may contend now that it comes entirely under the jurisdiction of the province of Ontario. If that is the case, why has not the principle advocated by the hon. gentleman from Russell been acted on continually ? It appears to me that we frequently advocate principles just as it may suit the individual ; that ought not to be. There is a reason for the passing of this Bill. We know that in Dunnville they have already a dam and water-power to a certain extent, by which grist mills are being run. If this was to arrest the water-power there, whereby it would flood the land and further interfere with the farming community along the stream above that point, I certainly would not be one to advocate the granting of rights to the company. Already they have that right, and we have no means of overcoming it, and they have flooded many acres of land in that vicinity and interfered with the farming community. That trouble exists at the present time. Why should we refuse the right of generating more power there, to enable the village of Dunnville and other places to further their interests in manufacturing industries ? As far as clause 17 is concerned, we find that no injustice can be done to any party. It must be brought into operation under an order in council, and I must confess, and gladly do so, that the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield is a true and correct principle that we ought to follow in this instance. It is not a private company ; it is a public company. The water-power has been there for some time; they have industries established, I know not how long, and it is by means of these industries that the village of Dunnville is the prosperous place it is. Although they have this water-power, you say to them that they shall not use it for any other purpose than merely running mills. Would hon. gentlemen prevent the people of Dunnville from having the same rights and privileges which we have been granting to hundreds of other municipalities ? I think it would not be fair. I do not believe any hon. gentleman who has examined carefully the condition of the country about Dunnville and the industries along this stream, would feel disposed to act on sentiment, because I must say it is a very easy thing for some hon. members to swallow themselves in reference to provincial rights and provincial powers without any hesitation or difficulty. They say one thing one day, and perhaps the next day a different thing. My hon. friend has ears to hear, and has a right to change his opinion, and he is systematically doing that, and to-day he is opposing this Bill upon the principle of it being within the jurisdiction of the province of Ontario. I strongly contend that hon. gentlemen here, if they knew the locality, would say that the water-power that is going to develop new industries there ought to be granted. I believe that it will develop industries there. The town of Dunnville ought to be encouraged. They were in a backward condition for a long time, and the flooding of the country above the stream is not going to be increased in any way whatever to the injury of the farming community more than it is at the present time. Therefore I shall vote for the third reading of the Bill.

The amendment was lost on a division.

The main motion was carried, and the Bill was then read a third time and passed.

COURT OF APPEAL FOR MANITOBA BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (195) An Act respecting the Court of Appeal for Manitoba.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 1,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does this provincial statute come into operation by proclamation ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. The controverted elections are to be tried in the Court of Appeal, and those changes in the Bill are consequent upon that.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend know whether this is to be a court of appeal, or a court of original jurisdiction ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a Court of Appeal. I endeavoured to inform myself on it, but they did not send down a copy of the Act. I suppose there is a copy in the Justice Department. I shall endeavour to procure a copy before the third reading.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 7,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The salaries are put on a par with the salaries paid to judges of the Court of King's Bench and the courts in Toronto. The chief justice gets $8,000, and the puisne judges $7,000 each.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think clause 7 should not form part of this Bill, but should be an independent Bill. It is amending the Act with reference to taking bribes, and it seems to me that it is very incongruous to have it in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It refers, of course, to the bribing of voters, and the only change in the clause is 'And in Manitoba to the Court of Appeal.' It read before 'And in Manitoba to the King's Bench.' It is germane here, because it gives jurisdiction to the Court of Appeals.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER, from the committee, reported the Bill without amendment.

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE SENATE.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. David : That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all petitions, resolutions or documents concerning the abolition or reorganization of the Senate.—Hon. Mr. Ellis.

Hon. Mr. ELLIS moved that the order of the day be discharged, and made the first order of the day after third reading for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I wanted to say something on this motion and would like to follow my hon. friend to-morrow.
